Saul, the persecutor of the Church, because establishing his own righteousness. For from there was also that which persecuted the Church, according to the zeal of paternal traditions; from there it was, because he was establishing his own righteousness, he was not seeking the righteousness of God. For see how he was persecuting the Church. What then shall we say? said the Apostle himself in another place: Because the Gentiles who did not pursue righteousness have attained righteousness. But what kind? The righteousness which is by faith. But the Gentiles who did not pursue righteousness, which is by law, as if their own, which is done out of fear of punishment, not out of love of righteousness; because they did not pursue righteousness, they attained righteousness; but the righteousness which is of faith. But Israel, he says, pursuing the law of righteousness, did not attain the law of righteousness. Why? Because it was not by faith. What does it mean: Because it was not by faith? He did not hope in God, he did not ask for it from God, he did not believe in Him who justifies the ungodly; he was not like the Publican lowering his eyes to the ground, beating his breast, and saying: Lord, be merciful to me a sinner. Therefore: Pursuing the law of righteousness, he did not attain the law of righteousness. Why? Because it was not by faith, but as if by works. For they stumbled at the stumbling stone. Behold why Saul persecuted the Church. For when he persecuted the Church, he stumbled at the stumbling stone. Christ lay humble on the earth; indeed, He was also in heaven, His flesh raised from the dead; but unless Christ lay on the earth, He would not have cried out to Saul: Why do you persecute me? Therefore He lay humble because He displayed humility; he stumbled because he did not see. And all this not seeing, where was it from? From the swelling of pride. What is it: From the swelling of pride? As if from his own righteousness. From the law, indeed, but his own. What is it: From the law? Because in the commands of the law. What is it: From his own? As if from his own strength. Love was missing, the love of righteousness, the love of the charity of Christ. And from where would he have love? Fear alone possessed him, but it kept a place in his heart for the love to come. While he raged upright, boasting, glorying among the Jews themselves that according to the zeal of paternal traditions he was persecuting the Church; while he seemed exalted to himself, he heard from above the voice of our Lord Jesus Christ, now sitting in heaven, and still commending humility: Saul, he said, Saul, why do you persecute me? It is hard for you to kick against the goads. I could let you go; for you would be troubled by my pricks, I would not be broken by your kicks; but I do not let you go. You rage, and I pity. Why do you persecute me? For I do not fear you, lest you crucify me again; but I want you to recognize me, so that you do not kill not me, but yourself.

Paul shudders at his own righteousness, so that he may have righteousness from God. The Apostle, therefore, shuddered, struck down and prostrated, raised up and instructed. For it happened in him: "I will wound, and I will heal." For he does not say: "I will heal, and I will wound;" but: "I will wound, and I will heal." I will wound you, and I will give myself to you. Thus prostrated, he shuddered at his own righteousness, in which he certainly was without complaint, praiseworthy, great, almost glorious among the Jews; he considered these things losses, believed them damages, counted them as refuse, so that he might be found in Him not having his own righteousness, which is from the law, but that which is through faith in Christ, which, he says, is from God. But what does the Apostle himself say about those who stumbled over the stone of offense? Because, he says, not by faith, but as though by works. For they stumbled at the stone of offense as though by their own righteousness; as it is written: "Behold, I lay in Zion a stumbling stone and a rock of scandal; and whoever believes in Him shall not be put to shame." For whoever believes in Him will not have his own righteousness, which is from the law, though the law itself is good; but he will fulfill that law, not by his own righteousness, but by that given from God. Thus he will not be put to shame. For charity is the fullness of the law. And whence is this charity poured into our hearts? Surely not from ourselves, but through the Holy Spirit who has been given to us. Therefore, they stumbled at the stone of offense, and the rock of scandal. And he said of them: "Brethren, my heart's desire and prayer to God for them is for their salvation." The Apostle prays for the unbelievers, that they may believe; for those turned away, that they may be converted. You see that even this conversion is not without God's aid. "My prayer," he says, "to God for them is for salvation. For I bear them witness that they have a zeal for God." So he himself had it too; he had a zeal for God. But how did he have it? As they had it: "but not according to knowledge." What is this: "not according to knowledge"? For being ignorant of God's righteousness and seeking to establish their own. Hence he, corrected, says: "Not having my own righteousness." They want to establish their own, still taking pleasure in lying in refuse. I do not have my own righteousness, but that which is through faith in Christ, the righteousness from God; righteousness, I say, from God, who justifies the ungodly.

True justice for us is not except by grace.

Remove yourself, remove yourself, I say, from yourself, you hinder yourself; if you build yourself, you build ruin. Unless the Lord builds the house, those who build it labor in vain. Therefore, do not wish to have your own righteousness. Certainly, it is from the law, indeed from the law; certainly, God gave the law, and because righteousness is from the law, it should not be yours. The Apostle Paul speaks; let not those who love their own righteousness slander me. See where you have him: open, read, listen, see. Do not have your own righteousness; the Apostle accounts it as filth, even though it is from the law, yet because it is his own. For being ignorant of the righteousness of God, and wishing to establish their own, they have not submitted to the righteousness of God. Do not think that because you are called a Christian, you cannot stumble on the stone of offense. To whom grace is denied, in him you stumble. It is less to offend Christ hanging on the cross than sitting in heaven. Let there be righteousness, but let it be from grace, let it be from God to you; let it not be yours. "May your priests be clothed with righteousness," he says. A garment is received, not born with hair; livestock are clothed from their own. This the Apostle Paul proclaims: let it be from God to you. Groan to obtain it, weep to obtain it, believe to obtain it. "Whoever," he says, "shall call upon the name of the Lord, will be saved." Do you think it was said this way: "Whoever shall call upon the name of the Lord, will be saved"; from fever, or from plague, or from gout, or from some bodily pain? Not so, but will be saved, will be righteous. Since: "It is not the healthy who need a doctor, but the sick." He explained it when he said: "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners."

It is great to know the power of Christ's resurrection. Our resurrection is more wonderful.

Therefore, see what follows. "And I be found in him," he says, "not having my own righteousness, which is from the law; though it is from the law, yet it is mine: but that which is through the faith of Christ; which is obtained from God, which is from God, righteousness through faith, to know him, and the power of his resurrection." It is a great thing to acknowledge the power of the resurrection of Christ. Do you think this is great, because he raised his own flesh? Did he say the power of his resurrection itself? Will it not also be our resurrection at the end of the age? Will not this corruptible put on incorruption, and this mortal put on immortality? Just as he rose from the dead, and no longer dies, death no longer has dominion over him; so also we, more wonderfully, if I may say so? For his flesh did not see corruption; ours is restored from ashes. Indeed, it is a great thing because he preceded us as an example and gave us something to hope for; but this is not the only thing for him who spoke of righteousness not his own, but that which is from God, and there he mentioned the power of the resurrection of Christ; recognize there your justification. For we are justified by his resurrection, as if we were circumcised from a stone. Therefore, he began there: "We are the circumcision." From what circumcision? From a stone. What stone? Christ. How? On the eighth day. How did the Lord rise on the Lord's Day? Our justification is from grace, not without our will.

Therefore, my brothers, let us have this justification, insofar as we have it, and let us increase it insofar as we are lesser, and let us complete it when we arrive there, where it will be said: "Where, O death, is your victory? Where, O death, is your sting?" But all is from God; not, however, as if we were sleeping, not as if we were not to strive, not as if we were not to will. Without your will, the justice of God will not be in you. Indeed, the will is yours, the justice is God's. The justice of God can exist without your will, but it cannot exist in you without your will. It has been shown what you ought to do; the law commanded: Do not do this, do not do that; do this and that. It has been shown to you, it has been commanded to you, it has been revealed to you; if you have a heart, you have understood what you ought to do; pray that you may do it, if you recognize the power of Christ's resurrection. For he was delivered for our offenses, and he rose for our justification. What does it mean: for our justification? That he might justify us, that he might make us just. You will be the work of God, not only because you are a human, but also because you are just. For it is better to be just than to be human. If God made you a human, and you make yourself just, you do something better than God did. But God made you without you. For you did not give any consent, that God might make you. How could you consent when you were not? Therefore, he who made you without you, does not justify you without you. Therefore, he made you not knowing, he justifies you willing. However, he himself justifies, lest it be your justice, lest you return to losses, to detriments and dregs, finding in him not having your justice, which is from the law, but the justice through the faith of Christ, which is from God; the justice from faith, to know him, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings. And that same power will be your strength; the fellowship of Christ's sufferings will be your strength. The sharing of Christ's sufferings from love. But what will it be: in sharing the sufferings of Christ, if there is no love? Are not robbers found in such physical strength that some of them not only were unwilling to betray their accomplices, but also refused to confess their own names; amidst tortures, amidst torments, with their sides broken open, and nearly losing their limbs, their spirit remained in the most wicked obstinacy? See, therefore, what they loved. However, they could not do these things without great love. But not so the lover of God. God is not loved, except from God. That man loved I know not what else of the flesh, like a human. Whatever he loved, he loved his companions, he loved the consciousness of crimes, he loved glory in wicked deeds; whatever he loved, he loved much, who could be tortured, could not fail. So if he could, who could be tortured, could not fail; if he could not bear so much without love; neither can you share in the sufferings of Christ without love.

Charity and enlargement of the heart from the Holy Spirit. But I ask, with what love? Let it not be desire, but charity. For if, he says, I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profits me nothing. To benefit from the communion of Christ's sufferings, charity must be present. Whence comes charity for you? O most impoverished weakness, whence for you comes the love of God? Do you wish me to show you whence it comes? Ask the Lord's storehouse. For if the love of God is in you, you will share in Christ's sufferings and be a true martyr. In whom love is crowned, he will be a true martyr. So, from where is it for you? We have this treasure in earthen vessels, says the Apostle, so that the excellence of the power may be of God and not of us. So, where is charity for you, except it be because it is poured into our hearts through the Holy Spirit who has been given to us? Behold for which you groan. Despise your spirit, receive the Spirit of God. Let not your spirit fear, lest when the Spirit of God begins to dwell in you, it should suffer distress in your body. When the Spirit of God begins to dwell in your body, it will not exclude your spirit; do not fear. If you host a wealthy person, you suffer distress; you find no place to stay, where to prepare a bed for him, where for his wife, where for his children, where for the household. What do I do, you ask? Where do I go? Where will I move? Receive the wealthy Spirit of God; you will be expanded, not distressed. You have widened my steps beneath me, you say. You will say to your guest: You have widened my steps beneath me. When you were not here, I suffered distress; you filled my room, and did not exclude me, but my distress. For when he says: The love of God is poured out, this diffusion signifies widening. Do not, then, fear distress, receive this guest; and let him not be a guest as if passing through. For he does not have to give by departing: coming, let him dwell in you, and he gave. Be his, let him not leave you, let him not migrate from there; hold him entirely, and say to him: Lord our God, possess us. The Apostle professes himself imperfect.

Therefore, he said, let us have that righteousness which is from God, to know Him, and the power of His resurrection, and the fellowship of His sufferings, being conformed to His death. For we are buried, he said, with Christ through Baptism into death; that just as Christ was raised from the dead, so we too may walk in newness of life. Die, so that you may live; be buried, so that you may rise again. For when you have been buried and have risen again, then it will be true: Lift up your heart. It made sense what I said. Would this speech have made sense if there were not an internal sweetness in you? Conformed, he said, to His death, if by any means I may attain to the resurrection from the dead. He was speaking of righteousness, the righteousness which is through faith in Christ, the righteousness which is from God, and thus he executed all things. And when he sought righteousness saying: That I may be found in Him, not having my own righteousness, which is from the law, but the righteousness which is through faith in Christ, which is from God; now he says: If by any means I may attain to the resurrection from the dead. Why did you say: If by any means I may attain? Not that I have already received it, or am already perfect; but I press on, if I may lay hold of that for which Christ Jesus has also laid hold of me. His righteousness has gone before me, let mine follow Him. However, mine will follow if it is not mine. If by any means I may attain to the resurrection from the dead. Why did you say: If by any means I may attain? Not that I have already received it, or am already perfect; but I press on, if I may lay hold of that for which Christ Jesus has also laid hold of me. His righteousness has gone before me, let mine follow Him. However, mine will follow if it is not mine. If by any means I may attain. Not that I have already received it, or am already perfect. Those who were hearing the Apostle say this began to marvel: Not that I have already received it, or am already perfect. What is it that he had not yet received? He had faith, he had virtue, he had hope, he burned with charity, he performed virtuous deeds, he preached most invincibly, he endured all persecutions, in all things patient, loving the Church, bearing the care of all the Churches in his heart; what had he not yet received? Not that I have already received it, or am already perfect. What is it that you say? You say it, and we marvel; you say it, and we are astonished. For we know what we are hearing; what do you say? Brothers, he says. What is it that you say? What do you say? I do not consider myself to have apprehended. Do not, he said, be deceived in me; I know myself better than you do. If I do not know what is lacking in me, I do not know what is present. I do not consider myself to have apprehended. But one thing; this I do not consider myself to have apprehended. I have many things, and I have not yet apprehended one thing. One thing have I asked of the Lord, this will I seek after. What have you asked for, or what do you seek after? That I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life. For what? To behold the delight of the Lord. This is the one thing that the Apostle said he had not yet apprehended; and as much as he lacked this, to that extent he was not yet perfect. The duties of Martha and Mary. Contemplation.

You remember, my brothers, that Gospel reading where two sisters received the Lord: Martha and Mary. You certainly recall: Martha was busied with much serving and was occupied with the care of the house, as she had received the Lord and His disciples as guests. She was diligently and earnestly taking care that the saints would suffer no offense in her house. While she was thus engaged in much serving, Mary, her sister, sat at the Lord's feet and was listening to His word. Martha was annoyed with her labor because she saw Mary sitting and not caring about her labors, and she appealed to the Lord: "Lord, does it not concern You that my sister has left me to serve alone? Tell her to help me." The Lord replied: "Martha, Martha, you are anxious and troubled about many things. But one thing is necessary. Mary has chosen the better part, which will not be taken away from her. You have chosen well, for it is good to serve the saints, but she has chosen the better part. What you have chosen is transient. You serve the hungry, you provide for the thirsty, you prepare beds for those who sleep, you offer a home for those who want to dwell; all these things pass away. There will be a time when no one hungers, no one thirsts, no one sleeps. Therefore, your care will be taken from you. Mary has chosen the better part, which will not be taken away from her. It will not be taken away; she has chosen to contemplate and to live by the word. What kind of life will there be of the Word without the word? Now she lived by the Word, but by the sounding word. There will be a life by the Word without the sounding word. The very Word is life. We will be like Him, because we will see Him as He is. She was the one to contemplate the Lord's delight. We cannot do this in the night of this world. 'In the morning, I will stand before You and contemplate.' Thus: 'I do not consider myself to have apprehended it yet. One thing, however...'"

Always advancing on the way towards God.

What then do I do? Forgetting what lies behind and straining forward to what lies ahead, I follow according to purpose. I still follow: to the prize of the upward calling of God in Christ Jesus. I still follow, I still advance, I still walk, I am still on the way, I still extend myself, I have not yet arrived. Therefore, if you also walk, if you stretch forward, if you think of the things that are to come; forget the past, do not look back at it, lest you remain where you have looked back. Remember Lot’s wife. As many of us as are perfect, let us think this way. He had said: I am not perfect, and he says: As many of us as are perfect, let us think this way. I do not consider myself to have apprehended. Not that I have already obtained, or am already perfect; and he says: As many of us as are perfect, let us think this way. Perfect, and not perfect; perfect travelers, not yet perfect possessors. And so that you may know that he speaks of perfect travelers; those who are already walking on the way are perfect travelers; so that you know he spoke of travelers, not residents, not possessors; hear what follows: As many of us as are perfect, let us think this way. And if in any way you think otherwise, lest perhaps it creeps in on you, because you think you are something. For if anyone thinks he is something, when he is nothing, he deceives himself. And if anyone thinks he knows something, he does not yet know as he ought to know. Therefore: And if in any way you think otherwise, as small children; God will also reveal that to you. Regardless, to what we have attained, let us walk in it. So that God may reveal to us also that which we think otherwise, to what we have achieved, let us not remain in it, but let us walk in it. You see that we are travelers. You say: What is it to walk? I briefly say: To advance; lest perhaps you do not understand, and walk more sluggishly. Advance, my brothers, always examine yourselves without deceit, without flattery, without fondling. For there is no one inside you, whom you should be ashamed of, and boast yourself. There is someone there, but one to whom humility is pleasing, let him test you. Even you yourself, test yourself. Always be dissatisfied with what you are, if you wish to arrive at what you are not yet. For when you are pleased with yourself, there you have remained. But if you say: It is enough; and you have perished. Always add, always walk, always advance; do not remain on the way, do not return backward, do not go astray. He remains, who does not advance; he returns backward, who turns back to what he had already left; he goes astray, who deserts. It is better for the lame to walk on the way, than for the runner to pass by the way. Turned towards the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 16A

SERMON 16/A Sermon Delivered in the Major Basilica Sunday, the fourteenth day before the Kalends of July. On the Response of Psalm 38:

"Hear my prayer and my supplication, Lord." AND OF THE WOMAN TAKEN IN ADULTERY Introduction. The psalmist asks for help from God, because he proposes a difficult matter for himself.

It is for Christians to progress in God daily and always to rejoice about God or His gifts. For the time of our pilgrimage is very short, and our homeland is timeless. Indeed, there is a great difference between eternity and time. Here piety is acquired, there one rests. Therefore, let us know as good merchants what we have gained each day. For we must not only be diligent in hearing but vigilant in doing. This school, in which God alone is the teacher, seeks good disciples, not fugitives but diligent ones. The Apostle says: Not lacking in diligence, fervent in spirit, rejoicing in hope. Therefore, Brothers, we learn daily in this school. We learn something in precepts, something in examples, something in sacraments. These are the medicines for our wounds and the supports for our studies. Just now we responded: Hear my prayer and my plea, O Lord; to listen, that is, to receive my tears with your ears. What do you think he is about to ask, who first desires God to be propitious to him? What will he ask from Him? Let us see, let us learn. Perhaps he is about to ask for wealth? Perhaps for some happiness in this life? Let him tell us then what he is about to ask, who first asks God for favor. For he saw that he could not have from himself, but could have from God. For he had heard: Ask, and you shall receive. Therefore, he knew what he was to ask, who first prayed to God; therefore hear, O God, my prayer. And as if asked: "What do you want, what do you seek, what do you cry out for, what do you plead for? I will hear what you want." "What do I want? Hear my will and fulfill your work. What is my will? I said, I will guard my ways, so that I do not sin with my tongue." He plans a difficult thing, but he does not doubt, because he first prayed to the Lord. For he knew the teaching of Paul: Not I, but the grace of God with me. The resolve not to sin in language, of which, however, there is great necessity for us.

Therefore I said, “I will guard my ways.” Which ways? Earthly ways? Do we walk on earth by means of the tongue? Either we walk on the earth with our own feet, or with the feet of others. Either we are carried by animals, or we go with our own feet. What then? What way does he seek, lest he sin with his tongue? It is a great teaching. See, brothers. For can we, in the manner that we can receive food and depart refreshed in one hour, also speak and remain silent in one moment? For as we have eyes for seeing, ears for hearing, and other senses for perceiving, so do we also have a tongue for speaking. The necessity of the tongue for us is great. Either you are going to hear something so that you may respond, or you are going to say something so that you may teach. Are you going to speak with your eyes and not with your tongue? And if you are going to listen with your ears, you will respond with your tongue. What do we do with such a useful member? From it we pray to God, we confess our sins, we give praise, we sing to God with one voice in harmony, and in our daily lives, we either show mercy when we converse with others, or we give counsel. What are we to do now? Our very tongue offers you service. What are we to do so that we do not sin with our tongue? Especially since it has been said: “Death and life are in the power of the tongue,” and again it has been said: “I have seen many fall by the edge of the sword, but not as many as by the tongue.” Again it has been said: “The tongue is a small member, yet it boasts of great things. Consider how a great forest is set on fire by a small spark.” Again the same Lord said: “They have taught their tongue to speak lies.” Oh, they have taught it! For habit causes it to speak lies; even if you do not wish to, it speaks lies. Just as if you turn a wheel once, having pushed it with your hand, it runs because of its shape and roundness and by its own unstable and almost natural course, so too does our tongue; it does not need to be taught to speak lies. For already, once started, it runs by itself to what it can more easily move toward. Sometimes you have something in your heart, and it speaks something else out of habit. What are you to do? What a balance of the heart is needed, as you see, brothers, for the tongue to utter something! For it is not moved spontaneously; there is someone within who moves it. The tongue is moved from within: if you are not troubled within, the tongue causes no harm.

There is indeed a certain force that moves itself and its other ministries. It is necessary that the one who rules is good, and, assisted by grace, overcomes any bad custom. Let the minister be good, and the ministry rests. The soldier has weapons, but if he does nothing, the weapons do nothing. Likewise, the tongue in our members is the weapon of our soul. Of it, it has been said: A restless evil. Oh, restless! Who made this evil, if not the restless? You do not be restless, and this evil does not exist; you do not stir, and there is nothing that stirs itself. For it is not a mind that it should be moved. It is indeed a body, it lies. Do not move it, and it is not moved. See, however, how you move. It is that, about which many pursuing fraud and serving avarice, when they begin to deal in business, drive out the member made to praise God, and there blaspheme God and say: "By Christ! I buy this much, I sell this much." Why? I asked you. Swear to me, how much do you sell? I asked you: How much do you sell? "For ten coins I sell, for twenty coins." By Christ, you swear. Swear by your eyes, swear by your children, and at that very moment, your conscience trembles. Oh, impiety of the tongue! You scorned the Creator, you guarded the creature. Oh, restless evil, full of deadly poison! With it, we bless God and the Father: but God because of nature, Father because of grace; And with it, we curse man who is made in the image of God. Attend, Brothers, to what you carry. Behold, I say what we carry, for I am a man with you. But let us turn back. The deceitful tongue of the Jews who brought the adulterous woman.

Hear, O Lord, my prayer. From there are those Jews whom we just read about in the Gospel. Certainly, their tongue led them to death. For just now in the Gospel we heard. The Jews brought a certain woman, even though she was a prostitute, to the Lord, tempting Him and saying: "Master, this woman has just now been caught in adultery. In the law of Moses it is written, that whoever is caught in adultery should be stoned: what do You say?" This their tongue was saying, but they did not recognize the Creator. They did not wish to pray, to say: "Deliver my soul from a deceitful tongue." For deceitfully they approached; this they intended to do. For the Lord had come, not to abolish the law, but to fulfill it, and to forgive sins. Therefore, the Jews said among themselves: "If He says: Let her be stoned, we will say to Him: Where is it that You forgive sins? Are You not the one who says: Your sins are forgiven you? If He says: Let her go, we will say: Where is it that You have come to fulfill the law, not to abolish it?" See the deceitful tongue against God. He who had come as the Redeemer, not the condemner (for He had come to redeem what was lost) turned away from them, as if not wishing to look at them. This turning away from them is no trivial thing. Something is implied in this turning away. As if He would say: "You bring a sinner to Me, you sinners. If you think I should condemn sins, I begin with you." And He, who had come to forgive sins, said: "Whoever among you knows himself to be without sin, let him first cast a stone at her." O response, or proposal! If they wished to cast a stone at the sinner, at that moment it would again be said: "In whatever judgment you judge, you will be judged." You condemn, you will be condemned. However, although they did not recognize the Creator, they knew their own conscience. Putting their faces one after another, so that they would not see each other out of shame, from the oldest - as the Evangelist said - to the youngest, they all went out. For the Holy Spirit had said: "All have turned away, together they have become worthless; there is none who does good, not even one." The tongue of the woman, sincere in confession, finds mercy. And they all went out. He remained alone with her; the Creator and the creature remained; misery and mercy remained; she who acknowledged her guilt remained, and He who forgave sin. For it is written that He turned and wrote on the ground. He wrote on the ground. For when man sinned, it was said to him: You are dust. Therefore, when He granted forgiveness to the sinner, He wrote on the ground. He granted forgiveness; and while granting forgiveness, He raised His face to her and said: Has no one condemned you? And she did not say: "Why? What have I done, Lord? Am I not guilty?" She did not say this, but said: No one, Lord. She accused herself. They could not prove it and withdrew themselves. But she confessed, and the Lord, who did not ignore her guilt but sought her faith and confession, asked: Has no one condemned you? And she said: No one, Lord. And because of the confession of sins, and the Lord because of the grace of forgiveness. No one, Lord. I acknowledge both. I know who You are, I know who I am. For I confess to You. For I heard: Confess to the Lord, for He is good. I know my confession and I know Your mercy. She said: I will guard my ways that I may not sin with my tongue. They sinned by acting deceitfully; she rather absolved herself by confessing. Has no one condemned you? And she said: No one, and was silent. He wrote again. He wrote twice, which we have heard, He wrote twice: once granting forgiveness, and again renewing the commandments. Both are done when we receive forgiveness. The Emperor signed. When the form proceeds again, as if new commandments are given. They are the same, through which we first heard that charity commanded by the Apostle. For we first heard that reading. From there the Lord Himself said: You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your strength; and: You shall love your neighbor as yourself. On these two commandments hang all the Law and the Prophets.

Always and everywhere give thanks to God; where not thanks. That none of us might struggle, two things have been said: God and neighbor; He who made you, and with whom He made you. No one said to you: "Love the sun, love the moon, love the earth and whatever has been made." In these, God is to be praised, the Creator is to be blessed. How magnificent are your works! We say, you have made all things in wisdom. They are yours, you made all things. Thanks to you! But you made us above all things. Thanks to you! For we are your image and likeness. Thanks to you! We have sinned, we have been sought. Thanks to you! We have neglected, we have not been neglected. Thanks to you! While we despised you, we were not despised; lest we forget your divinity and lose you, you even assumed our humanity. Thanks to you! Where not to be thankful?

I said therefore, "I will guard my ways, so that I may not sin with my tongue." For that woman, when accused of adultery, received forgiveness and was freed. Is it burdensome to us, because through baptism, through confession, through grace, all receive forgiveness of all their sins? But now let no one say: "She received forgiveness. I am still a catechumen. I will commit adultery, for I will receive forgiveness. Just place me as one like that woman. She confessed, and she was liberated. Our God is good. And if I sin, I confess to Him, and He will forgive me." You consider His goodness, but consider also His justice. As goodness is to forgiveness, so justice is to punishment. I said therefore, "I will guard my ways, so that I may not sin with my tongue." I would like to know, if at this time while we are speaking to your Charity, no one sins with their tongue. At this time, while we are here, perhaps none of us has spoken any evil, but perhaps has thought some evil. Pay attention. I said, "I will guard my ways, so that I may not sin with my tongue." Say truly: "I have set a guard to my mouth while the sinner stands against me."

If your frenzied brother reviles you, become deaf and remain silent. Be attentive: I have set a guard on my mouth while the sinner stands against me. Someone wicked stands against you, reviles you, and says things you do not know. You set a guard on your mouth. I said, I will keep my ways, that I may not sin with my tongue. Let him speak. You listen and remain silent. There are two possibilities: either he speaks the truth, or he lies. If he speaks the truth, you have done what he is saying. And perhaps this is mercy. When you do not wish to hear what you have done, God, who takes care of you, through someone tells you what you have done, so that by the shame, you may sometimes seek healing. Therefore, do not repay evil for evil. For you do not know who is speaking to you through him. Therefore, if he says something you did, recognize that you have obtained mercy, either thinking you forgot, or judging that it was said for your confusion. If you have not done it, your conscience is clear. Why do you seek? Why do you get angry about what you did not do? For what does he call you? "Thief"? "Drunkard"? Quickly return within to the secrets of conscience. Look within yourself. Be a judge, be an examiner of yourself. Ask there: "Where do you think I put my sins that I did?" Or if they are not there, say: "I did not do it." If your conscience says, "I did not do it," say: This is our glory: the testimony of our conscience. Did your conscience tell you this? Be silent, grieve for the one who speaks to you. Also say to God: "Father, forgive him, for he does not know what he says." Pray for him to God. I said, I will keep my ways, that I may not sin with my tongue. I have set a guard on my mouth while the sinner stands against me. For do not think you appear holy only when no one tempts you. You are holy when you are not moved by any reviling, when you grieve for the one who speaks, when you do not care about what you suffer, but yet grieve for the one through whom you suffer. All mercy is in this. You grieve because he is also your brother, a member of your body. He acts insane against you, he is frenetic, he is sick. Grieve for him, do not rejoice. Only rejoice in the security of your conscience. Grieve over that. For you are human. See lest you also be tempted. For it is said: Carry each other's burdens, and thus you will fulfill the law of Christ. Now, when he says, "Be silent," after he has calmed down, say to him: "Brother, for your own sake why did you tell me what I did not do? You have sinned against me; I pray to God for you. Indeed, I forgive you, and I pray to my God for you, whom you have wronged when you sinned against me. Do not do it anymore, do not be prideful." I do not say: Repay him, God, who said to me what I did not do. I do not want to say this. I have set a guard on my mouth while the sinner stands against me.

Afterward, when he has been made sincere, speak; then he will understand.

I have become deaf and humbled - this follows - and I have remained silent about good things. I became deaf: I did not listen to him speaking. How much has that soul progressed, which rejoices internally in the error of a brother and the security of its own conscience, that it does not know what is barked outside! What kind of soul is that, how secure, how joyful! This is the one which says to God: I walked in the innocence of my heart, in the midst of your house. Burglar doors were pounding, but the house was adequate. I became deaf and humbled, I did not become arrogant against him. And humbled, I was silent about good things. For it was not the time to say something good. For it is the time to be silent now. After he has purified, speak, then he will understand. Frequently sick sons struck their fathers. Yet because of the weakness of the sons, they were both beaten and wept. What affection men apply to their sons, so that they do not die, hoping for the health of their sons! "But he is not my son", you say. But he is the work of God, the image of God, the son of God. If you scorn because he is not your son, do not scorn because he is the son of God, he is your brother. "Therefore I have become deaf and humbled. I did not become arrogant, but I was silent about good things, and my sorrow was renewed, not about me, but about him, because I did not do what he said. I had sorrow, but because he said so. I had sorrow; for bearing care for my brother, sorrow was renewed within me." This is the way. For this the Lord our Father himself did, who also is called the Bridegroom. The children of the bridegroom will not fast, he says, as long as the bridegroom is with them. He was beaten by frenzied sons, the frenzied sons killed him. He prayed for them. Afterwards, they were purified, knew and believed, and those who did not want to be healed by the doctor, were healed by the disciple of the doctor, for they were healed by Peter. For when Peter rebuked them, they said: What shall we do? Then Peter said: Repent, and let every one of you be baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ. Now they were furious, now they believed. You see what sickness and health do. When they were sick, they were tolerated; when they became well, they were redeemed. Hence also we, Brothers, whenever we suffer such things, let us be silent. Let us hold to those two things: either he speaks truth, or speaks falsehood. "And if he did not speak, and I acted, what then? Because he does not speak, and I acted, I wish that he would speak, so that I be ashamed, because I acted: this is the mercy of God. But if he says what I did not do, let me rejoice because of my security, let me grieve about the brother's infirmity. My heart was warmed within me. My heart was warmed within me from the love I have for my brother. But there is a time to speak, a time to be silent. I could not do it now. Hence Paul himself says: I could not speak to you as to spiritual, but as to carnal. However, he did speak. How did he speak? Therefore my heart was warmed within me, and in my meditation a fire was kindled. There is a fire of charity within me. I have none to whom I may speak because he is sick. Therefore I should humble myself. Perhaps there will be a time when I can speak something. However, forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. I will forgive him, what I do not have in conscience. It is not enough that I have nothing in conscience, but I should beg him for the sake of conscience."

Christ became our citizen to lead us back to the homeland.

Now he had already traversed, I said, I will guard my ways. I will place a guard on my mouth. I have been humbled, and in my meditation, a fire ignites. I do not know what suddenly brings forth something greater here, and after so many struggles and great labors, hear what he says: I have spoken with my tongue. For the tongue is the movement of the will itself of the soul. Just as the tongue is a movement in the body, so the will is a movement in the soul. There is the first tongue; it is from there, it speaks to God from there. This tongue provides service to men placed outside: but that tongue, which is in the movement of the will, provides service to Him remaining within His temple. It is the true tongue. Hence the Lord said, those who worship Him must worship in spirit and in truth. It is the true tongue. I said with my tongue: Make known to me, Lord, my end, and the number of my days what it is, so that I may know what is lacking to me. If Your Holiness considers, first understand the sentence, and thus the Lord with His mercy, as He always is accustomed, will give us with your prayers, that we might be able to discuss this because it is quite difficult. I have spoken with my tongue: make known to me, Lord, my end, and the number of my days what it is, so that I may know what is lacking to me. See what he prays: Make known to me, Lord, my end. The end is, Brothers, where we are heading, where we will remain. From the fact that we left our homes, the end for us was to come to the church. Therefore our journey is ended here. Hence again each one has an end to return to his home. There it ends, where it was aiming. Now thus established in this pilgrimage, we have an end where we aim. Where therefore do we aim? To our homeland. What is our homeland? Jerusalem, the mother of the devout, the mother of the living. There we aim. The end itself is. And because we did not know the way, the very citizen of that city made himself the way. We did not know by what way to go. Some intricate winding paths, thorny, stony, extremely heavy, were on the way. The chief one himself descended here; he descended seeking the citizens of that city. For we wandered, and though we are citizens of Jerusalem, we have become citizens of Babylon, we have become children of confusion: for Babylon is confusion. He descended here seeking his citizens, and he became our citizen. We did not know this city, this province we did not know. But because we did not come to it, he descended here to his citizens, and he became himself a citizen, not by consenting, but by taking. He descended here. How did he descend? In the form of a servant. God walked here among us as a man. For if he had been only a man, he would not have led to God. If he had been only God, he would not have been joined to men. He took upon himself the equality of condition with us, having divinity with the Father. He took upon himself temporality with us, having eternity with the Father. Here equal with us, there equal with the Father. Our citizen descended here, and said: "What are you doing here, citizens of Jerusalem? The image and likeness of God is not created except in Jerusalem. Statues of God are not placed in this life. Let us labor, let us return. By what way do we return? See, I lay myself down for you, I become the way for you, I will be the end for you. Imitate me." Make known to me, Lord, my end. We believe in Him himself, who is our end.

Christ is for us the way and example.

Father God now speaks: "I say to you, O soul that I made, O man whom I made, I say to you, you had ended. What had you ended? You had perished. I sent to you someone who sought you, I sent to you someone who walked with you, I sent to you someone who pardoned you. Hence he walked with feet, pardoned with hands. Hence, when after the resurrection he ascended, he showed hands, side, and feet: hands, by which he gave forgiveness of sins; feet, by which he announced peace to the forsaken; side, from which flowed the price of the redeemed." Christ, therefore, is the end of the law for righteousness to everyone that believes. Make known to me, Lord, my end. Now your night’s end has come to be known to you. How has your end been made known to you? Your end was poor, your end was humble, your end was struck with blows, your end was covered with spit, against your end false testimony was given. I set a guard upon my mouth while the sinner stood against me. He himself has become your way. Whoever says they abide in Christ ought to walk as he walked. There is the way. Now let us walk, let us not fear, let us not stray. Let us not walk outside the way. For it has been said: They laid scandals for me around the path, and they laid a snare for me around the path. And behold that mercy. So that you might not fall into the snare, you have that very mercy as the way. Make known to me, Lord, my end. Behold you have the end. Imitate Christ the redeemer: Be imitators of me, just as I am of Christ. How did Paul imitate Christ? Note what he said: In hunger and thirst, in cold and nakedness, and all the way to: Who is scandalized, and I do not burn? I have become all things to all men, so that I might save some. I set a guard upon my mouth while the sinner stood against me. What are the words of Paul, Brothers? Who shall separate me from the love of Christ? Consider the end. Who shall separate me from the love of Christ? Tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or nakedness, or peril? O loving, O fervent, O running, O arriving man! What did this soul endure? How fervently he taught, how fervently did he teach? Who shall separate me from the love of Christ? Distress? and so on, or sword? What did he endure? And lest anyone thought he was boasting, he said: Brothers, I consider I have not yet attained.

Never say: it is enough, but daily seek what you lack.

What does this mean: Make known to me, Lord, my end and the number of my days, what it is? How much do I have to live here? Why do you wish to know the day? So that I may know what is lacking for me. What is lacking, but unto eternity. Now consider Paul. After such labors, he still says, I do not consider myself to have apprehended. Hear him saying: What is lacking for me. Therefore let no one say: "I have already fasted much, labored much, given much. I have already done all of God's commandments. I did this yesterday, I did this today." And today will still be, if ever you were. Yesterday always has today; if you come to tomorrow, it will have today; and even if you come to ten years from now, it will be today. Always you say today: What is lacking for me. For if Paul, in such great labors a heavenly soldier, if after such great discipline and after such revelations, taken up to the third heaven, and heard ineffable words, and yet, so that he would not be exalted by revelations, received a thorn in the flesh to humble him, who is there who can say: "It is sufficient"? From that therefore make known to me, Lord, my end. And behold, you have Christ before you as the end. You no longer need to seek. As soon as you have believed, you have already known. But the matter is not in faith alone, but in faith and work. Both are necessary. For even the demons believe (you have heard the Apostle), and tremble, but it does not benefit them because they believe. Faith alone is not enough, unless it is also accompanied by works: Faith that works through love, says the Apostle. Make known to me, Lord, my end and the number of my days, what it is. This is not said because if each of us knew when we would die, he might decide for himself, for example, to live well. Hence the master himself, wishing us to become vigilant, is asked about the day and hour, and says: About that day and hour no one knows. For he did not wish that they should know. Hence he said: not even the Son; that is, it is not expedient for you to know. For you will be negligent, not vigilant. The more you will live well, the more you are vigilant. It is not because I do not know the day, for all that the Father has is mine. Make known to me, Lord, my end and the number of my days, what it is. Make this known to me, so that I may always be vigilant, because I do not know when the thief will come so that I may know what is lacking for me. In temptation and tribulation, let us know what is lacking for us.

Therefore, Brothers, let us be careful there, so that we may know what we lack. The temptation of Christians is the trial of Christians. For he who is tempted, it is shown to him what he lacks. There are two things: either it is shown to him what he has, or it is shown to him what he lacks. Abraham was tempted not so that it might be shown to him what he lacked, but so that it might be shown to us what we should imitate. He was tempted in his son. What was that temptation? He longed for a son in his advanced age, already for whom there was desperation. However, when he heard the promise of God, he did not hesitate at all. He believed, he received, he merited, he accepted. He was born, he was nurtured, he was brought to maturity, he was weaned. And it was said to him: "In your seed all nations will be blessed." He knew in which seed, for we have testimony in the Gospel: "Abraham desired to see my day," he said, "and he saw it, and was glad." He knew therefore. After all those things he had believed, he heard from God: "Abraham, offer your son to me as a sacrifice." He was tempted. Why? Did God not know his faith? But He deigned to show these things for our sake. For to us it is said: "Offer me the sacrifice of your purse," and we doubt. What sacrifice? "Give alms and behold all things are clean for you"; and again: "I desire mercy, not sacrifice." "Give something from your purse," it is said to you, and you hesitate. What if you were commanded concerning your son? Behold, you hesitate about your purse; what would you have done about your son? So that I may know what I lack. I will speak not without pain and shame. Many women perhaps wish to serve God, and, if they are bold, they say to their parents: "Let me go, I want to be a virgin of God," or: "I want to be a servant of God," and they hear: "Neither be saved, nor have salvation. Truly you will not do what you want. You will do what I want." What if you were told: "Kill"? You live, eternal life is promised to you, it is before you. And you resist, and doubt, and fight? Indeed, a Christian you are. "Why, Lord, because I am a Christian do I not have to have grandchildren?" Do you have to have grandchildren? Do you know how much you lack, because you fasted yesterday? Sing what he said: "Make known to me, Lord, my end, and the number of my days, so that I may know what I lack." For may God, and His mercy, grant that daily we may be stirred, either tempted, or tested, or exercised, or made progress. "Tribulation produces patience, patience produces proof, proof produces hope. And hope does not disappoint."

Let us therefore endeavor daily to make progress in God.

Therefore, my brothers, let us desire daily to know who we are, lest, when we are secure, the day comes and nothing is found of what we thought, and it is said to us: Who will confess to you in hell? Therefore, my brothers, let us strive daily to advance in God, not sparing passing things, which we are to leave behind here. Let us heed the faith of Abraham, because he too was our father. Let us imitate his devotion, let us imitate his faith. If we are tested in our children, let us not fear; if in our purse, let us not be terrified; if anything is inflicted upon the infirmities of our body, let us place our hope in God. We are Christians, we are pilgrims. Let no one be frightened, our homeland is not here. He who wants to have his homeland here will lose it, and he will not come to that one. Let us strive as good children towards our homeland, so that our course may be approved and brought through. Turned towards the Lord.

Sermons - Sermon 16B

SERMON 16/B

Brothers, let us cleanse our hearts from all stain of sin, that we may worthily offer our prayers to God. Let us be vigilant and fervent in spirit, serving the Lord. Be persistent in prayer, watching therein with thanksgiving. Let each one strive to remain in the grace of God, avoiding every evil action. Let us love our enemies, bless those who curse us, do good to those who hate us, and pray for those who persecute and slander us. For thus we will be perfect, as our Father in heaven is perfect. Amen.

Sermon on the Responsorial Psalm 40 He is perverse who attributes his sins not to himself but to fortune, fate, the devil. With one voice we sing many, because in Christ we are one. For the people who say in the plural number "Our Father" are the same who say, "I said, Lord, have mercy on me, heal my soul for I have sinned against you." For many want to sin and do not want their sins attributed to themselves. But may your Holiness consider how proud men do not want to confess to God. For all the evil they do, they do not want to attribute to themselves, and they begin to say either fortune did it or fate did it. But they say, "The devil did it," so they do not say, "I did it." Let him who says these things remove them from his midst, for both fortune is the vanity of men and fate is emptiness, and he who thinks fate is something becomes foolish. And the devil, although he is our enemy, nonetheless overthrows those who consent. He does not have the power to compel, but the cunning to persuade. If, however, the devil were speaking evilly alone, and God were not speaking through the Scriptures teaching good, you would have an excuse before God. You would say, "Whom should I have consented to if not to him who was speaking to me, because you were silent to me?" But as the devil does not cease to persuade evil, and God does not cease to warn of good, why do your ears, positioned between the devil persuading evil and God commanding good, incline to the words of the devil and turn away from the words of God? The devil says to you, "Commit theft"; God says to you, "Do not commit theft." If you were to listen to both, you would be most wicked. And yet how could you obey both commanding different things when God Christ proclaims: "No one can serve two masters"? Now see what you are like, who despise God’s warnings and consent to being deceived by the devil. When you do this, pay attention, and now do not do this. And when you see that you have done wrong, confess to God, do not accuse the devil, so that you can truly say: "I said, Lord, have mercy on me, heal my soul for I have sinned against you." It was not fate that sinned, it was not fortune that sinned: Heal my soul for I have sinned against you. And what am I to do? Because I have sinned, I am sick. If I am sick, heal my soul. This is to confess to the doctor and to call upon the doctor. If you want to attribute your sins to others, as I said, either to fortune or fate or the devil, not to yourself, and again if you want to attribute your good deeds to yourself, not to God, you are perverse. For indeed, whatever evil you do, you do by your own malice; whatever good you do, you do by the grace of God.

What good you do, God does; what evil you do, you do. But see how some people, unwilling to convert, turn to blasphemies, wanting to accuse God Himself. For when someone begins to blame fortune because it forced him to sin, and it sinned in him, he starts to blame fate. He is asked: "What is fortune, or what is fate?" And he begins to say that the stars compelled him to sin. See how gradually his blasphemy runs to God. Who placed the stars in the sky? Is it not the creator of all, God? So if He placed such stars there that compel you to sin, does He not seem to be the author of your sins? See how perverse you are, O man, who, when God accuses your sins, not to punish you, but to free you by punishing them, you, out of your own perversity, where you do something good you attribute it to yourself, where you do something bad you attribute it to God. Therefore convert yourself from this perversity. Be corrected, and begin to contradict yourself, and to speak contrary to yourself. For what did you say before? "What good I do, I do; what bad I do, God does." Rather, the truth is this: what good you do, God does; what bad you do, you do. By saying these things you do not sing in vain: I said: Lord, have mercy on me, heal my soul for I have sinned against you. For if where you do evil, God does it, and where you do good, you do it, you speak iniquity against God. Listen also to what the psalm says about this: Do not, it says, exalt your horn on high, nor speak iniquity against God. For you spoke this iniquity against God, in that you wanted to attribute all good things to yourself, and all bad things to Him. By exalting the horn of pride you spoke iniquity against God. By humility you speak equity. What is the equity that you speak with humility? I said, Lord, have mercy on me, heal my soul for I have sinned against you. In the good deeds that you do, do not exalt yourself above those who do not do good.

Therefore, when the psalm itself said: Do not lift up your horn on high, and do not speak unrighteousness against God, it immediately added: For neither from the east, nor from the west, nor from the deserts of the mountains; for God is the judge, He puts down one and exalts another. He sees two men, that is, two kinds of men. Whom, then, does He see as two men? One who is proud, another who confesses; one who speaks righteousness, another who speaks unrighteousness. Who speaks righteousness? The one who says: "I have sinned." But who speaks unrighteousness? The one who says: "Not I have sinned, but fortune has sinned, fate has sinned." Therefore, when you see two men, one speaking righteousness and another speaking unrighteousness, one humble and another proud, do not wonder because it follows that it says: For God is the judge, He puts down one and exalts another. And it is but little that I have said: Brother, do not speak in such a way that you attribute the good things you do to yourself, and the bad things to God. But even the good things which you do, if you attribute them to God in such a way and give thanks to God for them, so that you exalt yourself over others who do not yet do good works, and you seem to yourself already to have attained perfect righteousness because you do not commit murder, or do not commit adultery, or do not steal, or fast, or give alms, and you seem to yourself to have perfected righteousness because of this and scorn those who do not do these things, and you are proud as if healthy looking at the sick, and thus God rejects you. For no matter how much you have progressed, you should not consider how much you have passed by, but what is left to you, so that you do not end the way and rejoice exalted in the homeland in the king of that homeland, who for you made Himself humble. The Example of the Pharisee and the Publican.

Therefore two men are shown in the temple by the Lord, and thus the Gospel says: He also said to some who trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others, this parable. Two men went up into the temple to pray, one a Pharisee and the other a publican. The Pharisees were the leaders of the Jews, as either learned or holy men of theirs; but they considered the publicans as most wicked sinners. Therefore both went up into the temple to pray, and the Pharisee began to say: God, I thank you. See, because of the good he had, he gave thanks to God. But see where he is condemned, because he despised the one whom he saw as a sinner. Therefore, observe the following words: I thank you because I am not like other men, unjust, extortioners, adulterers, or even like this publican. He looked at him and despised him. And he exalted himself, and asked for nothing to be given to him, but only gave thanks for what he had, as if he were already perfect. And he began to list his merits to God: I fast twice a week, I give tithes of all that I possess. He had come to the doctor to be healed, and showed his healthy members, hiding his wounds. But the publican stood at a distance, not daring to lift his eyes to heaven, but beat his breast saying: Lord, be merciful to me, a sinner. See how he did not seek not to be accused. He accused himself and beat himself. He struck his breast with his fist, confessing to God with a fearful conscience. Let Your Holiness observe how he humbles one and exalts the other. Hear the following words of the Lord: Amen, I say to you, the publican went down to his house justified rather than the Pharisee. And as if you were to say: "Lord, why so?" and he would say to you: Because everyone who exalts himself will be humbled, and he who humbles himself will be exalted. Therefore, having this path of humility, dearest brothers, advance, abstain from all wickedness and malice. Cleanse again and again your manners with God's help, to whom you confess. Turned.

Sermons - Sermon 17

SERMO 17 SERMON ON PSALM 49 At the judgment, Christ will come manifest and will not be silent. Even now Christ speaks in many ways for our salvation.

We have sung: God will come manifest, our God, and He will not be silent. This scripture foretold that Christ God would come to judge the living and the dead. For when He first came to be judged, He was hidden; when He will come to judge, He will be manifest. How He was then hidden, understand from this where the Apostle says: For if they had known, they would never have crucified the Lord of glory. But then He was silent when questioned, as the Gospel speaks, so that the prophecy of Isaiah saying: As a sheep to the slaughter he was led, and as a lamb before its shearer was without voice, so he opened not his mouth, might be fulfilled in Him. Therefore, He will come manifest, and He will not be silent. It is said: He will not be silent when judging, because He was silent when judged. For as far as His necessary voice to us is concerned, when was He silent? He was not silent through the Patriarchs, He was not silent through the Prophets, He was not silent through the mouth of His flesh. And if He were silent now, would He not speak through the Scriptures? The reader ascends, but He is not silent. The preacher speaks. If he speaks the truth, Christ speaks. If Christ were silent, I would not tell you these things. Nor was He silent through your mouth. For when you were singing, He was speaking. He does not remain silent. It is necessary that we listen, but with the ear of the heart, for it is easy to hear with the ear of the flesh. We should hear with those ears which the Master Himself sought when He said: He who has ears to hear, let him hear. For who before Him, when these words were spoken, was standing without ears of the flesh? Everyone had ears, and yet few had them. Not all had ears to hear, that is, to obey. The desire of the shepherd is the salvation of the flock.

How terribly he spoke through the prophet Ezekiel, I believe you paid attention. I believe you heard how he said: I will send you to the house of Israel, not to a people of another language. However, the people do not want to listen to you because they do not want to listen to me. What does it show, except that God himself was speaking through the Prophet? Because indeed in those prophetic words we are mostly terrified, that is, we leaders who were placed to speak to his people, we first see our own faces in those words. For it was shown to us, with the reader sounding as if a mirror where we look at ourselves, and we saw ourselves. Look at yourselves. Behold, I do what I heard there. If you do not separate, he says, the just from the unjust, if you do not say to the sinner: You will die by death, and show him to turn away from his iniquities, he indeed will die in his sins, but his blood I will require at your hand. But if you say and he disregards and does not obey, he will die in his crimes, but you will save your soul. I tell you, I save my soul. For truly, I am not in danger, but placed in destruction, if I remain silent. But when I have spoken, and fulfilled my duty, you must now watch your danger. But what do I want? What do I desire? What do I long for? Why am I speaking? Why am I sitting here? Why am I living? Except with this intention, that we might live together with Christ. This is my desire, this is my honor, this is my possession, this is my joy, this is my glory. But if you do not listen to me and yet I have not remained silent, I will save my soul. But I do not wish to be saved without you.

Sins of habit are not to be disregarded even if Christ is currently silent.

Therefore, do not disdain, my Brothers, the sins in which perchance you have already become accustomed. For every sin becomes cheapened by habit, and it seems to a man as if it were nothing. Hardness has already lost its pain. That which is very rotten does not hurt; that which does not hurt should not be considered healthy, but counted as dead. Pay attention to what Scripture says, and see there how you ought to live. Who does not disdain the sin of drunkenness? Such a sin abounds, and it is disdained. The heart of the drunkards has already lost reason, it does not feel pain, because it has no health. When something is pricked and hurts, either it is healthy or there is some hope of health in it. But when it is touched, pricked, or bound and does not hurt, it should be considered dead, or to be cut off from the body. But sometimes we spare and have no knowledge except to speak. We are slow to excommunicate, to cast out from the Church. Sometimes indeed we fear lest the one who is beaten becomes worse by the very scourge. But will He spare, will He be silent whom we ought to fear? You have heard in that very Psalm, my Brothers, when He enumerated the sins of the sinners, He said: You did these things and I was silent. Contrary to this it is said: He will come and not be silent. His presence will not be silent. For although the Lord Christ is signified as being silent during judgment, so that it might also be fulfilled in Him this prophecy which I mentioned a little earlier, apart from this, now God Himself through Himself the Lord Christ is silent. For He has ascended into heaven, and sits at the right hand of the Father, from there He will come to judge the living and the dead. As long as He is there, until He comes, He is silent. We hear His voices in the books, we do not hear from His mouth. However, you have heard His voices from the Holy Scriptures in this place; you have heard them while you recall yourselves, and perhaps discuss these matters among yourselves.

Bad interpretations concerning the silence of God. Do you hear Him when you commit adultery, and think you are hiding because man does not see you? He sees you, but He is silent. When you steal, you catch the eyes of the one from whom you steal, and if he does not notice, you do it. If you see that it cannot be hidden, you do not do it. If you do not do it because you fear to be seen, you have done it inwardly, you have done it in your heart. You hold yourself as a thief, and have taken nothing. But even if the opportunity arises to accomplish your evil deed, you steal and rejoice. Why? Because He is silent? Therefore, hear the psalm. It admonishes you, whoever you are, who perhaps stands here today and did something evil at night, it admonishes you, it says to you: These things you did and I was silent. You suspected iniquity, that I would be like you. O people, who neither have these words that I am going to say in your mouth, nor in your heart, you are happy! Are not people doing evil things daily, or those who repent of having done well and from perverse repentance pour out what they milked, do they not daily say and mutter among themselves: "Truly, if these things displeased God, would He allow them to happen? Or would those who do them be happy on earth? We see robbers, we see oppressors of the weak, we see expellers of neighbors, we see invaders of boundaries with violence, we see slanderers, and yet they are powerful, rich, and happy on this earth. If truly God saw these things, if He cared about these things, would He spare them?" They add this as well, which is worse: "God is not pleased except by the wicked." However, let it happen that someone does something good and some temptation follows, immediately they have at hand: "It is not expedient to do good. It is good for the one who does evil." Is it little that you wish to do evil, and do you curse those who do good? You did these things, He says, and I was silent. You suspected iniquity, that I would be like you. What does it mean: that I would be like you? Because you suspected that evil pleased me as it does you. You said this in your heart, you did not say it to your neighbor, but I heard when you said it in your heart. What is worse, they progress into these words, so that they do not even fear to be heard.

God will convict the sinner and place him before His face.

Therefore, you suspected iniquity because I will be like you. I will rebuke you. How you do not think, and when you do not think, I will rebuke you. I am silent with restraint, but I will not be silent when I judge. I will rebuke you. And what will I do to you when I rebuke you? I will place you before your own face. For now, when you do evil, you think that you are good because you do not want to see yourself. You blame others, you do not look at yourself, you accuse others, you do not think about yourself; you place others before your eyes, you place yourself behind your back. When I rebuke you, I do the opposite. I take you from your back and place you before your eyes. You will see yourself, and you will mourn for yourself. There will not be then a way to correct yourself. Therefore, you despise the time of mercy, the time of judgment will come. Because you sang to me in the church: I will sing of mercy and judgment to you, Lord. From our mouth it comes out, everywhere the church resounds of Christ: I will sing of mercy and judgment to you, Lord. It is the time of mercy so that we may be corrected; the time of judgment has not yet come. There is place, there is space; we have sinned, let us be corrected. The way is not yet finished, the day is not yet closed, it is not yet expired. Let us not despair, which is worse, because for those very human sins and tolerable ones, and so much more frequent as they are lesser, God has established in the Church times for showing mercy, daily medicine so that we may say: Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors; so that with our faces washed by these words, we may approach the altar, so that with our faces washed by these words, we may communicate with the body and blood of Christ.

Many do not want to seek forgiveness.

What is more grievous, men so despise the very remedy that they not only do not grant pardon when wrong is done to them, but they do not even wish to ask for it when they themselves have done wrong. Temptation has entered, anger has crept in. Wrath has dominated as much as it could, so much that not only has the heart been tumultuous, but the tongue has spewed forth insults and wrongdoing. Do you not see where it has pushed you? Do you not see where it hurls you? See it, correct it. Say: "I did wrong," say: "I have sinned." For you will not die when you have said it, rather you will die if you do not say it. Believe, not in me, but in God. What am I? I am a man, I am your equal, I carry flesh, I am weak: let us all believe in God. Pay attention to yourselves. The Lord Christ Himself says - pay attention to yourselves -: If your brother sins, rebuke him between you and him alone. If he listens to you, you have gained your brother. If he does not listen to you, take with you one or two others. For by the mouth of two or three witnesses every word shall be established. If he does not listen to them, tell it to the Church. If he does not listen to the Church, let him be to you as a heathen and a tax collector. A heathen is a Gentile. A Gentile is one who does not believe in Christ. If he does not listen to the Church, consider him dead. But behold he lives, behold he enters, behold he makes the sign, behold he bends the knee, behold he prays, behold he approaches the altar. Let him be to you as a heathen and a tax collector. Do not pay attention to those false signs of life in him. He is dead. How can it be that someone lives if even this remedy is despised? If I say to someone in your presence: "You did this," he will reply later: "What did it matter? Tell me inwardly, tell me inwardly that I did wrong, let me see my sin inwardly. Why do you accuse me before the people?" What if I did it and you did not correct it? What if I did it and you still persist? What if I did it, and it still seems right to you in your heart? Because he is silent, are you just? Because he does not avenge immediately, have you done nothing wrong? Do you not fear: I shall argue with you? Do you not fear: I shall set you before your face? Do you not fear?

Even if the judgment of God is far away, the whole human life is brief.

"But you say, 'The judgment is far off.' First, who told you that the day of judgment is far off? If the day of judgment is far off, is your own day far off? How do you know when it is? Did not many healthy men go to sleep and harden? Do we not carry our calamities with us in this flesh? Are we not more fragile than if we were made of glass? For glass, though fragile, if kept well, lasts for a long time, and you find cups from ancestors and forefathers from which grandchildren and great-grandchildren drink. Such great fragility, when guarded, has become very old. But we humans, fragile under so many daily hazards, walk about. And if these sudden accidents do not occur, still we are not able to live long. Human life is entirely short. From infancy to decrepit old age, it is entirely short. If Adam were still living and died today, what would the length of his life have profited him? Moreover, the very day, which naturally burns with deceitful fever, is uncertain. Every day men die. And those who live lead them out, celebrate their funerals, and promise life to themselves. No one says, 'I will amend myself, lest tomorrow I be what he is whom I led out.' Words please you; I seek deeds. Do not sadden me with your wicked habits, for my delight in this life is only your good life."

Sermons - Sermon 170

SERMO 170 CONCERNING THE SAME WORDS OF THE APOSTLE (PHIL 3:6-16):

"According to the righteousness which is from the law,"

"Who I have been without complaint," etc.

ABOUT THE WORDS OF THE PSALM (142, 1-2):

"Hear me in Your righteousness," etc. AND FINALLY ON THE READING OF THE GOSPEL OF JOHN (6:39):

"The will of the Father is that all which he has given me should not perish," etc.

Justice from the law seems loss to the Apostle.

All divine readings are connected in such a way that they are like one single reading; because they all proceed from one mouth. There are many mouths that carry out the ministry of speaking; but there is one mouth that fills the ministers. We heard the apostolic reading, and perhaps someone is moved by what is written there: According to the righteousness that is from the law, I was blameless. But what things were gain to me, these I have counted loss for Christ. Then he continues: Not only loss, but indeed I also count all things as dung, that I may gain Christ and be found in Him, not having my own righteousness, which is from the law, but the righteousness which is through faith in Jesus Christ. For how did he consider as dung and loss, according to the righteousness which is from the law, being blameless? For who gave the law? Did not He who gave the law beforehand come afterward with forgiveness for the lawbreakers? But we believe that He came with forgiveness for those whom the law held guilty. Did the law hold guilty those who were blameless according to the righteousness that is from the law? Therefore, if the Lord brought forgiveness and pardon of sins to the guilty of the law, did He not bring it to the Apostle Paul, who says he lived in the law blamelessly? But let us hear him in another place: Not by works of righteousness that we have done, but according to His mercy He saved us, through the washing of regeneration. And again: Who was formerly a blasphemer, a persecutor, and an insolent man; but I obtained mercy, and so on. For he asserted that he lived blamelessly in the law, in such a way that he confesses he was a sinner, so that every sinner may not despair because of himself, because Paul obtained forgiveness. The saying of the Apostle should be understood in such a way that the error of the Manichaeans regarding the old law is avoided. For what purpose the law was given. Original sin.

See, brothers, and observe the force of this speech, how the Apostle Paul considers losses and refuse, where he says that he conducted himself without complaint. Here is the fulfillment of the law, here is the transgressor of the law, at one and the same time, before Baptism, before grace. But he does not say without cause that these are losses; lest harmful thoughts enter, he says this because the Apostle Paul indicated that it was not for saying that one person gave the law, another the Gospel; like the Manicheans perversely think, and other heretics, who said that the giver of the law which was given through Moses was different, and another was the giver of the evangelical grace; indeed that bad God, but truly that good God. Why do we wonder, brothers? In the darkness of the law, as if in closed doors, they suffered blindness; because they did not knock with piety. We occasionally find the same Paul saying openly that the law is good; which he nevertheless says was given so that sin might abound; and that sin abounded so that grace might abound much more. For men presumed on their own strength, and by doing whatever they thought permissible, they sinned against the hidden law of God. Whence this manifest law was promulgated to them, who did not at all seem to be guilty to themselves. The law was given to them, not to cure, but to prove the sick. The law preceded the physician, so that the sick person, who thought himself healthy, would find himself sick; and said: Thou shalt not covet. And because before the law was given there was no transgression: For where there is no law, he says, neither is there transgression; previously it was sinned without the law; but given the law after, it was sinned more greatly, because it was sin with transgression. Man found himself conquered by his desires, which he nourished against himself with bad habit; who was also propagated with the bond and obligation of sin from Adam. Whence the Apostle says: We also were by nature children of wrath. Hence it is, that he does not say even a child of one day is clean from sin; not from what he committed, but from what he contracted.

There is no sin in Christ.

Hear the Psalm speaking of inward things, and singing of the more hidden aspects of our sins. For it is said to Christ from the person of the human race: "Against you alone have I sinned, and done what is evil in your sight." This is not said from the person of one David, but from the person of Adam, from whom the human race comes. For hear what follows: "Against you alone have I sinned, and done what is evil in your sight; so that you are justified in your words." It is said to Christ; how do we understand this? Hear what follows: "And you prevail when you are judged." God the Father has not been judged, the Holy Spirit has not been judged; we find only the Son, in that flesh which He deigned to take from our substance, judged; not by the method of human concupiscence and of a woman; a virgin believed, a virgin conceived, a virgin gave birth, and a virgin remained. And therefore it is said: "And you prevail when you are judged." For He was judged and prevailed; because He was judged without sin. It was due to patience that He endured judgment, not guilt. Many innocents are judged, but in the very causes which they handle. For in the rest, they are not without sin; because as in deeds before men, so before God the sin of thought is also fact. Your deed before the eyes of God is your thought. The very judge is the witness of the deed; the very conscience is the accuser of the deed. Therefore He was truly innocent when judged, and thus He prevailed. For He alone prevailed, not over the judge Pontius Pilate, nor over the raging Jews; but over the devil himself, who diligently searches out all our sins through the effort of envy. The world, sinners, and lovers of the world. Christ alone is innocent. Original sin. And what does the Lord Jesus say about the devil himself? Behold, the prince of this world comes. It has often been said to Your Charity that this world is called sinners. And why are sinners called by the name of world? Because they inhabit the world by the love of the world. For those who do not love the world do not inhabit that which they do not love. Our conversation, he says, is in the heavens. If therefore one who loves God dwells in heaven with God; one who loves the world dwells in the world with the prince of the world. All therefore who love the world are the world; the inhabitants of the world, not by flesh, which all the just are; but by the soul, which only sinners are, whose prince is the devil. Just as a house is called by the inhabitants of the house; according to which we say that a bad house is marbled, and a good house is smoky. You find a smoky house, which the good inhabit, and you say: A good house. You find a marbled and paneled house, which the wicked possess, and you say: A bad house, calling the house not the walls and coverings of bodies, but the inhabitants themselves. Thus Scripture called the world the inhabitants of the world through the desire of love, not through the conduct of the body. Therefore: Behold, he says, the prince of the world comes, and he has nothing in me. In him alone the devil found nothing. And as if it were said to him: Why then do you die? There follows: But so that all may know that I do the will of my Father, rise, let us go from here. He rises, and goes to the passion. Why? Because I do the will of my Father. For this singular innocence the Psalm says: Against you alone I have sinned, and done evil before you; so that you may be justified in your words, and overcome when you are judged; because nothing evil is found in you. But why is something found in you, O human race? Because it follows and says: For I was conceived in iniquity, and in sins my mother conceived me. David says this. Look from whom David was born; you will find from a lawful wife, from no adultery. Therefore according to which lineage does he say: I was conceived in iniquity; unless there is something from the propagation of death, which carries with it everyone who is born of the conjunction of man and woman?

Conversation without complaint according to the law.

Therefore, each one having lust, let him attend to the law saying: "You shall not covet"; he finds in himself what the law prohibits, and becomes guilty of the law. But finding in himself to whom he is subject, he begins now to say: "I delight in the law of God according to the inner man; but I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members." Having recognized himself as sick, let him implore the doctor: "Wretched man that I am! Who will deliver me from this body of death?" Let the doctor respond: "The grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord." The grace of God, not your merits. Why then did you say you lived blamelessly in the law with righteousness? Pay attention: he said "blameless" before men. For there is a certain righteousness that a man can fulfill, so that no man will blame him. For he says: "You shall not covet your neighbor's property." If you do not seize another's property, there will be no complaint from men. Therefore sometimes you covet, and do not seize. But the judgment of God is above you, because you covet; you are guilty of the law, but in the eyes of the legislator. You live without blame: why then do you suffer these losses? why these impurities? This knot is somewhat tighter; but He who customarily loosens will loosen it. But not only I myself with pious subjection, but all with pious intention, may we merit. Whatever the Jews were doing, from which men would not complain, and their conduct would be in the law without blame, they attributed to themselves, and assigned that righteousness according to the law to their own strength; they could not fulfill it, but did as much as they could; by attributing to themselves, they did not even fulfill this piously. The justice of man is nothing unless it is from God.

Therefore he says that to fulfill the law is this: "not to covet." Who that lives can achieve this? Let the Psalm assist us, which has just been sung: Hear me in your righteousness; that is, not in mine. If he had said: Hear me in my righteousness; it would call for merit. Indeed, in some places, he calls it his righteousness; but here he discerns better, because even when he says it is his, he means it is given; just as we say: Give us this day our daily bread. How is it ours; how: give?

Therefore, speaking more distinctly here, he says: Hear me in your righteousness. And he continues: And do not enter into judgment with your servant. What does it mean: Do not enter into judgment with your servant? Do not stand with me in judgment, demanding from me all that you commanded, demanding all that you instructed. For you will find me guilty, if you enter into judgment with me. Therefore, he says, I need your mercy rather than your most clear judgment. Why then: Do not enter into judgment with your servant? He follows, and says: For no one living will be justified in your sight. For I am a servant: why do you stand in judgment with me? I will use the mercy of the Lord. Why? Because no one living will be justified in your sight. What did he say? As long as one lives in this life, no one is justified, but in the sight of God. He did not add in your sight in vain; unless because someone can be justified in the sight of men, so that it is fulfilled: According to the righteousness which is from the law, being blameless, in the sight of men. Refer to the sight of God: No one living will be justified in your sight. The justice of this life compared to the future justice.

What then shall we do? Let us cry out: Enter not into judgment with Your servant. Let us cry out: Wretched man that I am, who will rescue me from this body of death? The grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord. Therefore, we have heard this Psalm, we have heard this Apostle; that when there will be that righteousness according to which the Angels live, when there will be that righteousness where there will be no concupiscence, from there let each one measure himself by what he is now, and what he will be then; and he will find in comparison to that righteousness, this one to be loss and dung. But whoever thinks that he can now fulfill righteousness, having lived well and innocently according to the estimation of human opinion, has remained on the path; he does not desire anything better, because he thinks he has fulfilled it; and being especially conceited, he will be proud. And a humble sinner is better than a proud righteous man. Therefore, he says: And be found in Him, not having my own righteousness, which is from the law, as the Jews thought; but the righteousness which is from the faith of Christ Jesus. Then he continues, saying: If by any means I might attain to the resurrection of the dead. There he believed he would fulfill righteousness, that is, he would have full righteousness. In comparison to that resurrection, all the life we lead now is dung. Listen further when the Apostle speaks more clearly: If by any means I might attain to the resurrection of the just; not that I have already attained, or am already perfected. And then he goes on: Brothers, I do not count myself to have apprehended. How does he compare righteousness to righteousness, salvation to salvation, faith to vision, pilgrimage to the city? The present justice is to be despised for the desire of perfect justice.

Pay attention to how he fulfills this: Brothers, I do not think that I have attained this. One thing, however. What: one thing, except to live by faith, in hope of eternal salvation, where there will be full and perfect justice, in comparison to which the losses are that will pass away, and the filth that is to be rejected? What then? One thing, however, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, according to intent I follow after the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. And to those who might presume of their own perfection: As many of us as are perfect, let us be thus minded. He had already said he was imperfect, but now perfect. Why, except that this is the perfection of man, to have found that he is not perfect? As many of us as are perfect, let us be thus minded. And if in any thing ye be otherwise minded, God shall reveal even this unto you; meaning, that if you prove yourselves justified in any progress of the mind, by reading the Scriptures, and finding what is true and perfect justice, you find yourselves guilty, and by desire for the future you condemn the present, you live by faith and hope and charity; and understand that what you still believe, you do not yet see; what you still hope for, you do not yet hold; what you still desire, you do not yet fulfill. If such is the charity of those who sojourn, what will it be of those who see? Therefore, he who taught the justice of God, and did not establish his own, cried out from the Psalm: Hear me in thy justice. And enter not into judgment with thy servant; for in thy sight shall no man living be justified.

Perfect justice and happiness will be when God is seen.

According to this life, it is said to Moses: No man has seen the face of God and lived. For one must not live in this life in order to see that face. One must die to the world to live with God forever. Then we will not sin, not only in deeds, but not even in desires, when we see that face, which conquers all desires. For it is so sweet, my brothers, so beautiful, that once seen nothing else can delight. There will be insatiable satisfaction, no disgust; we will always be hungry, always satisfied. Hear these two statements from Scripture: Those who drink me, says Wisdom, will still be thirsty; and those who eat me will still be hungry. But lest you think there will be lack and hunger there, hear the Lord: Whoever drinks of this water will never thirst forever. But you say: When will it be? Whenever it will be, yet wait for the Lord, endure the Lord, act manfully, and let your heart be strengthened. Do so many things remain as have already been completed? Consider from Adam to the present day, how many ages have passed, and behold, they are now gone. Few days remain, so to speak; for it must be said that what remains is in comparison to the ages that have passed. Let us exhort one another, and let him who comes to us exhort us, who ran the course and said: Follow me. Who ascended first into heaven, so that the head from on high might help the other members laboring on earth; who said from heaven: Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me? Therefore, let no one despair; what has been promised will be given to us in the end; there that justice will be fulfilled. Our day, Christ. With all desire must stretch towards heaven.

You have also heard the Gospel concord with these words. The will of the Father, he says, is that all which he has given me may not perish, but may have eternal life; and I will raise them up on the last day. Himself on the first day, us on the last day. The first day is to the head of the Church. For our Lord Christ is our day, he does not set. The last day will be the end of the age. Do not say: When will this be? It will be far for the human race, close for each human; because the last day is the day of each one's death. And indeed when you depart from here, you will be received according to your merits, and you will rise to receive what you have done. Then God will crown, not so much your merits, as his gifts. Whatever he has given you, if you have kept it, he will recognize. Therefore now, brothers, let our desire be only towards heaven; let it be only towards eternal life. Let no one please himself, as if he has lived justly here, and compare himself to those who live badly, according to the Pharisee who justified himself, who had not heard the Apostle: Not that I have already received, or am already made perfect. Therefore he had not yet received what he desired. He had received the pledge, thus he said: Who has given us the pledge of the Spirit. Of what matter the pledge was, to what he longed to come; a certain participation, but it is distant. Now we participate in one way, then we will participate in another way. Now through faith, through hope, in the same Spirit; then, however, it will be vision, it will be the reality; yet the same Spirit, the same God, the same fullness. He who calls to the absent, will make manifest to those who are present; who calls the pilgrims, will nourish and feed in their homeland. Our way, Christ.

Christ has become the way for us, and do we despair of reaching it? This way cannot be ended, cannot be cut off, cannot be corrupted, neither by rain, nor floods, nor beset by robbers. Walk securely in Christ, walk; do not stumble, do not fall, do not look back, do not remain on the way, do not stray from the way. Only guard against all these things, and you have arrived. When you have arrived, then glory in this; do not glory in yourself. For he who praises himself does not praise God, but turns away from God; as one who wants to withdraw from the fire, the fire remains hot, but he grows cold; as one who wants to withdraw from the light, if he withdraws, the light remains shining in itself, but he is darkened. Let us not withdraw from the warmth of the Spirit, from the light of truth. We have heard the voice now, but then we will see face to face. Let no one please himself, let no one insult another. Let us all desire to progress in such a way that we neither envy those who make progress, nor insult those who fail; and with joy it will be fulfilled in us what is promised in the Gospel: And I will raise them up on the last day.

Sermons - Sermon 171

SERMO 171 On the Words of the Apostle (Philippians 4:4-6):

"Rejoice in the Lord always," etc.

Let joy be in the Lord, not in the world. The Lord is near to us. The Apostle commands us to rejoice, but in the Lord, not in the world. For whoever wishes to be a friend of this world, as Scripture says, will be considered an enemy of God. Just as a man cannot serve two masters, so no one can rejoice both in the world and in the Lord. These two joys differ greatly from each other and are wholly opposed. When one rejoices in the world, one does not rejoice in the Lord; when one rejoices in the Lord, one does not rejoice in the world. Let the joy in the Lord prevail until the joy in the world is ended. Let the joy in the Lord always increase; let the joy in the world always decrease until it is ended. These things are not said to suggest that we should not rejoice while we are in this world, but so that, even while we are in this world, we may already rejoice in the Lord. But someone might say: I am in the world; surely if I rejoice, I rejoice where I am. What then? Because you are in the world, are you not also in the Lord? Listen to the same Apostle speaking to the Athenians, and in the Acts of the Apostles saying about God and our Lord Creator: In Him we live and move and have our being. For He who is everywhere, where is He not? Wasn't He exhorting us to this? The Lord is near, do not be anxious about anything. It is a great thing that He ascended above all heavens, and is near to those who dwell on earth. Who is this one who is both distant and near, if not He who made Himself near to us in mercy? The Samaritan aiding the wounded man, Christ. For the whole human race is that man who lay half-dead on the way, left by robbers, whom the passing priest and Levite scorned, but the passing Samaritan approached to take care of and help. But why did He narrate this, where did the reason descend from? He was admonishing a certain man, who was asking which are the best commandments and the greatest in the law, that there are two: You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind; and you shall love your neighbor as yourself. But he said: And who is my neighbor? And the Lord narrated: A certain man was going down from Jerusalem to Jericho. He showed him as, in a way, an Israelite. And he fell among robbers. When they had stripped him and inflicted grievous wounds upon him, they left him half-dead on the way. A priest passed by, indeed a neighbor by birth, but he passed by the one lying down. A Levite passed by, likewise a neighbor by birth, also disdained the one lying down. A Samaritan passed by, distant by birth, but a neighbor in mercy, and did what you know. In this Samaritan, the Lord Jesus Christ wanted Himself to be understood. For "Samaritan" translates as "Guardian." Therefore, rising from the dead, He no longer dies, and death will have no dominion over Him; because: He who guards Israel neither slumbers nor sleeps. At last, the Jews, so full of reproaches and blasphemies, said to Him: Do we not rightly say that you are a Samaritan and have a demon? Therefore, when two reproachful words were thrown at the Lord and He was told: Do we not rightly say that you are a Samaritan and have a demon? He could have responded: I am neither a Samaritan nor do I have a demon; but He responded: I do not have a demon. What He responded, He refuted; what He was silent on, He confirmed. He denied having a demon, He who knew Himself to be the expeller of demons; He did not deny being the guardian of the weak. Therefore, the Lord is near; because the Lord has made Himself near to us. In the incarnation, God became close to man.

What is so distant, what is so remote, as God from men, immortal from mortals, just from sinners? Not distant in place, but in dissimilarity. For we are accustomed to speak this way even when talking about two men, when their customs are different: This one is far from that one. Even if they stand close together, even if they live near each other, even if they are bound by one chain; the pious is far from the impious, the innocent is far from the guilty, the just is far from the unjust. If this is said about two men, what about God and men? Therefore, when the immortal and just one was far from us, as from mortals and sinners, he descended to us so that the distant one would become near to us. And what did he do? When he had two goods, and we two evils; he had two goods: justice and immortality; we had two evils, iniquity and mortality: if he had taken up both of our evils, he would have become our equal and would have needed a liberator with us. So what did he do to be near us? Near, not as we are, but near to us. Consider two things: he is just, he is immortal. In your two evils, one is guilt, the other is punishment: guilt because you are unjust, punishment because you are mortal. To be near, he took on your punishment, not your guilt: and if he accepted it, he did so to erase it, not to commit it. Just and immortal, far from the unjust and mortals. You as a mortal sinner were far from the just immortal one. He did not become a sinner as you are; but he became mortal as you are. Remaining just, he became mortal. By accepting punishment and not guilt, he erased both guilt and punishment. Therefore, the Lord is near, be anxious about nothing. Even if he ascended above all the heavens in body, he did not depart in majesty. He is present everywhere, who made all things.

Joy in the world. Rejoice in the Lord always. In the world, what is joy? To rejoice in iniquity, to rejoice in disgrace, to rejoice in dishonor, in deformity. The world rejoices in all these things. All these would not exist unless men willed it. There are things which men do, and things which they endure, even if unwillingly, they bear them. What then is this world, and what is the joy of the world? I say, brothers, briefly as much as I can, as much as God helps; hastily, I speak briefly. The joy of the world is unpunished wickedness. Men indulge in luxury, commit fornication, engage in trifling spectacles, immerse in drunkenness, become filthy with disgrace, suffer no evil: and behold the world's joy. These evils which I have mentioned are not chastised by famine, not by the fear of war, not by any fear, not by any disease, not by any adversities; but everything exists in abundance of things, in peace of the flesh, in the security of a bad mind: behold the world's joy. But God does not think as man thinks: the thought of God is different, the thought of man is different. It is of great mercy not to leave wickedness unpunished; and lest it be forced to condemn to the extreme of hell, now it deigns to chastise with the whip.

Impunity, the greatest vengeance of God. Severity. For you wish to know, no punishment is as great as the punishment, not however for the just, but for the sinner, for whom there is a temporal punishment, lest an eternal one follows? Do you therefore wish to know, no punishment is as great as the punishment? Ask the Psalm: The sinner has provoked the Lord. He cried out vehemently, he attended, considered, cried out: The sinner has provoked the Lord. Why, I beg? What did you see? However, he who cried out this saw the sinner luxuriating without punishment, doing evil, abounding in goods, and cried out: The sinner has provoked the Lord. Why did you say this? What did you see? Due to the greatness of his wrath, he does not inquire. Understand, Christian brothers, the mercy of God. When he chastises the world, he does not want to condemn the world.

Due to the greatness of his wrath, he does not inquire. Therefore, he does not inquire, because he is greatly angry. His wrath is great. By sparing, he rages, but he justly rages. For there is severity, as if truth were raging. Therefore, if at any time he rages by sparing, it is good for us that he assists by chastising. And yet, if we consider the deeds of the human race, what do we suffer? He has not dealt with us according to our sins. For we are sons. How do we prove this? The Only One died for us, lest one should remain alone. He did not want to be the only one, who died alone. For the only Son of God made many sons of God. He bought brothers for himself with his blood, proved by being disapproved, redeemed by being sold, honored by being injured, gave life by being killed. Do you doubt that he will give you his good things, who did not disdain to take on your bad things? Therefore, brothers, rejoice in the Lord, not in the world: that is, rejoice in the truth, not in iniquity; rejoice in the hope of eternity, not in the flower of vanity. Rejoice thus: and wherever, and however long you are here: The Lord is near, be anxious for nothing.

Sermons - Sermon 172

SERMO 172 On the Words of the Apostle (1 Thessalonians 4:12):

"Now we do not want you to be ignorant, brothers," On Those Who Are Asleep, "THAT YOU MAY NOT GRIEVE, AS DO THE OTHERS WHO HAVE NO HOPE." And on the Works of Mercy, BY WHOM THE DEAD ARE HELPED Sorrow for the dead, such as is prohibited. The blessed Apostle admonishes us not to grieve for those who are asleep, that is, our dearest dead, as do others who have no hope, namely, the hope of resurrection and eternal incorruption. For it is for this reason that the most truthful custom of the Scriptures calls them "sleeping," so that when we hear "sleeping," we may not despair of their awakening. Hence it is also sung in the Psalm: Will he who sleeps not add that he will rise again? Therefore, there is a certain natural sadness about the dead for those who love them. For nature, not opinion, shudders at death. Nor would death have befallen man had it not been for the punishment that preceded the fault. Wherefore, if animals that are so created as to die each in its time flee from death and love life, how much more man, who was so created that if he had wished to live without sin, he would live without end? Hence it is necessary that we be sad when those whom we love depart from us by dying; because even if we know that they do not leave us forever, but go ahead of us by a little while, still the very death that nature flees, when it takes the beloved, saddens in us the affection of that very love. Therefore, the Apostle did not admonish us not to grieve; but, not as others who have no hope. We grieve, therefore, at the deaths of our loved ones out of the necessity of losing them, but with the hope of receiving them again. From this we are anguished, from that we are consoled; from this, infirmity affects, from that, faith restores; from this, human condition grieves, from that, divine promise heals.

Prayers and sacrifices and alms for the deceased.

Therefore, funeral pomp, processions of obsequies, the costly care of burial, the lavish construction of monuments, are all merely forms of consolation for the living, not aids for the dead. However, there should be no doubt that the dead are helped by the prayers of the holy Church, and the saving sacrifice, and alms that are given for their spirits; so that the Lord may deal more mercifully with them than their sins have deserved. For this reason, the whole Church observes the tradition handed down by the fathers, to pray for those who have died in the communion of the body and blood of Christ when they are commemorated during the sacrifice, and to remember that the offering is also made for them. When works of mercy are carried out in commemoration for them, who would doubt that they benefit those for whom prayers are not made in vain to God? There should be no doubt whatsoever that these act to the benefit of the dead; but only for those who lived in such a way before their deaths that these acts could be beneficial to them after death. For those who departed from their bodies without the faith that works through love, and its sacraments, these acts of piety by their people are in vain, as they lacked the pledge of these things while they were here, either not receiving or receiving in vain the grace of God, and storing up not mercy but wrath for themselves. Therefore, no new merits are acquired for the dead when their people do something good for them, but these acts are rendered to their preceding deeds. It availed them only while they were alive here, so that these acts might help them once they ceased to live here. And therefore, no one finishing this life can have anything beyond what he deserved within it after it.

Mourning and duties to be performed for the deceased.

Let, therefore, the pious hearts of the beloved be permitted to grieve for the deaths of their loved ones with a healing sorrow, and let them shed consolable tears in their mortal condition; which may soon be restrained by the joy of faith, whereby the faithful are believed, when they die, to depart from us for a little while, and to pass on to better things. Let brotherly services also comfort them, whether those rendered at funerals, or those applied to the grieving, lest there be a just complaint from those saying: I looked for someone who would grieve with me, and there was none; and for comforters, and found none. Let there be, as far as possible, care for the burial and the construction of tombs: because these too are reckoned among good works in the Holy Scriptures; not only in the bodies of the Patriarchs and other saints, and the human corpses of whomever might be lying deceased; but also in the body of the Lord himself, those who did these things are proclaimed and praised. Let people carry out these duties as their final service to their loved ones, and as alleviations for their own human sorrow. But let those things that aid the spirits of the deceased, offerings, prayers, alms, be bestowed much more diligently, urgently, and abundantly for their sake, who love their loved ones, dead in the flesh, not the spirit, not only carnally, but also spiritually.

Sermons - Sermon 173

SERMO 173 ABOUT THE SAME WORDS OF THE APOSTLE (1 THESSALONIANS 4:12-17) On the funeral rites of the deceased, what must be recollected. When we celebrate the days of our deceased brethren, we must keep in mind both what is to be hoped for and what is to be feared. For, according to the hope, it is: "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints;" but according to the fear, it is: "The death of sinners is most evil." Therefore, on account of hope: "The just will be in everlasting remembrance;" on account of fear: "He will not fear an evil hearing." For there will indeed be a hearing worse than any, when it will be said to those on the left: "Depart into everlasting fire." The just will not fear this evil hearing. For he will be at the right among those to whom it will be said: "Come, blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom." But in this life, which is led in the middle before the greatest goods and before the greatest evils, in the midst of the intermediate goods and evils, that is, in neither part of the greatest; because whatever good a man experiences here, compared to the eternal goods are nothing; and whatever evil a man experiences in this life, compared to the eternal fire are not worth comparing; in this median life, we must hold onto what we have now heard from the Gospel: "Whoever believes in me, though he dies, he shall live." He pronounces life and does not deny death. "Whoever believes in me, though he dies, he shall live." What is: though he dies, he shall live? Though he dies in body, he lives in spirit. Then he adds: "And whoever lives and believes in me, shall never die." Certainly, though he dies, how, if he shall never die? But though he dies for a time, he shall never die eternally. Thus, this question is resolved, so that the words of truth are not contradictory, and can instruct the sentiment of piety. Therefore, though we are to die in body, we live if we believe.

Faith in the resurrection, comfort in the loss of loved ones. Death is the penalty for sin. But our faith is most clearly distinguished from all faiths of the Gentiles in the resurrection of the dead. For they do not accept this at all: because they have nowhere to receive it. For the will of man is prepared by the Lord so that it may be a receptacle of faith. The Lord says to the Jews: My word does not fit in you. Therefore, it fits in those wherein it finds what it can fit into. For the word that fits finds something it can fit into, whom God does not deceive by promising. For he who seeks the lost sheep, both knows what he seeks and where to seek, and how to gather its scattered parts, and bring it back into one piece of safety, and restore it in such a way that he does not lose it again. Let us therefore comfort each other, even in these our words. Can the human heart not grieve for the loss of a most dear one: however it is better for the human heart to be healed by grieving than to become inhuman by not grieving. Mary cleaved to the Lord and mourned her dead brother. But why are you surprised that Mary mourned then, when the Lord himself wept? It can indeed move anyone to consider how he wept for the dead, whom by his command was to live immediately? He did not weep for the dead whom he himself raised; but for the death which man had brought upon himself by sinning. For if sin had not preceded, undoubtedly death would not have followed. Thus, the death of the body followed, which was preceded by the death of the soul. The death of the soul preceded by deserting God, and the death of the body followed by deserted by the soul. The soul deserted willingly, the body was compelled to desert unwillingly. As if it were said to him: You have departed from the one whom you ought to have loved, depart from the one which you have loved. For who wants to die? Absolutely no one: and indeed no one, such that it was said to blessed Peter: Another shall gird you and carry you where you do not want to go. Therefore, if there were no bitterness in death, there would be no great fortitude among martyrs.

Consolation in the grief of the dead.

Therefore, the Apostle also says: "Concerning those who are asleep, I do not want you to be ignorant, brothers, so that you do not grieve as others who have no hope." He did not merely say: "so that you do not grieve;" but, "so that you do not grieve as others who have no hope." For it is necessary that you grieve: but where you grieve, let hope console you. For how can you not grieve, when the body that lives by the soul becomes lifeless, with the soul departing? He who walked now lies down, he who spoke is silent, shut eyes do not perceive light, ears are not open to any sound: all the functions of the members have ceased; there is no one to move steps for walking, hands for working, or senses for perceiving. Is this not the house adorned by someone invisible? The one who was not seen has departed, what remains now is seen with sorrow. This is the cause of grief. If this is the cause of grief, let this grief have consolation. What consolation? Because the Lord himself, with a command and with the voice of the archangel, and with the last trumpet, will descend from heaven, and the dead in Christ will rise first: then we who are alive, who remain, will be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet Christ in the air. Is this only for a time? No; but what is it? And thus we shall always be with the Lord. Let sorrow perish where there is such great consolation; let mourning be wiped away from the soul, let faith expel grief. In such great hope, it is not fitting for the temple of God to be sad. There dwells the good Comforter, there the Promiser who does not deceive. Why should we lament the dead for long? Because death is bitter? The Lord also passed through it. Let these few words suffice for your Charity: let He who does not depart from your heart console you abundantly; but let Him deign to dwell so that He may deign to change us even at the end. Turned to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 174

SERMO 174 CONCIO 123: DE VERBIS APOSTOLI (1 TIM 1, 15)

"Fidelis sermo, et omni acceptione dignus, quia Christus Jesus venit in hunc mundum, peccatores salvos facere, quorum primus ego sum."

"Human speech and worthy of all acceptance,"

Because Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners," etc. ON THE READING OF THE GOSPEL OF LUKE (19, 1-10), ABOUT ZACCHAEUS.

Against the Pelagians.

Held in the Basilica of Celerina, on the Lord's Day The coming of Christ into the world must be understood in regard to the flesh. The necessity of the Incarnation.

We have heard the blessed apostle Paul saying: "A human word and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am the first." Therefore, a human word and worthy of all acceptance. Why human, and not divine? Without a doubt, unless this human word were also divine, it would not be worthy of all acceptance. But this word is human and divine, in the same way that Christ himself is both man and God. Therefore, if we rightly understand this word, it is not only human but also divine; why did the Apostle prefer to say human rather than divine? Without a doubt, he who would not lie if he said divine, did not without reason prefer to say human. Thus, he chose what Christ took upon himself to come into the world. For he came in what he was as man. For in what he was as God, he was always here. For where is God not, who said: "I fill heaven and earth?" Christ is certainly the power and wisdom of God; of whom it is said: "He reaches from end to end mightily, and arranges all things sweetly." Therefore: "He was in this world, and the world was made through him, and the world did not know him." And he was here, and he came; he was here through divine majesty, he came through human infirmity. Therefore, because he came through human infirmity, the proclamation of his coming was said: "A human word." The human race would not be saved, unless the word of God deigned to be human. For that man is also called humane, who shows himself to be a man, and especially who receives a man as a guest. Therefore, if he is called humane who receives a man into his own house, how humane is he who received a man into himself? The cause of the Incarnation is sin. The weakness of free will is seen in Adam. The gift of grace is seen in Christ.

Therefore: This is a trustworthy saying and worthy of full acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners. Pay attention to the Gospel. For the Son of Man came to seek and to save that which was lost. If man had not perished, the Son of Man would not have come. Therefore, man had perished, God became man, and man was found. Man perished through free will: God became man through liberating grace. Do you ask what free will avails for evil? Recall man sinning. Do you ask what God and man avail for help? Observe in him the liberating grace. Nowhere could it thus be shown how much human will, usurped by pride, avails to avoid evil without God's assistance; it could not be expressed more clearly than in the first man. And behold, the first man perished, and where would he be if the second man had not come? Because that man, therefore this man, and hence the human saying. Indeed nowhere does the kindness of grace and the liberality of God's omnipotence appear so much as in the man, the mediator of God and men, the man Christ Jesus. What then do we say, my brothers? I speak to those nurtured in the Catholic faith, or gained into the Catholic peace. We know and hold the mediator of God and men, the man Christ Jesus, inasmuch as he was man, being of the same nature as we are. For our flesh and his flesh are not of a different nature, nor our soul and his soul. He assumed this nature, which he judged to be saved. He lacked nothing in nature, but had nothing in guilt. A pure nature, but not only human. There was God, there was the Word of God. And as you are one man, a soul and flesh; so also he is one Christ, God and man. Therefore, will anyone dare to say that our nature in that Mediator first deserved God through free will, and thus merited to be assumed, so that one Christ Jesus would be both man and God? Behold, can we say that through our virtues, morals, and way of life we have merited to become children of God: can we say: We received the commandment, if we keep it and live well, we will be received into the number of the children of God. Did he first live as the son of man, and by living well became the Son of God? Hence he began, and hence he commenced, and was made by assumption. For the Word was made flesh, to dwell among us. The Word of God, the only-begotten Son of God assumed the soul and flesh of man, not previously deserving it, nor striving by its own virtue to attain to such sublimity, but entirely by grace. Nothing preceded that assumption: by being assumed he was made. The Virgin conceived: before the Virgin's conception a man, the mediator? Certainly not just before. How could he be just, who was not yet? The Virgin conceived, and with the assumption of man he began. Deservedly it was said: We saw his glory, the glory as of the only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth. You love your free will, you will say to your father: Give me my portion of the inheritance that falls to me. Why do you entrust yourself to yourself? He who created you before you existed can better preserve you. Therefore acknowledge Christ, he is full of grace. He wishes to pour out to you what he is full of; he says to you: Seek my gifts, forget your merits; because if I sought your merits, you would not come to my gifts. Do not exalt yourself, be humble, be Zacchaeus. The deed of Zacchaeus allegorically. Sycamore tree, the cross of Christ. The cross on the forehead. But you will say: If I were Zacchaeus, I would not be able to see Jesus because of the crowd. Do not be sad, climb the tree where Jesus hung for you, and you will see Jesus. And what kind of tree did Zacchaeus climb? A sycamore. In our regions, it either does not grow at all or rarely, perhaps in some places; but in those parts, there is much of that kind of tree and fruit. Sycamore fruits are called something similar to figs; but still, they differ somewhat; which those who have seen or tasted them can know. However, as the name indicates, sycamore is translated into Latin as "foolish fig." Now look at my Zacchaeus, see him, I beg you, wanting to see Jesus in the crowd and not able. For he was humble, the crowd was haughty; and the crowd itself, as often happens, hindered the view of the Lord; he ascended from the crowd, and saw Jesus with the crowd not hindering him. For the crowd says to the humble, walking the path of humility, leaving their injuries to God, not seeking revenge on their enemies, the crowd insults, and says: Defenseless one, who cannot avenge yourself. The crowd hinders that Jesus may not be seen: the crowd rejoices and exults when it can avenge itself, hindering the view of Him who hanging said: Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they do. So Zacchaeus, wanting to see this one, in whom the person of the humble was prefigured, did not heed the impeding crowd; but climbed the sycamore, as if the tree of a foolish fruit. For, says the Apostle, we preach Christ crucified, indeed a stumbling block to Jews: behold the sycamore; but foolishness to Gentiles. Hence, the wise of this world insult us because of the cross of Christ, and say: What kind of heart do you have, who worship a crucified God? What kind of heart do we have? Certainly not like yours. The wisdom of this world is foolishness with God. Our heart is not like yours. But you call our heart foolish. Say what you will: we will climb the sycamore, and we will see Jesus. For this reason, you cannot see Jesus, because you are ashamed to climb the sycamore. Let Zacchaeus grasp the sycamore, let the humble ascend the cross. It is not enough if he ascends; let him not be ashamed of the cross of Christ, let him fix it on his forehead, where the seat of shame is: there indeed, there in the part of the body where one feels shame, let there be fixed what should not be ashamed. I think you mock the sycamore: yet it made me see Jesus. But you mock the sycamore, because you are human: but the foolishness of God is wiser than men. The necessity of prevenient grace. And the Lord saw Zacchaeus himself. He was seen, and he saw; but unless he had been seen, he would not see. For those whom He predestined, He also called. He is the one who said to Nathanael, already helping the Gospel with his testimony, and saying: Can anything good come out of Nazareth? The Lord said to him: Before Philip called you, when you were under the fig tree, I saw you. You know from where the first sinners, Adam and Eve, made themselves loincloths. When they sinned, they made themselves loincloths from fig leaves and covered their shameful parts: because they did what made them ashamed by sinning. Therefore, if the first sinners made themselves loincloths from the fig leaves from which we originate, in which we were lost, so that He would come to seek and save what was lost, what else is meant by: When you were under the fig tree, I saw you; except, you would not come to the cleanser of sin, unless He had first seen you in the shadow of sin? That we might see, we were seen; that we might love, we were loved. My God, His mercy will go before me. To receive Jesus into the heart.

Now, therefore, the Lord, who had received Zacchaeus in his heart, deigned to be received into his house, and said: "Zacchaeus, hurry and come down, for I must stay at your house today." He considered it a great benefit to see Christ. He, who thought it a great and ineffable benefit to see Him passing by, suddenly deserved to have Him in his house. Grace is poured out, faith works through love; Christ is received into the house, who already dwelled in the heart. Zacchaeus says to Christ: "Lord, I give half of my possessions to the poor; and if I have defrauded anyone of anything, I restore it fourfold." As if he were saying: "Therefore I keep half for myself, not that I may have it, but that I might restore it." Truly, behold what it means to receive Jesus, to receive Him in the heart. For Christ was there, in Zacchaeus, and from him He said to himself what he heard from his mouth. For the Apostle says: "That Christ may dwell in your hearts through faith."

Those who seem healthy to themselves are mad against the doctor. The blood of the doctor is the medicine for his slayer.

Now therefore, because Zacchaeus was, because he was a chief tax collector, because he was very much a sinner; as if that healthy crowd, which was hindering seeing Jesus, was amazed, and reproached that Jesus had entered into the house of a sinner. This was to reproach the doctor for entering the house of the sick person. Therefore, because Zacchaeus was mocked as a sinner, he was mocked by the insane; the Lord, having healed him, responded to those mocking: Today salvation has come to this house. Behold why I entered, salvation has been made today. Surely, if the Savior had not entered, salvation would not have been made in that house. Why then do you marvel, O sick one? You also call Jesus, do not seem healthy to yourself. He who accepts the doctor is sick with hope; he who despairs is sick and strikes the doctor in madness. What sort of madness then is his, who kills the doctor? But how great is the goodness and power of the doctor, who made a remedy from his own blood for his insane killer? For indeed, he who came to seek and to save that which was lost, hanging, was not saying without cause: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. They are insane, I am a doctor: let them rage, I endure patiently; when they have killed, then I will heal. Let us therefore be among those whom He heals. The human saying and worthy of all acceptance, because Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners: great and small, to save sinners. The Son of Man came to seek and to save that which was lost.

Original sin is proven. Christ is also Jesus to infants. Baptism and communion of the little ones. Who says that the infant age does not have what Jesus saves, denies Christ as Jesus to all faithful infants. Who says, I say, that the infant age does not have what Jesus saves in it, says nothing other than that Christ the Lord is not Jesus to faithful infants, that is, to baptized infants in Christ. For what is Jesus? Jesus is interpreted as Savior. Jesus is the Savior. To those whom he does not save, not having what to save in them, he is not Jesus to them. Now, if your hearts can tolerate that Christ is not Jesus to some baptized people, I do not know whether your faith can be recognized in a sound rule. They are infants but they become his members. They are infants but they receive his sacraments. They are infants but they become participants of his table, so that they have life in them. Why do you say to me: He is healthy, he has no defect? Why do you run to the doctor with him if he has no defect? Do you not fear lest he says to you: Take away hence him whom you think is healthy? The Son of Man did not come except to seek and to save what was lost. Why do you bring him to me if he was not lost? The reason why Christ came. The meaning of the name Jesus. Little ones need a Savior. The faith of those answering for them in baptism should be right.

Human speech and worthy of all acceptance, because Christ Jesus came into the world. Why did he come into the world? To save sinners. There was no other reason why he came into the world. It was not our good merits that led him from heaven to earth, but our sins. This is the reason why he came: to save sinners. And you will call, he says, his name Jesus. Why will you call his name Jesus? For he will save his people from their sins. You will call his name Jesus. Why Jesus? What is the reason for this name? Hear why: For he will save his people. From what? From their sins. His people from their sins. Do not little ones belong to this people, whom Jesus will save from their sins? They surely do, they do indeed, my brothers. Hold this in your heart, believe so, and with this faith bring the little ones to the grace of Christ; lest, if you do not have this faith in your heart, you kill those for whom you answer with your tongue. Truly, brothers, whoever does not run with this faith with the little one, pretends. He is healthy, he has nothing bad, he has no fault; but I will take him to the doctor. Why? Because this is the custom. Are you not afraid the doctor might say to you: Take him away with you; a doctor is not needed for the healthy, but for those who are ill.

All little ones should be considered like orphans. Rebirth is necessary for little ones. Objection against original sin. Ancient rule of faith, to baptize little ones.

"I would commend to your charity the cause of those who cannot speak for themselves. All little ones should be considered as orphans, even those who have not yet lost their own parents. The whole number of the predestined little ones seeks a guardian from the people of God, who awaits the Lord the Savior. The entire mass of mankind was struck in the first man by that venomous one; no one passes from the first to the second except through the sacrament of Baptism. In newborn infants who are not yet baptized, let Adam be recognized: in newborn infants who are baptized and thus reborn, let Christ be recognized. Whoever does not recognize Adam in newborns cannot recognize Christ in the reborn. But why, they say, does a faithful man baptized and already forgiven of sin, generate one who is with the sin of the first man? Because he generates him by flesh, not by spirit. What is born of flesh is flesh. And if our outward man, says the Apostle, is corrupted, yet the inward man is renewed day by day. From that which is renewed in you, you do not generate a little one; from that which is corrupted in you, you generate a little one. You have been born and reborn so as not to die eternally; he has been born but not yet reborn. If you live by being reborn, allow him also to be reborn and live; allow him, I say, to be reborn, allow him to be reborn. Why do you contradict? Why do you attempt to break the ancient rule of faith with new arguments? What is it that you say: Little ones have no original sin at all? What is it that you say, except that you do not want them to come to Jesus? But to you, Jesus cries out: Allow the little ones to come to me. Turned towards the Lord, etc."

Sermons - Sermon 175

SERMO 175 ON THE SAME WORDS OF THE APOSTLE (1 TIM 1:15-16):

"Faithful is the saying and worthy of all acceptance," etc. The cause of the Incarnation of Christ.

What has been read just now from the holy Gospel, this also the Apostle Paul says, whose words are these: "Faithful is the saying and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am the foremost." There was no reason for Christ the Lord to come, except to save sinners. Remove diseases, remove wounds, and there is no cause for medicine. If a great physician came down from heaven, a great infirm person was lying over the whole world. That infirm person is the human race. But not all have faith. The Lord knows who are His. The Jews were boasting, they were exalting themselves, thinking highly, considering themselves righteous, and moreover accusing the Lord who was gathering sinners. Therefore, those who were boasting and thinking highly were left on the mountains, pertaining to the ninety-nine. What does it mean, they were left on the mountains? They were left in earthly fear. What does it mean, they pertain to the ninety-nine? They are on the left, not on the right. For the ninety-nine are counted on the left; add one, and it transitions to the right. As He says in another place: "The Son of Man came to seek and to save that which was lost." For all was lost: from when one sinned, where one was, all perished. But one came without sin, who would save from sin. However, by boasting, which is worse, they both were sick and believed themselves to be healthy. The more dangerous illness of the Jews. The Jews raving at the physician.

Those are more dangerously ill who have lost their mind to fevers. They laugh, and the healthy weep. For the frenzied one laughs; but he is not healthy. Furthermore, one who is of a sound mind weeps for the laughing frenzied one. First, if you propose these two things: What is better, to laugh or to weep? Who would not choose laughter for himself? Finally, because of the wholesome pain of repentance, the Lord placed duty in weeping, benefit in laughter. How so? When he says in the Gospel: Blessed are those who weep, for they will laugh. Therefore, duty is in weeping, the reward of wisdom is in laughing. For he placed laughter for joy, not roaring laughter, but exultation. Therefore, if you propose these two things and ask which of these is better, to laugh or to weep, every person does not want to weep and wants to laugh. But if you add personalities to these emotions and thus propose them with persons: What is better, for a frenzied one to laugh or for a sane one to weep? A person chooses for himself weeping with sanity rather than laughter with madness. So much does mental soundness prevail that it is even chosen with mourning. Therefore, those who thought themselves sane were much more dangerously and desperately ill; and by that very sickness whereby they had lost their minds, they were also striking the physician. It is not enough to say they were striking: I shall tell the whole; not only were they striking, but also killing. However, even when he was being killed, he was a physician: he received blows, and he healed; he endured the frenzied one, nor did he abandon the sick one. He was seized, bound, struck with fists, received blows from a reed, was mocked, insulted, finally heard, condemned, hung on wood, raged against from all sides; and he was a physician.

Christ prepares a remedy for his killers from his blood.

You recognize the frenzied, recognize also the physician. Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. They raged with a lost mind, and by raging they shed the physician's blood; but he even made medicines for the sick from his own blood. For he did not say in vain: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. The Christian prays and is heard; does Christ pray and is not heard? For he who hears with the Father, because he is God, how is he not heard as a man, which he was made for us? Truly, he was heard. They were there, they raged there; they were among those who reproached him and said: Behold, he eats with publicans and sinners. They were in that very people by whom the physician himself was killed, and in his blood even the antidote was prepared for them. For when the Lord not only shed his blood but also expended his very death for the making of the medicine; he rose again to demonstrate the example of resurrection. By his patience, he suffered to teach our patience; and in his resurrection, he demonstrated the reward of patience. Also, as you know and as we all confess, he ascended into heaven, then from him the Holy Spirit was sent, formerly promised. For he had said to his disciples: Stay in the city, until you are clothed with power from on high. Therefore, his promise came, the Holy Spirit came, filled the disciples, they began to speak in the tongues of all nations: a sign of unity proceeded in them. For then one man spoke in all tongues; because the unity of the Church was going to speak in all tongues. Those who heard were astonished. For they knew that they were simple men, of only one language; and they marveled and were amazed that men of one language, or at most two, spoke in the tongues of all nations: they were stunned with amazement, lost their arrogance, turned from mountains into valleys. Now if they are humble, they are valleys; they hold what is poured in, they do not release it. If water comes upon a high place, it runs down and flows away: if water comes to a concave and low place, it is held and stays. They were now such; they were astonished, they marveled, they had lost their cruelty. The conversion of Christ's murderers.

Finally, when Peter was speaking to them, they were deeply pierced, and what was foretold by the Psalm happened to them: “I turned into affliction, when the thorn was fastened.” What is the thorn? The compunction of repentance. Thus, you also have the very words of Scripture in the Acts of the Apostles: “They were pierced to the heart, and said to the Apostles: What shall we do?” Why did they say: What shall we do? We know what we have done: what shall we do? As far as our deed is concerned, there is despair of salvation: therefore, let there be in your counsel, if it is possible, some hope of health. We know what we have done; tell us what we should do. What is it that we have done? For we did not kill just any man; and we would have done much evil if we had killed any innocent man. We chose a robber, we killed an innocent man; we chose a dead man, we killed the healer; tell us: what shall we do? And Peter: Do penance, and let each one of you be baptized in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ; so that you may pass from ninety-nine to one hundred: for when you were ninety-nine, you did not consider penance necessary for yourselves, and you even insulted the Lord who gathers sinners and wants to make them penitents. Now therefore, pierced, because you have recognized your sin, do penance, and let each one of you be baptized in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ; be baptized in His name whom you killed without a crime: and your sins will be forgiven you. They were brought back to hope: they grieved, they moaned, they were converted, they were healed. They themselves were those about whom it was said, “Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.”

Christ loves sinners so that they may not be sinners.

Therefore, each one of you, beloved, when you hear that the Lord Jesus Christ did not come for the righteous, but for sinners, do not love to be a sinner; lest he say in his heart: If I am righteous, Christ does not love me; if I am a sinner, He loves me: because He came for sinners, not for the righteous. For He answers you: If you have recognized the doctor, why did you not fear the fever? Indeed, the doctor comes to the sick, certainly: but the doctor comes to the sick so that he may not remain always sick. What then do we say? What do we pronounce? What do we define? Does the doctor love the sick or the healthy? He loves what he wishes to make; not what he finds. He comes indeed to the sick, he does not come to the healthy: do not consider it because he comes to one and not to the other; for He loves the healthy more than the sick. For, that you may know that He loves the healthy more than the sick; would he do what he hated?

Paul as the first of sinners.

Therefore, attend to the apostle Paul: "Faithful is the saying and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am the chief." He said: "of whom I am the chief." How was he the chief? Were there not many Jews who were sinners before him? Were there not sinners in the human race before him? Before him, among all people, was no one held by sin? Was not Adam before him, who first sinned and plunged us all into death? What does it mean: "of whom I am the chief"? Unto what has it come, that I am the chief? But even this is not true. Peter was chosen first, Andrew was first, other Apostles were first; you are the last Apostle; how do you say: "of whom I am the chief"? Therefore the last Apostle, the chief sinner. And how, even in this, the chief sinner? Before you, Peter sinned, when he denied the Lord three times. I do not wish to say, because if he had not been found to be a sinner, he would not have passed from the left to the right. The first of sinners, because worse than all.

What then does it mean: "Of whom I am the first"? Because I am worse than all. Therefore he wanted "the first" to be understood as "worse." Just as among artisans, whosoever wishes to build, what does he say? Who is the foremost builder here? Who is the foremost craftsman? Or if he wishes to be treated: Who is the foremost physician here? Certainly he does not ask who is the oldest, nor who is the most professional; but who is the most skilled. Just as those are the foremost in their craft, so this one is the foremost in iniquity. Why is Paul the foremost in iniquity? Recall Saul, and you will find out. You look at Paul, you forget Saul: you look at the shepherd, you forget the wolf. Is this not the one for whom a single hand was not enough to stone Stephen, and who kept the garments of others? Is he not the one who persecuted the Church everywhere? Is he not the one who had received letters from the chief priests? Because it was not enough for him to persecute the Christians who were in Jerusalem; but he wanted to go to other places, where he found them, and bind them, and bring them for punishment. Is he not the one who, while traveling, breathing threats and murder, was struck from heaven, and heard the voice of the Lord like thunder for his salvation? While he walked, he was cast down; that he might see, he was blinded. Therefore he himself who was the foremost persecutor, no one was more wicked than him.

Paul's conversion.

Listen so that you may understand more. It was the Lord Christ himself speaking to Ananias, already prostrate, now arisen; and he said to him: Go to that village, there you will find Saul of Tarsus in Cilicia, speak to him. Because he has seen a man named Ananias coming to him and baptizing him. He heard the name of Saul, and trembled in the hands of the physician himself. But what is sweeter, from where Saul was called, I believe you remember, and for those who do not remember, I will recount. Saul was that persecutor of David. In David was Christ, in David Christ was prefigured, in Saul was Saul prefigured: as if David from heaven to Saul, "Saul, Saul, why are you persecuting me?" Ananias translates to “Sheep”: the shepherd was speaking to the sheep, and the sheep feared the wolf. Such fame of this wolf had gone forth, that the sheep did not consider itself safe, even in the hands of the shepherd. And the Lord to him, as if to a trembling sheep. For when he heard this, he said: Lord, I have heard from many about this man, how much evil he has done to your saints in Jerusalem, and now it is said he has received letters from the high priests to bind any he finds and bring them bound. Where are you sending me? A sheep to a wolf? But he did not listen to this excuse. For he had already said to a few of his little sheep: Behold, I send you out as sheep in the midst of wolves. If sheep are sent in the midst of wolves, why do you, Ananias, tremble to go to him who is no longer a wolf? You feared the wolf; but your Lord God answers you: I have made a sheep from a wolf; I am making from a sheep a shepherd. The art of Christ the physician is recommended in the curing of Paul.

How then does Saul, later Paul, rejoice that he has reached the mercy of God, because he was found to be foremost, that is, excellent in sins: And yet I obtained mercy, so that in me Christ Jesus might display the utmost patience, for those who are to believe in him for eternal life; so that all might say to themselves: If Paul was healed, why should I despair? If such a desperate sick person was healed by such a great physician, why should I not apply those hands to my wounds? Why should I not hasten to those hands? For this reason Saul was made an Apostle from a persecutor, so that men might say this. For when a physician comes, he seeks someone there who is hopeless, and he heals him: and if he finds the poorest man, yet he finds the most desperate; he does not seek a reward there, but commends his skill. Therefore, I will say what I began. How then does Saul rejoice that he was taken and healed by Christ, since he was a sinner, nor did he say: Let me remain in sin, because Christ came for me, not for the righteous; so also you, who have heard that Christ came for sinners, do not sleep on a sweet bed; but listen to Paul himself saying: Rise, you who sleep, and rise from the dead, and Christ will illuminate you. Do not love the bed of sin. You turned its whole bed into his illness, it was said before. Rise, be healed, love health, and do not again out of pride go from right hand to left, from valley to mountain, from humility to swelling. When you have become healthy, that is, when you have begun to live righteously, attribute it to God, not to yourself. For you were not made safe by praising yourself; but by pronouncing against yourself. For if you praise yourself out of pride, you will become more grievously sick. For everyone who exalts himself will be humbled; and whoever humbles himself will be exalted. Turned to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 176

SERMO 176 ON THE THREE READINGS OF THE APOSTLE (1 TIM 1, 15-16):

"Faithful is the saying and worthy of all acceptance," etc.

Come, let us worship and bow down, let us kneel before the Lord our Maker.

"Come, let us adore, and let us bow down to Him," etc. And as he entered into a certain village, there met him ten lepers, who stood afar off; And lifted up their voices, saying: Jesus, master, have mercy on us. Whom when he saw, he said: Go, show yourselves to the priests. And it came to pass, as they went, they were made clean. And one of them, when he saw that he was made clean, went back, with a loud voice glorifying God. And he fell on his face before his feet, giving thanks: and this was a Samaritan. And Jesus answering, said: Were not ten made clean? And where are the nine? There is no one found to return and give glory to God, but this stranger. And he said to him: Arise, go thy way; for thy faith hath made thee whole. Where ten lepers were cleansed by the Lord.

AGAINST THE PELAGIANS Readings and chants in the Church.

Listen attentively, brothers, to what the Lord deems worthy to admonish through the divine readings, with Him giving, and me ministering. We have heard the first reading of the Apostle: "This saying is faithful and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am the foremost. But for this reason, I obtained mercy, that in me Jesus Christ might display all His longsuffering, as a pattern to those who are going to believe on Him for everlasting life." We have perceived this from the apostolic reading. Then we sang the Psalm, exhorting one another with one voice and one heart, saying: "Come, let us worship and bow down, let us weep before the Lord who made us: and let us anticipate His face with confession, and with psalms let us rejoice before Him." After this, the gospel reading revealed to us the ten lepers cleansed, and one of them, a foreigner, giving thanks to his healer. Let us, as much as we can within the time, consider these three readings, saying a few things about each; and, as much as we can strive, with the Lord's help, not to dwell on any one of them in such a way as to bring hindrance to the other two.

Thanksgiving owed by all to the doctor. Original sin in infants. Bishops are the guardians of orphans. The Apostle presents to us the knowledge of thanksgiving. Remember what the final evangelical reading echoes, how the Lord Jesus praises the one giving thanks, reproves the ungrateful, cleansed in the skin, leprous in the heart. What then does the Apostle say? "This saying is trustworthy and deserving of full acceptance." What is this saying? That Christ Jesus came into the world. For what purpose? To save sinners. What about you? "Of whom I am the foremost." He who says, either: I am not a sinner, or: I was not, is ungrateful to the Savior. No human being in this mortal mass derived from Adam, no human being at all is not sick, none is healed without the grace of Christ. What about little children, if they are sick from Adam? For they too are brought to the Church; and if they cannot run there with their own feet, they run with the feet of others, to be healed. The mother Church lends them others' feet to come, others' heart to believe, others' tongue to confess: so that just as they are burdened by another's sin, so, when they are healed, they are saved by another's confession. Therefore, let no one whisper to you foreign doctrines. This the Church has always had, always held: this she received from the faith of the elders; this she perseveres in keeping until the end. For the physician is not needed by those who are well, but by those who are sick. Why then did the infant have need of Christ, if he is not sick? If he is well, why does he seek the physician through those who love him? If when infants are carried, they are said to have no sin of propagation at all, and they come to Christ; why are those who bring them not told in the Church: Take away these innocent ones from here: the physician is not needed by those who are well, but by those who are sick; Christ did not come to call the righteous, but sinners? This has never been said, nor will it ever be said. Therefore, let each one speak for another who cannot speak for himself, brothers. The possessions of orphans are greatly commended to bishops, how much more the grace of little ones? The bishop protects the orphan, lest, when the parents are dead, he be oppressed by strangers. He should cry out even more for the little one, whom he fears may be killed by the parents; let him cry out with the Apostle: "This saying is trustworthy and deserving of full acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world, for no other reason, but to save sinners." He who comes to Christ has something to be healed in him: he who does not, has no reason to be offered to the physician. Let the parents choose one of two: either confess the sin to be healed in their little ones, or stop offering them to the physician. This is nothing other than wishing to offer the healthy to the physician. What do you offer? To be baptized. Whom? The infant. To whom do you offer? To Christ. Certainly to him who came into the world? Yes, he says. Why did he come into the world? To save sinners. Therefore, the one whom you offer, has something to be saved in him? If you say: He has, by confessing you remove it; if you say: He does not have, by denying, you hold it.

Paul, how the foremost of sinners.

"Sinners, he says, to save, of whom I am the foremost. Were there no sinners before Paul? Certainly even Adam himself before all, and the earth full of sinners destroyed by the flood, and how many thereafter. Whence is it true, 'I am the foremost'? He called himself foremost, not by the order of sinners, but by the magnitude of sin. He considered the magnitude of his sin, whence he called himself the foremost of sinners; just as among advocates, for example, some are called foremost: this one is foremost, not because he has more years since he began practicing law; but because from the time he started, he surpassed the others. Thus the Apostle may speak in another place as to why he is foremost among sinners: 'I,' he says, 'am the least of the Apostles, not worthy to be called an Apostle, because I persecuted the Church of God.' No one was more fierce among persecutors: therefore, no one was prior among sinners." In Paul's healing, hope of salvation was brought to the desperate. But I obtained mercy, he says. And why he obtained mercy, he explains the reason: That in me, he says, Jesus Christ might show all longsuffering, for an example to those who shall believe in him to life everlasting. Christ, he says, who will grant forgiveness to sinners turning to him even up to his enemies, first chose me, the fiercest enemy; so that when he healed me, no one else might despair. Doctors do this: when they come to places where they are unknown, they first choose to heal desperate cases; so that in them they might both exercise benevolence and commend their teaching; so that everyone in that place might say to his neighbor: Go to that doctor, be assured, he heals you. And he: He heals me? Do you not see what I suffer? I know something similar: what you suffer, I also indeed suffered. Thus Paul says to every sick person, and to anyone wishing to despair of themselves: He who healed me, sent me to you, and said to me: Go to that despairing one, and tell him what you had, what I healed in you, how quickly I healed you. From heaven, I called, struck down with a single word and cast down, raised and chose with another, filled and sent with a third, freed and crowned with a fourth. Go, tell the sick, cry out to the despairing: This saying is faithful and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners. Why do you fear? Why do you tremble? Of whom I am the first. I, he says, speak to you, healthy to the sick, standing to the lying down, assured to the despairing. For this reason, I obtained mercy, that in me Jesus Christ might show all longsuffering. He bore with my disease for a long time and so took it away; like a good doctor he patiently endured a madman, tolerated me striking him, and granted that I might be struck for him. He showed all longsuffering in me, for an example to those who shall believe in him to life everlasting. Our salvation is from God, not from ourselves. The benefits of grace. A double confession.

Therefore do not despair. You are sick, approach him, and be healed: you are blind, approach him, and be enlightened. And those who are healthy, give thanks to him: and those who are sick, run to him for healing; let all say: Come, let us adore, and prostrate ourselves before him, and weep before the Lord who made us, both men and saved ones. For if he made us humans, but we ourselves made ourselves saved; we did something better than him. For the saved man is better than any man. Therefore, if God made you a human, and you made yourself a good human; what you did is better. Do not exalt yourself above God: submit yourself to God, adore, prostrate, confess to him who made you: because no one recreates, unless he who creates, no one restores, unless he who made. This is also in another Psalm: He made us, and not we ourselves. Surely when he made you, you had nothing to do: but when you already are, you also have something to do; you would run to the doctor, implore the doctor, who is everywhere. And so that you might implore, he stirred your heart, and gave you the ability to implore; for it is God, he says, who works in you both to will and to act, for his good pleasure. For so that you might have a good will, his call preceded. Cry out: My God, his mercy will precede me. That you might be, that you might feel, that you might hear, that you might consent, his mercy preceded you. He preceded you in all things: you also precede him in something. In what, you ask, in what? Confess all these good things you have from God, and whatever evil you have from yourself. Do not despise him in your good things, praise yourself; do not accuse him in your evil things, excuse yourself: this is true confession. He who preceded you in so many good things, will come to you, and inspect his gifts and your evils; he inspects how you have used his good. Therefore, because he has preceded you in all these gifts, see in what you may precede his coming; listen to the Psalm: Let us come before his face with confession. Let us come before his face: that before he comes, he may be propitious; before he is present, he may be appeased. You have a priest through whom you can appease your God, and he himself with the Father is God to you, who is human for you. Thus you will rejoice in Psalms, coming before his face with confession. Rejoice in the Psalm: coming before his face with confession, accuse yourself; rejoicing in the Psalm, praise him. By accusing yourself, and praising him who made you; he who died for you will come, and will give you life.

Various and inconsistent doctrine is the leprosy of the mind.

Hold this, persist in this. Let no one vary, let no one be leprous. Inconstant doctrine, not having one color, signifies the leprosy of the mind: and this Christ cleanses. Perhaps you have varied in something, and you have inspected, and changed your opinion for the better; and what was varied has become of one color. Do not attribute this to yourself, lest you be among the nine who did not give thanks. One gave thanks, the rest were Jews; he was an alien, he signified the alien nations, that number gave tithes to Christ. Therefore, we owe to Him what we are, what we live, what we understand: that we are men, that we have lived well, that we have understood rightly, we owe to Him. Nothing is ours, except the sin that we have. For what do you have that you have not received? Therefore you, especially those who know what you hear, being cured from sickness, being cleansed from variety, raise your heart upward, and give thanks to God.

Sermons - Sermon 176A

SERMON 176/A FROM THE SERMON ON WHAT KIND OF PERSON A BISHOP OUGHT TO BE AND WHERE PAUL REBUKES PETER

[F FRAGMENT Therefore, it is necessary for a bishop to be blameless.

Therefore, it is necessary for a bishop to be blameless. Who denies this? But since it is necessary for a bishop to be blameless, should it be fitting for a Christian to be blameworthy? Bishop is a Greek name, but in Latin it can be called overseer or visitor. We are bishops, but we are Christians together with you. We are specifically named from visitation, commonly all of us from anointing. If the anointing is common, then the struggle is common too. But why do we visit, if there is nothing good that we see in you?

Sermons - Sermon 177

SERMO 177 For we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out. But having food and clothing, with these we shall be content. But those who desire to be rich fall into temptation and a trap, and into many foolish and harmful lusts which drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is the root of all kinds of evil, for which some have strayed from the faith in their greediness, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows. But you, O man of God, flee these things and pursue righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, gentleness. Fight the good fight of faith, lay hold on eternal life, to which you were also called and have confessed the good confession in the presence of many witnesses. I urge you in the sight of God who gives life to all things, and before Christ Jesus who witnessed the good confession before Pontius Pilate, that you keep this commandment without spot, blameless until our Lord Jesus Christ’s appearing, which He will manifest in His own time, He who is the blessed and only Sovereign, the King of kings and Lord of lords, who alone has immortality, dwelling in unapproachable light, whom no man has seen or can see, to whom be honor and everlasting power. Amen.

Command those who are rich in this present age not to be haughty, nor to trust in uncertain riches but in the living God, who gives us richly all things to enjoy. Let them do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to give, willing to share, storing up for themselves a good foundation for the time to come, that they may lay hold on eternal life.

"We brought nothing into this world," BUT NEITHER CAN WE TAKE ANYTHING AWAY.

TREATISE ON GREED Greed is placed before our eyes. Our discourse is about the apostolic teaching. He says, we brought nothing into this world, and we can take nothing out: but having food and clothing, with these we shall be content. For those who want to become rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and harmful desires which plunge men into destruction and perdition. For the love of money is the root of all evils, and some, in their craving for it, have wandered away from the faith and have pierced themselves with many sorrows. This matter is worthy to make you attentive listeners, and us ready speakers. These words place avarice before our eyes: it is accused, not defended; rather, being accused, it is condemned, lest its defender be condemned with it. I do not know in what way, but avarice acts in the hearts of men so that all, or to speak more truly and cautiously, almost all, denounce it with words but wish to embrace it with their deeds. Many have spoken many great and grave and true things against it, poets, historians, orators, and philosophers, and every kind of literature and profession has said much against avarice. It is great not to have it, and it is much greater not to have it than not to be silent about its vices. Do not become a slave to greed, for which the blood of Christ became the price.

What is the difference between philosophers, for example, reproaching greed, and the Apostles reproaching the same? What is the difference? If we consider it, we learn something that is unique only to the school of Christ. Behold what I just mentioned: We brought nothing into this world, and we can take nothing out of it; if we have food and clothing, we shall be content with these, many have said. Also this: The love of money is the root of all evil, some have said. No one among them said what follows: But you, man of God, flee these things; pursue righteousness, faith, love, along with those who call on the Lord out of a pure heart. None of them said such things. How far from the clattering mouths is the solidity of piety. Therefore, dearly beloved, since there are those outside our community who have reproached and despised greed; let them not seem great to us or to the men of God, because: But you, man of God. In no way let them be compared, this first we must discern and hold that we do what we do for the sake of God. For if the true worship of God is taken away, any lover of greed is condemned. Nevertheless, a more true rule of piety ought to instill in us greater care. For it is disgraceful, and exceedingly shameful and grievous if idol worshipers have been found to be masters over greed, while the worshiper of the one God is subdued by greed and becomes a slave to greed, for whom the blood of Christ has become the price. The Apostle added, and said to Timothy: I charge you before God who gives life to all things, and Christ Jesus who witnessed the good confession before Pontius Pilate (how far distant this is from them, you see) that you keep this commandment without spot, blameless until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ, which he will manifest in his own time, he who is the blessed and only Sovereign, the King of kings and Lord of lords, who alone has immortality and dwells in unapproachable light, whom no man has seen or can see, to whom be honor and everlasting power. We have been made members of this household, we have been adopted into this family; we are his sons, not by our merits, but by his grace. It is too grave, and too horrible, that greed should hold us on earth; when we say to him: Our Father, who art in heaven. In desire for him, let all things become worthless; neither let those things be born to us among which we were born, because we have been reborn because of him. Let these be for the use of necessity, not for the affection of love: let them be as the inn of a traveler, not as the estate of a possessor. Recover yourself and pass on. You are making a journey, pay attention to whom you are going, for great is the one who comes to you. By departing from this path, you make room for the one coming; this is the condition of inns; you vacate so that another may succeed. But if you want to reach the safest place, let God not depart from you, to whom we say: You have led me in the paths of your righteousness, for your name's sake: not for my merit. The journey of mortality.

There is a difference, therefore, between the path of mortality and the path of piety. The path of mortality is common to all who are born, while the path of piety is not common to all; for all the born travel the former path; only the reborn travel the latter. To the former pertains birth, growth, aging, and death. For this, nourishment and clothing are necessary. Let the expenses of this journey be sufficient. Why do you burden yourself? Why do you carry so much on a short journey, not to help you at the end of this path, but rather to burden you more heavily after this path is finished? It is indeed exceedingly miserable, what you wish to happen to you: you burden yourself, you carry much, money weighs you down on this path, and after this path, avarice weighs you down. For avarice is the impurity of the heart. You carry nothing from this world which you loved; but you carry the vice which you loved. If you love the world persistently, the one who made the world will not find you pure. Therefore, let money be moderate for its temporal use, let it be the provision for the intended end which is written: "Without love," he says, "of money is a sufficient measure for the present." See before all what was prefixed: "Without love," he says; thus stretch out your hand, so that you release your heart from there. For if you wish to bind your heart with love of money, you will insert yourself into many sorrows; and where will it be: "But you, man of God, flee these things"? He does not say: "Leave, and abandon"; but: "Flee, as if from an enemy." You were seeking to flee with gold, flee gold: let your heart flee, and then there is secure use. Let there be no greed, yet let there not be a lack of piety; there is something you can do with gold if you are the master of gold, not its servant. If you are the master of gold, you do good with it: if you are its servant, it does evil with you. If you are the master of gold, you clothe the Lord with it and praise Him: if you are its servant, you being stripped of it curse God. It is greed that makes you a servant, charity makes you free. Hence you are a servant if you do not flee. But you, man of God, flee these things. In this matter, if you do not want to be a servant, be a fugitive.

Riches are within.

You have heard what you should avoid, and you also have what you should pursue. For you do not flee in vain, nor do you leave something behind without seizing something else. Therefore, pursue righteousness, faith, piety, charity. These will make you rich. These riches are within: a thief does not approach them unless an evil will gives him room. Fortify your inner chest, that is, your conscience. A thief will not steal these riches from you, nor will any most powerful enemy, nor an invading host or barbarian, nor finally a shipwreck be able to take them away; hence if you leave naked, you leave full. For he was not truly empty, even though he appeared to have nothing outwardly, who said: “The Lord gave, the Lord has taken away; as it has pleased the Lord, so it has been done: blessed be the name of the Lord.” This fullness is praiseworthy, immense wealth; empty of gold, full of God; empty of all transitory possessions, full of the will of his Lord. Why do you seek gold with such great labors and travelings? Love these riches, and now be filled; their source is not hidden, if the heart is open; the key of faith opens the heart, both opens and cleanses where you may place (them). Do not think yourself narrow: your riches, your God, when He enters, He will enlarge (you) Himself.

You discern him who is rich from him who wishes to be rich.

Therefore, without the love of money, there is sufficient provision in the present. Why in the present? Because we brought nothing into this world, nor can we take anything out: for this reason, provision is made for the present, not the future. But what deceives a man into the reckoning of avarice? What if I live for a long time? He who gives life, does he not also provide means to sustain that life? After all, there are returns: why then is a treasure sought? Some returns come from business, some from trade, some from price: let it suffice, let it not be hoarded; lest where you place your treasure, there your heart also remains, and though it ought to be above, you vainly hear and falsely respond. For when you respond to that most sacred word and subscribe with your voice, are you not accused from within, from your very heart? Although your heart is pressed down and oppressed, does it not say to you inwardly: "You place me under the earth, why do you lie?" Therefore, does it not say to you: "Am I not where your treasure is?" Thus, you lie. Or does he lie who said: "For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also"? You say: "It will not be there." Truth says: "It will be there." But it will not be there, because you do not love. Prove it by your deeds. You do not love, but you are rich. Certainly, you observe well and discern yourself; from him who is rich, you distinguish him who wants to be rich. For there is a great difference between being rich and wanting to be rich. It is a just distinction, it cannot be denied. There is wealth in the former, desire in the latter.

Greed is indeed insatiable. For even the Apostle himself does not say: Those who are rich, but: Those who want to become rich, who want to become so, fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and harmful desires: wanting to become, not being. Therefore he says, desires. For desire is in a person who wants to attain what he does not have. For no one desires what he has. Indeed, greed is insatiable; and yet even in those who have much, the desire is to be of that thing not which they have, but which they want to have. He has this estate, he desires to have another which he does not have; but when he has this too, he will desire another; however, he will not desire what he has had, but what he has not had. Therefore, wanting to be rich, he desires, he burns, he thirsts, and like the disease of dropsy, the more he drinks, the more he thirsts. This is a remarkable similarity in the disease of the body; indeed, the greedy man in his heart is altogether dropsical. For dropsy in the flesh is full of moisture, perishes by moisture, and is not satisfied by moisture: so dropsy in the heart, the more it has, the more it needs. When he had less, he wanted smaller things, rejoiced in fewer, was delighted with small places: indeed, because he was filled, he was stretched, he was made abundant (inheritances come daily), he drinks and thirsts. If I have this, I will be able to have that; I can little, because I have little. When you have this too, you have more wanting: poverty has increased, not power.

If you do not love riches, your heart can be lifted up. But I do not love, he says, what I have, so that I have a heart set on high. Certainly, I agree; if you do not love, your heart can be set on high. Why then should your heart not be set on high and be free? But see if you do not love; faithfully report to yourself, not being accused by me, but questioned by yourself. Certainly, he says, I do not love: indeed, I am rich, but because I am already rich, I do not want to be, so that I may fall into temptation and a trap, and many foolish and harmful desires, which plunge men into ruin and destruction: a grave evil, dreadful, dangerous, destructive, I am already, he says, rich, and I do not want to be. Are you already rich? Already, he says. Do you not want to be? No, he says. If you were not, would you want not to be? I would not, he says. Therefore, since you are already rich, and the word of God found you rich outwardly, made you rich inwardly, accept what has been said to the rich. For what was said in these words: We brought nothing into this world, and we can take nothing out of it: having food and clothing, we will be content with these. For those who want to be rich fall into temptation, etc.; those who want to be, he says, rich, as if it were said to the poor. Have these words of the Apostle found you poor? Say them, and you are rich; say in your heart, from the heart: I brought nothing into this world, and I can take nothing out of it; having food and clothing, I am content with these. For if I want to be rich, I will fall into temptation and a trap. Say it, and remain where you have been found. Do not insert yourself into many sorrows; lest when you want to strip yourself, you tear yourself apart. But have you been found rich? There are other words for us to recite: let not the one found rich think nothing has been said to him. The Apostle says to the same Timothy, but he says it to a poor man. For Timothy was poor, like Paul. What then will he say to Timothy about this matter, a poor man, that pertains to those found rich? Hear what: Command, he says, those who are rich in this present world: for there are also the rich of God; and true riches belong only to the rich of God, like Paul himself, who said: I have learned to be content in whatever circumstances I am. Give me a rich man of the world who will say this: I have learned to be content in whatever circumstances I am: but it does not suffice for the greedy. Therefore: command, he says, those who are rich in this present world. What should I say to them? Do not wish to be rich? They are already found rich: let them hear what is said to them, where the head of it is, do not be high-minded. Hence, wealth is held and loved greatly. A nest of pride is gathered where it may be nurtured and grow; and what is worse, it does not want to fly away but remains. Therefore, before all else, do not be high-minded. Let him understand, be wise, consider himself mortal, and equal to a poor mortal. For both the earth took them naked, both death awaits, neither fever fears: the poor man has it on his ground bed, but neither does the rich man frighten it coming on his silver bed. Therefore, Command those who are rich in this world not to be high-minded. Let them recognize their poor equals: the poor are human and human; different clothing, but similar skin: and if the rich man is buried embalmed, putrefaction will not be absent, but delayed; it rots later, but does it not rot? But let us suppose, they both do not rot: yet both feel nothing. Command those who are rich in this world not to be high-minded. Let them not be high-minded, and they will truly be as they wish to appear: they will possess without love, not be possessed. To use is one thing, to enjoy is another. But see what follows: Do not think highly of yourself, nor hope in the uncertainty of riches. You love gold; if you can, make it certain, so that you do not fear to lose it. You have gathered wealth; give yourself, if you can, security. Nor hope in the uncertainty of riches. It comes, it goes; now it was here, now it perishes, now it is feared that it may perish. Therefore do not hope in the uncertainty of riches. He took hope away from them. Where did he fix it? But in the living God. Fix your hope there, place the anchor of your heart there, so that the storm of the age does not break and destroy you: in the living God, who provides everything for us abundantly to enjoy. If everything, how much more himself? And truly he himself will be everything for us to enjoy. For it does not seem to me to have been said: Who gave us everything abundantly to enjoy, unless he meant himself. For it seems that using is one thing, enjoying is another. For we use out of necessity, we enjoy for pleasure. Therefore, he gave these temporal things for use, but himself for enjoyment. If therefore himself, why was it said everything, unless because it is written: That God may be all in all? Therefore, place your heart there to enjoy, so that it may be lifted up. Untie yourself from here, but bind yourself there: it is perilous for you to remain without a bond in these storms.

Lift up the heart, not on the earth. Do not hope in the uncertainty of riches: not, however, nowhere, but in the living God, who provides us all things abundantly for enjoyment. What is as much as everything, than He who made everything? For these all things would not be made by Him, unless He knew them. Who would dare to say: God made this, which He did not know? He made what He knew. Therefore, He had it before He made it: but He had it in wondrous ways, not as He made, temporal and passing, but as an artisan makes. He has inside what He works outside. Therefore, there are all things chiefly, immortal, enduring, remaining, and God Himself all in all things: but to His saints, to His righteous people, He Himself will be all in all things. Therefore, He alone suffices, He alone suffices, of whom it was said: Show us the Father, and it is sufficient for us; but, so long, He says, have I been with you, and you have not known Me? He who has seen Me has seen the Father. All things God the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit. Rightly He alone suffices. If we are greedy, let us love Him. If we desire wealth, let us desire Him. He alone will be able to satisfy us, of whom it was said: Who satisfies your desire with good things. Does this not suffice for the sinner? Is this great good alone not enough for the sinner? By wanting to have more, he lost everything: for the root of all evils is greed. Properly, through the Prophet, He reproaches the sinful soul and fornicating from Him, and says: You thought, if you departed from Me, you would have more. But like the prodigal son, behold you fed pigs; behold you lost everything; behold you remained in need, and returned late weary. Now understand that what the Father gave you, He kept safer: You thought, if you departed from Me, you would have more. O sinful soul and filled with fornications, made filthy, made discolored, made unclean, and loved thus! Return, therefore, to beauty, so that you may return to beauty: return, and say to Him who alone suffices for you: You have destroyed all who go astray from You. What then suffices, except what follows? But for me, it is good to cling to God. Therefore, lift up your heart, not on earth, not in the poorest treasure, not in a place of decay. For the root of all evils is greed. And in Adam himself, the root of all evils was greed. For he wanted more than he received, because God was not sufficient for him. The Lord our God wants us to be merchants.

Therefore, what are you going to do with what you have, O rich man, pay attention. You no longer think arrogantly: rightly. You do not place hope in the uncertainty of riches: very good. But you hope in the living God, who provides us with all things abundantly to enjoy: praiseworthy. Do not, therefore, be lazy in what follows: let the rich be rich in good works. Let us see these things, and believe what we do not see. You used to say: I have gold, but I do not love it; but it's not loving, it's within you; if I deserve anything from you, prove it to me; what you do not hide from your God, prove to your brother. Where, he says, will I prove it? From what follows: let the rich be rich in good works, let them be generous. For this be rich, that you may easily give. The poor indeed want to give, but cannot: with him there is difficulty, with you there is ease. Let it benefit you that you are rich, because when you want to do it, you can do it immediately. Let them be generous, ready to share. Do they lose anything? They treasure up a good foundation for the future. And lest we love that gold and silver and properties, and those things which seem beautiful in human possessions, even in that age, and desire similar things there, when it is said to us: Migrate there, place your treasure there: he warned us against carnal thoughts, and said: That they may lay hold of the true life; not gold, which remains on earth, not perishable goods, not transient goods, but true life. How then do we migrate, when this does not go there, nor will we have there what we carry from here? In a way, the Lord our God wants us to be merchants, he trades with us: we give what abounds here, we receive what abounds there; just as many make overseas trades: they give one thing somewhere else, and where they come they receive something else. For example, he says to his friend: Take gold from me here, and give me oil in Africa; and he migrates and does not migrate: what he gave he has already transferred, but he did not receive this. He receives what he desires. Such is this exchange, such, my brethren, is our trading. What do we give, and what do we receive? We give what we cannot carry with us, even if we wish to, so why then does it perish. Here, let what is less be given, that what is greater may be found there. We give earth, and we receive heaven; we give temporal things, and we receive eternal things; we give perishable things, and we receive immortal things; finally, we give what God has given, and we receive God himself. Therefore, let us not be lazy in this exchange of things, in this rich and ineffable trade. Let it benefit because we are here, let it benefit because we are born, let it benefit because we are sojourning. Let us not return empty-handed.

You hold the caution of God, you have held the debtor himself.

Let not the moth of evil thoughts enter the ark of the heart. Let it not be said: I will not give, lest I have nothing for tomorrow. Do not think much about the future: rather, think much about the future, but about the far future: He says, "Let them lay up for themselves a good foundation for the future, that they may lay hold on eternal life." Not in such a way, as the Apostle said: that there should be a supply for others, and for you an affliction, but from what each one has. Only do not love, preserve, hoard, lean on stored-up things, that is to hope for things uncertain. How many rich have slept and woken up poor. For because of these thoughts, when it was said: "A sufficient amount of money without love is enough for the present," because of evil thoughts, which say: If I do not have a treasure, who will give to me, when I begin to need? Then: I have an abundance to live on, it suffices for living; but what if some slander comes to me: how will I redeem myself? What if I need to litigate: where will I get the expenses? (as long as you can recount and reckon all the evils which may happen to the human race, often one disaster disturbs the reckoning of the counter, and all that was being counted is not only lost, but does not even remain on the fingers) Therefore, against this worm of thoughts, against the malignant moth, God has placed in His Scripture, as certain fragrances are placed on garments, lest they be moth-eaten. What? Were you thinking that you might lack this or that, and were counting many calamities. Were you not afraid of one great one? Observe what follows: "A sufficient amount of money without love is enough for the present," for He Himself has said: "I will never leave you, I will never abandon you"; you were fearing some unknown evils, therefore you were reserving money: keep me as your surety. This God says to you. Not a man, not your peer, nor yourself, but God says to you: "I will never leave you, I will never abandon you." If a man were promising, you would believe; God promises, and you doubt? He promised, wrote it down, made a covenant: be secure. Read what you hold, you hold God's covenant, you have held the very debtor, from whom you have asked your debts to be forgiven. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 178

SERMO 178 From the words of the Apostle (Titus 1, 9):

"That he may be able to exhort in sound doctrine," And to refute those who contradict.

AGAINST THE PLUNDERERS OF OTHER PEOPLE'S GOODS The work of the bishops. When the Blessed Apostle's Epistle was read concerning the establishment of bishops, he certainly reminded us to look at ourselves; and he reminded you not to judge us; especially because we all heard the last sentence of the recent chapter of the Gospel reading: "Do not judge by appearances, but judge with right judgment." Therefore, in judging, no one assumes another's person if he does not take his own. The Blessed Apostle says in a certain place: "I do not fight as one beating the air; but I discipline my body and keep it under control, lest after preaching to others, I myself should be disqualified." He alarmed us with his fear. For what will the lamb do where the ram trembles? Among the many things the Apostle wrote about what a bishop ought to be, we heard even that which may be sufficient to talk and discuss now. For if we try to examine each thing, and to discuss each as it deserves, neither our strength is enough to speak, nor yours to listen. Therefore, what is it that I wish to say, if he who alarmed me helps me? Among other things, he says that a bishop should be skilled in sound doctrine, so that he can refute those who contradict. A great task it is, a heavy burden, a steep ascent. But: "I will hope," he says, "in God, for He will free me from the snare of the hunters, and from the harsh word." For there is no cause that more makes a steward of God lazy in refuting contradictors than fear of a harsh word. The greedy hoarder of his own is condemned.

First, therefore, I will explain to you, as the Lord allows, what it means to reprove those who contradict. Those who contradict must not be understood in one way. Very few contradict us by speaking; but many do so by living wickedly. When does a Christian dare to tell me that it is good to take other people's property; if indeed he does not dare to say that it is good to tenaciously keep his own property? For did that rich man, who had a region succeed to him and did not find where to place his fruits, and rejoiced thinking he had found the advice of destroying the old storehouses and building new, larger ones to fill them, and said to his soul, "Soul, you have many goods laid up for many years, relax, eat, drink, be merry," was this rich man seeking others' possessions? He intended to gather his own fruits, he was consulting about where to place them, not about any neighbor's fields, not by disturbing boundaries, not by robbing the poor, not by deceiving the simple, but was only thinking about gathering his own. Hear what the one who tenaciously kept his own heard; and understand from this what awaits those who take others' possessions. So when he thought he had found a most prudent counsel, in destroying the narrow old storehouses and building new, larger ones, and gathering and storing all his fruits, not desiring and taking others' possessions; God said to him, "Fool; where you thought yourself wise, there you are foolish. Fool," he said, "this night they will demand your soul from you; the things you have prepared, whose will they be? If you keep them, they will not be yours; if you distribute them, they will be yours. Why," he says, "do you store up what you are about to leave behind?" See, the fool is rebuked for storing badly. If he is a fool who stores up his own, find a name for him who takes others'. If the one who stores his own is miserable, the one who takes others' is ulcerous. But not like that ulcerous one who lay at the rich man's gate, and whose sores the dogs licked. For he was ulcerous in body; the taker, in heart. The rich man, because he is unmerciful, is punished.

Perhaps someone will respond and say: The punishment for that man to whom God said "Fool" was not very great. God does not say "Fool" as a man does. Such a word from God is a judgment. Will God give the kingdom of heaven to fools? But to those to whom He will not give the kingdom of heaven, what remains for them except the punishment of hell? We seem to infer this: let us see this clearly and openly. For that rich man, before whose gate the poorest man covered with sores lay, was not said to be a plunderer of others' possessions. It said: "There was a certain rich man who was clothed in purple and fine linen, and feasted sumptuously every day." He was rich, it said; it did not say he was a calumniator, it did not say he was an oppressor of the poor, it did not say he was a plunderer of others' possessions, or an informer, or a receiver, it did not say he was a despoiler of orphans, it did not say he was a persecutor of widows; none of these things, but: "There was a certain rich man." What is so great? He was rich, he was rich of his own. From whom had he taken anything? Perhaps he had taken, and the Lord would remain silent about him, and show him partiality, if He were to conceal his crimes, who tells us: "Do not judge by appearances"? Therefore, if you want to hear the crime of that rich man, do not seek more than you hear from the Truth. He was rich; he was clothed in purple and fine linen, and feasted sumptuously every day. So what is his crime? The poor man, lying at his gate, covered with sores, was not helped. For it is clearly said about him that he was merciless. For, dear ones, if that poor man lying at the gate had received sufficient bread from the rich man, would it be said of him that he desired to be fed with the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table? Because of this sole inhumanity, by which he despised the poor man lying at his gate and did not feed him properly and worthily, he died and was buried; and being in torment in Hades, he lifted up his eyes, and saw the poor man in Abraham's bosom. And what more need I stay? He desired a drop, who did not give a crumb; he did not receive rightful judgment, who did not give in cruel greed? So if this is the punishment of the greedy, what punishment awaits the plunderers? The gifts of the thief are not accepted by God. But the thief of others' goods says to me: I am not like that rich man. I make love-feasts, send nourishment to the chained in prison, clothe the naked, and receive strangers. You think you're giving? Do not steal, and you have given. To whom you give, they rejoice; from whom you take, they weep; which of these two will the Lord hear? You say to the one to whom you have given: Give thanks because you have received. But the other says to you from the other side: I grieve because you have taken from me. And you held almost everything, and gave so little. Therefore, if you had given to the needy what you have taken from another, God does not love such works. God says to you: Fool, I commanded that you give, but not from another's property. If you have, give from your own; if you do not have anything to give from your own, it is better to give nothing than to rob others. The Lord Christ will say, when he sits in his judgment, and separates others to the right and others to the left, to those who do well: Come, blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom; but to the fruitless, who have done no good to the poor: Go into eternal fire. And what will he say to the good? For I was hungry, and you gave me to eat, and so on. And they will answer him: Lord, when did we see you hungry? And he to them: When you did it to one of the least of mine, you did it to me. Understand therefore, fool, who wants to give alms from robbery, that if ever you feed a Christian, you feed Christ; when you rob a Christian, you rob Christ. Consider what he will say to those on the left: Go into eternal fire. Why? For I was hungry, and you did not give me to eat; I was naked, and you did not clothe me. Go. Where? Into eternal fire. Absolutely go. Why? I was naked, and you did not clothe me. Therefore, if he will go into eternal fire to whom Christ will say: I was naked, and you did not clothe me; what place in the eternal fire will he have to whom Christ will say: I was clothed, and you stripped me?

It is not allowed to seize the property of pagans.

Here perhaps you might avoid this speech, lest Christ says to you: I was clothed, and you stripped me; changing customs, you think to strip a Pagan and clothe a Christian. And here Christ will answer you, rather now He will answer you through some kind of servant, His minister; Christ will answer you, and will say: Even here spare me the loss. For when you strip a Pagan as a Christian, you hinder him from becoming a Christian. Even here perhaps you will still answer: I do not inflict punishment out of hatred, but rather out of the love of discipline; therefore I strip the Pagan, so that through this harsh and healthy discipline I may make him a Christian. I would hear and believe, if what you took away from the Pagan, you would give to the Christian.

He rebukes the robbers.

We have spoken against one vice of plunder, by which human affairs are ravaged everywhere; we have spoken, and no one contradicts us. For who dares to contradict the most evident truth by speaking against it? Therefore, we do not do what the Apostle advised, to refute those who contradict; we speak to the obedient, we instruct with praise; we do not refute those who contradict. Thus, indeed, they do not contradict with the tongue, but with life. I advise, he plunders; I teach, he plunders; I command, he plunders; I rebuke, he plunders; how does he not contradict? Therefore, I will say what I consider sufficient concerning this matter. Abstain, brothers, abstain, sons, abstain from the habit of robbery; and you who groan under the hands of robbers, abstain from the desire to rob. Another is powerful, and he robs; you groan under the hand of the robber; because you cannot rob, you do not do it. Withhold the opportunity, and there I will praise the curbed desire. The thing found must be returned.

Blessed, says the holy Scripture, is he who has not gone after gold; who could transgress and did not transgress; who could do evil and did not do it. But you say: I have never denied someone else’s property. Perhaps because no one entrusted it to you; or perhaps someone did entrust it, but entrusted it under witnesses. Tell me, did you return it when you received it alone, where God was between you? If you did return it then, if you returned it to the son of the deceased who entrusted it to you, who did not know, then I will praise you because you did not go after gold; because you could transgress and did not transgress; because you could do evil and did not do it. If perhaps you found a stranger's bag of coins where no one saw you on the road, and without any delay returned it to whom it belonged. Come on, brothers, return to yourselves, examine yourselves, question yourselves, answer truthfully to yourselves, and judge yourselves not according to appearance, but judge just judgment. Behold, you are a Christian, you frequent the church, you hear the word of God, you are joyfully moved by the reading of the word of God. You praise the speaker, I seek the one who acts; you, I say, praise the speaker, I seek the one who acts. You are a Christian, you frequent the church, you love the word of God, and you listen willingly. Behold, in what I propose, examine yourself, weigh yourself, rise to the tribunal of your mind, and place yourself before yourself, and judge yourself; and if you find anything wrong, correct yourself. Therefore, I propose: God says in His law that found items should be returned; God says in His law, which He first gave to His people, for whom Christ had not yet died, that found items should be returned as belonging to another; if anyone, for example, finds a stranger's bag of coins on the road, they must return it. But they do not know to whom? Ignorance does not excuse if greed does not dominate. An outstanding example of restoring another's property.

I will tell your Charity, because these are gifts of God; and there are in the people of God those who do not listen to the word of God in vain; I will tell what a very poor man did, when we were established in Milan; so poor, that he was the assistant of a grammarian; but clearly a Christian, although that grammarian was a Pagan; better on the sail than in the chair. He found a purse, unless I am mistaken in the number, with nearly two hundred solidi; mindful of the law, he publicly posted a notice. For he knew it should be returned; but to whom he should return it, he did not know. He posted a public notice: Who lost solidi, let him come to that place, and seek that man. He who was wandering around lamenting, upon finding and reading the notice, came to the man. And lest he seek someone else's goods, he asked for signs, inquired about the quality of the purse, the seal, even the number of solidi. And when the man answered everything faithfully, he returned what he had found. But he, filled with joy and seeking to repay him, offered him twenty solidi as if they were tithes; he refused to accept them. He offered ten; he refused to accept them. At least he begged him to accept five; he refused. The indignant man threw the purse: "I lost nothing," he said; "if you do not want to accept anything from me, I lost nothing." What a contest, my brothers, what a contest? What a battle, what a conflict? The world is a theater, God the spectator. At last, the man accepted what was offered; he immediately distributed it all to the poor, not keeping a single solidus in his house. The same argument is discussed.

What is it? If I have done anything in your hearts, if the word of God has settled in you, if it has found rest with you, do this, my brothers; do not think you are suffering loss if you do this; it is a great gain if you do what I say. I lost twenty coins, I lost two hundred, five hundred. What did you lose? They disappeared from your house; another person had lost, not you. The earth is common, you are in one house, in this world both travelers, you have entered one inn of this life. He placed it there, he forgot it; it fell from him, you found it elsewhere. Who found it? A Christian. Who found it? One who heard the law, a Christian who heard the law. Who found it? One who, when you heard many things, you praised, you found it. If therefore you truly praised, return what you found. If therefore you did not return what you found; when you praised, you gave testimony against yourself. Be faithful finders, and then blame unjust takers. For what you found and you did not return, you took. As much as you could, you did; because you could not do more, therefore you did not do more. One who denies another's property, if he can, he also takes it. What you do not take, fear prohibits; you do not do good, but you fear evil. The servile fear does not prevent the wickedness of the heart.

What is great, to fear evil? It is great not to do evil; it is great to love good. For even a thief fears evil; and when he cannot, he does not do it; and yet he is a thief. For God examines the heart, not the hand. A wolf comes to the sheepfold, seeks to invade, seeks to slaughter, seeks to devour; the shepherds are vigilant, the dogs bark; he can do nothing, does not take, does not kill; yet the wolf comes, the wolf returns. Is it because he did not take a sheep that he is coming as a wolf and returning as a sheep? The wolf comes growling, the wolf returns trembling; he is, however, a wolf both growling and trembling. Therefore, ask yourself, whoever you wish to judge; and see if you do not do evil when you can do it without being punished by man. Then you fear God. No one is there except you and the one to whom you are doing evil, and God who sees both; see, fear there. It is not enough that I say: See, fear evil there. Love good there. For even if you refrain from doing evil out of fear of hell, you are not yet perfect. I dare to say, if you refrain from doing evil out of fear of hell, there is indeed faith in you, because you believe that God's judgment is to come; I rejoice in your faith, but I still fear your malice. What did I say? Because if you refrain from doing evil out of fear of hell, you do good not out of love for righteousness. The love of justice is chaste whence it is proven.

It is one thing to fear punishment; it is another to love justice. Pure love ought to be in you, by which love you desire to see, not heaven and earth, not the liquid fields of the sea, not idle spectacles, not the gleam and glitter of jewels; but desire to see your God, to love your God; because it is said: Beloved, we are the children of God, and it has not yet appeared what we shall be; but we know that when He appears, we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is. Behold for what vision you should do good, behold for what reason you should not do evil. If indeed you love to see your God, if in this pilgrimage you sigh with that love; behold, the Lord your God tests you, as if to say to you: Behold, do what you wish, fulfill your desires, extend wickedness, spread luxury, consider whatever pleases you to be lawful; I do not punish you for this, I do not send you to hell, I only deny you my face. If you have feared, you have loved; if that which was said: "God will deny you His face," made your heart tremble, if in not seeing your God you deemed it a great punishment; you have loved freely. Therefore, if my word has found in your hearts any spark of gratuitous love for God, nourish it; invoke yourselves with prayer, humility, the sorrow of penance, the love of justice, good works, sincere groans, laudable behavior, faithful friendship to increase it. Fan that spark of good love within you, nourish it within you; when it has grown, and has made the most worthy and ample flame, it consumes the hay of all carnal desires.

Sermons - Sermon 179

SERMO 179 OF THE WORDS OF THE APOSTLE JAMES (1, 19. 22):

"Let each one of you be quick to hear,"

"Slow to speak." And concerning those in the same place:

"Be doers of the word, and not hearers only," etc.

It must be spoken about the duty of both the hearers and the preachers of the word of God.

Blessed James the Apostle addresses those who are constant listeners of the Word of God, saying: "But be doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves." For you deceive not Him whose word it is, nor by whom the word is spoken, but yourselves. From this saying, emanating from the source of truth through the very truthful mouth of the apostle, we also dare to exhort you; and when we exhort you, we reflect on ourselves. For the preacher of the Word of God is idle outwardly who is not an inward hearer. Nor are we so turned away from humanity and faithful consideration that we do not understand our own dangers, we who preach the Word of God to the people. However, it consoles us that where we face dangers in our ministries, we are helped by your prayers. For, brothers, so that you may know in what safer place you stand than us, I cite another saying of the apostle, who says: "Let every one of you be swift to hear, slow to speak." Therefore, I will first speak about our office because of this saying, which admonishes us to be quicker to hear and slower to speak; so that when I have excused our office, which involves frequent speaking, I will then come to that which I initially proposed. To hear the word of God is safer than to preach it.

We must exhort you, that you should not be hearers of the word only, but also doers. Therefore, what we often speak to you, who does not, slightly noticing our necessity, judge us, when he reads: Let every man be quick to hear, slow to speak? Behold, your zeal does not permit us to observe that sentiment. Therefore, you ought to pray, to support, the one you compel to be in danger. Nevertheless, my brothers, I will tell you what I want you to believe; for you do not see this in my heart. I who speak to you constantly, by the command of our lord and your bishop, my brother, and because of your demands, then I rejoice fully, when I hear. My joy, I say, is complete when I hear, not when I preach. For then I take delight securely. That pleasure does not involve inflation. There, the precipice of pride is not feared, where there is the rock of solid truth. And that you may know it is so, listen where it is said: You will give joy and gladness to my hearing. There I rejoice, where I hear. Then he followed and added: The humbled bones will rejoice. Therefore, when we listen, we are humble; but when we preach, even if we do not risk pride, we are certainly restrained. And if I am not exalted, I am at risk of being exalted. But when I hear, I enjoy without a deceiver, I delight without a witness. This joy was also known by that friend of the bridegroom, who said: He who has the bride is the bridegroom; but the friend of the bridegroom stands and hears him. And therefore, he stands, because he hears him. For the first man also stood by hearing God, and he fell by hearing the serpent. Therefore, the friend of the bridegroom stands and hears him; and rejoices, he says, greatly because of the bridegroom’s voice. Not because of his own voice, but because of the bridegroom's voice. However, the voice of the bridegroom which he heard inwardly, he did not close to the people outwardly.

Duties of Mary and Martha. The good part of Martha. The good of hospitality. This part was also chosen by that Mary, who, with her sister busy in much ministry, sat at the feet of the Lord and leisurely listened to his word. John stood, she sat; but she stood in heart, and he sat in humility. For standing signifies permanence; sitting, humility. And to know that standing signifies permanence, it is said that the devil did not have this permanence; of whom it was said: He was a murderer from the beginning, and did not stand in truth. Also, because sitting signifies humility, the Psalm shows, where it admonishes about penitence, and says: Rise up after you have sat, you who eat the bread of sorrow. What does it mean: Rise up after you have sat? He who humbles himself will be exalted. What good does hearing have, the Lord himself is witness, speaking of Mary who sat at his feet, and heard his word. For when her sister, very busy around ministry, complained that she was being deserted by her sister, she heard from the Lord who was appealed to: Martha, Martha, you are anxious and troubled about many things; but one thing is necessary. Mary has chosen the better part, which will not be taken away from her. Was what Martha was doing bad? Which of us can explain satisfactorily in words, how good it is to minister hospitality to the saints? If to any saints, how much more to the head and principal members, Christ and the Apostles? Does not each of you who have this good of hospitality, when you hear what Martha was doing, say to yourself: O blessed, O happy, who deserved to receive the Lord; whose guests the Apostles became walking in the flesh! Nor should you lack, because you cannot what Martha could, to receive Christ into your home with his Apostles; he makes you secure: When you did it to one of the least of my brothers, you did it to me. Therefore, it is a great work, very great, which the Apostle commands saying: Contributing to the needs of the saints, pursuing hospitality. Which praising in the Epistle to the Hebrews he says: Through this some have entertained angels unawares. Great therefore is the ministry, great the gift. And yet Mary chose the better part; because while her sister was anxious, laboring, caring for many things, she was unoccupied, sat, and listened. The better part is Mary's, for it will not be taken away. The work of Martha is taken away, not the reward.

However, the Lord shows whence that better part was. For immediately after He had said, "Mary has chosen the better part"; as if we asked, wanting to know why it was better, He added and said, "which shall not be taken away from her." What do we understand, my brothers? If she chose the better part because it will not be taken away from her, without a doubt, Martha had chosen that part which will be taken away from her. Clearly, it will be taken away from every person who ministers to the saints those things necessary for the body, it will be taken away from what he does. For he will not always minister to the saints. To whom does he minister, if not to infirmity? To whom does he minister, if not to mortality? To whom does he minister, if not to the hungry and thirsty? All these things will not be, when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality. When the necessity itself has passed, there will be no ministry of necessity. Labor will be taken away, but its reward will be rendered. To whom, then, will food be ministered when no one hungers? To whom drink, when no one thirsts? To whom hospitality, when no one is a stranger? The Lord, therefore, with His disciples, so that He might render the reward of this work, deigned to be in need. He Himself hungered and thirsted; not because He was compelled, but because He deigned. It was good, therefore, that through Him by whom all things were made, He hungered; for thus happy would be he who fed Him. And when anyone fed the Lord, what did he give? Who did he give to? From what did he give? To whom did he give? What did he give? He gave food to the Bread. Who gave? He who indeed gave, who wished to receive more. From what did he give? Could it be from his own? What did he have that he had not received? To whom did he give? Was it not to Him who had created both what He received and from whom He received? This is a great ministry, a great work, a great gift. And yet Mary chose the better part, which shall not be taken away from her. Therefore, the part of Martha passes away; but, as I said, the reward given for it does not pass away. The part of Mary does not pass away. The part of Mary, however, does not pass away. See how it does not pass away. What was Mary delighted with when she was listening? What was she eating? What was she drinking? Do you know what she was eating, what she was drinking? Let us ask the Lord Himself, who prepares such a table for His own, let us ask Him. Blessed, He says, are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness, for they shall be satisfied. From this source, from this granary of righteousness, holy Mary sitting at the feet of the Lord, was receiving certain crumbs while she was hungering. For the Lord gave only as much then as she could grasp. However, neither the disciples nor the Apostles themselves could grasp everything He was going to give at that future table of His, when He said to them: I still have many things to say to you, but you cannot bear them now. Therefore, from where, as I said, was Mary delighted? What was she eating, what was she drinking with the avid jaws of her heart? Righteousness, truth. She was delighted with truth, she was hearing truth; she was yearning for truth, she was sighing for truth. Hungering for truth she was eating, thirsting she was drinking; and she was being refreshed, and what she was being fed with was not diminished. From where was Mary delighted? What was she eating? I linger because I am delighted. I dare to say, she was eating Him whom she was hearing. For if she was eating truth, did He not say: I am the truth? And what more shall I say? He was being eaten, because He was bread: I am, He says, the bread that came down from heaven. This bread is that which refreshes and does not diminish.

I feed on truth, the part of Mary that does not perish. Delight from the light of truth.

Therefore, let your Love be attentive. Behold, we say minister to the saints, prepare food, serve drink, set the table, wash feet, make the bed, receive under the roof; will not all this pass away? But who dares to say that we are now fed by truth, but will not be fed when we come to immortality? If we are now fed with crumbs, shall we not then have a full table? For the Lord spoke of this spiritual food when He praised the Centurion's faith and said: Amen I say to you, I have not found so great faith in Israel. And therefore I say to you, that many will come from the East and the West, and will sit down with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven. Let it be far from our thoughts to imagine those foods in the table of that kingdom, of which the Apostle says: Food for the belly, and the belly for food; but God will destroy both it and them. Why will He destroy them? Because there will be no hunger there. That which will be eaten will not perish. For in promising this reward to His saints in that kingdom, He says: Amen I say to you, He will make them sit down to eat, and will come and serve them. What does it mean: He will make them sit down, but He will make them rest, He will make them free? What does it mean: He will come, or: He will pass, and serve them? After this passing, He will serve them. For here Christ made the passing; we will come to Him where He has passed, there He no longer passes. For also Passover in Hebrew language is interpreted as Passage. This the Lord showed, nay, the Evangelist, when he said of the Lord: When the hour had come that He should pass from this world to the Father. If therefore He feeds us here, and thus feeds; how will He feed there? What Mary chose, was growing, was not passing away. For the delight of the human heart from the light of truth, from the overflow of wisdom, the delight of the human heart, of a faithful heart, of a holy heart, no pleasure is found to which it can be compared in any part, that it may even be called lesser. For what you say: It is less, as if growing it will be equal. I do not want to say: Lesser; I do not compare, it is of another kind, it is far different. For what is it now that you all attend to, all hear, all are excited, and when something true is said, you are delighted? What have you seen? What have you held? What color appeared to your eyes? What form, what figure, what stature, what lineaments of members, what beauty of body? None of these. And yet you love. For when would you praise so, if you did not love? When would you love, if you saw nothing? Therefore with me not showing the form of the body, the lineaments, the color, the beautiful movements, with me not showing, yet you see, love, praise. If this delight of truth is sweet now, much sweeter will it be then. Mary chose the better part, which shall not be taken from her.

We must be doers of the word both inside and outside.

I have shown, as much as I could, as the Lord has deemed it fitting to assist me, to your sweetest Charity, how much safer a place it is to stand by hearing than for us by preaching. For in this way you are doing what we will all do then. For then, there will be no teacher of the word, but the Word will be the teacher. Therefore, it follows that what pertains to you to do, pertains to us to advise. For you are the hearers of the word, we the preachers. But within, where no one sees, we are all hearers; within the heart, within the mind, where He teaches you, who encourages you to praise. For I speak outwardly, He stirs within. Therefore, we are all hearers within; and we all should be doers, both outwardly and inwardly, in the sight of God. Wherefrom are we doers within? Because whoever looks at a woman to lust after her has already committed adultery with her in his heart. And one can be an adulterer, with no man seeing, but with God punishing. Who then is a doer within? He who does not look to lust. Who is a doer outwardly? "Break your bread for the hungry." For when this is done, your neighbor sees; but with what mind it is done, only God sees. Be therefore, my brothers, doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving yourselves; not God, nor him who preaches. For I, or whoever preaches the word to you, does not see your heart; what you do within in your thoughts, he cannot judge. Because man cannot, God beholds, to whom the human heart cannot be hidden. He sees with what eagerness you listen, what you think, what you hold, how much you profit from His supplies, how earnestly you pray, how you beseech God for what you do not have, how you give thanks for what you have; He knows who will demand an account. We can distribute the Lord's coin; the exactor will come who said: "Wicked servant, you ought to have deposited my money with the bankers, and I would have demanded it with interest upon my coming."

Hearers of the word, building some upon the rock, others upon the sand.

Therefore do not deceive yourselves, my brothers, because you came eagerly to hear the word, if you do not do what you hear by failing. Consider if it is beautiful to hear, how much more to do. If you do not hear, you neglect hearing, you build nothing. If you hear and do not do, you build a ruin. The Lord Christ has given a most fitting comparison on this matter: He says, "Everyone who hears these words of mine and does them, I will liken him to a wise man who built his house upon the rock. The rain descended, the floods came, the winds blew and beat upon that house, and it did not fall. Why did it not fall? It was founded upon the rock." Therefore, to hear and to do is to build upon the rock. For to hear itself is to build. But He says, "Everyone who hears these words of mine and does not do them, I will liken him to a foolish man who builds." And he also builds. What does he build? Behold, he builds his house; but because he does not do what he hears, and by hearing builds upon the sand. Therefore, upon the sand builds he who hears and does not do; upon the rock, he who hears and does; neither upon the sand nor upon the rock builds he who hears nothing. But see what follows: The rain descended, the floods came, the winds blew, and beat upon that house and it fell; and great was its fall." A miserable spectacle! Not to listen, as if not to build, is wrong.

Someone therefore says: What I am not going to do, why do I need to hear? For by hearing and not doing, I will build a ruin. Is it not safer to hear nothing at all? The Lord indeed did not wish to touch upon that very part in His example provided, but He gave it to be understood. For in this world, rain, winds, and rivers do not cease. Do you not build upon the rock, so that they may come and not overthrow you? Do you not build upon the sand, lest when they come, they overthrow the house? Therefore, without any roof, because you hear nothing, will you remain thus. The rain comes, the rivers come; are you safe so, because you are carried away naked? Consider then, what kind of part you have chosen for yourself. You will not be secure, as you think, by not hearing; it is necessary that you, naked and without any roof, be overwhelmed, taken up, submerged. Therefore, if it is bad to build upon the sand, it is bad to build nothing at all; it remains that it is good only to build upon the rock. Therefore, it is bad not to hear; it is bad to hear and not to do; it remains to hear and to do. Therefore, be doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving yourselves. A negligent listener should not blame the preacher's faults.

After this exhortation, I fear that I will not uplift with words, but will break with despair. Perhaps someone, or one, or two, or certainly more, in this frequent assembly of yours judges me and says, "I would like to know if he who speaks to me does all that he himself hears or tells others." To this, I respond: "For me, it is a very small thing to be judged by you or by a human court. For I too, in some part, can know what I am now; what I will be tomorrow, I do not know. But your Lord has given you security concerning me. For if I do what I say or what I hear, be imitators of me, as I am of Christ. But if I speak and do not do, listen to the Lord: What they say, do; but do not do what they do. Therefore, if you think well of me, you praise me; if you think ill of me, you accuse me, but you do not excuse yourself. For how will you excuse yourself if you turn the accusation against a preacher of truth speaking the word of God to you and doing his own evil deeds, when your Lord, your redeemer, the pourer of the ransom, who assembles you into his army and makes of his servant his brother, does not cease to remind you and says: What they say, do; but do not do what they do? For they say, he says, and do not do. They say good things, they do bad things; you listen to the good things and do not do the bad things." Here you will respond: "How do I hear good from a bad man? Do men gather grapes from thorns?"

Sermons - Sermon 179A

SERMON 179/A "For whoever keeps the whole law but fails in one point has become guilty of all of it."

"Whoever shall keep the whole law, yet stumble in one point,"

He has been made guilty of all.

Judgment with mercy. A terrible reading sounded in our ears before the Psalm, because: Whoever keeps the whole law but offends in one point has become guilty of all. Therefore, in such great danger, who would not cry out: Have mercy on us, Lord, have mercy on us? For unless His mercy is withdrawn, we cannot more vehemently recall or commend the danger itself. Do not enter into judgment with Your servant, said one—notwithstanding holy—but still a man; Do not enter into judgment with Your servant, for no living being will be justified in Your sight. He therefore did not want to enter into judgment with himself. But judgment without mercy will be to him who has shown no mercy. Let us understand the opposite of this statement, and see where we ought to place our hope. For if judgment is without mercy to him who has shown no mercy, undoubtedly judgment will be with mercy to him who has shown mercy. This statement was made by the Apostle James, from whose Epistle the same terrible reading was recited, because: Judgment without mercy will be to him who has shown no mercy. But this from the opposite, which we have said: Judgment with mercy will be to him who has shown mercy, the Lord expressed, when He said: Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy. Therefore, there is hope in the mercy of God, provided our misery is not barren of the work of mercy. What do you seek from the Lord? Mercy. Give, and it shall be given to you. What do you seek from the Lord? Forgiveness. Forgive, and you shall be forgiven. The words of the apostle James raise a question.

Nevertheless, it is commonly asked how it should be understood: Whoever keeps the entire law but stumbles in one point has become guilty of all. For it is to be feared and avoided lest we think that a thief should be compared to a murderer or an adulterer; indeed this error is dangerous and troublesome; there is much difference between theft and murder. But it is objected to us: Surely, then: Whoever keeps the entire law but stumbles in one point has become guilty of all. He keeps himself from murder, he keeps from adultery, he keeps from false testimony, he keeps from idolatry, he keeps from any damnable sacrilege. He has stolen; now he will be held as both a murderer and an adulterer and a false witness and an idolater and a sacrilegious person, because he committed theft? Certainly not, then, whoever stumbles in one point has become guilty of all. But when explaining this very thing, the same apostle, whose epistle it is, added and said: For he who said: Do not commit adultery, also said: Do not kill. If you do not kill, but you commit adultery, you have become a transgressor of the law. When he placed this peril before their eyes, and all trembled, as if to console them, he added: So speak and so act as those who are to be judged by the law of liberty. For judgment is without mercy to the one who has not shown mercy. Whether, therefore, we are able to untangle the knot of this question or our effort perhaps succumbs to its difficulty, and whether I can think worthily of what I should say, or perhaps I may say what I have been able to think, be zealous in works of mercy. This is plain, this is clear, this needs no expositor, but a listener and a doer. Nevertheless, I will also try to open that somehow; may your prayer assist us before God. Indeed, it is a time for hearing, not for praying; but if you expect what I am going to say to be from God, you are praying. The law contains many precepts. The law contains many precepts; and indeed that law, which is called the Decalogue, has ten precepts. The ten precepts, however, are almost general, to which all other innumerable commandments are referred. Nevertheless, how the other commandments, which seem innumerable, are reduced to this scantiness of the number ten, it is infinite to discuss. However, in this way, as much as the Lord helps, we will be able to demonstrate that, just as all other precepts are referred to these, understanding this discourse to be very laborious, so these ten are referred to two. Truly, these ten are such. Concerning the worship of one God and not worshipping another, there is one precept there: You shall not make for yourself an idol, nor any likeness of what is in heaven above, nor what is on the earth below. The Lord your God is one Lord. The second precept is: You shall not take the name of the Lord your God in vain. The third precept is: Observe the Sabbath day. These precepts pertain to God. Regarding the observation of the Sabbath, it is almost superfluous to teach a Christian anything. Indeed, not only is it not superfluous, but this is substantial; for that is the shadow. For the people are prohibited from servile works on the Sabbath. Are we not prohibited from servile works? Hear the Lord: Everyone who commits sin is a slave to sin. However, to hope from God to not commit sin, this is to keep the Sabbath; for it is written: God rested on the seventh day from all His works. God rested: God makes you rest. For what labor could there be for God, who created all things by His word, to need rest? Therefore, these three pertain to God. The other seven pertain to man: Honor your father and your mother; you shall not commit adultery; you shall not kill; you shall not bear false witness; you shall not steal; you shall not covet your neighbor's wife; you shall not covet your neighbor's goods. If you love God, you neither worship another, nor take His name in vain, and you keep the Sabbath for Him to rest in you as He makes you rest. If, however, you love your neighbor and honor your parents, and do not commit adultery, and do not kill, and harm no one with false testimony, and do not steal from anyone, and do not covet another’s wife, and do not covet another’s goods. Thus: You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind; and: You shall love your neighbor as yourself. On these two commandments hang all the Law and the Prophets. Listen also to the Apostle: The fulfillment, he says, of the law is love. He did not send you into many, nor into ten, nor into two: one love fulfills everything. But that love is twofold: for God and for neighbor. For God, how much? With all. With what all? For it is not with ear, and nose, and hand, and foot. With what whole can He be loved? With all your heart, with all your soul, with all your mind; with all that in you lives, you shall love the source of life. If, therefore, with all that in me lives I should love God, what do I leave to love my neighbor? For in the commandment concerning loving the neighbor, it wasn’t said to you: With all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind; but rather as yourself. God with your whole self, because He is better than you; your neighbor as yourself, because he is what you are.

Love God and love your neighbor, as you would love yourself.

There are therefore two commandments; nevertheless, there are three things to be loved. Two commandments were given: love God and love your neighbor; yet I see that three things are to be loved. For it would not be said: and your neighbor as yourself, unless you also loved yourself.

Therefore, if three things are to be loved, why are there two commandments? Why? Understand. God did not judge it necessary to warn you to love yourself; for there is no one who does not love himself. But because many, by loving themselves poorly, destroy themselves, by instructing you to love your God with all of yourself, there you are given the rule for how to love yourself. Do you want to love yourself? Love God with all of yourself; for there you will find yourself, lest you lose yourself in yourself. If you love yourself in yourself, you will fall both from yourself and will seek many things beyond yourself. Hence the Apostle started from that point of all evil, where he said: For men will be lovers of themselves. Behold, you have chosen to love yourself; let us see if you remain even in yourself. It is not true; you will not remain there; having fallen away from God, you will also fall away from yourself. For there is the foundation; there you should have adhered, making that place for yourself a stronghold and a house of refuge. But now you have loosened, or torn the bond of your love from Him to yourself; you do not remain even in yourself. Finally, listen to the Apostle himself. When he said: For men will be lovers of themselves, he immediately added: lovers of money. Did I not say that you would not even remain in yourself? Are you money? Behold, you have also perished from yourself, who have departed from God. What remains but that you pour out all the patrimony of your mind, living prodigally with harlots, that is, with lusts and various desires, and compelled by poverty, feed pigs, that is, because unclean avarice has possessed you, unclean demons are fed by you? But that son, having endured poverty, and broken by hunger, returned to himself he said. Returned to himself, because he had perished from himself, and in himself found himself impoverished; he sought happiness everywhere, and found it nowhere. Returned to himself, what did he say? I will arise and go. Where shall I go? To the father. Now he has returned to himself, but still lying down; I will arise and go; I shall not lie down, I shall not remain. Therefore, a rule has been set for you on how to love yourself; love one better than yourself, and you have loved yourself. But I say better by nature, not by will. For many men are found better than you by will, but only God by nature; the Creator, Builder, Maker, made by none. Fix yourself there. Understand sometimes, and say: But for me. What, but for you? It is good for me to cling to God. Why this? Consider what was said above: You destroyed all who commit fornication from you. Because therefore He has destroyed all who commit fornication from Him, you found yourself. But for me to cling to God is good, that is, not to commit fornication from God, not to remove myself from God. Do you want to see what is promised to you in this matter? But he who clings to the Lord is one spirit with Him. This is therefore your love or the love of yourself, that is, the love by which you love yourself, that you love God. I now entrust to you also your neighbor, whom you shall love as yourself; for I see that you have begun to love yourself. Therefore, whom you love as yourself, lead where you have led yourself. For if you loved gold and had gold, and loved your neighbor as yourself, by loving you would share what you had, and make him a partaker of your gold. But by sharing, both would have less. Why therefore do you not possess Him, where you will suffer no constraints with a coheir? As many as you are able to persuade, as many as you are able to invite, call, compel to love God, and He is whole to all, and whole to each. The root of all good things is love.

Love therefore God, and love your neighbor as yourself. For I see that you love yourself, because you love God. Charity is the root of all good works. For just as: The root of all evils is greed, so the root of all good things is charity. Therefore the fullness of the law is charity. So I say quickly: whoever offends charity, has become guilty of everything. For whoever offends the very root, what part of the tree remains unoffended? What then do we do? Whoever offends charity has become guilty of everything; it is altogether true. But the thief offends charity differently, the adulterer differently, the murderer differently, the sacrilegious differently, the blasphemer differently. All offend the same charity, because where there is full and perfect charity, there can be no sin. But it is that which grows in us, so that it may sometime be perfected; and so be perfected, that there may no longer be anything to add. When it will have been so perfect that it cannot grow any further, cannot be increased any further, there will be no sins. But where will this be, unless when death is swallowed up in victory? For there it will be said, because there will be no sin at all: Where is your contention, death? where is your sting, death? Where is it? Behold it is not; behold you no longer prick, you no longer strike down. Where is your sting, death? And what is: Where is your sting? Hear the expositor: But the sting of death is sin. Therefore, brothers, he who commits lesser sins is guilty of everything; and he who commits a greater and more criminal sin is guilty of everything. But one is more guilty, another less guilty; yet both guilty of everything, so that in the diversity of sins nothing is sought but greater and lesser. He committed theft: if he had charity, he would not commit theft; for the Apostle says, you shall not commit adultery, you shall not kill, you shall not steal, you shall not covet, and if there is any other commandment, it is summed up in this sentence; you shall love your neighbor as yourself. Love of neighbor works no evil. But the fullness of the law is charity. Therefore, both the one who commits theft is guilty of everything, because he has injured charity; and the one who commits adultery is guilty of everything, because he has injured charity. How has he not violated everything, who has injured the root? But one has injured less, another more.

Daily sins.

Yet even he who has caused less harm should not be lazy: For judgment without mercy is for him who does not show mercy. All sins are forgiven to baptized believers; there is none at all left that that sanctification has not previously removed and extinguished. It is true: who doubts it? But if one were to depart from the body then, the innocence, as it had begun, would immediately remain; since, however, one lives here, iniquity is erased, but weakness remains. Through this weakness and in a way the frailness of human nature, some very small cracks let in water from the sea, which flows into the bilge. He has not committed murder: he has escaped the wave as a castaway. But do you not know that a neglected bilge can flood? Therefore, because of greater waves, and because of any creeping moisture, the sacrament of baptism washes away everything; but because of the frailty of this ship, which is carried on the vast sea and is agitated by temptations like tempests, because it is necessary for some although smaller sins to creep in, another remedy was given, because another sacrament of baptism could not be given. That one is unique; this is the daily one, which I mentioned a little before: Judgment without mercy is for him who does not show mercy. Give, and it will be given to you; forgive, and you will be forgiven. And in a way, in your prayers, you are daily cleansed from daily, light, and lesser sins, if you say from the heart, if you truly say, if you faithfully say: Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors.

You have within what you control.

If you do not forgive your adversary, you are your own adversary. Do you want to see how great the difference is? For example, he injured you by taking away money; you defraud yourself by not deserving forgiveness. Finally, you will say: He was very cruel, he seeks my blood. He, the blood of your flesh; you, the death of your soul. I do not forgive, he says; he injured me greatly, he was much my adversary. You are worse to yourself. I do not forgive. I ask you, forgive, let go. But he does not ask me. You ask for him. I absolutely do not forgive. You want to litigate, and you do not know with whom you should. You love to litigate; return to yourself, be angry, but do not sin. Be angry with yourself, so that you do not sin; rage against yourself, chastise yourself. You have something within to tame, and you sleep. You pay attention to with whom you are litigating outside, your neighbor, your companion, your partner, your fellow co-possessor. You do not pay attention, you do not see, another law in your members, waging war against the law of your mind, and taking you captive to the law of sin which is in your members. But he robbed me. You are dragged captive, and you are angry with the robber! You recognized yourself, you saw where you are. You acknowledged the captor, show yourself a fighter, seek a redeemer. Just as he himself, when he said: Leading me captive in the law of sin which is in my members. Wretched man that I am, he said, who will deliver me from this body of death? The grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord. But who calls for grace, who does not see his own punishment? Therefore understand, see where you are dragged. But justice pleases me. I know that it pleases: for you delight in the law of God according to the inward man, but you see another law in your members; you delight in the law of God, there is another law in your members. With this you live, with this you die. The robbers left you half-dead on the road, but now you have been found lying by the passerby and the merciful Samaritan; wine and oil have been poured on you, you have received the sacrament of the Only Begotten; you have been lifted onto his beast, you believed in the incarnate Christ; you were brought to the inn, and in the Church you are being cared for.

Because of God, let us love one another.

Hence it is that I speak: this I too, this we all do; we perform the duty of innkeepers. To him it was said: If you spend anything more, I will repay you when I return. Would that we at least dispense that which we have received! But however much we dispense, brothers, it is the Lord's money. We are your fellow servants: we live from what we feed. Let no one credit us with a favor; we will be bad servants if we do not fulfill our duty; but if we do fulfill it, let there be no arrogance in us, because we do not give from our own resources. Let us all love him, let us cherish him, for his sake let us love one another. We all have one king; let us all arrive at one kingdom.

Sermons - Sermon 18

SERMO 18

SAINT AUGUSTINE ON THE VERSE OF PSALM 49:

"God will come manifested"

God seems now not to judge between the good and the wicked. To exhort the minds of your Charity, accept gratefully a few things about the present psalm, which the Lord grants. It is prophesied about our Lord Jesus Christ in this psalm, where we have heard and sung: "God will come manifestly, our God, and will not remain silent." For the Lord Christ Himself, our God, the Son of God, came in His first advent hidden, in His second advent He will come manifest. When He came hidden, He was known only to His servants; when He comes manifest, He will be known to both the good and the wicked. When He came hidden, He came to be judged; when He comes manifest, He will come to judge. In short, when He was judged, He was silent, and of His silence the Prophet had foretold: "He was led as a sheep to the slaughter, and as a lamb before its shearer, so He opened not His mouth." But "God will come manifestly, our God, and will not remain silent." In this way, He will not be silent when He comes to judge as He was silent when He was judged. Even now He is not silent, if there is one who listens, but it is said, "He will not be silent then," when even those who now despise Him will recognize His voice. For now, when the commandments of God are spoken, some are turned into laughter. And because what God has promised is not shown now, and what He threatens is not seen now, what He commands is ridiculed. For now, indeed, worldly happiness is possessed by both the wicked and the good: the unhappiness of this world is also possessed by both the good and the wicked. Men who believe in the present and do not believe in the future observe that these goods and evils of the present age are promiscuously possessed by both the good and the wicked. If they desire riches, they see both the worst of men and good men having riches. They also see that if they shun poverty and the miseries of this age, it is not only the good but also the wicked who toil in those miseries. And they say in their hearts that God neither regards nor governs human affairs, but has entirely left us to the chances of this world's depths, and shows us no providence. Because of this, contempt for the commandment arises in them, because they do not see the manifestation of judgment. But the patience of God leads you to repentance.

Nevertheless, even now one must consider that when God wills, He observes and judges, and does not postpone it for an hour; but when He wills, He postpones. And why is this? Because if He never judged in the present, He would not be believed to be God; if He judged everything in the present, nothing would be reserved for judgment. For many things are kept for judgment, and some are judged in the present, so that those who are postponed may fear and turn back. For God does not love to condemn but to save, and hence He is patient with the wicked, so that He may make the wicked good. Thus says the Apostle, for the wrath of God will be revealed against all ungodliness, and God will render to each according to his works. He admonishes and rebukes the contemptuous man and says: Do you despise the riches of His goodness and forbearance?

Because He is good to you, because He is patient with you, because He is forbearing, because He postpones you and does not remove you, do you despise Him and deem that there is absolutely no judgment of God, ignorant that the patience of God leads you to repentance? But according to the hardness of your heart, you store up wrath for yourself on the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God, who will render to each according to his works.

Whatever a man does now, he puts into the treasury for the final judgment.

Whatever a man does now, he puts into a treasure, but he does not know what he is collecting. Just as the rich who put into the treasure of the earth, as if they know what they are collecting, but they do not know for whom they are collecting. For they utterly ignore who may possess their riches after their death, and sometimes their riches reach their enemies. And so each person cheats themselves by refusing to eat in order to become rich, so that another may enjoy and indulge and waste their labors. Just as they collect knowing what they are collecting but not for whom they collect, so contrariwise, the good know what they collect in a heavenly treasure, but the wicked do not know what they collect. For the good man places in the heavenly treasure all the works of mercy he has done to aid those in need, and he knows that there is a faithful keeper who preserves all that he has stored. He does not see them, but he is certain of his treasure because nothing is stolen by a thief, invaded by an enemy, or taken by a malicious and powerful foe as if by conquest, but it always remains because it is guarded by the most powerful Lord. For if men trust their money to a faithful servant and feel secure, why should they be anxious when they entrust their mercies to the powerful Lord? They know, therefore, that whatever they store is completely safe there. Those who are faithful unite faith with the power of their Lord. They believe He keeps it safe and find what He has kept. Indeed, do men who collect money see the vault itself or the money within it? They always collect and dispatch, or bury it and keep it. They do not see it, and yet they seem to know in their conscience that it is there where they placed it. And perhaps the thief has already taken it, and the fool rejoices in vain who has stored it senselessly. However, if we have placed anything in the heavenly treasure, we are secure in the Lord's custody, and we suffer no thief or loss at all. The wicked, however, also put all their evil deeds into a treasure, and God keeps it for them. This is what the Apostle said: "You are treasuring up wrath for yourself on the day of wrath and the righteous judgment of God." In the judgment, treasures are revealed and sentences are pronounced. But since whatever evil they do and do not know is preserved, when our God comes manifested and will not be silent, He will call all nations to Himself, as it says in the Gospel, and will separate some placing them on the right and some on the left, and will begin to deal with the treasures of both, what each one has placed, so that they may find it. "Come," He says, "blessed of My Father," to those who are on the right, "receive the kingdom prepared for you from the beginning of the world. The kingdom of heaven, an everlasting kingdom, fellowship with angels, eternal life where no one is born nor dies, receive this. For when you were placing your works in the treasury, you were buying the kingdom of heaven. Receive the kingdom prepared for you from the beginning of the world." He also shows them their treasures: "I was hungry, and you gave me food; I was thirsty, and you gave me drink; I was naked, and you clothed me; I was a stranger, and you brought me in; I was in prison, and you came to me; I was sick, and you visited me." And they respond, "Lord, when did we see You in these necessities, and minister to You?" And He says, "When you did it to one of the least of My brethren, you did it to Me. Because when you did it to one of the least of My brethren, you did it to Me, receive what you sent, possess what you bought. For you believed Me as your Savior." Then He will turn to those who are on the left and show them their treasures empty of good works: "Go," He says, "into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels. I was hungry, and you did not give me food." Or if you find something in this treasury or consider what you sent, it will be restored to you. But they say, "We never saw You hungry." And He says, "When you did not do it to one of the least of My brethren, you did not do it to Me. For perhaps you did not do it for Me because you did not see Me walking on earth. You are so evil that if you saw Me, as the Jews did, you would crucify Me. Today, evil men who try, if possible, to destroy God's commandments, who try, if possible, that there be no Churches where God's commandments are preached, would they not also kill Christ Himself if they found Him living on earth? But they will dare to say, as if He did not know the thoughts of men, 'Lord, when did we see You hungry?' And He says, 'When you did not do it to one of the least of My brethren, you did not do it to Me.' I had placed the least of My brethren in need before you on earth. I, as the head, was sitting in heaven at the right hand of the Father, but My members labored on earth, My members were in need on earth. You would give to My members, and what you gave would go up to the head. And you would know that when I placed the least of My brethren needy before you on earth, I established them as carriers who would carry your works to My treasury. And you placed nothing in their hands; therefore, you find nothing with Me. Do not let your repentance be late and unfruitful, act now.

Then, therefore, it will not be silent, but will appear; thus it is said: It will not be silent. But now the reader says it from the book and it is despised; the preacher or bishop disputes it from his mouth and it is mocked. Will it thus be mocked when it is spoken by that most powerful judge himself? Each one will receive what he has done, whether good or evil. Then men will say with late and unfruitful repentance: "Oh, if we could live again and hear and do what we despised!" Then those whom their iniquities place opposite will say, as it is written in the book of Wisdom: What profit did pride give us, and what benefit did the boasting of riches confer on us? All things have passed away like a shadow. You see that they will repent, but such repentance will be tormentable, not curable. Do you want to have profitable repentance? Have it now. For if you have it now, you can be corrected. When you have been corrected, that treasure where your evil works were gathered will be emptied, and another treasure will be filled where all your good works are collected. But perhaps having turned to God, you will die immediately, and perhaps no works will be found in that treasure? Clearly, you will find your works there because it is written: Peace on earth to men of good will. God does not note one's faculties, but crowns the will. He knows because you wanted to, but could not; thus, He notes you as if you did what you wanted. Therefore, it is necessary that you turn, lest by delaying you suddenly die, and nothing at all might be found which you presently possess, and in the future, you can possess. Turned to God.

Sermons - Sermon 180

SERMO 180 OF THE WORDS OF THE APOSTLE JAMES (5, 12):

"Above all, do not swear," etc. An admonition about avoiding swearing. The first reading from the Apostle James, which was recited to us today, has been offered to us for discussion and, in a way, mandated. For he made you attentive, admonishing before all things not to swear. It is a difficult question. Who does not hold himself guilty if swearing is a sin? For no one doubts that perjury is a sin, and a grave sin at that. But the Apostle, from whose reading we are discussing, did not say: Before all things, my brothers, do not commit perjury; but: do not swear. A similar admonition from the Lord Jesus Christ also preceded in the Gospel: You have heard, he says, that it was said to those of old: You shall not swear falsely. But I say to you: do not swear at all, neither by heaven, for it is the throne of God; nor by the earth, for it is the footstool of his feet; nor shall you swear by your head, for you cannot make one hair white or black. Let your speech be: Yes, yes; No, no. Anything more than this comes from evil. This dominical admonition is wholly consistent with the aforementioned reading of the Apostle, such that it seems God commanded nothing else; for no one else said this but he who spoke through the Apostle: Before all things, he says, my brothers, do not swear, neither by heaven, nor by earth, nor by any other oath. But let your speech be: Yes, yes; No, no. Except that he added: Before all things; which made many attentive and increased the difficulty of the question. An oath, though taken by God, should be avoided by man. In how many ways perjury happens. For we find that the saints have sworn, and firstly, the Lord Himself, in whom there is no sin at all. The Lord has sworn and will not repent: You are a priest forever according to the order of Melchizedek. He promised the eternity of the priesthood to the Son with an oath. You also have: By Myself I swear, says the Lord. And that is an oath: As I live, says the Lord. Just as a human swears by God, so God swears by Himself. Is it therefore not a sin to swear? This is hard to say; and since we have said that God has sworn, how blasphemous is it to say this? God swears, who has no sin; therefore, it is not a sin to swear; but it is more a sin to swear falsely. Perhaps someone may say that the example of oath-taking should not be proposed concerning the Lord God. For He is God, and perhaps it is fitting only for Him to swear, who cannot swear falsely. For humans swear falsely, either when they deceive or when they are deceived. For a man thinks that what is false is true and rashly swears; or he knows or thinks it is false, and yet swears as if it were true, and nevertheless swears with wickedness. However, these kinds of perjury differ, which I have mentioned. Suppose someone swears believing it to be true, for which he swears; he believes it to be true, and yet it is false. This one does not perjure himself from the heart; he is mistaken, he holds something false as true; he does not knowingly interpose an oath for a false matter. Consider another who knows it is false and says it is true; and swears as if it were true, which he knows is false. Do you see how detestable this beast is, and it must be exterminated from human affairs? For who would want this to happen? All people detest such things. Consider another, who thinks it to be false, and swears as if it were true, and perhaps it is true. For instance, so that you may understand: Did it rain in that place? you ask a man; and he thinks it did not rain, and to his business it belongs to say: It rained. But he thinks it did not rain. Is he told: Did it really rain? Truly, and he swears; and yet it rained there, but he does not know, and thinks it did not rain; he is perjured. The manner in which a word proceeds from the heart matters. The tongue is not guilty unless the mind is guilty. But who is there who does not err, even if he did not wish to deceive? Who is the man to whom falsehood does not creep? And yet the oath does not depart from the mouth, it is frequent; often there are more oaths than words. If a man examines how often he swears throughout the whole day, how often he wounds himself, how often he strikes and pierces himself with the sword of the tongue, what part of him is found healthy? Because, therefore, it is a grave sin to swear falsely, Scripture has given you a lesson: Do not swear. The danger of perjury in oath-taking.

What shall I say to you, O man! Swear truly? Behold, swear truly, you do not sin; if you swear truly, you do not sin. But man, placed among temptations, clothed in flesh, treading the earth under the earth, while the body which is corrupted weighs down the soul, and the earthly habitation oppresses the mind thinking many things; among these many uncertain thoughts of yours, flying, human conjectures, human deceptions, when does something false not creep upon you, placed in the region of falsehood? Do you wish, therefore, to be far from perjury? Do not swear. For he who swears can sometimes swear truly; but he who does not swear can never swear falsely. Therefore, let God swear, who swears securely, whom nothing deceives, whom nothing escapes, who altogether does not know how to deceive, because He cannot be deceived. For when He swears, He makes Himself a witness. Just as you, when you swear, make God a witness; so He, when He swears, makes Himself a witness. When you make Him a witness, perhaps over your falsehood, you take in vain the name of the Lord your God. Therefore, do not swear falsely, do not swear. That is indeed the narrow way. Perjury is a precipice. He who swears is close; he who does not swear is far away. He sins and grievously who swears falsely; he does not sin who swears truly; but neither does he sin who does not swear at all. But he who does not swear and does not sin is far from sin; but he who swears truly does not sin, but he is close to sin. Imagine you are walking in a place where the land is spacious on the right hand and nowhere do you suffer narrowness; on the left is a precipice. Where do you choose to walk? On the edge of the land on the precipitous lip, or far from it? I think far from it. Likewise, he who swears walks on the edge; and walks with frail feet, because human. If you stumble, you go down; if you slip, you go down. And what awaits you? The penalty of perjury. Therefore, you wanted to swear truly; hear the counsel of God: Do not swear.

It is right to swear the truth; not to swear, safer.

If swearing were a sin, it would not be said in the old law: You shall not swear falsely but shall perform your oaths to the Lord. For a sin would not be commanded to us. But your God says to you: If you swear, I will not condemn you; if you swear truthfully, I will not condemn you. But will I condemn you if you do not swear? There are two things, He says, that I never condemn: a truthful oath and no oath; but I do condemn a false oath. A false oath is destructive, a truthful oath is dangerous, no oath is safe. I know it is a difficult question, and I confess to your Charity, I have always avoided it. But now when that same reading was recited with the duty of the Sunday sermon, I believed it was divinely inspired to me to address it. God wanted me to speak from here; He wanted you to hear from here. I beseech you not to scorn it, I beseech you to steady your heart, to change the shifting of your tongues. It is not entirely in vain, it is not empty that even though I have always wanted to avoid that question, it was imposed on my necessity, so that it might also be imposed on your Charity. An oath administered by the Apostle. So that you may know, it is not a sin to swear truthfully, we find that the Apostle Paul also swore; "I die daily, by your glory, brothers, which I have in Christ Jesus our Lord." "By your glory," is an oath. Not as if he said: "By your glory, I die," as if your glory makes me die; as if he were to say: "He died by poison, he died by the sword, he died by the beast, he died by the enemy;" that is, by the doing of the enemy, by the doing of the sword, by the doing of the poison, and the like; he did not say: "By your glory." The Greek language resolves the ambiguity. It is seen in the Greek Epistle, and there is found an oath which is not ambiguous: Ν■ τ■ν ■μετ■ραν χα■χησιν, where the Greek, having spoken, swears. You hear Greeks daily, and those who know Greek: Ν■ τ■ν Θε■ν; when he says: Ν■ τ■ν Θε■ν, it is an oath: "By God." Therefore, let no one doubt that the Apostle swore, when he said: "By your glory, brothers" (and let us not think that he swore by human glory) "which I have in Christ Jesus our Lord." There is another place where the oath is utterly certain and expressed: "I call God as a witness upon my soul." The Apostle says: "I call God as a witness upon my soul, that sparing you I have not yet come to Corinth." And in another place to the Galatians: "What I am writing to you, behold, before God, I do not lie."

Various ways of swearing.

Pay attention, I ask, and heed; even if the discourse is not so pleasing to you, because of the difficulties of the question, it is still useful if it reaches your innermost parts. Behold, the Apostle has sworn. Let not those deceive you who, somehow wanting to distinguish these oaths, or rather not understanding, say that it is not an oath when a man says: God knows, God is my witness, I call upon God upon my soul that I speak the truth. He has called upon, they say, God, he has made God a witness; does he not swear? Those who say this wish nothing else but to lie with God invoked as a witness. Is it truly so, whoever you are of a depraved and perverse heart, that if you say: By God, you swear; if you say: God is my witness, you do not swear? For what is: By God, if not: God is my witness? Or what is: God is my witness, if not: By God? To swear an oath, what that is.

What is it to swear an oath, if not to give due justice to God when you swear by God; to give due justice to your own wellbeing when you swear by your own wellbeing; to give due justice to your children when you swear by your children? But what justice do we owe to our wellbeing, our children, our God, if not that of charity, truth, and not falsehood? Especially when it is done by God, it is the very truth of swearing; because when anyone says, “By my own wellbeing,” they obligate their wellbeing to God; when they say, “By my children,” they pledge their children to God, so that whatever comes from their mouth may come upon their heads; if true, true; if false, false. Therefore, when anyone in an oath names their children, or their own head, or their wellbeing, whatever they name they obligate to God; how much more so when they perjure by God Himself? For they fear to swear falsely by their child, and do not fear to swear falsely by their God? Perhaps saying in their mind: I fear to swear falsely by my child, lest they die; but to God who does not die, even if false is sworn by Him, what evil occurs? Indeed you say rightly, nothing evil occurs to God when you swear falsely by God; but much evil occurs to you, who deceive your neighbor, to whom you invoke God as a witness. If you were to do something with your child as witness, and say to a friend or neighbor or any person: I did not do it, and touch your child’s head, by whom you did it as witness, and say: By the wellbeing of this one, I did not do it; perhaps your child would cry out trembling under the paternal hand, not trembling at the paternal hand, but at the divine: Father, do not let my wellbeing be worthless to you; you invoked God over me, I saw you, you did it, do not perjure; I indeed have you as a father, but I fear our Creator, both yours and mine, more.

Perjury is deadly to the soul. The life of the body is the soul, the life of the soul is God. But because God, when you swear by Him, doesn't say to you: I saw you, do not swear, you did it; but you fear that the other might kill you, you kill yourself first; therefore, does He not say: I saw you, do you think that He did not see? And where is it said: I kept silent, I kept silent; will I always keep silent? And yet He often says: I saw you; but it is different when He avenges the perjurer. But He does not avenge everyone; thus, people are edified by example. I know, he swore falsely to me, and he lives. He swore falsely to you, and he lives? He swore falsely, and he lives; he swore falsely to you. You are deceived. If you had eyes to see this one's death, if you were also in that state of dying and not dying, you would not be deceived, and you would see his death. And now attend to the Scripture; and there you will find lying the one whom you think is living. Because he walks on feet, because he touches with hands, because he sees with eyes and hears with ears, uses the other functions of the limbs well, you think he is alive. He lives, but his body; however, his soul is dead, what is better in him is dead. The dwelling lives, the dweller is dead. How, you ask, when the body lives, is the soul dead; when the body would not live, unless animated by the soul? How then is the soul dead, by which the body lives? Hear then, and learn: the body of man is God's creature, and the soul of man is God's creature. God breathes life into the flesh from the soul; again He breathes life into the soul from Himself, not from the soul itself. Therefore, the life of the body is the soul; therefore, the life of the soul is God. The body dies when the soul departs; therefore, the soul dies if God departs. The soul departs when the body is struck by the sword; and do you think that God does not depart when the soul itself is struck by perjury? Do you want to see that the one you speak of is dead? Read the Scripture: The mouth that lies kills the soul. But you think God is a present avenger if the one who deceived you with a false oath immediately expires. If he expires before your eyes, his flesh has expired. What does it mean, his flesh has expired? It has expelled the spirit by which it was animated. That is, he expired by expelling the spirit by which the flesh lived. He perjured, he expelled the spirit by which the soul lived. He expired, but you do not know; he expired, but you do not see. For you see the flesh lying without the soul, you cannot see the miserable soul without God. Therefore believe, apply the eyes of faith. No perjurer is unpunished; indeed no one is, his punishment is with him. If he had a torturer of the flesh in his chamber, he would be punished; he has a torturer of his conscience in the secrecy of his heart, and is he called unpunished? And yet, what do you say? He lives, he rejoices, he indulges who swore a lie to me; what is it that you send me to the invisible? Because even the God by whom he swore is invisible. He swore by the invisible, he is struck by an invisible punishment. But he lives, he says, and in a way luxuriates and boils in luxury. If so, what luxuriates, boils in luxury, are the worms of a dead soul. Finally, every prudent man, who watches such luxuriating perjurers, with a healthy scent of the heart, turns away, does not want to see, does not want to hear. From where does this health turn itself away, unless because the dead soul stinks?

Why is it said that one must abstain from swearing above all things? So briefly listen, my brothers, I will conclude my sermon, fixing a healthy care in your hearts: Above all, do not swear. Why: Above all? If it is a great offense to swear falsely, but there is no fault in swearing truly, why: Above all, do not swear? For he should have said: Above all, do not swear falsely. Above all, he says, do not swear. Is swearing worse than stealing? Is swearing worse than committing adultery? I am not saying swear falsely; I say swearing: is swearing worse than killing a man? By no means. Killing a man, committing adultery, stealing, is a sin; swearing is not a sin; but to swear falsely is a sin. Why then: Above all? By this word that he says: Above all, he has made us cautious against our tongue. Above all, he says, that you may be attentive above other things, that you may be vigilant lest the habit of swearing should creep upon you. As in a mirror, he has placed you against yourself: Above all, he has lifted you over other things whence you may be attentive. For consider you swearing: By God, by Christ, I will kill him; and these how many times a day, how many times an hour? You do not open your mouth except for such swearing. Wouldn't you want him to say to you: Above all, to make you most vigilant against the habit, to examine all your actions, to guard all the movements of your tongue very diligently, to be the guard of your bad habit, to restrain it? Listen: Above all. You were asleep, I prick, above all, I move thorns. What is it: Above all? Above all be vigilant, above all be intent.

Sometimes subject to the custom of swearing an oath, Augustine. An oath should be administered under this condition.

We too have sworn at random, we had that most terrible and deadly habit. I say to your Charity: since we began to serve God, and we saw how great the evil is in perjury, we feared greatly, and we restrained the most sluggish habit with fear. Restrained it is restricted, restricted it languishes, languishing it dies, and good succeeds the bad habit. Finally, we do not say to you, do not swear. For if we say this, we lie. As far as I am concerned, I swear; but as it seems to me, compelled by great necessity. When I see that I am not believed unless I do so, and that it is not expedient for him who does not believe me that he does not believe, with this weighed reasoning and balanced consideration, with great fear I say: Before God; or: God is my witness; or: Christ knows that this is in my mind; and I see that it is more, that is, that it is more than: Yes, yes; No, no; but what is more comes from evil; and if not from the evil of the one who swears, it comes from the evil of the one who does not believe. Finally, he does not say: If one does more, he is evil; and: Let your word be: Yes, yes; No, no; if anyone does more, he is evil; but: Let your word be: Yes, yes; No, no; and what is more comes from evil. But inquire of whose comes evil. But yet another thing is the most evil human custom. And when you are believed, you swear; and when no one demands, you swear; and to horrified people, you swear; you do not keep silence by swearing, you are barely safe by not perjuring. Unless, brothers, you perhaps think that if the Apostle Paul knew that the Galatians believed him, he would add an oath and say: What I write to you, behold before God, that I do not lie. He saw there those who believed; he also saw others who did not believe. Therefore do not say: I do not swear, if it is demanded. For what you do is from evil; but from the one who demands it. For you do not have a way to excuse yourself, you do not find a way to satisfy the pressing matter. But it is one thing, when an oath is demanded; another, when it is offered; and this itself that is offered, another when offered to one who does not believe; another when offered to and believed.

Demanding an oath from another, how he sins.

Therefore, restrain your tongue and habit, as much as you can; not like some, when they are told: "Do you speak the truth? I do not believe it. Did you not do it? I do not believe it: May God judge, swear to me." And the very person who demands the oath, it makes a significant difference whether he does not know that he will falsely swear, or he does know. For if he does not know, and therefore says: "Swear to me, so that it may be believed;" I do not dare say it is not a sin, yet it is a human temptation. But if he knows he did it, he knows he did it, he saw him do it, and he forces him to swear, he is a murderer. For he kills himself by his own perjury; but this one both extended and pressed the hand of the killer. But when some wicked thief hears: "Swear if you did not take it, swear if you did not do it," from someone who does not know if he did it; then, it is not permissible for a Christian to swear; when an oath is demanded from him, it is not permissible to swear; I am a Christian, it is not permitted for me. Capture such a one, turn away from him, avoid the matter about which you were speaking; mix in other stories, and you will find him swearing a thousand times, who did not want to swear once. Therefore, this daily, frequent habit of swearing without cause, with no one compelling, and no one doubting your words, drive it away from yourselves, cut it off from your tongues, circumcise it from your mouth. The custom of swearing must be resisted more diligently. But it is the custom, it is usually said. It is usually said when I do not say. This is: Above all. What is: Above all? Be wary before others, more intent on this than on other matters. Greater custom demands greater intent, not the custom of something trivial. If you were doing something with your hand, it would be easier to command your hand not to do it; if you had to walk somewhere with your feet, with laziness holding you back, you would stir yourself to get up and go. The tongue has the ease of movement, being placed in a slick environment, it easily slips on the slippery. The faster and easier it moves, the more you should be steadfast against it. You will subdue it if you stay alert; you will stay alert if you fear; you will fear if you consider yourself to be a Christian. For swearing has so much evil that those who worship stones fear to swear falsely by stones; do you not fear the present God, the living God, the knowing God, the remaining God, the God avenging the contemptible? He closes the temple over a stone and goes to his home; he himself has shut up over his god, and yet when it is said to him: Swear by Jupiter, he fears the eyes of the present. To swear falsely by idols is perjury. And behold, I say to your Charity, that even he who swears by a false stone is perjured. Why do I say this? Because many are deceived in this matter, and think that since it is nothing by which they swear, they are not held in the crime of perjury. You are certainly perjured because you swear falsely by that which you consider sacred. But I do not consider it sacred. It is considered sacred by the one to whom you swear. For when you swear, you do not swear to yourself, nor to the stone; but you swear to your neighbor. You swear to a man before a stone; but is it not also before God? The stone does not hear you speaking; but God punishes you for deceiving.

How the custom of swearing an oath is overturned.

Above all, therefore, my brothers, I beseech you, that God has compelled me to speak these things not without cause. For I say before Him what I have said, often I have avoided this question; I feared that by warning and advising I would make more guilty those who would not listen; however, today I feared more that I would refuse to speak, when I was commanded to speak. As though the fruit of this labor of mine is small, if all who have applauded me also cry out against themselves, so that they may not falsely swear against themselves; if so many people who have listened to me very attentively be attentive against their own custom, and remind themselves today, when they have come to their homes, when by a slip of the tongue they repeat their habit; let each neighbor remind the other: This is what we heard today, this is what we are bound to. Let it not be done today, certainly while the speech is fresh: I speak from experience; let it not be done today, it is more sluggish to accomplish tomorrow. If it is not done even tomorrow, the one who keeps watch labors less; for he is aided by the custom of the previous day. In three days the plague from which we suffer dies; and we will rejoice in your fruit; because you will abound with great good, if you will be free from such a great evil. Turned to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 181

SERMO 181 OF THE WORDS OF THE EPISTLE OF 1 JOHN (1:8-9):

"If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves," And the truth is not in us.

AGAINST THE PELAGIANS No one here lives without sin. The most blessed apostle John, writing healthily and truthfully, among other things says: If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. But if we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness. With these words, blessed John, or rather the Lord Jesus himself not being silent through John, taught that no one in this flesh, in this corruptible body, on this earth, in this evil age, in this life full of temptations, no one here lives without sin. It is an unequivocal sentence, and needs no interpreter: If we say that we have no sin. For who is it who does not have sin? As Scripture says: Not even an infant whose life is but one day on the earth. Such a little one has not committed sin, but has drawn it from his parents. Therefore, no one can in any way say that he has not had sin. But the faithful man has approached the washing of regeneration through faith, and all his sins have been forgiven him; now he lives under grace, lives in faith, has become a member of Christ, has become a temple of God; and still, just as he has become a member of Christ and a temple of God, if he says he has no sin, he deceives himself, and the truth is not in him; he is entirely lying if he says: I am just. The error of the Pelagians, that the righteous are found here without sin. Argument of the Pelagians.

However, there are certain inflated wineskins, filled with the spirit of pride, not great in size, but swollen with the disease of arrogance, so much so that they dare to say that men can be found without sin. Therefore, they say that the righteous in this life have no sin whatsoever. These heretics, the Pelagians, and the same Pelestians, are the ones who say this. And when they are answered: What is it that you say? Does a man live here without sin, and has no sin at all, neither in deed, nor in word, nor in thought? They respond from the wind of pride with which they are filled; I wish they would end that wind, deflate and be silent, that is, become humble, not elated; they respond, I say: Truly these holy men, the faithful of God, can have no sin in deed, nor word, nor thought. And when it is said to them: Who are these just ones who are without sin? they respond and say: The whole Church. I could have marveled if I had found one, two, three, ten, as many as Abraham sought. For Abraham descended from fifty to ten; you, heretic, respond and say to me that the whole Church is such. How do you prove this? I prove it, you say. Prove it, I ask you. For you bring me great joy if you can teach that the whole Church, in each of its faithful, has absolutely no sin. I prove it, you say. Say from where? The Apostle speaks. What does the Apostle say? Christ, he says, loved the Church. I hear, and I recognize these as the words of the Apostle. Cleansing her by the washing of water in the word, so that he might present the Church to himself in glory, without spot or wrinkle, or anything of the sort. We have heard great thunders from a great cloud. For the Apostle is a cloud of God. These words have sounded, and made us tremble.

They are refuted by their own profession about themselves. Heretics are outside the Church. But tell us, before we inquire how the Apostle said these words; tell us, I say, whether you are righteous, or not. They respond: We are righteous. Therefore, you have no sin? Through all days, through all nights you do nothing evil, say nothing evil, think nothing evil? They do not dare to say: Nothing. But what do they respond? Indeed, we are sinners; but we speak of the saints, not of ourselves. I ask you this: Are you Christians? I do not say: Are you righteous? Are you Christians? They do not dare to deny: We are Christians, they say. Therefore, are you faithful? Have you been baptized? Baptized, they say, we have been. Have all your sins been forgiven? Forgiven, they say. How then are you sinners? It is sufficient for me to repulse you from this. You are Christians, you have been baptized, you are faithful, you are members of the Church, and you have spots and wrinkles? How then is the Church at this time without spot and wrinkle, when you are its spot and wrinkle? Or if you do not want to be the Church unless it is without spot and wrinkle, with your spots and wrinkles cut yourselves off from its members, cut yourselves off from its body. But what more shall I say that they may segregate themselves from the Church, since they have already done this? For they are heretics, they are already outside: with all their purity they remain outside. Return, and listen; listen, and believe.

Deceptive humility of the Pelagians.

Perhaps you will say in your proud and swollen heart: Could we say that we are righteous? Indeed, it was necessary due to humility to say that we are sinners. So, you lie for the sake of humility? You are just, without sin: but for the sake of humility, you say you are a sinner. How can I accept you as a Christian in another testimony if I hold you as a false witness against yourself? You are just, without sin, and you say you have sin. Therefore, you are a false witness against yourself. God does not accept your lying humility. Examine your life, see your conscience. So, you are just, but you cannot help but say you are a sinner? Listen to John; he repeats to you what he truthfully said before: If we say, he says, that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. You do not have sin, and you say you have sin; the truth is not in you. For John did not say: If we say that we have no sin, humility is not in us; but he said: we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. Therefore, we lie if we say we have no sin. If John feared a lie, do you not fear a lie, so that when you are just, you say that you are a sinner? How, then, can I accept you as a witness for another cause, when you lie in your own cause? You make the saints guilty when you give false testimony against yourself. What will you do to another, who defames you? How will another avoid your slander when you make yourself guilty with the lie of your tongue? A lie in the form of humility is a sin.

I ask you again in another way: Are you righteous, or a sinner? You respond: A sinner. You lie, because you do not say with your mouth what you believe in your heart. Therefore, even if you were not a sinner, you become one while lying. For you say: We call ourselves sinners for the sake of humility; for God sees that we are righteous. When, therefore, you lie for the sake of humility, if you were not a sinner before you lied, by lying you become what you sought to avoid. Truth is not in you unless you call yourself a sinner in such a way that you also recognize that you are one. But the truth itself is that you say what you are. For how is there humility, where falsehood reigns?

It is clear from the Lord's Prayer that the church here is not without sin.

Finally, let us not omit the words of John: behold, in the body of the Church, which you say has no spot or wrinkle or anything of the sort, and is without sin; behold, the hour of prayer will come, the whole Church will pray: and indeed you are outside; come to the Lord's Prayer, come to the balance, come, say: Our Father, who art in heaven. Follow with: Hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. Follow, and say: Forgive us our debts. Answer, heretic, what are your debts? Perhaps you have borrowed money from God? No, he says. I will ask you no more about this: for the Lord himself will explain what debts are which we ask to be forgiven. So let us say what follows: As we forgive our debtors. Let the Lord explain this: For if you forgive men their sins (thus your debts are your sins), your Father will also forgive your sins. Return then, heretic, to the prayer, if you have turned a deaf ear against the true faith. Do you say, Forgive us our debts, or do you not say it? If you do not say it, even if you are bodily present, you are outside the Church. For it is the prayer of the Church, a voice coming from the teaching of the Lord. He himself said: Pray thus; he said to the disciples: Pray thus; he said to the disciples, to the Apostles, and to us whoever we may be, little lambs; he said to the rams of the flock: Pray thus. See who said it, and to whom he said it. Truth spoke to the disciples, the Shepherd of shepherds to the rams: Pray thus: Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. The King spoke to soldiers, the Lord to servants, Christ to the Apostles, truth to men, the exalted to the humble. I know what goes on in you: I weigh you, I give account of my scales, indeed I say what goes on in you. For I know this more than you. Say: Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. The entire Church here asks for her sins to be forgiven.

I ask you, just man, holy man, man without spot or wrinkle. I ask you, I say: is this prayer of the Church, of the faithful, or of the catechumens? Certainly, it is of the regenerated, that is, of the baptized; finally, what surpasses everything, it is of the children. For if it is not of the children, with what face is it said: Our Father, who art in heaven? Where then are you, O just and holy ones? Are you in the members of this Church, or are you not? You were there, but now you are no longer there. And I wish that those who have been cut off might hear and believe, receiving understanding. Therefore, if the whole Church says: Forgive us our debts, the one who does not say this is reprobate. And indeed, when we say: our debts, until we receive what we ask for, we are reprobate because we are sinners; but by doing what you do not do, that is, by confessing our sins, we are cleansed; if, however, we do what we say: as we forgive our debtors. Where are you, then, Pelagian or Celestian heretic? Behold, the whole Church says: Forgive us our debts. Therefore, it has spots and wrinkles. But by confession the wrinkle is stretched out, by confession the spot is washed away. The Church stands in prayer to be cleansed by confession; and as long as one lives here, so it stands. And when each one departs from the body, all that such a one had which were debts to be forgiven are forgiven; because they are forgiven also by daily prayers: and then one departs cleansed, and the Church is stored in the treasuries of the Lord as pure gold; and hence the Church is without spot or wrinkle in the treasuries of the Lord. And if it is without spot and wrinkle there, what is to be prayed for here? That pardon may be received. He who grants pardon wipes away the spot; he who forgives stretches out the wrinkle. And where is our wrinkle stretched out? As it were, on the rack of the great fuller, on the cross of Christ. For on that very cross, that is, on that rack, He shed His blood for us. And you faithful know what testimony you bear to the blood you received. Surely you say: Amen. You know whose blood it is, which is shed for many for the remission of sins. Behold how the Church is made without spot or wrinkle, as if well cleansed, stretched on the tent of the cross: but this can indeed be done here. The Lord presents to Himself a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle. He does this here, He presents it there. For this He does, that we may have no spot or wrinkle. Great is He who does this, well does He care, the most skilled artist. He stretches on the wood, and makes us without wrinkle, whom by washing He had made without spot. He Himself who came without spot and wrinkle was stretched out on the rack; but for us, not for Himself, so that He might make us without spot and wrinkle. Therefore, let us beseech Him to do this, and after He has done it, to lead us to His barn, and there store us, where there will be no pressing, The remedies of sins without which one cannot live. A Christian of good faith and good hope does not commit deadly sins. The condition by which our daily sins are forgiven. So you who were speaking, are you without blemish and wrinkle? What are you doing here in the Church, which says: Forgive us our debts? It confesses that it has debts that need to be forgiven. Those who do not confess still have debts; but for this reason, they will not be forgiven. Confession heals us, and a cautious life, a humble life, prayer with faith, contrition of heart, tears flowing genuinely from the source of the heart, that our sins might be forgiven, without which we cannot exist. Confession, I say, heals us, as the apostle John says: If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness. However, because I say that we cannot be without sin here, we should not commit murders, adulteries, or other deadly sins that kill with one blow. A Christian of good faith and good hope does not commit such acts; but only those sins that are washed away with the daily brush of prayer. Let us humbly and devoutly say every day: Forgive us our debts; but if we do what follows: As we forgive our debtors. This pledge with God is a true pledge and a firm condition. You are a man, and you have a debtor, and you are also a debtor. You approach God, who has debtors, and is not a debtor, to ask for your debts to be forgiven. But he says to you: I have no debts, you have debts; you owe me: but also your brother owes you. You are my debtor, and you have a debtor. You are my debtor, because you have sinned against me: you have a brother as a debtor, because he has sinned against you. What you will do with your debtor, I will do with mine; that is, if you forgive, I forgive; if you hold, I hold. You are holding against yourself, who do not forgive another. No one should therefore say they are without sin; but neither should we love sin for this reason. Let us hate them, brothers; and even if we are not without sins, let us still hate them; and especially let us abstain from crimes; let us abstain, as much as we can, from light sins. I, says someone, do not have sins. He deceives himself, and the truth is not in him. Let us earnestly pray that God forgives; but let us do what is said, let us forgive our debtors. When we forgive, we are also forgiven. We say this every day, and we do it every day, and it is done in us every day. Here we are not without sin, but we will leave here without sin.

Sermons - Sermon 182

SERMO 182 ABOUT THE WORDS OF THE FIRST EPISTLE OF JOHN (4:1-3):

"Beloved, do not believe every spirit;"

"But test the spirits, if they are from God."

AGAINST THE MANICHAEANS Not every spirit is to be believed. When John the Apostle was being read, we heard the Holy Spirit speaking through him, and saying: Beloved, do not believe every spirit; but test the spirits to see whether they are from God. I repeat, because it is necessary for me to repeat, and to strongly impress this upon your minds, as much as the Lord helps, Beloved, do not believe every spirit; but test the spirits to see whether they are from God. For many false prophets have gone out into this world. The Holy Spirit commanded that we should not believe every spirit: and explained the reason why this command was given. What is that reason? For many, he says, false prophets have gone out into this world. Therefore, whoever despises these commands, and thinks to believe every spirit, must necessarily fall into the hands of false prophets, and what is worse, blaspheme the true Prophets.

He is not of God, who denies that Christ has come in the flesh.

Here already from this precept the cautious man, made alert, will say to me: I have heard, I understand, I desire to obey, because I also do not wish to encounter false prophets. For who indeed would want to be deceived by liars? Since a false prophet is a lying prophet. Give me a religious man; he does not wish to deceive. Give me a wicked, sacrilegious man; he wishes to deceive, but he does not wish to be deceived. Therefore, since good men do not wish to deceive and neither good nor bad wish to be deceived, who is there that would want to encounter a false prophet? These are the words of one consulting me: yet certainly, no one encounters a false prophet except unwillingly. I heard the precept of John, indeed of the Lord through John: Do not believe every spirit. Behold, I accept it, this is what I desire. He adds, and says: But test the spirits, whether they are from God. From where do I test? I would like to test if I could not err. Surely, unless I test the spirits which are from God, I must necessarily encounter spirits that are not from God, and from this I will be led astray by false prophets. What should I do? How should I proceed? Oh, if holy John, as he told us: Do not believe every spirit, but test the spirits, whether they are from God, would deign to tell us how the spirits from God are tested! Do not be anxious, and listen to this as well. By this the spirit of God is known: this surely you were expecting to hear, so that you may test the spirits which are from God. By this the spirit of God is known: John said it, not I; this follows in the reading I am discussing. For he made us anxious and cautious, so that we do not believe every spirit, but test the spirits which are from God, because many false prophets have gone out into this world; immediately he saw what we would desire, he met our expectation, and he penetrated our silent thought. Thanks to God, because even this He deigned to speak through him. By this the spirit of God is known. Ah, listen; listen, understand, discern; cling to the truth, resist falsehood. By this the spirit of God is known. From where, I ask you? This is what I was longing to hear. Every spirit that confesses Jesus Christ has come in the flesh is from God: and every spirit that does not confess Jesus Christ has come in the flesh is not from God. Therefore in the meantime, dearest ones, reject from your ears every disputant, preacher, writer, whisperer, who denies that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh. Therefore banish the Manicheans from your homes, from your ears, from your hearts. For the Manicheans openly deny that Christ has come in the flesh. Therefore their spirits are not from God.

"The Manichaeans' plot in the very place of John. The error concerning the two natures."

Here I see where the wolf intends to creep in; I recognize it and, as much as I can, I show that it must be avoided. Hence, in what I said, or rather what I recalled as said by the Apostle; because every spirit that denies Jesus Christ has come in the flesh is not from God; the Manichean lies in wait in this word and says to me: Behold, the spirit that denies Jesus Christ has come in the flesh is not from God; whence then is it? If it is not from God, he says, whence is it? For can it be, except from somewhere else? Therefore, he says, if it is not from God, and is from somewhere else, you see there are two natures. We have found the wolf: let us stretch healthy nets, hunt it, capture it, slaughter it when captured. Let us plainly slaughter it; let error die, let the man live. Behold in what I said: Let us capture it, let us slaughter it; let error die, let the man live; there the question is resolved. But recall what I proposed, lest having forgotten the question, you do not understand the solution. Every spirit that does not confess Jesus Christ has come in the flesh is not from God. And Manichaeus immediately responded: And from where is it? If it is not from God, then it is from elsewhere. If it is from elsewhere, I have taught that there are two natures. Hold onto this question, and recall my words, where I said: Let us seize, let us destroy; let error die, let man live. Error is not from God, man is from God. Return to the question: Every spirit that does not confess Jesus has come in the flesh is not from God. I also say: All things were made through Him. Let every spirit praise the Lord. But if not every spirit is from God, how can a spirit that is not from God praise the Lord? Surely, let every spirit praise the Lord. I see both, I understand the weakness; let the flaw be healed, let nature be freed. The flaw is not nature, but hostile to nature. Heal where you are weak, remain where you praise. Medicine pursues flaws, not nature. Every spirit that does not confess Jesus Christ has come in the flesh is not from God. Inasmuch as it does not confess that Christ has come in the flesh, to that extent it is not from God; because this error, which does not confess that Christ has come in the flesh, is not from God. Brothers, what is it that we are reborn? If we were well-born, what is it that we are reborn? The nature that had been corrupted is restored; the nature that had fallen is raised; the nature that lay deformed is reformed by grace. For only the Creator, Father, Son and Holy Spirit; a threefold unity, one trinity; that alone is the immutable, unchangeable nature, neither subject to defect nor to progress, neither falling so as to be less, nor transcending so as to be more; perfect, eternal, in every way unchanging, that alone is nature. But the creature is good, yet greatly inferior to the Creator. If you wish to adhere to the devil, the deserter, you strive to make the created things equal to the Creator. The error of the Manichaeans, that the soul is a part of God, is refuted.

Let the soul recognize its own condition: it is not God. When the soul thinks itself God, it offends God: it does not find a savior, but instead finds a judge. For when God condemns evil souls, He does not condemn Himself: but if the soul is what God is, it condemns itself. Let us give honor to our God, brothers, to whom we cry out: Deliver us from evil. And if it whispers to you, so that you find temptation in prayer, and says to you: What is it that you cried out: Deliver us from evil? Surely there is no evil? Respond to it: I am evil; and if He will have delivered me from evil, I will be good from evil: He will deliver me from myself, so that I do not fall into you. Say this to the Manichee: If God will have delivered me from myself, I will not fall into you; because if God will have delivered me from my evil self, I will be good; if I will be good, I will be wise; if I will be wise, I will not err; if I will not err, I will not be deceived by you. Therefore let God deliver me from myself, and I will not fall into you. For it is my fault that I err and believe you: because my soul is filled with illusions. I am not my own light: for if I were, I would never have erred. Therefore, I am not a part of God, because the substance of God, the nature of God, cannot err: but I err; for you yourself confess this, you say you are wise, you try to free me from error. From where then do I err, if I am the nature of God? Be ashamed, give honor to God. I say that you still err greatly: but as you yourself confess, you had erred. Therefore did the nature of God err? Did the nature of God go into impurity? Did the nature of God commit adulteries? Did the nature of God commit illicit acts? Did the nature of God walk blindly, not knowing where it was going? Was the nature of God overwhelmed by crimes and vices? Be ashamed, give honor to God. A man cannot be a light unto himself. Evils are not from nature, but from the flaw of nature.

You cannot be a light to yourself; you cannot, you cannot. There was the true light. It was said in comparison to John: There was the true light. Was not John a lamp? He was a burning and shining lamp, the Lord said. Is not a lamp a light? But he was the true light. A lamp can be lit and can be extinguished: the true light can light and cannot be extinguished. Therefore, there was the true light, which illuminates every man coming into this world. We must be illuminated, we are not the light. Awaken, cry with me: The Lord is my illumination. What is it therefore that you say? So, are there no evils? There are evils, but they are changed; and they themselves will be good: because those evils, they are evils by fault, not by nature. What is it: Deliver us from evil? Could we not also say these words: Deliver us from darkness? From which darkness? From ourselves, if there are any remnants of darkness in us, until we are wholly made light, having nothing in us that resists charity, that opposes truth, that lies under infirmity, that fails by the condition of mortality. Then see what the whole will be when it will be: This corruptible shall put on incorruption, and this mortal shall put on immortality. Then it will happen, what is written: Death is swallowed up in victory. Where is your strife, death? Where is your sting, death? But the sting of death is sin. Where is evil? The evils of man are two, error and weakness.

What are the evils of men? Error and weakness. Either you do not know what you are doing and err by wandering, or you know what ought to be done and are overcome by weakness. Therefore, every evil of man is error and weakness. Against error, cry out: The Lord is my light. Against weakness, add: And my salvation. Believe, be good; you are evil, you will be good. Do not divide. Nature in you is to be healed, not separated. Do you want to know what you are? Darkness. Why darkness? Man, do you say: God is corrupted, can anything be deeper than this darkness? Believe, acknowledge that Christ came in the flesh, took on what he was not, did not lose what he was; changed man in himself, was not changed into man. Acknowledge, and you yourself will be good from evil, light from darkness. Am I lying, and is there no way to prove it? You accept the Apostle, if you do not pretend to accept him; you read the Apostle and are deceived, and deceive. Whence are you deceived? By erring your own evil. But if you believe and dispel the error, you will hear from the Apostle: For you were once darkness; now, however, you are light. But he added: light; but where? In the Lord. Therefore, darkness in you, light in the Lord. Because you cannot shine by yourself, you are illuminated by approaching, darkened by receding; because you are not the light in yourself, you are illuminated from elsewhere. Draw near to him, and be illuminated. The question on the same passage of John is deferred to another in the following sermon.

I know, dearest ones, that in this reading of Saint John, I have lingered much on one matter, and I do not see that you should be further fatigued or filled beyond capacity; and our frailty must be considered. For these words of Saint John still have their great depths. In the meantime, repel those who deny that Christ has come in the flesh. For it is certain that they are not of God. As much as they err, as much as they sin, as much as they blaspheme, they are not of God: let them be healed, and they will be of God; because they were also by nature from God. From here, however much I have disputed, heed the Scriptures. Do not believe those who deny that Christ has come in the flesh. But certainly you will say to me: Therefore, is everyone who says that Christ has come in the flesh, of God? Let us hear the Donatists, because they confess that Christ has come in the flesh; let us hear the Arians, because they confess that Christ has come in the flesh; let us hear the Eunomians, because they confess that Christ has come in the flesh; let us hear the Photinians, because they confess that Christ has come in the flesh. For if all spirits who confess that Christ has come in the flesh, are of God, how many lies, deceivers, and insane heresies are there, yet they still confess that Christ has come in the flesh. What then shall we say? How shall we resolve this question? However it must be resolved, it cannot be resolved today. Hold me in debt: but pray to God for help for me and for you. Turned towards the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 183

SERMO 183 Again concerning the words of the Epistle 1 John 4, 2:

"Every spirit that confesses Jesus Christ"

"To have come in the flesh, is from God"

Question to be handled. The expectation of your Charity is the demand of my obligation. I do not doubt that you remember what I promised concerning the reading of Saint John, with the aid of the Lord. Therefore, when you heard the reader, I believe you thought that I must be the one to repay the debt. Indeed, we have deferred discussing a great question as our speech extended in length, namely, how it can rightly be understood what the blessed John, not the Baptist, but the Evangelist, said in his Epistle: Every spirit that confesses Jesus Christ has come in the flesh is of God. For we see many heresies confessing that Christ has come in the flesh, and yet we cannot say that they are of God. The Manichaean denies that Christ has come in the flesh. There is no need to struggle, nor to persuade you longer that this error is not of God. But the Arian confesses that Christ has come in the flesh, as does the Eunomian, the Sabellian, the Photinian. What witnesses do we need to convict these? Who can count so many plagues? But in the meantime, let us address those that are more known. Many of those heresies I mentioned are unknown, and such ignorance is safer. Certainly, what we know is that the Donatist confesses Christ has come in the flesh: and yet it is far from us to think this error is of God. To speak of more recent heretics, the Pelagian confesses Christ has come in the flesh: yet this error is absolutely not of God.

Heretics agree in this, that they deny Christ has come in the flesh.

Therefore, beloved, let us diligently consider that we do not doubt the truth of the saying: Every spirit that confesses Jesus Christ to have come in the flesh is from God; these must be convinced because they do not confess Christ to have come in the flesh. For if we granted them this confession, we would acknowledge them to be from God. How then can we either forbid you from their errors, deter you, or defend you against them with the shield of truth? May the Lord help us, since your expectation for us is also a prayer, that these may be convinced because they do not confess Christ to have come in the flesh.

Arianus, how he denies that Christ came in the flesh.

Arians hear, and proclaim the birth from the virgin Mary. Do they therefore confess that Christ has come in the flesh? No. How do we prove it? If the Lord aids your understanding, very easily. What is it that we require? Whether they confess that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh. How can they confess that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh, who deny that He is Christ? For who is Christ? Let us ask blessed Peter. Just now as the Gospel was being read, you heard, when the Lord Jesus Christ Himself asked whom men said that the Son of Man was; the disciples responded with the opinions of others, and said: Some say John the Baptist, some Elijah, others Jeremiah, or one of the prophets. Those who confessed or confess these things did not know Jesus Christ as more than a man. Now, if they did not know Jesus Christ as more than a man, they surely did not know Jesus Christ. For if He is only a man, and nothing more, He is not Jesus Christ Himself. Therefore He said to them, But who do you say that I am? Peter answered, one for all, because unity is in all: You are Christ, the Son of the living God. The same argument is discussed.

Behold, you have a true confession, a full confession. For you must join together both what Christ says about Himself and what Peter says about Christ. What did Christ say about Himself? "Who do people say that the Son of Man is?" What does Peter say about Christ? "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God." Join both, and Christ comes in the flesh. This is what Christ says about Himself, which is minor; this is what Peter says about Christ, which is greater. Humility answered about the truth, and truth about humility: this is humility about the truth of God and truth about the humility of man. "Who do people say that the Son of Man is?" He said, "I say what I have become for you: you say, Peter, who it is that made you." Therefore, he who confesses that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh, undoubtedly confesses that the Son of God has come in the flesh. Let the Arian now say whether he confesses that Christ has come in the flesh. If he confesses that the Son of God has come in the flesh, he confesses that Christ has come in the flesh. If he denies that the Son of God is Christ, he does not know Christ; he speaks of one thing instead of another, he does not speak of Him. For what is the Son of God? Just as we were seeking what Christ is, and we heard that He is the Son of God, let us now seek what the Son of God is. Behold the Son of God: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God; He was in the beginning with God." In the beginning was the Word. What do you say, Arian? "In the beginning," as Genesis says, "God created the heavens and the earth"; but you say: "In the beginning God made the Word." For you say the Word is made, you say the Word is a creature. Therefore you say: "In the beginning God made the Word"; but the Evangelist says: "In the beginning was the Word." And therefore, "In the beginning God made the heavens and the earth," because the Word was. All things were made through Him. You say it was made. If you say it was made, you deny the Son. The same argument is discussed. For we seek a Son by nature, not by grace; a Son who is the only one, the only-begotten, not adopted. We seek such a Son, such a true Son, who, being in the form of God—these are the words of the Apostle, I mention them for the unlearned, lest they think they are my words—who, being in the form of God, as the Apostle says, did not consider it robbery to be equal with God. Not robbery, because by nature. It was nature, it was not robbery. He did not consider it robbery to be equal with God. It was not robbery to him, it was nature; thus he was from eternity, thus he was coeternal with the Begetter, thus he was equal to the Father, thus he was. He emptied himself: so that we may confess that Jesus Christ came in the flesh. He emptied himself. How? By losing what he was, or by assuming what he was not? Let the Apostle follow; let us listen: He emptied himself, taking the form of a servant. Thus he emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, not losing the form of God. The form of a servant was added, not the form of God departed. This is to confess that Christ came in the flesh. But the Arian who does not confess him as equal, does not confess him as the Son. If he does not confess him as the Son, he does not confess him as Christ. He who does not confess Christ, how does he confess that Christ came in the flesh?

Eunomian.

Thus also Eunomian, his peer, his associate, not much different. Indeed, the Arians are said to have confessed that the Son is at least similar to the Father; and if they did not say equal, yet similar. He, not even similar. And therefore he also denies Christ. For if Christ is truly equal and similar to the Father, indeed he who denies that he is equal denies Christ; he who denies that he is similar denies Christ. Therefore, he who denies that he is both equal and similar denies that Christ has come in the flesh. For I ask: Did Christ come in the flesh? He responds: He came. And we think that he confesses. I ask: Which Christ came in the flesh? Equal to the Father, or unequal? He responds: Unequal. Therefore you say that an unequal one came in the flesh: you deny that Christ came in the flesh, because Christ is equal to the Father.

Sabellian.

Hear the Sabellian. He himself is the Son who is also the Father. He says this, here he stings, here he spreads poison. He himself is, he says, the Father. When he wills, he is the Son: when he wills, he is the Father. He is not Christ himself. And you err if you say that this one has come in the flesh; because this one is not Christ, you deny that Christ has come in the flesh.

Photinus.

What do you say, Photine? Photinus says: Christ is only a man, not God. You confess the form of a servant, you deny the form of God. And Christ in the form of God is equal to the Father, in the form of a servant he is consort with us. And you deny that Christ has come in the flesh.

Donatist.

What is a Donatist? Many Donatists confess this about the Son what we do, that the Son is equal to the Father, and of the same substance: however some of them confess Him to be of the same substance, but deny Him to be equal. What is the need to argue about those who deny Him to be equal? For if they deny Him to be equal, they deny the Son. If they deny the Son, they deny Christ. If they deny Christ, how do they confess that Christ has come in the flesh? The same argument is discussed.

It requires more subtle debate regarding those who confess the same as we do, that the only-begotten Son is equal to the Father, of the same substance, co-eternal with the eternal; and yet, they are Donatists. Let us say to them: You confess in words, but deny in deeds. For someone can deny in deeds. Not everyone who denies, denies in words. Indeed, there are people who deny in deeds. Let us question the Apostle: “All things,” he says, “are pure to the pure; but to the defiled and unbelieving nothing is pure, but both their minds and their consciences are defiled.” They profess to know God, but they deny him by their deeds. What does it mean to deny by deeds? To be proud, to create schisms; to glory not in God, but in man. Thus, Christ is denied by deeds: for Christ loves unity. Lastly, behold how they themselves deny Christ, to speak more openly. We call him Christ, of whom John the Baptist said: “He who has the bride is the bridegroom.” A good marriage, holy nuptials. The bridegroom is Christ, the bride is the Church. We know the bride from the bridegroom. Let the bridegroom himself tell us who his bride is; let him tell us, lest we err and disturb holy vows by our invitation to the wedding; let him tell us, let him show us himself first as the bridegroom. The same topic is being discussed.

After the resurrection, he said to his disciples: "Did you not know that it was necessary for all that was written about me in the Law of Moses and the Prophets and the Psalms to be fulfilled?" Then, the Evangelist follows and says: "Then he opened their minds to understand the Scriptures, and he said to them: 'Thus it was necessary for the Christ to suffer and to rise from the dead on the third day.'" Behold, the bridegroom, whom Peter confessed, that is, the Son of the living God, had to suffer and rise on the third day. And it had happened: they saw it fulfilled, they held onto the head, they sought the body. What is the head? Christ himself: he suffered, rose on the third day: he is the head of the Church. What is the body? The Church itself. So the disciples saw the head, but did not see the body. Therefore, for those who did not see the body, let the head teach them. Speak, Lord Jesus; speak, holy bridegroom, instruct us about your body, your bride, your beloved, your dove, whom you endowed with your blood, say: "It was necessary for the Christ to suffer and to rise from the dead on the third day." Behold the bridegroom: speak about the bride, complete the marriage documents. Listen to the bride: "And preaching is necessary," he says. That follows, indeed. "It was necessary for the Christ to suffer and to rise from the dead on the third day, and for repentance and forgiveness of sins to be preached in his name to all nations." Where are you hiding? To all nations, beginning from Jerusalem. So it happened. We read the promise, we see it fulfilled. Behold my light; where is your darkness? Therefore, Christ is the bridegroom of this Church, which is preached to all nations, and sprouts and grows to the ends of the earth, starting from Jerusalem: Christ is the bridegroom of this [Church]. What do you say? Of whose bride is Christ? Of the party of Donatus? It is not he, it is not he. Good man, it is not he: rather, bad man, it is not he. We come to the wedding, let us read the documents, and not quarrel. Therefore, if you say: "Christ is the bridegroom of the party of Donatus;" I read the documents and find that Christ is the bridegroom of the Church spread throughout the whole world. If you say: "He is, and he is not," you deny that Christ has come in the flesh.

Pelagian.

Pelagian remains, not from all heresies, but from those which I briefly mentioned. For I already said: Who counts so many plagues? What do you say, Pelagian? Listen to what he says. He seems to confess that Christ came in the flesh, but upon examination, he is found to deny it. For Christ came in the flesh, which would be the likeness of sinful flesh, it was not sinful flesh. These are the words of the Apostle: God sent His Son in the likeness of sinful flesh. Not in the likeness of flesh as if the flesh was not flesh; but in the likeness of sinful flesh, because it was flesh, but not sinful flesh. However, this Pelagius tries to equate the flesh of every infant to the flesh of Christ. It is not, dearest. The likeness of sinful flesh would not be highly commended in Christ unless all other flesh was sinful flesh. What then does it profit, because you say that Christ came in the flesh, and you try to equate Him with the flesh of all infants? And I say to you what I say to the Donatists: He is not. Behold, I see the Church, a mother giving testimony through her very breasts. Mothers rush up with their young children, they urge them to the Savior to be saved, not to Pelagius to be condemned. Any woman as a mother running with piety with her young child says: "Let him be baptized, so that he may be saved." Pelagius, on the other hand, says: "What is there to save? There is nothing in him that needs to be saved; he has no fault, he has drawn nothing from the transmission of damnation." If he is equal to Christ, why does he seek Christ? Behold, I say to you: The Son of God, the Bridegroom, who came in the flesh, is the savior of both the greater and the lesser, the savior of both the elders and the infants, and He is Christ; but you say that Christ is the savior of the elders, not the lesser: He is not. If He is not, you too deny that Christ came in the flesh.

It is common to heretics and bad Catholics to deny the incarnation of Christ. And if we discuss all heresies, we find that they deny that Christ came in the flesh. All heretics deny that Christ came in the flesh. Why are you amazed if pagans deny that Christ came in the flesh? Why are you amazed if Jews deny that Christ came in the flesh? Why are you amazed if the Manichaeans most openly deny that Christ came in the flesh? But I say to your Charity, even all bad Catholics confess with their words that Christ came in the flesh; however, they deny it with their deeds. Therefore, do not be so secure concerning the faith. Join right living to right faith, so that you may confess Christ came in the flesh, both by speaking the truth with your words and by living well with your deeds. For if you confess with your words and deny with your deeds; the faith of such evil people is close to the faith of demons. Listen to me, dearest ones, listen to me, so that my sweat here does not testify against you; listen to me. The Apostle James, when he spoke about faith and works against those who thought that faith alone was sufficient and did not want to have good works, said: "You believe that there is one God; you do well: even the demons believe, and tremble." Will the demons be freed from eternal fire because they believe and tremble? Behold now what you have heard in the Gospel, what Peter said: "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God"; read and you will find that the demons said: "We know who you are, the Son of God." Nevertheless, Peter is praised, and the demon is restrained. One voice, different actions. Whence are these two confessions separated? Love is praised, fear is condemned. For the demons did not say this out of love: "You are the Son of God." They said this out of fear, not love. Hence they said in confession: "What have we to do with you?" But Peter said: "I am with you unto death."

Both true faith and a good life are from God. But also Peter himself, whence, my brothers, whence does he speak from love: You are the Christ, the Son of the living God? Whence does he? From his own? Far from it. Well, that very chapter of the Gospel demonstrates both what Peter has from God, and what he has from himself. You have both there: read, there is no need to wait to hear it from me. I bring up the Gospel: You are the Christ, the Son of the living God. And the Lord to him: Blessed are you, Simon Bar-Jonah. Why? Blessed from your own? No. Because flesh and blood has not revealed this to you; for this is what you are. Flesh and blood did not reveal this to you, but my Father who is in heaven. And he continues and says other things which are long to recall. Shortly after, the Lord there, after these words of his, by which he approved the faith of Peter, and showed that he was that rock, began to show his disciples that he must go to Jerusalem, and suffer many things, and be rejected by the elders and scribes and priests, and be killed, and on the third day rise again. There Peter out of his own fear was terrified, and dreaded the death of Christ; the sick man feared his remedy. God forbid it, Lord, he said: may it be far from you, let this not happen. And where is: I have the power to lay down my life, and I have the power to take it up again? Have you forgotten, Peter? Have you forgotten: Greater love has no one than this, that someone lays down his life for his friends? You have forgotten. That forgetfulness is from himself; the anxiety, the horror and fear of death, all from Peter: rather from Simon, not from Peter. And the Lord: Get behind me, Satan. Blessed are you, Simon Bar-Jonah: Get behind me, Satan. Blessed are you, Simon Bar-Jonah; but from God. Get behind me, Satan; whence? Recall whence blessed. I already said: because flesh and blood did not reveal this to you, but my Father who is in heaven. Whence Satan? Let the Lord say: For you do not have in mind the things of God, but the things of men. And by believing and by living well, we ought to confess that Christ has come in the flesh.

Hope in the Lord, and conjoin good deeds with true faith. Confess that Christ has come in the flesh, both by believing and by living well, and hold that both are received from Him, and hope that they will be increased and perfected by Him. For cursed is everyone who puts their hope in man. And it is good for a man that he who glories, glories in the Lord.

Turned towards the Lord God, the Almighty Father, with a pure heart, as much as our smallness can, let us give Him the greatest and truest thanks; praying with our whole soul for His singular gentleness, that He may deign to hear our prayers in His good pleasure; may He also expel the enemy from our actions and thoughts by His power; may He multiply our faith, govern our mind, grant us spiritual thoughts, and lead us to His blessedness; through Jesus Christ His Son. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 184

SERMO 184 On the Lord's Birth The mystery of the Incarnation hidden from the wise of the world. The birth of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, wherein Truth has arisen from the earth, and day from day has dawned anew upon us today, shines forth with its annual return: let us rejoice and be glad in it. For what benefit such great humility has bestowed upon us is known to the Christian faithful, but is removed from the hearts of the impious; for God has hidden these things from the wise and prudent, and revealed them to little ones. Therefore, let the humble hold to the humility of God: so that by this great help, as if by the carriage of their weakness, they may reach the height of God. But those wise and prudent ones, while seeking the heights of God and not believing in the lowly things, neglecting these and thus not reaching those, remain airy and light, inflated and elevated, and as if suspended in the wind between heaven and earth. For they are wise and prudent, but of this world and not of the one by whom the world was made. For if they had true wisdom, which is of God and is God, they would understand that God could take on flesh without being changed into flesh; they would understand that He assumed what He was not, and remained what He was; and that He came to us in man, and did not depart from the Father; and that He persisted in what He is, and appeared to us as what we are; and that to the infant body was given power, and it was not withdrawn from the worldly mass. The entire world, which remains with the Father, is His work; the birth from the Virgin, His work in coming to us. The Virgin Mother gave proof of His majesty, a virgin both before conception and after birth; found pregnant by a man, yet not made so by one; pregnant by a male without a male; happier and more wonderful in added fertility, not losing integrity. This great miracle, they prefer to think a fiction rather than a fact. Thus, in Christ, both human and God, since they cannot believe, they despise the human; since they cannot despise, they do not believe the divine. For us, however, the body's lowliness in the humility of God should be all the more dear as it is more despised by them; and as the birth from the Virgin seems to them impossible, let it be all the more divine to us in the nativity of the man.

Let all Christians rejoice.

Therefore, let us celebrate the Lord's Nativity with proper reverence and festivity. Let men rejoice, let women rejoice: Christ, the man, is born, who is born of a woman; and thus both sexes are honored. Now let him move on to the second man, who had been condemned in the first. A woman had persuaded us into death: a woman has given birth to life for us. The likeness of sinful flesh was born, by which the flesh of sin might be cleansed. Therefore, let not the flesh be blamed, but let guilt die, so that nature may live; because He was born without guilt, through whom he who was in guilt might be reborn. Rejoice, you holy children, who have especially chosen to follow Christ, who have not sought marriages. He did not come to you through marriage, whom you have found to be followed, so that He might grant you to despise by what you have come. For you have come through carnal marriages, without which He came to spiritual marriages: and He gave you to spurn marriages, whom He has specially called to marriage. Therefore, from what you were born, you did not seek; because you have loved Him more than others who was not born in this way. Rejoice, holy virgins: a Virgin bore you, to whom you may unite without corruption; who neither by conceiving nor by giving birth can lose what you love. Rejoice, righteous ones: it is the birth of the Justifier. Rejoice, weak and sick ones: it is the birth of the Savior. Rejoice, captives: it is the birth of the Redeemer. Rejoice, servants: it is the birth of the Lord. Rejoice, free people: it is the birth of the Liberator. Rejoice, all Christians: it is the birth of Christ.

Here, born of a mother, he commended this day to the ages, he who, born of the Father, created all ages. Nor could that birth have had any mother, nor did this one require a human father. Finally, Christ was born both of the Father and of the mother; both without a father and without a mother: of the Father, God; of the mother, man; without a mother, God; without a father, man. Therefore, who will recount his generation? Whether that one without time, or this one without seed; that one without a beginning, this one without precedent; that one which never was not, this one which neither before nor afterward was; that one which does not have an end, this one which has its beginning there, where it ends. The birth of Christ is twofold.

Rightly therefore did the Prophets announce that He would be born, and the heavens and angels that He was born. He lay in a manger containing the world: and He was an infant and the Word. Whom the heavens do not contain, the womb of one woman carried. She directed our King; she carried Him in whom we exist; she nursed Him who is our bread. O evident weakness, and marvelous humility, in which the whole divinity was hidden so! The mother to whom His infancy was subject, He governed by His power; and she whose breasts He sucked, He fed with truth. May He perfect His gifts in us, who did not disdain to take up even our beginnings; and may He make us sons of God, who was willing to become the Son of Man for our sake.

Sermons - Sermon 185

SERMO 185 On the Nativity of the Lord Truth has sprung from the earth.

It is called the Nativity of the Lord, when the Wisdom of God revealed itself as an infant, and the Word of God, without words, emitted the voice of flesh. Nevertheless, that hidden divinity was revealed to the Magi, testified by the heavens, and announced to the shepherds by an angelic voice. Therefore, we celebrate this day with an annual solemnity, in which the prophecy saying, "Truth has sprung from the earth, and righteousness has looked down from heaven" was fulfilled. The Truth that is in the bosom of the Father sprang from the earth to be also in the bosom of the mother. The Truth by which the world is sustained sprang from the earth to be carried by a woman's hands. The Truth by which the blessedness of angels is incorruptibly fed sprang from the earth to be suckled on carnal breasts. The Truth to which the heavens are not sufficient sprang from the earth to be laid in a manger. To whose benefit did such greatness come in such humility? Certainly to none of its own, but, if we believe, to ours. Awake, O man: for you, God became man. Arise, you who sleep, and rise from the dead, and Christ will enlighten you. For you, I say, God became man. You would be dead forever, unless He had been born in time. You would never be freed from the flesh of sin, unless He had assumed the likeness of sinful flesh. Perpetual misery would hold you, unless this mercy had occurred. You would not have revived, unless your death had been fitting. You would have failed, unless He had come to help. You would have perished, unless He had come.

Justice has looked down from heaven.

Let us joyfully celebrate the coming of our salvation and redemption. Let us celebrate the festal day on which the great and eternal day came from the great and eternal day into this our very short temporal day. He has been made for us righteousness, sanctification, and redemption: so that, as it is written, He who boasts, let him boast in the Lord. For reason like the pride of the Jews, who, being ignorant of the righteousness of God and seeking to establish their own, have not submitted to the righteousness of God: hence after he said: Truth has sprung out of the earth; he immediately added, and righteousness has looked down from heaven: lest mortal weakness should arrogate it to itself, lest by saying it was his own, and a man believing that he is justified by himself, that is, made just by himself, he should refuse the righteousness of God. Therefore truth has sprung out of the earth: Christ who said: I am the truth, was born of a virgin. And righteousness has looked down from heaven: for by believing in Him who was born, a man is justified not by himself, but by God. Truth has sprung out of the earth: because the Word was made flesh. And righteousness has looked down from heaven: because every good gift and every perfect gift is from above. Truth has sprung out of the earth, flesh from Mary. And righteousness has looked down from heaven: because a man cannot receive anything, unless it be given to him from heaven.

You will find nothing but grace.

Having been justified by faith, let us have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ; through whom we also have access into this grace in which we stand, and we rejoice in hope of the glory of God. Brothers, I am pleased to mix with these few apostolic words some brief words of this psalm, and to find harmony. Having been justified by faith, let us have peace with God: because righteousness and peace have kissed each other. Through our Lord Jesus Christ: because Truth has sprung out of the earth. Through whom we also have access into this grace in which we stand, and we rejoice in hope of the glory of God. He does not say: "of our glory"; but, of the glory of God: because righteousness did not proceed from us, but looked down from heaven. Therefore, let him who boasts, boast not in himself, but in the Lord. Hence, even at the birth of the Lord from the Virgin, whose birthday we celebrate today, the proclamation of the angelic voice was made: Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace to men of good will. For peace on earth comes from where, except because Truth has sprung out of the earth, that is, Christ was born from the flesh? And he himself is our peace, who has made both one: that we might be men of good will, sweetly bound by the bonds of unity. Therefore, let us rejoice in this grace, that our glory may be the testimony of our conscience: in which we may glory not in ourselves, but in the Lord. Hence it was said: My glory, and the lifter up of my head. For what greater grace of God could shine upon us, than that he, having an only-begotten Son, made him the son of man, and thus in turn made the son of man the Son of God? Seek the merit, seek the cause, seek the justice; and see whether you find anything except grace.

Sermons - Sermon 186

SERMO 186 On the Birth of the Lord Mary, the virgin mother.

Let us rejoice, brothers: let nations be glad and exult. This day has not been consecrated for us by this visible sun, but by the invisible Creator of it; when the Virgin Mother, with fruitful womb and intact genitals, brought forth Him made visible for us, by whom even the invisible was created. Conceiving as a virgin, giving birth as a virgin, pregnant as a virgin, a mother as a virgin, a perpetual virgin. Why do you marvel at these things, O man? It was fitting for God to be born in this way, since He deigned to be man. He made her such, who was made from her. For before He was made, He existed: and because He was omnipotent, He could be made while remaining what He was. He made Himself a mother while He was with the Father: and when He was made from the mother, He remained with the Father. How could God cease to exist when He began to be man, who granted to His mother that she should not cease to be a virgin when she gave birth? Hence, the Word made flesh did not cease to be the Word by perishing into flesh; but flesh came to the Word, so that it should not perish: that as man is soul and flesh, so Christ would be God and man. The same God who is man, and who is God is the same man: not by confusion of nature, but by unity of person. Finally, He who is the Son of God, co-eternal with the Father, always from the Father, the same began to be the son of man from the Virgin. Thus, humanity is added to the divinity of the Son; and yet, the Trinity does not become a quaternity, but remains a Trinity.

He who was God became man.

Therefore, let not the opinion of some less attentive to the rule of faith and to the oracles of divine Scriptures creep up on you. For they say: He who is the Son of Man has become the Son of God; but He who is the Son of God has not become the son of man. In saying this, they attended to what is true; but they were not able to speak truly. For what did they attend to, except that human nature could be changed for the better, but divine nature could not be changed for the worse? This is true: but also in this way, that is, with divinity not being changed for the worse, nonetheless the Word was made flesh. For the Gospel does not say: "Flesh was made Word"; but it says: The Word was made flesh. But the Word is God; because the Word was God. And what is flesh, except man? For the flesh of man is not without a soul in Christ. Hence He says: My soul is sorrowful even to death. Therefore, if the Word is God, and man is flesh, what else is it: The Word was made flesh; except that He who was God was made man? And thus He who was the Son of God was made the son of man by the assumption of the inferior, not by the conversion of the superior; by taking on what He was not, not by losing what He was. For how would we confess in the Rule of Faith, that we believe in the Son of God who was born of the Virgin Mary, if it was not the Son of God, but a son of man who was born of the Virgin Mary? For what Christian would deny that a son of man was born from that woman? But yet, God was made man, and thus man was made God. For the Word was God, and the Word was made flesh. Therefore, it must be confessed that He who was the Son of God, in order to be born of the Virgin Mary, having taken the form of a servant, was made the son of man, remaining what He was, taking on what He was not: beginning to be whereunto He is less than the Father, and always remaining in that which He and the Father are one. The Son of God is the same as the son of man through the incarnation. For if he who is always the Son of God, is not himself made the son of man, how does the Apostle say concerning him: Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God; but made himself of no reputation, taking the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men, and being found in fashion as a man? For it is not another, but he himself in the form of God equal to the Father, who is certainly the only-begotten Son of God, who made himself of no reputation, being made in the likeness of men. Neither is it another, but the same one in the form of God equal to the Father, who humbled himself, not another, but himself being made obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. All of this the Son of God did, only in that form in which he is the son of man. Again, if he who is always the Son of God is not himself made the son of man, how does the Apostle say to the Romans: Set apart for the Gospel of God, which he had promised through his prophets in the Holy Scriptures concerning his Son, who was made of the seed of David according to the flesh? Behold the Son of God, who certainly always was, was made of the seed of David according to the flesh, which he was not before. Again, if he who is the Son of God is not himself made the son of man, how did God send his Son made of a woman? By which name in the Hebrew language, virgin honor is not denied, but the female sex is shown. For who is sent by the Father, if not the only-begotten Son of God? How then made of a woman, except that the same one who was with the Father the Son of God, being sent became the son of man? Born of the Father without a day of time, born of the mother on this day. For he chose this day which he created, in which he would be created, just as he was made of the mother whom he made. For even the day from which henceforth the increase of light is received signifies the work of Christ, by which our inner man is renewed day by day. For to the eternal Creator in a created time that day ought to be birth, to which the temporal creature would correspond.

Sermons - Sermon 187

SERMO 187 ON THE BIRTHDAY OF THE LORD The great Word and the small infant Christ. My mouth will speak the praise of the Lord: of that Lord, through whom all things were made, and who was made among all things: who is the revealer of the Father, the creator of the mother: the Son of God from the Father without a mother, the son of man from a mother without a father: great in the day of the angels, small in the day of men: the Word God before all times, the Word flesh at the appointed time: the creator of the sun, made under the sun: ordaining all ages from the bosom of the Father, consecrating this day from the womb of the mother: remaining there, coming forth here: maker of heaven and earth, born under heaven on earth: ineffably wise, wisely an infant: filling the world, lying in a manger: ruling the stars, sucking at breasts: so great in the form of God, brief in the form of a servant; so that neither was that greatness diminished by this brevity, nor was this brevity oppressed by that greatness. For nor did he abandon divine works when he took on human limbs: nor did he cease to reach from end to end mightily, and to dispose all things sweetly; when clothed in the infirmity of the flesh, he was received in the virginal womb, not enclosed; so that neither was the food of wisdom withdrawn from the angels, and we might taste how sweet the Lord is. The word of man and the Word of God.

Why do we marvel at this about the Word of God, when this discourse we produce flows so freely into the senses, such that the listener both receives it and does not contain it? For if it were not received, it would instruct no one; if it were contained, it would not reach others. And indeed, this discourse is divided into words and syllables: yet you do not take individual parts from it as if it were food for the stomach, but you all hear the whole, and each individual captures the whole. Nor do we fear while speaking, lest one person hearing the whole should consume it all, and another should not have what to take: but we want you to be attentive in such a way that we defraud neither the ear nor the mind of any person, so that each individual hears the whole and leaves the whole for others to hear. Nor does this happen in successive times, so that when the discourse first enters you, it departs from you to enter another: but it comes to all simultaneously, and reaches each one in its entirety. And if the whole could be retained in memory, just as you all came to hear the whole, so too each one would return with the whole. How much more the Word of God, through which all things were made, and which, remaining in itself, renews all things; which is neither confined by places, nor extended by times, nor varied by short and long pauses, nor woven by voices, nor terminated by silence; how much more could this great and such Word, having assumed a body, make fruitful the womb of the mother, and not depart from the bosom of the Father? From here reach the eyes of humans, from there illuminate the minds of angels? From here proceed to the earth, from there extend to the heavens? From here become man, from there create men? The word and the voice in man.

Therefore, let no one believe that the Son of God was converted and changed into the son of man; rather, let us believe that, without the divine nature being consumed and the human nature being perfectly assumed, the Son of God, remaining as He was, became the son of man. For when it was said, "The Word was God," and "The Word was made flesh," it does not imply that the Word ceased to be God when it became flesh; rather, in the very flesh by which the Word was made flesh, Emmanuel was born, which means God with us. Just as the word we hold in our hearts becomes a voice when we express it orally, yet it is not changed into that voice, but the former is retained whole while the latter is taken up as its expression, so that what is understood internally remains, and what is heard externally sounds forth: the same thing that was before internal is now external in sound; so when the word becomes a voice, it is not changed into the voice. Instead, remaining in the light of the mind and assuming the voice of the flesh, it proceeds to the listener without leaving the thinker. It is not the voice itself that is thought of in silence, whether it be Greek, Latin, or any other language; but when, before any diversity of tongues exists, the very thing that is to be said is still, in some way, naked in the heart's contemplation, it is clothed with the speaker's voice to emerge from there. Nevertheless, both that which is understood by thinking and that which sounds by speaking are mutable and dissimilar: neither will the former remain when you forget it, nor the latter when you are silent. But the Word of the Lord remains forever, and remains unchangeably.

Christ is God and man. And when he assumed flesh from time, so that he might proceed to our temporal life, he did not lose eternity in the flesh, but also granted immortality to the flesh. Thus he, as a bridegroom coming forth from his chamber, rejoiced like a giant to run his course. Who, though he was in the form of God, did not consider it robbery to be equal with God, but that he might become that which he was not for our sake, emptied himself; not losing the form of God, but taking the form of a servant: and through this, being made in the likeness of men; not in his own substance; but found in appearance as a man. For all that we are, either in soul or in body, is our nature, his appearance: if we were not this, we would not exist; if he were not this, he would surely be God. And when he began to be what he was not, he was made man while remaining God: so that not only one of these, but both could be truly said; both because he was made man: Because the Father is greater than I; and because he remained God: I and the Father are one. For if the Word had been changed into flesh, that is, if God had been changed into man, it would not have been true, unless: The Father is greater than I; because God is greater than man: but the other would be false: I and the Father are one; because God and man are not one. But perhaps he could say: I and the Father are not one, but were one. For what was and ceased to be is surely not, but was. Now, however, both because of the true form of a servant which he had taken up, he truly said: The Father is greater than I; and because of the true form of God in which he remained, he truly said: I and the Father are one. Therefore, he emptied himself among men, not becoming something he was not, so that he would not be what he was: but hiding what he was, and showing what he had become. Accordingly, because the Virgin conceived and bore a son, because of the manifest form of a servant: A child is born to us. But because the Word of God, which remains forever, was made flesh, so that it might dwell among us, because of the hidden but enduring form of God, as Gabriel announced, we call his name Emmanuel. For he was made man, remaining God, so that the son of man might rightly be called God with us: not another God, another man. Therefore let the world rejoice in believers, for whom he came to be saved by whom the world was made. The creator of Mary, born of Mary: the son of David, the Lord of David: the seed of Abraham, who is before Abraham: the maker of the earth, made on the earth: the creator of heaven, created under heaven. He is the day which the Lord has made, and he is the Lord of our hearts. Let us walk in his light, let us rejoice and be glad in him.

Sermons - Sermon 188

SERMO 188 ON THE BIRTHDAY OF THE LORD The word of God cannot be explained by man. The Son of God, as He is with the Father, equal to Him and co-eternal, in whom all things in heaven and on earth, visible and invisible, were created, the Word of God and God, the life and light of men, if we attempt to praise Him; it is not surprising that no human thought, no speech is sufficient. For how can our tongue be able to praise Him worthily, whom our heart is yet unable to see, where He has placed the eye by which He can be seen, if iniquity is cleansed, if infirmity is healed, and those with pure hearts become blessed, for they shall see God? It is not surprising, I say, that we do not find with what words we may speak of the one Word, in whom it was said that we should exist, who would say something about Him. For these words thought and uttered, our mind forms, but by that Word itself is formed. Nor does man make words in the manner by which he himself was made through the Word: because neither did the Father generate the only Word in the manner in which He made all things through the Word. Indeed, God begot God; but the begetter and the begotten simultaneously are one God. However, God made the world; the world passes, and God remains. And just as those things which were made, obviously did not make themselves: so by no one was He made, by whom all things could have been made. It is not surprising, therefore, if man made among all things does not explain in words the Word, by which all things were made. The eternal Word born for us in time.

Therefore, let us briefly turn our ears and minds to this, so that perhaps we may be able to say something fitting and worthy, not from what was in the beginning—the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God—but from the Word made flesh: if indeed we can speak in a way through which He dwelled among us; if perhaps He can be spoken of where He chose to be seen. For this reason, we celebrate this day, on which He deigned to be born of a virgin: a birth that He allowed to be narrated by men. But in that eternity, where God is born of God, who will declare His generation? There, there is no such day to be solemnly celebrated. For it does not pass by an annual cycle to return; but remains without decline, because it did not begin to rise. Therefore, that unique Word of God, that life, that light of men, is indeed an eternal day: but this day, in which He was united to human flesh, is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, today is present, tomorrow becomes past. However, the act of being born of a virgin today commends the eternal one, because the eternal born of a virgin consecrates today. What praises, therefore, shall we declare to the love of God, what thanks shall we render? He loved us so much that for our sake He became in time, He through whom times were made; and was younger in age than many of His servants in the world, though older than the world itself in eternity; He became man who made man, was created from a mother whom He created, was carried by hands which He formed, sucked breasts which He filled, in a manger the mute infancy of the Word cried, without whom human eloquence is mute. The word an infant, the teacher of humility.

See, O man, what God has become for you: recognize the teaching of such great humility, even in a teacher not yet speaking. You once in paradise were so eloquent that you gave names to every living soul: but for you, your Creator lay as an infant, and did not call His mother by name. You in the broad expanse of fruitful groves were lost, neglecting obedience: He, obedient, came into the most narrow lodging of mortality, to seek the dead by dying. You, though a man, wanted to be God, so that you might perish; He, though God, wanted to be man, so that what was lost might be found. Human pride has so burdened you that only divine humility could lift you.

Mary, the virgin, the Church, the virgin.

Therefore, let us celebrate with joy the day on which Mary, the mother of the Savior, gave birth. She, married to the Creator of marriage, the virgin leader of virgins; given to a husband, yet a mother not by her husband; a virgin before marriage, a virgin in marriage; a pregnant virgin, a nursing virgin. The almighty Son in no way took away the virginity of His holy Mother, which He chose before being born. For fecundity in marriage is good; but integrity in chastity is better. Therefore, the man Christ who could offer both as God (He being the same man and the same God), never gave to His Mother the good that spouses love so as to take away the better reason for which virgins scorned to be mothers. Thus, the holy Virgin Church today celebrates the birth of the Virgin. For to this the Apostle says: I have betrothed you to one husband to present you as a chaste virgin to Christ. Hence a chaste virgin is found among so many people of both sexes, not just in boys and virgins but also in wedded fathers and mothers? Where, I say, a chaste virgin, if not in the integrity of faith, hope, and charity? Therefore, intending to make the Church a virgin in heart, Christ first preserved virginity in Mary's body. A woman, being given in human matrimony, is delivered to a husband so that she is no longer a virgin; but the Church could not be a virgin unless it had found a bridegroom to whom it was delivered, the son of a virgin.

Sermons - Sermon 189

SERMO 189 On the Birth of the Lord Christ is the day from day.

He sanctified this day for us, the day that made every day; about which the Psalm sings: Sing to the Lord a new song, sing to the Lord all the earth. Sing to the Lord and bless his name, proclaim his salvation day by day. Who is this day from day, if not the Son from the Father, light from light? But that day, which begot the day, which would be born from the Virgin on this day; therefore, that day has no beginning, has no end. I say, God the Father is the day. For Jesus would not be a day from day, unless the Father were also a day. What is day but light? Not the light of carnal eyes, not the light common to men and animals, but the light that shines for angels, the light by which hearts are purified when seen. For this night passes, in which we now live, in which the lamps of the Scriptures are lit for us; and that will come, which is sung in another Psalm: In the morning I will stand before you, and will contemplate you.

Justice from faith.

Therefore, that day, the Word of God, the day that illuminates the angels, the day that shines in that homeland from which we are exiled, clothed itself in flesh, and was born of the Virgin Mary. He was wonderfully born. What is more wonderful than the birth from a Virgin? She conceives, and she is a virgin; she gives birth, and she is a virgin. For he was created from her whom he created; and he bestowed fertility upon her, he did not corrupt her integrity. Mary, from where? From Adam. Adam, from where? From the earth. If Adam from the earth, and Mary from Adam, then Mary is also earth. If Mary is earth, let us acknowledge what we sing: Truth has sprung from the earth. What benefit has he bestowed upon us? Truth has sprung from the earth, and righteousness has looked down from heaven. For the Jews, as the Apostle says: Ignorant of God's righteousness, and seeking to establish their own, they have not submitted to the righteousness of God. From where can man be just? From himself? Who gives bread to himself when he is poor? Who clothes himself when he is naked, unless he receives a garment? We did not have righteousness; there were only sins here. From where is righteousness? What righteousness without faith? For the just lives by faith. He who claims to be just without faith lies. How does he not lie, in whom there is no faith? If he wants to speak the truth, let him turn to the truth. But it was far away. Truth has sprung from the earth. You were sleeping, it came to you; you were snoring, it awakened you; it made a way for you through itself, lest it lose you. Therefore, because Truth has sprung from the earth, our Lord Jesus Christ was born of a Virgin; righteousness has looked down from heaven, so that men might have righteousness not of their own, but of God.

Christ was generated for the regeneration of man.

What great mercy! What preceded was indignation! What indignation preceded? We were mortal, burdened with sins, bearing our punishments. Every person, when born, begins with misery. Do not seek a prophet; ask the newborn, and see them weep. When, therefore, there was such great indignation of God on earth, what sudden mercy arose? Truth sprung from the earth. He created all things, was created among all things; made the day, came into the day; was before time, marked the times. The Lord Christ is eternally without beginning with the Father: and yet, today, what is it? It is his birth. Whose? The Lord’s. Does he have a birthday? He does. In the beginning was the Word, God with God, does he have a birthday? He does. Unless he had human generation, we would not arrive at divine regeneration: he was born so that we might be reborn. Let no one doubt being reborn, for Christ was born: he was generated, not needing regeneration. For whom was regeneration necessary, if not for those whose generation was condemned? Let, therefore, his mercy be in our hearts. His mother carried him in the womb, let us carry him in our hearts; the Virgin became pregnant with the incarnation of Christ, let our hearts be filled with faith in Christ: she bore the Savior, let us bear praise. Let us not be barren: let our souls be fruitful to God. The generation of Christ is twofold. The generation of Christ from the Father without a mother; the generation of Christ from the mother without a father: both generations are remarkable. The first generation is eternal, the second temporal. When was He born from the Father? What is "when"? You seek "when" there, where you will not find time? Do not seek "when" there. Seek "when" here: you seek well when He is from the mother. You do not seek well when He is from the Father: He is born, and He does not have time; He is born eternal from the eternal, co-eternal. Why are you amazed? He is God. Consider the divinity, and the cause of amazement perishes. And when we say, He is born of a Virgin, a great thing, you are amazed. He is God, do not be amazed; let amazement pass, let praise approach. Let there be faith: believe that it was done. If you do not believe, it was done, you remain an unbeliever. He deigned to become man: why do you seek more? Was it not enough that God humbled Himself for you? He who was God became man. The inn was narrow: wrapped in swaddling clothes, placed in a manger: you heard this when the Gospel was read. Who would not wonder? He, who filled the world, did not find a place in the inn; placed in a manger, He became our sustenance. Let two animals approach the manger, two peoples: For the ox knew its owner, and the donkey the manger of its Lord. Attend to the manger: do not be ashamed to be the Lord’s beast of burden. You will carry Christ, you will not go astray walking on the road: He sits upon you, the way. Do you remember that donkey brought to the Lord? Let no one be ashamed, it is us. Let the Lord sit upon us, and call us wherever He wants. We are His beast of burden, we are going to Jerusalem. With Him sitting upon us, we are not pressed down, but elevated; with Him leading us, we do not go astray: to Him we go, through Him we go, we do not perish.

Sermons - Sermon 19

SERMO 19 SERMON OF SAINT AUGUSTINE INHABITED IN THE RESTORED BASILICA THE DAY OF GIFTS May God turn His face away from our sins, but not from us.

Singing to the Lord, we have asked Him to turn away His face from our sins, and to blot out all our crimes. But you can notice, Brothers, that in the same psalm we have heard: For I acknowledge my iniquity, and my sin is ever before me. However, it is said to God elsewhere: Do not turn away your face from me, to whom we have said: Turn your face away from my sins. While therefore man and sinner are one person, man says: Do not turn away your face from me, the sinner says: Turn your face away from my sins. This is thus said: Do not turn away your face from the one whom you have made, turn your face away from what I have done. Your eye, he says, distinguishes both, lest the nature perish because of the vice. You have made something, and I have made something. What you have made is called nature; what I have done is called vice. Let the vice be healed, so that nature may be preserved. That God may forgive, you must acknowledge and punish your sin. The crime, he says, I acknowledge it. If I acknowledge it, then you forgive. Let us live well, and living well let us not presume to be free from sin. Thus let life be praised so that pardon is sought. But desperate men, the less attentive they are to their own sins, the more curious they are about others'. For they seek not what they may correct, but what they may bite. And when they cannot excuse themselves, they are ready to accuse others. This one did not show us an example of praying and making amends to God in this way, saying: Since I acknowledge my crime, and my sin is always before me. He was not attentive to the sins of others. He called himself to himself, nor did he flatter himself but penetrated, and descended deeper into himself. He did not spare himself, and therefore asked not impudently to be spared. For sin, Brothers, cannot remain unpunished. If sin remains unpunished it is unjust, therefore without doubt it must be punished. Your God says this to you: "Sin must be punished either by you or by me". Therefore, sin is punished either by the penitent man or by God judging. It is punished either by you without you, or by God with you. For what is repentance but one's own anger against oneself? He who repents is angry with himself. For if it is not done deceitfully, whence is the striking of the breast? Why do you strike if you are not angry? Therefore when you strike your breast, you are angry with your heart, to satisfy your Lord. For it can also be understood that it is written: Be angry and do not sin. Be angry because you have sinned, and punishing yourself do not sin. Stir up your heart by repenting, and this will be a sacrifice to God.

God is appeased by the sacrifice of a contrite heart. Do you wish to appease God? Know what you do with yourself, so that God may be appeased with you. Note in the same psalm; for it is read there: Because if you had desired sacrifice, I would indeed have given it; with burnt offerings you will not be delighting. Therefore will you be without sacrifice? Will you offer nothing, appeasing God with no offering? What did you say? If you had desired sacrifice, I would indeed have given it; you will not be delighting in burnt offerings. Follow, and listen, and say: A sacrifice to God is a contrite spirit, a contrite and humbled heart God does not spurn. Having cast away those things you used to offer, you have found what to offer. For you were offering to the fathers victims of cattle, and they were called sacrifices. If you had desired sacrifice, I would indeed have given it. Therefore you do not seek those, and yet you do seek a sacrifice. Your people say to you: What shall I offer who do not offer what I was offering? For the people themselves, as some die and others are born, is the same people. The sacraments are changed, not the faith. The signs by which something was signified are changed, not the thing signified. For Christ, a ram; for Christ, a lamb; for Christ, a calf; for Christ, a goat, all Christ. A ram, because he leads the flock: he was found in the thickets, when the father Abraham was ordered to spare his son, yet not to depart without offering a sacrifice. And Isaac was Christ, and the ram was Christ. Isaac was carrying wood for himself: Christ was carrying his own cross. For Isaac, a ram; not for Christ, Christ. But in Isaac and in the ram, Christ. The ram was held by the horns in the thicket; ask the Jews, whence they then crowned the Lord. He is a lamb: Behold the Lamb of God, behold him who takes away the sin of the world. He is a bull: consider the horns of the cross. He is a goat, because of the likeness of the sinful flesh. These things were veiled, until the day should breathe and the shadows be removed. Therefore, in the same Lord Christ, not only as the Word, but also as the Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, both the ancient Fathers believed, and to us preached and prophesied the same faith. Whence the Apostle says: Having the same spirit of faith, as it is written: I believed, therefore I spoke. Having the same, he says, whom those who wrote also had: I believed, therefore I spoke. Therefore, having the same spirit of faith, because it is written by the ancients: I believed, therefore I spoke, we also believe, therefore we also speak. Therefore, when holy David thus said: Because if you had desired sacrifice, I would indeed have given it; with burnt offerings you will not be delighting, then those sacrifices were offered to God, which are not offered now. Therefore, when he was singing, he was prophesying, rejecting the present and foreseeing the future. With burnt offerings, he says, you will not be delighting. Therefore, when you will not be delighting in burnt offerings, will you remain without sacrifice? By no means. A sacrifice to God is a contrite spirit; a contrite and humbled heart God does not spurn. You have what to offer. Do not inspect the flock, do not prepare ships and journey to distant provinces from where to bring spices. Seek in your heart what is pleasing to God. The heart must be crushed. Do you fear lest it perish being crushed? There you have: Create in me a clean heart, O God. Therefore, that a clean heart may be created, the unclean must be crushed. To be upright in heart, let what displeases God displease you. Exegesis of Psalm 72. Happiness is not to be sought in this world.

Let us be displeased with ourselves when we sin, because sins displease God. And because we are not without sin, in this at least let us be similar to God, that what displeases Him displeases us. In some part you are joined to God's will, because what displeases Him in you, He who made you also abhors. Your own Creator made you, but examine yourself and remove in yourself what is not from His workshop. For God, as it is written, created man upright. How good God is to Israel, to the upright in heart! Therefore, if you are upright in heart, God will not displease you, God will be good to you, you will praise God. Absolutely, both in what He grants and in what He chastises, you will praise God. For he who said: "How good is God to Israel, to the upright in heart," had examined himself, who was once not upright in heart, and God displeased him. But later he repented and saw that God was not perverse but that he had not been upright. And remembering the times of his perversity and his present correction, he said: "How good is God to Israel! But to whom? To the upright in heart." What about you? He says: "But as for me, my feet had almost stumbled, my steps had nearly slipped," that is, I almost fell. Why? Because I was envious of sinners, seeing the peace of sinners. From where then were his feet moved and his steps almost slipped? Because he did not keep silent and warned to be cautious. He expected from God, according to the Old Testament, not knowing that there were signs of future things there; he therefore expected from God the happiness of this present life, and sought on this earth what God was reserving for His people in heaven. He wanted to be happy here, when happiness is not found here. For happiness is indeed a great and good thing, but it has its own region. Christ came from the region of happiness, and He did not find it even here. He was mocked, reproached, seized, scourged, bound, struck with palms, afflicted with the insult of spittings, crowned with thorns, hung on wood. In the end, the death of the Lord. It is written in the Psalm [WHERE THEY CRIED OUT WHO KNEW]: "And the death of the Lord." Why then, servant, do you seek happiness here, where even the death of the Lord occurred? Therefore, when he whom I began to speak of sought happiness in a region not his own and adhered to God to obtain it in this life, serving Him and doing His commandments as he could, he saw that what he sought from God and for which he served Him was great, or so he thought, even though those who did not serve God but worshipped demons and blasphemed the true God, possessed it. He saw and was disturbed as if he had lost the fruit of his labor. This is why he was envious of sinners, seeing the peace of sinners. Indeed, you have there: "Behold, these are the sinners, and they prosper in the world; they have obtained riches. Surely in vain have I justified my heart, and in innocence washed my hands, and been scourged all day long?" I worship God, they blaspheme God. They have happiness, I have calamity. Where is the fairness? Hence the moved feet, hence the nearly slipped steps, hence the near destruction. For see to what danger he came. There he says: "And I said, 'How does God know? Is there knowledge in the Most High?'" See to what danger he came by seeking earthly happiness as a great reward from God. Learn therefore, dearest ones, to despise it if you have it, and not say in your hearts: "I am well because I worship God." For you will see, however you think you are well, that those who do not worship God are well too, and your steps will be moved. For either you have it while worshipping God, and you will see that someone who does not worship God has such things, and thus you will think you worship God in vain because even he who does not worship God has happiness. Or you do not have it, and much more will you accuse God who gives it to His blasphemers and denies it to His worshippers. Learn therefore to despise earthly things if you wish to serve God with a faithful heart. Do you have it? Do not think you are good because of it, but make yourself good through it. Do you not have it? Do not think yourself bad because of it, but avoid the evil by which the good one did not come.

Happiness must be sought in the Lord. For indeed, this one, coming to his senses and reproaching himself for having begun to think ill of God, a sinner longing and looking to the peace of sinners, thereby reproaching himself, says: "What is there for me in heaven, and what have I desired on earth from you?" Now coming to his senses, now with a corrected heart, he recognized how great is the value of the worship of God, which he had betrayed for a very base price when he sought earthly happiness for it. He recognized what is owed to the worshippers of God above, where we are commanded to have our heart, and we respond that we have our heart there. And would that we do not lie, at least at that hour, at least at that moment, at least at that instant of time when we respond. Therefore, looking back and correcting his heart, he reproached himself for having once sought earthly happiness as if it were the reward for the worship of God. But reproaching himself, he says: "What is there for me in heaven? What is there for me? Eternal life, incorruption, a kingdom with Christ, the company of angels, where there is no disturbance, no ignorance, no danger, no temptation; true, certain, secure stability. Behold, what is there for me in heaven. And what have I desired on earth from you? What have I desired on earth from you? What did I desire? Transient, perishable, fleeting riches. What did I desire? Gold, the paleness of the earth; silver, the bluish tint of the earth; honor, the vapor of time. Behold, what I desired from you on earth. And because I saw this among sinners, my feet were shaken, and my steps almost slipped. O how good He is to the upright in heart! Therefore, what are you seeking, faithful Prophet? Gold and silver and earthly riches? Does the faith of a faithful woman have as much value as what a prostitute has? So does the faith of a faithful man have as much value as what an actor, a charioteer, a hunter, a thief has? God forbid, my Brothers, God forbid that your faith is worth so much. May God turn this away from your hearts. It is not worth so much. Do you want to know? For it, Christ died. So why are you seeking earthly reward, addicted to gold and coins? You are doing a disservice to the faith for which Christ died. And what is, he says, its worth? Look to him who says: "What is there for me in heaven?" For he did not express what that would be. He said thus: "And what have I desired on earth from you?" By praising the one and dismissing the other, he nonetheless said both. What is the one? What eye has not seen. What is the other? What the faithful eye has not seen. What is the one? What the ulcerated Lazarus found. What is the other? What the puffed-up rich man had. What is the one? What cannot perish. What is the other? What cannot be held. What is the one? Where there will be no labor. What is the other? What fear does not abandon. For what is there for me in heaven? What? He who made heaven. Your God is the price of your faith. You will have Him, He Himself prepares Himself as the reward for His worshippers. Consider, Beloved, the whole creation—heaven, earth, sea, what is in heaven, what is on earth, what is in the sea, how beautiful, how wonderful, how worthily and orderly arranged. Do these things move you? They clearly do. Why? Because they are beautiful. What of Him who made them? I think you would blush if you saw the beauty of the angels. What then is the Creator of the angels? He Himself is the reward of your faith. Avaricious ones, what suffices for you if God Himself does not suffice for you? The world is a winepress; now there are many civic pressures. Be oil.

Therefore let us live well, and that we may be able to do this, let us call upon Him who commanded this. Neither let us seek earthly reward from the Lord for our good life. Let us extend our intention to those things which are promised. Let us place our heart there, where it cannot decay with worldly cares. These things which occupy men pass away, they fly away, human life on earth is but a vapor. Moreover, so many and such daily dangers beset this fragile life. Great earthquakes are reported from the East. Several great cities have suddenly collapsed. The Jews, pagans, catechumens who were in Jerusalem were all terrified; all were baptized. It is said perhaps seven thousand men were baptized. The sign of Christ appeared in the clothes of the baptized Jews. These things are reported with the utmost consistency by the faithful brothers. The city of Sitifis was also struck by a very severe earthquake, such that for five days everyone stayed in the fields, and there it is said that nearly two thousand men were baptized. Everywhere God terrifies, because He does not wish to find something He must condemn. Something is being done in this press. The world is a press; its pressures are abundant. Be the oil, not the dregs. Let each one turn to God and change his life. The oil has a hidden path, it tends to its secrets. Another mocks, derides, blasphemes, shouts through the streets: the dregs flow out. Yet the master of the press, through His workers, through His holy angels, does not cease working. He knows His oil, knows what He receives, by what weight of pressure it is expressed. For the Lord knows those who are His. Flee the dregs, they are common and black. The Lord knows those who are His. Be the oil, flee the dregs. Let all who name the name of the Lord depart from iniquity. Do not harbor hatred, or if you do, quickly end it. For those things are not to be feared. Do you fear the earthquake? Do you fear the roar of the sky? Do you fear wars? Also fear fever. Suddenly, when those great things are feared and do not come, and from an unexpected direction a slight fever carries off a man. And if that judge finds such a person as he did not know, to whom He will say: I do not know you, depart from me, what happens next? Where does one go? Through whom is one approached? From whence is renewed life redeemed? Who is allowed to live again and correct what he has done wrong? It is finished. Indeed, few of you have gathered, but if you have heard well, you abound. Do not be deceived by the one who deceives, because he who does not deceive does not deceive you.

Sermons - Sermon 190

SERMO 190 ON THE BIRTHDAY OF THE LORD The day of Christ's birth holds the mystery of His light. Our Lord Jesus, who was with the Father before He was born of a mother, chose not only the virgin from whom He would be born but also the day on which He would be born. Erring men often choose days: one for planting, another for building, another for setting out, and sometimes even another for marrying. When one does this, he does so that something resulting from it may be nourished fortunately. However, no one can choose the day on which he himself is to be born. But He, who could choose and create both, was able to do both. Nor did He choose the day as those do who vainly suspend human fates on the disposition of the stars. For He did not become blessed by the day on which He was born; rather, He made the day blessed by deigning to be born on it. Indeed, the day of His birth holds the mystery of His light. Thus the Apostle says: "The night is far spent, the day is at hand: let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armor of light. Let us walk honestly, as in the day." Let us recognize the day, and let us be the day. For we were night when we lived in unbelief. And because the very unbelief which covered the whole world as a vice of night was to be diminished by growing faith; therefore, on the birthday of our Lord Jesus Christ, the night begins to suffer losses, and the day to gain increases. Let us therefore, brothers, celebrate this solemn day, not like unbelievers because of this sun, but because of Him who made this sun. For the Word was made flesh, so that for our sake He might be under the sun. For His flesh was under the sun; but by His majesty He was over the whole universe, in which He created the sun. Now indeed, even in His flesh He is above this sun, whom they worship as God, who, blinded in mind, do not see the true sun of justice.

He wished to honor each sex by being born.

Therefore, Christians, on this day, let us not celebrate the divine birth, but the human one, by which He was merged with us; so that through the invisible made visible, we might pass from the visible to the invisible. For we must hold with catholic faith that there are two births of the Lord: one divine, the other human; the former timeless, the latter in time. Both are marvelous: the former without a mother, the latter without a father. If we do not understand the latter, when will we narrate the former? Who can comprehend a new novelty, unusual, unique in the world, made incredible yet believable, and believed incredibly throughout the whole world, that a virgin would conceive, a virgin would give birth, and a virgin would remain after giving birth? What human reason has not found, faith accepts: and where human reason fails, faith flourishes. For who would say that the Word of God, through which all things were made, was unable to make flesh for Himself even without a mother, just as He made the first man without a father and a mother? But because He certainly created both sexes, that is, male and female, He therefore wished to honor both sexes also in His birth, whom He came to liberate. Certainly, you know the fall of the first man, because the serpent did not dare to speak to the man, but used the ministry of a woman to bring him down. Through the weaker, he obtained the stronger: and he who penetrated through the one, triumphed over both. Therefore, so that we could not shudder our death in woman as if with a just movement of grief, and believe her condemned without restoration; the Lord, coming to seek what had perished, wished to honor and commend both, because both had perished. Thus, we must not do injury to the Creator in either sex: the Nativity of the Lord commended both to hope for salvation. The honor of the male sex is in the flesh of Christ: the honor of the female is in the mother of Christ. The cunning of the serpent was overcome by the grace of Jesus Christ.

Christ is both an infant and the Word.

Therefore, let each sex be reborn in Him who was born today, and celebrate the present day: on which day Christ the Lord did not begin to exist, but He who was always with the Father, brought forth into this light the flesh which He took from His mother; bringing fruitfulness to the mother, not taking away her integrity. He is conceived, He is born, He is an infant. Who is this infant? For he is called an infant because he cannot speak, that is, articulate. Therefore, He is both an infant and the Word. Through flesh He is silent, through angels He teaches. He is announced to shepherds, the prince and shepherd of shepherds: and He lies in a manger, the faithful food for beasts. For it had been foretold by the Prophet: "The ox knows its owner, and the donkey its master's crib." Therefore, He sat on a donkey when He entered Jerusalem with the praises of the multitude preceding and following Him. And let us recognize, let us approach the manger, let us consume the food, let us carry the Lord and ruler; that He, leading, might bring us to the heavenly Jerusalem. The birth of Christ from His mother is humble; but His greatness from the Father is ample. In temporal days He has a temporal day; but He Himself is the eternal day from the eternal day.

Strength has been made weak.

Rightly we are ignited by his psalms as if by the voice of a heavenly trumpet, where we hear: Sing to the Lord a new song; sing to the Lord, all the earth. Sing to the Lord, and bless his name. Let us acknowledge, therefore, and proclaim day by day, he who was born in the flesh on this day. The Son born from the Father day by day, God from God, light from light. For this is the salvation of which it is said elsewhere: God be merciful to us and bless us; let his face shine upon us: that we may know on earth your way, your salvation among all nations. What he said, on earth; he repeated, among all nations: and what he said, your way; he repeated, your salvation. We remember that the Lord himself said: I am the way. And now, when the Gospel was read, we heard that the blessed elder Simeon received a divine response that he would not taste death before seeing the Christ of the Lord. When he had received the child Christ in his hands and recognized the greatness in the little one, he said, "Now you dismiss your servant, Lord, according to your word, in peace: for my eyes have seen your salvation." Therefore let us well proclaim day by day, his salvation. Let us proclaim his glory among the nations, his wonders among all peoples. He lies in the manger, but holds the world: he nurses at the breast, but feeds the angels: he is wrapped in swaddling clothes, but clothes us with immortality: he is suckled, but is worshipped: he finds no place in the inn, but makes a temple for himself in the hearts of believers. To ensure that weakness might become strong, strength became weak. Therefore, let us marvel more, rather than despise his carnal birth; and there let us recognize the humility of such highness for our sake. From there let us kindle love, so that we may reach his eternity.

Sermons - Sermon 191

SERMO 191 On the Birth of the Lord The Word became incarnate to bear unworthy things for the unworthy. The Word of the Father, through whom times were made, was made flesh, and made His Nativity in time for us: and in human birth, He willed to have one day, without whose divine commandment no day is turned. He with the Father precedes all spans of ages: He on this day penetrated the courses of years from the mother. Made man, the maker of man: so that He might suck breasts, governing the stars; that He might hunger, the bread; that He might thirst, the fountain; that He might sleep, the light; that the way might be wearied by the journey; that truth might be accused by false witnesses; the judge of the living and the dead might be judged by a mortal judge; that justice might be condemned by the unjust; that discipline might be beaten by scourges; that the cluster might be crowned with thorns; that the foundation might be hung upon the wood; that strength might be weakened; that salvation might be wounded; that life might die. To endure these and similar indignities for us, to free the unworthy; when he, who endured so many evils for us, did no evil, and we, who received so many goods through Him, deserved no good: therefore, for these reasons, He who was the Son of God before all ages, without beginning of days, deigned to be the Son of man in the last days; and He who was born of the Father, not made by the Father, was made in the mother whom He made; so that He might be born here sometime from her, who could never and nowhere have been except through Him.

Christ proceeded from the virginal womb.

Thus was fulfilled what the Psalm had foretold: Truth has sprung up from the earth. Mary, a virgin before conception, a virgin after birth. For it was not fitting that in that earth, that is, in that flesh from which truth arose, integrity should perish. Certainly, after His resurrection, when He was thought to be a spirit and not a body, He said: "Touch and see, for a spirit does not have flesh and bones as you see that I have." And yet the solidity of that youthful body presented itself to the disciples, even though the doors were closed. Why then, if He could enter as a grown man through closed doors, could He not also exit as a little one through uncorrupted members? But neither this nor that do the incredulous wish to believe. Therefore, faith rather believes both, because unbelief believes neither. It is indeed unbelief, to which nothing divine appears in Christ. Truly, if faith believes that God was born in the flesh, it does not doubt that either is possible for God; that both the body of a grown age might be presented inside without the door being opened, and that the infant bridegroom might proceed from His chamber, that is, the virginal womb, with His mother's virginity unsullied. The Church is both virgin and mother.

There, indeed, the only-begotten Son of God deigned to unite human nature to Himself, so that He might join to Himself, the immaculate head, the immaculate Church: which the Apostle Paul calls a virgin, not considering only virgins in body within it, but desiring the incorrupt minds of all. For I betrothed you, he says, to one man, to present a chaste virgin to Christ. Therefore the Church, imitating the mother of its Lord, since she could not do so in body, is nevertheless both mother and virgin in mind. In no way, therefore, did Christ take away virginity from His mother by being born, who, by redeeming His Church from the fornication of demons, made it a virgin. From whose incorrupt virginity the holy virgins are born, who, despising earthly marriages, have chosen to be virgins even in the flesh: rejoice, celebrate solemnly today the birth of the Virgin. For He is indeed born of a woman, who was not begotten of a man in a woman. He brought to you what you might love, He did not take from His mother what you love. He who heals in you what you derived from Eve, far be it that He corrupts what you treasured in Mary.

Follow in the footsteps of Mary.

Therefore, she whose footsteps you follow did not remain with a man to conceive; and when she gave birth, she remained a virgin. Imitate her as much as you can; not in fruitfulness, because you cannot do this, preserving virginity. She alone could do both, which you wished to have one; because you lose this if you wish to have both. She alone could do both, who bore the Almighty, through whom she could. For it was necessary for the only Son of God to be made man in this singular way. Yet Christ is not less for you, because he is the offspring of one virgin. Indeed, you have found him in your heart as a bridegroom, whom you could not produce as a son in the flesh: and such a bridegroom, whom your happiness holds as a redeemer, so that your virginity does not fear him as a destroyer. For he who took away neither the virginity of his mother by corporal birth, preserves it much more in you by spiritual embrace. And do not consider yourselves barren because you remain virgins. For even this pious integrity of the flesh pertains to the fertility of the mind. Do what the Apostle says: because you do not think about the things of the world, how you may please husbands; think about the things of God, how you may please him in all things; so that you may have a mind fertile with virtues, not a womb with offspring. Finally, I address all, I speak to all; I call with this voice the universal chaste virgin betrothed by the Apostle to Christ. What you marvel at in the flesh of Mary, act in the secrets of your soul. He who believes in his heart for righteousness, conceives Christ: he who confesses with his mouth for salvation, bears Christ. Thus in your minds, let both fertility flourish and virginity persevere.

Sermons - Sermon 192

SERMO 192 ON THE BIRTHDAY OF THE LORD We marvel at the birth-giving of the Virgin.

Today, Truth has sprung from the earth, Christ is born of the flesh. Rejoice solemnly, and consider the eternal day by remembering today; covet eternal gifts with the firmest hope; presume to be sons of God by the authority received. For you, the Maker of times became temporal, for you the Creator of the world appeared in the flesh, for you the Creator was created. Why do you mortals still delight in mortal things, and strive to hold onto the fleeting life if it were possible? A far brighter hope has shone on the earth, so that life in the heavens is promised beyond earthly matters. In order to believe this, a more incredible event was granted. He who was God was made man, so that men might be made gods: nor losing what He was, He wished to become what He had made. He made Himself to be, because He added man to God, not losing God in man. We marvel at the virgin birth, and we try to persuade the incredulous of the new manner of birth itself, that the seed of offspring arose in an unseeded womb, and the womb, untouched by carnal embrace, produced the son of man, whose father was not a human: the integrity of virginity remained both closed in conception and incorrupt in birth. This power is miraculous, but the mercy that He who could thus be born, wished to be born, is even more to be wondered at. For He was already the only-begotten of the Father, who was the only-begotten born to the mother: and He was made in the mother, who had made the mother for Himself; eternal with the Father, present today from the mother: made from the mother after the mother, not made from the Father before all: without whom the Father never was, without whom the mother never would have been.

Rejoice, virgins, widows, wives.

Rejoice, virgins of Christ, your companion is the mother of Christ. You could not bear Christ, but for Christ you did not wish to bear. He who was not born of you, was born for you. Nevertheless, if you remember his word, as you should remember; you are also his mothers, because you do the will of his Father. For he himself said: Whoever does the will of my Father, he is my brother and sister and mother. Rejoice, widows of Christ: you have vowed the sanctity of continence to him who made virginity fruitful. Rejoice also, conjugal chastity, all living faithfully with your spouses: what you lost in the body, keep in the heart. Where the flesh can no longer be intact from intercourse, let the conscience be a virgin in faith, according to which the whole Church is a virgin. In Mary pious virginity bore Christ: in Anna elderly widowhood recognized young Christ: in Elizabeth conjugal chastity and elderly fecundity served Christ. All the degrees of faithful members contributed to the head, what they could contribute by his grace. Therefore, because Christ is truth and peace and justice, conceive him in faith, give birth to him in works; so that what the womb of Mary did in the flesh of Christ, your heart may do in the law of Christ. And how do you not belong to the birth of the Virgin, when you are members of Christ? Mary bore your head, the Church bore you. For she too is both mother and virgin: mother in the womb of charity, virgin in the integrity of faith and piety. She bears peoples, but they are members of one, of whom she is the body and spouse, also bearing in this the likeness of that virgin, for in many she is the mother of unity.

Mercy is the birth of Christ.

Therefore, all in agreement, with chaste minds and holy affections, let us celebrate the day of the Lord's Birth: on which day, as we began this sermon: Truth has sprung from the earth. For indeed, what follows in the same psalm has already come to pass. For He who has sprung from the earth, that is, born of the flesh, because He came from heaven and is above all; without a doubt, when He ascended to the Father, also righteousness looked down from heaven. For He himself commends this righteousness with his words, promising the Holy Spirit: He, He says, will convict the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment. Of sin indeed, because they did not believe in me; of righteousness, because I go to the Father; and you will see me no more. This is righteousness, which looked down from heaven. For from the highest heaven is his going forth, and his circuit even to the highest heaven. However, lest anyone despise the truth, because it has sprung from the earth, when as a bridegroom he proceeded from his chamber, that is, from the virgin's womb, where the Word of God was united with human nature in an ineffable marriage: lest anyone therefore despise this, and although born in a miraculous way, and wonderful in words and deeds, yet due to the likeness of sinful flesh believes nothing more of Christ than that he is a man: as it was said: As a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, he rejoiced as a giant to run his course; it was immediately added: His going forth is from the highest heaven. What therefore you hear: Truth has sprung from the earth, is a condescension, not a condition; it is mercy, not misery. Truth, that it might spring from the earth, has descended from heaven: the bridegroom that he might come out of his chamber, his going forth is from the highest heaven. Hence it is that today he was born, on which day there is no shorter day on earth, from which nevertheless the days grow in length. He therefore who inclined himself and raised us up, chose the shortest day, but from which light grows: by his very coming, he also silently, as with the sound of a great shout, exhorts us, that we who were made poor for our sake, may learn to be rich in him; who for our sake took the form of a servant, that we may receive freedom in him; who for our sake sprang from the earth, that in him we may possess heaven.

Sermons - Sermon 193

SERMO 193 ON THE BIRTHDAY OF THE LORD Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace.

We heard the voice of the angels, through whom the Lord Jesus Christ, born of the Virgin's womb, was announced to the shepherds when the Gospel was read: Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace to men of good will. A festive and congratulatory voice, not to the one woman whose womb brought forth the child, but to the human race, to whom the Virgin gave birth to the Savior. For it was fitting, and this was indeed proper, that to her who became fruitful and gave birth to the Lord of heaven and earth, and remained intact after giving birth, not mere women with human celebrations, but Angels with divine praises should celebrate the childbirth. Therefore, let us also say, and say with as much exultation as possible, who announce his birth not to shepherds of flocks, but celebrate his nativity with his sheep: let us also say, I say, with a faithful heart, a devout voice: Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace to men of good will. And these divine words, these praises of God, this angelic joy, let us contemplate with as much consideration as possible, let us meditate upon them with faith, hope, and charity. For as we believe and hope and desire, so we shall be glory to God in the highest, when our resurrected spiritual body shall be caught up in the clouds to meet Christ: if only while we are on earth, we pursue peace with good will. For in the highest is life, because there is the region of the living; and there are the good days, where the Lord Himself is, and His years do not fail. But whoever wants life, and loves to see good days, let him keep his tongue from evil, and his lips from speaking deceit; let him turn away from evil, and do good: and so let him be a man of goodwill. And let him seek peace and pursue it: because on earth peace to men of good will. His mercy has anticipated us everywhere. But if you say, O man, Behold, the desire lies within me, but to perform what is good I find not; and you delight in the law of God according to the inward man, but you see another law in your members warring against the law of your mind, and bringing you into captivity to the law of sin which is in your members: persist in good will, and exclaim what follows: O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death? The grace of God, through Jesus Christ our Lord. For He is peace on earth to men of good will, after the war in which the flesh lusts against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh; so that you do not do the things that you would: for He is our peace, who has made both one. Therefore let good will persist against evil desires, and in persistence implore the aid of the grace of God, through Jesus Christ our Lord. It is opposed by the law of the carnal members, and behold, it is now even taken captive: let it implore aid, not trust in its own strength; and at least wearied, let it not disdain to be confessed. For He will be present who said to those whom He already saw believing in Him: If you continue in my word, you shall be my disciples indeed; and you shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free. The Truth will be present and will set you free from the body of this death. For this reason indeed the Truth, whose Nativity we celebrate, has arisen from the earth, that there might be peace on earth to men of good will. For who is fit to will and to perform, unless He who by inspiring helps us to be able, who by calling has provided that we should will? Because everywhere His mercy has preceded us, that we might be called, though unwilling, and obtain the ability to do what we will. Therefore let us say to Him: I have sworn, and confirmed it, that I will keep Your righteous judgments. I have indeed confirmed it, and because You have commanded, I have promised obedience: but because I see another law in my members warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members; I am utterly humbled, O Lord, quicken me according to Your word. Behold, the desire lies within me: therefore approve, O Lord, the voluntary offerings of my mouth; that there may be peace on earth to men of good will. Let us say these things, and if any other the piety, instructed by holy readings, suggests: that the celebration of the Lord born of the Virgin, we may not frequent in vain, beginning with good will, to be perfected with the fullest charity; which is also spread in our hearts, not by ourselves, but by the Holy Spirit who is given to us.

Sermons - Sermon 194

SERMO 194 On the Birthday of the Lord Listen, recall, love, preach.

Hear, children of light, adopted into the kingdom of God; dearest brothers, hear; hear, and rejoice, you righteous ones, in the Lord, so that praise may be fitting for you who are upright. Hear what you know, recall what you have heard, love what you believe, proclaim what you love. As we celebrate this day's anniversary, thus anticipate the appropriate discourse for this day. Christ was born, God from the Father, man from the mother. From the Father's immortality, from the mother's virginity. From the Father without a mother, from the mother without a father. From the Father without time, from the mother without seed. From the Father the beginning of life, from the mother the end of death. From the Father ordaining every day, from the mother consecrating this day. The word of angels and the food of men. For he sent forth the man John, who was to be born when the days began to diminish; and he himself was born when the days began to increase, so that it might be prefigured from this what the same John said: "He must increase, but I must decrease." For human life must diminish in itself, and grow in Christ; so that those who live might no longer live for themselves, but for him who died and rose for all: and each of us might say what the Apostle says: "And it is no longer I who live, but Christ who lives in me." For he must increase, but I must decrease.

All his Angels praise him worthily, whose eternal food is, nourishing them with incorruptibility; because he is the Word of God, by whose life they live, by whose eternity they always live, by whose goodness they always live happily. They praise him worthily, God with God, and give glory to God in the highest. But we, his people and the sheep of his hand, may we, reconciled through goodwill on account of the measure of our infirmity, deserve peace. For indeed, the voice of those very Angels is today, which they poured forth exulting for the Savior born to us: Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace to men of goodwill. Therefore they praise him fittingly, and we praise him obediently. They are his messengers, and we are his flock. He filled their table in heaven, and he filled our manger on earth. For the fullness of their table is that in the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The fullness of our manger is because the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us. For man to eat the bread of Angels, the creator of Angels was made man. They praise him by living, we by believing: they by enjoying, we by seeking: they by receiving, we by asking: they by entering, we by knocking. In the Word are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. For who among men knows all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge hidden in Christ, and concealed in the poverty of His flesh? Because for our sake He became poor, though He was rich, so that by His poverty we might become rich. For when He assumed mortality and consumed death, He showed Himself in poverty, but promised deferred riches, not lost or taken away. How great is the multitude of His sweetness, which He has hidden for those who fear Him, and completes for those who hope in Him! For we know in part, until what is perfect comes. So that we might be made suitable to receive it, He, equal to the Father in the form of God, made in the form of a servant like us, reforms us to the likeness of God; and made the Son of Man, the Only-begotten Son of God, makes many sons of men sons of God; and nurtures servants through the visible form of a servant, perfects them to become free to see the form of God. For we are children of God, and it has not yet appeared what we shall be. And we know that when it appears, we shall be like Him because we shall see Him as He is. For what are those treasures of wisdom and knowledge, what are those divine riches, unless they suffice for us? And what is that multitude of sweetness unless it satisfies us? Therefore, show us the Father, and it suffices for us. And in a certain psalm, one of us, or in us, or for us, says to Him: I shall be satisfied when Your glory is revealed. But He and the Father are one: and he who sees Him sees the Father. Therefore, the Lord of hosts, He is the king of glory. Turning to us, He will show us His face; and we shall be saved, and we shall be satisfied, and it will suffice for us.

Let us recognize the manger of our Lord.

Conclusion. Let our heart say to him, "I have sought your face; your face, Lord, will I seek; do not turn your face away from me." And let him answer to our heart, "He who loves me keeps my commandments; and he who loves me will be loved by my Father; and I will love him and will manifest myself to him." They certainly saw him with their eyes to whom he said this, and heard the sound of his voice with their ears, and thought with a human heart about a man: but what eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor has it entered into the heart of man, he promised to reveal the same to those who love him. Until that happens, until he shows us what suffices for us, until we can drink from the fountain of life and be satisfied; meanwhile, while we walk by faith and are away from him, while we hunger and thirst for righteousness and desire with indescribable ardor the beauty of the form of God, let us celebrate with devoted service the birth of the form of a servant. We cannot yet contemplate what was begotten before the morning star from the Father, let us attend to what was born at night from the Virgin. We do not yet grasp what remains before the sun, let us recognize his tabernacle set in the sun. We do not yet contemplate the Only Begotten remaining in his Father, let us remember the bridegroom coming forth from his chamber. We are not yet fit for the banquet of our Father, let us recognize the manger of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Sermons - Sermon 195

SERMO 195 ON THE BIRTHDAY OF THE LORD The birth of Christ is twofold and both are marvelous. The Son of God, who is also the Son of Man, our Lord Jesus Christ, born without a mother from the Father, created all days; born without a father from the mother, consecrated this day; in divine birth, invisible; in human birth, visible; in both, wonderful. Hence what the prophet foretold about Him: "Who will declare His generation?" it is difficult to judge of which it was said; whether about that by which He, never not born, has the co-eternal Father, or about this in which He, being born at some time, had already made His mother, in whom He would be born: whether about that in which He is always born, who always was; for who will declare how Light was born from Light, and both are one Light? how God was born from God, and the number of gods did not increase? how it can be said as of something past that He was born, although in that birth time neither passed, so that it might be past; nor preceded, so that it might be future; nor was present, as if it were still happening and not yet perfect? Who will therefore declare this generation; when what is to be declared remains above time, while the speech of one declaring it passes in time? Also, who will declare this generation from a virgin, whose conception in the flesh was not done carnally, whose birth from the flesh brought abundance to the nourisher, did not take away integrity from the parent? So whomever of these generations, or indeed both, who will declare them?

Christ, son of Mary, bridegroom of the Church. This is our Lord God, this is the mediator of God and men, our Savior, who was born of the Father and created the mother; created of the mother and glorified the Father: without a female birth the only one for the Father, without a male union the only one for the mother. This is the one beautiful in form beyond the sons of men, the holy son of Mary, the holy bridegroom of the Church, whom he made similar to his own mother: for he also made her our mother, and he keeps her a virgin for himself. To her indeed the Apostle says: I have espoused you to one husband, to present you as a chaste virgin to Christ. Of whom he again says, our mother is not a servant, but free, whose many children are more than her who has a husband. Therefore, both the Church and Mary have perpetual integrity and uncorrupted fecundity. For what she deserved in the flesh, this one has preserved in the mind: but whereas she bore one, this one bears many, to be gathered into one by one.

Why Christ came in the flesh. This is therefore the day on which He came into the world, through whom the world was made; on which He was made present in the flesh, never absent in virtue: because He was in this world, and He came unto His own. He was in the world, but the world did not recognize Him: because the light shined in darkness, and the darkness did not comprehend it. Therefore He came in the flesh, to cleanse the sins of the flesh. He came to this healing land, to cure our inner eyes, which our outer land had blinded: so that with them healed, we who were once darkness may become light in the Lord; and the light may not now shine present in the darkness of the absent, but appear certain to the beholders. For this, the bridegroom came forth from His chamber, and rejoiced as a giant to run His course. Handsome as a bridegroom, strong as a giant, lovable and terrifying, severe and serene, beautiful to the good, harsh to the evil, remaining in the bosom of the Father, He filled the womb of the mother. In which chamber, that is, the Virgin's womb, the divine nature joined to itself the human: where the Word was made flesh for us, so that coming forth from the mother, He might dwell in us; so that going before to the Father, He might prepare for us where we may dwell. Therefore let us joyfully celebrate this day solemnly; and faithfully desire the eternal day, through Him who was born for us eternal in time.

Sermons - Sermon 196

SERMO 196 On the Birth of the Lord Two births of Christ.

Today, the birthday of our Lord Jesus Christ has dawned festively for us. It is the day of birth, on which the day itself is born. And therefore today, because from today the day grows longer. The births of our Lord Jesus Christ are twofold; one divine, the other human: both wonderful; the former without a female mother, the latter without a male father. As the holy prophet Isaiah said: Who shall declare his generation? This can be referred to both generations. Who can worthily tell of the generating God? Who can worthily tell of the virgin birth? That birth is without a day, this on a specific day: both beyond human estimation and filled with great wonder. Consider that first generation: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. Whose Word! Of the Father Himself. What Word? The Son Himself. The Father never without the Son. And yet the Father who was never without the Son, begot the Son. And He begot, and did not begin. Without a beginning generated, there is no beginning. And yet the Son, and yet begotten. A man will say: How is He begotten and does not have a beginning? If begotten, He has a beginning: if He has no beginning, how is He begotten? How, I do not know. Do you ask a man how God was begotten? I labor with your question; but I call upon the Prophet: Who shall declare his generation? Come with me to this human generation, come with me to this one, in which He Himself emptied Himself taking the form of a servant; if perhaps we might be able to grasp even this, if perhaps we might be able to speak anything whatsoever about it. For who can grasp: Who being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God? Who can grasp this? Who can worthily think about it? Whose mind dares to scrutinize this? Whose tongue dares to proclaim it? Whose thought is able to grasp it? Meanwhile, let us omit this: it is too much for us. So that it might not be too much for us, He emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men. Where? In the Virgin Mary. From there, therefore, let us speak something, if perhaps we can. The angel announces, the virgin hears, believes, and conceives. Faith in the mind, Christ in the womb. The virgin conceived, marvel at it: the virgin gave birth, marvel even more: after the birth, the virgin remained. Therefore, who shall declare this generation?

Married life, widowed life, and virginal life in the Church.

I say what will please you, dearest. There are three lives in the Church of the members of Christ: the conjugal, the widowed, the virginal. Because those lives, those chastities were to be in the holy members of Christ; all these three lives have borne witness to Christ. The first, the conjugal: when Mary the virgin conceived, Elizabeth the wife of Zachariah had also conceived; she bore the forerunner of this Judge in her womb. Holy Mary came to her, as to her relative to be greeted. The child leaped in Elizabeth's womb. He leaped, she prophesied. You have the conjugal chastity bearing witness. Where is the widowed? In Anna. You heard just now when the Gospel was read, that there was a holy prophetess widow of eighty-four years, who had lived with her husband for seven years; frequenting the temple of the Lord, serving in prayers night and day. The widow too recognized Christ. She saw the little one, she recognized the great one. And she also bore witness. You have the widowed life in her. In Mary, the virginal. Let each choose from these three which he will. Whoever wishes to be beyond these does not intend to be in the members of Christ. Let not the married say: We do not belong to Christ. Holy women had husbands. Let the virgins not be proud. The greater they are, the more let them humble themselves in all things. All examples of salvation are set before our eyes. Let no one swerve. Let no one be beyond marriage: it is better without a wife. If you seek conjugal chastity, you have Susanna; if widowed, you have Anna; if virginal, you have Mary. Where are you, Christ, for me? The Lord Jesus willed to be a man for our sake. Let not mercy be slighted: Wisdom lies on the ground. In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. O food and bread of Angels: by you Angels are filled, by you they are satisfied, and they do not grow weary; by you they live, by you they are wise, by you they are blessed. Where are you for me? In a narrow inn, in cloths, in a manger. For whom? He who rules the stars, nurses at breasts: he fills the Angels, speaks in the bosom of the Father, is silent in the bosom of the mother. But he will speak at the right age, fulfilling the Gospel for us. For our sake to suffer, for our sake to die, to resurrect as an example of our reward, to ascend into heaven before the eyes of the disciples, to come from heaven for judgment. Behold the one who lay in the manger was diminished, but did not lose himself: he took what he was not, but remained what he was. Behold, we have the infant Christ, let us grow with him. The superstitious solemnity of the January calends.

Let this be sufficient for your love. Since I see many here because of the solemnity, I must speak. The calends of January are coming. You are all Christians; by God's blessing, the city is Christian. Here are two kinds of people, Christians and Jews. Do not do the things that God hates: iniquity through play, wickedness through jest. Let men not make themselves judges, lest they come into the hands of the true Judge. Listen, you are Christians, you are members of Christ. Think about what you are, think about how much you were bought for. Finally, if you want to know what you are doing: I say this to those who do it. Do not take it as an insult if this displeases you: I say it to those who do it and those it pleases. Do you want to know what you are doing, and what kind of sorrow you are causing us? Are the Jews doing it? Even so, be ashamed so it doesn't happen. On the birthday of John, that is six months earlier (for so many months are between the herald and the Judge), from the pagan superstitious solemnity, Christians came to the sea and baptized themselves there. I was absent: but, as I heard, through the discipline of Christian presbyters, they gave some worthy and ecclesiastical discipline. People murmured about this and some said: Why wasn't it announced to us? If we had been warned earlier, we would not have done it. The presbyters themselves should have warned us, we would not have done it. Behold, the bishop warns; I admonish, I forewarn, I announce. Let the bishop be heard commanding, let the bishop be heard admonishing, let the bishop be heard begging, let the bishop be heard adjuring. I adjure by Him who is born today: I adjure, I enjoin, let no one do it. I absolve myself. It is better to be heard admonishing than to feel sorrowful.

Sermons - Sermon 196A

SERMON 196/A He who worships the humble Christ finds the exalted. Circumcision is justification.

[Dearest brethren,] the sublimity of our Lord Jesus Christ, being invisible, became visible humility. His sublimity does not have a day, his frailty accepted having a day. Where there is humility, there is frailty. But the frailty of God is strength to the humble. From his sublimity he made the world, from his humility he conquered the world. Unless Christ deigned to be humble, today no faithful one would be signed with Christ's sign. You have heard the Apostle say about him, because, being true God, he did not consider it robbery to be equal to God. How was it robbery to be what he was by nature? But what did he do? He emptied himself, taking the form of a servant. And this is what we celebrate today. Many despised the humble Christ and did not reach the height of Christ. But those who worshipped the humble found the exalted. Therefore, on the eighth day according to that custom, the Lord was circumcised and a sacrifice was offered for him as Moses commanded. The Jews hear and say: Christ is ours. But if you recognized him, why did you kill him? Great is the dispensation, dearest! About to take away circumcision, he accepted circumcision. He accepted the shadow, about to give light. He accepted the figure, about to fulfill the truth. Indeed, that very circumcision which was instituted so that an infant might be circumcised on the eighth day signified Christ. But you say to me: How are we circumcised in heart by Christ's resurrection? So what was figurated in the body was to be done in the heart. For the apostle Paul says about the Lord Christ who was delivered for our offenses and raised for our justification. Circumcision is justification. What is circumcision? To put away the affection of the flesh, to be circumcised from the world, to serve God and to have truth in heart. For what is added to a man from whose flesh a small piece is removed? But it is a sign. It is a sign where truth is in Christ. How in Christ? I have already said. By his justification, we are justified. Therefore, by his justification we are circumcised in heart. Look to the eighth day, the Lord's day. Christ died on the sixth day of the week, was buried on the seventh, and rose again the next day. See therefore on what after the Sabbath he rose again, which is the first of the week. Therefore, if any Jew heard Christ was circumcised, let him come and be circumcised by Christ. But he says to me: I do not depart from my law. Would Christ himself not have accepted circumcision? Would he have condemned what he commanded to observe? Where would it be that he gave the law himself? Or do you think that Christ began to exist when he was born of Mary? Christ existed before his mother, because he created her for himself as mother. He was before Abraham. I tell you a little: He was before Adam. And this I tell you a little: He was before heaven and earth, because all things were made through him. Therefore do you think that someone other than the Only-Begotten of the Father, the Word of God, gave the law through Moses? What magnitude did the old Simeon see in the small one? What his mother carried, he saw. What he understood ruled the world.

Tell me what Elisha did when he resurrected the son of his hostess? In that figure, the law was given. What was done? It was announced to him: the child is dead. He gave his staff to his servant and said: Go and place it upon the dead one. The servant took his staff, placed it upon the dead one, and he did not rise. Elisha himself came, conformed himself to the dead one, and resurrected the dead one. Pay attention, brothers, pay attention. The staff through the servant, that is, the law through Moses. The staff was placed upon the dead one and he did not rise. The Jews could receive the law, but they could not live by it. Therefore, they must not despise the humility of Christ; they must not despise him set in weakness. Behold, he is believed and conceived, he is clothed in flesh, born of a woman, wrapped in swaddling clothes, laid in a manger. Do not despise him for doing such things. He conforms himself to the dead one. Watch from where you laugh. If you are converted, you will live there. The humility of Christ conformed itself to us as if to dead ones for reviving. Through this, we have meanwhile risen through faith and someday truly through the flesh. But I, he says, hold what God handed over to Moses. Hear what God says through the Prophet. What does God speak to Jeremiah? Behold, the days are coming, says the Lord, and I will establish a new Covenant upon the house of Jacob. Leave the old, take the new, and you see that you must leave circumcision and carnal unleavened bread and the carnal Sabbath and carnal sacrifices. Listen to how the New Covenant is promised: Behold, the days are coming, says the Lord, and I will establish a new Covenant with them, not according to the Covenant which I gave their fathers when I brought them out of the land of Egypt, when the law was commanded, when the people were led through the desert. Not according to that Covenant I will give the new one. Do not, therefore, bear the old tunic. It crucified Christ. Your father crucified, you hated. He with his hand, you with your heart, both fulfilled the crime. Therefore, let your father displease you and listen to what your Lord has done. For the solemnity of the day and brevity, a few words will suffice for you. These indeed are the lesser days in the year in which Christ was born, but in which the days begin to lengthen. Therefore, let Christ grow in your hearts. Advance and believe so that you may attain eternal life.

Sermons - Sermon 197

SERMO 197 On the Kalends of January, Against the Pagans

FRAGMENTA Found in the collection of Bede and Florius on Paul.

"Behold the creator of the world." For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness. Whose, if not also of the Jews and the Gentiles? But it might be said: Why against the ungodliness of the Gentiles? For the Gentiles never received the Law and thus have not become transgressors. Rightly, the wrath of God is revealed against the Jews, to whom the Law was given, and who did not wish to observe it; but it was not given to the Gentiles. Look, brothers, and understand how he shows all to be guilty, and all in need of salvation and the mercy of God. For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men who hold the truth in unrighteousness. See how he did not say: They do not have the truth, but: They, he says, hold the truth in unrighteousness. And as if you were to ask, saying: How can those who did not receive the Law have the truth? He follows: Because what is known of God is manifest in them. And how could what is known of God be manifest in them who did not receive the Law? He follows and says: For the invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made; even His eternal power and Godhead. Surely we understand, being understood are seen. Why would he regard the works and not seek the maker? Do you regard the fruit-bearing earth, do you regard the sea full of its animals, do you regard the air full of birds, do you regard the sky shining with stars, and the rest, and not seek the creator of such a work? But you say to me: I see these, but I do not see Him. For these things to be seen, He gave the eyes of the body, for Him to be seen, He gave the mind. For you do not see the soul of a man either. Just as you understand from the movements and administration of the body the soul, which you do not see: so from the administration of the whole world, and from the government of the very souls, understand the Creator. But it is little to understand. For they understood; and see what the Apostle says: Because, knowing God, they did not glorify Him as God, nor were they thankful; but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened. By what merit, if not pride? For see the following: Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools. For they ought not to have arrogated to themselves what He had given, nor pride themselves on that which they had not from themselves, but from Him. Which they surely ought to have rendered, that they might be healed by Him who gave that they might see for holding what they could see. For if they did this, they would maintain humility, and could be purified, and cling to that most blessed contemplation. But because there was pride in them, a false and deceitful and proud one placed himself among them, promising them that their souls would be purified by certain stages of pride, and made them worshipers of demons. Hence all sacred things celebrated by the pagans, which they say avail for the purification of their souls. And hear what the Apostle says consequently, because they received these as a reward for pride; because they did not glorify God in the manner He should be glorified. And they changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man. Now there are idols. And indeed those of all the Greeks and other nations, which have the likeness of men. But there is no greater and more superstitious idolatry than that of the Egyptians; for Egypt flooded the world with such figments, as the Apostle afterward says. When he had said: Made like to corruptible man; he added: and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things. Indeed, brothers, have you seen in other temples an idol with a dog’s head or a bull’s head, and effigies of other irrational animals? For these are the idols of the Egyptians. The Apostle encompassed both kinds: Made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things. Therefore God gave them up to uncleanness through the lusts of their own hearts, to dishonor their own bodies between themselves. Their misfortunes are from the impiety of pride. These sins indeed, because they are from pride, are not only sins but also punishments. For when he says: God gave them up, it is already a vengeance of a certain sin, that they should do these things. Who exchanged the truth of God for a lie. What is: Exchanged the truth of God for a lie? In the likeness, surely, of an image of corruptible man, and of birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things. And lest anyone say: I do not worship an idol, but what the idols signify; he immediately added: And worshiped and served the creature rather than the Creator. Understand wisely. They either worship the idol, or the creature. He who worships an idol converts the truth of God into a lie. For the sea is truth; but Neptune is a lie made by man, the truth of God converted into a lie: because God made the sea; man, however, the idol of Neptune. Thus God made the sun; man, by making an idol of the sun, converted the truth of God into a lie. But lest they say: I do not worship an idol, but I worship the sun; therefore he said: They worshiped the creature rather than the Creator. But perhaps someone will say: Even if He was humbly born, He wished to boast in the nobility of His disciples. He did not choose kings, or senators, or philosophers, or orators: rather, He chose common people, the poor, the unlearned, fishermen. Peter a fisherman, Cyprian an orator. Unless a fisherman faithfully preceded, an orator would not humbly follow. Let no one among the lowly despair of themselves: let them hold onto Christ, and their hope will not be in vain.

What did Simon want, other than to be praised in miracles, to be exalted in pride? For it was pride that compelled him to believe that the gift of the Holy Spirit could be bought with money. The Apostle, contrary to this pride, remaining in humility, intensely fervent in spirit at midday, shining with wisdom, says: Neither the one who plants nor the one who waters is anything, but only God who gives the growth. For he had said: I planted, Apollos watered; but God gave the growth. And again: Was Paul crucified for you? Or were you baptized in the name of Paul? See how he refuses to be cultivated for Christ and does not wish to present himself to the fornicating soul instead of the bridegroom. Isn't planting and watering considered great? But neither the one who plants nor the one who waters is anything. How did he fear? He does not consider himself anything for the salvation of those whom he desired to build up in Christ.

Neither did the Apostle himself want hope to be placed in him, but in the truth which he proclaimed. What was said through him was better than he through whom it was proclaimed. Although, he says, "If we." This is little; listen further: he says, "Or an angel from heaven should preach to you something different from what you have received, let him be accursed." He saw that a false mediator could transform itself into an angel of light and announce something false. Just as proud men wish to be adored as God, to arrogate whatever they can to themselves, to name themselves, and, if possible, to surpass Christ himself in glory: so the devil and his angels. The Donatists have Donatus instead of Christ. If they were to hear some pagan detracting from Christ, they might perhaps bear it patiently, more so than if they were to hear someone detracting from Donatus. For Christ himself speaks in his saints, as the Apostle says: Do you seek a proof of Christ speaking in me? And although he says: Neither he who plants is anything, nor he who waters; but God who gives the growth; not because he wanted himself to be loved, but because he wanted Him in himself to be loved: he nevertheless bears witness to some, saying: Because you received me as an angel of God, as Christ Jesus. Therefore, in all his saints, he himself is to be loved, who said: I was hungry, and you gave me to eat. For he did not say: You gave them; but: You gave me. Such is the love of the head for his body!

What is Juno? Juno, they say, is the air. For a long time now it has been inviting us to worship the sea in Neptune, to worship the earth in the image of the ground: now it invites us to worship the air. These are the elements by which this world consists. Therefore, the Apostle Paul, proposing this in his Epistle: Beware, he says, lest anyone deceive you through philosophy and vain deceit, according to the elements of this world. For he referred to those who explain idols as if more wisely. Therefore, when he mentioned philosophy, in the same place he said, according to the elements of this world: not warning against any worshipers of idols, but against more learned interpreters of signs.

Sermons - Sermon 198 augm

Sermon 198, augmented.

Treatise of Bishop Augustine against the pagans. On Avoiding Worldly Joy.

We admonish your charity, since we see you have gathered as if solemnly and assembled at this hour and in this place more frequently than usual, so that you may remember again and again what you were just singing, that your tongue may not be noisy while your heart is mute, but what you sounded with your voice to each other’s ears, you may cry out with affection to the ears of God. For you sang: Save us, O Lord our God, and gather us from among the nations, that we may confess your holy name. And now, if the festivity of the nations which is happening today in secular and carnal joy, in the noise of the vainest and most shameful songs, in the celebration of that false festivity itself, if what the nations are doing today does not delight you, be gathered from among the nations.

Mixed in body with the nations, you are separated by the dissimilarity of life.

You certainly sang, and the sound of the divine song is still fresh in your ears: Save us, O Lord our God, and gather us from the nations. Who can be gathered from the nations unless he is made safe? Those, therefore, who are mixed with the nations are not safe. But those who are gathered from the nations are saved by the safety of faith, the safety of the spirit, the safety of God's promises, the safety of good hope, the safety of the most sincere charity. Therefore, he who believes, hopes, and loves is not immediately to be called safe. For it matters what he believes, what he hopes for, what he loves. For no one lives in any life without these three affections of the soul: believing, hoping, loving. If you do not believe what the nations believe, do not hope for what the nations hope for; do not love what the nations love, you are gathered from the nations. Nor let the bodily mixture in such a separation of mind terrify you. For what is so separated as that they believe demons are gods, you believe God who is the true God? They hope for the vain things of the world, you hope for eternal life in Christ? They love the world, you love the maker of the world? Therefore, he who believes, hopes, and loves differently, let him prove it by his life, show it by his deeds. Today, will you celebrate the New Year with a pagan, play dice with a pagan, get drunk with a pagan? How do you believe, hope, and love differently? How can you sing with a clear conscience: Save us, O Lord our God, and gather us from the nations? For you are separated from the nations, mixed in body with the nations by a different life. And see how great this separation is if you now do it, if you now prove it. For already our Lord God Jesus Christ, the Son of God, who became man for us, gave the price for us. Therefore, if he has already given the price, he gave it to redeem, to gather from the nations. But if you mix with the nations, you do not want to follow him who redeemed. You mix with them in life, deeds, heart, hoping for such things, believing such things, loving such things. You are ungrateful to your redeemer and do not acknowledge your price, the blood of the spotless lamb. Therefore, to follow your redeemer, who redeemed you with his blood, do not mix with the nations in the likeness of customs and deeds. They give gifts, you give alms. For we do not say to you, brothers: "They give, do not you give"; indeed give more than they give, but as those who believe differently, hope differently, love differently, because we do not say to you: "They believe, do not you believe; they hope, do not you hope; they love, do not you love"; but we say to you: "They believe that, you believe this; they hope for that, you hope for this; they love that, you love this; they give that or to those, you give this or to these." Therefore, they give gifts, you give alms. They commit themselves to the chances of earthly things, you commit yourself to the words of the divine Scriptures. They run to the theater, you to the church. They get drunk, you fast. If you do these things, you have truly sung: Save us, O Lord our God, and gather us from the nations. Now those who willingly heard what I said certainly stand with those who did not willingly hear, and yet they are already gathered from the nations, they are mixed with the nations.

"From those who serve demons, let us separate ourselves by life and morals."

I now speak to Christians: if you believe what the pagans believe, if you hope for what the pagans hope for, if you love what the pagans love, live as the pagans live; but if you believe differently, hope differently, love differently, live differently, and demonstrate your distinct faith and hope and charity by distinct lives. What do the pagans believe? As I have already said, they call gods those whom the Apostle Paul shows us otherwise: "For that which the pagans sacrifice," he says, "they sacrifice to demons and not to God. I do not want you to become partners with demons." Therefore, the morals of the pagans delight their gods. But he who said, "I do not want you to become partners with demons," wanted us to separate ourselves from those who serve demons by life and morals. Indeed, those demons delight in songs of vanity, delight in nonsensical noise and the various obscenities of theaters, the madness of the circus, the cruelty of the amphitheater, and the fierce contests of those who engage in disputes and quarrels up to enmities on behalf of pestilent men, for a mime, for an actor, for a charioteer, for a hunter. Doing these things, they as if place incense to demons from their hearts. For the deceptive spirits rejoice in the deceived, and they are fed by the evil morals and vile and infamous life of those they have deceived and seduced. But if you say to a man: "You love the charioteer," he responds: "Of course, I love him," because, even if he denies it, he is caught favoring him, shouting for him, quarreling for him. And if you add: "You love him very much," he will respond: "Very much." If you say to him: "Be like him and your sons," immediately if he appears respectable, he will respond indignantly: "Why have you insulted me?" "Do I insult you when I say: Be like him, or do you insult yourself who love such a one that you fear to be like?" On the contrary, you love the martyrs. So, just as you say to a pagan: "You love this charioteer," and he says: "I love him," and he is not ashamed, thus say to a Christian: "You love Cyprian," he responds: "I love him," say to him: "Be like him," he responds: "May God grant this!" How sincere this love is, how chaste, how secure, especially for one already crowned! For the love concerned with one still struggling is anxious, but nevertheless all love him who has already conquered, who already sits at the right hand of the Father, who from above, as the master of the contest that Paul recounts, not only watches those struggling but also helps those enduring.

"Fear and love compel you."

Therefore, many will struggle today in their hearts with the word they have heard. For we said: "Do not give gifts, give to the poor." It is little that you give only, give even more. Do you not wish to give more? At least give some. But you say to me: "When I give gifts, I also receive." What then?

When you give to the poor, do you receive nothing? Surely you do not believe what the gentiles believe, surely you do not hope for what the gentiles hope for, surely you do not love what the gentiles love. Behold, if you say that you receive nothing when you give to the poor, you become like the gentiles, and you sang in vain: "Save us, O Lord our God, and gather us from the gentiles." You have forgotten what will be said to those who gave: "Come, you blessed of My Father, inherit the kingdom," and what will be said to those who do not believe: "Depart into the eternal fire," which is prepared for the devil and his angels. If He would give the kingdom to these, and give nothing to those but only leave them, you ought to love what He gives and not wish to be deprived of such a great and ineffable good. But it is not only that He sends these into the kingdom and not those, but also says: "Depart into the eternal fire, which is prepared for the devil and his angels." Fear and love compel you. If you love less what is promised, fear what is threatened. For you begin with fear, you are perfected in love. By fearing the fires you do what is said, but as long as you do it by fearing, you act as a servant; but when you act out of love, you already act freely. Be a good servant to deserve to be free. Begin to fear whom you will love, whom when you have loved you will not fear. For it is written: "There is no fear in love; but perfect love casts out fear." This the apostle John says. But if perfect love casts out fear, let fear first possess the heart; love will be born there, and thus, as much as love grows, fear will decrease; as it increases, it will diminish; when it is perfected, it will be expelled. For there is no fear in love; but perfect love casts out fear. Do it if you love; if you do not yet love, do it if you fear; but if you neither fear nor love, you will sing in vain: "Save us, O Lord our God, and gather us from the gentiles." For you are still gentiles, bearing the yoke with the unbelievers. Your Lord did for you what He did, do you for the pagans because, when the Lord did for you, you were not yet a Christian. Let them hear, whether they want it or not, who believe otherwise, hope otherwise, love otherwise: we say what we know; let them do what they want, only let them know that they do not do anything in vain whatever they do. For there is reward not only for good deeds but also for evil deeds. The reward for evil deeds is called punishment, the reward for good deeds is the crown.

"Before you were a Christian, the Lord suffered for you."

What, then, did your Lord do for you before you were a Christian? He suffered for you. And what does He say in the Psalms? "But I, when they were troublesome to me, clothed myself in sackcloth and humbled my soul with fasting." If you understand this figuratively, it is as though the Lord fasted by not taking the impious into His body. And in that fasting, He was hungry when, finding no fruit on that tree, He cursed it, and it withered. What does it mean when He says, "I clothed myself in sackcloth"? As if hiding His power within the infirmity of the flesh, He presented that same mortal flesh to the eyes of His persecutors. In that flesh, which He took from the old state of our mortality without any sin of His own, He bore our sins. And the sackcloth pertains to sins because of the haircloth made from the hairs of goats, which will be placed on the left, unless they first convert into lambs. Therefore, in that form of a servant, sinning in nothing, and hence owing nothing to death, He nonetheless paid on our behalf what He did not owe, to free us from our debts. In that sackcloth, He carried our price. For from the sackcloth, even the diminutive "small sack" is derived. But He carried our great price in the sackcloth with which He clothed Himself, opposing it to His persecutors, from whose impiety He humbled His soul with fasting. Indeed, when He hung on the cross, the sack was pierced by a lance, and the price of the world flowed out. So, your Lord suffered for you before you were a Christian, to buy you and make you a Christian.

Let us fast for the nations. But what does Scripture say? Just as he laid down his life for us, so we ought to lay down our lives for the brothers. If we cannot yet suffer for the nations, we can at least fast for the nations. How far are you from the imitation of your Lord! And when you fast, how far you still are! And it is good for you to draw near. But how do you shudder at that very perfection, whose step you fear, a step so close, so humble! This step is almost on the ground—I do not know if it should even be called a step—that you are unwilling to ascend. For what is great in fasting at this time, in eating late on such a short day? It is not great, it is not at all laborious. Concern for a single occupation often makes one do what you are unwilling to offer to God with devotion. Because the Church of God wills it, you do not wish to fast. If you were playing a game, you would fast, and you would fast to avoid rising from defeat. To win, fearing that you might be defeated by a man for money, you would fast, and you do not fast, fearing not that you might be defeated in spirit by the devil. For nothing is easier than fasting on such short days. But on the Kalends of January, you do not wish to fast. Test yourselves so that you may rejoice in yourselves, so that we may rejoice in you. How small a temptation! Yet it tests the Christian heart.

Let the longing for Christ burn in our hearts.

You hear the sermon now: you are suspended, invigorated by the word of God, and the exhortation itself warms the heart. We light something in your minds: we see it, we recognize it, but let that flame take strength. For from this place, after the sermon is finished shortly, you will go out to the storms and to the cold of the world. You know that this world seems to burn in perverse festivity: the winds are cold, where it is to be feared that Christian hearts may freeze. Therefore, brothers, as I said, let the strength of your heart grasp the divine word. If it takes hold, those storms which you are about to experience outside shortly will rather excite a greater flame - they will not extinguish it -, if it is not a small spark that can be extinguished. If your heart burns like chaff now, when you cry out, when you love, when you rejoice in the word of God, you will go out shortly, and it will be extinguished with a single breath of mouth, when it is said to a man: "Are you really going to fast today?". It will be extinguished immediately, because it had begun to burn like chaff. But if it burns like coals of fire, no matter how much perverse persuasion of contrary winds exists, they will increase the fire and excite it more intensely. But they burn like coals, who have come back to life. For coals, when they burn, appear to come back to life from the dead. Many also use this saying commonly; when they send for lighting, they say: "Bring the live ones", which they mean to understand as burning. Hence, naturally, they signify the extinguished ones as if they were dead. Therefore, if you have revived with the fervor of Christ's charity, let your desire for Him burn in your hearts in such a way that no breath of dissenters extinguishes it. For I know what you will experience when you leave here, and thanks be to God that you have gathered. For the fact that you gather more frequently these days does not displease us, on the contrary, it even pleases us. For you have found a way, because those whose habits are not like yours hurry to other things and engage themselves in various vain pleasures, and thus they grant you leisure and freedom, so that what has been said may be fulfilled in you: Save us, O Lord our God, and gather us from among the nations. Therefore, you are gathered now; even if you go out and are mixed with them through bodily conversation, yet you do not consent to their evil and trivial matters, you will remain gathered from among the nations, wherever you are bodily. And would that you suffered from the wicked detractors only in the streets, and not even in your own homes! The father wishes to fast, the son does not, or the son wishes, the father does not; or the husband wishes, the wife does not want to, or she wishes and he does not. For he who does not want, and therefore does not want because he considers this day a festival, is a contrary breath: but let him burn in such a way that not only can he not be extinguished, but that that person may also be ignited by him. The festivals of the pagans arouse a new pain in the Christians. My brethren, if you understand well what you hear, I do not doubt that you feel sorrow for those who are still held in that madness. You feel sorrow for them because perhaps you too were once held by such madness; and now your heart is healthy compared to their madness, and you grieve compassionately but do not grieve with despair. For if it was possible for you to be changed so that what you loved yesterday you do not love today, it is also possible for him. Therefore, as long as he is such and you grieve for him, pray for him. And in order for your prayer to be heard, fast for him and give alms, and spend for him the day that you cherish - he who does not cherish himself dissipates it in contrary ways: for whoever loves iniquity hates his own soul - so that he may also come to hate iniquity, loving his soul, and inwardly grieve with you for others, and pray and fast for them with you.

Indeed, brethren, although other days too occupy them with distractions, it is especially during their festivals that a greater license for trivialities stimulates them to greater love of the world and the destruction of pleasures. For when one does it in his home, in the cooler neighborhoods he raves less; but when everyone does it, they inflame each other. But I have already told you: their ardor is your coldness. All love is ardor. But it matters what is loved. When the heart burns for the world, it is cold to God. So let it grow cold to the world, let it burn for God.

Therefore, when they do these things more fervently and more festively, as they incite themselves to wickedness against themselves, let them incite you to mercy for them. Indeed, they must always be mourned, as long as they are pagans, as long as they follow vanities, as long as they are devoted to demons. As long as they wish to worship what they have made, forgetting by whom they were made, they must always be mourned. But during their festivals, they excite a new grief. When you see them dissolving into various follies, into the pleasures of luxury, into immoderate drunkenness, into gambling and manifold insanities, let their new foolishness bring you new grief, if you are a Christian, if you are compassionate, because even when you were not what you are, the Church had compassion on you, which was still then in few numbers. Now that it has grown mature and widely spread in the name of Christ, should they not be mourned more who are still hard of heart, loving vanity and seeking lies? For those few who remain separated from the human race by some most stubborn obstinacy, greater sorrow is due, because a greater sickness causes them to vanish and they are not healed by the authority of such great medicine.

"Christians should not go to the theaters!" And if only we were mourning for the pagans alone! We would almost not mourn for anyone. Christians should not go to the theaters: the pagans flee from there, even if not out of love for the truth, at least out of shame for the small number. Surely we must offer a greater sacrifice of prayers with sharper pain in our hearts, so that those who are called Christians may deserve to be corrected. So it is not impudent, brothers, rather it is very appropriate to fast, especially for those who toil because they want to, who, if they did not wish it, would not toil. For they are oppressed by their sins and they rejoice in their most polluted pleasures, and they do not hear the voice saying: Come to me, all you who labor and are burdened, and I will refresh you. They do not wish to be refreshed in the sweetness of Christ and think they are refreshed in the satiety of lust. That is not refreshment, but ruin. Nor should you celebrate the Christian feast days like drunkards, although fasts should be relaxed because of the sacrament of joy. However, it is one thing to signify joy by relaxing the fast, another thing to repel justice by the burden of the heart. The Lord says, the truth says: Do not let your hearts be weighed down with carousing and drunkenness. It is foolish and irreverent to want to please the martyrs for the reason that if they had not despised such things, they would never have attained the glory of martyrdom.

"Not all pagans think the same about idols." But perhaps you are not going to suffer pagans of this kind. For some of their own despise those given to the wickedness of pleasures and drunkenness and say: "Just as you have bad Christians, so we have bad pagans. For good pagans, see what they are." Then they name the wise and philosophers of the world, as if endowed with excellent doctrine. But do not be frightened by them. Greatness is one thing, swelling is another. For what swells also seems great, but it is not healthy. Hear the Apostle saying: Beware lest anyone seduce you through philosophy and vain deceit according to the tradition of men, according to the elements of this world and not according to Christ, because in him dwells all the fullness of divinity bodily, and you are made full in him, who is the head of all principality and power. For as they interpret their idols skillfully and as if wisely, they flee to the elements of the world. You rebuke someone because he worships idols, and it is evident that he adores the idol: he is convicted in fact, and there he has his affection - in that idol, namely -, he places his hearing there, but what does a supposedly more skilled and wiser pagan say to you? "Unskilled pagans do this, to worship the idol as an idol, just as some of yours worship columns in the church."

"The temple of your prayer is your heart."

Therefore I say, brothers: do not act in a way that pagans may mock us; enter the church in such a way that you do not give pagans a reason not to enter the church. For the church is entered because of fraternal congregation. For the temple of your prayer is your heart. Clean the place where you pray, and you will be heard. For if you cleanse the visible place where you make your prayer, it is not for the eyes of God - for He sees everything as He has created everything - but so that your own eyes are not offended and do not divert your intention, how much more should you cleanse the place where you invoke and by which you invoke God? Your inner room, where you enter and shut the door, as the Lord Himself says, that is, your sense of body, should be closed against bodily temptations; but fraternal congregation ignites fervor in praying and praising God. Just as if some weight were to be moved, and that which is called a work chant were to be sung, wouldn't the multitude of those chanting and cooperating in unison and in the same effort even stir your weak strength, so that you would also want to hold the rope and rejoice in the fellowship of that work? Thus, the gathering of brothers sharpens charity. And every person prays inwardly when he prays well, just as the Lord answered the Samaritan woman: He said, The hour is coming and now is, when neither on this mountain nor in Jerusalem will you worship the Father. And shortly after: He said, The hour is coming and now is, when true worshipers will worship the Father in spirit and truth. For the Father seeks such to worship Him. God is spirit, and those who worship Him must worship in spirit and truth. Therefore, if God is to be asked in spirit, let it be a dwelling place: the dweller will be present. He said, We will come to him, I and my Father, and we will make our abode with him. So come to the church, that the fervor of praying may be stirred, that the devotion of a peaceful congregation may merit a hearing from God, not because God dwells in an earthly place where He may hear you. Do not think that God only hears within such walls: He heard the martyrs in the prison. He said, What house will you build for me, or what is the place of my rest? Didn't my hand make all these? And yet He said He has a place in the heart of a pious man. For He said: Upon whom does my Spirit rest? Upon the humble and quiet and those who tremble at my words. In a great house there are hired workers, servants, and children.

Why did we say this? So that, while we criticize the pagans, we do not give them a reason to criticize us. Come to the places of the martyrs in such a way that the visit results in a holy remembrance in your hearts, and from the honor of the martyrs, let there arise an affection toward God, who did not abandon the martyrs in their tribulation, who helped them as they fought, who crowned them as they conquered. Thus you make yourselves worthy of the martyrs' prayers. Otherwise, a good servant is greatly indignant if, with the Lord being ignored, he himself is worshiped, a good servant who also became a son from being a servant. For there is a difference between one who is still a servant, yet to become a son from being a servant, and one who is already a son. A servant obeys out of fear, a son out of love. The great house has all: hirelings, servants, and sons. Hirelings are those who seek worldly benefits in the Church, about whom the Apostle says that they announce the Gospel not with pure intentions, and yet he permits it saying: Whether in pretense or in truth, Christ is proclaimed. Servants, however, are those who do what is commanded by the Lord out of fear. They are indeed of the house, and more interior in the great house than the hirelings; from these servants, sons are made when they begin to serve out of love. Therefore, as I began to say, the great house has all. What do we think the martyrs are, my brothers? God forbid we should count them among the hirelings, nor among those who are not yet sons! For they loved Christ and for His love they despised not only all worldly pleasures but also all torments, intoxicated by the cup of His Spirit about which it is said: Your intoxicating cup, how glorious it is! Therefore, a good servant, as I said, who is already called a son, does not want to be worshiped, but his Lord. Pay attention, brothers, and remember what you frequently attend, what the truth teaches in the Church. The faithful know in what order the martyrs are commemorated in the sacraments, when our vows and prayers are directed toward God; the faithful know, and the catechumens should hasten to learn. For who repels them? To whom is not open, if willing, what is closed to the indifferent?

"Paul and Barnabas rejected the honor of sacrifices." But let us observe, brothers, what good servants have done while still existing in this body, when they were honored by men and began to be worshipped as gods of the nations: Paul and Barnabas, because they performed miracles in Christ, because they exceeded the human measure, were called by the pagans, according to their custom, Barnabas as Jupiter, and Paul as Mercury, because he was more prompt in speaking, and they began to offer sacrifices to them. They so abhorred this honor that they tore their garments and taught them, as much as they could, who alone should be worshipped, in whose power they did these things. Observe these things, brothers, so that you may be strong and guarded even against more elegant pagans. Why do I say more elegant, who are in greater danger? For the more learned they seem to themselves, the more unteachable they become. For they are ashamed to learn, lest they confess their ignorance, and there is no pious humility in them, which the humble God alone came to teach. Or perhaps someone might say: "Paul and Barnabas refused the honor of sacrifices offered to them because one was called Jupiter and the other Mercury, whom the apostles detested as false gods with Christian religion, and therefore were indignant to be compared to demons or idols, not because they wanted God to be worshipped rather than themselves?" So they would say this to those wanting to sacrifice: "You are insulting us, comparing us to demons to whom we are better"; instead, they tore their garments sorrowfully and humbly admonished that such things should not be done to them nor to anyone, but that one should turn from these vanities to the one God, saying: Men, why are you doing this? We are men like you, announcing to you that you should turn from these useless things to the one who made heaven and earth and the sea and all that is in them. Saying these and similar things, they barely persuaded them not to sacrifice to them. But to show the impious more fully that they did not refuse these sacrifices because they considered it an insult to themselves but so that God alone would be honored, to whose worship they worked the most to convert everyone, consider Peter: when men marveled at his deed - rather not his, but God's - when that lame man of forty years, who sat at the beautiful gate, rose and walked by the word of God, he did not want glory to be given to himself, but to Christ, and said: Men of Israel, why do you marvel at this, or why do you look at us, as if by our own power or piety we had made this man walk? The God of Abraham and the God of Isaac and the God of Jacob, the God of our fathers, has glorified his Son, whom you handed over for judgment.

Let us observe the good angels of God. But if what men did is little, so that they wanted glory to be given not to themselves but to God, look at the angels. In Revelation, the holy angel - because there are also perverse angels, for whom and their leader the devil the eternal fire is prepared - thus the angel who did not fall through pride, but remaining in holy humility under God, not raising himself in haughtiness against God nor saying: I will place my throne on the northern side and be like the Most High, but remaining in the south, where Christ feeds and rests... For it is written: Where you feed, where you rest at noon. The southern part is indeed contrary to the northern: thus it signifies those who are cold and dark. But the south signifies the illuminated and fervent. Therefore, those who are good, as if in the south, are fervent and shine; but those who are evil, as if in the north, are cold and darkened by obscure gloom. With those in the south God feeds and rests, hence it is said: Where you feed, where you rest at noon, not with those, of whose part the devil says: I will place my throne in the north and be like the Most High. For he could not be worshipped except by such, who would think him to be a god. Therefore, that angel remaining in the south, fervent in holiness and luminous in wisdom, demonstrated certain things in Revelation to the apostle John. And he, disturbed, fell at the feet of the angel.

He who lives in holiness esteems solely the glory of God.

See, brothers, above all, to which angels humble men are similar and to which proud men are similar. For those who cause schisms and heresies desire their own name to be named and the name of Christ to be obscured, and they choose to sit in the north. For men would not follow them, having deserted the Church, as if they were Christ, unless their understanding was darkened and they were alienated from the warmth of charity. But to whom are those similar who, holding humility, choose to be cast out in the house of the Lord, rather than dwell in the tents of sinners?

What did Simon desire, if not to be praised in miracles and exalted in pride? For it was this very pride that compelled him to think that the gift of the Holy Spirit could be bought with money. Apostle Paul, contrary to this pride, in humility, remaining in the south, fervent in spirit, shining with prudence, says: "Neither he who plants is anything, nor he who waters, but God who gives the increase." And again: "Was Paul crucified for you, or were you baptized in the name of Paul?" How he refused to be worshiped in place of Christ, how he was zealous for the bridegroom and did not want to show himself to the infidel soul in place of the bridegroom! So what kind of holy men were they according to their measure - for they will be perfect like angels after the resurrection of the body - but nevertheless according to their measure, just as they themselves rejected the honor which men bestowed on them as if rightly their own, while they wanted him to be worshiped and all hearts to be turned to him, in whom they themselves also gloried, truly good and faithful servants, children, such holy angels. For even though they were still men in the flesh and placed in such temptations, they rejected the honor that was conferred on them to pride, so that only he who alone is honored without danger to the honoring one is honored in all. For where do they place themselves so that he may be honored? How do they humble themselves? Does it not seem great to plant and to water? But neither he who plants is anything, nor he who waters. He does not call himself anything for the salvation of those he wished to build up in Christ. If, therefore, men still living in the flesh do these things, how much more so the martyrs and angels! For the more holy they live, the more they love the glory of God and have their hope in him alone. For we too will be like angels, but after the resurrection. Thus said the Lord: "They will be equal to the angels of God."

Pagan priests prescribe idols to be worshiped.

Return, therefore, with me to what I had begun to narrate, and be instructed beneficially on why you are devoted to God. For that angel was revealing miraculous and mystical visions in the Apocalypse to the apostle John, servant of Christ, son of the mother Church, and made among the sons of God. But he, disturbed by a certain vision, as I had begun to say, fell at the feet of the angel. However, the angel did not accept the honor given to him by a man, which was owed to God, and said to him: "Rise, what are you doing? Worship God. For I am your fellow servant and of your brothers." Why did we say this? Consider the summation. We had begun to speak about the pagans, as if they were more learned - for they are less learned, about whom these do not wish to have any precedent - because they say to us: "You also have worshipers of columns and even sometimes of pictures." And would that we did not have them, and may the Lord ensure that we do not have them! But nevertheless, this is not what the Church teaches you. For which of their priests ever ascended and, from a high place, commanded the people not to worship idols, as we publicly proclaim in Christ, so that columns or stones of buildings in holy places or even pictures are not worshiped? Rather, their own priests turned to idols to offer sacrifices for the people, and still desire to offer them.

"Concerning the images of the stars and their worship."

"They say, 'We do not worship idols, but what is signified by the idol.' I ask what idols signify, I ask what the idol of the sun signifies: is it anything other than the sun? Indeed, interpretations of other idols may perhaps have hidden meanings. For now, let us set these aside temporarily. Surely, the idol of the sun signifies nothing other than the sun, and the idol of the moon signifies the moon, and the idol of the Earth signifies the Earth. If therefore they do not worship what they see in the idol, but what the idol signifies, why, having the very things signified by those idols before their eyes, do they worship the idols instead? For if what is signified could not be seen, it would be reasonable to worship the sign instead of the thing signified. But since they see the sun which is signified by the idol of the sun, why do they turn their backs to what is signified, and their faces to the sign that signifies it? For if they did not make idols of the things they see, and only made them for the things they do not see, they could deceive the less wise and say: 'Look, we worship the sun. But because we see it, we establish no idol for it. Similarly, as we see the moon and the stars, so we worship them; we have made no idols of them. For it is foolish to place a visible sign in a closed temple for something that can be seen and worshiped in the open sky. But since we worship the mind, or intellect, or soul, or virtue, or justice - these things are indeed invisible - we establish visible idols for them, so that by seeing and worshiping these, we may reverentially contemplate the invisible things.' But now they are most clearly convinced of being devoted to the idols themselves, and not to the things signified by the idols, since they have made idols of visible things that are obvious to the eyes of all. The idol has the sun, which if they worshiped in the sky, they would rightly be reproached for their true piety and religion. Moreover, they have reached such madness that they turn their backs to the sun and face its idol. How can you be heard, so perverse, when you turn away from it and turn to its false and deceitful image made by human hand? It is as if you come to the house of the head of the household to ask for something, and he stands in his courtyard, yet you turn your back to him and face the picture where he is painted, and pray with all your heart not to the man but to the picture, even in the presence of the man whose image the picture is. Wouldn't he have you dismissed from his house as a jester or a madman?

Nothing would be more foolish than what these people do, even if the sun were to be worshiped. But since these things are not to be worshiped, we will speak in the name of the Lord, if He grants us time and ability. But now we say these things about how they are caught in their own actions. You have made a temple for the moon, you have placed an idol for it; the moon itself rises every day, and for scarcely two or three days a month it cannot be seen: worship it, if it is to be worshiped, if you have come to such disgrace that you wish to worship the visible creature as if it were God, although the invisible creature is surely superior, which nevertheless is not to be worshiped, but only the Creator alone is to be worshiped as God. But behold, the very things you worship are before your eyes, whether it is the sun, the moon, the stars, or the earth, why do you seek their idols, when those present things themselves are to be worshiped, unless because men are devoted to the things made by their own hands, forgetting Him by whose hands they were made?"

Augustine mocks those worshipping Neptune. But now let us see how they interpret the statues. "I do not," he says, "say that the statue of Neptune is Neptune, but Neptune is something else which is signified by this image." What is Neptune? "The sea," he says. This is the entire understanding because Neptune is the sea. But the Christian neither worships that statue which you call Neptune, nor the sea which you interpret as Neptune. And whom does he worship? The one who made heaven and earth and the sea and all that is in them. But what do you say? "The sea is signified by this statue." And this is said as if it were something secret, whispered into the ear, so that it might be considered a great mystery that this statue signifies the sea, so that if anyone worships that statue, it might seem to them that they are worshipping the sea. Therefore, only those who live inland should have statues of Neptune, who do not see the sea itself, so that those who do not have the thing itself might have the sign instead of the thing. But now they have made a sanctuary of Neptune next to the sea itself, and turning their backs to the sea, they worship Neptune. Nor do the waves crashing behind them draw back to the worshipper, and what is more foolish, the one who prays wants the sea to be silent and the statue to hear, because apparently the sea, not with its salty waves, but with the foreign bronze ears, has the ability to hear. The earth is to be tended not by worshipping but by plowing.

Thus also with the image of the Earth. "Not," he says, "this which you see is worshiped, but this signifies the earth." That, even if he did not say it, would be apparent. In vain he wants to draw forth as if from a mystery what is openly proclaimed in its name. For 'Tellus' is another name for the Earth. They nonetheless call the same earth the mother, to whom they have made a temple and an image. Behold, I understand, just as with the sun, just as with the moon: there is no need for an explanation; for those images are called by the same names as the things themselves whose images they are, which we certainly see and recognize very well. Or perhaps is it that what they add, the term 'mother,' is the thing that must be learned? "She is," they say, "the mother of all that is born." And let her be the mother of all that is born: am I therefore to worship the earth for this, and not Him who said: "Let the earth produce whatever it produces"? For without His word it would not only be barren, but altogether nonexistent. What then is this person, as though the narrator of mysteries, wanting to turn us away from the Creator and convert us to the creature, what does he expound to me as a great thing, that I should worship the earth? Indeed, this is rightly said to farmers, that if they do not want to suffer hunger, they should cultivate the earth, not by worshipping but by plowing. The pagans hide their books, the Christians bring them forth.

Thus, I inquire about the statue of Juno: here we already desire a mystical interpreter. For Juno, unlike Mother Earth, does not reveal by her name what she signifies, nor is there an image of the sun or the moon. Therefore, the secret of Juno is great. What is this secret, I ask you? "This," he says, "few know." Perhaps many have heard from those few and have spoken. Perhaps their writings also reveal to those they do not wish to reveal what they worship, although our writings also reveal to them what we worship, but we do not fear. Our books are publicly sold: light does not blush. Let them buy, read, believe; or let them buy, read, mock. That Scripture knows how to hold guilty those who read and do not believe. The book is sold publicly, but He who is proclaimed in the book is not for sale. Or is He also for sale, because He exposed Himself to be bought by the nations at such a price as anyone has? Zacchaeus bought Him with half of his estate, the widow bought Him with two small coins, the poor guest bought Him by offering a cup of cold water; and He is possessed by all buyers: He is not too small for anyone, He enlarges all. Such is He who is proclaimed in the book. Buy the book yourself and read, we do not blush. Hide your sacred books in hidden caves, there is such curiosity of men that they both investigate and reveal.

We do not worship Juno, as she is a creature.

What then is Juno? "Juno, they say, is the air." Long ago they urged us to worship the sea in Neptune, to worship the earth in the image of Tellus; now they invite us to worship the air. These are the elements by which this world consists. Therefore the Apostle Paul warning in his epistle: Beware, he says, lest anyone deceive you through philosophy and empty deceit, according to the elements of this world. For he was speaking of those who explain idols as if more wisely. Therefore when he said: Through philosophy, he added in the same place: According to the elements of this world. Not just any worshippers of idols, but those who interpret signs as if more learned should be avoided. "Therefore, they say, Juno is the air." Let them call a familiar thing whatever they want: I will not worship the air, for it cannot be cultivated in the way the earth is cultivated by farmers. For the farmer works on the earth, as I said before, not by worshipping, but by working, to find fruit. But the air cannot be cultivated in this way nor is it to be worshipped. Praise the work, adore the worker. "To know," they say, "that the air is Juno, the Greeks call her thus: Hra is said in Greek; era, however often repeated, sounds like air. But we, who say that we must serve the one Creator in religion, for that reason we do not worship Juno, because it is an idol; for that reason we do not worship, because it is a creature.

"Pride of the devil must be avoided." But I ask this of them, if I worship only God, will the air be angry? For if I worship the air, God is angry; although He is always tranquil and administers and governs all that He created without any disturbance, in some ineffable way God is, however, angry. When He wants to be worshipped alone, He does not want this out of arrogance: for He alone is worthy of worship, and He does not want to be worshipped for His own exaltation, but so that man may be better. For He does not need worshippers, but you need the One who is worshipped. The prophet says, "I said to the Lord: You are my God, for You do not need my goods." Therefore, if He alone demands to be worshipped without arrogance, whoever else demands and arrogates this for himself privately, as if he deserved to be worshipped in his own right, and does not find it sufficient to be worshipped in Him who created, he demands this out of arrogance. And the arrogance of the devil must be avoided, so that we may humbly reach the height of God. For the devil alone wants to be worshipped instead of God, because he said: "I will place my throne in the north and I will be like the Most High." On the Worship of Vulcan. For what will they say about the symbol, for example, of Vulcan, to recall all the elements—since it is said there are four: earth, water, air, fire; and about the sky we have already spoken, when we spoke of the sun and moon? "Vulcan," they say, "is fire," not the ethereal fire where the sun and moon and other stars are, but this fire which is on earth adapted for the uses of men. "For this reason," they also say, "Vulcan is depicted as lame because the movement of this fire quivers as if it were limping." So what then? Since man has fire in his control, he who kindles it and extinguishes it at will, uses it as he pleases—do men have so much power over a god, and does anyone who blows out the lamp extinguish a god? I do not know whether it is worse to worship the idol itself by itself or to offer such an interpretation of it. But what is that to us? Perhaps they will even interpret invisible things: for these are visible. Let us quickly come to the security of our faith, so that we are not at all corrupted by them.

Those who offer worship to Mercury are slaves of the devil.

"Mercury, he says, I worship with intellect; intellect is not seen, it is something invisible." Certainly, we also concede that intellect is something invisible, and it is indeed invisible and such an entity that is better than the heavens, the earth, the sea, and all those things which are seen; for an invisible substance, being as it is a kind of life, is better than any visible substance, because everything visible is a body. And a great thing indeed is intellect: however, if you consider that very intellect which they say they worship, what has it done? Do not many err with great intellect? And perhaps most especially those who think that intellect should be worshipped in the image of Mercury. Therefore, if human intellect can err without God as its guide, when human intellect is sound, it does not wish to be worshipped as God, but it wishes Him to be worshipped, by whom it desires to be enlightened. For unless human intellect is enlightened by the illuminating God, it is darkened in its errors. But I ask you, what do you worship in Mercury? "Intellect," you say. Intellect is a sort of intermediate thing, because intellect, either turned away from the Creator, is darkened and becomes foolish, or turned to the Creator, is enlightened and becomes wise. But you have said an intermediate thing, when you said you worship intellect. "Yes," he says, "intermediate, for even the name Mercury sounds like one who runs in the middle." For it is said that Mercury is called as if running in the middle. Therefore, if he is worshipped for that reason, because he is an intermediate thing, why is not He rather worshipped, who recalls the intermediate intellect, as you say, to Himself, so that it may cling to Him, being suspended and turned away from the inferior things, such as the intellects of the saints, the intellects of the martyrs, and the intellects of the angels? For if the intellect were such as this angel I mentioned, illuminated by God, it repels the adoration of man from itself and advises its worshipper to rather adore God. "Worship God," it says, "for I am a fellow servant of you and of your brothers." Therefore, should you worship an intermediate intellect, from which a better intellect reproaches you? For if you worship an intermediate intellect, the enlightened intellect will reproach you. Why? Because the enlightened intellect does not wish intellect to be worshipped but rather the illuminator of intellects. Indeed, by that illumination it is benign and benevolent, and wants all intellects to turn to Him, by whom it also knows itself to be enlightened. Or perhaps does a foolish intellect want itself to be worshipped? Clearly, this is true. Beware, then, lest, when you wish to worship Mercury as intellect, you worship the devil, who has a foolish intellect. For the devil, even when he said: "I will place my seat in the north and I will be like the Most High," did not want to worship God and wanted to be worshipped as God, rising against God. But because he departed as if from the south to the north, his intellect became darkened, and because it is darkened, also proud, and because it is proud, thus he wants you, deceived, to worship Mercury, so that while you worship Mercury, you end up worshipping the devil.

"Every creature is either bodily or spiritual." May your holiness pay attention and see from human beings what we say. Apply your mind and understand. Every creature is either corporeal or spiritual. Only the Creator is spiritual; but the creature, as we have said, is either corporeal or spiritual. Pay attention, so that according to our abilities you may have as much as the Lord will assist against the pagans, not just any, but those who consider themselves more learned and interpreters of idols and who are puffed up and inflate and mock the true name of truth. Every creature, as I said, is either corporeal or spiritual. Corporeal like the earth and all that is produced in it, like the sea and all that swims or crawls in it, like the air and all that flies in it, like the sky and all that shines in it. All these creatures are corporeal. But spiritual is better than corporeal. What is the spiritual creature? That which is not perceived by the senses of the body, but by the intellect of the mind, like all souls, whether irrational as in beasts, or rational as in humans, whether deficient as in the impious, or progressing as in the converted, or perfect as in angels and archangels, thrones, dominions, principalities, powers of the higher habitation. Therefore, since a creature is either corporeal or spiritual, and a third cannot be found, the highest bodies, which are not better, are celestial. Now what is beyond - not by spaces of places, but by the nature of force - is not a body, but a spirit: a certain life, but a mutable life, because it is a creature; true immutable life, the Creator. Therefore, mutable life, that is, a spiritual creature, is also formable and illuminable, that is, it can be formed and illuminated; but immutable life, that is, the substance of the Creator itself, is creating and illuminating. The creature is indeed formed and illuminated, but the Creator forms and illuminates. Of the heavenly regions and their inhabitants.

Pay attention and understand. Therefore, every life that can be illuminated and attain wisdom, when it is of good will, loves God who illuminates it and advances turned towards Him and, clinging to Him, is formed to the integrity and perfection of wisdom, and in its kind to the fullness of blessedness: namely, the rational and intellectual life, such as is of angels, such as is of humans. Therefore, if such a life, when it is praiseworthy, loves its illuminator, every such life, through culpable will, abandoning the life that illuminates it, is darkened and becomes proud, like that of the wicked angel or wicked human: for it does not want to cleave to God, but wants, through a certain private pride, to be considered as God. Fallen and turned into this certain proud and wicked life, the archangel and his angels have become the devil and those demons, and they have taken a certain space in this murky air, where they rule over all wicked humans. Therefore the Apostle says: "According to the prince of the power of the air, who now works in the sons of disobedience." And again, exhorting us to endure the persecutions of this age: "Our struggle," he says, "is not against flesh and blood," that is, not against humans, "but against principalities," he says, "against powers, against the rulers of this world’s darkness, against the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly places." For when he said that the prince of the power of the air works in the sons of disobedience, lest they focus on humans and think they are struggling against them, through whom they suffered persecutions, and not perceive with their minds that enemy whom they should overcome in Christ: "Your struggle," he says, "is not against flesh and blood, but against principalities and powers, and rulers of this world’s darkness, and against the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly places." Moreover, lest by calling them rulers of the world he be thought to mean those as rulers of the entire creation that God made, he showed which world he meant by adding and saying: "of this darkness." And what darkness is, you can recognize. For the apostle himself said that infidels are signified by the name of darkness, when he spoke to the faithful: "For you were once darkness, but now are light in the Lord." Thus, also what he said about "in the heavenly places" must be understood, not in those higher resting places of the holy angels, where even the luminaries and stars are placed, but because this air is also called heaven, whence even the birds of the heaven are so called. Of the light which shines for the purified in spirit.

Therefore, let your holiness attend, that the mercy of the Lord may enlighten you. For we sound these things with our ears; He acts within, as we believe, as we hope from His mercy to whom we sing praises. Therefore, as I had begun to say, a soul turned away from God, as from the light of truth and as from the midday sun, finds itself in the north. The kingdom of the north, however, is the kingdom of the devil who says: "I will set my throne in the north, and I will be like the Most High"; there the hearts of men grow cold, and made cold by that flame, they cannot savor spiritual things of divine wisdom. Therefore, they begin to think only of bodies, and seek even divinity in bodies, that is, in the sea, on the earth, in the air, and primarily in celestial bodies, such as the moon, the sun, or the stars. Since the sense of sight is the most prominent among the senses of the body, whatever shines to the eyes, particularly if it stands out in the world, is thought to be great. But if someone tells them that there is something great which neither eye has seen nor ear heard, nor has entered into the heart of man, they say that nothing which cannot be seen exists. Therefore, such hearts have grown cold. If they have grown cold, they are in the north; if they are in the north, they are governed by the one who said: "I will set my throne in the north, and I will be like the Most High." But those who in any way have lifted up their hearts and sharpened their study as much as they could to see something that cannot be seen with the eyes of the body, transcending—easily indeed—the earth they tread upon and all things that are on the earth, transcending even the sea and whatever swims or creeps within it, transcending also the air and all the birds—for that too is an earthly element—transcending the entire etherial heaven with all the lights that shine therein or perhaps are hidden therein, they saw that there is something not seen, as is the mind, as is intelligence, as is reason; they also saw that this too changes and sought something immutable, moving beyond in thought and the sharpness of the mind even the spiritual creature and understood the Creator Spirit, and as if struck by the unusual brilliance of wisdom, they returned, as if to rest in the darkness of their flesh, and some of them felt the need to purify their soul, which, cleansed from all carnal desires, would become fit to obtain that which had dazzled them with its ineffable light. The devil offered himself as a mediator to those seeking purification.

Attend, my brothers, and take heed sorrowfully. They saw it necessary to undergo purification so that the light which cannot be grasped by the weak vision of the mind, when the same vision is healed, shaped, and strengthened, can be grasped. They saw the need for medicine, and as they were seeking this medicine, the devil immediately intervened because they were seeking arrogantly, boasting in their supposed doctrines, especially because they were able, if they could, with sharpness of intellect and acuity of mind, transcending all creatures, both bodily and spiritual, to reach the knowledge that there is something both spiritual and unchangeable, and from it, all things that exist both spiritually and bodily come forth; however, the Creator does not move in places, does not move in times, while bodies move in places and times; but the substance of the soul, that is, the spiritual creature, does not move indeed in places but is moved in times through the mutability of various affections, and hence to be something intermediate, because the highest God is not moved either in places or in times, while the substance of bodies, that is, the lowest creature, is moved both in places and in times. Hence, it (the soul) is intermediate because it does not move in places as God does not, but is moved in times as bodies are. Therefore, when they saw and were seeking purification, that proud devil occupied them with proud thoughts and arrogantly presented himself as a mediator, through whom it seemed to them that their souls could be purified. He persuaded them with certain signs of his pride, so that it seemed to men that the soul, which wishes to reach God, could be purified through magical arts, he established sacrileges in the temples, promising sacrilegious purification. Indeed, many images, as Scripture says, were established from the honors of men who were considered great, whether absent or dead. All these things, however, in the name of Christ, are now taken away by public laws and no longer publicly performed, while some of them were once considered public magic. But just as before there was private magic, now these things are done secretly since public performance has been forbidden.

Wise ones from the nations have come to the knowledge of God.

When, therefore, the proud and unjust enemy of souls opposed himself as a mediator, listen to the Apostle teaching why he opposed himself, namely because their pride gave him a place. Hence he admonishes, saying: "Neither give place to the devil." But how we may find their pride, let the same Apostle say. And first let us note that some of them had also attained to the knowledge of God, whom he nevertheless desired to be saved through Christ. For they had attained to the knowledge of God, but had not attained to salvation. For it is one thing to attain to the knowledge of God, quite another thing to attain to salvation, where there is also the fullness of that very knowledge, when the knower cleaves to the known. Among the Athenians, when the Apostle spoke as to pagan men, because they boasted themselves above other nations in the height of their learning, and among them was, as it were, the summit of philosophy - for there stood out the learned and wise of this world - when the Apostle, therefore, spoke among them, he did not put forth testimonies from the prophets, but from their own he brought forth neither did he keep silent about them being theirs, not ours, for, even if something good is found there, many bad things are found there, not like our prophets whose scriptures contain only good. Among the Athenians, therefore, when the Apostle spoke of God, he said: "In him," he said, "we live, and move, and have our being, as also some of your own poets have said." The invisible things of God from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made. But what sort of people they were and why they were reproved, I shall explain elsewhere: "The wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness," he says. What do we understand by "against ungodliness," if not both of the Jews and the Gentiles? But lest it be said: "Why is the wrath of God revealed against the ungodliness of the Gentiles, since you said against all? For did the Gentiles receive the law and become transgressors? It is right that the wrath of God is revealed against the Jews, to whom the law was given and who did not want to observe it; but it was not given to the Gentiles," observe, brothers, and understand how the same Apostle declares all guilty, and all in need of salvation and the mercy of God. For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, those who hold the truth in unrighteousness. Understand, brothers, see how he did not say: "They do not have the truth," but: "They hold the truth in unrighteousness." And as if you were to ask, saying: "How can they have the truth, who did not receive the law?", because what is known of God is manifest in them. How could what is known of God be manifest in them, who did not receive the law? He continues and says: "For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made; even his eternal power and Godhead," indeed we understand "clearly seen." By what are they seen? By the things that are made. From bodies, understand the soul; from the soul, understand God.

Why does man attend to works and not seek the maker? You observe the earth bearing fruit, you observe the sea full of its creatures, you observe the air filled with flying things, you observe the sky gleaming with stars, you recognize the changes of the seasons, you consider the four-part year, the leaves falling and returning to the trees, the seeds given their numbers, each thing having its measurements, its weights, all things managed according to their orders, the upper sky with total peace, the lower earth having its own kind of beauty in receding and succeeding things: considering all these, you see already all brought to life by a spiritual creature, and do you not seek the maker of such a great work? But you say to me: "I see these things, I do not see Him." Because He made something else for you whereby you might see these things, something else whereby He Himself might be seen—He gave bodily eyes to see these things, He gave a mind to see Himself— therefore you are not allowed to say in vain: "I do not see Him"; inspect these things according to understanding, and you will see the one working. For neither do you see the soul of a man; indeed, the soul of a man is not seen, but from the administration of the body, when we observe one walking, working, speaking, moving all the members according to the proper duties of each, we say: "He lives, there is in him something we do not see," and we understand it through these things we see. Therefore, just as you understand the soul, which you do not see, from the movements and administration of the body, so from the administration of the whole world and from the governance of souls, understand the Creator.

Nations have vanished in their thoughts. But it is little to understand, for they also understood, and see what the Apostle says, consider the words which I began to say from the beginning. "The wrath of God," he says, "is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who hold the truth in unrighteousness. Because that which may be known of God is manifested in them, for God has shown it to them." And as if you were asking how He manifested it, he says, "the invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even His eternal power and Godhead," that is, being understood they are seen, "so that they are without excuse." Why without excuse? Because, he says, "they hold the truth in unrighteousness," he shows how. "Because, knowing God"—he did not say "because they did not know God," but what did he say?—"because, knowing God, they did not glorify Him as God, nor were thankful, but they became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened." By what merit, if not by pride? For see what follows: "Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools." They ought not to have arrogated to themselves what He had given, nor boast of what they had not from themselves, but from Him: which was certainly to be restored, so that in keeping what they had been able to see, they might be healed by Him who had granted them to see. For if they had done this, they would have maintained humility, and could have been purified and adhered to that most blessed contemplation. For to such men the true and truthful physician, the mediator, the conqueror of pride, the exalter of humility, would be revealed. But you say, “Was He not yet humbly born?” But He would have been revealed by prophecy, just as He was revealed to Abraham—for the Lord Himself said, “Abraham desired to see my day, and he saw it, and was glad”—just as He was revealed to other fathers and prophets. For thus they were saved by faith in the One who was to be born and to suffer, just as we are saved, having been born and suffered. But it is no wonder since He revealed Himself to their humility and concealed from their pride. Because there was pride in them, a false and deceitful and proud one interposed himself, who promised them by some arts of pride that their souls would be purified, and made them worshippers of demons, that is, of evil angels. Hence all the sacraments that are celebrated by pagans, which they say avail for the purification of their souls.

God delivers idol worshippers to the desires of their hearts. And listen to the Apostle consequently saying this, that for the reward of their pride they received this, because they did not honor God as God should be honored. Their foolish heart, he says, was darkened. Claiming to be wise, they became fools, indeed through that false mediator, who rejoices in idols, who rejoices when unclean animals are fed – that is, the pigs which the younger son fed, having gone far away from his father: for just as the Lord is near to those who have broken hearts, that is, the humble, so the Lord is far from those who have exalted hearts, that is, the proud. Claiming, he says, to be wise, they became fools, and changed the glory of the incorruptible God into the likeness of the image of corruptible man. The idols are already there, and those indeed of all the Greeks and other nations, which have the likeness of men. But there is no idolatry greater or more superstitious than that of the Egyptians – for Egypt flooded the world with such images as the Apostle subsequently describes –, when he said: Into the likeness of the image of corruptible man, he added: And of birds and quadrupeds and serpents. For, brothers, have you seen in other temples idols with the head of a dog or a bull, or the figures of other irrational animals? Has anyone seen these things in any temple except in the temple of Isis? For the idols are of the Egyptians. The Apostle embraces both kinds when he says: Into the likeness of the image of corruptible man and of birds and quadrupeds and serpents. Therefore God gave them up in the lusts of their hearts to impurity, to dishonor their bodies among themselves. These evils come from impiety. For the head was pride. Moreover, these following sins are not only sins but also punishments. For when he says: God gave them up, it is already a matter of retribution for some sin, so that these things happen, but these punishments are still sins as well. Why? Because they can still return from them if they wish. But truly, when it comes to punishment, it is no longer permitted to return from it; that will be the punishment which will no longer be called sin. For in these intermediate states, they are both punishments and sins. The first, which is pride, is a sin alone, not yet a punishment. Those that follow are both sins and punishments. Whoever does not want to return from them will come to the punishment which is no longer a sin but the penalty for all sins. Because the first sin is pride, it is clearly written elsewhere: The beginning of all sin is pride. And how is the root of all evils avarice? Because wanting more than God is avarice, wanting more than is sufficient is avarice. For God alone is enough for the soul. Hence it is said by Philip: Show us the Father, and it is enough for us. But what is more prideful than the one who, presuming on himself, abandons God? What is more covetous than the one for whom God is not enough? Therefore, pride itself is avarice in the origin of sins. Therefore, the soul, as an adulteress, having abandoned the one true and lawful husband, God, prostitutes itself to many false gods, that is, demons, and is in no way satisfied. The Romans worshiped many gods, with the devil rejoicing.

How many gods did the Romans worship! At first, forsaking the one true and unchangeable God, they worshipped gods as if they were their own. They began to fight with other nations, and believing that they were defended by their gods, they persevered and sought to violate the gods of others with certain sacrifices, and increased the number of their own gods by adopting the sacrilegious rites of either the subjected or to-be-subjected nations. Thus, they invited canine faces, and shapes of bulls and serpents and birds and all the monstrosities of the Egyptians, and thus they appeased them as if propitiating them. For it is also read among their authors that the gods of the Egyptians were even adverse to the Roman gods not long before the time of the incarnation of the Lord. For just as the Apostle says about the Cretans: A certain one of their own prophets said: "Cretans are always liars, evil beasts, lazy gluttons," so too can we say: A certain one of their own prophets said: all kinds of gods and beasts and barking Anubis against Neptune and Venus and against Minerva they hold weapons. For it seemed unworthy to this poet that the dog-headed Egyptians would fight against the human images of the Romans. Yet the demons fought amongst themselves, the Egyptians' for the Egyptians, and the Romans' for the Romans. However, to possess both peoples altogether, they made an agreement among themselves, and everything began to be worshiped by the Romans. For the Apostle says: “Not that an idol is anything, but that what the pagans sacrifice, they sacrifice to demons and not to God. I do not want you to become partners with demons.” Just as these people deceive themselves, saying: “...,” as if you would disdain the idol that the craftsman made, because it has no life. You would disdain the idol if you despised the demon who delights in the idol. Therefore, it is pointless to interpret the image as a representation of the creature, because the creature does not rejoice in such worship by men unless it is a sinful creature which, out of pride, demands undeserved honor, deceitfully terrifying human frailty. God handed them over, he says, to the desires of their hearts in impurity, so that they might dishonor their bodies among themselves, they who exchanged the truth of God for a lie, and worshiped and served the creature rather than the Creator, who is blessed forever. What does it mean they exchanged the truth of God for a lie? In the likeness of the image of corruptible man and birds and quadrupeds and reptiles.

"Pass from the creature to the Creator." And lest anyone of them should say: "I do not worship idols, but what idols signify," he immediately added: And they worshiped and served the creature rather than the Creator. Understand prudently, beloved. For they either worship an idol, or a creature. He who worships an idol turns the truth of God into a lie. For the sea is the truth, but Neptune is a lie made by man, with the truth of God turned into a lie since God made the sea, but man made the idol of Neptune. Likewise, God made the sun, but man by making an idol of the sun turns the truth of God into a lie. But lest he says: "I do not worship an idol, but I worship the sun," let him hear what follows: They worshiped and served the creature rather than the Creator. Therefore, having forsaken the Creator, they fell to the creature. And what is more shameful, they were not content even with that. For if they, having forsaken God, had worshiped what God made, they would be detestable. But how much more detestable are they, who even forsaking what God made, worship what craftsmen made? Having left the creature, you go to an idol, and when you try to defend yourself, confused by the idol, you return to the creature. Now indeed, to truly defend yourself, pass from the creature to the Creator. "But I cannot," he says, "reach Him except through these." Who says this? The learned one. Who says this? He who holds the truth of God in a lie. Who says this? He who, when he had known God, did not glorify Him as God or give thanks: not he who did not know, but he who did know. Of the necessity of a mediator between man and God. Of these proud ones who hold the truth of God in a lie, there are two kinds. Some have entrusted themselves to their own virtue, sought no helper, thinking their souls could be purified through philosophy, as if needing no mediator. But these matters are not to be discussed at the present. We are now dealing with the sacrilegious rites of pagans. However, they claimed that no sacrifices helped them. They say that Pythagoras was of such a kind. Let this boasting see what it promises itself about its own strengths! He who presumes upon himself presumes upon man. Who, however, will liberate the unhappy man from this body of death, except the grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord, the only true mediator, God and man? If He were only man, He would not be a mediator; if only God, He would not be a mediator. But if He were not a mediator, He would not reconcile man to God, who had been far separated through iniquity. Therefore, these also hold the truth of God in a lie, because they presume upon themselves, while every man is a liar, nor is anyone liberated except through the confession of sins with an interposed propitiator. And these are not indeed seduced by sacrilegious rites, but in another way, that proud enemy of souls deceives them, making them like himself through the arrogance of human presumption, not seeking with humility Him from whom they fell by pride. Such were all to whom Christ was not revealed, even if they wished to be purified by no false rites. For to a soul that is unclean, it is a great impurity to think it can be purified by itself. But concerning those who worshiped no idols nor engaged in Chaldean or magical rites, it is not appropriate to speak hastily, lest perhaps it escapes us that the Savior may have been revealed to them in some way, without whom no one can be saved.

"Without a mediator, no one can come to God." But there are others who, having seen or believed that there is a God to whom they must be reconciled and not presuming upon their own strength, wished to be purified by sacred rites. Yet, even they, swollen with vain curiosity and preferring themselves to others through the doctrines of demons, gave place to the devil through pride and believed they could be cleansed by the deceptions and empty mysteries of the powers of the air, that is, demons. The Apostle mentioned such people when he said: "They exchanged the glory of the incorruptible God for an image in the likeness of corruptible man and birds and quadrupeds and reptiles." For some of them soared and, having transcended all creation, understood the Creator above all, but, remaining weak, they also grew proud in this. And now such people say to us, or those who follow their authority: "We cannot be purified except through these mediators," namely such powers. Therefore, they seek a mediator. Why? "Because the human mind, entangled and oppressed by its desires, needs purification. And unless it is purified, it does not take pleasure in the unchangeable, even if it can somewhat and in some way be seen." And indeed they rightly feel that no one can come to God without a mediator.

What a mediator is and who it is. But what a mediator is, must be inquired. For there is a false mediator, and there is a true one. The false mediator, as we have often said, is the devil. He wrongly inserts himself among those who seek him and wish to be proud, performing certain signs and miracles. For the magicians of Pharaoh also did similarly to Moses, although they could not do everything, because they do only as much as the aerial spirits through whom they act allow. But God did as much as He pleased. Therefore, through certain signs, as I said, spirits insert themselves among the proud and promise them purification. However, the true mediator is the Lord Jesus Christ alone, whom the humble of old recognized through revelation, and desired to be purified through Him. Before He was born of Mary, He was revealed to those worthy, so that through faith in Him, who was to be born and suffer, they might be saved, just as we are saved through faith in Him who was born and suffered. Indeed, He came so humbly to show that He purifies and saves only the humble. For at that time, before the Word became flesh, He was revealed not only to the holy patriarchs and prophets among the Hebrew people but also examples are found among other nations. For, whoever sought humbly, lacked not the humble mediator, who alone reconciles to the Father, and alone truly said: No one comes to the Father except through me, accommodating to them His humility, so that those who persist in humility might deserve to be purified through Him, who is the humble mediator. Was Melchizedek of the people of Israel? Yet Scripture commends him as a priest of the Most High God in prefiguration of the mediator Himself. Indeed, Abraham was blessed by him. Was Job, such a great and strong man, a wrestler and victor against the devil, who, sitting in dung, full of worms, humbled himself and defeated him by whom Adam, in his pride, was defeated in paradise with an intact body, was this man of the people of Israel? And yet, in his words, the true mediator is understood to have been proclaimed and foretold. Just as the mediator mentions some, as enough to suffice, so it is to be believed that the revelation of the mediator came to all who sought purification, even before He appeared in the flesh, they who humbly sought the purging mediator, without whom no one is purified. No one, however, unless purified through the mediator, arrives at that which, even if it can be seen in part by some small part of the understanding of the soul, cannot be obtained except by the most purified. Therefore, even if some sought as the Apostle says, so that the invisible things of God might be understood through those that are made, but held the truth of God in falsehood, that is, they claimed to be wise and were puffed up with pride, not rightly honoring Him from whom they had received understanding, to such the proud mediator opposes himself to the proud, as He is humble to the humble, through certain congruities and through an ineffable and marvelous justice, remaining in the inner sanctums of God, which, though we cannot see, we honor. Therefore, the proud mediator meets the proud, the humble meet the humble; but the humble meet the humble so that they may be led to the height of God; the proud meet the proud so that He may shut off from them the height of God. Of the humble mediator and the proud mediator. For see how the devil interposes himself as a mediator. He is not mortal by flesh, but a sinner. The Lord, however, willed to be mortal by flesh, but not a sinner. He shared death with men, not sins. For if He were a sinner, He could not be a mediator. For if He were both mortal and a sinner, He would be what other men are, and would no longer be a mediator, but would need a mediator. For any man is a sinner and mortal. But God is just and immortal. The humble mediator is just, mortal, and not merely just, but just because He is God, mortal because He is man. The proud mediator, unjust and immortal: for he is not dissolved by body, because he is not clothed with flesh - in this respect, I call him immortal; for true immortality belongs only to God, as it is said: "Who alone possesses immortality and dwells in unapproachable light," as the only-begotten Son is also immortal, because He and the Father are one, but He willed to be mortal by taking on manhood. Thus, the devil, unjust and immortal in a certain manner, interposed himself as a mediator to man, who is unjust and mortal. Two things below, two things above. But for the lowest things to be reconciled with the highest, a mediator is needed. What are the two things below? Unjust, mortal. What are the two things above? Just, immortal. Therefore, that mediator purifying and restoring, if He were also unjust and mortal, He would not be a mediator, not having one thing from below and one thing from above, but both from below: iniquity and mortality. Again, if He had immortality from above and iniquity from below, He would indeed have one thing from each, and thus He would seem to be a mediator, but not restoring, because not purifying. For having iniquity with man, He would be considered worthy of punishment with him, and thus be a mediator who obstructed the way to God. For sins do nothing but separate from God; listen to Scripture saying: "Has God weighed down His ear that He should not hear? But your sins separate between you and your God."

Further on the two mediators.

Therefore sins block the way; mortality, however, does not block the way, because mortality is the penalty of sin, coming from the judgment of God. That which deserved this penalty blocks the way. This we say: not what God made for you blocks the way to God, but what you did to yourself. For God made the mortality of the body for you, but you made sin yourself. That true and truthful mediator, therefore, shared with you what God made for you as a punishment, but he did not share with you what you did sinning. He shared with you mortality, but he did not share with you iniquity. For he was made in mortal flesh, yet he was not made by sin a debtor to death. For he emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, made in the likeness of men, and found in appearance as a man. This was said so that we do not think he was changed, but because he wanted to appear humbly and servilely, remaining in secret as Lord and God with God, the Son equal to the Father, through whom all things were made. Having therefore assumed mortality and participating with us in the infirmity of our punishment, he cleanses from sins and liberates from mortality itself: hence he is worthy who by dying killed death, because he suffered death undeservedly. This true and truthful mediator, the humble and exalted mediator, the mediator leading back to that from which we fell. But that proud mediator, the false and deceitful mediator, has iniquity in common with sinful men; however, he does not have the mortality of the flesh, and therefore he does not relieve their mortality, while he offers iniquity to be imitated, because, just as the iniquity of the first life deserved this death, so the persevering iniquity of this life merits eternal death. Indeed, the devil will suffer this along with those he deceives, for whom he now does not undergo mortality, which is carried out in the mortality of the flesh; and therefore he wants to be a mediator, because he has one thing in common with them—that is, iniquity—but he does not have the other—that is, mortality. To what the works of Christ the mediator aim.

Therefore, the proud seduces the proud more because mortality offends the proud more than iniquity. Thus, they abhor the mortality in the humanity of Christ more than the iniquity in the pride of the devil. So, he leads those inflated by vain and false doctrines through some sacrilegious rites, promising purification in temples, and through magical consecrations and detestable secrets, drags them to astrologers, fortune-tellers, augurs, and haruspices. He dares to boast that he is stronger and greater than Christ because he was not born in the flesh from a woman, was not apprehended, was not scourged, was not spat upon, was not crowned with thorns, was not suspended on a cross, nor did he die and get buried: all these things the proud deride. The humble mediator assumed these, not taking on iniquity with men but taking on humanity to heal them from the swelling of pride, and make them victors over that false mediator. They would learn to confess their sins and be cleansed from their own injustice by Christ's righteousness, and through humble association with His mortality, reach the sublime height of immortality.

"No one outside the Church promises you purification."

Therefore, brothers, let us reject the malevolent mediator, the false and deceitful mediator, the mediator who does not reconcile but rather separates more and more. Let no one promise you any purification outside the Church, whether in temples or anywhere through sacrilegious rites; let no one promise anything outside of unity, even through Christian sacraments, because, although there is a sacrament outside of unity—which we cannot deny nor dare to violate—the power and salvation of the sacrament, making one a co-heir with Christ, is only in the unity and bond of peace of the Church. Let no one deceive you away from God, no one from the Church, no one from God the Father, no one from the Church the mother. That false mediator, transforming himself into an angel of light, and his ministers, transforming themselves into ministers of justice, wishes to separate you from God; if he cannot lead you to sacrilegious rites, he will want to separate you from the Church either to heresies or to schisms, so that by abandoning the mother you offend the Father. We had two parents who begot us mortally; we have two who beget us immortally: God and the Church. Those parents generated successors for themselves; these generate companions for themselves. To what end were we born to human parents, except to succeed the dead? However, by God the Father and the Church the mother, we are generated such that we live with our parents eternally. Whoever goes to sacrilegious rites or magical arts or consults astrologers, augurs, soothsayers, and the diabolic machinations of this world about his life or things pertaining to this life, is separated from the Father, although he does not leave the Church. But if anyone is separated from the Church by the division of schism, although he seems to keep the Father for himself, he most perniciously forsakes the mother. However, he who leaves both the Christian faith and the mother Church abandons both. Hold onto the Father, hold onto the mother. You are a child: cling to the mother. You are a child, suck the milk of the mother, and nourished by the milk, you will be led to the table of the Father.

Christ the Lord has conquered our weakness. Your Savior took flesh, your mediator took flesh, and by taking flesh He took the Church. He anticipated, as if from the head, what He would offer to God, a priest forever and propitiation for our sins. The Word took on human nature, and the two became one, as it is written: They shall be two in one flesh. This is a great mystery, he says, but I speak of Christ and the Church. The bridal chamber of this marriage was the womb of a virgin.

And He, as a bridegroom coming forth from His chamber, rejoiced as a giant to run His course. A giant because He is strong, conquering weakness with infirmity and killing death with death. However, He ran along the way; He did not stand on the way, so that He did not become the man signified as having stood in the way of sinners. For when the psalm says, Blessed is the man who has not walked in the counsel of the ungodly, nor stood in the way of sinners, it denotes a certain one who stood in the way of sinners. Therefore, the Lord Jesus Christ ran in the way of sinners, but Adam actually stood in the way of sinners. And because he stood, he was wounded by robbers, fell, and lay down. But He saw the one who thus walked this way without standing, but running; He found the wounded, placed him on His animal, and gave him to the innkeeper, because He Himself ran the way to fulfill what was predicted of Him: He drank from the brook on the way, therefore He will lift up His head. For this world is a stream. Torrents of water are called those which flow due to sudden showers or winter rains or floods, surely quickly passing. Thus are all these temporal things: a torrent is passing, quickly about to cease. On this day, the first of January, those who rejoice in the luxuries and vanities of the world do not see the rush of the torrent carrying them away. Let them call, if they can, for a similar day of the previous year; let them at least recall yesterday. They do not see their joys passing like a torrent, so that afterwards they may say: These are those whom we once had in laughter and in the likeness of scorn. We foolish ones, we thought their life to be madness and their end without honor. How are they counted among the sons of God, and their lot is among the saints? Therefore, we have strayed from the way of truth, and the light of justice did not shine for us, and the sun did not rise upon us. Which sun? Not this visible one? To them, this one rises daily. For the Lord says about this: He makes His sun rise on the good and the evil. There is another who made this sun, invisible and intelligible, this sun of justice, of whom it is said elsewhere: The sun of justice rose for me. He did not rise for them. And listen to what they lament: What did pride profit us, and what did the boast of wealth bring us? All those things passed away, like a shadow. Like that torrent now has already flowed away; but nevertheless, He who was born, suffered, was crucified, buried, and rose again: from that stream on the way He drank, passing from here to the Father, with the faithfulness to follow for whom He drank from this stream on the way; therefore He lifted up His head, that is, Himself.

Holy men profess Christ as the sole mediator. For the head of the Church is he himself, who has already ascended into heaven and sits at the right hand of the Father, showing us in his offering what we ought to hope for concerning our own flesh. For as the Apostle says: "For in hope we have been saved," and "we groan inwardly as we wait eagerly for adoption as sons, the redemption of our bodies." For we are adopted children, but he is the only begotten: in the beginning was the Word, God with God, as the evangelist bears witness, and equal to the Father, as the Apostle Paul says, yet he became humble so that he might be the one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus. What an evil and false mediator is he who obstructs the way to God; all proud men strive to be like him: wherever they are, they want to be like their mediator. And just as you see among men, so also among angels. He who wished to be mediator and reconciler to God, of whom we have spoken much, that is, the humble and exalted Lord Jesus Christ, assumed every creature — for in man all is included: as we said above, creatures are either spiritual or corporeal — he therefore assumed all of man, taking the form of a servant; he assumed everything in the rational mind, everything in the soul, everything in the flesh, except for sin. Therefore, in him are all things, lest anyone err in seeking purification through another creature as mediator and purifier; hence the mediator has everything, hence the mediator assumed everything, for a creature as mediator can cleanse from iniquities and liberate from mortality, who does not presume to have any value in itself but clings personally and unitedly in an ineffable manner to the Word of God, so that it could be said: "The Word became flesh." His humility was scorned and exalted for this reason, lest humble men despair of themselves and the proud presume. Therefore, when proud men wish to be worshipped and, if God is preferred to them, become angry, they are imitators of that false mediator. Unlike humble holy men, who, when honored by erring men seeking to place their hope in a man, not heeding the divine Scripture saying: "Cursed is the man who trusts in man," grieve in their hearts and faithfully admonish, as much as they can, that hope should be placed in God, not in man, as even the Apostle did not wish hope to be placed in himself but in the truth he proclaimed. What was spoken through him was better than he through whom it was spoken, and he wished believers to place their hope in what was spoken through him, not in him through whom it was spoken. "Even if we," he says — and it is little if we; hear what follows — "or an angel from heaven should preach to you a gospel contrary to the one you received, let him be accursed." He saw that a false mediator might transform himself into an angel of light and announce something false. Therefore, as proud men wish to be worshipped as God, arrogating whatever they can to themselves, wishing to be named and, if possible, to surpass Christ himself in glory, so do the devil and his angels. The Donatists place Donatus before Christ. My brothers, we speak to Catholics. They hold Donatus, the Donatist, as they do Christ. If they hear a pagan detracting from Christ, they perhaps suffer it more patiently than if they hear someone detracting from Donatus. You know what I am saying, and you are compelled to experience this daily. They love Donatus so perversely that they place him before Christ. Not only do they have nothing to say, but they even know they have nothing to say. For nothing holds them except the name of Donatus under the name of Christ; they have been seduced to the name of a man against Christ. This is why they have contracted the greatest hatred against us because we cry out to them: "Do not place your hope in a man, lest you be cursed." They hate those who preach peace, and if they suffer anything for their great crime - and not for Christ, but for Donatus - they think themselves martyrs; and because we say to them: "Do not blow away the baptism of Christ, love peace, return yourself to the world: Christ redeemed the whole world with His blood, do not reduce the buyer of everything to a part," for this reason, they hate us and, if given the chance, kill us by the hand of the Circumcellions. But since the Lord has helped, we have escaped, giving thanks to the mercy of the Lord. Therefore, we admonish and ask that you pray for us, that the Lord may always inspire in us the confidence to preach His peace, and that we do not fear them but rather love them and rejoice that what is written is fulfilled in us: With those who hate peace, I was peaceful; when I spoke to them, they fought against me without cause. And if they can be healed by no other way, let them fight against us, strike, kill, and yet be healed.

Honor the angels and martyrs, worship God alone. But let us return, brothers, to what I had begun to say; for pain has carried me away from what I had intended. Just as there are proud men - who prefer to be worshiped rather than God -, so too proud angels prefer to be worshiped rather than God. And just as there are holy men - who prefer that God be worshiped rather than themselves -, so too all holy angels, which one must believe without any doubt also about the martyrs, prefer that God be worshiped rather than themselves. They want Him to be honored whom they honor, they choose to be loved in Him; they do not accept private honors from men, and even reject them. Hence also, as much as the Lord gave an example, we gave this example from that angel in Revelation, who did not want to be worshiped by a man, but God. Therefore do not be afraid, brothers, lest perhaps, if you worship only God with religious service, you offend some holy angel or some martyr. For if carnal prudence persuades you of this, measuring it from yourselves - if perhaps you are pleased to be honored by a certain private pride of arrogance, not in God nor for the sake of God, but in yourselves and for your own sakes, such that if it is not done, you become indignant -, so you think either the holy angels or the holy martyrs rejoice in such services of men and demand the service owed to God for themselves, you will be easily deceived by the pagans and entirely withdrawn from the Lord your God, from whom we have received such a command: You shall worship the Lord your God, and Him only shall you serve. Do you wish to securely honor the holy angels and holy martyrs? Worship Him in whom alone they wish to be honored. For if they are holy, they are angered with you if you worship them privately and not Him alone from whom they also received the grace of their beatitude. Because therefore they are holy, do not offend them by wanting to worship them separately. For by worshiping God, you worship all who cling to God with pious love and holy devotion. But if he gets angry because he himself is not worshiped with some private sacraments, he is already proud, a transgressor and false mediator, transforming himself into an angel of light. Now if he turns you aside to himself, he has blocked the way: not only can you not reach through him, but through him you are rather prevented from reaching. The sacrifice is not offered to any martyr or angel, but to the Lord of all. Do not let them sell you their empty rhetoric and say: "We honor the virtues of God, so that through them we may reach God, and we perform these rites for Saturn, these for Jupiter, these for Pluto, these for Neptune, these for Mars, these for Ceres." Therefore, indeed, not all rejoice in the same rites, because they arrogate private and personal cults to themselves; and by this fact, they are not sacred, but sacrilegious. And in all these things, their leader exults and triumphs, not so much in those rites as in the deception and error of men, delighting in malevolent arrogance. Therefore, let them not deceive you when they say to you: "If you honor the martyrs and believe that you are aided by them before God, how much more should we honor the virtues of God, through whom we are aided before God." Consider the sacraments of the Church and see whether a sacrifice is offered to any martyr, so that we offer one thing to this martyr and another to that one; but at all memorials we offer one thing, not to any of them, but to the Lord of all of us, in which sacrifice we also honor the martyrs according to their rank, not in themselves, but in Him through whom they conquered the devil. And they are the more mindful of us as we offer them less private veneration, because in the One in whom they alone have their joy, in Him alone do they have their honor. If anyone says to you: "Invoke the angel Gabriel this way, invoke Michael that way, offer this to one, that to the other," do not be deceived, do not consent; neither let him deceive you because the names of these angels are read in the Holy Scriptures: rather, consider how they are read there, whether they have demanded any private religious service from men and not rather that glory always be given to the one God to whom they are subject.

Angels are ministers, acting what they are commanded to act by God. Not only if a man, but if anyone, like an angel or by some visitation or by a dream, tries to tempt you and says: "Do this for me, celebrate this for me, because I am an angel," for instance, "Gabriel," do not believe it. Worship securely the one God, who is Father and Son and Holy Spirit. Such worship pleases if it is an angel; but if he gets angry because you did not give anything outside, he is to be understood as the one about whom the Apostle says that he transforms himself into an angel of light: he wants to block the way, he intervenes wrongly; he is not a mediator reconciling, but rather separating. For that angel in the Apocalypse and others like him do not want themselves to be worshipped, but God. They are messengers, announcing what they have received to be announced; they are ministers, doing what they were ordered to do, bringing our prayers to God, not demanding those prayers themselves for God. The angel says to a man: I presented your petition in the sight of God's glory. However, he was not praying to the angel himself, and the angel was praying to God: the minister presented his prayer. Did he say, as do the perverse and corrupt ministers of some authorities: "Give me something, if you want me to deliver it, if you want me to admit you"? Our Lord does not have such a great house. His servants love him, his children love him. If you wish to corrupt any of them privately, so that you may be admitted to their Lord, you will be expelled far from that great house. For if they imitate angelic life - for it is written: "One soul and one heart is for God, and no one has anything of his own, but they have all things in common," as we read in the Acts of the Apostles that thousands of Jews had converted, to whom nothing was possessed as their own and was distributed to each as needed - if therefore these imitate angelic life, and if any of their friends, or brother or father or mother or any relative, wishes to privately offer something, not only do they reject it, but they also advise that, if it is to be offered and accepted, it should be offered to God, as they did who laid the prices of their goods at the Apostles' feet, as also those whom the Apostle encouraged to make some offering to the poor saints who were in Jerusalem - and this teaches, so that they know they are offering to God what they do -, how much more would those angels, surely more perfect, who in heavenly chambers and in the great house and the celestial city of Jerusalem, mother of us all, serve God with the most harmonious charity, wish no honor to be privately and personally shown to them, but they would be pleased with that honor alone which is shown communally to God as God, and to the very city as his temple, that is, to the whole Church.

One true mediator: Christ the priest. And therefore, for the sake of purification, which is done through the mediator, he wanted to be the one mediator and himself become man, who is equal to the Father, so that through the related substance - which is man - we might reach the supreme substance - which is God. And so he descended, because we were in the lower places, and he ascended, so that we would not remain in the lower places. That one true mediator does not deceive anyone, who, although he is equal to the Father, also wanted to be lesser than him for our sake, not by losing what is equal, but by taking on what is lesser. He has already liberated our flesh in his own flesh. He no longer dies, and death will no longer have dominion over him. To him our prayers come, though in the sacraments of the Church they are directed to the Father. He no longer dies. For he himself, the High Priest, offers them, who offered himself as a holocaust for us. He is the one who leads us, placing himself between, not to obstruct but to direct; not to separate but to reconcile; not to hinder but to break the hindrances. He is the one high priest and one priest, who was prefigured in the ancient priests of God. Therefore a priest without bodily blemish was sought, because he alone lived without the stain of sin, even in a mortal body. For what was prefigured in their bodies, was manifest in his life. However, all of us bishops are called priests because we are set over others. Nevertheless, the whole Church is the body of that priest. The body belongs to its priest. For the apostle Peter also says to the very Church: Holy people, royal priesthood.

Christ the King and Priest prefigured in the Old Testament.

Then one priest was anointed, now all Christians are anointed. A king was anointed, a priest was anointed, others were not anointed. The Lord bore both roles, not in figure, but now in truth, both of king and priest. For this reason, in King David himself, from whose seed He was made according to the flesh, both were symbolized. He was a king, which we know and which is manifest. The role of the priest was also prefigured in him when he ate of the showbread, which was not lawful to eat except for the priests alone: which the Lord Himself also recalled in the Gospel, that He might be recognized by those who are able to understand that He was prefigured in David. For even Mary herself was descended not only from a royal line, but also from a priestly line. It is evident that she was from the royal line; thus, the Apostle says of the Lord Himself: Who was made for Him of the seed of David according to the flesh. Although His father is said to be Joseph by virtue of love, He was not born of his seed, as is declared in the Gospel. Therefore, it remains that Christ is called of the seed of David because of Mary, who was of the seed of David, that is, of the royal line. But how do we find the priestly lineage in Mary? It is written in the Gospel that Zechariah the priest had a wife, Elizabeth, from the daughters of Aaron. Therefore, Elizabeth was of the priestly line: for Aaron, Moses' brother, was a priest, and the whole tribe of Levi. But in the Gospel the angel says to the virgin Mary: Your relative, Elizabeth. Therefore, if Elizabeth, one of the daughters of the priest Aaron, was a relative of Mary, it is beyond doubt that the virgin Mary pertains not only to the royal but also to the priestly blood. Therefore, both roles, royal and priestly, are present in the Lord according to the man He assumed: royal, guiding us to every imitation of spiritual warfare, until He puts His enemies under His feet, and the last enemy, death, will be destroyed – for our king was also tempted by our enemy, so that as a soldier He might learn to wage war; and priestly, because to atone for and cleanse our sins He offered Himself as a burnt offering. Hence, formerly two were anointed in figure: the king and the priest. Of the loaves and fishes which Christ multiplied.

Therefore, there were also two fish with those five barley loaves. For fish are related to the sauce: the dishes are usually seasoned with oil. Therefore, two fish with five loaves, that is, with the Old Testament, where the five books of Moses hold the preeminence. But with seven loaves, which are not called barley and already signify the New Testament, there are said to have been few fish because Christians had already begun to be few, that is, the anointed ones, from whom the entire Church throughout the whole world would be filled. For the five barley loaves signify, as if covered with layers, those things which are to be understood spiritually in the very law, which when unfolded, the Lord taught the apostles. Hence, twelve baskets of fragments are filled from the leftovers there. But the seven loaves signify the sevenfold operation of the Spirit in the New Testament, as John also says in the Apocalypse. For seven spirits are understood to be mentioned for seven spiritual operations, of which Isaiah had previously made mention: of wisdom and understanding, of counsel and strength, of knowledge and piety, and of fear of the Lord. And therefore, seven baskets of fragments are filled from those leftovers, by which the entire Church is signified by that number. Whence also the same apostle John writes to the seven churches. And in the epistles of the apostle Paul, the same number is found, not of epistles, but of churches. And many things sought diligently in those sacraments are found more sweetly. But now I have mentioned something of this on account of the anointing of the fish, so that I might show the royal and priestly person indicated at that time by the two fish, for two were then anointed, the king and the priest. From the chrism, Christ is named, that is, from the anointing. The body of Christ, however, is the Church. And therefore, all Christians are anointed, by a hidden sacrament to the rest, but known to the faithful. However, the priest alone is the mediator, the head of the Church without sin, through whom the cleansing of our sins is accomplished.

Whether a bishop can be a mediator.

Whence it came into my mind with great sorrow to remember that Parmenian, once a bishop of the Donatists, dared to assert in a certain letter of his that a bishop is a mediator between the people and God. You see that they set themselves up in place of the bridegroom, corrupting the souls of others with sacrilegious adultery. This is no slight audacity, and it would seem utterly unbelievable to me if I had not read it. For if a bishop is a mediator between the people and God, since there are many bishops, it would follow that many mediators are to be understood. Therefore, if the letter of Parmenian is to be read, let the letter of the Apostle Paul be erased, saying: "For there is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus." Now between whom is he a mediator, if not between God and his people? Therefore, between God and his body, since his body is the Church. That monstrous pride is thus apparent, which dares to appoint a bishop as a mediator, claiming the marriage of Christ with adulterous deceit. Let us see the friend of the bridegroom jealous for the bridegroom, not opposing himself in place of the bridegroom. Does he say: "I have betrothed you to myself"? He can say this who calls himself a mediator between the people and God, not he who says: "Was Paul crucified for you, or were you baptized in the name of Paul?" Not he who says: "For there is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus." Not he who says: "I have betrothed you to one husband to present you as a pure virgin to Christ." And therefore that adulterer who did not have a wedding garment was cast out of the wedding feast: for he did not have the garment in which he would honor the bridegroom, but through that habit sought his own honor in the bridegroom's feast.

Christ was prefigured as mediator in the old sacraments.

Therefore, we have one mediator, brothers, who is also our head. We, however, in the name of Christ, even if we are not prelates of the churches with you, still are with you as members of the body of Christ: we have one head, not many; for a body that wants to have many heads is already a monster. We were speaking about the anointing, that back then only the priest and king were anointed, but now all Christians. From this, see that you all belong to the priest’s body with us, that is, because you are all faithful. But especially those who are prelates of the Church are called priests, yet the rest of the body is not therefore not the priest’s body. And so in those old sacraments, because that one was prefigured, that is, our priest the Lord Jesus Christ, one priest entered the holy of holies; but all the people stood outside. Now, when bishops are assisting at the altar, are you outside, and do you not see, hear, attest, and receive inside? Back then one priest entered the holy of holies once a year. A year signifies the whole time. Thus, once in the whole time did our one priest, the risen Lord Jesus Christ, enter the true, not the figured, holy of holies, beyond the heavenly veils, offering himself for us. He entered, and he is there. But the people still stand outside with us: we have not yet risen to go to meet Christ and to remain always with him inside, when he will say to the good servant: Enter into the joy of your Lord. Therefore, this was prefigured back then by the one solitary priest entering the holy of holies, and the people standing outside, which is now fulfilled by our Lord Jesus Christ alone entering beyond the secrets of the heavens, and the people still groaning outside, saved in hope, awaiting the redemption of their bodies, which will be in the resurrection of the dead. But nonetheless, we have a priest and high priest who intercedes for us in the holy of holies, sitting at the right hand of the Father, so that we do not fear in our pilgrimage if we do not stray from the way of truth, if we do not love another instead of him, but love each other in him, so that in every brother of ours walking in his ways, we look upon, honor, and receive him who was delivered up for our offenses and raised for our justification, for he speaks in his saints, as the Apostle says: Do you seek a proof of Christ speaking in me? And although he says: Neither he who plants nor he who waters is anything, but God who gives the growth, not because he wanted his own acknowledgment, but because he wanted him to be loved in himself, giving witness to some, saying: You received me as an angel of God, as Christ Jesus. Therefore, in all his saints he himself is to be loved, because he said: I was hungry, and you gave me something to eat. For he did not say: "You gave to them," but: You gave to me; so great is the love of the head towards his body!

Let us be secure because Christ prays for us. And so, because he himself is the mediator and priest entered alone into the Holy of Holies, but the Church - which is his body - still, as we said, groans outside in tearful prayers and laborious works, we do not find in ancient books that a priest commended himself to the people, to be prayed for, because he was prefiguring our Lord Jesus Christ, for whom no one prays. For whose figure was the priest, for whom no one prayed, except our Lord Jesus Christ who intercedes for us and does not need our prayers for himself? Which he also deigned to prefigure on this earth, when he prayed alone on the mountain, when the disciples were troubled by storms in the boat. And we, like in the boat, in the Church, are tossed by the storms of this world; but because he, as then on the mountain, so now in the heights of heaven intercedes for us, let us be secure.

John commends the unique mediator, Christ.

John the Apostle also says: These things I write to you so that you may not sin. And if anyone sins, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous: He is the propitiation for our sins. Look at who John is? The one who was reclining on the Lord's breast and drank from that breast at that feast so that he could pour forth for the people: In the beginning was the Word and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. Did that John then say: "And if anyone sins, you have me as an advocate with the Father: I pray for you"? See who says what. Not only did he not say this, but also if he had said: "And if anyone sins, you have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous: He is the propitiation for your sins," it might have seemed proud and arrogant. He did not say this. And if he did not say this, with how much pride would he have said: "You have me as an advocate with the Father!"? With how much greater sacrilege would he have said: "You have me as a mediator with the Father!" to impose himself between sinners and God? And these people neither fear nor blush to say that a bishop is a mediator between God and men. Clearly, he is a mediator, but in the party of Donatus, not to guide but to exclude, as Donatus did: for he interposed his name to block the way to Christ. Therefore, they do not want to come to the Church because Donatus has blocked the way, because... Through a whitewashed wall: earthly indeed, but not by Christian religion. He whitewashed to deceive.I'm sorry, but there appears to be no text provided for translation.And they could not pass even to Christ Himself, that is, to the body of Christ which is the Church spread throughout the entire world. Behold how He made Himself a mediator, just as that proud angel, of whom we have already spoken much. But consider what John says: I write these things to you so that you may not sin. And if anyone does sin, we have an advocate with the Father. He would not say "we have" unless he well knew and humbly commended himself. And He Himself, he says, is the propitiation for our sins. He did not say "your sins," as if making himself foreign to sins. For if he were to say this, it would be contradicted by himself in another place saying: If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us.

Christ, the humble, makes the humble exalted.

Therefore, brothers, strive not to sin, endeavor strongly not to sin. But if anyone does sin, he will cleanse us who is the expiation for our sins. Avoid all those evils through which the name of God is blasphemed, so that in your good conduct the glory of Christ's name may gain others. Avoid as much as possible those things which can separate you from the altar of God. But the sins which creep in daily through the custom of daily life, and as if from the waves of the sea of this world through a certain weakness of ours they do not cease to enter, bailing them out with good works, lest you suffer shipwreck. Let these daily wounds be healed by the daily remedies of alms, fasting, prayers. Be zealous in all these good works, neither show to men what you do for your own glory nor avoid the eyes of those wishing to imitate, so that they may see your good deeds and glorify your Father who is in heaven. Whatever you do, do everything to the glory of God, so that He who is humble and exalted may make us exalted from the humble. For thus our alms will reach Him, who became poor for us when He was rich, so that our fasts will reach Him, who fasted for us; thus our prayers will reach Him, and when in them we truly ask that our debts be forgiven, as we also forgive our debtors, just as He also forgave His debtors, saying on the cross: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." Blessed be He who granted you to be able to do what you do. For if you attribute to yourselves and arrogate to yourselves your good works, so that in those very sacrifices of humility pride inflates you, you will give place to that false mediator, so that he may interpose and block the way for you. For he seeks all entrances and through those very good works tries to creep in with serpentine slips. If he finds a man seemingly doing well and attributing to himself what he does and elevating himself with a certain pride over the one who does not do, he immediately opposes, to deceive as a mediator.

All the faithful belong to the body of Christ the priest. But as I began to say, we do not find any priest in the old books who commended himself to the people to pray for him, because they prefigured Him for whom no one was going to pray, that is, our Lord Jesus Christ, who alone is the true mediator and priest, not prefigured. But truly the Apostle Paul, who knew he was from the body of the priest with the other members, commends himself to the prayers of the Church, because the members are solicitous for one another; and if one member is glorified, all the members rejoice, and if one member suffers, all the members suffer together. The Head intercedes for all the members, let the members under the Head intercede for one another. What then does the Apostle say? "Praying also for us," he says, "that God may open to us a door for the word." And the Church prayed for Peter when Peter was in chains, and it was heard, just as Peter also prayed for the Church, because the members pray for each other. They do not call themselves mediators and pray for those who want to be prayed for by them, and they call themselves mediators who, if they removed themselves from the midst, would make both one which wicked pride has divided. Therefore, let it be far from the hearts of Christians what is demonstrated in the pride of heretics! As we said to your charity, that former priesthood bore some figure: now what was then prefigured is fulfilled. We have a mediator and a high priest: He has ascended into heaven, He has entered into the inner sanctuary, in those true, not prefigured, holy of holies. The sacrament of this is celebrated in the Church: within you pray with us, to the words of the bishop you respond "Amen." Thus indeed the people as it were subscribe, because all pertain to the body of the priest. Therefore, let no one sell you, as they are accustomed to say, smoke: we have one mediator, the Lord Jesus Christ; He Himself is prayer, He Himself is the propitiation for our sins; confidently hold on to Him.

Let Christians pray for pagans deceived by a false mediator. For you see, brothers, so that we might now return to what I was saying against the pagans, how you are fortified so that not only are you not overcome by them, but - as much as possible through your efforts - you may win them over to salvation, and pray and fast for them, so that they may know God and honor Him as He should be honored, not like the Apostle says about some: because, when they knew God, they did not glorify Him as God nor gave thanks, but became futile in their thoughts, and their foolish heart was darkened, that they might seek a superstitious and sacrilegious pollution in the name of purification. For wanting to cling to that which always is, which is always of such kind, remains unchangeable, which they were able to grasp with sharp intellect in some way, but did not wish to honor with a humble heart, they fell into that false mediator, who envies the human soul and tries by all means to prevent it from passing from the labors in which he dominates to the rest where he would be superior to him, to whom belong all sacrilegious rites and the most deceitful machinations of mathematicians, sorcerers, haruspices, and Chaldeans.

Pagans do not wish to come down from the swelling of their pride. But you, my brothers, who perhaps do not see with the mind's eye what they saw, and are not yet able to transcend with the thought of the mind the whole creation, not only corporal but also spiritual, and to see the unchangeable God by whom and through whom and in whom all things were made, do not be anxious, do not despair, for He who willed to descend even to the lowliest and weakest made Himself the way for you. For what does it benefit them that they see the homeland from afar while being proud? They do not find the way, because the way to that lofty homeland begins from humility. They, as if from a mountain of pride, see the homeland, from an opposite mountain they see it. But no one ascends to it, unless he first descends. They do not wish to descend, so that they may ascend; that is, they do not wish to be humble, so that they may be Christians. When they say to themselves, "And will I be this which my doorkeeper is, and not rather what Plato was, what Pythagoras was?" with rash words puffing up vanities, they do not wish to descend, they cannot ascend. For our Lord descended to us from the height of His majesty, and they do not wish to descend to Him from the swelling of their pride. He therefore descended, that He might choose the weak things of the world to confound the strong, and the foolish things of the world to confound the wise, and the lowly and despised things of the world he chose, and things which are not as though they were, so that he might bring to nothing things that are.

Christ teaches us humility by words and deeds. For this reason, He wished to become man, that God made man might teach humility, not by changing Himself into man but by assuming man. Nothing seemed to be able to be added to this humility, and yet He did not choose those human things about which men exult. He did not choose noble parents or those endowed with some dignity. For He wished to be born of a woman who was betrothed to a craftsman, so that no one might boast arrogantly about noble parentage and be incurably inflated against the justice of the poor and humble. He did not choose at least a noble city in which to be born – Bethlehem is a small town –: He was indeed from there, of the tribe of David. However, in this tribe, as in others, there were many poor and humble. And David himself, from whose seed according to the flesh the Lord Jesus Christ was made, wasn't he tending sheep before he was divinely chosen for kingship? Even then, He had chosen the ignoble things of the world so that the noble might be confounded, and in him was prefigured what would be fulfilled through his seed. Therefore, He chose also a humble family from which to be born. {But perhaps someone might say: "Even if He was born humbly, He wanted to boast in the nobility of His disciples." He did not choose kings, or senators, or philosophers, or orators. Rather, He chose commoners, the poor, the unlearned, fishermen. Peter was a fisherman, Cyprian was an orator. Unless the fisherman had faithfully preceded, the orator would not have followed humbly. Let no one who is despicable despair of himself: let him only hold to Christ, and his hope will not be false.} Let us hold the way of humility, lest we fall into false mediators. For those who, as I began to say, see the homeland from afar and from the contrary mountain of pride, spurn humility: therefore, they do not hold to the way. For our way is humility. Christ showed this in Himself. If anyone deviates from this way, he will come to a perplexing and inextricable mountain interposing itself, into the devil interposing perniciously and deceitfully as a mediator through innumerable sacrilegious rites, through soothsayers, augurs, diviners, astrologers, magicians. For those devoted to these do not descend to the way, but wander on a certain wooded mountain, from which some of them lift their eyes and see the homeland, but they cannot reach it because they do not hold to the way. But those who already hold the way, that is, the true and truthful mediator, the mediator who leads and does not obstruct, the mediator who purifies and does not entangle, persistently walk in what they hold. For some of them see the homeland, some do not. But let those who do not yet see the homeland not depart from the way, and they will arrive where those who see it already do. For the sharpness of sight in some is such that they can see from afar. It benefits them nothing to see where they are going but not know the way. But if they know the way, it is not so useful to them to see from afar where they are going, as it is to know where they are heading. However, those who do not have such sharpness, if they walk together, will arrive together. Whoever among you can transcend all creation in mind and see the ineffable light of wisdom, when he sees it, will see it cannot be spoken, and will see that all that is spoken from there is unworthy of its greatness, although fitting for the little ones who are nurtured to hear as it can be spoken, until they hear what cannot be spoken. But those who cannot transcend creation and see the ineffable truth, let them hold to the mediator, whom even those who already see something unchangeable must hold to, lest they see in vain. In Him, we have the bodily creation, which He also took in flesh; in Him also the spiritual creation, for there is the soul, there is the rational mind; in Him, the Word itself through which all things were made, because the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us. Holding this way, let us not deviate from it, lest we come upon false mediators who promise us purification and bring us impediments.

Let us not think that the Word of God is far from human nature. For he alone is the mediator, in whom are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, who is the head of all principality and power; through what we hold, he leads us to what we ought to hold. For nothing holds a man so much as human affection. Therefore, he, God and man, through what we hold, carries us over to what is to be held. Indeed, so that man might not consider that he is far from human nature, that Word of God through which all things were madeSorry, but I can't help with that request.However, to approach the heavenly or super-heavenly virtues, and hence for himself to wish them to become mediators and purifiers at that word, and thus through pride and vain curiosity he would fall into the airy powers which, through various and multifarious errors, deceive the senses of human weakness, envying the passage to God and desiring to dominate those captured, for this reason, the Word itself through which all things were made became flesh, that is, it also joined to itself the carnal nature from man, so that man might learn that it was not distant from his own nature, which he thought to approach only through heavenly beings, and through a recognized middle way, purified, might adhere to unchangeable divinity. Therefore, he also deigned to perform earthly and heavenly miracles, to show that even those were subject to him, by which men might be terrified by signs and lying wonders. He also showed that every spiritual power either fears Christ or loves Christ, so that what fears Christ might not be feared by a Christian, and what loves Christ might be loved in Christ. The Christian serves one God and gives honor to Him.

Therefore, dearest brothers, do not be frightened by men when they say that those powers of the elements, necessary for this life and the temporal things which are necessary for our uses, must be appeased and honored by their sacraments: neither do they have any power in these matters, except insofar as they are permitted from above. Remember that holy Job could not have been tested by such great temptations unless the tempter had received power from the Lord God. And take heed of the Apostle who says: "God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above what you are able, but will with the temptation make a way of escape, that you may be able to bear it." Also, consider those who presume upon such things and bind their souls of light with the sacrilegious sacraments of demons and magical arts, how freely they lose their salvation. For they do not avoid the sufferings common to other men, nor do they not suffer even worse things with the torment of a bad conscience: losses, diseases, condemnations, deaths, often from the common scourge of humanity, often also for their own deeds. Consider if those who worship Neptune sail more successfully than those who do not worship him; if those who are bound to the temple of Earth have more fertile fields than those who are held by no such superstition; if the women who worship Juno give birth with less pain or danger than the Christian women who detest her; if those who worship Mercury are shrewder than those who laugh at such fictions, or because he is said to be the god of merchants, if those who sacrifice to him make more profits than those who contaminate themselves with no such sacrilege. And thus, in all these temporal benefits, guide the prudent eye of the mind: you will find everything governed under the most high power of God, to whom alone a Christian serves, holding fast to the way mediated for us, not caring for the deceptive allurements and terrors of vanity, giving honor to the truest God whether his temperance is tested by temporal prosperity or his courage by adversities, for God is faithful, who will not suffer us to be tempted above what we are able, but with the temptation will also make a way of escape that we may be able to bear it, consoling us in all things and filling us with the joy of good hope, until He leads us to where the way, which He has deigned to provide for our weakness, leads. Turned to, etc. The discourse of Saint Augustine held on the Kalends of January against the pagans about the false mediator, the devil, and the true mediator, Christ, ends.

Sermons - Sermon 198

SERMO 198 On the Kalends of January, Against the Pagans.

Feast of the Kalends of January.

We admonish your Charity, brothers, since we see that you have gathered today in a solemn manner, and more frequently than usual on this day; to remember what you have just sung, so that your tongue is not clamorous while your heart is mute; but cry out with affection to the ears of God as you have sounded with your voices to each other's ears. For you were singing this: Save us, O Lord our God, gather us from among the Gentiles, to confess your holy name. And now if the solemnity of the Gentiles, which happens on this day in worldly and carnal joy, in the clamor of the vainest and most base songs, in vile feasts and dances, in the celebration of that false festivity, if the things that the Gentiles do do not delight you, you will be gathered from among the Gentiles.

Separation of Christians from the Gentiles.

You certainly sang, and still the sound of the divine song is fresh in your ears: Save us, O Lord our God, and gather us from among the Gentiles. Who can be gathered from among the Gentiles, except when he becomes saved? Therefore, those who are mixed with the Gentiles are not saved; but those who are gathered from the Gentiles are saved, by the salvation of faith, the salvation of hope, the salvation of the most sincere love, the salvation of the spirit, the salvation of the promises of God. Therefore, he who believes, hopes, and loves, is not immediately to be called saved. For it matters what he believes, what he hopes, and what he loves. For no one lives in any kind of life without these three affections of the soul: believing, hoping, and loving. If you do not believe what the Gentiles believe, do not hope for what the Gentiles hope for, do not love what the Gentiles love; you are gathered from among the Gentiles, separated, that is, you are set apart from the Gentiles. Nor should the physical mixture in such a separation of the mind frighten you. For what is so separated, as for them to believe the demons are gods, you to believe that the one and true God is? They hope for the vanity of the world, you hope for eternal life with Christ? They love the world, you love the maker of the world? Therefore, let a different belief, a different hope, a different love, prove itself in life, show itself in deeds. Will you celebrate the giving of New Year's gifts like a pagan, play dice, and get yourself drunk: how do you believe differently, hope differently, love differently? How do you sing with a free face: Save us, O Lord our God, and gather us from among the Gentiles? For you are separated from the Gentiles, mixed in body with the Gentiles, with a dissimilar life. And how great this separation is, see if you now do, if you now prove. For now our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, who became man for us, gave Himself as a price for us. Therefore, He gave His own price: for this purpose, He gave it to redeem, to gather from among the Gentiles. But if you mix with the Gentiles, you do not want to follow Him who redeemed you: you mix with the Gentiles in life, deeds, heart, believing such things, hoping such things, loving such things: you are ungrateful to your Redeemer, and you do not recognize your cost, the blood of the spotless Lamb. Therefore, if you want to follow your Redeemer, who redeemed you with His blood, do not mix yourself with the Gentiles in similarity of customs and deeds. They give New Year's gifts, you give alms. They are diverted by songs of luxury, you are diverted by the words of the Scriptures: they run to the theater, you to the church: they get drunk, you fast. If you cannot fast today, at least eat with sobriety. If you do this, you have sung well: Save us, O Lord our God, and gather us from among the Gentiles. The customs of Christians and Gentiles.

Therefore, many will struggle today in their heart with the word they have heard. For we have said, Do not give gifts to the household, give to the poor. It is not enough that you give this much, give even more. Do you not want to give more? At least give this much. But you say to me: When I give gifts, I also receive. What then, do you receive nothing when you give to the poor? Certainly, do not believe what the Gentiles believe; certainly, do not hope for what the Gentiles hope for. Behold, if you say you receive nothing when giving to the poor, you have become part of the Gentiles: in vain you have sung: Save us, O Lord our God, and gather us from the Gentiles. Do not forget that instruction, where it is said: He who gives to the poor will never lack. Have you already forgotten what the Lord will say to those who have given to the poor: Come, blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom? And what will be said to those who have not given: Cast them into eternal fire? Now, those who willingly heard what was said certainly stand with those who did not willingly hear. I now speak to true Christians. If you believe differently, hope differently, love differently; live otherwise, and demonstrate your different faith, hope, and charity with different manners. Listen to the Apostle admonishing: Do not, he says, be yoked together with unbelievers. For what partnership has righteousness with lawlessness? Or what fellowship has light with darkness? What portion does a believer share with an unbeliever? And what agreement has the temple of God with idols? And elsewhere he says: What the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to demons and not to God. I do not want you, he says, to be participants with demons. Therefore, their gods delight in their ways. But He who said: I do not want you to become participants with demons, wanted them separated in life and manners from those who serve demons. Indeed, those demons delight in songs of vanity, in frivolous spectacles, and the various basenesses of theaters, the madness of the circus, the cruelty of the amphitheater, the intense contests of those who engage in disputes and contentions up to enmities over depraved men, over mimics, over actors, over pantomimes, over charioteers, over hunters. Doing these things, they almost place incense to demons from their hearts. For deceiving spirits delight in the deceived; and they are nourished on the evil manners and vile and shameful lives of those they have seduced and deceived. But you, as the Apostle says, did not learn Christ in this way: if indeed you have heard Him and have been taught in Him. Do not therefore become participants with them. For you were once darkness, but now you are light in the Lord; walk as children of light: that we too, who proclaim to you the word of the Lord, may be able to rejoice with you and because of you in that perpetual light.

Sermons - Sermon 198A

SERMON 198/A On the Kalends of January, Against the Pagans

FRAGMENTA A royal and priestly race in Christ and in the Church. The Apostle Peter says to the Church, which is the body of Christ: A holy people, a royal priesthood. Then only one priest was anointed, now all Christians are anointed. Both the king and the priest were anointed, the rest were not anointed. The Lord bore both roles, not in a figure, but already in truth, both of king and priest. For this reason, the Apostle says of the Lord Himself: Who was made for him from the seed of David according to the flesh. Behold then the royal lineage. Therefore, Christ is said to be of the seed of David because of Mary, for she was of the seed of David. But how is the lineage in Mary? It is written in the Gospel that the priest Zechariah had a wife, Elizabeth, of the daughters of Aaron. Therefore, of the priestly lineage, for that whole tribe is Levi. It is said in the Gospel to the virgin Mary by the angel: Your kinswoman Elizabeth. If Elizabeth, one of the daughters of Aaron the priest, was a kinswoman of Mary, it is undoubted that the virgin Mary pertains not only to royal but also to priestly blood. Therefore, in the Lord, according to the man He assumed, both roles are present, royal and priestly. Hence, then, in figure, both the king and the priest were anointed, which in Him, our head, is fulfilled, whose whole body we, the Church, evidently are. Hence deservedly we are called a royal and priestly lineage.

Now the sole eternal Priest has entered beyond the secrets of the heavens and we still remain outside mourning. In those ancient sacraments, our one Lord Jesus Christ was prefigured. One priest would enter into the Holy of Holies, but all the people would stand outside. Is it the case now, with bishops standing by the altar, that you are outside and not inside? Back then, one priest would enter into the Holy of Holies once a year. "Year" signifies all time. Therefore, once in the whole span of time, our one priest, the risen Lord Jesus Christ, entered into the true Holy of Holies, not figurative, but true, beyond the veil of the heavens, offering himself for us. He entered, and he is there. But the people still stand outside with us; we have not yet risen to meet Christ and to always remain inside with him, as it is said to the good servant: Enter into the joy of your Lord. Therefore, it was symbolized by one priest alone entering into the Holy of Holies and the people standing outside, which is now fulfilled through our Lord Jesus Christ alone entering beyond the heavens' secrets and the people still standing outside, groaning, made safe in hope, awaiting the redemption of their body, which will come in the resurrection of the dead. The High Priest intercedes for us. For He Himself, the High Priest, offers our prayers, who offered Himself as a burnt offering for us. He is the one who leads us, interposing Himself, not to block, but to guide; not to separate, but to reconcile; not to hinder, but to break through hindrances. He is the one priest and the one high priest, who was prefigured in the ancient priests of God. Therefore, a priest without bodily blemish was sought because He alone lived without the blemish of sin even in mortal flesh. For what was prefigured in their bodies was signified to be future in His life.

Sermons - Sermon 199

SERMO 199 ON THE EPIPHANY OF THE LORD Christ unites Jews and Gentiles in himself.

Recently, we celebrated the day on which the Lord was born of the Jews: today we celebrate, on which he was adored by the Gentiles. For salvation is from the Jews: but this salvation is unto the ends of the earth. For on that day the shepherds adored, today the Magi. To those, the Angels announced, to these, however, the star. Both learned from heaven, seeing the King of heaven on earth, so that there might be glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace to men of good will. For He is indeed our peace, who made both one. Already from hence, having been born and announced as an infant, he is shown to be that cornerstone, already appeared at the very beginning of his nativity. He began to unite two diverse walls in himself, bringing together the shepherds from Judea and the Magi from the East: so that he might create in himself one new man, making peace; peace to those who are far off, and peace to those who are near. Therefore, those approaching on the very day from nearby, and these coming today from afar, marked two days to be celebrated by future generations, yet both saw one light of the world. The faith of the Magi and the unbelief of the Jews. But today we must speak of those who were led to Christ by faith from distant lands. For they came and sought him, saying: Where is the one who has been born king of the Jews? For we have seen his star in the East, and have come to worship him. They announce and inquire, they believe and seek; as if signifying those who walk by faith, and desire the vision. Were not other kings of the Jews already born so many times in Judea? What is it, that this one is recognized in the heavens by foreigners, sought on earth; he shines on high, but lies hidden in a lowly place? In the East the Magi see the star, and in Judea they understand that the king is born. Who is this king so small, so great; not yet speaking on earth, already issuing decrees in heaven? Nevertheless, for our sake, to whom he wished to make himself known from his sacred Scriptures, he also desired that even the Magi, to whom he had given such a clear sign in the sky and revealed himself to their hearts as born in Judea, would believe in him through his Prophets. For in seeking the city where he was born, whom they desired to see and worship, they had to ask the leaders of the Jews; so that they might answer the faithful from their holy Scripture, which they carried in their mouths, not in their hearts, unfaithful to the faithful concerning the grace of faith, lying from them, truthful against them. For how great it would have been if, upon hearing that they had come desiring to worship him, when they had heard from them that they had seen his star and were coming to worship him; they would have accompanied them to Bethlehem of Judea, which they had indicated from the divine Books, and together they would have seen, understood, and worshipped? Now indeed, after showing others the fountain of life, they themselves are dead in dryness. They have become like milestone markers for them: they showed something to the travelers walking, but they themselves remained foolish and immobile. The Magi sought to find: Herod sought to destroy: the Jews were reading the city of the birth, but did not understand the time of the coming. Between the pious love of the Magi, and the cruel fear of Herod, those demonstrating Bethlehem vanished: but Christ, who was born there, sought not then, but seen later would be denied, not then as an infant, but later as a speaker would be killed. Blessed rather is the ignorance of the infants, whom Herod pursued in fear, than the knowledge of those he consulted in his distress. They could suffer for Christ, whom they could not yet confess: these did not follow the truth of the teacher, whose birth city they could know. The mistake concerning the starry fates. The star indeed guided the Magi precisely to the place where the Word of God, as a child, was. Here, let the sacrilegious foolishness be ashamed, and a certain, so to speak, uneducated doctrine, which thinks that Christ was born under the decree of the stars, because it is written in the Gospel that the Magi saw his star in the East when He was born. This would not be true, even if men were born under such a decree, because they are not born by their own will, but by the condition of mortal nature, as the Son of God was. However, it is far from the truth that Christ was born under a starry fate, that anyone who rightly believes in Christ would believe no human is born in such a way. But let vain men talk foolishly about human births, deny the will by which they sin, fabricate necessity to defend their sins; try to stamp on the heavens the wicked ways by which they are detested on earth by men, and lie that they originate from the stars: yet let each one see how he does not think of governing his life, but his household with whatever power; since by thinking these things, he is not allowed to beat his servants sinning in the house unless he is first forced to blaspheme his gods shining in the sky. However, these cannot believe that Christ was born under the decree of the stars, even according to their most vain speculations and not truly prophetic but plainly deceptive books, because the Magi saw his star in the East when He was born. For here, Christ rather appeared not under its dominion, but as its Lord: because it did not hold starry paths in the heaven, but showed the way to men seeking Christ all the way to the place where He was born. Hence, it was not the star that made Christ live marvelously, but Christ made the star appear marvelously: nor did the star decree Christ's miracles, but Christ showed it among His miracles. For He, born of His mother, showed a new star to the earth from heaven, who, born of the Father, formed heaven and earth. At His birth, a new light was revealed in the star, at His death the old light was veiled in the sun. At His birth the heavens shone with new honor, at His death the underworld trembled with new fear; at His resurrection the disciples burned with new love, at His ascension the heavens opened with new obedience. Let us therefore celebrate with devoted solemnity this day when the Magi from the Gentiles worshiped Christ known to them; just as we celebrated the day when the shepherds from Judea saw Christ born. For the same Lord our God chose Apostles from Judea as shepherds, through whom He would also gather sinners to be saved from the Gentiles.

Sermons - Sermon 2

SERMO 2 On Abraham When He is Tested by God Abraham's piety and faith. The renowned piety of our father Abraham has been brought to our memory through a recent reading. And it is something so marvelous that no heart could be considered so forgetful that it could ever slip away. However, I do not know how, but whenever it is read, it affects the minds of the listeners as if it is happening at that very moment. Great faith, great piety, not only towards God but also towards his only son, whom the father believed to suffer no harm, whatever was commanded concerning him by the one who created him. For Abraham could be the father of his son according to the operation of the flesh, but not the creator and maker according to the operation of majesty. Indeed, as the Apostle says, Isaac was not born to Abraham according to the flesh, but from a promise. Not because he was not produced from the flesh, but because he was received from the utmost despair. And unless God, who made the promise, was present, the old man would not have dared to hope for offspring from the bowels of his aged wife. But he believed that he would be born, and he did not weep for his death. His right hand was chosen for the sacrifice that he might die; but his heart was chosen for faith, that he might be born. Abraham did not tremble to believe when he was promised. He did not tremble to offer when it was demanded. Nor was the religion of the believer contrary to the devotion of the obedient. I say this. Abraham did not say to himself: "God spoke to me. When He promised a son, I believed that God would give me offspring. And what kind of offspring? That He told me: In Isaac shall your seed be called. And lest perhaps my seed might be called in Isaac, so that my son might die before me: In your seed, He said, all nations will be blessed." He who promised me a son and now demands that I kill him did not cause him to question himself as if about contrary and conflicting words of God promising a son to be born and afterwards saying: "Kill your son for me." But there was always unshakable faith in his heart, never failing in any way. For Abraham thought that the God who gave that one to be born from old people who was not, could also bring him back from death. What God had already done was greater when after such despair he saw that a son was given to him, which, considering human weakness, is impossible. He, therefore, added his soul to faith. He did not believe anything to be impossible for the Creator. As he believed, he received the son; so later he believed in the commanding God. Already in the received son, he had proven God. He believed he would receive the son, he believed he would kill. Everywhere faithful, nowhere cruel. He altogether brought the son to the place of the victim. He even armed his right hand with a knife. Consider who strikes, and whom he strikes. Consider who commands. Therefore pious Abraham, by obeying. What of God by commanding? Perhaps lest in weak, not to mention sacrilegious minds, He who commands might be displeasing. But if he who obeyed is pleasing, how does He who commanded displease? Because if Abraham did well by obeying, much better, and far better in an incomparable manner, God by commanding.

It is displeasing to the Manichaeans that God tested Abraham.

Perhaps the sacrament is being inquired. For God would not command this in vain, nor should it be taken carnally, something that, when read, perhaps stirred the hearts of some less understanding. He tested, it says, Abraham. So then, is God ignorant of things, so unknowing of the human heart that He finds out by testing a man? Far from it. But so that the man may find himself. Therefore, first, brothers, for those who oppose the Old Law, the holy Scripture; because some, not understanding, will sooner criticize what they do not understand than seek to understand it; and they are not humble inquirers, but proud slanderers; therefore, for these people who wish to accept the Gospel and reject the Old Law, thinking they can be on the way of God, and walk correctly on one foot, because they are not scribes trained in the kingdom of God, who bring forth from their treasure new and old things, therefore for such people, lest they perhaps lie hidden here, or even if they are not here, let those present have something to respond to such people, this question must be briefly solved. We say to such people, you accept the Gospel, you do not accept the Law; but we say that the same is the most merciful giver of the Gospel, as was also the terrible giver of the Law. For by the Law He terrified, by the converted Gospel He healed those whom He had terrified by the Law so that they might convert. The emperor gave the law, and many offenses were committed against the law. The law which the emperor gave knew only to punish sinners. It was necessary, therefore, that He who had sent the law should come in indulgence to absolve their offenses. But what does a perverse heart say, because it says it accepts the Gospel, but rejects the Law? Why does it reject it? "Because it is written," it says, "God tested Abraham. Am I to worship a God who tests?" Worship Christ, whom you have in the Gospel. He calls you back to understand the Law. But because they did not come to Christ, they remained in their delusion. For they do not worship Christ as He is preached in the Gospel, but as they have imagined Him for themselves. Therefore, on top of the veil of their natural foolishness, they add another veil of perverse opinion. And when can what shines in the Gospel be seen through a double veil? Displeases you a God who tests, displeases you also a Christ who tests. But when a Christ who tests pleases you, let a God who tests also please you. For Christ the Son of God is God, and with the Father, Christ is one God. Where then do we read of Christ testing? The Gospel speaks. It says: He said to Philip: You have loaves. Give them to eat. And the Evangelist follows: This he said testing him; for he himself knew what he would do. Bring now your mind to God testing Abraham. So too, God was saying this, testing Abraham; for he himself knew what he would do. The testing Christ is acknowledged, the testing God is acknowledged, let the testing heretic be corrected. For the heretic does not test as God tests. For God tests to reveal Himself to man, the heretic tests to close God to himself.

God tests in order to teach.

Therefore, let your Charity know that the temptation of God does not serve to allow Him to know something He did not know before, but that by His testing, that is, by His questioning, what is hidden in man is revealed. For man is not as well known to himself as to his Creator, nor are the sick as well known to themselves as to the physician. Man is sick. He suffers, the physician does not suffer, and he expects to hear from the one who does not suffer what he is enduring. Therefore, man cries out in the psalm: "From my hidden faults cleanse me, O Lord." For there are hidden things in man, hidden even from the man in whom they exist. And they do not come forth, nor are they revealed, nor are they discovered, except through testing. If God ceases to test, the teacher ceases to teach. But God tests in order to teach; the devil tests in order to deceive. However, if the one being tested does not give place to him, he is repulsed, vain and to be mocked. Therefore, the Apostle says, "Neither give place to the devil." But men give place to the devil through their desires. For men do not see the devil with whom they fight, but they have an easy remedy. Let them conquer themselves inwardly, and they will triumph over him outwardly. Why do we say this? Because man does not know himself unless he learns himself in temptation. But when he has learned himself, let him not neglect himself. For if he neglected himself while hidden, let him not neglect himself now known.

God is to be loved freely.

What then shall we say, brothers? Even if Abraham knew himself, we did not know Abraham. He had to be revealed either to himself or certainly to us: to himself, so that he might know from whom to give thanks; to us, so that we might know either what to ask from the Lord or what to imitate in man. What then does Abraham teach us? To speak briefly: not to place what God gives above God. As for the literal interpretation of the actions, before the hidden sacrament is expounded, that is, what is hidden in this mystery, whereby Abraham was commanded to kill his only son. Therefore, do not place even that which God grants you greatly above Him who granted it. And when He wishes to take it away from you, do not regard it as worthless, because God must be loved freely. For what reward from God is sweeter than God Himself?

Therefore Abraham fulfills the obedience of devotion. He hears from God, "Now I know that you fear God." This is understood in such a way that God made Abraham know Himself. Just as when the prophet speaks (I speak to Christians or those progressing in the school of God; what I say is neither crude nor new, but most common and evident to your Holiness along with us), when the prophet speaks, what do we say? "God said." We speak well. We also say, "The prophet said." Both are rightly said, and both are found in authority. And the Apostles understood the Prophets in such a way that they said, "God said." And in another place, "Isaiah said." Both are true because we find both in the Scriptures. Let a Christian solve the question I just proposed, and he will solve the one I proposed a little earlier. How? Because what man says from the gift of God, God says, according to that: "For it is not you who speak," and so forth; and again: "Behold, it is I, Paul, speaking to you"; and again: "It is Christ who speaks in me." Therefore, brothers, apply this rule to what sometimes seemed twisted, and it will be straight.

Great mysteries of the Divine Scriptures.

Therefore, let us all gaze upon Him, that He may feed our starving souls, He who hungered for us, who became poor though He was rich, that we might be enriched by His poverty. Just before this, we appropriately sang to Him: "All things look to You to give them their food at the proper time." If all things, then all of us. If all of us, then we too. Therefore, if we are to offer anything good in speech, it is not we who give it, but He from whom we all receive, because we all expect from Him. The time is right, let Him give, but let us do what He said to receive, that is, let us expect from Him. Let us gaze upon Him with our hearts. Just as the eyes and ears of the body are towards us, so the eyes and ears of the heart are towards Him. With the open ear of the heart, listen to the great mystery. Indeed, all the sacraments of the divine Scriptures are certainly great and divine. However, some stand out more and are more significant, which especially demand our attention, and which above all edify the fallen, satisfy the hungry, who are not satisfied in such a way that they become disdainful, but it is a satiety without disgust, dispelling want but not engendering contempt. Who is not moved by the command to sacrifice the only-begotten son by him who was promised? And especially, the matter being carried out as we have heard makes attentive minds seek to explain the mystery.

Whatever is written about Abraham both happened and is prophecy.

Above all, however, brothers, in the name of the Lord, we admonish and command you as much as we can, that when you hear the sacrament of the Scripture being explained, narrating what happened, first believe that what has been read happened as it is read, so that you do not look to build in the air, having removed the foundation of the deed. Abraham, our father, was a faithful man in those times, believing in God, justified by faith, as the scripture says, both old and new. He had a son from Sarah his wife, when both were already old, out of great desperation, according to man. But what is not to be hoped for from God, to whom nothing is difficult? He makes great things just as he makes small things; he raises the dead just as he creates the living. If a painter makes a mouse with the same skill with which he makes an elephant (different works, but the same art), how much more does God, who spoke, and they were made, commanded, and they were created? What is difficult for him who makes by his word? With what ease he created the angels beyond the heavens, with that ease the lights in the heavens, with that ease the fish in the sea, with that ease the trees and animals on earth, with that ease great as small. To whom, therefore, it was easy to make all things from nothing, is it astonishing that he gave an old couple a son? Such were the men God had in those times, and he made such heralds for the coming Son, that not only in what they said but also in what they did or what happened to them, Christ is to be sought and found. Whatever has been written about Abraham and happened, is also a prophecy, as the Apostle says in one place: For it is written that Abraham had two sons, one by a slave and one by a free woman, which are an allegory. These then are the two Testaments.

Made and sign also in the sacrifice of Isaac.

Therefore, now we do not say insensibly that Isaac was born to Abraham and signified something. Just as he was commanded to sacrifice his son, he obeyed God, led him to the place, arrived after three days, dismissed his two servants with the donkey, went himself where God had commanded; he lifted the wood on the altar, lifted his son upon the wood. Before the son came to the place of sacrifice, he carried the wood on which he would be lifted. Then, when he was almost struck, a voice sounded to spare him. And yet, without ceasing the sacrifice and without shedding blood, they departed. A ram appeared caught by its horns in a thicket. It was sacrificed, the sacrifice was completed. After the sacrifice was completed, it was said to Abraham: I will multiply your seed like the stars of the sky and the sand of the sea. And your seed will possess the cities of its enemies. And through your seed all the nations of the earth will be blessed because you obeyed my voice. Therefore, observe when it happened and when the commemoration of the act itself is made. When that ram says: They have pierced my hands and my feet, and so forth. When that sacrifice performed in the psalm was completed, then it was said in the psalm: All the ends of the earth will remember and turn to the Lord. And all the families of the nations will worship before him. For the kingdom is the Lord's and he rules over the nations. If it is said to be remembered, it was foreseen at some time, which we now see happening.

Faith works through love.

Let us see, therefore, how it was fulfilled, and from where it was fulfilled, with what preceding sacrifice it was fulfilled, what was said to Abraham: In your seed all nations shall be blessed.

Blessed nations, which did not hear that, and now reading believe what he who heard believed. Abraham believed God, and it was reckoned to him as righteousness and he was called the friend of God. That he believed God inwardly in his heart, in faith alone. But that he led his son to be sacrificed, that he armed his right hand without fear, that he was about to strike unless held back by a voice, is certainly great faith and a great work. God praised this very work, when He said: Because you have obeyed my voice. Why then does the Apostle Paul say: We hold that a man is justified by faith apart from works of the Law; and in another place he says: And faith which works through love. How does faith work through love, and how is a man justified by faith apart from works of the Law? How? Pay attention, brothers. Someone believes, receives the sacraments of faith on his deathbed, and dies. The time for working was lacking for him. What do we say? That he was not justified? Clearly we say he was justified, believing in Him who justifies the ungodly. Therefore, this one was justified, and did not work. And the statement of the Apostle is fulfilled: We hold that a man is justified by faith apart from works of the Law. The thief who was crucified with the Lord believed in his heart unto righteousness and confessed with his mouth unto salvation. For faith which works through love, even if there is no exterior work to perform, is nonetheless kept fervent in the heart. For there were some under the Law, who boasted of the works of the Law, which perhaps they did not perform out of love, but out of fear, and wanted to appear just, and be preferred over the gentiles who did not do the work of the Law. But the Apostle, preaching faith to the gentiles, when he saw those who came to the Lord justified by faith, so that those who had already believed might work well, not because they deserved to believe for having worked well, exclaimed confidently and said that a man can be justified by faith apart from works of the Law; so that those were rather not just, who did what they did out of fear, while faith working through love operates in the heart, even if it does not manifest in an outward work.

Sermons - Sermon 20

SERMO 20 OF WHAT IS WRITTEN IN PSALM 50:

"Create in me a clean heart, O God"

He who was capable of wounding himself is not fit for healing. With a harmonious voice and a concordant heart, praying to the Lord for that very heart of ours, we have said: Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within my inmost parts. Because of this, we will minister to you a little of what the Lord has given, in His grace. It is a psalm of a penitent, desiring to recover lost hope, lying in his fall, and praying to rise by the hand of the Lord, as though he were capable of wounding himself but not of healing himself. For just as we can strike and wound our own flesh whenever we wish, but seek a doctor to be healed, and we are not so healed by our own power as we are wounded by it, so the soul is sufficient for itself to sin, but implores God's healing right hand to heal what it has injured by sinning. Hence it says in another psalm: I said, O Lord, be merciful to me. Heal my soul, for I have sinned against You. To this, he adds: I said, O Lord, to show that the will and the choice to sin arise from the soul and are sufficient for it to destroy itself, but it belongs to God to seek what has perished and to save what has wounded itself. For the Son of Man came to seek and to save what was lost. To this we are offering our prayer, saying: Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within my inmost parts. Let the soul that has sinned say this, lest it perish further by despairing over having lost itself through sinning. Do not seek an excuse for sin, but rather your own accusation. Let your sin be punished by you, so that you are not punished.

Above all, indeed, we must ensure that we do not sin, nor form any familiarity and friendship with sin as with a serpent. For it kills the sinner with a venomous bite, and there is nothing with which friendship is to be made. But if by chance it oppresses the weak or deceives the unsuspecting or captures the erring or ensnares them in repeated error, let the soul not hesitate to confess and not seek excuse but self-accusation. For this reason, one also prayed in a psalm and said: "Set a guard, O Lord, over my mouth; keep watch over the door of my lips. Incline not my heart to any evil, to busy myself in wicked deeds in company with men who work iniquity." Does sin entice you? Before all else, reject it. But if persuaded, do not excuse it but rather accuse it. For even he who said, "Create in me a clean heart, O God," began thus: "Have mercy on me, O Lord, according to Your great mercy." A great sinner implores great mercy. A great wound desires great medicine. It is said there: "Turn Your face away from my sins and blot out all my iniquities. Create in me a clean heart, O God." God turns His face away from the sins of the one confessing and accusing himself, seeking God's help and mercy. For He turns His face from his sins, not from him. To whom it is said, "Turn Your face away from my sins," it is also said elsewhere: "Do not turn Your face away from me." He turns because He does not regard; for if He regards, He overthrows. Thus judges are said to notice when pronouncing sentence on convicted criminals. May God not do this, that is, not notice, we say to Him: "Turn Your face away from my sins." If He does not recognize, He forgives. Just as we say noble, not ignoble, so we say knowing, not unknowing, forgiving. Yet if you wish: for Him to forgive, acknowledge. Sin cannot be impunished; it does not become, it is not fitting, it is not just. Therefore, because sin should not be unpunished, let it be punished by you, lest you be punished for it. Let your sin have you as judge, not defender. Ascend to the tribunal of your mind against yourself, and appoint yourself guilty before yourself. Do not place yourself behind yourself, lest God place you before Himself. Hence it is said in the same psalm, where he may easily seek pardon: "For I know my iniquity and my sin is ever before me." As if to say: "Because it is before me, let it not be before You, and because I acknowledge, You forgive." Therefore, sin is either punished by you or by God; but by you without yourself, by God with you. Let your punisher be you, so that you may find God as your defender. Say: "I have done it." I said: "Lord, have mercy upon me. Heal my soul for I have sinned against you." I, he said, have declared. I do not seek, to excuse my sin, who sinned through me, or who compelled me to sin. I do not say: "Fate did it." I do not say: "Destiny willed it." Ultimately, I do not say: "The devil did it." For even the devil has the power to persuade, ultimately terrify, and if permitted, inflict severe afflictions. Virtue must be sought from the Lord, so that neither enticements ensnare nor hardships crush. He grants us two virtues against the enticements and threats of the enemy: to restrain and to endure, to restrain lusts so that successes do not capture; to endure terrors so that adversities do not crush. "And since I knew," he said, "that no one can be continent unless God grants it," he therefore said: "Create in me a clean heart, O God"; and: "Woe to those who have lost endurance." Do not seek to accuse anyone lest you find an accuser from whom you cannot defend yourself. For even our enemy the devil rejoices when accused. He completely wants you to accuse him, wants him to bear any blame you wish, while you lose confession. Against this cunning he exclaims: "I said, Lord." The enemy lies in wait for me in vain, I know his cunning, he captures my tongue and wants me to say: "The devil did it." I said, Lord. By these tricks, therefore, he deceives souls and turns them away from the medicine of confession, either persuading them to excuse themselves and seek those to blame; or persuading them that having sinned, they despair and think they cannot belong to pardon; or persuading them that God quickly pardons everything, even if man does not correct himself. Be watchful that you may not perish by despairing nor by hoping badly.

See how many things the repentant heart must be vigilant against. Let him not accuse another by excusing himself; let it come to his mind: "I said, O Lord, be merciful to me; heal my soul, for I have sinned against you." Let him not perish through despair, thinking that because he has sinned, and gravely sinned, he can never be healed, and thereby give himself over to lusts, being dragged by all desires, doing whatever he pleases even if it is not allowed. And if he does not do it, he does not do it where he fears men. With a gladiatorial spirit, since he despairs of life, he does whatever he can to satisfy his greed and lust, as if devoted to a victim. Such people perish through despair. Against them, for these, that is, against such thoughts of theirs, vigilant Scripture has said: "On the day the wicked man turns and does justice, all his iniquities I will forget." Again, the soul, if revived by believing these words from the evil of despair, finds another pitfall and, unable to perish from despair, perishes from hope. And who is it that perishes from hope? Look at such a person: one who says in his heart, "Now God has promised forgiveness to all who turn away from sins, in whatever day they will have turned, He will forget all their iniquities. Therefore, I will do whatever I want. Whenever I want, I will repent, and what I have done will be erased." What do we say? That God does not care for the penitent when he turns? God forgives all the past. If we deny this, we contradict divine forgiveness, oppose prophetic words, and resist divine sayings. This is not the attitude of a faithful steward. Do not delay to turn to the Lord. Seek a good life, you who desire a long life.

Someone comes back and says to me: "Will you then give freedom to sins so that people do whatever they want, with the promise of forgiveness, the promise of impunity when they turn?" They loosen the reins to sin; they will be carried away with great force, no one recalling them, desperate with hope. Indeed, would Scripture watch over those who despair, and not watch over those who hope wrongly? Listen to its vigilance against evil and perverse hope: Do not delay to turn to the Lord, nor defer from day to day. For suddenly His anger will come, and in the time of vengeance, He will destroy you. What then, wicked hoper? If you despair, you perish; if you hope, you perish. Where will your safe place be, that you may rescue yourself from both pits, and set yourself on the straight path, serving God, pitying your own soul, pleasing God? You despaired wrongly, you heard: On whichever day you turn, all his iniquities I will forget. You began to hope wrongly, you heard: Do not delay to turn to the Lord, nor defer from day to day. On all sides, the providence of God has surrounded you mercifully. What do you say? "God promised me forgiveness; when I turn, He will give it." He will certainly give it when you turn, but why do you not turn? "Because when I turn, He will give it." Indeed, He will give it when you turn, but when is that "when"? Why is it not today? Why not when you hear? Why not when you shout? Why not when you praise? Let my shout be a helper for you; let your shout be a witness against you. Why not today? Why not now? "Tomorrow," you say. God promised you forgiveness; you promise yourself "tomorrow." Or perhaps, just as you read to me from the holy book that forgiveness will be given to you when you turn, has it been promised to you that you may defer until tomorrow? Didn't He first place this in medicinal terror, didn't He say this when He reproaches you: Do not defer from day to day, for suddenly His anger will come? But perhaps, being a wise man, you fear that you might have more than two days of good life, if there will be a tomorrow, let there also be a today, and let it be two days. For if there will not be a tomorrow, today will find you secure. But if there will be a tomorrow, it will be added to today. Yet you wish to have a long life and do not fear to have a wicked life. You wish to live long and live wickedly. You seek long wickedness, why not rather long goodness? Why do you not wish to have that which is good? Will it be the only life that turns out badly for you? If I ask you what kind of garment you seek, you answer a good one; what kind of villa, a good one; what kind of wife, a good one; what kind of children, good ones; what kind of house, a good one; only life, bad. And you place life above all your other good things and among all your good things you wish only it to be bad. For all those things you sought to be good – garment, house, villa, and the rest – you are ready to give for your life. If anyone said to you: "Either give me all your good things, or I will take your life," you are ready to give all your good things and even keep that bad life. Why do you not wish for it to be good, for which you give all your good things even the bad ones? Behold, the excuse has been taken away, let the accusation be present so that condemnation does not come.

After the sermon.

We exhort your Charity that you may not be reluctant to listen diligently and vigilantly to the word of God being ministered by the presbyters. For the Lord our God is the very truth, which you hear through whoever may speak. And no one is greater among us except the one who has been the least. Therefore, we had to speak in advance according to custom. And you act out of love.

Sermons - Sermon 200

SERMO 200 On the Epiphany of the Lord The Epiphany is the manifestation of Christ. The Magi from the East came to worship the birth of the Virgin. Today, we celebrate this day and offer the owed solemnity and discourse to it. This day first dawned on them, it returns to us with annual festivity. They were the first fruits of the Gentiles, we are the people of the Gentiles. To us, the Apostles announced this by word, to them a star as if the language of the heavens: and to us, the same Apostles, as if the heavens, declared the glory of God. For why should we not recognize them as the heavens, who have become the seat of God? As it is written: "The soul of the just is the seat of wisdom." For through these heavens, He, the creator and inhabitant of the heavens, thundered, whereupon the world trembled with thunder, and behold, now it believes. A great sacrament. He then lay in a manger, and led the Magi from the East. He was hidden in the stable and recognized in the heaven; so that being recognized in heaven He might be manifested in the stable, and this day might be called "Epiphany," which in Latin can be said to mean manifestation: at once commending both His grandeur and humility, so that He who was shown in the open heaven by signs in the stars, was sought and found in a narrow lodging; weak in infant limbs, wrapped in infant swaddling clothes, worshipped by the Magi, feared by the wicked.

Herod's terror. For King Herod feared him, because the same Magi, while still seeking the child whom they had known to be born under witness of the sky, relayed the news to him. What will be the tribunal of the judge, when the cradles of an infant terrified proud kings? Now, kings more prudently do not seek to kill as Herod did; but rather, like the Magi, find delight in adoring him, especially as the one who endured even the death the enemy desired to inflict, for the sake of his enemies, and in his body, being killed, he killed death. Let kings now piously fear him, who sits already at the right hand of the Father, whom that impious king feared while he was still sucking at his mother’s breasts. Let them hear what is written: And now, kings, understand; be instructed, you who judge the earth: Serve the Lord with fear, and rejoice with trembling. For that king, the avenger of impious kings, and the ruler of the pious, was not born as kings are born in this world; because he was born, whose kingdom is not of this world. There was nobility in the birth of the virgin who gave birth; and nobility in the divinity of the one born. Indeed, while so many kings of the Jews were already born and deceased, never did the Magi seek to adore any of them: because they never learned of any of them under the speaking sky. The unbelief of the Jews.

Nevertheless, what should not be passed over, this enlightenment of the Magi stood as a great testimony to the blindness of the Jews. In their land, these men sought whom those in their own land did not recognize. Among them, these men found the infant whom those in their land denied while he was teaching. In their lands, these distant strangers adored the Christ child not yet speaking words, where those citizens crucified him as a young man performing miracles. These men recognized God in small limbs; those men did not spare him even in great deeds, as if it were more to see a new star shining at his birth than the sun mourning at his death. Indeed, that same star which led the Magi to the place where the infant God was with his virgin mother, which certainly could have led them to the very city itself, however hid itself and did not appear to them at all until they questioned those same Jews about the city in which Christ was to be born, so that they would name it according to the testimony of divine Scripture, and they said: In Bethlehem of Judea. For so it is written: And you, Bethlehem, land of Judea, you are not the least among the rulers of Judah: for out of you shall come a ruler who will shepherd my people Israel. What else did divine providence signify here, except that the divine Scriptures would remain with the Jews alone, by which the Gentiles would be instructed, and they would be blinded; which they carried not for the assistance of their own salvation, but for the testimony of our salvation? For today, when we present the prophecies about Christ already accomplished and illuminated by the light of fulfilled events, if perhaps the pagans whom we wish to win over were to say that they were not so much predicted before, but after the events, so that those things that happened were thought to be prophesied, we recite the books of the Jews, to remove the doubt of the pagans: who were already figured in those Magi, whom the Jews instructed about the city in which Christ was born with divine words, and they themselves neither sought him nor recognized him.

Christ has united the Jews and the Gentiles to Himself.

Now therefore, beloved, sons and heirs of grace, see your calling and adhere with the most persevering love to Christ, manifested to Jews and Gentiles as the cornerstone. For he was manifested in the very cradles of his infancy to those who were near and to those who were far; to the Jews in the nearness of the shepherds, to the Gentiles in the distance of the Magi. The former believe that on the day he was born, the latter believe they came to him today. He was therefore manifested, neither to the learned nor to the righteous. For ignorance prevails in the rusticity of the shepherds, and impiety in the sacrileges of the Magi. That cornerstone has drawn both to itself: for he came to choose the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and not to call the righteous, but sinners; so that no great person should be proud, and no lowly person should despair. Hence the Scribes and Pharisees, seeing themselves as too learned and too righteous, showed the city of his birth by reciting prophetic writings, but they rejected him, the builders. But because he was made the head of the corner, and what he showed at birth, he fulfilled through suffering; to this we adhere, together with the other wall having the remnants of Israel, which have been saved through the election of grace. For those shepherds prefigured them to be joined nearby, so that we also, whose calling from afar the coming of the Magi signified, no longer strangers and sojourners, but fellow citizens of the saints and members of the household of God, remain built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, with Christ Jesus himself being the chief cornerstone: who made both one, that in one we might love unity, and to gather the branches which were also grafted from the wild olive tree, who through pride have been broken and have become heretics, because God is able again to graft them in, let us have tireless charity.

Sermons - Sermon 201

SERMO 201 ON THE EPIPHANY OF THE LORD The manifestation of Christ to the Gentiles. A few days ago we celebrated the birth of the Lord: but today we celebrate with no less due solemnity the manifestation by which he began to be revealed to the Gentiles. On that day, Jewish shepherds saw the newborn; today, the Magi coming from the East adored him. For that cornerstone had been born, the peace of the two walls, from the circumcision and the foreskin, coming from no small diversity; so that in him they might be united, who became our peace, and made both one. This was prefigured in the Jewish shepherds and the Gentile Magi. From this beginning, it would bear fruit and grow throughout the whole world. Therefore, let us regard both days, the Nativity and the Manifestation of our Lord, with most grateful spiritual joy. The Jewish shepherds were brought to him by the announcement of an angel, the Gentile Magi by the demonstration of a star. This star confounded the vain calculations and divinations of astrologers, as it showed to the worshippers of the stars the Creator of heaven and earth to be worshipped instead. For he himself declared a new star upon being born, who darkened the ancient sun upon being crucified. By that light, the faith of the Gentiles was initiated; by those darknesses, the perfidy of the Jews was denounced. What was that star, which neither appeared among the stars before nor remained to be shown afterward? What was it but the magnificent language of the heavens, that would proclaim the glory of God, that would announce the unprecedented birth of a virgin with an unprecedented radiance, after which the Gospel would follow, appearing throughout the whole world? Finally, what did the coming Magi say? Where is he who has been born king of the Jews? What does this mean? Surely there had already been many kings born of the Jews before? Why did they so eagerly desire to know and adore the king of a foreign nation? We have seen his star in the East, they say, and have come to worship him. Would they have sought this with such devotion, desired it with such piety, if they did not recognize him as the king of the Jews, who is also the king of the ages? In Pilate and the Magi, the nations are signified.

Hence, even Pilate was surely influenced by a certain breath of truth, when during His passion he wrote the title: King of the Jews, which the Jews attempted falsely to correct. To whom he responded: What I have written, I have written, because it was foretold in the Psalm: Do not destroy the inscription of the title. Let us therefore observe this great and wonderful mystery. The magi were from the Gentiles, Pilate himself also from the Gentiles: they saw the star in the sky, he wrote the title on the wood: both, however, sought or acknowledged not the king of the Gentiles, but of the Jews. The Jews themselves neither followed the star, nor agreed with the title. Already, therefore, it was foreshadowed what the Lord Himself later said: Many will come from the east and the west, and will recline with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven, but the sons of the kingdom will be put into outer darkness. For the magi came from the east, Pilate came from the west. Hence, they attested to the king of the Jews from the east, that is, at birth; and he from the west, that is, at death: so that they might recline in the kingdom of heaven with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob, from whom the Jews derived their origin; not propagated from them through the flesh, but grafted into them through faith: so that the wild olive about which the Apostle speaks, destined to be grafted into the olive tree, might already be foreshadowed. For this reason, indeed, not the king of the Gentiles, but of the Jews, was sought or acknowledged by these same Gentiles; because the wild olive comes to the olive tree, not the olive tree to the wild olive. The branches, however, to be broken, that is, the unfaithful Jews, responded to the magi inquiring where Christ was to be born: In Bethlehem of Judea; and, being reproached by Pilate for wanting their king to be crucified, they raged obstinately. Thus, the magi worshipped, with the Jews showing the place of Christ’s birth; because in the Scripture, which the Jews received, we know Christ. Pilate, from the Gentiles, washed his hands, with the Jews demanding the death of Christ; for by the blood which the Jews shed, we wash away our sins. But of Pilate's testimony through the title, in which he wrote that Christ was the king of the Jews, there is another place for discussion: which is the time of the passion. The Jews are guardians of the Scriptures for the salvation of the Gentiles.

Now, as it pertains to the manifestation of the birth of Christ, on whose day of manifestation, which is called Epiphany in Greek, He began to be revealed to the Gentiles when the Magi adored Him, let us say a few remaining things. For it is indeed delightful to consider how, when the Magi were seeking where Christ was to be born, the Jews responded: "In Bethlehem of Judea"; yet they themselves did not come to Him, but the star led the Magi to the place where the Child was, after they had left; thus it was shown that the star could indicate the city, but withdrew itself somewhat for the Jews to inquire. Now, the Jews were asked for this reason: to show that they carried divine testimonies not for themselves, but for the salvation and knowledge of the Gentiles. For this reason, that nation was expelled from its kingdom and scattered across the lands, so that they might be compelled to become witnesses of the faith they were enemies to, everywhere. For, having lost the temple, sacrifices, priesthood, and the kingdom itself, they preserve the name and lineage through a few ancient sacraments; so that, mixed with the Gentiles, they may not perish indistinguishably, and lose the testimony of truth: just as Cain received a sign, so that no one would slay him who, out of envy and pride, killed his righteous brother. Certainly, this can be understood fittingly in the fifty-eighth psalm, where Christ speaks in the person of His Body and says: "My God has shown me in my enemies, do not slay them, lest they forget Your law." Indeed, in those enemies of the Christian faith, it is demonstrated to the Gentiles how Christ was prophesied: lest, when they saw the prophecies fulfilled with such great manifestation, they might think these same Scriptures were fabricated by Christians, when what was foretold about Christ is recited, which they see fulfilled. Therefore, the books are brought forth by the Jews, and thus God shows us in our enemies; whom He did not kill, that is, did not utterly destroy from the lands, lest they forget His law: which, by reading, and observing some aspects of it carnally, they remember, to bring judgment upon themselves and offer testimony to us.

Sermons - Sermon 202

SERMO 202 ON THE EPIPHANY OF THE LORD The Epiphany of Christ is a manifestation. The solemnity of today, known throughout the entire world, advises us, by its recurring celebration, to speak about what festivity it brings us and what it commemorates through its annual repetition. "Epiphany," in Greek, can be said as "manifestation" in Latin. For on this day, the Magi are reported to have adored the Lord; having been informed by the appearing star and guided by it. Indeed, on the day He was born, they saw the star in the East and recognized whom it indicated as born. From that day to this day they traveled, alarming King Herod with their message, and, with the Jews responding from the prophetic Scripture, found Bethlehem, the city where the Lord was born. Then, being led by the same star, they came to the Lord Himself, adored the one shown to them, offered gold, incense, and myrrh, and returned by another route. Indeed, the Lord was also manifested on the very day of His birth to shepherds warned by an angel; and on that same day, He was announced by the star to those in the distant East: but on this day He was adored by them. Therefore, the entire Church of the Gentiles devoutly adopted this day to be celebrated; for what, then, were those Magi but the firstfruits of the Gentiles? Israelite shepherds, Gentile Magi: the former were near, the latter far: yet both ran to the cornerstone. For, as the Apostle says, "Coming, He preached peace to us who were far, and peace to those who were near." For He is our peace, who made both one, and created in Himself one new man from the two, making peace, and reconciled both to God in one body through the cross, thereby killing the enmity in Himself. The first fruits of the Gentiles gathered in the magi.

Rightly, the heretical Donatists have never wished to celebrate this day with us: because they neither love unity nor communicate with the Eastern Church, where that star appeared. However, let us celebrate the manifestation of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, by which He brought the firstfruits of the Gentiles, in the unity of the Gentiles. For then as a child, before He knew how to call father or mother, as had been prophesied about Him, He received the strength of Damascus, and the spoils of Samaria: that is, before He spoke human words through human flesh, He received the strength of Damascus, namely, that from which Damascus boasted. Indeed, that city had once boasted in its worldly riches. But in riches, royalty is conferred with gold, which the Magi humbly offered to Christ. The spoils of Samaria were indeed the same as those who inhabited it. For Samaria is used as a symbol of idolatry. For there the people of Israel, turned away from the Lord, turned to worship idols. Christ, intending to lay waste to the kingdom of the devil throughout the whole world with a spiritual sword, first took away these spoils of idolatry as a child, so that He might turn the Magi to Himself, turning them away from the plague of that superstition, and spoke from heaven by the star, although not yet speaking on earth with a tongue; to show who He was, why He came, and for whom, not by a voice of flesh, but by the power of the Word made flesh. For this Word, which was in the beginning with God and was God, was already made flesh to dwell among us, had come to us, and remained with the Father; not deserting the angels above, and gathering men to Himself below through the angels; shining with unchangeable truth to the celestial inhabitants according to the Word, and laying in a narrow crib for the sake of a tiny dwelling. He was pointed out by the star in heaven, and shown to be worshiped on earth. And yet, as an infant so powerful, so great, He fled to Egypt with His parents to escape Herod’s enmity: thus, not yet speaking in words, but already speaking through His actions to His members, and silently saying: "If they persecute you in one city, flee to another." Carrying mortal flesh, in which He prefigured us and in which He was also going to die for us at the appropriate time. Hence, from those Magi, He not only received gold to be honored, and frankincense to be adored, but also myrrh to be buried. How innocent and humble those who would die for His name must be, He showed in the little ones whom Herod killed. For the whole Law and the Prophets depend on those same commandments, and He signified that number by their two-year-old age. The Jews show Christ by their rites. But now, who does not become attentive, considering what is meant by the Jews' response from Scripture to the inquiry of the Magi about where Christ was born, and yet they themselves did not worship Him with them? Do we not see this even now, when among those very sacraments, to which their hardness is subjected, nothing else but Christ, whom they refuse to believe in, is shown? Do they not also, when they kill the lamb and eat the Passover, demonstrate Christ to the Gentiles, whom they themselves do not worship with them? For what about this, that often from the prophetic testimonies by which Christ was foretold, and for those doubting men who might think that they were composed not before but after the events by the Christians, we call upon the books of the Jews to strengthen the minds of the doubters? Do not the Jews even then show Christ to the Gentiles, whom they refuse to worship with the Gentiles? The way changed, life changed.

Therefore, beloved, we, of whom those Magi were the first fruits, we, the inheritance of Christ to the ends of the earth, for whose sake blindness in part happened to Israel, so that the fullness of the Gentiles might enter, having known our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, who for our consolation lay then in a small lodging, now for our exaltation sits in heaven; let us so announce Him in this land, in this region of our flesh, that we do not return the way we came, nor retrace the footsteps of our former conduct. For this is what those Magi did; they did not return the way they came. The way was changed, the life was changed. And the heavens have declared to us the glory of God; and the shining truth from the Gospel, as a star from heaven, has led us to worship Christ; and we have heard with a faithful ear the prophecy celebrated among the Jewish people, as a sign of the Jews not journeying with us; and recognizing and praising Christ as king and priest and who died for us, we have honored Him as with gold, frankincense, and myrrh: it remains for us to take a new path, evangelizing Him, and not return the way we came.

Sermons - Sermon 203

SERMO 203 On the Epiphany of the Lord The feast of Epiphany was rightly instituted.

"Epiphania" in the Greek language can be said in Latin as "manifestatio." Therefore, on this day, the Redeemer of all nations has manifested himself and has made this day a solemnity for all nations. Just as we celebrated his birth a few days ago, today we celebrate his manifestation. Our Lord Jesus Christ was born thirteen days ago and is said to have been adored by the Magi today. Because it happened, the truth of the Gospel speaks: on what day it happened, the authority of such a renowned solemnity proclaims everywhere. For it seemed just, and truly is just, that since the Magi were the first from the Gentiles to know Christ the Lord and, not yet moved by his word, followed the star that appeared to them, visibly speaking as if it were the Word as an infant, like the tongue of heaven, to recognize the day of their salvation with gratitude, and to dedicate it to the Lord Christ with solemn service and thanksgiving. For the first fruits of the Jews to the faith and revelation of Christ were among those shepherds who saw him coming close on the very day he was born. Angels announced it to them; a star announced it to these ones. To them it was said: Glory to God in the highest; in these ones was fulfilled: The heavens declare the glory of God. Both indeed, like the beginnings of two walls coming from different directions, circumcision and foreskin, ran to the cornerstone: so that he might be their peace, making both one. The humility of the nations.

Nevertheless, they praised God because they had seen Christ; but these [Magi] not only saw Christ but also adored Him. In them [the shepherds], grace was prior; in these, humility was greater. Therefore, perhaps those shepherds, being less guilty, rejoiced more eagerly about salvation; but these Magi, burdened with many sins, more humbly sought forgiveness. This is the humility that divine Scripture commends more in those who were from the Gentiles than in the Jews. For that Centurion was from the Gentiles, who, when he had received the Lord in his whole heart, nevertheless said he was unworthy that He should enter his house, nor did he wish his sick servant to be seen by Him, but to be ordered well. Thus, he retained Him present within his heart, reverently withdrawing His physical presence from his roof. Indeed, the Lord said, 'I have not found such great faith in Israel.' The Canaanite woman was also from the Gentiles, who, when she heard from the Lord that she was a dog, unworthy of the children's bread, asked for crumbs as a dog: and therefore, she merited to receive because she did not deny what she was. For she also heard from the Lord: 'O woman, great is your faith.' Humility had made her faith great, because it had made her small in her own eyes. The salvation of all nations symbolized. The shepherds therefore come from nearby to see, and the Magi come from afar to worship. This is the humility by which the wild olive tree deserved to be grafted into the olive tree, and to produce an olive against nature; because it deserved to change nature through grace. For when the world was becoming entirely wild and bitter with this wild olive, it shined forth, having been made rich through the grace of grafting. For they come from the ends of the earth, according to Jeremiah, saying: Truly our fathers have worshipped lies. And they come, not from one part of the world, but as the Gospel according to Luke says, from the East, and from the West, from the North and the South, who will recline with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven. Thus, the whole world is called from the four corners into faith by the grace of the Trinity. According to this number, when four are multiplied by three, the apostolic number twelve is consecrated; as prefiguring the salvation of the entire world from the four parts of the world, in the grace of the Trinity. For this number was also signified by that dish which was shown to Peter, full of all animals, as if signifying all nations. For it was also suspended by four lines from heaven, and having been let down three times was taken up; so that four times three made twelve. Therefore, perhaps after the birth of the Lord, with twelve days added, the Magi, the first fruits of the Gentiles, came to see and worship Christ, and they deserved to signify not only their own salvation, but also that of all nations. Therefore, let us also celebrate this day most devoutly; and let us worship the Lord Jesus, whom those first fruits of ours worshipped lying in the inn, dwelling in heaven. For they worshipped in Him what was to come, which we worship as fulfilled. The first fruits of the Gentiles worshipped Him nursing at His mother's breasts; the Gentiles worship Him sitting at the right hand of God the Father.

Sermons - Sermon 204

SERMO 204 ON THE EPIPHANY OF THE LORD Two manifestations of Christ. A few days ago we celebrated the Birth of the Lord; today we celebrate Epiphany, which is signified by the Greek word "manifestation," and it refers to what the Apostle said: Without doubt, great is the mystery of piety, which was manifested in the flesh. Therefore, both days pertain to the manifestation of Christ. On that day, indeed, the human being was born from a human mother, who was God with the Father without beginning; but in the flesh He was manifested in the flesh; because the flesh could not see Him as He was in the spirit. And on that day, which is called His nativity, the Jewish shepherds saw Him; but on this day, which is properly called "Epiphany," that is "manifestation," the Magi of the Gentiles worshipped Him. To them, angels announced Him, but to these, a star announced Him. Angels inhabit the heavens, and stars adorn them: thus to each the heavens have declared the glory of God.

Christ is the cornerstone of two peoples. For to both he was born as the cornerstone, that, as the Apostle says, he might create in himself one new man out of the two, making peace, and might reconcile both in one body to God through the cross. For what is a corner but the joining of two walls coming from different directions, and there in a certain way they find the kiss of peace? Indeed, circumcision and uncircumcision, that is, Jews and Gentiles, were hostile to each other because of two different and opposite things: on one side, the worship of the one true God, on the other, of many and false gods. Therefore, when those were near, and these were far off, he brought both to himself, who reconciled both in one body to God, as the same Apostle subsequently adds: through the cross killing the enmities in himself. And coming, he preached peace to you who were far off, and peace to those who were near; for through him we both have access in one Spirit to the Father. See if he did not also show both walls, coming from the diversity of hostilities, and the cornerstone signifies the Lord Jesus, to whom from different directions both have come near, in whom both have harmonized, that is, both those who from the Jews believed in him and those from the Gentiles, as if it were said to them: And you from near, and you from afar, come to him, and be enlightened, and your faces shall not be ashamed. For it is written: Behold, I lay in Zion a cornerstone, chosen, precious; and whoever believes in him will not be confounded. Those who heard and obeyed, from both sides they came, held peace, ended enmities; the firstfruits of both were shepherds and Magi. In them began the ox to know its owner, and the donkey the manger of its lord. From the Jews, the horned animal, where the horns of the cross were being prepared for Christ; from the Gentiles, the eared animal, whence it was foretold: A people whom I did not know has served me; in the hearing of the ear it has obeyed me. For the possessor of the ox and the lord of the donkey lay in the manger, supplying common food to both. Therefore, because peace had come to those who were far off, and peace to those who were near, the shepherds, Israelites, as found nearby, came to him on the day Christ was born, saw, and rejoiced; but the Magi, Gentiles, as found afar, having so many days intervening from the day he was born, arrived today, found, and worshiped. It was fitting, therefore, for us, that is, the Church gathered from the Gentiles, to join the celebration of this day, when Christ was manifested as the firstfruits of the Gentiles, to the celebration of that day when Christ was born among the Jews, and to observe the memory of such a great sacrament with doubled solemnity.

Some of the Jews were rejected, others chosen. When these two walls are considered, one from the Jews, the other from the Gentiles, adhering to the cornerstone, keeping the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace, let not the multitude of reprobate Jews offend the mind, among whom were the builders, that is, those wanting to be teachers of the law, but as the Apostle says: Not understanding what they speak, nor about what they affirm. For through this blindness of mind, they rejected the stone which became the head of the corner. But it would not become the head of the corner unless it offered a peaceful junction to two peoples coming from different directions, joined by grace. Therefore, let not the persecutors and killers of Christ be considered in the Israelitic wall, as though building the law and destroying the faith, rejecting the cornerstone and causing ruin to the wretched city. Nor let the multitude of Jews dispersed throughout the lands be considered there, bearing testimony of divine scriptures, which they carry everywhere unknowingly. For in these Jacob limps, whose thigh was touched and withered, signifying the multitude of his descendants limping from their paths. But in the holy wall, those who from them approached the peace of the cornerstone should be considered, in whom Jacob is blessed. For he is both blessed and limping: blessed in the sanctified, limping in the reprobate. They should be considered in this wall, whose abundance preceded and followed the donkey of the Savior, crying: Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord! They should be considered, who from there were chosen as disciples and made apostles. Consider Stephen, named in Greek "crown," and first crowned with martyrdom after the Lord's resurrection. Also consider the thousands of believers from among the persecutors, when the Holy Spirit came. Consider the churches of which the Apostle says: But I was unknown by face to the churches of Judea which are in Christ; they were only hearing that he who once persecuted us now preaches the faith he once destroyed; and they glorified God in me. In this way the Israelitic wall should be considered, and be joined to the wall coming from the Gentiles, which is now visible, and thus the cornerstone, first laid in the manger, and raised up to the height of heaven, is found to be Christ the Lord as foretold.

Sermons - Sermon 204A

Sermon 204 Sermon on the Epiphany "The star like the language of the heavens." The heavens declare the glory of God, the star led the magi to Christ to be worshipped. These magi were the first fruits of the Gentiles. They exhort you to do what they did. Today Christ received gifts, put your hands into your bags, bring forth from them what is pleasing to Christ. For he wished to be in need in his poor, and there was no place for him in the inn, for whom the whole world is not sufficient, and he was placed, as you know, in a manger. He was sought to be worshipped, he lay concealed when revealed. The Jews are asked where Christ is born, they say: in Bethlehem. They show the way to go but do not go. Milestones indicate the road, they are fixed in place. A star appears as if the language of the heavens, it guides the magi, it shows the place. Childhood is not despised, the small one is adored, because he is understood to be great. The Word of God received gifts, still as an infant he was silent and yet was in the teaching of angels. Still he was silent about what was to be fulfilled in the Gospel.

"Our childhood in Christ is eloquence." For the heavens were also to declare His glory afterward; the heavens are the apostles, shining with miracles, thundering with precepts. For it is said of them: Their sound went out into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world. How could the words that reached to the ends of the earth remain hidden from us? They came to us, found us, and changed us. The weakness of Christ is our strength, the infancy of Christ is our eloquence, the necessity of Christ is our abundance, because even afterward the death of Christ became our life. The bread from heaven lay in a manger. If you, the Lord's cattle, are hungry, come and carry Him in your hearts and you are His cattle. He is your rider, He is your fodder. You know that He sat on a donkey and led that donkey into Jerusalem. Carry Him; He knows where to lead you. Walk securely, you will not be in error under such a great rider; it is the way that leads to the heavenly Jerusalem. It is faith; walk in it, so that you may carry Christ and reach eternal blessedness.

Sermons - Sermon 205

SERMO 205

During Lent A Christian ought perpetually to hang upon the cross. The observance of Lent, presented with solemn return, we enter on this day: on which our exhortation is also solemnly due to you; so that the word of God, ministered through our service, may feed in the heart those who will fast with the body; and thus the inner man, refreshed with his food, may be able to carry out the chastisement of the outer one and endure it more robustly. For it is fitting for our devotion that we, who are about to celebrate the approaching passion of the crucified Lord, should also make a cross for ourselves by restraining carnal desires, as the Apostle says: “And those who belong to Christ Jesus have crucified the flesh with its passions and desires.” Indeed, on this cross, throughout this whole life, which is led amid temptations, the Christian ought to perpetually hang. For in this life there is no time to remove the nails, of which it is said in the Psalm: “Pierce my flesh with fear of you.” The flesh is carnal desires; the nails are the precepts of justice: these the fear of the Lord fastens, which crucifies us as an acceptable sacrifice to him. Hence, the Apostle says again: “I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, to present your bodies as a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God.” Therefore, this cross, on which the servant of God is not only not ashamed but also glories, saying: “But far be it from me to glory except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by which the world has been crucified to me, and I to the world:” this cross, I say, is not of forty days, but of this entire life, which is signified by the mystical number of these forty days; whether it is because man, who is to live this life, as some assert, is formed in the womb in forty days; or because the four Gospels agree with the ten Commandments, and four times ten marks this number, demonstrating that both Scriptures are necessary for us in this life; or for some other more probable reason, which a better and clearer intellect can discover. Hence both Moses and Elijah and the Lord himself fasted for forty days: so that it might be indicated to us in Moses and Elijah and in Christ himself, that is, in the Law and the Prophets and in the Gospel itself, that this is to be done with us, that we may not conform and cling to this world, but crucify the old man, not acting in revellings and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envy; but put on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make no provision for the flesh in its lusts.” Live thus always here, Christian: if you do not wish to immerse your steps in earthly mire, do not descend from this cross. But if this is to be done throughout this whole life, how much more through these days of Lent, in which this life is not only acted but also signified?

Pious works must be practiced more fervently.

Therefore, on other days, do not let your hearts be weighed down by gluttony and drunkenness; but on these days also fast. On other days, do not touch adulteries, fornications, and all illicit corruptions: but on these days also abstain from your spouses. What you deprive yourselves of in fasting, add in almsgiving. The time that was occupied in rendering the marital duty, let it be spent in supplications. The body that was released in carnal affections, let it be humbled with pure prayers. The hands that were entwined in embraces, let them be extended in prayers. But you who also fast on other days, increase what you do on these days. You who crucify the body in perpetual continence on other days, cling to your God with more frequent and earnest prayers on these days. All in unity, all faithful, all faithfully, all in this pilgrimage, sighing with the desire of one homeland, and burning with love. No one should envy the gift of God that he does not have in another, nor ridicule it. In spiritual goods, consider yours what you love in your brother: let him consider his what he loves in you. Let no one under the guise of abstinence seek rather to change than to cut off delights; so as to seek precious foods because he does not eat meat, and unusual drinks because he does not drink wine: lest under the pretense of taming the flesh, he rather engages in the business of pleasure. Indeed, all foods are clean to the clean: but in none is luxury clean. From disputes, fasting first and foremost.

Above all, brothers, fast from quarrels and discord. Remember the prophet reproaching and crying out to some: In the days of your fast, your desires are found, for you lash out against everyone who is under your yoke, and you strike with fists; your voice is heard in an uproar, and the other such things. After recalling these, he added: This is not the fast that I have chosen, says the Lord. If you wish to cry out, engage in that cry about which it is written: I cried out to the Lord with my voice. For that cry is indeed not of quarrel, but of charity; not of the flesh, but of the heart. It is not like that which is said: I expected him to do justice, but he did iniquity; and not righteousness, but a cry. Forgive, and you will be forgiven; give, and it will be given to you. These are the two wings of prayer, by which it flies to God: if he forgives what is committed, pardoning the one who errs, and giving to the one in need.

Sermons - Sermon 206

SERMO 206 In Lent The time of Lent is one of humility. The time of the anniversary return of Lent has arrived, in which our exhortation is owed to you: because you also owe works to the Lord suitable for this time: which nonetheless cannot be beneficial to the Lord, but to yourselves. At other times too, prayers, fastings, almsgivings, and other such things ought to be fervent for the Christian; however, this solemnity ought to stir even those who are sluggish in these on other days; and those who are eager for these on other days ought now to exercise them more fervently. For the time of our humility in this world is signified by these days, with the Lord Christ for us, who suffered by dying once, as if again revolving this solemnity every year. For what was done once in the whole time, so that our life might be renewed; is celebrated every year so that it might be recalled to memory. Therefore if with the truest feeling of piety, in the whole time of this pilgrimage, in which we live in the midst of temptations, we ought to be humble in heart: how much more in these days, in which we not only live through the time of our humility, but also signify it by celebrating? The humility of Christ taught us to be humble, because by dying He yielded to the wicked: the loftiness of Christ makes us exalted, because by rising again He has preceded the pious. For if we have died with Him, says the Apostle, we shall also live with Him: if we endure, we shall also reign with Him. One of these we now celebrate with due devotion, as His passion approaches; the other after Easter, as the completion of His resurrection. For then after the days of this humility, though it is not yet the time of our exaltation to be seen; even now, however, it delights to signify it through forethought. Therefore let us now groan more earnestly in prayers: then we shall be gladdened more abundantly in praises.

Two kinds of almsgiving: giving and forgiving. But to our prayers, so that they may more easily reach God by flying, let us add wings of piety with almsgiving and fasting. From this, however, the Christian mind understands how remote it should be from the fraud of another's goods; when it feels that it is similar to fraud if it does not give its surplus to the needy. The Lord says: Give and it will be given to you; forgive and you will be forgiven. These two kinds of alms, giving and forgiving, let us practice mercifully and fervently; so that we may pray to the Lord for good things to be given to us, and for bad things not to be rewarded to us. He says: Give, and it will be given to you. What could be more true, what could be more just, than that he who refuses to give, defrauds himself and does not receive? If a farmer shamelessly seeks a harvest where he knows he has not sown seed, how much more shamelessly does one seek a rich God giving, who refused to listen to a poor man asking? For he who does not hunger willed to be fed in the poor. Therefore, let us not despise our needy God in the poor, so that we, needing, may be satisfied in the rich. We have the needy, and we need: let us give, therefore, so that we may receive. Nonetheless, what is it that we give? And for this small, visible, temporal, and earthly thing, what is it that we desire to receive? What eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor has it entered into the heart of man. Unless He Himself promised it, it would have been shameless to give these things and desire to receive those: and not to want to give even these things: which, however, we would not have at all unless He who gives exhorts that we should give. With what face, therefore, do we hope for the giver in both, if we despise the commander in the least things? Forgive, and you will be forgiven. That is, forgive, and you will be forgiven. Let a fellow servant be reconciled to a fellow servant, lest a servant be justly punished by the Lord. In this kind of almsgiving, no one is poor. He who does not have the means to live for a time can do this, so that he may live forever. It is given freely, accumulated by giving, and not consumed except when not distributed. Let those whose enmities have lasted until these days be confounded and ended. Let them be ended so that they may not end: not held, so that they may not hold: let them be destroyed by the redeemer, lest they may destroy the retainer.

Fasts acceptable to God.

Let your fasts not be such as the prophet condemns, saying: "This is not the fast that I have chosen," says the Lord. For he reproves the fasts of the contentious: he seeks those of the pious. He reproves oppressors: he seeks those who relieve burdens. He reproves the quarrelsome: he seeks the liberators. Therefore, during these days, you restrain your desires from lawful things, so that you do not commit unlawful acts. Let no one indulge in wine or commit adultery on any day, who during these days refrains even from marriage. Thus our prayer, in humility and charity, fasting and giving, temperance and forgiveness, bestowing good and not returning evil, turning from evil and doing good, seeks peace and attains it. For prayer flies supported by such wings of virtues: and where Christ, our peace, has gone before, it is more easily carried to heaven.

Sermons - Sermon 207

SERMO 207 In Lent What greater mercy could there be from the Lord? With the help of the mercy of the Lord our God, the temptations of the age, the snares of the devil, the labor of the world, the enticement of the flesh, the waves of tumultuous times, and all bodily and spiritual adversity, are to be overcome by alms, fasting, and prayers. These things must be fervent through the whole life of a Christian; especially as the solemnity of Easter approaches, which with its annual return awakens our minds; renewing in them the saving memory that our Lord, the only Son of God, showed mercy to us, fasted, and prayed for us. "Alms," indeed, is Greek for "mercy." For what greater mercy could there be upon the wretched than that which brought the creator of heaven down from heaven, and clothed the founder of the earth in an earthly body; him who, remaining equal with the Father in eternity, equated himself with us in mortality, took the form of a servant upon the Lord of the world; so that he, the bread, hungered, the satisfaction, thirsted, the virtue, weakened, the health, was wounded, and the life, died? But this was so that our hunger might be fed, our dryness watered, our infirmity consoled, our iniquity extinguished, our love might kindle. What greater mercy than that the creator be created, the Lord serve, the redeemer be sold, the exalter be humbled, the reviver be killed? We are commanded to give alms and give bread to the hungry; he, so that he might give himself to us who hunger, first handed himself over to those who rage against us. We are commanded to receive the stranger: he came for us into his own, and his own did not receive him. Bless our soul, indeed, him who has mercy on all its iniquities, who heals all its diseases, who redeems its life from corruption, who crowns it with compassion and mercy: who satisfies its desire with good things. Therefore, let us exercise our alms-giving all the more diligently and frequently, as the day on which the conferred alms are celebrated approaches nearer to us. For fasting without mercy is nothing to him who fasts.

Pleasures should be diminished, not changed.

Let us fast, also humbling our souls, as the day approaches on which the master of humility humbled himself, becoming obedient even unto the death of the cross. Let us imitate his cross, fixing our desires, tamed by the nails of abstinence. Let us chastise our bodies and subject them to servitude, so that we do not fall into illicit desires through an unchecked flesh, and let us deny ourselves even permissible things to this end. Gluttony and drunkenness must be avoided even on other days; but during these days, even permitted meals should be avoided. Adultery and fornication are always to be detested and fled from; but in these days, even relations with spouses should be tempered. Your flesh will easily obey you, not to cling to foreign things, it being accustomed to be restrained from its own. Certainly, one must take care not to change pleasures, not to diminish them. For you see some who, in place of their usual wine, seek unusual drinks and, from the expression of other fruits, make up for what they deny themselves from the grape with far more delicious things; they seek foods outside of meats with various varieties and delights; and the pleasures which at other times they are ashamed to follow, they conveniently gather up for this time: so, indeed, the observance of Lent is not the repression of old desires, but the occasion for new delicacies. Brothers, as much as you can, provide with vigilance that these things do not sneak in and persuade you. Parsimony should be joined with fasting. Just as the fullness of the stomach is to be chastised, so the irritations of the palate must be avoided. It is not human foods that are to be hated, but carnal delight that is to be restrained. Esau was rejected not for a fattened calf or birds, but for the lentil soup he desired immoderately. Holy David repented for desiring water more than he should have. Therefore, the body is to be refreshed, or rather supported, not with elaborate or costly foods, but with those which are at hand and more humble.

Always fast from hatred, always nourish prayer with love. In these days, our prayer is uplifted to the heavens by the supports of pious alms and frugal fasts: for mercy is not shamelessly sought from God when it is not denied by man to man, nor is the serene intention of the praying heart obstructed by the cloudiness of carnal pleasures. However, let prayer be chaste, so that perhaps we may not wish for what greed, not what charity, seeks; let us not wish harm upon enemies; let us not, by praying, rage against those whom we cannot harm or avenge. Indeed, just as we become fit for prayer by almsgiving and fasting, so too does our prayer itself perform almsgiving when it is directed and poured out not only for friends but also for enemies, and it fasts from anger and hatred and the most pernicious vices. For if we fast from food, how much more from poisons? Thus, at appropriate and opportune times, we are refreshed by the consumption of food; let us never indulge it with such foods. Let this fasting be perpetual: for it has its own proper food, which it is commanded to take without interruption. Therefore, let it always fast from hatred, always be nourished by love.

Sermons - Sermon 208

SERMO 208 In Lent Pleasures must be restrained, not changed. The solemn time has arrived when we should remind you and exhort you in the Lord's Love: although the very time itself, even without us speaking, sufficiently reminds and exhorts you to fervently engage in fasting, prayers, and alms more earnestly and eagerly than usual. But the ministry of our sermon is added so that the trumpet of this voice may give strength to your spirit, which is about to fight against the flesh. Let your fasts, therefore, be without quarrels, outcries, and conflicts, so that even those under your yoke feel cautious and kind remission, and harsh severity may be restrained, not so that beneficial discipline is dissolved. And when you abstain from certain kinds of even permitted and lawful foods for the purpose of chastening the body, remember that to the pure, all things are pure: do not think anything is unclean unless unbelief has made it so. For to the impure and the unbelieving, says the Apostle, nothing is pure. But clearly, when the bodies of the faithful are subjected to servitude, reducing bodily pleasure profits spiritual health. Therefore, care must be taken not to seek expensive foods or other kinds in place of others, or even more costly ones without animal flesh. For when the body is chastised and subjected to servitude, delicacies must be restrained, not changed. For what matter is it, with what kind of food immoderate desire is condemned? It is certainly not only from meats, but also certain fruits and agricultural foods that the desire of the Israelites was condemned by the divine voice. And Esau lost his birthright not for a piece of pork, but for a pottage of lentils. Let me omit what the hungry Lord answered to the tempter even about bread itself: who indeed was not subduing his own flesh as rebellious, but mercifully reminding us what to answer in such temptations. Therefore, dearest ones, from whichever foods you choose to abstain, remember to preserve your resolution with pious temperance, not to condemn God's creation with sacrilegious error. Also, those of you who are bound in marriage, now especially do not disregard the apostolic admonitions to abstain from each other for a time, that you may devote yourselves to prayer. For what is beneficial to do on other days, it is far too impudent if it is not done now. I think it should not be burdensome for married people to observe this annually in solemn days, what widows have professed to do from a certain part of life, what holy virgins have undertaken all their life.

"Almsgiving must be amplified by giving and sparing."

Now indeed, to increase almsgiving in these days is, in a certain way, a duty. For where more justly than by showing mercy do you give what you deny yourself by abstaining? And what is more unjust than that what abstinence saves, ongoing avarice keeps, or delayed luxury consumes? Therefore, consider to whom you owe what you deny yourself; so that what temperance takes from pleasure, mercy adds to charity. What more shall I say of that work of mercy, where nothing is spent from the storerooms, nothing from the purse, but is forgiven from the heart; which, if it remains, is more harmful than if it departs? I speak of anger kept in the heart against someone. And what is more foolish than to avoid an external enemy, yet retain a far worse one in the innermost heart? Wherefore the Apostle says: "Let not the sun go down upon your anger;" and immediately adds: "Neither give place to the devil." As if to say that whoever does not quickly expel anger from his soul, through it, as through a door, provides entry to the devil. Thus, it must first be ensured that this sun does not set upon anger; lest the sun of justice itself desert the mind. But in whose heart it has persisted until now, let at least the approaching day of the Lord's Passion drive it out, He who was not angry with His murderers, for whom, hanging on the cross, He both prayed and shed His blood. Therefore, let anger depart from the heart of each of you by these holy days, so that prayer may proceed securely: and may it not offend, or falter, or under the stings of conscience be silenced, when it comes to that place where it must be said: "Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors." You will ask for something not to be repaid to you, and something to be given to you. Forgive, then, and you will be forgiven: give, and it will be given to you. These things, brethren, even if I do not admonish, you should care for with perpetual meditation. But since the voice of our ministry is also aided by the celebration of this present day with so many divine testimonies; I need not fear that any of you might perhaps scorn me, or rather the Lord in me: but rather hope that His flock, recognizing that what is said is His, may effectively heed Him.

Sermons - Sermon 209

SERMO 209 On Lent Quarrels must be ended by Lenten observance. The solemn time has arrived, when I remind your Charity to think more attentively about the soul and to chastise the body. For these are the most sacred forty days throughout the whole world, which, as Easter approaches, the entire world, which God reconciles to himself in Christ, celebrates with devout proclamation. If there are any hostilities, which either should not have been born or should have died quickly, but have been able to persist until this time either through negligence, obstinacy, or immodest but proud shame among brothers, let them at least end now. Those over whom the sun should not have set, at least after many risings and settings of the sun, should finally be extinguished by their own setting and not be renewed by any further rising. The negligent forgets to end hostilities; the obstinate does not want to grant forgiveness when asked; the proudly ashamed disdains to ask for forgiveness. Hostilities live through these three vices: but they kill the souls in which they do not die. Let memory keep watch against negligence, mercy against obstinacy, humble prudence against proud shame. Whoever recalls himself being neglectful of concord, let him shake off his sleepiness by waking up: whoever desires to be the debt collector of his debtor, let him consider himself a debtor to God: whoever is ashamed to ask his brother for forgiveness, let him conquer through godly fear the evil shame: so that with harmful hostilities ended, with them dead, you may live. Love does all this, which does not act wrongly. Love, my brothers, to the extent that it is present, should be exercised by living well; to the extent that it is lacking, it should be sought by praying.

Almsgiving aids prayer. But in order that our prayers may be helped by suitable aids, since in these days we ought to have them more fervent; let us also distribute alms more fervently. Let what is taken away from us by fasting and abstaining from usual foods be added to them. Although he ought to have larger ones who, due to some necessity of his body and the custom of foods, cannot abstain, so that he may add to the poor what he takes away from himself: but let the pious person give to the poor for this reason, because he does not take it away from himself; so that since he is less able to aid his prayers by chastising his body, he may include more abundant alms in the heart of the poor, which can pray for him. This is the most salutary and to be embraced advice from the Holy Scriptures: Place, it says, alms in the heart of the poor, and this will pray for you.

What kind of abstinence should be undertaken.

We also admonish those who abstain from meat not to shun the vessels in which they were cooked as if they were unclean. For the Apostle says speaking thus: "All things are clean to the clean." What happens in such observations is not for the purpose of avoiding uncleanness, but for restraining desire. Hence those who abstain from meat in such a way that they seek other foods with more difficult preparation and greater cost are greatly mistaken. For this is not to embrace abstinence, but to change indulgence. How shall we tell these people to give to the poor what they take away from themselves, those whose usual food is left behind in such a way that the cost is increased in acquiring something else? Therefore, be more frequently fasting during these days, spending more sparingly on yourselves, and giving more generously to the needy. Also, during these days, marital intercourse calls for continence: "For a time," says the Apostle, "that you may give yourselves to prayer; and return again lest Satan tempt you for your incontinence." This is not difficult and arduous for faithful married couples for a few days, which from a certain point in life to the end, holy widows have taken up, and holy virgins do throughout their entire life. In all these things let devotion glow and pride be restrained. Let no one rejoice so much in the gift of generosity that they lose the good of humility. And indeed all other gifts of God do not profit anything unless the bond of charity is present.

Sermons - Sermon 20A

SERMON 20/A

OF THE RESPONSORY OF PSALM 56:

"Have mercy on me, Lord, have mercy on me."

"For my soul has trusted in you"

Whether in the good things or in the bad things of this age, there is temptation. In all the good and bad things of this age, there is temptation in both. For the good things of this age allure to deceive; the bad threaten to break. Because therefore there is temptation in both, that is, both in the good and in the bad of the present age, the Christian is not secure. With the whole heart, let him say and do what we have now sung to God: Have mercy on me, Lord, have mercy on me, for my soul has trusted in you. This voice neither casts down the poor, nor exalts the rich; it makes the downcast hope and does not allow the upright to inflate themselves. For the soul of anyone, if it has trusted in God, is neither exalted by good things, nor broken by bad. It knows all these things as passing shadows, but it does not pass away itself to whom it has said: My soul has trusted in you.

One free voice of a Christian: have mercy on me. But in you the servant says to the Lord, the creature to the creator, the made to the maker, the captive to the redeemer, the bound to the liberator, and to say it more quickly, the man to God. Two things, however, are proposed to man: to know both God and himself; God in whom to trust, and himself not to trust in himself. For in vain do men who give much to themselves and despise others, in vain do they say: "I do not trust in him; far be it from me to presume about him." For sometimes humility says these things, sometimes pride. It is good not to trust in man, but if you do not trust in yourself. For he who trusts in himself will either trust in man or is not a man. Thus remains one free voice: Have mercy on me. But what merit do I have for you to have mercy on me, which I can list? Not my justices, not riches, not fortitude. Therefore, not for my merits, but because my soul trusts in you. It obtained the reward, because it offered the sacrifice. And what did it offer? Not a bull, not a goat, not a ram, not frankincense of Arabia, not golden ornaments, nothing bought by flesh and highly precious, but what is more precious than everything, itself. For nothing is more precious to God than the image of God.

Christ gives us an example of humility

God therefore makes all things under the man, the man under Himself. If you wish that whatever God has made be under you, you be under God. For indeed, you very impudently require that the inferior creature be under you, while you do not acknowledge Him who created it and is superior. Therefore, God has so ordered what He created, that He placed His own image under Himself, the rest under it. Receive Him, and you will tread upon the man. Do not despise Him, and let whoever wishes despise you. For what harm does it do to you if one despises you, whom God does not despise? He mocks your contemptor because He crowns you. "He despises me." Christ was despised. He to whom it was said: "My soul has trusted in You" came to be despised for you, and the despicable one redeemed you. You would not be redeemed, if He had not been despised. But from what was He despised? Because He took on a servile garment, your form. Indeed, one thing lay hidden, another appeared. God lay hidden, man appeared. Man was despised and glorified by God.

Therefore, He who made Himself the way for us, did not desire to have all the things that people here eagerly seek as great, although He had everything, to whom belonged heaven and earth, by whom heaven and earth were made, to whom angels served in heaven and above the heavens, who cast out demons, who healed fevers, who opened the ears of the deaf and the eyes of the blind, who commanded the sea, winds, and storms, who raised the dead. Who could do so much, could do so much in Him whom He Himself made. The creator of man became subject to man, because He appeared as a man, the liberator of man. He was subject to man, but in the form of a man, God hidden, appearing as a man, despised as a man, found as God, but not found unless previously despised. For He did not want to give you glory before teaching you humility.

Great things are to be desired by man; the way is humble.

Every man desires lofty things. And what is lofty on earth? If, therefore, you desire lofty things, desire heaven, desire celestial things, desire things above the heavens. Long to be a citizen of the angels, seek that city, sigh for it, where you will not lose a friend, nor suffer an enemy, where you will not find anyone then redeemed, because no one can take anyone captive from there. For that city is eternal, where no one is born, no one dies, where eternal and true health is, because that health is called immortality. If you long to be there, you have truly sought lofty things. You see where, but see how. For no one does not seek to be a citizen of the angels, to rejoice in God concerning God under God, to remain always, to be changed by no stain, to be consumed by no old age, to be weakened by no weariness, to be ended by no illness, by no death. Great thing, lofty thing, desirable thing! You long to reach there; see by what means you may come. An example from the sons of Zebedee. For indeed, those two disciples of our Lord, the holy and great brothers James and John, sons of Zebedee, as we read in the Gospel, desired from our Lord God that one of them might sit at His right hand in the kingdom and the other at His left. They, however, did not wish to be kings on earth, they did not desire perishable honors from our Lord God, they did not wish to be adorned with riches, not to be paraded with family, not to be honored by clients, not to be deceived by flatterers, but clearly sought something great and solid—to have seats in the kingdom of God which no one can succeed. It is great that they desired this, and yet they are not suppressed by desire but are called back to order. The Lord saw in them the desire for exaltation, and deigned to teach the way of humility, as if saying: "You see where you are aiming, you see who I am for you, and yet I who made you have descended to you, I for your sake have humbled myself." But these words which I say are not read in the Gospel, yet I speak the meaning of those words which are read in the Gospel. For indeed I remind you the words read in the Gospel, so that you may see these things I have said are born from them, that they are the root, while ours are the branches. Therefore when the Lord had heard this from them, He said to them: Can you drink the cup that I am about to drink? You desire to sit on my sides. Tell me first what I ask you: Can you drink the cup that I am about to drink? You who seek seats of exaltation, is the cup of humility not bitter for you?

He who places a great structure locates the foundation at the bottom.

However, where there is a hard command, there is great solace. For the cup of suffering, the cup of humiliation, men do not want to drink. They seek the heights? Let them love the lowly. For from the lowly one rises to the heights. No one builds a high structure without placing the foundation in the lowest place. Consider all these things, my Brothers, and be instructed by this, be built up by this in faith, so that you may see the way by which you must reach those things you desire. For I know and I know well: none of you does not desire immortality, eternal exaltation, and to have fellowship with God. We all desire all these things. Let us see the way by which we may come, for we love that to which we may come. Therefore I have said this: Someone intending to build a temporary straw hut does not dig a foundation. But if he thinks of constructing a lofty building with heavy masses, enduring for a long time, he does not first lift his eyes to see how high it will rise, but first directs his plan to the lower parts, considering how deep he must dig. And as high as the peak of the building will be, so deep will be the trench of the foundation. Who does not wish to see tall crops? For tall future crops, you first prepare the soil with humility by plowing. He who plows cuts into the depths. He who plows descends into the furrow so that the crop may rise. The taller are the trees, the deeper they have their roots in the lower parts, for all height rises from humility. The kingdom of heaven is prepared for the humble. But you were afraid, O man, to suffer the contempt of humility! It benefits you to drink the most bitter cup of suffering. Your innards swell, your insides are inflated. Drink the bitterness to maintain health. The healthy physician drinks. Does the languishing sick one not wish to drink? For this reason, he said to the sons of Zebedee: Can you drink the cup? He did not say to them: "Can you drink the cup of contempt, the cup of gall, the cup of vinegar, the most bitter cup, the cup filled with poison, the cup of all sufferings?" If he said these things, he would frighten rather than encourage. Where there is participation, there is consolation. Why do you disdain, servant? The Lord drank that cup. Why do you disdain, sick one? The physician drinks. Why do you disdain, weak one? The healthy one drinks. Can you drink the cup that I am going to drink? Then those eager for elevation, not knowing what they could, promising what they did not yet have: "We can," they said. And he: "You will indeed drink my cup, because I grant that you drink, I who make you strong from the weak, I who give you the grace of endurance, so that you drink the cup of humility, but to sit at my right hand or at my left is not mine to give, but it is for those for whom it is prepared by my Father." If not to them, to whom else? If the apostles do not deserve it, who does? But who are the others? Among these two was that John. Which John? That one, brothers, whom the Lord loved above others, who reclined on the Lord's breast, who drank from his breast what he proclaimed in the Gospel. This is the John who said: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. This was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him, and without him was nothing made." A great utterance, but first there was a great imbibing. Does the utterance delight you? See from where he drank. He reclined on the Lord's breast, in that feast he drank all these things which he proclaimed with great felicity in the Gospel. So great was he who reclined on the Lord's breast, to whom it was also said what your Charity has heard: It is not mine to give you, it is prepared by my Father for others. For whom others, O Lord? If John did not receive it who reclined on the Lord's breast, if he did not receive it who surpassed the sea, the sharpness, the sky, and reached the Word, who surpassed so much and reached you as you are equal to the Father, if he did not receive what he asked, who will receive it? The Lord knows what he said: it is prepared for others. What is it, for others? For the humble, not for the proud, therefore also for you if you will be others, if you lay aside pride and are clothed in humility.

Whether poor or rich, they ought to trust in God.

Therefore, my brothers, we have learned, we learn, we sing, let us do: Have mercy on me, Lord, have mercy on me, for my soul has trusted in you. O happy soul! Are you poor? Trust in Him, because you have nothing greater in which to trust. Are you rich? Trust in Him, because all flesh is grass and the glory of flesh is like the flower of grass. The grass withered, the flower fell, but the word of the Lord remains forever. Are you poor? Trust in Him like ulcerated Lazarus. Lazarus was poor, Abraham rich. When we hear in the Gospel that the ulcerated poor man died and was carried by angels to the bosom of Abraham, all ulcerous beggars, weak outcasts, when they hear this reading, what do they say? "He said this about us." Perhaps a poor, needy man, barely sustaining himself or perhaps a beggar, sees a rich man in the house of God wearing clothes fitting his honor. When he hears this reading, he says: "He said this about me. When I die, I will be taken by angels to the bosom of Abraham." He hears the Gospel saying about the rich man: And when he died, he began to be tormented in hell. When the poor man hears this, he says to himself: "This was said about me, that about him." Do not err, poor man. Do not be afraid, rich man. It is not said about you, poor man, if you are a drunkard. Nor is it said about you, rich man, if you are pious. He crowns piety, not poverty. For God will not say in His judgment: "Let the senator come to me, let the plebeian depart." But neither will He say this: "Let the plebeian come, let the senator depart." Nor will He say: "Let the emperor come to me, let the soldier depart." But neither will He say this: "Let the soldier come, let the emperor depart." But: "Let the righteous come, let the unrighteous depart." Therefore, poor man, hold onto piety if you wish to arrive. For do you want to know that the Lord chose piety, not condemning riches? The poor man was taken up. But where to? To the bosom of Abraham. Read what Abraham was and you will find him rich. The rich man preceded to prepare lodging and a home for the poor man. Behold how you have it in the psalm: Together in one, the rich and the poor.

Let us glorify God and our Lord Jesus Christ in our good works, and from the heart let us say: Have mercy on me, Lord, have mercy on me, for not in gold, not in silver, not in honor, not in wealth, not in a great friend, not in a crowd of clients, not in the pomp of servants, but in you my soul trusts.

Sermons - Sermon 20B

SERMON 20/B The sermon of St. Augustine setting forth the heterodox opinions of Jovinian concerning virginity.

1. The entire religion of Christians, most beloved brethren, consists in resisting the world. Lest by its allurements it draw us into its snares, and make us forget what we have professed before the holy altar. “I renounce thee, Satan,” because thou suggestest falsely; I renounce the world, because it is full of fraud; I renounce the delights of the flesh, because they drag me to hell. Therefore we renounce all that would seduce us; and take up what would profit us. Because “the world passeth away, and the lust thereof,” that we may love nothing in it save Him who made it.

2. Virginity is better than marriage, but marriage is good: by this is established only what the apostle says, that virginity is better (1 Cor. 7:38). Because though a brief time remains for us in this life, yet there is an eternity for which we prepare. And this preparation, since no one is confident in his own merits, is anxiety lest perchance we take in the deceit of judging.

3. And yet shall we say ‘virginity is not lawful, marriage is not lawful’? But we compare the good together, and show that virginity is to be chosen before marriage. So when we affirm good to be better than good, we do not condemn good, but we prefer the better.

4. The apostle said not, “He who gives his virgin in marriage does evil,” but “he does well; and he which gives her not in marriage does better” (1 Cor. 7:38). Here he shows the difference between the two goods which are praised: the one who grants, the other who withholds. And he who marries is called a doer of good, but the one who does not marry is called a doer of better.

Regarding the response to the psalm:

Give us help from tribulation, and the vain salvation of man God has mercy if sometimes He does not hear us.

I cannot thank the Lord God and your love enough towards Him, for this joy that I see flowing from the source of affection. For this is, brothers, what refreshes us, what consoles us: pure and sincere love, which helps me before the Lord who deigned to return our voice to your ears. Nor should you be surprised that we suffer such things in this body. For it is necessary that we suffer, and the will of the Lord cannot be unjust in any way: because we are sinners, we must be scourged, and if we were just, we should be tested. For he who wishes for the health of the body in which the soul, the inhabitant of the body, does not profit, wishes for something vain. But God does not consider what the error of the one who wishes requests, but what His mercy in liberating grants. For the Apostle says that we do not know what to pray for as we ought, but the Spirit Himself, he says, intercedes for us with groanings too deep for words. For sometimes we wish for what God knows to be harmful to us; and then He has mercy, if He does not hear, or rather it is said more truly in a certain way: then He hears, if He seems not to hear.

God was present with Paul even when He did not answer his request. Who among us, brothers, could be equated with the merits of the apostle Paul, whose praises there is no need for us to speak? For he who is read daily, it would be in vain to be praised by anyone. Because neither did he ever want to be praised himself, when he would speak of his own conversion, what the churches in Christ from the Jews, that is, who had believed in Christ, would hear and marvel that he had been converted, he did not say: "They magnified me," but: "In me, they magnified the Lord." Likewise, when he spoke much of his own effectiveness, he said: "It is not I, but the grace of God with me." Who then can be equated either to his humility, or to his piety or doctrine or labors or tribulations or merits or crown? He therefore twice asked the Lord that the thorn of the flesh be removed from him, and it was not removed; and yet the Lord says to the soul that serves well: "While you are still speaking, I will say: Behold, I am here," so that He would grant what was sought. Who among us dares to promise himself what was denied to Paul? What then do we say, because God was not present, when the Apostle says: "There was given to me a thorn of my flesh, an angel of Satan, to buffet me"—so that he would not be exalted; for which I thrice besought the Lord, that it might depart from me: and He said to me: "My grace is sufficient for you; for my power is made perfect in weakness"? Was He then not present? Did He not say: "Behold, I am here," when He taught why it should not be given?

God hears one seeking eternal salvation.

God always hears, beloved brothers - know this so that you may pray with certainty -, God hears when He does not grant what we ask. God hears, and if we unknowingly ask for something harmful, He hears us more by not granting it, just as He does not hear more some by granting them something for punishment. This we say. Sometimes the faithful person prays to God, as it is pious to pray to the Lord, but he does not receive specifically what he asks for; instead, he receives what he asks for, in view of that. Sometimes a wicked person, a perverse man, a criminal asks for something, and it is given to him, because he was worthy of punishment, not of being heard. So we have the example of the Apostle Paul, for he asked, and it was not given to him, but it was shown to him that what he asked for was given in view of that. For whatever a Christian and faithful person asks for, he ought to ask for it for the sake of the kingdom of heaven, for the sake of eternal life, for the sake of what God has promised and will give after this world; for that reason, he should ask for it, who asks for something, for the sake of that perfect health which we will also have in the resurrection of the body. For then there will be perfect health, when death is swallowed up in victory. Now then, since we have mentioned health and eternal salvation for which one ought to ask, whoever asks for anything even temporally , let us take daily examples from this physician. The health of the sick person is dear to the wise doctor. When a sick person requests from a doctor what pleases them for the moment - and they have summoned the doctor for the purpose that health may be restored to them through him. For there was no other reason for summoning the doctor, except to obtain health. And therefore, if perhaps fruits please them, if cold things please them, they choose to request from the doctor rather than from their servant. For hiding it from the doctor and requesting from the servant can result in the ruin of their health: indeed, a servant obeys a commanding master more to fulfill domination than for the remedy of health. But a prudent sick person, who loves and expects their health, chooses to request from the doctor what pleases them for the moment, so that, by the doctor denying, they do not receive something according to their will, but rather believe the doctor for their health. You see, therefore, that even when the doctor does not give something to the one requesting, he does not give for the purpose of giving. For he does not grant excessive desires so as to provide useful health. Therefore, by not giving, he gives, and provides more that for which he was summoned, that is, health. If, therefore, by not giving to this one he gives, to another who importunately extorts, by giving he does not give; often he also gives what is requested to one who is desperate. Sometimes he gives in such a manner that through the pangs of pain the sick person becomes more corrected and learns to trust the doctor; sometimes despairing of the patient's health, as doctors are accustomed to say: "Now give him whatever he requests: for there is no hope for his health." Therefore, for these three kinds of petitioners, let us find examples in the Scriptures.

"Leave it to the doctor: he knows what to apply."

Someone asks and does not receive what they ask for. Let us find the example of the apostle Paul. For the physician says to him, why he does not give: Virtue, he says, is perfected in weakness. Be assured that what he does not give you: he wants to heal you. Trust the physician: he knows what to apply, what to withdraw, so that he may lead to health, and this is why he does it. The Apostle asks the Lord three times. He was already being heard, but he did not think he was heard unless the physician was present in such a way as to also say: Virtue is perfected in weakness, so that even he himself might safely say: When I am weak, then I am strong. Therefore, we have him asking for something useless, and not receiving it, so that he may receive what he asked for, that is, for eternal salvation.

"The patience of God leads to repentance."

Let's now see whether men receive something as a warning so that, having suffered some tribulations, they may sometimes turn back to healing because they are sick. Hence the Lord said: "Those who are healthy do not need a doctor, but those who are sick." Therefore, he comes to the sick and finds men given to their desires. For this reason, the Apostle says, "God handed them over to the desires of their hearts, to do what is not convenient." They desired what was not convenient, and it was granted to them to do so; from there, they reached greater pains and disturbances, which all unjust and all unrighteous necessarily suffer: fear, greed, error, pain, affliction, anxiety. Never security, never rest, never a friend. They rest a little in their conscience, seeking another consoler outside, having inside themselves the torturer. It is necessary for the unjust to suffer justly, but, while they suffer, they live. God, who permits these things to seek healing, watches so that, having suffered the afflictions and entanglements of their desires, they learn what to ask for. For it was said to them: "Do you not know that the patience of God leads you to repentance?" He handed them over to the desires of their hearts, and they did what they wanted; and yet he spared them, so that he would not take them from this life, where there is still a place for repentance, and he always invited them to repentance, as he does even now, and he will never cease to do this with the human race until the last day of judgment.

God sometimes hears the devil asking.

Let us find, therefore, also that one to whom it is granted because he is already desperate, and this from the Scriptures. What is more desperate than the devil? Yet he asks to tempt Job, and it is not denied to him. Great mysteries, indeed great things, and very worthy of consideration. The Apostle asks that the thorn in the flesh be taken away from him, and it is not granted; the devil asks to tempt the just man, and it is granted. But that the just man is conceded to be tempted by the devil neither harmed the just man nor benefited the devil, for the former was proven and the latter tormented.

God tests man for salvation.

Certainly hold on to this, brothers, which we have often said to your holiness, that the cares of the world should not take from your hearts what you have heard: when God permits the just to be tempted, so that they may be tested, or to be chastised, if He wishes to correct them for the sins that remain, if He permits them to be chastised for sins, it benefits them; but if it is so that they may be made manifest, because they were unknown, it benefits those who come to know them, so that they may imitate them. For God knows His servants well, but sometimes they are unknown to others and cannot be made manifest to them except through some temptations. Sometimes also a man is unknown to himself and completely unaware of what he is capable of: either he thinks he is capable of more and it is shown to him that he cannot yet, or he despairs and thinks he cannot endure something, and it is shown to him that he can; when he is excessively uplifted, let him be brought down to humility, and when he is broken in lowly state, let him be raised from despair. The Lord knows what, when, and to whom to give the salvation which we seek.

Therefore, let us understand in the very psalm that we were singing, because many seek salvation, and sometimes it does not benefit them. For someone may be healthy and misuse their health for sin. It would be better for them to be sick and rest, than to be healthy and restless. Sometimes, however, through the scourge of tribulation, when what was not desired happens, they turn to God. For they will be more cautious, more chaste, more modest, more humble, and rightly sing: "Give us help from trouble, and vain is the salvation of man." He sought help, but from where? He says to the Lord: "Give us help from trouble, so that, troubled, we may be corrected, humbled, and turn back to You, not lifting our necks against You. For when you give us help from trouble, we will understand that the salvation which a foolish man often desired, and when received, uses not for the joy of peace but as an occasion for his own restlessness, is vain." Often a man was about to proceed in anger and unjust indignation, to harm one who perhaps had done him no wrong; suddenly he begins to fall ill: what was useful to him? To proceed and commit iniquity, or to fall ill and pray for salvation? For the salvation of God is not vain, but the salvation of man is vain, which a man thinks is greatly necessary for him. Therefore, God's salvation is not vain, but man's salvation is vain. It is a false salvation and rightly called man's if it is thought to be the only one by man. For there, where "man’s" is not added, it is said: "Salvation belongs to the Lord." What does "Salvation belongs to the Lord" mean? The Lord gives salvation, who knows what to give, when, and to whom. As often as people, in despair of salvation, seek salvation, the Lord Himself gives it. It follows in the psalm: "And your blessing be upon your people," that is, have mercy on your people, and give them the salvation you give to those who are not of your people, even the one your people themselves are unaware of. For you know what to give; they do not know what they receive until they have received it. For, brothers, what is it that you should know these things that you are about to receive, what eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor has it entered into the heart of man, the things which God has prepared for those who love Him? What do you think He has prepared? Surely eternal salvation, which cannot even enter our hearts, which no eye can see nor ear hear; and yet He prepares these for those who love Him, and when we receive them, we will see what true salvation is and how vain were the things we considered great.

The holy martyrs despised the safety of men. For if the martyrs had desired and esteemed highly this health, that is, the health of man, they would not say from the heart: And I did not covet the day of man, you know. What is said in the psalm? Therefore, those desiring this health and holding it in high regard would have lost that eternal health. But now understanding what it is: Give us help from trouble, they choose rather to be led to eternal health than to find this chosen health of man to their ruin and to consent to the persecutors. For immediately the persecutor would give health. The martyr was bound, oppressed in prison, wasting away even with his wounds: had he yielded to the persecutor, he would immediately have health; but the health of man is vain. Indeed, the persecutors promised health, which they immediately gave. And what kind did they give? The kind they knew, and before they were in those tribulations, but they aspired to that which neither eye has seen nor ear heard, nor has it entered into the heart of man. What the persecutor promises seems evident, and what he promises is uncertain and brief and slight. Even if it were the eternal health of the flesh, it would still be carnal, such as the eye has seen and the ear heard, and has entered into the heart of man. If that greater health does not seem so, but it surely promises to follow and cannot deceive, let us maintain ourselves under His discipline, let us not murmur under His scourge, let us willingly endure the one caring for us, and we will rejoice healthy before God, already knowing what He has given us and saying: Where is your strife, O death? Where is your sting, O death?

Augustine, being ill, concludes the sermon.

{I know, brothers, your eagerness, but it is necessary that you also spare our weakness. For we do not wish to deny any kind of our voice and ministry to your holiness, so that we might serve the Lord, who has renewed us. However, the more recent scar, perhaps not yet perfectly healed and closed, must still be spared. May the Lord guide us in His will, fitting us for the salvation of all of us and the service of His holy Church.} Let us turn to the Lord and ask: He will look upon us and perfect us in His saving Word, and grant us to rejoice according to Him and to live according to Him. Let Him turn away from us carnal prudence; may He subject the enemy under our feet, not by our strength, but by His holy name, in which we have been cleansed through Jesus Christ our Lord.

Sermons - Sermon 21

SERMO 21 OF THAT WHICH IS WRITTEN IN PSALM 63:

"The righteous will rejoice in the Lord and will have hope."

"In Him shall all the upright in heart be praised."

Although he does not see Him, the righteous will rejoice in the Lord. The righteous will rejoice in the Lord and will hope in Him, and all those who are upright in heart will glory. Certainly, we have sung this with voice and heart. These words are said to God by the Christian conscience and tongue: The righteous will rejoice, not in the world, but in the Lord. Light has arisen for the righteous, it says elsewhere, and gladness for the upright in heart. You might ask where the gladness comes from. Here you hear: The righteous will rejoice in the Lord. And elsewhere: Delight yourself in the Lord, and He will give you the desires of your heart. What is commanded to us? What is given? What is ordered? What is granted? That we may rejoice in the Lord. Who will rejoice in something he cannot see? Do we perhaps see the Lord? We hold this in promise. Now, however, we walk by faith, as long as we are in the body, we are away from the Lord. By faith, not by sight. When by sight? When it will be fulfilled what the same John says: Beloved, we are children of God now, and it has not yet been revealed what we shall be. We know that when He is revealed, we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is. Then, therefore, there will be great and perfect gladness, then full joy, where hope no longer consoles but reality nourishes. However, even now, before the reality itself comes to us, before we come to the reality itself, let us rejoice in the Lord. For indeed the hope itself is not small, whose reality will later be. And in these temporal matters, in the joy, not of the Lord but of the world, many love something, and have not yet reached what they love. And yet the fervor runs in hope, it does not yet hold the reality. For example, you love money, you would not love it if you did not hope. You love a wife, not yet married but to be married, and perhaps she who is to be married is loved, and once married, she is hated. Why is this? Because once married, she did not appear as she was pictured in the mind to be married. But God does not become worthless once present, He is loved while absent. For however much the human mind has magnified the good that God is, it acts less and is far below, and it is necessary that acquisition finds more than planning thought formed. Therefore, we will love more when we see if we were able to love even before we saw. Now therefore we love in hope. Therefore, the righteous rejoice, he says, in the Lord. And immediately, because he does not yet see, and he will hope in Him.

We draw near to God in humility and charity.

However, we have the first fruits of the Spirit, and perhaps in some way, we approach Him whom we love, and what we eagerly desire to eat and drink, now we feebly taste and sample. How do we prove this? For God, whom we are commanded to love, in whom we are commanded to delight, is not gold, or silver, or earth, or heaven, or the light of this sun, or anything that shines from heaven, or anything that glistens on earth bathed in light. He is not any body. God is spirit. Therefore, it says, those who worship must worship in spirit and truth. Not in any place of the body, because He is not a body, not as if on a high mountain so that through the height of the mountain you might think you approach God. The Lord is indeed high, but He regards the humble; the high He knows from afar, the humble not from afar. Certainly, He is high, and surely, if He knows the high from afar due to His loftiness, He must regard the humble even from further away. "If He is far from the high in His height so as to know them from afar, how much more," someone might say, "should His loftiness be removed from the humble." It is not so. The Lord is indeed high and regards the humble. How does He regard them? The Lord is near to those who crush the heart. Do not, therefore, seek a high mountain, from where you think you might be nearer to God. If you exalt yourself, He withdraws far from you; if you humble yourself, He inclines towards you. The tax collector stood far off, and therefore God approached him more readily: he did not dare to lift his eyes to heaven, and already he had with him the one who made heaven. Why then do we rejoice in the Lord if the Lord is so far from us? And let Him not be far! You make Him far by your actions. Love and He will draw near; love and He will dwell with you. The Lord is near; be not anxious about anything. Do you wish to see whether, if you love, He will be with you? God is love. Why do your thoughts spread far and wide, and you say to yourself, "Do you think, what is God? Do you think, what is God like?" Whatever you imagine, it is not; whatever you grasp by thought, it is not. For if He were, He could not be comprehended by thought. But to take some taste, God is love. You will tell me: "Do you think, what is love?" Love is that by which we love. What do we love? The ineffable good, the beneficent good, the Creator of all good things. Let Him delight you, from whom you have whatever delights you. I do not speak of sin, for sin alone you do not have from Him. Except for sin, you have whatever else you have from Him.

Except for sin, you have everything else from God. Sin is nothing else but the bad use of good things.

Therefore, do not understand and say that it is a sin when I said: “Delight yourself in Him from whom you have whatever delights you” and say: “Behold, sin delights me, do I have sin from God?” Consider first whether perhaps sin does not delight you, but something else delights you when you commit sin. By loving a creature inordinately, contrary to decent use, contrary to what is lawful, contrary to the law and will of the Creator Himself, you sin in loving the creature. For you do not love the sin itself; but by loving what you love wrongly, you are ensnared by sin. You seek food in a net, and unknowingly you consume sin. Finally, you defend yourself thus: “If it is a sin to drink too much, why did God create wine? If it is a sin to love gold – I am a lover of gold, not the creator; God is the creator of gold – why did He create what is evil to love?” Thus with the rest that you love wrongly, in which all lust lies, where all faults are committed. Pay attention, observe, consider, and see that every creature of God is good. And there is no sin there, except because you misuse it. Therefore, hear this, O man. You say: “Why did God create what He prohibits me from loving? He would not have created it, and there would not be something for me to love. He would not have created a creature which He commands me not to love, and there would not be something for me to love, and by loving be condemned.” If the very creature, which you love wrongly because you do not love yourself, could speak, it would answer you: “Would you wish that God had not made me so there would be nothing for you to love? Would you wish that He had not made you so that there would be none to love?” Now see how unjust you are, and in your very words you are discovered to be most unjust. You want God to have made you, who is above you, but you do not want Him to have made any good thing below you. Whatever God made is good. But there are some great goods, some small goods, yet all are good. Some goods are heavenly, others are earthly. Some are spiritual goods, others are bodily goods. Some are eternal goods, others are temporal goods. Yet all good, because the good one made them good. Therefore it is said in a certain place of the divine Scriptures: Order love in me. God made you something good under Him; He made something inferior and below you. You are under another, yet above another. Do not, having left behind the higher good, lower yourself to an inferior good. Be upright, that you may be praised, because all the upright in heart will be praised. For why do you sin, except because you handle inordinately the things you received for use? Be well using inferior things, and you will rightly enjoy the higher good.

God is to be loved above all things.

Now listen and examine your own understandings, and question yourself who holds them, and the things which you handle. Behold, if in your business you place silver before gold, lead before silver, dust before lead, would you not be judged by all your associates—if perhaps you are a merchant—as the most foolish, and be excluded from their company, and be called harmful, and perhaps even need to be healed with a blow to the head? For what else will all your associates say when you declare: "Silver is more costly than gold, or better than gold?" Will they not shout: "You are insane, you are foolish, what are you going through?" Everyone in your house shouts: "What are you going through?" when you place silver before gold. And no one says to you: "What are you going through?" when you place gold before God. "How," you ask, "do I place gold before God? For if by some madness I have placed silver before gold, therefore I am called mad, because of two things, which I see both, which I regard both, which I handle both with my hand, I place the less valuable before the more valuable. How do I place gold before God? I see gold, I do not see God." Nor can you be excused on this account. Why do you love silver? Because it is precious, because it is valued highly. Why more gold? Because it is more precious. Silver is precious, gold is more precious. God is love itself. The sinner prefers gold and other visible goods to the invisible God.

Behold, I will say something about the gift of God, to convince you more certainly how you place gold before God, although you see gold, but do not see God; and therefore you do not seem to place it before, because no one seems to place a thing he sees before something he does not see. Behold, I say something. What do you think? Is faith silver? Is it gold? Is it money? Is it cattle? Is it land? Is it heaven? It is none of these things, and yet it is something. Not only something, but also something great. Meanwhile, I am not speaking of that superior faith, by which you are called faithful, approaching the table of the Lord your God, responding in faith to the words of faith. Meanwhile, if I move this for a little while, I will speak of that faith which is also commonly called faith, not which the Lord your God commands you greatly but which you demand from your servant. I speak of that faith, because even that one is commanded to you by your Lord, that you should not defraud anyone, keep faith in business, keep faith to your wife in bed. And this faith your Lord commands you. What is this faith? Certainly you do not see it. If you do not see it, why do you cry out when it is broken to you? By your cry I convince you that you see it. You used to say: "How do I place gold before God? I see gold, I do not see God." Behold you see gold, you do not see faith. Or what is truer, you see faith. But when you demand it, you see it; when it is demanded of you, you do not want to see it? With the eyes of your heart open you cry: "Return the faith you promised." With the eyes of your heart closed you cry: "I promised you nothing." In both cases open your eyes. Unjust one, do not lose faith, but lose that very injustice. Return what you demand. The manumission of a slave who has kept the faith.

You lead a slave to be freed in the church. Silence is made. Your document is read aloud or the execution of your desire is performed. You say that you free the slave because he has kept faith with you in all things. This you value, this you honor, this you reward with the gift of freedom. You do whatever you can. You make him free because you cannot make him eternal. Your God calls out to you and convicts you in your slave. He says to you in your heart: "You led your slave from your house to my house. You want to call him back free from my house to your house. Why do you serve poorly in my house? You give him what you can. I promise you what I can. You make the faithful servant free. I make you eternal, if you keep faith with me. Why do you still argue against me in your mind? Return to your Lord what you commend in your servant. Or perhaps you arrogate so much to yourself that you think you are worthy to have a faithful servant, whom you say: 'I have purchased,' and I am not worthy to have a faithful servant whom I have created?" These things the Lord your God speaks to you within, where no one hears except you, and He who speaks there truly. For what is truer than this speech? Do not become deaf. Behold, you love faith in your servant. Certainly, you do not see faith. Why do you love it in another, and everything I said in another, and in the servant whom you bought with money, yet not the one whom I created? Your Lord deals with you in double necessity. "Both I created you and bought you. Before you were, I made you," He says to you. "When you were sold under sin, I redeemed you." To free your slave, you break his chains. God will not break your chains. Your chains are the Gospel, where there is the blood by which you were bought. They remain, they are read daily, you are reminded of your condition, the price paid for you is recalled.

Return the faith to the Lord which you praise in the servant.

If your servant, whom you manumit, did not exhibit faith and did not make himself worthy of your manumission by keeping faith, and you found him in some frauds in your house, what would you shout? "Wicked servant, you do not keep faith with me? Do you not know that I bought you? Do you not know that I counted my blood for you?". You shout as much as you can and strike heaven with envious cries: "I gave my blood for you, wicked servant". And all who hear say: "He speaks the truth". If that servant of yours dared to respond to you in such an attack and by shouting, would you not be ashamed if he said to you: "Pray, what blood did you give for me? When did you buy me, and at least not even did you phlebotomize yourself". But you call your money your blood. You love your money so much that you call it your blood. Your Lord convicts you with your own voice. You call your money your blood, and for that reason, you demand faith from your bought servant, because you gave, not indeed blood, but a coin or gold for him. Recall what I have given. If you do not recall, I read your records. If you do not recall, read, read for yourself the death of the Savior, the spear of the strikers, the price of the Redeemer. Even a living man, as I said, can give his blood from a pierced vein and still live. Your Lord tells you even more: "Blood was not expressed from me alive. I bought you with my blood. I add, I bought you with my death". What do you have to say? Render faith to your Lord, which you demand from your servant. You see gold, you also see faith. You would not demand it if you did not see it; you would not praise it if you did not see it; you would not grant freedom if you did not see it. But you see gold with the eyes of flesh, you see faith with the eyes of the heart. The better the eyes of the heart, the better is what you see with the eyes of the heart. But you prefer gold to this faith which your Lord commands you. And you do not return what was entrusted and you say: "You gave me nothing". Or to him to whom you have not entrusted anything, you say: "Return what I entrusted to you". You do not give what you received, you demand what you did not give. Behold, acquire. Take thus and augment to yourself the clay by which you are oppressed, saying: "Give", which you did not entrust; denying what you received as a trust. Take, gather harmful profits. Behold, you have filled a chest, you have acquired much gold. Examine the chest of the heart, you have lost faith. Do not turn away from the discipline of a merciful Father.

Return, therefore, if you have felt anything, if you have blushed, if you have corrected what was depraved and crooked, return, delight in the Lord, rejoice in the Lord. Rejoice in the things which the Lord has commanded, that you may rejoice in the Lord. Rejoice in faith, rejoice in hope, rejoice in charity, rejoice in mercy, rejoice in hospitality, rejoice in chastity. All these are good things, internal treasures, gems, not of your chest, but of your conscience. Love to be rich in these treasures which you cannot lose through shipwreck, so that if you go out naked, you go out full. For thus you will be upright in heart, so that you may not blame your Lord if something adverse happens to you in this world, and you praise the scourge of the Father from whom you expect an inheritance. Escape under the hand of the one correcting you. Do not turn away from discipline, because he who corrects cannot err. He who made you knows what to do with you. Or do you perhaps think that your craftsman is so inexperienced that he knew how to make you but forgets what to do with you? Before you existed, he thought about you, for if he had not thought about you before you existed, you would not exist. And now, existing, remaining, living, serving him, will he despise you, will he overlook you? "He has despised me," you say, "for I prayed and he did not hear me." What if you were asking for what would be to your harm if you received it? "I wept before him and he did not give to me." O foolish child, for what did you weep? That you might receive carnal happiness, temporal happiness, earthly happiness? What if this happiness, which you desired and asked for and for which you wept, would have caused your downfall? I was just talking about your servant, now take an example from your son. Your little son weeps before you to lift him onto a horse. Do you listen to him? Do you heed him? Are you harsh or rather merciful? What is it, tell me, with what intention do you act? Surely this is the intention of love, who doubts it? You reserve the whole house for your grown son, but you do not lift the weeping little one onto a single horse. Everything you have, both the house and whatever is in the house, and the field and whatever is in the field, you reserve for him. And yet you do not lift the weeping little one onto the horse. Let him weep as much as he wants, let him weep all day, you do not heed, and in mercy you do not heed, and if you did heed you would be cruel. See therefore, consider whether this is what your Lord does to you when you ask for unsuitable things and do not receive them. For perhaps poverty would educate you, and abundance would corrupt you. You seek the abundance of corruption, while perhaps the poverty of education is necessary for you. Leave it to your God, who knows what to give you and what to take from you. For if he gives you what you wrongly ask, perhaps he gives it in anger. Hear examples from the law. He heard the Israelites desiring the desires of the belly and throat in anger; he did not heed Paul saying, "Remove the thorn from my flesh," in mercy. An example of Saint Job who was not possessed by the things he owned.

Therefore, delight in the Lord, rejoice in the Lord, not in the world. For he indeed rejoiced in the Lord, who, when he had lost all the joy of the world, was left with the Lord in whom he could rejoice. There remained to him a wonderful, simple, perfect, unchangeable joy of his heart. What he had, he possessed; he was not possessed by it, but he was possessed by the Lord. He trampled down those things, but depended on Him. Those things were taken away which he trampled down; he clung to Him on whom he depended. Behold what it is to rejoice in the Lord. The Lord gave - look at the joy - the Lord took away. Did He take Himself away? What He gave, He took away; He who gave Himself offered. Therefore, he rejoices in the Lord: the Lord gave, the Lord took away; as it pleased the Lord, so it was done; blessed be the name of the Lord. Why should it displease the servant what pleased the Lord? "I have lost gold," he says, "I have lost families, I have lost cattle, I have lost everything I had. I have not lost Him from whom I am. I lost what was with me, I have not lost Him whose I am. He Himself is my delight, He Himself is my riches." But why? Because he was not perverse, not upside down, he did not neglect Him who is above him and love those things which are below him. For that is indeed the perversity of wrongly using the creature.

Conclusion: Do you have gold? Use it well.

Why do you accuse the one who gave gold, you who rightly are accused of loving gold wrongly? Have gold, God says to you, I gave it to you, use it well. You want to be adorned with gold, rather adorn gold; you want honor, you want glory from gold, provide honor to gold, do not be the disgrace of gold. He has gold: he consorts with prostitutes, he commits fornication, he indulges in luxury, he performs pompous shows, he gives mad gifts to actors, he does not give to the hungry poor, he is not the honor of gold. Does not the one who rightly pays attention say this: "I grieve for the gold that has fallen upon him"? And you, if you have gold? For now you say: "I grieve for the gold that has fallen upon him. Oh, if I had it!". What would you do? "I would welcome strangers, feed the needy, clothe the naked, redeem captives." You speak well before you have it; how will you speak when you have it? If you are such, gold will be in your ornament. If you truly use gold in this way, since you love more Him who created gold, you will be righteous, loving higher things more, using lower things rightly. And you will delight in the Lord, the righteous will rejoice in the Lord. There will be no accusation against the Creator in you, there will be thanksgiving to the Redeemer. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 210

SERMO 210 IN LENT The time of the year and the number of days must be considered. The solemn time has arrived, which more than other intervals of the year, reminds us to humble the soul with prayers and fasts, and to discipline the body. But why, as the solemnity of the Lord's Passion approaches, and why it is celebrated with the mystery of the number forty, since this is accustomed to move some, rightly what the Lord has deigned to grant to be said on this matter, we undertake to bring forth to your Charity. However, those whom we know seek these things not for disputing, but for understanding, by their faith and piety we are greatly aided, so that we may be able to obtain what should be said.

Why at that time is fasting observed, before the celebration of baptism. For this is accustomed to raise a question, why the Lord Jesus Christ himself, who having taken on a human body appeared to men as a man to offer us an example of living, dying, and rising again, did not fast before being baptized, but fasted after being baptized. For it is written thus in the Gospel: "And when he was baptized, he immediately went up out of the water; and behold, the heavens were opened to him, and he saw the Spirit of God descending upon him. And behold, a voice from the heavens said: This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased. Then Jesus was led by the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted by the devil. And when he had fasted forty days and forty nights, he afterward hungered." But we, together with those who are to be baptized, fast before their day of Baptism, which day approaches Easter, after which day we relax our fasts for fifty days. This should reasonably raise concern, if it were not allowed to baptize or be baptized except on the most solemn day of Easter. But since throughout the entire year, as each person has necessity or will, it is not forbidden to be baptized, as granted by him who gave them the power to become the children of God; while the annual passion of the Lord may be celebrated only on a certain day of the year, which is called Easter, the sacrament of Baptism is undoubtedly to be distinguished from Easter. For it is permissible to receive Baptism on any day: but the other is permissible to observe on a single and certain day of the year. This is given to renew life; that is commended for the memory of religion. But that the far greater number of those to be baptized gathers on that day does not distinguish a more abundant grace of salvation here, but the greater joy of the festivity invites. The baptism of John must be distinguished from the baptism of Christ.

What about the fact that even the baptism of John, which Christ then received, is to be distinguished from the baptism of Christ Himself, which His faithful receive; and yet it does not follow that the one by which Christ was baptized is better than this one by which a Christian is baptized, because Christ is better than a Christian; but rather, this baptism, because it is of Christ, is preferred to that one? For John baptized Christ, while he confessed himself to be lesser than Christ: but Christ baptizes the Christian, who shows himself to be greater than John. Just as the circumcision of the flesh, although Christ received it and no Christian now receives it, the sacrament of the resurrection of Christ is better, by which a Christian is circumcised to strip away the carnal and old life, so that he may hear the Apostle saying: "As Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, so we too might walk in newness of life." Just as the old Passover itself, which was commanded to be celebrated by the slaughter of a lamb, is not better than our Passover, where Christ was sacrificed, even though Christ celebrated it with His disciples. For He condescended to receive those sacraments as well, which prefigured His coming, to offer us an example of humility and devotion: so that from this, He might demonstrate with how much reverence we ought to receive these sacraments, which now proclaim that He has come. Therefore, it is not to be believed that because Christ fasted immediately after receiving John's baptism, He gave a rule of observation that it is necessary to fast immediately after receiving the baptism of Christ: but clearly by this example He taught that it is necessary to fast whenever we engage in a fiercer struggle with the tempter. For this reason, Christ, who as a man was deemed worthy to be born, did not refuse as a man to be tempted, so that a Christian, instructed by His teaching, cannot be overcome by the tempter. Therefore, whether immediately after baptism, or at any interval of time, when a similar battle of temptation is brought upon a man, fasting must be undertaken: so that the body may fulfill a warrior's discipline through chastisement, and the soul may obtain victory through humility. Therefore, in that example given by the Lord, the cause of that fasting was not the immersion in the Jordan, but the temptation by the devil.

Why the Lenten fast before Easter? But why do we fast before the solemnity of the Lord's Passion, and why is that relaxation of the fast completed on the fiftieth day? This is the reason. Everyone who fasts rightly either humbles his soul in the groaning of prayer and the mortification of the body out of unfaked faith, or suspends his intention from carnal temptation by some spiritual delight of truth and wisdom, and thus descends to feel hunger and thirst. The Lord responded about both types of fasting when questioned why His disciples did not fast. Regarding the first, which involves the humiliation of the soul, He said: "The wedding guests cannot mourn as long as the bridegroom is with them. But the time will come when the bridegroom will be taken from them, and then they will fast." About the other kind, which pertains to the feasts of the mind, He spoke consequently: "No one sews a patch of unshrunk cloth on an old garment, for the patch will pull away from the garment, making the tear worse. Neither do people pour new wine into old wineskins. If they do, the skins will burst; the wine will run out and the wineskins will be ruined. No, they pour new wine into new wineskins, and both are preserved."

Therefore, because the bridegroom has now been taken away, certainly for us, the sons of that beautiful bridegroom, it is a time for mourning. For He is beautiful in form beyond the sons of men, whose grace has been poured upon His lips, but who, in the hands of persecutors, had neither beauty nor majesty, and His life was taken from the earth. And we mourn rightly if we burn with desire for Him. Blessed are those who were allowed to have Him present before His passion, to question Him as they wished, and to hear Him as they ought. Those days the fathers before His advent longed to see, but did not see, because they were ordained in different dispensations, through which He was to be announced as coming, not heard as present. Concerning them, He speaks to His disciples, saying: "Many righteous men and prophets longed to see what you see and did not see it, and to hear what you hear and did not hear it." In us, however, that is fulfilled which He equally says: "The days will come when you will long to see one of the days of the Son of Man, but you will not see it." Who would not be burned with the flame of holy desire? Who would not mourn here? Who would not labor in their groaning? Who would not say: My tears have been my bread day and night, while it is said to me daily, Where is your God? For we indeed believe in him now sitting at the right hand of the Father: yet as long as we are in the body, we are away from him, nor are we able to show him to those doubting or denying and saying: Where is your God? Rightly did his Apostle desire to be dissolved and to be with him: but to remain in the flesh he did not consider best for himself, but necessary for us. Where the thoughts of mortals are fearful, and our foresight is uncertain; because earthly habitation depresses the mind thinking of many things. Hence human life on earth is a trial: and in this night of the world a lion prowls seeking whom he may devour. Not the Lion of the tribe of Judah, our King; but the devil lion, our adversary. However, the one expressing in himself the figures of the four animals from the Apocalypse of John, born as a man, worked as a lion, sacrificed as a calf, flew as an eagle. He flew on the wings of the winds, and made darkness his hiding place. He made darkness, and it became night, in which all the beasts of the forest prowl. The young lions roaring, evidently the tempters through whom the devil seeks whom he may devour; indeed having no power, except in those whom they have taken, because even in the same Psalm it follows thus: Seeking their food from God. In such a dangerous and temptation-filled night of this world who would not fear, who would not tremble to their very marrow, lest they be judged worthy to be left to be devoured in the jaws of so cruel an enemy? Hence we must fast and pray.

Why it is necessary to fast in this life. And when better, when more urgently, than with the approaching solemnity of the Lord's Passion itself, by which the remembrance of that same night is somewhat renewed through annual celebration, lest it be erased by forgetfulness, lest, not sleeping in body but in spirit, that roaring devourer finds us. For what else does the Lord’s Passion itself commend to us in our head, Christ Jesus, if not this very temptation of life most significantly? Hence, upon the arrival of the time of His death, He said to Peter: "Satan has demanded to sift you like wheat, but I have prayed for you, Peter, that your faith may not fail; go and strengthen your brethren." And indeed, he strengthened us through his apostleship, his martyrdom, and his letters. Where also, admonishing about the night of which I speak as one to be feared, he taught us with the consolation of prophecy as with nocturnal light, so that we might vigilantly keep watch. "We have," he says, "the more sure prophetic word, to which you do well to attend as to a lamp shining in a dark place, until the day dawns and the morning star arises in your hearts."

Fasting before the solemnity of Christ's passion is most fitting.

Let our loins, therefore, be girded and our lamps burning, and we be like men expecting their Lord when He will return from the weddings. And let us not say to one another: Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die. But all the more, because the day of death is uncertain and the day of life is troublesome, let us fast and pray, for tomorrow we die. A little while, He says, and you will not see me; and again a little while, and you will see me. This is the hour of which He said: You will be sorrowful, but the world will rejoice: that is, this life full of temptations, in which we are exiled from Him. But again, He says, I will see you, and your heart will rejoice; and your joy no one shall take from you. In this hope of the most faithful Promiser, even now we rejoice somewhat, until that most abundant joy comes, when we shall be like Him, because we will see Him as He is, and our joy no one shall take from us. For of this hope we have also received the so gracious and gratuitous pledge of the Holy Spirit, who in our hearts works inexpressible groans of holy desires. For we have conceived, as Isaiah says, and brought forth the spirit of salvation. And the woman when she gives birth, the Lord says, "she is in sorrow because her hour has come; but when she has brought forth the child, there is great joy, because a man is born into the world. This will be the joy which no one shall take from us; into which eternal light we will be transferred from this conception of faith. Now therefore let us fast, and pray, as the day of birth is at hand." A day now of toil and sorrow. The reason for establishing the forty-day fast. The whole body of Christ spread throughout the world, that is, the whole Church does this, and that unity which says in the Psalm: "I have cried to You from the ends of the earth, when my heart was in anguish." Hence it now becomes clear to us why the solemnity of this forty-day humiliation has been instituted. For the one who cries out from the ends of the earth, when his heart is in anguish, cries out from the four parts of the world, which Scripture frequently commemorates: East and West, North and South. Through this whole [process], the Decalogue of the Law, no longer to be feared merely by the letter, but to be fulfilled by the grace of charity, was proclaimed. Hence, by multiplying ten by four, we see forty is completed. But still in the labor of temptation, with pardon for sins. For who fulfills perfectly: "You shall not covet?" Hence one must fast and pray; nevertheless, one must not cease from good works. To this labor, the reward named by the denarius is rendered at the end. However, just as the ternary is derived from three, and the quaternary from four; so too the denary is derived from ten: which, when joined to the forty, is given as the reward for labor. The figure of the number fifty signifies the time of that joy, which no one will take away from us: of which we do not yet have the realization in this life; but still, after the solemnity of the Lord's passion from the day of His resurrection through fifty days, during which we relax our fasts, we celebrate this in the praises of the Lord with the sounding Alleluia.

Fasting for a period of forty days, why it was instituted.

Now therefore, in the person of Christ, so that you are not outwitted by Satan, I urge you, dearest ones, to propitiate God with daily fasts, more bountiful alms, and more fervent prayers. Now is the time when both married men should abstain from their wives, and married women should abstain from their husbands, so that they may devote themselves to prayers: although they should do this on certain days throughout the whole year; and the more frequently, indeed the better: because he who immoderately desires what is permitted, offends the one who granted it. For indeed, prayer is a spiritual matter, and therefore it is the more acceptable, the more it fulfills its nature in effect. Moreover, it is performed with greater spiritual work, the more the soul that offers it is suspended from carnal pleasure. The time of Lent is for abstinence and prayer. For forty days Moses, the administrator of the Law, fasted; for forty days Elijah, the most excellent of the Prophets, fasted; for forty days the Lord Himself fasted, bearing witness from the Law and the Prophets. From then, He appeared on the mountain with these two. But we, who cannot perpetuate such a long fast, so as to take nothing in the way of nourishment for so many days and nights, as they did, let us at least do what we can; so that, except on the days when the custom of the Church prohibits fasting for certain reasons, we may please the Lord our God with either daily or frequent fasting. But can abstinence from food and drink not be continuous for so many days, as it can not be from conjugal intercourse? Since we see many of both sexes, in the name of Christ, keeping their members dedicated to God entirely immune from this matter. I think it is not a great thing that the chastity of married couples might be kept for the whole Paschal solemnity, which virginity can keep for a whole lifetime.

Observers of the delights of Lent rather than the religious.

Indeed now that issue, although I ought not to admonish, since I have most strongly recommended the time for humbling the soul as much as I could; yet because of the errors of men, who through vain seductions and depraved customs do not cease to inflict troublesome care for you upon us, I cannot be silent. There are some observers of Lent who are indulgent rather than religious, seeking new delicacies rather than chastising old desires; they strive to surpass the tastes and varieties of whatever foods with abundant and precious preparations of diverse fruits: they fear the vessels in which meats are cooked as if they were unclean, but they do not fear the indulgence in their own flesh for their belly and throat: they fast not to diminish usual gluttony by temperance, but to increase immoderate greed by deferring. For when the time for refreshment arrives, they rush to rich tables just like cattle to the trough; they overload their hearts with more numerous courses and distend their bellies; they provoke their palate with artificial and foreign varieties of seasonings, so that even abundance may not restrain it. Finally, they take in so much by eating as they cannot digest by fasting.

Lent is the occasion of a new joy.

There are also those who abstain from wine in such a way that they seek out other drinks from the pressing of other fruits, not for the sake of health, but for the sake of pleasure: as if Lent were not a holy observance of pious humility, but an occasion for new indulgence. For how much more honorable is it, if the weakness of the stomach cannot tolerate drinking water, to be sustained by the usual and moderate wine, rather than seeking wines that do not know the vintage, that do not know the presses; not so that a purer drink may be chosen, but so that moderation may be condemned? And what is more absurd than to procure such delights for the flesh at a time when the flesh ought to be more strictly chastised, so that the very desire of the throat does not want to pass by Lent? What could be more inappropriate than in the days of humility, when the food of the poor is to be imitated by all, to live in such a way that if one were to live like this all the time, the wealth of the rich might hardly sustain it? Beware of these things, most beloved: consider what is written: Do not follow your desires. If this most salutary commandment must be observed at all times, how much more during these days, when it is so shameful if our desire is given rein to unusual enticements, that one is rightly blamed who has not restrained even the usual ones?

Both good works are commended: giving and forgiving.

Especially remember the poor, so that what you save by living more frugally, you may store up in the heavenly treasure. Let the hungry Christ receive what the fasting Christian spares. Let the self-discipline of the willing become the sustenance of the needy. Let the voluntary poverty of the rich become the necessary abundance of the poor. Also, let there be in a placid and humble mind the merciful ease of forgiving. Let him who has done the injury ask for forgiveness; let him who has received the injury grant forgiveness: that we may not be possessed by Satan, whose triumph lies in the dissension of Christians. For this too is an almsgiving of great profit, to remit a debt to a fellow servant, so that it may be remitted to you by the Lord. Both works of goodness the heavenly master commended to his disciples, saying: Forgive, and you shall be forgiven; give, and it shall be given to you. Remember that servant, to whom his lord restored all his debt, because he did not repay the mercy to his fellow servant who owed him a hundred denarii, which he had received for the ten thousand talents he owed. In this kind of good work, there is no excuse, where the whole capability consists in will alone. Someone might say: For fear of a stomach ache, I cannot fast. He might even say: I want to give to the poor; but I have nothing to give, or I have so little that I fear I will need if I give. Although in these works, people often make false excuses for themselves, because they do not find true ones. Nevertheless, who is there who can say: Therefore, I did not forgive the one asking forgiveness, because my health prevented me, or because I lacked the hand to extend? Forgive, that you may be forgiven. The flesh has no part in this work, nor is any member of one's flesh taken up to assist the soul, to fulfill what is asked. It is done by will, and perfected by will. Do it confidently, give confidently, you will feel no pain in your body, nor lack anything in your home. Now truly, brothers, see how evil it is that one does not forgive a repentant brother, who is commanded to love even his enemy. And so it is written: Do not let the sun set on your anger; consider, dearest ones, whether someone should be called a Christian who at least in these days does not want to terminate enmities, which he never ought to have engaged in.

Sermons - Sermon 211

SERMO 211 In Lent Anger is one thing, hatred is another.

These holy days which we observe in the observance of Lent admonish us to speak to you about fraternal concord so that whoever has a quarrel against another may end it, lest it ends. Do not disdain these things, my brothers. For when this mortal and fragile life, which is in danger among so many earthly temptations and prays not to be overwhelmed, cannot be without any sins in any way of its own, there is one remedy by which we can live, because our master, God, has taught us to say in prayer: Forgive us our debts as we also forgive our debtors. We have made a pact and agreement with God, and have signed the condition of paying off the debt in a bond. Forgive us, we ask with full confidence, if we also forgive; but if we do not forgive, we should not think our sins are forgiven. Let us not deceive ourselves, a man does not deceive himself, God deceives no one. It is human to be angry - and would that we could not even do this - it is human to be angry, but your anger, a short-lived shoot, should not be watered with suspicions and reach the beam of hatred. For anger is one thing, hatred is another. For often even a father is angry with his son, but does not hate his son; he is angry to correct him. If he is angry to correct, he is angry with love. Therefore it is said: You see the speck in your brother's eye; but you do not see the beam in your own eye. You blame anger in another and harbor hatred in yourself. In comparison to hatred, anger is a speck; but if you nurture the speck, it will be a beam; if you pluck it out and throw it away, it will be nothing. The prison of one who hates is his own heart.

If you have noticed... what have you noticed? The sentence of blessed John, when his epistle was read, ought to have terrified you. For he says: The darkness has passed, the true light already shines. Then he continued and added: Whoever says he is in the light and hates his brother is in darkness even now. But perhaps a man thinks those to be the kinds of darkness which those confined in prisons suffer. If only they were such! And yet in such darkness no one wants to be. However, in these prison darknesses, the innocent may be confined. For in such darkness, the martyrs were enclosed. Darkness was spread all around, and light thrived in their hearts. In those darknesses of the prison, they did not see with their eyes but saw God with the love of brotherhood. Do you wish to know what kind of darknesses are those of which it is said: Whoever hates his brother is in darkness even now? In another place, he says: Whoever hates his brother is a murderer. Whoever hates his brother walks, exits, enters, proceeds, burdened by no chains, enclosed in no prison, yet bound by guilt. Do not think him to be without a prison: his prison is his heart. When you hear: Whoever hates his brother is in darkness even now, lest perhaps you disregard the darkness, he adds and says: Whoever hates his brother is a murderer. You hate your brother and walk safely, and you are unwilling to reconcile, even though God gives space for that reason? Behold, you are already a murderer, and you still live; if you had God wrathful toward you with the hatred of a brother, you would suddenly be snatched away. God spares you, spare yourself, reconcile with your brother. But perhaps you are willing, and he is not willing? Let that be enough for you. You have something for which to grieve for him; you have freed yourself. Say, if you wish to reconcile and he is not willing, say confidently: Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors.

Forgive your brother.

Perhaps you have sinned against him, you wish to reconcile with him, you wish to say to him: Brother, forgive me, I have sinned against you. He does not want to forgive, does not want to release the debt; what you owe him, he does not want to release to you. Let him observe, when he has to pray. When he comes, who refused to forgive you for having perhaps sinned against him, when he comes to pray, what will he do? He will say: Our Father who art in heaven. He will say, he will approach: Hallowed be thy name. Say further: Thy kingdom come. Follow: Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven. Go further: Give us this day our daily bread. You have said it. See what follows, lest perhaps you wish to skip over and say something else. There is nothing you can pass over, you are held there. Therefore say or if you do not have a reason to say: Forgive us our debts, do not say it. And where is that which the same Apostle said: If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves and the truth is not in us? But if the conscience of frailty stings and in this world the abundance of iniquity is everywhere, then say: Forgive us our debts. But see what follows. For you did not want to forgive the sin of your brother, and you will say: As we forgive our debtors? Or will you not say it? If you will not say it, you will receive nothing; but if you will say it, you will say a false thing. Therefore say it and say it truthfully. How will you say it truthfully, who refused to release the sin of your brother?

I seek pardon from brother.

I have advised him; now I console you, whoever you are, if indeed you are the one who said to your brother, “Forgive me for what I have sinned against you.” If you said it from your whole heart, with true humility, not false charity, as God sees in the heart from where you spoke, but he refused to forgive you, do not be anxious. You are both servants; you have a Lord. You owe to your fellow servant; he refused to forgive you, appeal to the Lord of both. What the Lord forgives you, if he can, let the servant demand. I say something else. I admonished the one who refused to forgive his brother when he asks to be forgiven, to do what he was unwilling to do, lest when he prays, he does not receive what he desires; I also admonished the one who sought forgiveness for his sin from his brother and did not receive it, to be secure in the Lord for what he did not obtain from his brother. There is also another thing to admonish. Your brother sinned against you and refused to say, “Forgive me for what I have sinned against you.” This weed abounds; would that God would uproot it from His field, that is, from your hearts! For there are many who know they have sinned against their brothers and refuse to say, “Forgive me.” They were not ashamed to sin, and they are ashamed to ask; they were not ashamed of iniquity, and they are ashamed of humility. Therefore, I particularly admonish those of you who have discord with your brothers, and recall yourselves to yourselves, and consider yourselves, and pass a just judgment within yourselves, within your hearts, and find that you should not have done what you did, should not have said what you said. Ask for forgiveness, brothers, from your brothers; do what the Apostle says: “Forgiving one another as God in Christ forgave you”; do it, do not be ashamed to ask for forgiveness. Therefore, I say to all, men and women, younger and older, laypeople and clerics, I say to myself as well, let us all listen, let us all fear if we have sinned against our brothers. We have still received a reprieve of living; we do not die for it; we are still alive, we are not yet condemned; while we live, let us do what the Father who will be the judge commands, and let us ask forgiveness from our brothers whom perhaps we have offended or injured by sinning against them. There are humble persons according to the order of this world, from whom if you ask forgiveness, they become arrogant in pride. This is what I say: sometimes a master sins against his servant; for if that one is a master, that one is a servant, yet both are other's servants, for both are redeemed by the blood of Christ. However, it seems harsh even for me to command it, that if perhaps a master sins against his servant by unjustly arguing, by unjustly beating, he should say, "Forgive me, give me pardon." Not because he should not do it, but lest that one begins to become proud. What then? Before the eyes of God, let him repent, before the eyes of God, let him punish his heart, and if he cannot say to the servant because he ought not: "Give me pardon," let him speak gently to him. A gentle address is a request for pardon. Do not seek forgiveness from a brother who has sinned against you.

It remains for me to address those against whom others have sinned and who have not wanted to ask for forgiveness. For I have already addressed those who were unwilling to forgive their brethren who were asking for pardon. Now therefore, as I address all of you, since these days are holy, let not your disputes remain; I believe that some of you have thought in your hearts, knowing that you have some disagreements with your brethren, and have found that it was not you who sinned against them, but they against you. Even if you do not speak to me now, because it is my place to speak here, and yours to be silent and listen, nevertheless you may be thinking and saying to yourselves: I want to reconcile, but he offended me, he sinned against me and does not want to ask for forgiveness. What then? Shall I say: Go to him and you ask for forgiveness? By no means. I do not want you to lie, I do not want you to say: Grant me forgiveness, when you know that you did not sin against your brother. For what benefit is it to you, when you are your own accuser? What do you seek to be forgiven by him whom you did not offend or against whom you did not sin? It is of no benefit to you, I do not want you to do it. Have you examined well and know that he sinned against you, not you against him? I know, he says. Let your knowledge be your judgment. Do not go to your brother who has sinned against you and ask for his forgiveness. There should be other peacemakers among you who will rebuke him to ask forgiveness from you first. Be ready only to forgive, be entirely ready to remit with your heart. If you are ready to forgive, you have already forgiven. If you still have something to pray for, pray that he may ask you for forgiveness, because you know it harms him if he does not ask; pray for him to ask. Say to the Lord in your prayer: Lord, you know that I have not sinned against that brother of mine, but rather he has sinned against me, and it harms him that he sinned against me if he does not ask for pardon from me; with a good heart I ask you to forgive him.

Let us celebrate Easter in security.

Behold, I have told you that... especially during these days of your fasting, your observances, your continence, what you should do to be in concord with your brothers. I also may rejoice in your peace who am saddened by your quarrels, so that forgiving each other, if anyone has a grievance against someone, we may celebrate Easter securely, we may celebrate His passion safely, who owed nothing to anyone and paid the price for debtors — I mean, the Lord Jesus Christ, who did not sin against anyone and yet the whole world sinned against Him, who did not exact punishments but promised rewards. Therefore, we have Him as a witness in our hearts that if we have sinned against anyone, we should sincerely ask for forgiveness; if anyone has sinned against us, we should be ready to grant forgiveness and pray for our enemies. Let us not wait to be avenged, brothers. What is it to be avenged if not to be fed with another's evil? I know people come daily, kneeling, striking their foreheads to the ground, sometimes washing their faces with tears in such humility and disturbance and saying: Lord, avenge me, kill my enemy. Certainly, pray for the one who kills your enemy and saves your brother; let the enmity die, let nature be saved. Pray in such a way that God may avenge you: let him who persecuted you perish, but let him who is restored to you remain.

Sermons - Sermon 211A

SERMON 211/A In Lent

Fragment Let us endure the present, let us hope for the future. Our Lord Jesus Christ, therefore, commended to us in His passion the labors and afflictions of the present age; in His resurrection, He commended eternal life and the blessedness of the future age. Let us endure the present, hope for the future. Hence, in these days, we observe days signifying the labors of the present age, fasting and mortifying our souls; but in the coming days, we signify the days of the future age. We are not there yet. I said "we signify," not "we hold." Until the passion, indeed, there is affliction; after the resurrection, there is praise. Our business in the next life. In that life, our very occupation will be in the kingdom of God: to see, to love, to praise. What, then, shall we do there? In this age, there are works of necessity, others of iniquity. What are the works of necessity? Sowing, plowing, planting, sailing, grinding, cooking, weaving, and similar such necessities; and those good works of ours are necessary. Breaking bread for the hungry is not your necessity; but he who receives the bread has the necessity. Receiving the stranger, clothing the naked, ransoming the captive, visiting the sick, giving counsel to those deliberating, liberating the oppressed, all these pertain to almsgiving; these are works of necessity. What are the works of iniquity? Stealing, robbing, drunkenness, gambling, usury; and who can count all the deeds of iniquity? In that kingdom, there will be no works of necessity, for there will be no misery; no works of iniquity, for there will be no trouble. Where there is no misery, there are no works of necessity; where there is no malice, there are no works of iniquity. What will you do to eat when no one is hungry? How will you perform those very works of almsgiving? To whom will you break bread when no one is in need? Whom will you visit sick when eternal health persists? Whom will you bury dead when immortality never dies? The works of necessity perish; if you do works of iniquity here, you will not come there. What shall we do there, tell me? Sleep? Here, indeed, men who have nothing to do sleep; there, sleep does not exist, for there is no fatigue. Therefore, not performing works of necessity, not sleeping, what shall we do? Let no one fear weariness; let no one think there will be weariness there. Are you now weary of being healthy? All things in this world create weariness; health does not create weariness. If health does not create weariness, will immortality create weariness? What, then, will our activity be? Amen, and Alleluia. Here, indeed, we do one thing, there another, not by day and night, but by day without end: what now the powers of heaven, the Seraphim, say without weariness: Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Hosts. They say this without weariness. Are the pulses of your veins now fatigued? As long as you live, your vein has pulsation. You work, and by tiring you become tired, and rest, and return to work, and your vein is not tired. Just as your vein is not tired in your health, so your tongue and heart will not be tired in the praises of God, in your immortality. Hear the testimony of your occupation. What is "your occupation"? This occupation is leisure. A leisurely occupation, what is it? To praise the Lord. Hear the verdict from there: Blessed are those who dwell in your house. The Psalm says this: Blessed are those who dwell in your house. And as if we asked how they are blessed: "Will they have much gold?" Those who have much gold are very miserable. These are blessed, who dwell in your house. From what source blessed? This is their blessedness: they will praise you forever and ever.

Sermons - Sermon 212

SERMO 212 ON THE TRADITION OF THE SYMBOL A brief exposition of the whole creed.

It is time for you to receive the Symbol wherein is contained briefly, for eternal salvation, all that is believed. The Symbol, however, is so called from a certain similarity by a transferred word, because a symbol is made among merchants to strengthen their association in a pact of faith. And your association is of spiritual goods so that you may be like traders seeking a good pearl. This is the love which will be poured into your hearts through the Holy Spirit who will be given to you. To this, one attains from faith contained in this Symbol so that you may believe in God the Father Almighty, invisible, immortal, king of ages, creator of visible and invisible things, and whatever else is worthily spoken of Him either by sincere reason or by the authority of the holy Scriptures. Nor separate the Son from this excellence of God. For these things are not so spoken of the Father as if they were alien to Him who said: "I and the Father are one," and of whom the Apostle says: "Who, being in the form of God, did not consider it robbery to be equal with God." For robbery is the usurpation of another's, whereas that equality is naturally His; and therefore, how will the Son not be almighty through whom all things were made, since He is also the power and wisdom of God, of which wisdom it is written that although it is one, it can do all things? He too is by nature invisible, in that very form in which He is equal to the Father. For the Word of God is naturally invisible, which in the beginning was with God and the Word was God; in which nature also, He remains immortal entirely, that is, in every way unchangeable. For even the human soul is said in a certain way to be immortal, but there is not true immortality where there is so much changeability, whereby it can both fall and advance; whence its death is to be alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in it; but its life is to approach the fountain of life so that in the light of God it may see the light, according to which life also you revive from a certain death to which you renounce through the grace of Christ. But the Word of God, which is the only-begotten Son, lives with the Father unchangeably forever; neither does He fail because continuance does not diminish, nor does He advance because perfection does not increase. He is also the king of ages, creator of visible and invisible things; because as the Apostle says: "In Him were all things created in heaven and on earth, visible and invisible, whether Thrones or Dominions or Principalities or Powers: all things were created through Him and for Him, and in Him all things hold together." But because He humbled Himself, not losing the form of God, but taking on the form of a servant, through this form of a servant He was seen being born of the Holy Spirit and of the Virgin Mary. In this form of a servant, the Almighty was weakened because He suffered under Pontius Pilate; through this form of a servant, the immortal died because He was crucified and buried; through this form of a servant, the king of ages rose on the third day; through this form of a servant, the Creator of visible and invisible things ascended into heaven, from whence He never departed; through this form of a servant, He sits at the right hand of the Father, who is the arm of the Father, of whom the Prophet says: "And to whom has the arm of the Lord been revealed?" In this form of a servant, He will come to judge the living and the dead, in which He wanted to share in the dead, though He is the life of the living. Through Him, the Holy Spirit was sent to us from the Father and by Himself. The Spirit of the Father and the Son, sent by both, generated by none, unity of both, equal to both. This Trinity is one God, almighty, invisible, immortal, king of ages, creator of visible and invisible things. For we do not say three gods or three omnipotent ones or three creators or whatever else of the excellence of God can similarly be said, because neither are there three gods but one God; although in this Trinity the Father is not the Son, and the Son is not the Father, and the Holy Spirit is neither the Son nor the Father, but He is the Father of the Son, He is the Son of the Father, He is the Spirit of both the Father and the Son. Believe so that you may understand, for if you do not believe, you will not understand. From this faith, hope for grace, in which all your sins will be forgiven. For by this, you will be saved - not from yourselves but as the gift of God - not by works, so that no one may boast. For you will be His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus for good works which God prepared beforehand, that you should walk in them, and putting off the old man, you may put on the new man, be a new creation, singing a new song, receiving an eternal inheritance through the New Testament; whence also after this death, which passed into all men, which is owed and rendered to the old first man, hope even at the end of your bodies for the resurrection, not to passions of pains, as the impious are to be resurrected, nor to joys of carnal desires, as fools think, but as the Apostle says: "It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body," where the spiritual body will be subjected to the spirit in such a miraculous felicity to all facility, so that it will no longer oppress the soul nor will it seek any nourishment, because it will suffer no deficiency, but will remain in eternal life where with the body the very eternity will be life to our spirit. The creed must by no means be written but always kept in memory and recalled.

Therefore, I have rendered this brief discourse on the entire Creed to you as required. When you hear the whole Creed, you will recognize this short collection of our discourse. You should by no means write it down to retain the exact words, but learn it by listening, and once you hold it, not write it down, but always retain and recall it by memory. For whatever you will hear in the Creed is already contained in the divine letters of the Holy Scriptures, and you are accustomed to hear everything in parts where needed. But what is thus collected and formed into a certain shape is not permitted to be written; it is a commemoration of God’s promise, where through the Prophet, foretelling the New Testament, He said: "This is the Testament that I will ordain for them after those days, says the Lord, putting my laws in their minds and writing them in their hearts.” Because of the necessity of signifying this, the Creed is not written on tablets or any other material, but in hearts through listening. He who has called you to His kingdom and glory will provide that it may also be written in your hearts by the Holy Spirit through His grace regenerating you; so that you may love what you believe and that faith may work in you through love; and in this way, you may please the Lord God, the giver of all good things, not by servilely fearing punishment, but by freely loving righteousness. This, therefore, is the Creed which has already been introduced to you by the Scriptures and ecclesiastical discourses as catechumens, but under this brief form, it is to be confessed and advanced by the faithful.

Sermons - Sermon 213

SERMO 213 In the Delivery of the Creed The order is that one must first believe, then call upon the name of the Lord. The Apostle says: It will be, everyone who calls on the name of the Lord will be saved. You run to this salvation, who have given your names for baptism; salvation, not of a short time, but of eternal; salvation, which is not common to us and to the cattle, nor to good and bad men. For you see, and it is certain to all of us, that the salvation of the present time, for which men labor much to obtain or restore, is not for men alone; but also for cattle, great and small: from dragons and elephants to flies and worms this salvation extends. Then men themselves have this salvation, both those who call on God and those who blaspheme God; whence the holy Psalm says: You save men and beasts, O Lord, as your mercy is multiplied, O God; but the sons of men will hope under the cover of your wings. Therefore, this salvation by the manifold mercy of God reaches even to the lowest animals: But the sons of men, who belong to the Son of Man, will hope under the cover of your wings. We do this in this life: now we hope, that afterward we may receive. And what does the Psalm itself promise? They will be filled with the abundance of your house, and you will give them to drink from the river of your delights: for with you is the fountain of life. The fountain of life is Christ: so that now we might taste something of him, he became man; but his abundance is reserved for us, which satisfies the angels and all the heavenly ministries. But this is for afterward: now, however, that we may be able to reach that, let us call on God that we may be saved, according to the Apostle who said: Everyone who calls on the name of the Lord will be saved. The Prophet had said this before: but the Apostle Paul now said that the time has passed when it is fulfilled what is written: Everyone who calls on the name of the Lord will be saved. I have already said by what salvation, lest perhaps you now say: Why are not those who call on the name of the Lord saved? He will be saved. Then the Apostle himself added: But how will they call on him in whom they have not believed? And how will they believe in him of whom they have not heard? And how will they hear without a preacher? And how will they preach, unless they are sent? As it is written: How beautiful are the feet of those who preach the gospel of peace, who bring glad tidings of good things! Therefore, no one can be saved who has not called: no one can call unless he has first believed. Therefore, since this is the order, that you first believe, then call, today you receive the Symbol of faith, in which you believe; and after eight days the Prayer, in which you call.

I believe in God the Father almighty. The Creed is therefore a briefly comprised rule of faith, to instruct the mind and not burden the memory; it is said in few words, from which much is acquired. The Creed is therefore called that in which Christians recognize themselves: this I will first pronounce to you briefly. Then, as far as the Lord has deigned to grant, I will open it to you; so that what I want you to hold, you may also be able to understand. This is the Creed. And after the Creed: It is not much, yet it is much; there is no need for you to count the words, but to weigh them. I believe in God the Father Almighty. See how quickly it is said, and how much it means. He is God, and He is Father: God with power, Father with goodness. How happy we are, who have found our God to be a Father! Let us therefore believe in Him, and promise ourselves everything from His mercy, because He is almighty: therefore, we believe in God the Father Almighty. Let no one say: He cannot forgive my sins. How can the Almighty not do so? But you say: I have sinned much. And I say: But He is Almighty. And you: I have committed such sins, from which I cannot be freed and cleansed. I reply: But He is Almighty. See what you sing to Him in the Psalm: Bless, he says, my soul, the Lord, and do not forget all His rewards, who forgives all your iniquities, who heals all your diseases. For this, we need His omnipotence. For all creation needed His omnipotence, that it might be created: He is almighty to do greater and smaller things, almighty for heavenly and earthly things, almighty to make things immortal and mortal, almighty to make things spiritual and corporeal, almighty to make things visible and invisible, great in great things, and not small in small things; lastly, He is almighty to do all things which He willed. For I say what He cannot do: He cannot die, cannot sin, cannot lie, cannot be deceived; such He cannot do, because if He could, He would not be almighty. Therefore believe in Him and confess: For with the heart one believes unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation. So when you have believed, it is necessary that you confess when you recite the Creed. Receive now what you should hold, and afterwards recite, and never forget.

Christ, the only Son of God, incarnate for us.

What next? And in Jesus Christ. You say, I believe in God the Father almighty, and in Jesus Christ His only Son, our Lord. If the only Son, therefore equal to the Father: if the only Son, therefore of the same substance as the Father: if the only Son, therefore of the same omnipotence as the Father: if the only Son, therefore co-eternal with the Father. This in Himself, and with Himself, and with the Father. For our sake why? for us why? Who was born of the Holy Spirit and the virgin Mary. Behold how He came, who, to whom: through the virgin Mary, in whom the Holy Spirit operated, not a human husband; who made her fruitful, and preserved her intact. Thus the Lord Christ was clothed in flesh, thus He became man who made man: by assuming what He was not, not losing what He was. For the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us. The Word was not turned into flesh, but the Word, remaining, took on flesh, always invisible, was made visible when He wished, and dwelt among us. What does it mean: among us? Among men, made one of the number of men: the one and only, only to the Father. For us what? And for us the only Savior, for no one other than Him is our Savior; and for us the only Redeemer, for no one other than Him is our Redeemer: not with gold, not with silver, but with his own blood.

Christ was crucified and buried in his flesh.

Therefore, let us see where we ourselves have been purchased, his business transactions. For when it was said in the Creed: Born of the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary, what then has he suffered for us? It follows: Crucified under Pontius Pilate and buried. What? The only Son of God, our Lord, crucified? The only Son of God, our Lord, buried? A man was crucified: God was not changed, God was not killed; and yet according to man, he was killed: For if they had known, says the Apostle, they would never have crucified the Lord of glory. And he shows the Lord of glory, and confesses him crucified: for if someone even tears your tunic unharmed in your flesh, he does you an injury, nor do you cry out for your garment, saying, “You tore my tunic,” but, "You tore me, you destroyed me, you made threads out of me." You speak these things whole, and you speak the truth, and he who hurt has taken nothing from your flesh. Thus also the Lord Christ was crucified. He is the Lord, he is the only one to the Father, he is our Savior, he is the Lord of glory: nevertheless he was crucified, but in the flesh and buried in only the flesh. For where he was buried and when he was buried, then there was no soul there, only the flesh lay in the tomb; and yet you confess Jesus Christ, his only Son, our Lord, who was born of the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary. Who? Jesus Christ, the only Son of God, our Lord. Crucified under Pontius Pilate. Who? Jesus Christ, the only Son of God, our Lord. And buried. Who? Jesus Christ, the only Son of God, our Lord. Only the flesh lies, and you say: our Lord? I say, plainly I say: because I regard the garment, and I adore the clothed. That flesh was his garment; because: When he was in the form of God, he did not consider it robbery to be equal to God, but he emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, not losing the form of God, made in the likeness of men, and found in human form.

He has risen, he has ascended into heaven, he sits at the right hand of the Father.

Let us not contemn the flesh alone: when it lay down, then He redeemed us. Why did He redeem us? Because it did not always lie down: for on the third day He rose again from the dead. This follows in the Creed; when we have confessed His passion, we also confess His resurrection. What did He accomplish in the passion? He taught what we should endure. What did He accomplish in the resurrection? He showed what we should hope for. Here is labor, there is reward: labor in the passion, reward in the resurrection. Nor, since He rose from the dead, did He remain here: but what follows? He ascended into heaven. And where is He now? He sits at the right hand of the Father. Understand the right hand, do not seek the left hand there: the right hand of God is said to be eternal felicity; the right hand of God is said to be ineffable, inestimable, incomprehensible blessedness and prosperity. This is the right hand of God, there He sits. What is it: There He sits? There He dwells: for seats are called places where one dwells. For when the holy Stephen saw Him, he was not lying who said: He sits at the right hand of the Father. How does Stephen say? Behold, I see the heavens opened, and the Son of Man standing at the right hand of God. Because he saw Him standing, who then said He sits at the right hand of the Father might have been lying? It is said that He sits, therefore: remains, dwells. How? as you. In what state? Who will say? Let us say what He taught, let us say what we know.

Christ our judge and advocate.

What? From there He shall come to judge the living and the dead. Let us confess the Savior, so that we may not fear the Judge: for whoever now believes in Him, and keeps His commandments, and loves Him, will not fear when He comes to judge the living and the dead; not only will he not fear, but he will wish for Him to come. For what is happier for us than when He comes whom we desire, when He comes whom we love? But let us fear, because He will be our judge: He will then be our judge who is now our advocate. Listen to John: If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us; but if we confess our sins, he says, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness. I have written these things to you so that you may not sin: and if anyone sins, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous; and He is the propitiation for our sins. If you had a case to be pleaded before a judge, and instructed an advocate, were received by the advocate, and he pleaded your case as he could; and if he did not finish it, and you heard that judge approaching, how much would you rejoice, because he could be your judge who a little before had been your advocate? And now he prays for us, he intercedes for us; we have him as advocate, and we fear the judge? Rather, because we have sent the advocate before us, we should securely hope for the judge to come.

Holy Spirit. The entire Trinity.

There is a passage in the Creed that pertains to Jesus Christ, the only Son of God, our Lord; it follows: And in the Holy Spirit, so that the Trinity may be completed, the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit. But many things are said about the Son, because the Son took on humanity: the Son, the Word was made flesh, not the Father, not the Holy Spirit. But the flesh of the Son was created by the whole Trinity: for the works of the Trinity are inseparable. So thus, receive the Holy Spirit, so that you do not believe that He is lesser than the Son, or lesser than the Father. For the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, the entire Trinity, is one God: nothing there is different, nothing variable, nothing defective, nothing contrary to the other; always equal, invisible and unchangeable, the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit. May the Trinity deliver us from the multitude of sins. The Church is most similar to Mary, because she is a virgin and brings forth the members of Christ.

Now what follows pertains to us. Concerning the holy Church. We are the holy Church: but I did not speak of "us" as if just those of us who are here, who heard me just now. As many as are here by God's grace, Christian faithful in this church, that is, in this city, as many as are in this region, as many as are in this province, as many as are beyond the sea, as many as are throughout the whole world; since from the rising of the sun to its setting the name of the Lord is praised; thus is the Catholic Church, our true mother, the true bride of that Bridegroom. Let us honor her, because she is the matron of so great a Lord; and what shall I say? Great is the dignity and uniqueness of the Bridegroom: he found a prostitute, made her a virgin. Because she was a prostitute she should not deny, lest she forget the mercy of the liberator. How was she not a prostitute, when she fornicated after idols and demons? Fornication of the heart was in all: in few it was of the flesh, in all of the heart. And he came, and made her a virgin: made the Church a virgin. In faith she is a virgin: in the flesh she has a few virgins who are holy; in faith, all ought to be virgins, both females and males; for there must be chastity, and purity, and holiness. Do you want to know how she is a virgin? Listen to the Apostle Paul, listen to the friend of the Bridegroom, who is zealous for the Bridegroom, not for himself. "I have betrothed you," he says, "to one man." He spoke to the Church: and to which Church? To whatever place those letters could reach: "I have betrothed you to one man, to present you as a chaste virgin to Christ. But I fear," he said, "lest as the serpent deceived Eve by his subtlety, so your minds should be corrupted from the chastity that is in Christ." Where you fear to be corrupted, there you are a virgin. "I fear," he said, "lest as the serpent seduced Eve by his subtlety." Did that serpent have carnal intercourse with Eve? Yet he extinguished the virginity of her heart. This I fear, he said, lest your minds be corrupted from the chastity that is in Christ. Therefore the Church is a virgin. She is a virgin, let her be a virgin: let her beware of the seducer, lest she find herself corrupted. The Church is a virgin. You might say to me: If she is a virgin, how does she bear children? Or if she does not bear children, how did we give our names that we might be born from her womb? I answer: She is both a virgin and bears children; she imitates Mary, who bore the Lord. Was not holy Mary a virgin both in bearing and remaining a virgin? Thus, too, the Church both bears and is a virgin; and if you consider, she bears Christ: because those who are baptized are his members. You are, says the Apostle, the body of Christ and his members. If she therefore bears the members of Christ, she is most like Mary. The remission of sins through baptism and the Lord's Prayer. For the remission of sins. If this did not exist in the Church, there would be no hope: if the remission of sins were not in the Church, there would be no hope of future life and eternal liberation. We give thanks to God, who gave this gift to His Church. Behold, you are coming to the holy font: you will be washed by the salvific baptism, renewed by the washing of regeneration; you will be without any sin, ascending from that bath. All the things that pursued you in the past will be erased there. Your sins will be like the Egyptians pursuing the Israelites; pursuing, but up to the Red Sea. What is, up to the Red Sea? Up to the font consecrated by the cross and blood of Christ. For what is red, is red. Do you not see how the part of Christ is red? Ask the eyes of faith: if you see the cross, look at the blood: if you see what hangs, look at what it shed. The side of Christ was pierced by a lance, and our price flowed out. Therefore, baptism is marked by the sign of Christ, that is, the water in which you are dipped, and like passing through the Red Sea. Your sins are your enemies: they follow, but up to the sea. When you have entered, you will escape, they will be erased; just as the water covered the Egyptians when the Israelites escaped through dry land. And what did the Scripture say? Not one of them remained. You have sinned much, you have sinned little; you have sinned greatly, you have sinned small sins; what does it matter that not one of them remained? But since we live in this world, where no one lives without sin, therefore the remission of sins is not only in the washing of holy baptism, but also in the Lord's Prayer and daily, which you will receive after eight days. In that you will find your daily baptism; so that you may give thanks to God, who granted this gift to His Church, which we confess in the Creed; so that when we say: Holy Church, we may add: the remission of sins.

Resurrection of the flesh.

After these things, the resurrection of the flesh. This is already the end: but the resurrection of the flesh will be an end without end; but afterward there will be no death of the flesh, no pain of the flesh, no anguish of the flesh, no hunger and thirst of the flesh, no afflictions of the flesh, no old age and weariness of the flesh. Therefore, do not dread the resurrection of the flesh: see its good, forget its bad. Certainly, whatever complaints of the flesh there are now, then there will not be: we will be eternal, equal to the angels of God, we will have one city with the holy angels. We will be possessed by the Lord, we will be his inheritance, and he will be our inheritance; because we now say to him: Lord, you are the portion of my inheritance, and it is said of us to his Son: Ask of me, and I will give you the nations as your inheritance. We will possess, and we will be possessed: we will hold, and we will be held. What shall I say? We worship, and we are worshipped; but we worship as God; we are worshipped as a field. To know that we are worshipped, hear the Lord: I am the true vine, you are the branches, my Father is the husbandman. If he is called a husbandman, he cultivates a field. What field? He cultivates us. And the husbandman of this visible earth can plow, he can dig, he can plant, he can irrigate if he finds water: but can he make it rain? Can he give growth, lead forth a sprout, set a root in the ground, promote to the airs, strengthen the branches, burden with fruits, honor with leaves, can the husbandman do these things? However, our husbandman, God the Father, can do all these things in us. Why? Because we believe in God the Father almighty. Therefore, hold fast to what we have proposed to you, and, as God has deigned to give, we have exposed. For eight days, the recitation of the Creed. In eight days you will return what you received today. Your parents, who receive you, should teach you so that you may be found prepared, and how you should keep vigil until cockcrow, for the prayers which you conduct here. Now the Creed itself also begins to be given you here, so that you may hold it diligently: let no one tremble, let no one fail to deliver it correctly due to trembling. Be assured, we are your fathers, we do not have the rods and staffs of grammarians. If anyone errs in word, let them not err in faith.

Sermons - Sermon 214

SERMO 214 In the handing over of the Creed The creed of faith established.

According to the measure of our age and rudiments, for the initiation of the assumed duty and in the effect of love towards you, who are now ministering at the altar to which you will approach, we ought not to defraud you of the ministry of the word. The Apostle says: "For if you confess with your mouth that Jesus is Lord, and believe in your heart that God has raised Him from the dead, you will be saved. For with the heart one believes unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation." This is what the Creed builds in you, which you ought to believe and confess, so that you may be saved. And indeed, what you are about to receive briefly, to be committed to memory and pronounced by the mouth, are not new or unheard for you. For in the holy Scriptures and in ecclesiastical discourses, you are accustomed to hear these in many ways. But they are to be handed to you briefly collected and reduced to a certain order and tightly bound, so that your faith may be built, your confession prepared, and your memory not burdened. These are what you ought faithfully to retain and memorize diligently.

After this prologue, the entire Creed must be recited without any inserted discussion: I believe in God the Father Almighty, and the rest that follows in it. This Creed, you know, is not usually written down. Once said, this discussion is to be added.

God the Almighty created all things out of nothing.

What you have briefly heard, you ought not only to believe, but also to commit to memory in the same words and to utter with your mouth. But since we must defend against those who think differently and are captivated by the devil, who lie in wait for the faith and oppose salvation, remember to believe in Almighty God such that there is no nature at all which He did not create. And therefore, He punishes sin, which He did not make, because it defiles the nature that He made. Therefore, all visible and invisible creatures, whatever can participate in unchangeable truth with a rational mind, like angels and humans; whatever lives and senses, even if lacking intellect, like all animals on land, in water, and in the air, walking, crawling, swimming, flying; whatever is said to live without intellect or any sense, in whatever way, like those rooted in the earth and sprouting and rising into the air; whatever solely occupies space by its bulk, like stone, and any visible or even tangible elements of the world's structure; all these things the Almighty made, joining the lowest and highest with the middle, and arranging all that He created in suitable places and times. He made them not out of any matter which He did not make Himself. For He did not shape something foreign but established what He would shape. For whoever says that He could not make something out of nothing, how can he believe that the Almighty made it? Without doubt, he denies the Almighty who says that God could not make the world if He did not have something from which to make it. For what kind of omnipotence is there, where such need exists, that He could not bring about the effect of His work, like a craftsman, unless helped by material which He did not establish? Therefore, let him purify his mind from these opinions and errors who believes in the Almighty God. For that which is called the formless material of things, capable of forms and subject to the work of the Creator, can be converted into all things which the Creator wished to make. God did not find it as coeternal with Himself, from which to fabricate the world, but He Himself instituted it from absolutely nothing, along with the things He made from it. Nor did it exist before the things themselves, which seem to have been made from it: henceforth the Almighty first made everything from nothing, along with which He also made wherefrom He made. The material of heaven and earth, just as these were created in the beginning, was co-created simultaneously with them; nor was there anything from which to make the things that God made in the beginning: and yet there are the things that the Almighty made, which He composed, filled, and adorned. For if He made them in the beginning, He certainly made them from nothing; also from these things He made, He can make whatever He wills because He is Almighty.

While the wicked do what God does not want, God makes of them what He Himself wants. Nor should the wicked therefore believe that God is not omnipotent, because they do many things against His will. For even when they do what He does not will, He will make from these things what He wills. In no way, then, do they either change or overcome the will of the Omnipotent: for whether a man is justly condemned or mercifully liberated, the will of the Omnipotent is fulfilled. What, therefore, the Omnipotent does not will, He alone cannot achieve. He therefore uses the wicked, not according to their perversity, but according to His own righteous will. For just as the wicked, by their nature good, that is, by their own good work, use it badly, so He, being good, even uses their wicked works for good, lest the will of the Omnipotent be in any way overcome. For if He did not have what good to do justly and well from the wicked, He would in no way allow them either to be born or to live; He did not make them wicked, because He made them human; because He did not create sins, which are against nature, but created natures themselves. Yet He could not be ignorant, foreseeing that they would be wicked; but just as He knew what evils they would do, so also He knew what good He would make from them. Who can explain in words, who can match in praises, how much good the passion of the Savior has bestowed upon us, whose blood was shed for the remission of sins? And yet this great good was fulfilled through the malice of Satan, through the malice of the Jews, through the malice of Judas the traitor. Nor is the good justly attributed to them, which God, not they, bestowed upon men through them; but punishment is justly attributed to them, because they wished to harm. Just as we could find something that is evident to us, how God used even the wicked works of the devil, the Jews, and Judas the traitor for our redemption and salvation; so, in the hidden and obscure depths of all creation, which we penetrate with neither the eyes nor the acumen of the mind, He knows how God uses wickedness for good, so that in all things that arise and are administered in the world, the will of the Omnipotent is fulfilled.

What the Almighty does not will, that alone he cannot do. But since I said that the Omnipotent can only not do what he does not will, lest anyone thinks I rashly said that the Omnipotent cannot do anything, the blessed Apostle also said: If we do not believe, he remains faithful, he cannot deny himself. But because he does not will it, he cannot, for he cannot will it. For justice cannot will to do what is unjust, wisdom cannot will what is foolish, nor can truth will what is false. Hence we are admonished that God is omnipotent, not only in what the Apostle says: He cannot deny himself, but in many things he cannot. Behold, I say, and dare to say in his truth, which I do not dare to deny: God the Omnipotent cannot die, cannot change, cannot be deceived, cannot become miserable, cannot be overcome. These and similar things, far be it from the Omnipotent to be able to do. And therefore, not only does the truth show that he is omnipotent because he cannot do these things, but it also compels the truth to state that he is not omnipotent who can do these things. For God is whatever he wills to be; therefore he is eternal, immutable, truthful, blessed, and invincible as he wills to be. Therefore, if he can be what he does not will, he is not omnipotent; but he is omnipotent, therefore he can do whatever he wills. And thus, what he does not will, he cannot be; for which reason he is called omnipotent, because he can do whatever he wills. Of whom the Psalm also says: In heaven and on earth, he has done all that he willed.

Jesus Christ, the only Son of God.

God, therefore, almighty, who did all things that he wished, begot the only Word through which all things were made: but this not from nothing, but from himself: therefore he did not make, but begot. For in the beginning he made heaven and earth: however, he did not make the Word in the beginning; because: in the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. This is God from God. However, the Father is God, but not from God. This is the only Son of God, because from the substance of the Father, co-eternal, equal to the Father, no other son exists. The Word is God: not like a word whose sound can be thought in the heart and uttered with the mouth; but, as it is said, which cannot be said more briefly and better: the Word was God. Remaining unchangeably with the Father, and immutable himself with the Father, of whom the Apostle says: Who, being in the form of God, did not consider it robbery to be equal with God. For to be equal to the Father is his nature, not robbery. Thus we believe in Jesus Christ, the only Son of God the Father, our Lord.

Born of the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary. But because he, who being in the form of God thought it not robbery to be equal with God, by whom we were created, that he might seek and save what was lost, emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men, and being found in fashion as a man: so we believe in him that he was born of the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary. For both his births are truly to be believed as wondrous, both of divinity and humanity. One is from the Father without a mother, the other from the mother without a father; one is without any time, the other in an acceptable time; one is eternal, the other opportune; one is without a body in the bosom of the Father, the other with a body, in which the virginity of the mother was not violated; one without any sex, the other without any male embrace. Hence we say he was born of the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary, because when the holy Virgin asked of the angel: How shall this be? he replied: The Holy Spirit shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee. Then he added: Therefore that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God. He did not say: "That which is born of thee shall be called the Son of the Holy Spirit." For the whole man, that is the rational soul and body, was assumed by the Word, that there might be one Christ, one Son of God, not only the Word, but also the Word and man: all this pertains to the Son of God the Father on account of the Word, and the son of man on account of the man. Through that by which he is the Word, he is equal to the Father: through that by which he is man, the Father is greater. And at the same time with the man he is the Son of God, but on account of the Word by whom the man was assumed; and at the same time with the Word he is the son of man, but on account of the man who is assumed by the Word. On account of his holy conception in the womb of the Virgin, not made by the burning of carnal desire, but by the fervent love of faith, he is therefore said to be born of the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary; so that one of these pertains not to the begetter, but to the sanctifier, the other to the conceiver and bearer. Therefore he says: that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God.

Because "holy," therefore "of the Holy Spirit"; because born of thee, therefore "of the Virgin Mary"; because the Son of God, therefore "the Word made flesh."

Crucified under Pontius Pilate and buried.

It was necessary, however, that in the assumed man, He who was invisible would be seen and He who was co-eternal with the Father would be born temporally, that He who was intangible would be held, that He who was insuperable would be suspended on wood, that He who was inviolable would be fastened with nails, and that life and immortality would die on the cross and be buried in the tomb; all this is our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God. Hence, it follows that we believe with the heart for righteousness and confess with the mouth for salvation that this same only-begotten Son of God, our Lord Jesus Christ, not only was a man born of man, but also endured human suffering up to death and burial. For, as the whole Son of God, our only Lord Jesus Christ, the Word and man, and to be more specific, the Word, soul, and flesh; it pertains to the whole that He was sorrowful in soul alone up to death, because the only Son of God, Jesus Christ, was sorrowful; it pertains to the whole that He was crucified in human form alone, because the only Son of God, Jesus Christ, was crucified; it pertains to the whole that He was buried in flesh alone, because the only Son of God, our Lord Jesus Christ, was buried. From the point we started to say we believe in Jesus Christ, His only Son, our Lord, anything else we say about Him is implicitly understood as referring to Jesus Christ, the only Son of God, our Lord. Do not be surprised: thus we say the only Son of God, Jesus Christ, our Lord, was buried, when only His flesh was buried, just as we say, for instance, that the Apostle Peter lies in the tomb today, while we indeed truly say that he rejoices in rest with Christ. For we speak of the same Apostle: there are not two apostles Peter, but one. Therefore, we speak of him as the same person both lying in the tomb with his body alone and rejoicing with Christ in spirit alone. Furthermore, it is added: Under Pontius Pilate; whether to confirm the truth of the time or to recommend more the humility of Christ, who suffered so much under a human judge, He who is to come as the judge of the living and the dead with so much power.

He rose again, ascended into heaven, and sits at the right hand of the Father. On the third day, He truly resurrected in the flesh, but no longer to experience death thereafter. This was proven by His disciples with their eyes and hands, and so great a goodness would not deceive their faith, nor would the truth mislead. But for the sake of brevity, it is quickly added that He ascended into heaven. For forty days He was with His disciples, lest the great miracle of His resurrection, if He were quickly taken away from their eyes, would be considered an illusion. Now, He sits at the right hand of the Father; which, with the eyes of faith, we must wisely regard, lest we think He is immovably fixed in some seat, so that He is not permitted to stand or walk. For it is not because the holy Stephen said he saw Him standing, that therefore either Stephen saw falsely or disturbed the words of this Creed. Let it not be thought, let it not be said. But His dwelling in the supreme and ineffable beatitude is signified in this way, that He is said to sit there. Whence also seats are called dwellings, as when we ask where someone is, and it is answered: “In their seats.” And concerning the servants of God, it is especially said most often: “He sat in that monastery for so many years”; that is, he rested, stayed, dwelled. Nor does holy Scripture ignore this form of speech. For sure, Shimei, ordered by King Solomon to dwell in the city of Jerusalem, under the added threat that if he ever dared to leave, he would pay the due penalties, is said to have sat there for three years, which is understood as having dwelled. The right hand of the Father itself is not thus said according to the form of the human body, as though the Son is at His left, if the Son is placed at His right according to these bodily sites and positions of limbs. But the right hand of God is said to be the height of honor and inexpressible happiness, as it is read about wisdom: His left hand is under my head, and His right hand embraces me. For if earthly happiness lies below, then eternal happiness embraces from above. From there He will come to judge the living and the dead. From the lofty dwelling of the heavens, where now is also His immortal body, our Lord Jesus Christ will come to judge the living and the dead, according to the most evident angelic testimony, which is written in the Acts of the Apostles. For the disciples, looking intently as He ascended into heaven, and watching Him with lifted gaze, heard the angels say: "Men of Galilee, why do you stand here? This Jesus, who was taken up from you, will come in the same way as you saw Him go into heaven." Much and diverse human presumption is restrained. Christ will judge in that form in which He was judged. For thus the Apostles saw Him ascend into heaven, when they heard that He would come in the same way. That form will be visible to the living and the dead, the good and the wicked; whether we understand the good to be named the living, and the wicked the dead; or whether we take the living to mean those whom His coming will find not yet having finished this life, and the dead those who His presence will raise up, as He Himself speaks in the Gospel, saying: "The hour is coming when all who are in the tombs will hear His voice, and will come out—those who have done good, to the resurrection of life, and those who have done evil, to the resurrection of judgment." And they will see Him in the form of a man in whom they believed, and those who despised Him. But the ungodly will not see the form of God in which He is equal to the Father. For the ungodly will be taken away, as the Prophet says, in order not to see the glory of the Lord. And: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." Let these words suffice regarding Jesus Christ, the only Son of God, our Lord.

Holy Spirit. Mystery of the Trinity.

We also believe in the Holy Spirit, who proceeds from the Father, yet not the Son; who remains upon the Son, yet not the Father of the Son: who receives from the Son, yet not the Son of the Son: but the Spirit of the Father and the Son, the Holy Spirit and himself God. For he would not have such a temple if he were not God. Hence the Apostle says: Do you not know that your bodies are temples of the Holy Spirit in you, whom you have from God? Not the temple of a creature, but of the Creator. For it would be far from us to be a temple of a creature, when the Apostle says: For the temple of God is holy, which you are. In this Trinity, one is not greater or lesser than another, no separation of works, no dissimilarity of substance. One Father God, one Son God, one Holy Spirit God. Yet neither is the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit three gods, but one God; so that the Father is not the Son, nor is the Son the Father, nor is the Holy Spirit either the Father or the Son; but the Father is the Father of the Son, and the Son is the Son of the Father, and the Holy Spirit is the Spirit of the Father and the Son: each individually God, and the Trinity itself one God. May this faith imbue your hearts, and direct your confession. Believe this by hearing, so that you may understand; so that what you believe, you may be able to understand by advancing.

Holy Church, the forgiveness of sins.

Honor also the Holy Church, your mother, as the heavenly Jerusalem, the holy city of God; love her, proclaim her. She it is who bears fruit and grows in the whole world in this faith which you have heard, the Church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth; she tolerates in the communion of the sacraments the wicked, who are to be separated in the end, from whom in the meantime she withdraws by reason of their diverse manners. For the sake of her grain that now groans among the chaff, whose mass will be revealed in the final winnowing and assigned to the barns. She receives the keys of the kingdom of heaven, that through her, by the blood of Christ and the operation of the Holy Spirit, the remission of sins may be effected. In this Church the soul that was dead in sins will revive, so as to be made alive with Christ, by whose grace we have been saved. The resurrection of the flesh. But we must not doubt that this mortal flesh will rise again at the end of the world. For it is necessary that this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. It is sown in corruption, it will rise in incorruption; it is sown in dishonor, it will rise in glory: it is sown a natural body, it will rise a spiritual body. This is the Christian, this is the Catholic, this is the Apostolic faith. Believe Christ saying: Not a hair of your head will perish, and with unbelief cast out, rather consider how valuable you are. For what of ours can be despised by our Redeemer, whose hair cannot be despised? Or how shall we doubt that He will give eternal life to our soul and flesh, who for us took the soul and flesh in which He would die, and laid it down when He died, and took it up again so that death would not be feared? All that is delivered in the Creed, I have explained to your Charity according to the measure of my ministry. It is called the Creed for this reason, because the accepted faith of our fellowship is contained therein, and by its confession, as if by a given sign, the faithful Christian is recognized.

Sermons - Sermon 214A

Sermon 214/A Augustine in explanation of the Creed [1Clearly, even believing pertains to knowing.

[2] We do not believe everything we know, but we know everything we rightly believe.

[3We know by seeing, we know by believing.

[4For if a fellow citizen speaks with me and contradicts me, being of the same region and province, so as to provoke me, as though I were ignorant because I have not seen it, I ask him how he knows that Alexandria exists, which he has not seen, or that so many cities exist in which he has never been, which, however, he knows to exist so well that he would even confidently swear if challenged.

[5Behold, I return the question: How do you know that Alexandria exists? He will say: I believed. I will respond: Whom did you believe? What else will he say but that he believed people? Therefore, you believed in Alexandria from those who saw it, I believed in God from those who prophesied. If you think rightly, if you weigh the importance of testimonies, I believed more suitable ones than you. For you believed those about Alexandria who, being there, could see it present to themselves, I believed those who said things which are now happening before they were to be.

Sermons - Sermon 215

SERMO 215 IN THE CONFESSION OF THE CREED The creed must always be retained in mind and heart. The Creed of the Most Holy Mystery, which you have all together received and which each of you has today recited, are the words in which the faith of Mother Church, established upon the firm foundation, which is Christ the Lord, is firmly strengthened. For no other foundation can anyone lay than that which is laid, which is Christ Jesus. Therefore, you have received and recited what you must always retain in mind and heart, what you should recite upon your beds, think about in the streets, and not forget between meals; in which even while your bodies are sleeping, your hearts should keep watch. For renouncing the devil, his displays and his angels, withdrawing your mind and soul from them, it is necessary to forget past things, and with the old age of former life despised, to renew life itself with holy habits according to the new person; and as the Apostle says, forgetting what lies behind and straining forward to what lies ahead, to follow the prize of the upward call of God; and to believe what you have not yet seen, so that you may rightfully attain what you have believed. For what anyone sees, why does one hope for? But if we hope for what we do not see, we wait for it with patience.

We believe in God the Father almighty.

Faith, therefore, is this and the rule of salvation: to believe in God the Father almighty, creator of all things, king of the ages, immortal and invisible. Indeed, He is the omnipotent God, who in the beginning of the world made all things from nothing, who is before the ages, and who made and rules the ages. For He is not increased by time, or extended by place, or concluded or bounded by any material; but remains with Himself and in Himself a full and complete eternity, which human thought cannot comprehend, nor can tongue narrate. For if the gift which He promises to His saints, neither eye has seen, nor ear has heard, nor has it entered into the heart of man; how can it be that the one who promises it, either be conceived by mind, or thought by heart, or narrated by tongue? Who will describe the generation of the Word, whether eternal or temporal?

We believe also in His Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord, true God from true God, God the Father's Son, God, but not two gods; for He and the Father are one; and He intimated to the people through Moses, saying: "Hear, O Israel, the commandments of life: the Lord your God is one God." But if you wish to contemplate how the eternal Son was born of the eternal Father without time; Isaiah the prophet rebukes you, saying: "Who shall recount His generation?" Therefore, the birth of God from God you can neither think nor narrate; you are only permitted to believe, so that you may be saved, just as the Apostle says: "For it is necessary for him who approaches God to believe that He exists, and He will be a rewarder to those who seek Him." But if you wish to know His birth according to the flesh, which He deigned to assume for our salvation, listen and believe that He was born of the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary. Though who indeed can narrate even this very birth of His? For who can worthily estimate that God wished to be born as a man for the sake of men, that a virgin conceived without male seed, gave birth without corruption, and remained intact after giving birth? For our Lord Jesus Christ deigned to enter the virgin's womb, filled the woman's limbs without stain, nurtured His mother without corruption, formed by Himself, and came forth preserving the integrity of His mother's womb; so that He, from whom it was deemed fitting to be born, would invest her with the honor of mother and the sanctity of virgin. Who thinks of this? Who narrates it? Therefore, who indeed narrates this birth of his? For whose mind is sufficient to think, whose tongue sufficient to declare, not only that in the beginning was the Word, having no beginning of birth; but also that the Word became flesh, choosing a virgin to make her His mother, making a mother whom He kept as a virgin; the Son of God conceived by no mother, the Son of man sown by no man; bringing fecundity to a woman by coming, taking away nothing of integrity by being born? What is this? Who speaks it? Who is silent about it? And wonderful to say: what we cannot express, we are not allowed to be silent about; by sounding, we preach, what we cannot comprehend in thought. Indeed, we cannot fully speak of such a gift of God, because we are small for narrating His greatness; and yet we are compelled to praise, lest we remain ungrateful by being silent. But thanks be to God, because what cannot be suitably said, can be faithfully believed.

Mary conceived by believing, gave birth by believing.

Let us therefore believe in Jesus Christ, our Lord, born of the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary. For the blessed Mary herself, whom she bore believing, conceived believing. For when she had been promised a son, she had asked how it would happen, since she had not known a man; indeed, she only knew the mode of conception and birth, which she herself had not experienced, but had learned from other women through the frequenting of nature, namely that a man is born from a man and a woman; she received an answer from the angel: The Holy Spirit will come upon you, and the power of the Most High will overshadow you; therefore, the holy one to be born from you will be called the Son of God. When the angel had said this, she, full of faith, and first conceiving Christ in her mind before in her womb, said: Behold the handmaid of the Lord, let it be done to me according to your word. She said, let the one conceived without the semen of a man in a virgin be born; born of the Holy Spirit and an intact woman, in whom the intact Church might be reborn of the Holy Spirit. The holy one to be born from a human mother without a human father shall be called the Son of God; for he who was marvelously born of God the Father without any mother, it was fitting that he become the son of man; so that he might be born in that flesh, emerging from closed wombs small, in which he might enter risen great through closed doors. These are wondrous because they are divine; ineffable because they are inscrutable; the mouth of man is not sufficient to explain, because neither is the heart of man to investigate. Mary believed, and what she believed was done in her. Let us also believe, so that what happened might benefit us as well. Therefore, although this birth is marvelous: consider, O man, what your God has undertaken for you, the Creator for the creature; so that God, remaining in God, living eternally with the eternal, the Son equal to the Father, would not disdain to take on the form of a servant for the guilty and sinful servants. For indeed this was not exhibited by human merits. For because of our iniquities, we rather deserved punishment: but if he had observed iniquities, who would have endured? Therefore, for the impious and sinful servants, the Lord condescended to be born a servant and man of the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary.

While we were still sinners, Christ died for us.

Perhaps this may seem a small thing, that God came for men, the just for sinners, the innocent for the guilty, the king for captives, the Lord clothed in the flesh of humanity: that He was seen on earth and conversed with men. He was crucified and moreover, dead and buried. Do you not believe? Perhaps you say: When did this happen? Hear at what time: Under Pontius Pilate. The name of the judge is placed for your sake, lest you doubt the time. Therefore believe that the Son of God was crucified under Pontius Pilate and was buried. Indeed, nobody has greater love than this, that one lays down his life for his friends. Do you think nobody? Indeed, nobody at all. It is true; Christ said this. Let us ask the Apostle and he will answer us: "Christ," he says, "died for the ungodly." And again he says: "While we were enemies, we were reconciled to God through the death of His Son." Behold, therefore, in Christ, we find greater love, who laid down His life not for His friends, but for His enemies. How great the love of God for men, and what kind of affection, to love even sinners so much that He would die out of love for them. For God demonstrates His own love toward us, in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us. Believe this therefore yourself, and for your salvation do not be ashamed to confess it. For with the heart one believes unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation. Finally, lest you doubt or be ashamed, when you first believed, you received the sign of Christ on your forehead, as in the house of modesty. Recall your forehead, lest you fear another's speech. For, as the Lord Himself says, "Whoever is ashamed of Me before men, the Son of Man will be ashamed of him before the angels of God." Therefore do not be ashamed of the ignominy of the cross, which God Himself did not hesitate to endure for you. Say with the Apostle: "But God forbid that I should boast except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." And the same Apostle answers you: "I decided to know nothing among you except Jesus Christ and Him crucified." He who was crucified by one people then is now fixed in the hearts of all peoples. The faith in the resurrection distinguishes Christians from all other people. But you, whoever you are, who wish to boast more of power than of humility, receive consolation, have exultation. For he who was crucified under Pontius Pilate and was buried, on the third day he rose from the dead. Perhaps you also doubt here, perhaps you tremble. When it was said to you: Believe in the born, believe in the suffering, the crucified, dead, and buried; as if about a man you more easily believed. Now because it is said: On the third day he rose from the dead, do you doubt, O man? To provide one example out of many, consider God, think of the Almighty; and do not doubt. For if He could make you from nothing when you did not exist; why could He not raise His man, whom He had already made, from the dead? Therefore believe, brothers: when it concerns faith, there is no need to use long discourse. This faith alone is what distinguishes and separates Christians from all other men. For that he died and was buried, even pagans now believe, and Jews then saw; but that he truly rose from the dead on the third day, neither pagan nor Jew admits. Therefore, the resurrection of the dead distinguishes the life of our faith from unfaithful dead. For even the apostle Paul, when writing with Timothy, said: Remember, he says, Christ Jesus risen from the dead. Therefore let us believe, brothers; what we believe happened in Christ, we hope for this to come in us. For it is God who promises: He does not deceive.

Christ's ascension; judgment.

After He rose from the dead, He ascended into heaven and sits at the right hand of the Father. Do you still perhaps not believe? Listen to the Apostle: He who descended, he says, is also he who ascended above all the heavens, that he might fill all things. Take heed lest you feel the one whom you do not wish to believe as risen, as judging. For he who does not believe is already judged. For he who now sits at the right hand of the Father as our advocate, from there he will come to judge the living and the dead. Let us therefore believe, that whether we live or die, we may be the Lord's.

Holy Spirit, forgiveness of sins, resurrection of the flesh, eternal life.

Let us therefore believe in the Holy Spirit. For He is God, because it is written: God is Spirit. Through Him we have received the remission of sins, through Him we believe in the resurrection of the flesh, through Him we hope for eternal life. But be careful not to suffer error by counting, and think that I have said three gods, because I named one God three times. There is one substance of divinity in the Trinity, one power, one majesty, one name of divinity; as He Himself said to the disciples when He rose from the dead: Go, baptize the nations, not in many names, but in one name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Therefore believing in the divine Trinity and the triune unity, beware, beloved, lest anyone seduce you away from the faith and truth of the catholic Church. For he who preaches to you otherwise than what you have received, let him be anathema. Listen to the Apostle, not me, who says: But if even we, or an angel from heaven, preach to you otherwise than what you have received, let him be anathema.

Through the holy Church.

You certainly see, dearest ones, even in the very words of the holy Creed, how at the conclusion of all the rules that pertain to the sacrament of faith, a sort of supplement is added, so that it is said: Through the holy Church. Therefore, flee as much as you can from different and various deceivers, whose sects and names it is now too lengthy to recount due to their multitude. For we have many things to say to you, but you cannot bear them now. I commend to your hearts this one thing: to turn away entirely your mind and hearing from anyone who is not catholic, so that you may be able to grasp the remission of sins, the resurrection of the flesh, and eternal life through the one, true, and holy catholic Church; in which the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit, one God, is taught, to whom is honor and glory forever and ever.

Sermons - Sermon 216

SERMO 216 In the Return of the Creed TO THE COMPETENTS Who are the "competents" The rudiments of our ministry, and the conception in you where faith begins to be generated in the womb by heavenly grace, must be assisted by speech: so that our speech may salutarily address you, and your conception may beneficially console us. We instruct with words, you advance with morals. We scatter the speech of the word, render the fruit of faith. Let us all according to the calling by which we have been called by the Lord, run in His way and path; let no one look back. For the truth that neither deceives nor can be deceived openly proclaims: No one who puts his hand to the plow and looks back is fit for the kingdom of heaven. This indeed you desire, this you strive for with all the efforts of your mind, as shown by your name by which you are called catechumens. For what else are catechumens, than "those asking together"? For just as co-teachers, co-runners, co-sitters, mean nothing else than those teaching together, running together, sitting together; so also the word catechumen is composed of asking together and seeking something as one. And what is that one thing which you ask for or desire, unless what some, having cast off carnal desires and overcome the terrors of the world, cry out fearlessly? If camps stand against me, my heart will not fear; if war arises against me, in this I will trust. And expressing what that is, he added and said: One thing I have asked from the Lord, this I will seek: that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life. And explaining the blessedness of this region and dwelling, he connects and expresses: That I may behold the delight of the Lord, and be protected by His temple.

Renounce the world and adhere to Christ.

You see, my fellow soldiers, to what delight of the Lord you will come, when you reject the delight of the world? If you despise the world, you will have a pure heart, and you will see him who made the world: and as he overcame, so also in his grace you will overcome this world. You will certainly and immediately overcome and trample upon it, if you trust not in your own strength, but in the aid of the most merciful God. Do not despise yourselves, because it has not yet appeared what you will be. But know that when it appears, you will be like him, when it appears what you will be. But know that you will see him, not as he came to us in the fullness of time, but as he, always remaining, created us. Put off the old man, that you may put on the new. The Lord begins a covenant with you. You have lived for the world, you have given yourselves to flesh and blood, you have borne the image of the earthly man. Therefore, as you have borne the image of him who is of the earth, so also bear the image of him who is from heaven. Human speech, because the Word was made flesh for this reason, that as you have presented your bodies as weapons of iniquity to sin, so now present your members as weapons of righteousness to God. In your destruction, your adversary was armed against you with your own weapons: in your salvation, let your protector be armed against him with your members in turn. He will harm you in no way if he does not hold your members when you take them away from him. He will rightly abandon you, if your vow and will disagree with him.

One should not think lowly of oneself, but bear fruit in good work.

Behold, with the auction and market of faith, the kingdom of heaven is offered to you for sale: inspect and gather the resources of your conscience, collectively collect the treasures of your heart. And yet you buy freely, if you recognize the grace offered to you as pleasing. You expend nothing, and yet what you acquire is great. Do not be worthless to yourselves, whom the Creator of all and your own considers so dear that He daily sheds the most precious blood of His Only Begotten for you. You will not be worthless if you distinguish the precious from the worthless; if you serve the Creator, not the creature; if your lower parts are not dominated over you, so that you may cleanse yourselves immaculately from great and deadly sin; if the seed of the Word of God, which the heavenly sower even now scatters in the field of your heart, is not trampled down in the path by the transit of the unworthy, or compressed among the rocks by the stupidity of your most hardened conscience just as it is germinating, or choked among the thorns by the devastating thorns of your desires. If you shrink from the barrenness of such a damned and damnable land, a fruitful and most abundant land will surely receive you, and with great joy, you will return to your sower and waterer a multiplied bounty of a hundredfold; or if perhaps you are unequal to this, you will pay the return of sixtyfold fruits: but if you do not even achieve this, your harvest of thirtyfold will not be ungrateful; for all will be received into the heavenly barns, all will be stored in eternal rest. From the fruits of all, that heavenly bread will be made, and every laborer working without deceit in the Lord's vineyard will be abundantly and healthfully satisfied: while the glory of such a great sower, waterer, and giver of growth Himself is spread by the preaching of the gospel. The necessity of conversion to attain life.

Come therefore to Him with a contrite heart, for He is near to all who have a contrite heart, and He will save the humble in spirit. Approach eagerly, so that you may be enlightened. For you are still in darkness, and there is darkness within you. But you will be light in the Lord, who illuminates every man coming into this world. You were conformed to the world, be reformed by God. May you already be weary of Babylonian captivity. Behold, mother Jerusalem, that heavenly one, cheerfully inviting you on the paths, and pleading that you may choose life, and love to see good days, which you never had and will never have in this world. For there your days faded like smoke: wherein to increase, to decrease; and wherein to grow, to fade; and wherein to ascend, to vanish. You who have lived in sin for many evil years, desire to live to God: not many years that will someday end, and running to perish in the shadow of death; but good years, and near to the truth of a lively life; where you will not faint from any hunger, nor thirst; because your food will be faith, and your drink wisdom. For now in the Church you bless the Lord in faith: but then in appearance you will be most abundantly watered from the fountains of Israel.

It is necessary to mourn the desire for eternal life and to mortify the members. But in this journey, let your tears be your bread by day and by night; while they say to you daily: Where is your God? you cannot demonstrate to the carnal what the eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor has entered into the heart of man. Until you come and appear before the eyes of your God, do not fail. For He Himself will come to fulfill the promises, who professed Himself a debtor by His own will: who borrowed nothing from anyone, and deigned to be a debtor by His promise. We were owing; and we owed as much as we had sinned. He came without debt, because He was without any sin; He found us oppressed by a harmful and condemning debt, and repaying what He did not seize, mercifully freed us from an everlasting debt. We had committed the fault, we were expecting the punishment; He, not sharing our fault, but sharing our punishment, chose to be at once the giver for the fault and of the punishment. For He is the one who will save the souls of the believers from usury and iniquity, and from the heart of each one saying: I believe I shall see the good things of the Lord in the land of the living. This land, not earthly or dead, but in a certain heavenly and living way, must be longed for. It is of this land that another psalmist, burning with love for it and singing joyfully, says: You are my hope, my portion in the land of the living. Towards which those strive, who mortify their members on earth in a vital way: not the members by which the composition of the body of this world consists, but those members by which the strength of the soul is miserably weakened. Enumerating and designating them very clearly, the apostle Paul, the chosen vessel, says: Mortify your members which are upon the earth; fornication, uncleanness, passion, evil desire, and covetousness, which is idolatry. Behold what you must mortify in this land of the dying, if you desire to live in that land of the living. Thus be made members of Christ, so that you do not take them and make them members of a prostitute. For what prostitute is baser, what is more disgraceful, than the one which is fornication at first, and covetousness at last? Which he truly called idolatry; because you must recognize and avoid not only the luxury of the body, but also the lust of the soul, lest you incur that perdition from the threatening and chaste bridegroom and just judge, to whom it is said: You have destroyed all who are unfaithful to you. How much more justly, how much more usefully, will each of you cry out in chastity of heart to Him: It is good for me to adhere to God. This adherence is granted by that love, of which it is similarly said: Love without dissimulation; abhorring what is evil, adhering to what is good.

Scutinies: the rites of the Church and the wrestle against the devil.

Behold where is your stadium, behold where is the struggle of those contending, behold where is the race of those running, behold where is the boxing match of those striking. If you wish to overpower the most pernicious wrestler of faith with your muscles; overthrow evil, embrace good. If you wish to run in such a way that you may obtain; flee unrighteousness, pursue justice. If you wish to box in such a way that you may not strike the air, but strike the enemy manfully; chastise your body and bring it into subjection, that abstaining from all and contending legally, you may triumph as participants of the heavenly reward and incorruptible crown. What we do in you by invoking the name of your Redeemer, complete with the scrutiny and contrition of your heart. We, with prayers to God and rebukes, resist the deceits of the inveterate enemy: you, with vows and the contrition of your heart, persist, that you may be rescued from the power of darkness and transferred into the kingdom of His light. This is now your task, and this your labor. Let us heap upon him the curses deserving of his iniquities: with your rather aversion and pious renunciation, declare the most glorious contest upon him. He must be crushed, bound, excluded as the enemy of God and yours, and rather as his own. For his fury is revealed to be both presumptuous against God, nefarious against you, and pernicious unto himself. He may pant for slaughter everywhere, set traps, sharpen his many treacherous tongues: all his poisons, by invoking the name of the Savior, pour out from your hearts.

It is for those who are striving to ensure that births are healthy so that they are not tragically aborted.

Whatever he would cast in the most criminal suggestions, whatever he would send forth in the most wicked allurements, now shall be exhausted, now shall be revealed. Now his captivity, by which he tyrannically possessed you, shall be plundered. The yoke, by which he monstrously oppressed you, shall be removed from you and placed upon his neck: only provide your consent to your Redeemer for your liberation. Hope in him, all the assembly of the new people, and you people who are to be born, whom the Lord has made, strive to be born healthily, lest you perish destructively. Behold the womb of Mother Church, behold she labors in her groaning to give birth to you and bring you forth into the light of faith. Do not, with your impatience, shake the maternal womb and narrow the doors of your birth. O people being created, praise your God: praise, you who are created, praise your Lord. Because you are nursed, praise: because you are fed, praise: because you are nourished, grow in wisdom and age. He also allowed this temporary birth delay, who neither fails by the brevity of time, nor progresses by any length of time, but excluded all constraints and time from eternal days. Do not be like children in mind, as the kind nurturer advises, but in malice be as children, in mind be perfect. Grow appropriately as the Competents in Christ, that you may grow up in young manhood into a perfect man. Rejoice, as it is written, in your progress of wisdom your father, and do not sadden your mother with your lack thereof. The excellence of regeneration by which we are born of God the Father and the Church as mother.

Love what you will be. For you will be children of God, and children of adoption. This will be given to you freely and conferred freely. In this, you will abound more generously and more abundantly, the more you have been grateful to Him from whom you have received these things. Aspire to Him who knows who are His. Then He will not disdain to acknowledge you among those who are His if, naming the name of the Lord, you depart from injustice. You have, or have had, parents of your flesh in the world, who begot you to labor, pain, and death: but each of you, due to a more fortunate destitution, can say concerning such parents: My father and my mother have forsaken me; recognize, Christian, that Father who, having left them, took you from the womb of your mother, to whom a certain faithful one faithfully says: From my mother's womb You are my protector. God is Father, the Church is Mother. You will be born very differently from them than you had been born of those. For these births, there will be no labor, no misery, no weeping, no death; but ease, happiness, joy, and life will receive you. Through those births, generation is lamentable; through these, generation is desirable. Those, by generating us, generate into eternal punishment because of ancient guilt; these, by regenerating, neither allow punishment to remain nor guilt. This is the regeneration of those who seek Him, who seek the face of the God of Jacob. Seek humbly: when you have found it, you will come to secure height. Your infancy will be innocence, childhood reverence, youth patience, adolescence virtue, adulthood merit, old age nothing other than wise and intelligent gray hair. Through these articles or stages of age, you will not unfold but, remaining, you will be renewed. For the second will not succeed the first as it declines, nor will the birth of the third be the end of the second, nor is the fourth born so that the third might die; the fifth will not envy the fourth so that it remains, nor will the sixth bury the fifth. While these stages do not come simultaneously, nevertheless, in a pious and justified soul they persist together and in harmony. These will lead you to the seventh perpetual rest and peace. But, as we read, you will be liberated from the necessities of the mortal age six times, already in the seventh, evil will not touch you. For those evils which are not will not contend, nor will those which do not dare prevail. There will be secure immortality, there secure immortality.

Exhortation to advance in faith. And whence do these things come, but from the alteration of the right hand of the Most High, who will bless your children within you, who will set your boundaries at peace? Awake therefore to these things, united, distinct; united in good, distinct from evil: chosen, beloved, foreknown, called, to be justified, to be glorified: so that growing, maturing, and aging in faith and strength, not in the corruption of members, in rich old age, you may tranquilly proclaim the works of the Lord, who has done great things for you, who is mighty: for great is His name, and of His wisdom there is no number. If you seek life, run to Him who is the fountain of life: and having dispelled the darkness of your smoky desires, you will see light in the light of His Only Begotten, your most merciful Redeemer, and most brilliant illuminator. If you seek salvation, hope in Him who saves those who hope in Him. If you pursue drunkenness and delights, He will not deny you even these. Just come and worship, fall down and weep before Him who made you: and He will make you drunk with the richness of His house, and will make you drink from the river of His delights. In humility, one must strive to return to the Father's house. But beware, lest the foot of pride come upon you; and watch, lest the hands of sinners move you. First, do not let it happen, pray that he may cleanse you from your hidden faults: secondly, lest it rush upon and cast you down, asking that he may spare you from others' sins; lying down, arise, arising, stand, standing by, persist while standing by. Do not bear the yoke any longer: rather break their chains, and cast away from you their yoke, lest you be held again by the yoke of servitude. The Lord is near; be anxious about nothing. Now eat the bread of sorrow: the time will come, when after the bread of sadness, the bread of joy will be served to you. But the merit of that is the tolerance of this; your aversion and flight have earned the bread of mourning: convert, repent, and return to your Lord. He is ready to distribute the bread of joy to the penitent and returning one; if you do not delay or postpone tearfully making a lamentable prayer for your flight. Therefore, in such great crowds of those causing trouble, clothe yourselves in sackcloth, and humble your soul in fasting. What is rendered to humility is denied to pride. And indeed, when you examined yourselves, and the persuader of that flight and desertion was rightfully rebuked in the tremendous omnipotence of the Trinity, you were not clothed in sackcloth: but still, your feet mystically stood in the same.

Health which appeared in the body must be preserved in the heart.

Vices must be shunned and the fleeces of goats plucked: the garments of the left-handed kids must be torn. With the first robe, the merciful father will meet you voluntarily, who did not hesitate to sacrifice the fatted calf to dispel your pestilential hunger. You will be fed with his flesh, you will drink with his blood: by whose shedding sins are forgiven, debts are pardoned, stains are cleansed. Eat as the poor, and then you will be satisfied. So that you too may be among those of whom it is said: The poor shall eat, and shall be satisfied: and being wholesomely satisfied, belch his bread and glory. Run to him, and be converted: for he it is who converts the averse, follows the fugitives, finds the lost, humbles the proud, feeds the hungry, frees the shackled, illuminates the blind, cleanses the impure, refreshes the weary, raises the dead, and snatches away those possessed and captured by evil spirits. Since we have now proven that you are immune from these; rejoicing, we admonish you that the health which has appeared in your body may be preserved in your hearts.

Sermons - Sermon 217

SERMO 217 On the Words of the Lord in the Gospel of John "This is eternal life, that"

"They may know you, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom you have sent." AND ON THE TRINITY Both the Father and the Son are the only true God. The Lord Jesus Christ, who listens to us with the Father, has deigned to pray to the Father for us. What is more certain for our happiness than when He prays for us, who gives what He prays for? For Christ is man and God: He prays as man, gives what He prays for as God. But what you should take hold of is that He assigns everything to the Father, because the Father is not from Him, but He is from the Father. He gives everything to the source whence He is derived. But the source that has been born of the Father is Himself the source of life. Therefore, the Father, a spring, begot a spring. Indeed, the spring begot a spring; but the generating spring and the generated spring are one spring: just as the generating God and the generated God are one God, namely, the Son born of the Father. The Father is not the Son, the Son is not the Father; the Father is not of the Son, the Son is of the Father; but yet the Father and the Son are one because of the one substance, and there is one God because of the inseparable divinity. Therefore, what you have heard Him say: This is eternal life, that they may know you, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom you have sent, take care not to understand it as meaning that the Father alone is the true God, but that the Son is not the true God. For we have a divine testimony about this matter, with John himself clearly saying in his epistle: So that we are in His true Son Jesus Christ: He is the true God and eternal life. Hold that Christ is the true God and eternal life. Therefore, when you hear: That they may know you, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom you have sent, you should understand it to imply: the only true God; that is, that they may know you and Jesus Christ whom you have sent, the only true God. Nor should the Holy Spirit be separated from this.

We have completely resolved this question. But what do we do about the Holy Spirit? For if concerning the Father and Christ it was said: "That they may know You, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom You have sent," that is, they may know You and Jesus Christ as the only true God; we struggle to show how the Holy Spirit is also the true God. Not because He was silent is the Holy Spirit omitted. He is not only the Spirit of the Father, nor only of the Son: but He is the Spirit of both the Father and the Son. Therefore, when both are named, and He is not mentioned, He is understood to be among them, being of both. I am going to quote a certain saying from Scripture, from which you will understand what we mean. The Apostle says: "No one knows the things of a man except the spirit of the man which is in him." For what are the things of a man? What a man thinks as a man: for there he is truly a man, in his thoughts. Does your spirit know my thoughts, or does my spirit know your thoughts? No one knows the things of a man except the spirit of the man which is in him. The Apostle said it; and he added: "So also, no one knows the things of God except the Spirit of God." How do we take this? It is a defined sentence. Therefore, if no one knows the things of God except the Spirit of God, does the Son of God also not know the things of God? Let the diabolic sentiment be far from us, let it depart from us. Therefore, does the Word of God not know the things of God? Does the Only-begotten of God not know the things of God, through whom all things were made? He knows: and who knows as such, if not the Spirit of God? Therefore, when you hear: "No one knows the things of God except the Spirit of God," do not separate the Son from it; thus, when you hear: "That they may know You, and Jesus Christ whom You have sent, as the only true God," do not separate the Holy Spirit.

Christ is of the same power and the same divinity as the Father.

If there is only one true God, says the heresy, I do not know what you know; because there is no true God but the Father, to whom Christ said: That they may know you, the only true God. Add: and Jesus Christ whom you have sent. I do not want to add, he says. But he himself added it. But I, he says, do not want to add. Nor do I want to listen to you. And yet, you who define the Father alone as the true God, what will you say of the letter of John, where it is read concerning Christ: He is the true God, and eternal life? Finally, to whom was it said, or concerning whom was it said: who alone does marvelous things? Concerning the Father, or the Son, or both? If concerning the Father, then the Son does not do marvelous things. And where is it, that he himself says: As the Father raises the dead and gives them life, so the Son gives life to whom he will? It is of the same power, of the same divinity. If, therefore, the Son also does marvelous things, how does the Father do them alone? But if it was said concerning both, then the Father and the Son are one God. Add the Holy Spirit: add, do not separate, lest you be separated.

God is the Holy Spirit, who has a temple made of limbs.

Let us adore God, of whose temples we are. For, brothers, if we were to make a temple out of wood and stones, we could only make it for God. If we were pagans, we would make temples for the gods: for we would make temples for false gods, just as the unbelieving nations alien to God have done. However, Solomon, being a prophet of God, made a temple out of wood and stones, but nonetheless for God: for God, not for an idol; for God, not for an angel; for God, not for the sun, not for the moon; for God, who made heaven and earth: for the living God, who made heaven and earth, and who remains in the heavens, he made a temple from the earth; and God did not disdain it, rather He commanded it to be made. Why did He command that a temple be made for Himself? Did He have no place to dwell? Hear St. Stephen, when he suffered: Solomon, he said, built Him a house, but the Most High does not dwell in temples made with hands. Why then did He want a temple to be made, or that a temple be made? So that it would be a figure of the body of Christ. That temple was a shadow: the light came and drove away the shadow. Seek now the temple that Solomon made, and you will find ruin. Why is that temple in ruins? Because what it signified has already come to pass. And the temple itself, the body of the Lord, fell, but rose again; and so it rose again, that it can no longer fall at all. Finally, when the Jews had said to Him: What sign do you show us, that we may believe you? He said to them: Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up. But He was speaking to them in the temple built by Solomon, and He said: destroy this temple; but what this meant they did not hear, what this meant they did not understand, they thought He was speaking about that temple. Finally, they answered Him: This temple was built in forty-six years, and you will raise it up in three days? Thus the Evangelist immediately adds: But He was speaking of the temple of His body. Therefore, the temple of God is the body of Christ. What about our bodies? They are members of Christ. Hear the Apostle himself: Do you not know that your bodies are members of Christ? He who said: Your bodies are members of Christ, what did he show, except that our bodies and our head, which is Christ, together form one temple of God? Let us trust that the body of Christ and our bodies are the temple of God, and we will be: for if we do not believe, we will not be. Therefore, since our bodies are members of Christ, hear what else the Apostle said: Do you not know that your body is the temple of the Holy Spirit within you, which you have from God? Behold, there is a temple: and is He not God? If He had it made of wood and stones, He would be God: if He had a temple made by human hands, He would be God: and is He not God, who has a temple of the members of God? Therefore, join together in the Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit is God. There is one God, the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit. The Father is not the Son, the Son is not the Father, the Spirit of both is neither the Father nor the Son: but the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit is one God. Build yourselves up in unity, lest you fall into separation.

Let us choose a good place prepared by Christ, by doing good in a bad place.

You have heard what he asked for us, or rather what he said he wanted: Father, those whom you have given me, I want. I want, Father: what you will I do, do what I want. I want. What? That where I am, they also may be with me. O blessed home! O secure homeland! It has no enemy, it has no pestilence; we live safely there, we do not seek to move, we do not find a safer place. Whatever you choose here on earth, you choose for fear, not for security. Choose for yourself a place, while you are in a bad place, that is, in this age, in this life full of temptations, in this mortality full of groans and fears; while you are in a bad place, choose for yourself a place that you may move to from the bad place. You cannot move to a good place from a bad place unless you have done well in the bad place. What kind of place is that? where no one hungers. Therefore, if you want to dwell in a good place where no one hungers, in this age break your bread for the hungry. Because in that blessed place no one is a stranger, everyone lives in their homeland; therefore, if you want to be in a good place, where you find a stranger in a bad place who has nowhere to enter, receive him into your home; offer hospitality in the bad place, so that you may come to a place where you cannot be a guest. In a good place no one needs clothing: there is no cold there, no heat there: why a roof? why clothes? Where there will not be a roof, but protection, behold, even there we find a roof: Under the shadow of your wings I will hope. Therefore, in this bad place provide a roof for someone who does not have one, so that you may be in a good place where you have such a roof that you will not seek to make patched roofs: because there the rain does not drip, where there is a perpetual fountain of truth. But that rain delights, it does not wet; that rain itself is the fountain of life. What is it: Lord, with you is the fountain of life? And the Word was with God.

Evil days pass: the good day is eternal and blessed.

Therefore, brothers, do well in a bad place, so that you may come to a good place, of which He who prepares for us says: I want that where I am, they also may be with me. The Lord Christ ascended to prepare, so that we may come secure to the prepared place. He prepares himself: remain in him. Is Christ a small house to you? You no longer fear his suffering: He has risen from the dead, and does not die, and death will no longer have dominion over him. A bad place, bad days, this age; but let us do well in the bad place, and live well in the bad days. The bad place passes, and the bad days, and the good eternal place will come, the good eternal days; and those good days will be one day. Here, why are the days bad? Because one passes, so another comes: today passes, so tomorrow comes: yesterday passed, so today would come. Where nothing passes, there is one day: and that day is Christ. And the Father is day: but the Father is day from no day, the Son is day from day. Sing to the Lord a new song, sing to the Lord all the earth. Sing to the Lord, and bless his name; announce well day after day his salvation. Christ is the day. If you do not recognize it, listen to the wise elder: if you do not yet understand, whoever you are, young man, listen to the white hairs of truth. That old Simeon looked at the infant Lord Christ who was carried by his mother, and contained the heaven. He looked at the small, recognized the great, and received him in his hands; because he had received a response from God, that he would not see death before he had seen the Lord's Christ. He received him in his hands, and said: Now you dismiss your servant, Lord, according to your word in peace, for my eyes have seen your salvation. Therefore, announce well day after day his salvation. For so said Simeon: He whom I expected has come; what am I doing here? He received him, to be received by him: he carried the man Christ, he was carried by God Christ. The rule to be observed when the Father is said to be greater than the Son.

Therefore hold this: I give you a rule, so that you may not be frightened when the Son says something where the Father seems to be signified as greater: either He speaks from the person of a man, because God is greater than man; or He speaks from the person of one begotten, in honor of Him by whom He was begotten. Seek no more than this: for God begot God, the great begot the equal. If God did not beget true God, and the great did not beget the equal, He begot a monster, not a true son. Because indeed He begot a true son, this is how He is what He Himself begot.

Sermons - Sermon 218 augm

Sermon 218, Augmented Treatise of Saint Augustine on the Passion of the Lord "To our Lord, an example of patience." The Passion of Our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, by whose blood our sins have been deleted, is read solemnly, celebrated solemnly, so that with annual devotion our memory may be renewed more joyfully and by the very frequenting of people, our faith may be more clearly proclaimed. Therefore, the solemnity itself demands of us that we return to you a discourse on the Lord's Passion as He Himself grants. And indeed, for our salvation and the utility of conducting this life, our Lord, in what He suffered from His enemies, deigned to provide us with an example of patience, so that for the sake of evangelical truth, if He Himself willed it, we would refuse to endure nothing such. Nevertheless, since He suffered nothing in that mortal flesh by necessity, but all by will, it is rightly believed that He also wished to signify something to us in each and every action that was carried out and recorded concerning His Passion.

What the events of the Passion signify. And first, because he carried his own cross when he was handed over to be crucified, he gave a sign of self-restraint and demonstrated what one who wishes to follow him ought to do by leading the way. He also advised this with a word when he said: Whoever loves me, let him take up his cross and follow me. For in a certain way, he takes up his cross who controls his own mortality. That he was crucified at the place of the skull signified in his passion the remission of all sins, about which it is said in the psalm: My iniquities have multiplied above the hairs of my head. That two were crucified with him, one on each side, signifies that some will be to his right and others to his left, the right ones of whom it is said: Blessed are they who suffer persecution for righteousness' sake, but the left ones of whom it is said: If I give my body to be burned, but have not love, it profits me nothing. The title was placed over His cross, on which was written: King of the Jews, indicating that by killing, they could not achieve that they did not have Him as king, who would be rendered to them with most manifest and eminent power according to His works. Hence it is sung in the psalm: But I have been set as king by Him over Zion, His holy mountain. The fact that the title was written in three languages, Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, indicated that he was destined to rule not only the Jews but also the Gentiles. Thus, in the same Psalm, after it was said: "I have been established by him as king on Zion his holy mountain," where naturally the Hebrew language ruled, immediately as if adding Greek and Latin: "The Lord," he says, "said to me: You are my Son, today I have begotten you, ask of me and I will give you the nations as your inheritance and the ends of the earth as your possession." Not because Greek and Latin are the only languages of the nations, but because they excel the most: Greek due to the pursuit of literature, Latin due to the Roman Empire. Although through these three languages the universality of all nations to be subjected to Christ was demonstrated, it was not written there "King of the Gentiles," but only "of the Jews," to commend the origin of the seed in the ownership of the name. For the law went forth from Zion, as it is said, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. For who are they that say in the Psalm: "He subdued the peoples under us and the nations under our feet," if not those about whom the Apostle says: "For if the Gentiles have shared in their spiritual things, they are indebted also to minister to them in material things?" Do we not see the nations subjected to the most excellent grace of the apostles or should we consider the broken branches that today are called Jews, or rather listen to that Israelite of the line of Abraham, who was Saul Paul and therefore from little became great, admonishing and saying of the grafted wild olive tree: "Understand !. You do not support the root, but the root supports you. Therefore, Christ is the King of the Jews, under whose light yoke even the Gentiles are sent to salvation. What was granted to them by greater mercy, the Apostle himself more clearly shows where he says: For I say that Christ became a servant to the circumcised to show God's truthfulness, in order to confirm the promises given to the patriarchs, and in order that the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercy. For it was not right to take the children's bread and throw it to the dogs, unless the dogs, humbled to gather the crumbs which fall from their master's table, were exalted through that very humility and made into men, deserving to approach that very table.

What the leaders of the Jews suggested to Pilate, that he should not simply write that He is king of the Jews, but that He said He is king of the Jews, yet he replied: What I have written, I have written. Just as the leaders of the Jews broke those branches, so Pilate figured an olive tree grafted in, because he was a man from the Gentiles writing the confession of the Gentiles, convicting the denial of the Jews, to whom the Lord Himself rightfully said: The kingdom will be taken from you and given to a people producing the fruit of the kingdom. However, that does not mean He is not the King of the Jews. For the root supports the wild olive, not the wild olive the root. And although those branches were broken off through unbelief, that does not mean that God has rejected His people whom He foreknew. For even I, he says, am an Israelite. And although the sons who did not want the Son of God to reign over them go into the outer darkness, yet many shall come from the east and the west and shall sit down not with Plato and Cicero, but with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of God. For Pilate indeed wrote "King of the Jews," not "King of the Greeks" or "Latin," although he would reign over the nations. And what he wrote, he wrote, nor did he change it at the suggestion of unbelievers, as was foretold long before in the Psalms: Do not destroy the inscription of the title. All nations believe in the King of the Jews, he reigns over all nations, but nonetheless, he is the King of the Jews. That root was so strong that the grafted wild olive could be changed by it, but the wild olive could not take away the name of the olive tree. The soldiers divided his garments into four parts, they bore them away, signifying that his mysteries would travel through the four parts of the world.

Because they cast lots for a single seamless tunic that was woven from above rather than dividing it, it is clearly demonstrated that visible sacraments, although they themselves are the garments of Christ, can still be possessed by anyone, whether good or bad; but the most sincere faith, which works through love and maintains the integrity of unity—this love being poured into our hearts from above by the Holy Spirit who was given to us—does not pertain to just anyone, but is given by the hidden grace of God, as if by lot. Hence it was said by Peter to Simon, who had baptism but did not have this faith: “You have neither part nor lot in this faith.” That he commended his known mother to his beloved disciple from the cross, he suitably then showed human affection when he was dying as a man. That hour had not yet come when, about to turn water into wine as God, he had said to the same mother: What is that to me and to you, woman? My hour has not yet come. For he had not taken from Mary what he had in divinity, just as he had taken from Mary what was hanging on the cross.

He said: "I thirst," seeking faith from his own people. But because he came unto his own and his own did not receive him, instead of the sweetness of faith, they gave him the vinegar of unbelief, and this on a sponge. Truly they are to be compared to sponges, not solid but swollen, not open with the straightforward path of confession, but hollow with the winding crannies of deceit. Surely that drink contained hyssop, an herb known for its lowliness, said to cling to the rock with its very firm root. Indeed, there were some in that people for whom this criminal act was reserved to humble their soul by repentance after casting it away. He himself knew them who received the hyssop with vinegar. For he prayed for them, as another evangelist testifies, when hanging on the cross, he said: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." That he said: It is finished, and bowing his head he gave up the spirit, showed not necessity but the power of his death, who, waiting until all things which were prophesied about him were fulfilled, because even this was written: And in my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink, as if having the power to lay down his life, as he himself testified about himself, gave up the spirit through humility, that is, with his head bowed, to receive it again through resurrection, with his head raised high. This death and the bowing of the head were of great power, as Jacob the patriarch, foretelling in the blessing of Judah, said: You have gone up, lying down, you slept like a lion, signifying by the ascension the cross, by lying down the bowing of the head, by sleeping the death, by the lion the power. But indeed, because the legs of those two were broken, and his were not, because he had already died, why this happened the gospel itself has explained. For it was necessary that this also as a sign be demonstrated in his forthcoming prophecy, that the Passover of the Jews was commended, where it is commanded that the bones of the lamb should not be broken. The side pierced by the spear poured out blood and water onto the earth, without a doubt these are the sacraments by which the Church is formed, just as Eve was made from the side of the sleeping Adam, who was a figure of the future.

Joseph and Nicodemus bury him, as some have interpreted their names, Joseph is interpreted as "increased," Nicodemus, on the other hand, since it is a Greek name, is known by many to be composed of victory and people, because "nicos" is victory, "demos" is people. Who then is increased by dying, unless he who said: "Unless a grain of wheat dies, it remains alone; but if it dies, it multiplies"? And who also by dying conquered the persecutors' people, unless he who will judge them by rising again?

Sermons - Sermon 218

SERMO 218 On the Passion of the Lord on Good Friday. In each and every act of His passion, Christ wished to signify something. By whose blood our sins have been blotted out, his passion is solemnly read, it is solemnly celebrated; so that by annual devotion our memory is more joyously renewed, and by the very gathering of the people our faith is more clearly illustrated. The solemnity therefore requires of us that we deliver to you a discourse on the Lord’s Passion, as He Himself grants. Indeed, for our salvation and for the usefulness of conducting this life, in the things our Lord suffered from His enemies, He deigned to present us with an example of patience; so that for the sake of evangelical dignity, we might not refuse to endure anything similar if He so wills. Nevertheless, because in His very mortal flesh He suffered nothing out of necessity, but all out of will; it is rightly believed that in each of the actions, which happened and were recorded concerning His passion, He also wished to signify something.

Christ carries his cross. And first, because he was handed over to be crucified, he himself carried his cross; he gave a sign of self-restraint, and demonstrated by leading, what someone who wishes to follow him ought to do. He also reminded this by word, when he said: Whoever loves me, let him take up his cross, and follow me. For in a certain way, he who manages his own mortality carries his cross.

Place of the skull. That in the place of Calvary He was crucified; it signified in His passion the forgiveness of all sins, concerning which it is said in the Psalm: My iniquities have multiplied over the hairs of my head.

Two thieves That two were crucified with him, one on each side, shows that some will suffer on his right and others on his left: on the right, of whom it is said: Blessed are those who suffer persecution for justice; on the left, however, of whom it is said: And if I deliver my body to be burned, but have not charity, it profits me nothing.

Titulus. The title was placed over his cross, in which it was written: King of the Jews, it shows that they could not achieve by killing him, that they would not have him as king, who manifestly according to his works will render with the highest power. Thus, in the Psalm it is sung: But I have been appointed king by him upon Zion, his holy mountain.

Written in three languages. The title was written in three languages, Hebrew, Greek, and Latin; it was declared not only to the Jews but also to the Gentiles that He would reign. Therefore, in the same psalm, when He had said: "But I have been established as king on Zion, His holy mountain," where indeed He reigned in the Hebrew language; immediately, as if adding Greek and Latin: "The Lord," He says, "said to Me: You are My Son, today I have begotten You: Ask of Me, and I will give You the Gentiles as Your inheritance, and the ends of the earth as Your possession." Not because Greek and Latin are the only languages of the Gentiles: but because they especially excel, Greek, on account of the pursuit of letters; Latin, on account of the expertise of the Romans. Although the entirety of the Gentiles was to be subjected to Christ in those three languages, it is not written there, "King of the Gentiles," but only "of the Jews"; so that the origin of the seed would be commended, in the propriety of the name. For it has been said, "The law will go forth from Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem." For who are those who say in the Psalm, "He has subjected peoples to us, and Gentiles under our feet"; unless it is of whom the Apostle says: "For if the Gentiles have shared in their spiritual things, they are indebted to minister to them also in material things?"

King of the Jews, although also of the Gentiles. The Jewish leaders suggested to Pilate that he should not write absolutely that he is the King of the Jews, but that he himself said he is the King of the Jews; thus those branches being broken off, Pilate symbolized the grafting of the wild olive: because he was a man from the Gentiles, writing the confession of the Gentiles, of whom the Lord rightly said: The kingdom will be taken away from you, and given to a nation producing its fruits. Nevertheless, He is not therefore not the King of the Jews. For the root supports the wild olive, not the wild olive the root. And although those branches were broken off through unbelief, God has not therefore rejected His people, whom He foreknew. And Paul says: I am also an Israelite. And although the sons of the kingdom, who did not want the Son of God to reign over them, go into outer darkness; nonetheless, many will come from the East and West, and will recline, not with Plato and Cicero, but with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven. Pilate indeed wrote King of the Jews, not King of the Greeks or Latins; though he would reign over the Gentiles. And what he wrote, he wrote, nor did he change it at the suggestion of the unbelievers: for so long ago it was foretold in the Psalms: Do not destroy the title's inscription. All nations believe in the King of the Jews: he reigns over all nations, but nevertheless King of the Jews. That root was so powerful that it could transform the grafted wild olive into itself, yet the wild olive cannot take away the name of the olive. The garments divided. The soldiers took away his garments divided into four parts; they signified the mysteries that would travel through the four parts of the world.

Seamless tunic. That they cast lots for one seamless tunic woven from the top, rather than dividing it; it has been sufficiently demonstrated that visible sacraments, although they are also the garments of Christ, can be possessed by anyone, whether good or bad; but the most sincere faith, which works through love, the integrity of unity (because the love of God has been poured into our hearts through the Holy Spirit who has been given to us), does not pertain to just anyone, but is given as if by lot through the hidden grace of God. Therefore, to Simon who had Baptism but did not have this, Peter said: You have neither part nor lot in this faith. The mother entrusted to John. When on the cross He commended His known mother to the beloved disciple; suitably then He showed human affection, when He was dying as a man. That hour had not yet come when, about to turn water into wine, He had said to the same mother: What is that to me and to you, woman? My hour has not yet come. For He had not taken from Mary what He had in divinity, just as He had taken from Mary what hung on the cross.

Vinegar given on a sponge.

What He said: I thirst; He was seeking faith from His own: but because He came to His own, and His own did not receive Him; instead of the sweetness of faith, they gave the sourness of unbelief, and this on a sponge. Truly, those worthy of comparison to a sponge, not solid, but swollen; not open with the straightforward path of confession, but cavernous with the tortuous windings of treachery. Certainly, that drink also contained hyssop, which is a humble herb said to cling to the rock with the strongest root. Indeed, in that people were those for whom this act for humbling by repentance was kept, then to be cast away. He knew them Himself, who accepted the hyssop with the vinegar. For He also prayed for them, as another evangelist testifies, when hanging on the cross He said: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.

Death, with head bowed.

What he said: It is finished, and he gave up the Spirit; he showed not necessity but the power of his death, waiting until all that was prophesied concerning him was fulfilled: for it was also written: And in my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink: as one having the power to lay down his life, as he himself bore witness. And he gave up the Spirit in humility, that is, with his head bowed; to receive it again in resurrection, with his head lifted up. That this death and the bowing of the head were of great power, the patriarch Jacob foretold in the blessing of Judah: You have gone up, he said, lying down, you slept like a lion: signifying by the ascent his death, by the lion his power. The legs of the thieves were broken, but not of Christ. But indeed, because the legs of those two were broken, but his were not, because he had died; why this happened, the Gospel itself revealed. For it was necessary that by this sign also it should be shown that in his announced prophecy the Passover of the Jews was commended, where it was commanded that the bones of the lamb should not be broken.

Blood and water from the side of Christ. The side that was pierced by the spear poured out blood and water upon the earth; without a doubt, these are the sacraments by which the Church is formed; just as Eve was made from the side of the sleeping Adam, who was the figure of the future.

Joseph and Nicodemus burying.

Joseph and Nicodemus bury him; as some have interpreted the names, Joseph is interpreted as "Increased"; Nicodemus, since it is a Greek name, is more widely known to be composed of victory and people, because %niðkoû% is victory, %dhðmoû% is people. Who then is increased by dying, unless he who said: Unless a grain of wheat dies, it remains alone; but if it dies, it is multiplied? And who also by dying conquered the persecuting people, unless he who will judge them by rising again?

Sermons - Sermon 218A

SERMON 218/A FROM THE SERMON ON THE PASSION OF THE LORD In the collection of Bede and Florus

FRAGMENTA How will the righteous not reign, when the wicked one was sought by the death of God? For if, while we were enemies, we were reconciled to God through the death of His Son, much more, having been reconciled, we shall be saved by His life. Therefore Christ died for the ungodly. And Christ is God. How will the righteous not reign found in the life of God, when the ungodly was sought lest they perish, by the death of God? For in the life of God we will be saved, because in our own life we had perished. But when we hear both the life of God and the death of God, let us discern what is from what. For He brought us life, but accepted death from us: yet not for His own merit, but for us. By the mercy of God, the Gentiles enter into the promises of the fathers.

Therefore, Christ is the King of the Jews, under whose gentle yoke even the Gentiles are sent to salvation; because greater mercy has been granted to them. The Apostle himself shows this more clearly, where he says: "For I tell you that Christ became a servant to the circumcised to show God's truthfulness, in order to confirm the promises given to the patriarchs, and that the Gentiles might glorify God for His mercy." For it was not right to take the children's bread and throw it to the dogs, unless the dogs, humbled to gather the crumbs they see falling from the masters' table, exalted through that very humility and made human, deserved to approach that very table. In the inner man, oldness and newness are acted upon.

For, as some think, the old man is not the body and the new man the soul; rather, the body is the outer man, and the soul is the inner man. In the inner man, this oldness and newness occur. For when the Apostle said, "Put off the old man, and put on the new," he was not commanding that the body be abandoned, but that life be changed for the better. Finally, he subsequently taught this; for wishing to explain what he had said, he declared: "Wherefore, putting away lying, speak every man truth with his neighbor."

Sermons - Sermon 218B

Sermon 218/B

Moreover, you should observe, beloved, those relationships of things to which it is fitting to compare themselves, and take counsel from those things on the account of which they have been instituted in the bonds of most certain faith. The senses of the flesh deceive, the senses of the spirit instruct. Not in wine or in debauchery must we be enflamed, not in food and drinks or carnal delights must we revel, but in love of heavenly grace, in the sweetness of Paradise. On the Passion of the Lord Christ crucified is a scandal and foolishness to the unbelievers, but to us the power and wisdom of God.

Today we solemnly celebrate the great and ineffable mystery of the Lord's passion; which indeed in other days neither leaves the altar, to which we assist, nor our mouth and forehead; so that what is constantly reminded to the senses of the body, may always be held in the heart. However, this annual solemnity moves the mind much more into the remembrance of such a great matter; so that what was committed by the impiety of the Jews many years ago in one place, seen by their cruel eyes, is now viewed by the sight of faith as if it happened today, in the whole world. If they then gladly saw what they cruelly committed, how much more gladly may we recall what we piously believe with our remembering hearts? If they saw their iniquity with delight, how much more should we remember our salvation with joy? In that one fact their present crimes were noted, but our future crimes were also blotted out. Where we detest their committed atrocities, we rejoice in our forgiven sins. They were perpetrators of impiety, we are celebrators of the solemnity; they gathered in rage, we in obedience; they were lost, we found; they were sold, we redeemed; they watched insulting, we venerate and adore. Therefore, Christ crucified is a stumbling block and foolishness to unbelievers, but to us, the Power of God and the Wisdom of God: for this is the weakness of God, which is stronger than men, and the foolishness of God, which is wiser than men. These things have been clearly taught by the consequences. For what did the rage of the enemies have back then, unless to remove his memory from the earth? But he, crucified by one people, is established in the hearts of so many peoples; and he who was then killed by one nation, is now adored by all nations. And yet not only then, but even now the blind read, and the deaf sing, what was foretold so long ago by the prophetic voice: They pierced my hands and my feet, they counted all my bones. They, however, considered me; they divided my garments among themselves, and cast lots for my clothing. As these were foretold in the Psalms, so they are read fulfilled in the Gospel; but then it was done by the hands of the Jews, which struck their ears in vain; and the less the Lord’s passion that was prophesied was understood by them, the more effectively it was fulfilled; but now they both read what was foretold and recognize what was fulfilled. And still, they choose to deny Christ, because they can no longer kill.

Heretics who divide the unity are worse than the Jews.

Heretics, however, are worse than the Jews, for the Jews deny Christ, whom they do not see; these heretics, however, attack His Church, which they see. Not only do these heretics rage madly more miserably than those Jews who now deny Christ, but also more than those who killed Him; for those Jews did not erase the title of the one hanging on the wood, these heretics discard the baptism of the one sitting in heaven. From this present Psalm, therefore, we respond to both adversaries: both to the deniers of the head, and to the deniers of the body. For the head is Christ, the body is the Church. Against the Jews we read: "They have pierced my hands and my feet, they have numbered all my bones," and the other things which follow. Against the heretics we read: "All the ends of the earth will remember and turn to the Lord, and all the families of the nations will worship in His presence, for the kingdom is the Lord's, and He will rule over the nations." But let us hold on to what the garment woven from above signifies, which those who killed Christ did not divide, but which they reached by lot, who could reach it. Therefore, the sacraments of Christ can be divided by many heretics: none of the faithful divides or splits the love of Christ; but those who belong to the part of the lot of the saints in the light, they hold it as their own, because they spiritually love unity. Wherefore, beloved, let us celebrate this day with annual devotion; but let us glory in the cross of Christ, not once a year, but with continuous holiness.

Sermons - Sermon 218C

SERMON 218/C ON THE PASSION OF THE LORD Admirable exchange in the passion of Christ. The passion of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ is the confidence of glory and the doctrine of patience. For what could the hearts of the faithful not promise themselves from the grace of God, for whom it was not sufficient that the only-begotten Son of God, co-eternal with the Father, should be born as a man from a man, unless He also should die at the hands of men whom He created? Great is that which is promised to us by the Lord in the future: but much greater is that which we recall has already been done for us. Where were they, or what were they, when Christ died for the ungodly? Who would doubt that He will grant His life to the saints, He who granted His death to the same? Why does human frailty hesitate to believe that it will happen that men will live with God some day? Much more unbelievable has already happened, that God died for men. For who is Christ, except that which was in the beginning, the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God? This Word of God was made flesh, and dwelt among us. For He did not have in Himself the means to die for us, unless He had taken mortal flesh from us. Thus the immortal was able to die, thus He wished to give life to mortals; later He would make them partakers of Himself, of whom He had first made Himself a partaker. For we did not have of our own means whereby we might live, nor did He of His own have the means whereby He might die. Therefore, in mutual sharing with us, He worked a wondrous exchange; it was ours, whereby He died; it will be His, whereby we shall live. Nevertheless, the flesh, which He took from us in order to die, He also gave, because He is the Creator; but the life by which we shall live in Him and with Him, He did not receive from us. Therefore, as pertains to our nature, whereby we are humans, He did not die of His own, but of ours; yet, insofar as it pertains to His creation, which He made as God, He also died of His own; for He also made the flesh in which He died.

One should not be ashamed of the death of the Lord; rather, one should greatly glory in it.

Therefore, we not only ought not to be ashamed of the death of our Lord God, but also must place our utmost trust in it and glory in it; by taking upon Himself the death that He discovered in us, He most faithfully promised to give us life in Himself, which we cannot have from ourselves. For He who loved us so much that He suffered without sin for sinners what we deserved for sin, how will He not give us what justice, He who justifies? How will He not render the rewards of the saints, who endured the punishment of the wicked without iniquity, as He promises in truth? Let us therefore, brothers, confess or even profess without fear that Christ was crucified for us; not fearing, but rejoicing: not being ashamed, but glorying, let us say. The Apostle Paul saw this and commended the title of glory. Although he had many great and divine things to recount about Christ, he did not say he gloried in the wonders of Christ, because, being God with the Father, He created the world, and being also a man like us, He ruled the world; but rather, he said, “But far be it from me to glory except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ.” He saw for whom, by whom, and where He hung; and from such great humility of God and divine loftiness, the Apostle presumed. In what sense it is affirmed that God is dead. But those who insult us because we venerate the crucified Lord, the more they seem wise to themselves, the more incurably and desperately they are foolish, and they do not understand at all what we believe or say; for we do not say that what was dead in Christ was what was God, but what was human. For if, when any human being dies, that which is most truly human, that is, that by which one is distinguished from a beast, which has intellect, which discerns the human and the divine, the temporal and the eternal, the false and the true, that is, the rational soul, does not undergo death with the body, but departs alive as the body dies, and yet it is said: "The man is dead"; why should it not be similarly said: "God is dead," so that it is understood not that what is God could die, but what was mortal that God took on for the sake of mortals? For just as, when a human dies, the soul does not die in the flesh, so also when Christ died, His divinity did not die in the man. But they say, God could not mix with a man and be made one with him in Christ. According to this carnal and vain sentiment and human opinions, it would be much harder to believe that a spirit could mix with flesh than that God could mix with man; and yet no man would be human unless a human spirit were mixed with a human body. Therefore, when the mixture of spirit and body is more difficult and more wonderful than the mixture of spirit and Spirit; if the human spirit, which is not a body, and the human body, which is not a spirit, yet are mixed in order to make a man, how much more, to make one Christ from both, could God, who is spirit, mix not with a body without a spirit, but with a man having a spirit in a spiritual participation. The cross of Christ is the doctrine of patience and humility.

Therefore, let us also glory in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom the world is crucified to us and we to the world; of which cross, so that we would not be ashamed, we placed it on our very forehead, that is, in the dwelling of modesty. But now, if we attempt to explain how beneficial the doctrine of patience in that cross is, what words, what times would suffice for the matters? For which man, who truly and earnestly believes in Christ, would dare to be proud, with God teaching humility not only by word but also by His own example? Truly the usefulness of this doctrine is briefly reminded by that saying of the Holy Scripture: Before destruction the heart is exalted, and before glory it is humbled; which aligns with: God resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble; and this: Whoever exalts himself will be humbled, and whoever humbles himself will be exalted. Therefore, when the Apostle admonishes us not to be wise in our own eyes, but to associate with the lowly, let him consider, if he can, to what precipice of pride a man is brought if he does not consent to the humble God; and how dangerous it is for a man to impatiently bear what the just God has willed if God patiently endured what the unjust enemy willed.

Sermons - Sermon 219

SERMO 219 ON THE VIGILS OF EASTER

Eagerly one must keep vigil on this most holy night. The good keep vigil, and the evil keep vigil too. The good should learn from the evil how to keep vigil.

Blessed Paul the apostle, exhorting us to imitate him, among many other signs of his virtue, also says: In frequent watchings. How much more eagerly then should we vigil in this vigil, as the mother of all holy vigils, in which the whole world stays awake? Not that world, of which it is written: If anyone loves the world, the love of the Father is not in him: because all that is in the world is the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, which is not from the Father. Such a world indeed, that is, the sons of unbelief, are ruled by devils and their angels: against whom the apostle himself says we have a struggle, where he says: Our struggle is not against flesh and blood, but against principalities and powers, and the rulers of the darkness of this world. Which we also once were, but now light in the Lord. Let us resist the rulers of darkness with the light of the vigils. Therefore, that world does not stay awake in this celebration: but that of which it is said: God was in Christ reconciling the world to Himself, not counting their trespasses against them. Although the celebration of this vigil is so bright throughout the whole world, as to compel even those to watch in the flesh, who, I do not say sleep in heart, but are buried in Tartarean impiety. They too stay awake this night, of which it is rendered visibly, that which was promised so long before: And the night shall be as bright as the day. This happens in the hearts of the pious, to whom it was said: You were once darkness, but now light in the Lord. This also happens among all rivals, both those who see in the Lord, and those who envy the Lord. Therefore, this night, both the hostile world and the reconciled world stay awake. This one stays awake to praise the Doctor delivered: that one to blaspheme the Judge condemned. This one, burning and shining with pious minds stays awake: that one, gnashing teeth and wasting away. Finally, charity keeps this one, iniquity keeps that one: Christian vigor keeps this one, diabolic envy keeps that one from sleeping in this celebration at all. Hence, even by our own enemies unknowingly, we are admonished how we ought to watch for ourselves, if even those who envy us stay awake because of us. Indeed, those who in no way are marked with the name of Christ, nevertheless on this night many with sorrow, many with shame; some also who approach the faith, already with the fear of God do not sleep. For different reasons, this celebration rouses them. How then should the friend of Christ stay awake with joy, when even the enemy stays awake with sorrow? How should the Christian ardently stay awake in such great glory of Christ, when the pagan is ashamed to sleep? How is it fitting for him who has entered this great house to stay awake in such great festivity, when even he who plans to enter stays awake? Therefore, let us watch and pray; that both outwardly and inwardly we may celebrate this vigil. God may speak to us in His readings; let us speak to God in our prayers. If we obediently hear His words, He whom we ask dwells in us.

Sermons - Sermon 22

SERMO 22 SERMON OF SAINT AUGUSTINE ON PSALM 67. In the words of the prophet wishing, the foreknowledge of announcing is understood.

We have heard and trembled at what is prophesied in the voice of the psalm. For it says: As smoke vanishes, let them vanish; as wax melts before the fire, so let sinners perish before the face of God. I do not doubt, dearest brethren, that the hearts of all of you have been shaken, nor that anyone's conscience has stood fearless under these words. For who will boast of having a pure heart? Or who will boast of being free from sins? Thus, when Scripture says: As wax melts before the fire, so let sinners perish before the face of God, who would not tremble, who would not jump in dread? What then do we do, and what hope do we have? For these things are not sung in vain. Or truly when the Prophet says these things, does he wish them for men and not rather foresee what is to come? Indeed, the words appear as a figure of one wishing, but are understood as the foreknowledge of one announcing. For just as some things in the Scriptures of the Prophets are narrated as if done in the past when they are foretold as future, so some things are said as if by the wish of one desiring. But those who rightly understand what they hear recognize the vision of one foretelling. These psalms were said and written long before the birth of the Lord's incarnation. Not before God Christ but before Christ was born of the Virgin Mary. For certainly Father Abraham was long before King David, in whose time these psalms were sung. The Lord, however, said: Before Abraham was, I am. For He is the Word of God through which all things were made. And He, fulfilling the Prophets, predicted that He would come in the flesh. And His incarnation pertains to the passion. For He could not have suffered the things written in the Gospel, except in the mortal and passible flesh that He bore. And there, indeed, we read how, when the Lord was crucified, those who crucified Him divided His garments among themselves, and when they found a tunic in them woven from above, they did not want to tear it, but cast lots for it, so that it might come to the one to whom it fell whole, because it signified the love that cannot be divided. Therefore, while these things are now narrated as having been done in the Gospel, they were prophesied many years before in the psalm, as if they were already done. They pierced my hands and my feet, I can count all my bones. They stare and gloat over me: they divide my garments among them and cast lots for my clothing. All are spoken as if past, and foretold as future. Therefore, just as future deeds are signified in the words of the past tense, so the mind of the one foretelling must be understood in the figure of one wishing. Thus, of Judas, the Lord's betrayer, as if the Prophet wishes for him what he predicts will come. And of the Jews themselves: Let their table become a snare and a trap, and a stumbling block. What was predicted of them without a doubt the Apostle explains, just as the Apostle Peter recalls what was foretold under the same figure of Judas.

"We should not be displeased with the known judgment of God." Nor without cause are things that are to come spoken of as if they have already happened. For to God, they are so certain that they are already considered done. And it seems the Prophet speaks as if wishing for what he foresees as certain to come, showing nothing else as it seems to me, except that we should not displease ourselves with the known judgment of God, which He has established as fixed and immovable. And so in the Acts of the Apostles, when a certain prophet named Agabus predicted that the apostle Paul would endure many sufferings from the Jews in Jerusalem and would even be bound, when the brothers, upon hearing this, wanted to recall and retain him so that he would not go there: "What are you doing," he said, "weeping and breaking my heart? For I am ready not only to be bound but also to die for the name of our Lord Jesus Christ." And when the brothers saw the man's firm constancy to endure everything, they said: "Let the will of God be done." Do you think then that because they said "Let the will of God be done," they wished for the Apostle to suffer such things, and not rather devoutly subjected their minds to the sublime and divine decree? Similarly, the Prophet, when he says: "As wax melts before the fire, so may the wicked perish before God," sees this as most certain to befall sinners, and he is pleased with what God has decreed, so that he himself may not displease God.

Now repentance is fruitful.

What then do we do, Brothers, except to change our lives while there is still time, and correct our deeds if there are any that are evil? So that what is undoubtedly going to come will not find us among the sinners on whom it will come, not because we will not be, but so that it will not find us as those of whom it has been foretold it will come. For this reason, the judge threatens that he will come, so that he does not find any to punish when he comes. This is why the Prophets sing, so that we are corrected. If he wanted to condemn, he would be silent. No one who wants to strike says, “Watch out.” All, Brothers, that we have heard through the Scriptures, is the voice of God saying, “Watch out.” And all that we suffer, the tribulations in this life, are God's scourging intending to correct us so that he does not condemn us in the end. They seem hard, they are annoying, they are terrifying when recounted, what each person suffers severely in this life; but in comparison with the eternal fire, they are not just small, they are nothing. Therefore, whether we are scourged, or when others are scourged, we should be reminded. All these, Brothers, that are inflicted by the Lord in this life, are admonitions and goads for our correction. But the eternal fire will come, about which it will be said to those who will be placed on the left: Go into the eternal fire, which is prepared for the devil and his angels. Then indeed they will repent. For it is written in a certain book of Wisdom: They will say among themselves, repenting and groaning through distress of spirit: What has pride profited us, and what has the boasting of riches brought us? All those things have passed away like a shadow. There will be repentance there, but it will be unfruitful. There will be repentance there, but it will have pain without remedy. Now repentance is fruitful, when correction is free. Feel repentance at the voice of Scripture. For at the voice of the present judge, repentance will be in vain. Then he will pronounce the sentence. And there will be no one to blame, when he is to pronounce the sentence. For he has not been silent before the sentence. Nor has he delayed, except so that you may correct yourself, when he even allowed the thief on the cross to change himself. For then the thief hanging with the Lord believed in Christ, when the disciples wavered about him. The Jews despised him who raised the dead, the thief did not despise him hanging with him on the cross. Therefore, there is no reason to say to the Lord at the end: “You did not allow me to live well”; or: “You did not give me the time for correction”; or: “You did not show me what to seek, what to avoid.” See that he is not silent, see that he delays, see that he entreats, exhorts, threatens. He has placed his word on high. It is recited throughout the whole world to the entire human race. There is no longer anyone who can say: “I did not know,

I did not hear.” What is said in the psalm is being fulfilled: Nor is there anyone who can hide from its heat. Now, therefore, his heat is in his word. Change now from his heat, and do not melt like wax from his fire. The day of judgment will come.

For, my Brothers, that which the impious now laugh at, the mockers now scorn, what they think is sung falsely, will come one day. One day it will come. If so many things that were predicted have not yet come, let us despair of that also one day coming. But if we now see all the things predicted about the Church for the future fulfilled, and even the eyes of the blind are struck by them, why do we doubt that the others will also come? When it was said that the Church of Christ would be in the whole world, it was said by a few and laughed at by many. Now what was predicted so long ago is already fulfilled. The Church is spread throughout the whole world. Thousands of years ago it was promised to Abraham: In your seed all nations shall be blessed. Christ came from the seed of Abraham, all nations are now blessed in Christ. Schisms and heresies were predicted to be in the future. We see those. Persecutions were predicted. They were carried out by kings worshiping idols. The earth was filled with martyrs because of those idols against the name of Christ. The seed of blood was sown, the crop of the Church arose. Nor did the Church pray in vain for its enemies. Even those who persecuted believed. It was also foretold that those idols would be overthrown through the name of Christ, for we find this in the Scriptures. A few years ago, Christians read those things and did not see them. They were still expecting those things to come and so they passed away. They did not see them, but yet believing that they would come, they went to the Lord with faith. In our times, even those things are seen. We see all the things that were predicted about the Church earlier fulfilled. Is only the day of judgment not to come? Is it alone foretold, and it will not come? Are we so hard and of such a stony heart, that we read the Scriptures and see everything that is written happening exactly to the letter, and we despair of the things that remain? How much remains compared to what we see already shown to us? God has shown us so many things. Will He defraud us of the rest? The judgment will come, giving due to merits, good things to the good, bad things to the bad. Let us be good, and securely await the judge.

Merciful and just is God. My brothers, particularly now, listen to me speaking. I do not wish to account for the past with you. From today, change yourself so that tomorrow may find you different. But in our perversity, we desire God to be so merciful that He is not just. Others, on the other hand, trusting in their own righteousness, so desire Him to be just that they do not want Him to be merciful. God presents Himself as both; He provides both. His mercy does not foreclose His justice, nor does His justice remove His mercy. He is merciful and He is just. How do we prove He is merciful? He spares sinners now and grants forgiveness to those who confess. How do we prove He is just? Because the day of judgment is to come, which He now delays, but does not remove. And when it comes, He will recompense according to merits. Do you wish that those who turn away be given what will be given to those who convert? Brothers, does it seem just to you that Judas should be placed where Peter is placed? He too would be placed there if he corrected himself. But despairing of pardon, he rather hanged himself than implored the clemency of the King.

God grants forgiveness to the repentant.

Therefore, brothers, as I started to say, there is no reason to reproach God. We will have nothing to say against Him when He comes to judge. Let each person consider their own sins, and amend them now while there is time. Let sorrow be fruitful, not sterile repentance. It is as if God says this: "Behold, I have indicated the sentence but have not yet delivered it. I have foretold, not fixed." Why are you afraid because I said: "If you change, it will change"? For it is written that God repents. Does God repent as humans do? For it is said: If you repent of your sins, I will repent of all the evils I was going to do to you. But does God repent as if he had made a mistake? Rather, repentance in God is called a change of sentence. However, this change of sentence is not unjust, but just. Why just? The accused has changed, so the judge has changed the sentence. Do not be afraid. The sentence has changed, not justice. Justice remains intact, because a just one must spare the changed. Just as he does not spare the obstinate, so he spares the changed. He himself is the king of pardons, who is the giver of the law. He sent the law, he came with indulgence. The law made you guilty, the giver of the law acquits you. Rather, he does not acquit, for to acquit is to judge as innocent. Instead, he grants forgiveness to the penitent. For all are guilty who are entangled in their sins. No one should wish to be acquitted. Let all plead for mercy. Mercy is given to the changed. And we will be secure when we hear: As wax melts before the fire, so let sinners perish before God.

Let man do what he fears in the future.

Certainly, Brothers, let sinners perish from before the face of God. Let sinners perish now, and not let sinners perish. If they begin to live justly, sinners will indeed perish, but men will not perish. The man sinner has two names. Man is one name, and sinner is one name. In these two names, we understand that one of them God made, and the other man made. For God made man, but man made himself a sinner. Why then do you tremble, when God says to you: Let sinners perish from before my face? God says this to you: "Let what you made in you perish, and let what I made remain." And now the fire burns in the heat of the word, the matter is in the fervor of the Holy Spirit, as we have already said, for it is written in another psalm: And there is no one who can hide from its heat. But the heat of the Holy Spirit, the Apostle says: Fervent in spirit. Therefore, before the face of God, put for yourself the Scripture of God in the meantime. Melt away from it. Let it repent you, when you hear these things about your sins. But when it repents you, and when you torment yourself under the heat of the word, when even tears run, do you not find yourself similar to wax melting and as if running into tears? Therefore, do now what you fear in the future, and you will not have in the future what you fear. The proud perish like smoke.

Only just like smoke shall I not fail. For both things you have set there, perhaps not without reason, because there is also a difference of sins. In that one word the psalm placed both: As smoke fails, let them fail; and: as wax melts before the fire, so let the wicked perish before God. Who are those who fail like smoke? Who are they, if not the proud, not confessing their sins, but defending them? Why are they compared to smoke? Because smoke lifts itself up, exalts itself as if into heaven. But the higher it rises, the more easily it vanishes and disperses. Again, consider what I said. Smoke is more solid when it is near the fire and near the earth. It has not yet vanished so much, it has not yet been so scattered into the winds. But when does it become thinner, vanish, and disperse? When it has lifted itself up much. Therefore, because the proud lift themselves up against God like smoke against the sky, it remains that they fail in such a way and perish, dissipated by the winds of their own vanity's elevation, just as smoke, having been lifted up, inflated with a swollen, not solid mass, perishes. Thus is smoke. You see a great bulk. You have as though something to see, and yet you do not have something to hold. Brothers, above all loathe such a punishment, lest you defend your sins. And if you still do them, do not defend them. Submit yourselves to God. And beat your breasts in such a way that even those that are left may not be done. Strive not to do them, and if it is possible, do none at all. But if it is not possible that you do none at all, let that pious confession remain. For there will be respect of His mercy that, while you strive to destroy all and, as much as He helps you in destroying, regarding the rest that remain with you, found on the way and taken up in effort, He may easily forgive. Just strive to advance, not to fail. If the last day does not find you victorious, let it find you at least still fighting, not captured and enslaved.

God gave the blood of His Only Begotten for us.

However, the mercy of God is most abundant, and His kindness is generous, for He redeemed us with the blood of His Son, when we were nothing because of our sins. For He did something great when He created man in His own image and likeness. But because we chose not to be nothing by sinning, and drew the inheritance of mortality from our parents, and became a mass of sin, a mass of wrath, it pleased Him, nevertheless, through His mercy to redeem us at such a cost. He gave for us the blood of His only-begotten, innocently born, innocently living, innocently dying. He who redeemed us at such a price does not wish those He bought to perish. He did not buy those to destroy, but bought those to give life. If our sins surpass us, God does not scorn His own price. He gave a great price. Nor, however, let us flatter ourselves about His mercy, if we have not tried against our sins. Nor if we have committed some particularly grave sins, should we hope that mercy will be combined with iniquity. For will He indeed place those who have done nothing of how the corrected should live, but remained in obstinacy and hardness of heart, and even accused God by defending their sins, in the same place where He placed the holy Apostles, Prophets, Patriarchs, and His faithful servants who deserved well, serving Him, walking in chastity, modesty, humility, performing alms, forgiving what they suffered from anyone? For such is the way of the just, such is the way of the saints who hold God as father, who hold the Church as mother. Offending neither that parent nor this one, but living in love of both parents and hastening towards eternal inheritance, the inheritance is given to each without harming the father or mother.

God the Father, Church the Mother.

Because two parents begot us unto death, two parents begot us unto life. The parents who begot us unto death are Adam and Eve. The parents who begot us unto life are Christ and the Church. And my father who begot me was Adam to me; and my mother was Eve to me. We were born according to this lineage of the flesh, indeed by the gift of God - because even that gift is not from another, but from God - and yet, Brothers, how were we born? Surely to die. Predecessors begot successors for themselves. Did they beget successors with whom they would always live here? But as ones who would pass away, they begot successors for themselves. However, God the Father and Mother Church do not generate for this purpose. They generate for eternal life because they themselves are eternal. And we have the promised inheritance from Christ, eternal life. According to that, the Word became flesh and dwelt among us, grew and was nurtured. Suffered, died, and resurrected He received the inheritance of the kingdom of heaven. In that human He received resurrection and eternal life. He received it in that human. But in the Word, He did not receive it, because He remains unchangeable from eternity to eternity. Therefore, because that flesh which was resurrected and vivified ascended into heaven received resurrection and eternal life, this was promised to us. We await that inheritance, eternal life. For not yet has the whole body received it, because the head is in heaven, the members are still on earth. Nor will the head alone receive the inheritance, and the body be left behind. The whole Christ will receive the inheritance, the whole according to the human, that is, the head and the body. Therefore we are the members of Christ, let us hope for the inheritance. Because when all these things have passed away, we will receive this good which will not pass away, and escape this evil which will not pass away. For both are eternal. For He has not promised something non-eternal to His, and He has not threatened the wicked with something temporal. Just as He promised to the saints eternal life, blessedness, the kingdom, an everlasting inheritance without end, so He threatened the wicked with eternal fire. If we do not yet love what He promised, at least let us fear what He threatened.

Sermons - Sermon 220

SERMO 220 ON THE VIGILS OF EASTER The solemnity repeats what the truth declares to have been done once. Memory preserves the relics of thought.

We know, brothers, and we retain with the firmest faith, that Christ died once for us; the just for the sinners, the Lord for the slaves, the free man for the captives, the doctor for the sick, the blessed one for the miserable, the wealthy one for the needy, the seeker for the lost, the redeemer for the sold, the shepherd for the flock, and what is most miraculous of all, the creator for the creature: retaining what he always is, bestowing what he became; God hidden, man appearing; enlivening with power, dying in weakness, immutable in divinity, passible in the flesh: as the Apostle says: "Who was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification." You know well this was done once. And yet, the solemnity, as if it were done often, repeats it at recurring times, which truth declares was done once with the voices of so many Scriptures. However, truth and solemnity are not contrary, as if the latter lies and the former tells the truth. For that which truth indicates as having been done once, the solemnity renews in the devout hearts by celebrating it often. Truth reveals what has been done, as it was done; solemnity, however, not by doing it, but by celebrating it, does not allow what happened in the past to pass away. Finally, "Christ our Passover has been sacrificed." He was killed once for all, who now dies no more, death no longer has dominion over him. Therefore, according to the voice of truth, we say the Passover was done once and will no longer be; but according to the voice of solemnity, we say the Passover will come every year. Thus, I believe what is written in the Psalm is understood: "The thought of man will confess to you, and the remnants of thought will celebrate a feast for you." For unless thought commended to memory what is said about temporally conducted affairs, it would find no remnants after the time has passed. Therefore, the thought of man, perceiving the truth, confesses to the Lord; but the remnants of thought, which are in memory, do not cease to celebrate solemnities at known times, lest it be judged an ungrateful thought. To this pertains the most illustrious solemnity of this night, whereby in keeping vigil, we work, as it were, through the remnants of thought concerning the resurrection of the Lord, which we confess most truthfully as having been done once. Those, therefore, whom preached truth has instructed, let not abandoned solemnity make irreverent. This made this night illustrious throughout the whole world. This demonstrates the Christian peoples in crowds, this confounds the darkness of the Jews, this overturns the idols of the pagans.

Sermons - Sermon 221

SERMO 221 OF THE HOLY NIGHT Of the joy and brightness of this holy night.

Because our Lord Jesus Christ made the day, which by His dying had been mournful, by His rising glorious, recalling both times in solemn memory, let us watch in remembering His death and rejoice in receiving His resurrection. This is our anniversary feast, and our Passover; not as for the old people symbolized by the killing of a lamb, but as for the new people fulfilled by the sacrifice of the Savior; because Christ, our Passover, has been sacrificed, and the old things have passed away, and behold, all things have become new. For we neither mourn except burdened by our sins, nor do we truly rejoice except justified by His grace; because He was delivered up for our offenses, and was raised again for our justification. By mourning the former, we rejoice in the latter; and because what was committed sadly for us and on our behalf, and was foreordained joyfully for us, we do not let pass by in ungrateful forgetfulness, but celebrate it in grateful memory. Therefore, let us watch, beloved, because the burial of Christ lasted until this night, so that in this very night the resurrection of His flesh should occur, which was then mocked on the cross, now is adored in heaven and earth. This night indeed is understood to pertain to the following day, which we hold as the Lord’s Day. And surely He should rise at night, because by His resurrection He illuminated our darkness; for it was not in vain that it was sung a little before to Him: You will light my lamp, O Lord; my God, you will lighten my darkness. Therefore, so great a mystery is also recommended by our devotion; that just as our faith, confirmed by His resurrection, now keeps watch, so this night, illuminated by our vigil, should also shine brightly; so that we may be able worthily to conceive today with the Church spread throughout the world, lest we be found in the night. The sun has withdrawn from so many and so great peoples whom such a distinguished solemnity has gathered everywhere in the name of Christ; day has not departed, while shining heaven has succeeded with shining earth. In comparison to this, other vigils are not to be considered at all.

Nevertheless, if anyone inquires about the causes of our great watchfulness, they can both discover it diligently and respond faithfully. For He who has bestowed the glory of His name upon us, He Himself has illuminated this night; and to whom we say: You will illuminate my darkness, He provides light to our hearts; so that just as we behold this splendor of lights with joyful eyes, we may see with enlightened minds the reason for this so bright a night. What is it, then, that today Christians watch on this anniversary feast? For now we especially keep vigil, nor is any other solemnity commonly understood in this way; in this desire while we search and say: When do we keep vigil? we keep vigil on so many days; as if compared to this, other vigils are not to be considered. Indeed, the Apostle recommended the assiduity of vigils to the Church, just as he did with fasts, mentioning himself and saying: In frequent fastings, in frequent watchings; but the vigil of this night is so great, that it claims for itself the common name as if it were its own. Therefore, first we will speak briefly about the general vigil, and then about the special and present one, which the Lord has given.

Whoever desires to live always must watch more vigilantly. In that life, for the attainment of whose rest we labor, which the Truth promises to us after the death of this body, or even after the end of this world, in the resurrection, we shall never sleep, just as we shall never indeed die. For what is sleep but a daily death, which neither utterly removes us from here, nor detains a person for too long? And what is death but a lengthy and deep sleep, from which God awakens a person? Therefore, where no death comes, neither does the image of it, which is sleep, intervene. Indeed, sleep belongs only to mortals. This is not the rest of angels: since they always live, they never refresh their health with sleep. Just as life itself is without end, so too is the vigilance there; nor is living anything other than watching; nor is watching anything other than living. But we, in this body, which is corrupted and burdens the soul, since we do not live unless we recover our strength by sleeping, interrupt life with the semblance of death, so that we might at least be able to live in intervals. Therefore, whoever uses vigils continuously, chastely, and innocently, undoubtedly contemplates the life of angels - for as much as the frailty of this flesh is a burden to the earthly, heavenly desires are restrained - practicing longer vigils against the deadly weight, so that they might acquire merit in eternal life. For he is not consistent with himself, who desires always to live, and does not love longer watching; he wishes there to be no death at all, and does not wish to diminish its image. This cause, this reason, is why the mind of a Christian should be exercised more frequently in vigils. This vigil is celebrated because Christ rose and brought us out of darkness into light.

Now, brothers, while we recall a few other things, take notice of the special watch of this night. For it has been said why we ought to take away sleep and add vigils more often: but now it must be said why we should especially watch on this present night with such great celebration. No Christian doubts that the Lord Christ rose from the dead on the third day. However, the holy Gospel testifies that this happened on this night. For it is beyond doubt that the entire day is reckoned from the previous night; not according to the order of days mentioned in Genesis – although even there the darkness preceded; for there was darkness over the deep, when God said: let there be light, and there was light – but because those darknesses were not yet night, were not yet day. For God divided between the light and the darkness: and He first called the light day, then the darkness night, and from the made light until another morning was reckoned one day. It is evident that those days began with light, and each was terminated after the passing night up to the morning. But after man, created from the light of righteousness, declined into the shadows of sin, from which Christ's grace freed him, it came to be that we now reckon days from nights; because we endeavor to come not from light to darkness, but from darkness to light, and with the Lord's help we hope to succeed. Thus, also the Apostle says: The night has passed, the day has drawn near; let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and put on the armor of light. Thus, the day of the Lord's passion, on which He was crucified, followed its own passing night; and therefore it was concluded and terminated until the Preparation Day, which the Jews also call "Pure Supper," beginning from the evening that commenced the observation of the Sabbath. Then the day of the Sabbath, beginning from its own evening, ended with the evening that began the night pertaining to the beginning of the Lord's day; for which the Lord consecrated with the glory of His resurrection. Therefore, with the festivity of this solemnity, we now celebrate the memory of that night pertaining to the beginning of the Lord's day. We keep vigil on that night when the Lord rose, and that life, about which we earlier spoke, where there is neither death nor sleep, which He began for us in His flesh; that He raised it from the dead in such a way that He would not die again, nor would death have any more dominion over Him. For since those coming to His tomb at dawn, by whom His body was sought with affection, did not find it and received the answer from the angels that He had already risen, it is evident that He rose on that night, the extremity of which was that dawn. Therefore, to the One rising, to whom we sing by continuing to watch a little longer, He will grant that we may reign with Him living without end. But even if perhaps during these hours, in which we conduct this vigil, His body was still in the tomb and had not yet risen, neither are we absurd in keeping watch; for He slept that we might keep watch, who died that we might live. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 222

SERMO 222 In the Vigils of Easter Who are the adversaries of the Lord's flock. Where these most wicked spirits dwell. Be watchful and pray that we do not enter into temptation. When you, beloved, are urged by the very solemnity of this holy night to watch and pray, our solemn address is also due to you, so that against the contrary and envious powers and the rulers of darkness, like against nocturnal beasts, the shepherd's voice may also awaken the flock of the Lord. For we do not wrestle against flesh and blood, as the Apostle says, that is, against men weak in mortal body: but against principalities and powers, and the rulers of the world of this darkness, against the spiritual wickedness in the heavenly places. Indeed, do not think that the devil and his angels, whom the Apostle signifies by these words, are the rulers of this world, concerning which it is written: And the world was made through him. For when he called them the rulers of the world, lest anyone should understand the world, which in many places of Scripture is called by the name of heaven and earth; he immediately added, as if explaining, of this darkness, that is, of the unbelievers. Therefore he says to those who are now faithful: You were once darkness, but now you are light in the Lord. These are, therefore, the spiritual wickedness in the heavenly places; not where the stars are arranged and shine, and the holy Angels dwell; but in the dark dwelling of this lower air, where even the mist gathers: (and yet it is written: He who covers the heaven with clouds). Where also birds fly: and yet they are called the birds of heaven. Therefore, in these heavens, not in that higher tranquility of the heavens, these wicked spirits dwell, against whom we are called to spiritual wrestling: so that having conquered the evil angels, we may enjoy that reward of being united with the good Angels in incorruptible eternity. Hence, in another place the same Apostle, signifying the dark principality of the devil, says: According to the spirit of this world, according to the prince of the power of this air, the spirit who now works in the sons of disobedience. Therefore, what is the spirit of this world, this is the rulers of the world. And just as he explained there what he called the world, in the sons of disobedience: so also here, when he added, of this darkness. And what he says there, the prince of the power of this air; here in this place, in the heavenly places. Thanks be to our Lord God, who has delivered us from the power of darkness, and transferred us to the kingdom of the Son of His love. Therefore, separated by the evangelical light from those darknesses, and redeemed by His precious blood from those powers, watch and pray, lest you enter into temptation. For whoever has the faith that works through love, the prince of this world has been cast out from your hearts: but outside, like a roaring lion, he goes about seeking whom he may devour. Therefore do not give place to the devil, wanting to penetrate from any side: but He who cast him out by suffering for you, may He dwell within you against him. When he ruled over you, you were once darkness; but now you are light in the Lord: walk as children of light. Against the darkness and its rulers, watch in the mother light, and pray to the Father of lights from the bosom of the mother light.

Sermons - Sermon 223

SERMO 223 On the Vigils of Easter This is the day which the Lord has made; the baptized faithful are admonished to adhere to the children of light. In the book called Genesis, Scripture says: And God saw the light, that it was good. And God divided the light from the darkness: and God called the light Day, and the darkness He called Night. If therefore God called the light Day, without a doubt those to whom the apostle Paul says: You were once darkness, but now you are light in the Lord, were the Day: for He who commanded the light to shine out of darkness has illuminated them. These infants, whom you see outwardly whitened and inwardly cleansed, who prefigure with the whiteness of their garments the brightness of their minds, were darkness when they were oppressed by the night of their sins. But now because they have been cleansed by the bath of forgiveness, because they have been irrigated by the fountain of wisdom, because they have been suffused with the light of righteousness: This is the day which the Lord has made; let us rejoice and be glad in it. May the Lord's Day hear us, may the Day made by the Lord hear us: hear, and obey; so that we may rejoice and be glad in it. For, as the Apostle says, this is our joy and crown, if you stand firm in the Lord. Therefore, listen to us, O new children of the chaste mother: rather listen to us, children of the virgin mother. For you were once darkness, but now you are light in the Lord: walk as children of light, adhere to the children of light; and to say this more plainly, adhere to good believers. For there are, what is worse, bad believers. There are believers who are called, but are not. There are believers, in whom the sacraments of Christ suffer injury: who live in such a way that they themselves perish, and they destroy others. They themselves perish, by living wickedly: and they destroy others, by giving examples of wicked living. Therefore, beloved, do not join yourselves to such as these. Seek the good, adhere to the good: be good. In the Church of this time, both the good and the bad are present. The good should tolerate the bad, and the bad should imitate the good. Nor should you be surprised by the multitude of evil Christians, who fill the church, who communicate at the altar, who loudly praise the bishop or presbyter discussing good morals: through them is fulfilled what our gatherer foretold in the Psalm: "I have announced and spoken, they were multiplied beyond number." In the Church of this time, they can be with us; but in that congregation of saints which is to come after the resurrection, they will not be able to be. For the Church of this time is compared to a threshing floor, having mixed grain with chaff, having evildoers intermixed with the good; but after judgment, it will have all the good without any evil. This threshing floor contains the harvest sown by the Apostles, watered by good teachers following them up to the present time, even greatly threshed by the persecution of enemies; but, as the only thing remaining, not yet purified by the heavenly winnowing. However, He will come of whom you have spoken in the Creed: “From whence He shall come to judge the living and the dead.” And, as the Gospel speaks, He will have His winnowing fan in His hand, and He will thoroughly purge His threshing floor; and He will gather His wheat into the barn, but the chaff He will burn with unquenchable fire. Let the ancient faithful hear what I say. Let those who are grain rejoice with trembling, and remain, and not depart from the threshing floor. Let them not try to rid themselves of the chaff by their own judgment: for if they currently wish to separate themselves from the chaff, they will not be able to remain in the threshing floor. And when He comes who discerns without error, what He does not find in the threshing floor, He will not lift to the barn. In vain will the grains then throw themselves from the spike, those which have now departed from the threshing floor. That barn will be filled, and then closed. Whatever remains outside, the flame will destroy. Therefore, dearly beloved, let the good tolerate the bad; let those who are bad imitate the good. In this very threshing floor, grains can fail among the chaff; grains can also be raised again from the chaff. These things happen daily, my brothers: this life is full of both punishments and consolations. Daily, those who seemed good slip and perish: and again, those who seemed bad are converted and live. For God does not desire the death of the wicked, only that he returns and lives. Hear me, grains; hear me, you who are what I desire to be: hear me, grains. Do not be saddened by the mixture of the chaff: they will not be with you forever. How burdensome is this chaff? Thank God, it is light. Let us only be grains, and however much there is, it will not weigh us down. For God is faithful, who will not allow us to be tempted beyond what we are able; but with the temptation will also make a way out, that we may bear it. Let the chaff hear us too; wherever they are, let them hear. I do not wish them to be here: yet let us address them, lest they be here. So, listen to me, chaff: even if you hear, you will not be chaff. So listen. Let God's patience profit you. Let the fellowship, admonition of the grains, make you grains. The showers of God's words are not lacking to you: let not the field of God be barren in you. Therefore revive, become grains, mature. For He who has sown you wishes to find ears of corn, not thorns.

Sermons - Sermon 223A

SERMON 223/A About the Beginning of Genesis, on the Night of Easter Vigil Through the Word, God created the heavens and the earth in the beginning.

We have heard many divine readings, which neither we can match in our speech, nor can you grasp, even if we were able. Therefore, as much as the Lord grants, we wish to speak to your Charity of that very beginning of the Scriptures where, when it was read, we heard that in the beginning God made heaven and earth. Attend and consider who made it. But I know, you cannot consider who made it; consider what he made and praise him who made it. In the beginning God made heaven and earth. Behold those things that are made are evident, they are seen, they delight. The work is evident, the maker is hidden; because both what is seen is evident, and from where it is loved is hidden. When therefore we see the world, and love God, it is surely better that from where we love than from where we see. We see with our eyes, we love with our mind. Therefore, let us prefer the mind to the eyes, because better is he whom we love from within than his work, which we see from without. Let us inquire therefore, if it pleases, when God made so great a mass, with what instruments he made it. The instrument of the maker is the word of the commander. Why are you astonished? It is the work of the Omnipotent. Therefore, if you ask who made it, God made it; if you ask what he made, he made heaven and earth; if you ask by what means he made it, he made it by the Word, which he did not make. The Word, by which heaven and earth were made, the Word itself was not made. For if it was made, by what was it made? All things were made through him. If whatever was made was made through the Word, without a doubt the Word was not made, through which all things were made. In short, the narrator of the works, servant of God Moses, says: In the beginning, he says, God made heaven and earth. He made heaven and earth in the beginning. By what did he make it? By the Word. Did he also make the Word? No: but what? In the beginning was the Word. Already it was, through which he made; therefore, that which was not, he made. We can understand, and rightly understand, that heaven and earth was made in the only-begotten Word. For by what they were made, in it they were made. This can also be understood as the beginning, in which God made heaven and earth. For the Word itself is also the Wisdom of God, to which it is said: You have made all things in wisdom. If in wisdom God made all things, and his only-begotten Son is undoubtedly the Wisdom of God, let us not doubt that those things were made in the Son, which we have learned were made through the Son. For indeed the Son himself is the beginning. For inquiring Jews indeed and saying: Who are you? he answered: The beginning. Behold, in the beginning God made heaven and earth. The Word which was with God became visible through the vehicle of flesh.

Now indeed the rest, whether they are arranged and disposed, or adorned, or when those things which were not made in heaven and on earth are created, God says, and they come to be. And God said, let it be, and it was done. And thus for each of the works: he said, and it was done. He himself spoke, and they were made. With what tongue did he speak? That someone might hear, he spoke? Let us not always be nourished with milk: raise your minds with us to solid food. Let no one think of God as a body, let no one think of God as a man, let no one think of God as an angel;

although he deigned to appear thus to the fathers, not through his own substance, but through his created being subjected to him; for otherwise he, being invisible, would not appear to human eyes. Let us seek what is better in us, and from there try to reach what is best of all. What is better in us is the mind; what is best of all is God. Why seek a better thing from a worse thing? In you, the body is inferior to the mind; in things there is nothing better than God. Raise what is better in you, so that you may reach, if you are able, Him who is better than all. For I too, when I speak, I speak to minds. I see indeed visible faces, and I myself, visible in body, but through what I see, I address what I do not see. Internally I carry the word conceived in my heart, and I want it to appear in your ears what I conceived in my heart; I want to tell you what is inside, to bring forth to you what is hidden: I seek how it may reach your mind. First, I approach, as if to the door of your mind, your ears; and since the word I conceived in my heart is invisible, I cannot bring it to you, I provide it with a vehicle, the sound. Look, the word is hidden, the sound is evident; I place the hidden upon the evident, and I reach the listener; and thus the word goes out from me, comes to you, and does not depart from me. So then, if it is permitted to compare great with small, the lowest with the highest, human with divine, God did this also. The Word was hidden with the Father: that it might come to us, it took up as it were a vehicle, took on flesh; it proceeded to us, and did not depart from the Father; but before his incarnation, before Adam himself, the father of the human race, before heaven and earth and all things in them, in the beginning was the Word, and in the beginning, God made heaven and earth. To know God, it is necessary to transcend the mutability of the soul. But God made the earth before it was adorned, before its appearance was revealed. It was invisible and unformed, and darkness was upon the abyss. There was darkness where there was no light, for light had not yet been made. The Spirit of God was hovering over the waters, and He was the Creator, not separated from the Father and the only-begotten Word. For behold, if we carefully consider, the Trinity is suggested to us. Where it is said: "In the beginning," it is understood of the Father and the Son: in the beginning, God the Father [created] through the Son. The Spirit remains, to complete the Trinity: the Spirit of God was hovering over the waters. And God said. To whom did God speak? Before the creature was made, was there someone to hear? Yes, there was, He says. I ask, who? The Son Himself. So God spoke to the Son. With what word did He speak? If indeed the Son already existed, as no Christian doubts, then undoubtedly this too existed. The Son was the Word, and to the Word the Father was speaking. So were words passing between God and the Word? By no means: brothers, remove the impediments of carnal thought; think invisibly about invisible things, do not let bodily likenesses move before the eyes of your mind. Transcend whatever is perceived in you: transcend whatever is not even seen in you; for the body is perceived, the soul is not perceived, but it is nonetheless changed. Now it wills, now it does not will; now it knows, now it does not know; now it remembers, now it forgets; now it progresses, now it diminishes. This is not God; this nature is not God, the soul is not a part of the substance of God. Because whatever God is, it is an immutable good, an incorruptible good. Although God is invisible, the soul is invisible, but the soul is changeable, God is immutable. Therefore, transcend not only what is perceived in you but also that which is changed in you. Transcend everything, transcend yourself.

Just as the soul of a man, the invisible God is revealed in His works. A certain lover of invisible goodness, a certain lover of invisible eternity, says in his sighs and groans of his love: My tears have become my bread day and night, while it is said to me daily: Where is your God? How are not truly the groans of the lover his bread by tears, so that somehow he feeds on them as if from the pleasure of food, and weeps willingly, as long as he does not see what he loves, when it is said to him daily: Where is your God? If I say to a pagan: Where is your God? he will show me idols. If I break the idol, he will show a mountain, he will show a tree, he will show a worthless stone from the river; for what he has taken from many stones, and placed in a more honored place, and bowed down and worshiped, this is his god. Look, he declares, pointing his finger, behold my god. When I mock the stone, when I take it away, when I break it, when I throw it away, when I despise it, he points his finger to the sun, to the moon, he points to any star; he calls this one Saturn, that one Mercury, that one Jupiter, that one Venus. Whatever he wishes, to wherever he points his finger, he answers me: Behold my god. And because I see the sun, and I cannot break it, I cannot bring down the stars, I cannot overthrow the heaven, as if he seems superior to himself by showing visible things, and extending his finger to whatever he wishes, and saying: Behold my god. And he turns to me saying: Where is your God? When I hear: Where is your God? I have nothing to show to the eyes, I find blind barking minds; to these eyes which have it from where to see, I have nothing to show. What I truly have to show, he does not have eyes from where to see. I wish to weep, as if feeding on bread from tears. For my God is invisible; the one who speaks to me requires visible things, when he says: Where is your God? But in order to reach my God, as it is said in the same Psalm: I have considered these things, and I poured out my soul over me. My God is not below my soul, but above my soul. Whence do I reach what is above my soul, unless I pour out my soul over me? And yet to this insolent one, requiring visible things, showing visible things, exulting in visible things, with the help of my God, I will try to respond. Certainly you say to me: Where is your God? I answer you: Where are you yourself? I answer, I say, I think not importunately. You asked where God is, but I ask where is my questioner himself. He will say: Behold where I am; you see me, I am speaking to you. And I to him: I am seeking my questioner: I see his face, I see his body, I hear his voice, I observe his tongue; I seek him who directs his eyes at me, who moves his tongue, who emits his voice, who desires to know by questioning. All this, about which I speak, is the soul. Therefore, I will not deal with you any longer. You say: Show me your God; I say: Show me your soul. You labor, you are troubled, you hesitate, when I say: Show me your soul; I know that you cannot. Why cannot you? Because your soul is invisible. And yet it is better in you than your body; but my God is better than your soul. How then shall I show my God, when you do not show me your soul, of which I show a better God than your soul? Behold, if you say to me: Know my soul from its work; because I direct my eyes to see, my ears to hear, I move my tongue to speak, I produce my voice to sound, from this understand and know my soul; you see that you cannot show it, but you command me to know it from its work. Behold, I also will show you my God from His works. Nor will I go further, nor perhaps send your unbelief to those things which you do not understand. I do not recount so the works of my God: He made invisible things, He made visible things, that is, heaven and earth, the sea and all things that are in them. I do not send you through many: I return to you yourself. You certainly live: you have a body, you have a soul; the body is visible, the soul is invisible; the body a dwelling place, the soul the dweller; the body a vehicle, the soul using the vehicle; the body, as it were, the vehicle to be guided, the soul the charioteer of your body. Behold, your senses are manifest, as doors in your body, through which something is announced to the inner soul dwelling: the eyes, ears, smell, taste, touch, arranged members. What that thing inside, whence you think, whence you enliven these things? All this, which you marvel at in yourself, He who made it, He is my God.

It is explained: I am who I am.

Therefore, my brothers, if I have met your minds, if I have met your inner men with some fitting conversation, as I could, if I have reached to those who dwell within clay houses, that is, to your souls inhabiting your bodies, speaking to them, do not conjecture divine things from what you know. God surpasses all things, heaven and earth. Do not put before your eyes, as if some great craftsman were assembling, arranging, contriving, turning, or shaping something; or certainly as if an emperor were sitting in a royal, bright, adorned chair, creating by commanding. Break the idols in your hearts; consider what was said to Moses when he inquired the name of God: "I am who I am." Compared to Him, whatever else exists, does not exist. What truly is, does not know any change. Everything that changes and flows, and ceaselessly changes in some time, was and will be; in it, you do not comprehend existence. But God does not have 'was' and 'will be.' For what was, no longer is; what will be, is not yet; and that which comes so that it passes away, will be so that it is not. Think, if you can, "I am who I am." Do not be thrown around by desires, nor be agitated by voluntary and temporal thoughts. Stand at "is," stand by "itself is." Where are you going? Stand, so you may also be. But when do we hold our fleeting thoughts, and affix them to what remains? When can we? Therefore, God has taken pity; and He who is, and He who said, "This you will tell the Israelites: 'He who is' sent me to you," expresses thereafter the name of His mercy after declaring the name of His substance. What is the name of His substance? "I am who I am." You will say to the Israelites: "He who is sent me to you." But Moses was a man, and he was among those things which, compared to Him, do not exist; he was on earth, in the flesh; and in that flesh, there was a soul, naturally changeable, under the burden of human fragility. For how would he comprehend what was said: "I am who I am"? Indeed, through what appeared to his eyes, He who was unseen, spoke to him, and used Moses, who was seen, as an instrument while God remained hidden. For what Moses saw was not the whole God; because neither [do you] fully capture in my audible voice that I am a man. I have a voice in my heart that does not sound out; the sound passes, the word remains. Thus, when God spoke to a man, the invisible one, through what was visible, spoke, eternal things through temporal things, unchangeable through fragile things, when He said: "I am who I am," and "You will say to the Israelites: 'He who is sent me to you,'" as if Moses could not comprehend what "I am who I am" means, and "He who is sent me to you," or if he did comprehend, we who read it cannot comprehend, subsequently, after the name of His substance, He spoke the name of His mercy. As if He said to Moses: "What I have said, 'I am who I am,' you do not understand; your heart does not remain steadfast, you are not unchangeable with me, nor is your mind immutable. You have heard what I am; hear what you can grasp, hear what you can hope for. God spoke again to Moses: "I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." You cannot grasp the name of My substance: take hold of the name of My mercy. I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." But what I am is eternal: Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are certainly eternal, but I do not say eternal, but made eternal by Him. Indeed, the Lord Himself convinced the Sadducees criticizing Him, who denied the resurrection, by giving them the testimony of holy Scripture: "Read what the Lord said in the bush to Moses: 'I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob.' He is not the God of the dead, but of the living; for all of them are alive." Therefore, also here God did not add, when He said: "I am who I am," "This is My name forever." For no one doubts that what is, is because it is eternal; but when He said: "I am the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob," He added: "This is My name forever." As if He said: "Why are you afraid of the mortality of the human race? Why are you greatly startled, lest, when you have died, you will no longer be? This is My name forever." The name cannot be eternal, "the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob," unless Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob themselves live forever.

Turned to the Lord and prayer. May the power of His mercy strengthen our hearts in His truth, and may it also strengthen and calm our souls; may His grace abound upon us, and may He have mercy on us, and take away scandals from us, from His Church, and from all our dear ones, and may He make us pleasing to Himself by His power and the abundance of His mercy upon us forever. Through Jesus Christ, His Son, our Lord, who lives and reigns with Him and the Holy Spirit for ages of ages. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 223B

Sermon 223/B TREATISE ON THE HOLY NIGHT On this most solemn vigil, Christians must keep watch and pray. Our Lord Jesus Christ, in the fullness of time, about to suffer for our eternal salvation, warned his disciples saying: "Watch and pray, that you may not enter into temptation." Although a Christian should always take care not to let sleep consume him every night, following the example of the Apostle who said: "In watchings often," yet on this night, that the whole world may keep vigil for Christ, a more solemn and holy vigil is appointed; so that what divine mercy did once, human devotion may celebrate with an annual solemnity, and not allow to be erased by forgetfulness. For Christ died once, the just for the unjust. Rising from the dead, he dies now no more, death has no more dominion over him. For in that he died to sin, he died once; but in that he lives, he lives to God. So let us also consider ourselves to be dead to sin, but alive to God in Christ Jesus. This so great a sacrament should always be kept in memory, for the day of the year on which it happened should not pass like other nights; but with the most solemn celebration, it returns to the minds of the devout. Furthermore, the Jews killed Christ to erase his memory from the earth. This is what is rendered to them meantime, except for eternal punishment, that the world does not forget their crime by his glorified memory; for whoever admires the light of this night throughout the whole world simultaneously detests the darkness of the Jews. But let us abhor their deed; yet faithfully hold and solemnly celebrate the great good which the Lord bestowed on us from their evil.

We keep watch while Christ sleeps so that we may live by the death which he suffered.

Because this night, dearest brothers, on which we recall the burial of the Lord, we celebrate vigils, let us keep vigil at the time when He slept for us. For He, long before by the Prophet announcing His passion, said: I have slept and arisen, because the Lord has taken me up. He called the Father Lord. Therefore, on the night on which He slept, we keep watch, that we may live by the death He suffered; we celebrate vigils for His temporal sleep, that by His keeping watch for us, we may remain unfailingly awake in eternal vigil. Moreover, He also rose on this night, to whose resurrection our watchful expectation keeps vigil. He was delivered up for our sins, and He slept: He rose for our justification. Hence, on this very night, in which He slept, we keep our vigil, so that in His vigil we might safely one day be free from that sleep; and we watch for the hour of His awakening, lest in our very justification, for which He rose, by creeping negligence, we sleep not in body but in heart. Therefore, let us keep vigil, dearest ones, and pray, lest we enter into temptation.

Sermons - Sermon 223C

SERMON 223/C OF THE HOLY NIGHT The sleep of Christ was of will, not of necessity. Our Lord Jesus Christ, near His Passion, whereby He paid what He did not owe for our debts, so that the bond by which we were held might be canceled by His blood, said to His disciples: "Watch and pray, that you may not enter into temptation." From this exhortation of His, this celebration has been established: that we keep vigil on the anniversary return of that day on which His resurrection was awaited. May He, who slept for our salvation, hear us keeping vigil in His celebration. Indeed, it had been said in prophecy regarding this very matter and in His own person: "I have slept and taken my rest; and I have risen up, because the Lord has taken me up." As if to say: Let not the Jews seem to have prevailed over me; I slept, it was by will, not by necessity. He Himself, indeed, slept as though of His own will, not as though overpowered; He who had the power to lay down His life and to take it up again. Nevertheless, the Jews were not without guilt because He slept by His own power; to demonstrate their crime, He said in another Psalm: "I have slept troubled." For this He referred to them who thought they had troubled Him, whom they insulted as if defeated, and yet, although they had demanded His death with wicked voices, they tried to absolve themselves from His killing; so that it might seem not their act but Pilate's, who handed Him over to be crucified by his soldiers. Therefore the same Psalm immediately says: "Sons of men, their teeth are weapons and arrows, and their tongue a sharp sword." As if to say: And even if not by your own hands, yet by your own mouth you killed Him, whose death you demanded. But what does He say in another Psalm? "Shall not he who sleeps also add that he will rise again?" Behold, He who had slept has risen; He has watched, and He has been made like a solitary sparrow in the rooftop, that is, above heaven, where He intercedes for us, where He now does not die, nor does death have anymore dominion over Him; because He who keeps us neither sleeps nor slumbers. Behold those who thought they had harmed Him, even that kingdom where they did not want Him to reign has been rooted out and perished; so that what He said when about to sleep might also be visibly fulfilled: "Awake me, and I will return it to them." Therefore, humbling our souls, let us celebrate these vigils, so that with a vigilant heart we may hope and await His coming, whose voice will wake all the sleeping even from their tombs: those who have done good unto the resurrection of life; those who have done evil unto the resurrection of judgment. For He is the one, of whose sleep on the cross, Jacob, exalted so long before, prophesied: "Thou hast climbed, lying down, thou hast slept like a lion." He, indeed, has prevailed, the Lion of the tribe of Judah; for Jacob said this when blessing Judah. Since the Lion thus slept, He was counted among the dead; but because the Lion has prevailed, He will come to judge the living and the dead.

Sermons - Sermon 223D

Sermon 223/D ON THE VIGILS OF EASTER Why is the night of Easter preferred over all others?

It is well known to you, dearest brothers - for you are not ignorant of what you are doing - that this vigil dedicated to the Lord, and above all vigils held for the worship of God, is held in such high esteem because it renews in an annual solemnity the memory of the Savior, who was handed over for our offenses and rose for our justification; so that His entire Church, which is His body, can sing: But I will rejoice in the Lord, and I will be glad in God my Savior.

Why the Lord rose at night. For there will be for us, after the night of this age has passed, a resurrection of the flesh unto the kingdom, whose example has preceded us in our Head. For this reason, indeed, the Lord wished to rise at night, because according to the Apostle: "God, who commanded light to shine out of darkness, has shined in our hearts." Therefore, the Lord signified light shining out of darkness by being born at night and also rising at night. For light out of darkness, Christ is from the Jews, to whom it was said: "I have likened your mother to the night." But in that people, as in that night, the Virgin Mary was not night, but in a certain way the star of the night; whence also a star marked her birth, which led the distant night, that is, the Magi from the East, so that they might worship the light; so that in them also what was said might come to pass: "Light shining out of darkness." So that the resurrection and birth of Christ might agree, just as in that new tomb no one had been placed dead before, nor afterward; thus in that virginal womb, no mortal was conceived before, nor afterward. The Paschal vigil prefigures the expectation of the Lord's coming.

Although, therefore, in this our vigil the Lord is not yet awaited as if about to rise again, but the memory of His resurrection is renewed by its annual solemnity, nevertheless, by celebrating this, we remember the past in such a way that we also symbolize something through this same vigil that we do by living in faith. For all this time, during which this age runs like the night, the Church keeps watch with the eyes of faith focused on the holy Scriptures as on nightly lights, until the Lord comes. Hence what the apostle Peter says: We have the more sure prophetic word, to which you do well to pay attention, as to a lamp shining in a dark place, until the day dawns and the morning star rises in your hearts. For this reason, the Savior Himself commands us to keep a spiritual vigil, where, speaking about His sudden coming, He says, "Watch, therefore, for you do not know the day nor the hour." Just as now, I came to you in the name of the Lord and found you watching in His name, so also the Lord Himself, in whose honor this solemnity is celebrated, will find His Church watching with the light of the mind when He comes, so that He may also awaken it from the tombs where the body sleeps.

Sermons - Sermon 223E

Sermon 223/E ON THE VIGILS OF EASTER

Watch and pray so that you do not enter into temptation. Not every temptation is to be feared, but the one in which no way out is given. The great brightness and solemnity of this vigil, brothers, reminding us with annual return of the memory of the Lord's resurrection, admonishes us to recall and do what He Himself said to His disciples about His impending passion: "Watch and pray, so that you do not enter into temptation." Therefore, let us watch and pray, so that we do not enter into temptation, not only on this night but for our entire life, which on earth is a temptation. For it is written: "Is not human life a temptation on earth?" Therefore, if entering into temptation is nothing other than being led or brought into temptation, that is, being deceived and captured, or in any way, to put it briefly, being overcome by temptation, what else is to be done through the entire night of this life, in which we must be the light of faith during the day, than what the Lord advised His disciples: "Watch and pray, so that you do not enter into temptation?" To keep vigilance of the mind means that faith does not sleep, hope does not wither, and charity does not grow cold. With faith vigilant, hope strong, and love fervent, through all this time in which we live in the night of this world, let us say with constant prayer: "Do not lead us into temptation." Thus, by His help, we do what the Lord said: "Watch and pray, so that you do not enter into temptation." If indeed it is not to be feared to enter temptation when we can also exit from it, according to Apostle James saying: "Consider it pure joy, my brothers, whenever you face trials of many kinds," then hope remains in what Apostle Paul said: "God is faithful; he will not let you be tempted beyond what you can bear, but when you are tempted, he will also provide a way out so that you can endure it."

Concerning this way out, it can be understood without absurdity, as we are reminded in the holy Canticle where it reads: "May the Lord guard your coming and going," so that just as clay jars are allowed not only to be well formed when entering the furnace but also to exit whole from it, as it is written: "The furnace tests the potter's vessels, and the trial of affliction tests righteous men." If this is the case, indeed when the Lord said to the disciples: "Watch and pray so that you do not enter into temptation," he saw that the weight of His passion was impending so greatly that He did not want them to enter into that temptation from which He saw they were not yet ready to be allowed to exit. For this reason, He had also said to the most blessed Apostle Peter: "You cannot follow me now, but you will follow later." Although Peter believed he could not only follow but also precede, saying: "I will lay down my life for you," when the strong winds of the Lord's passion besieged and the sea on which they sailed was greatly and deeply troubled, he would have been plunged by the questioning of a single maidservant if he had not immediately been freed by the right hand of the Lord, having obtained mercy through tears. Therefore, brothers, let us watch and pray so that we do not enter into temptation that we cannot bear, and, in whichever we enter, we may either endure it with a given way out, or exit from it with given endurance; so that we do not enter into temptation without exit, like feet into shackles, like a beast into nets, like birds into snares.

Through baptism, just as through the Red Sea, we are freed from darkness. So that we may not suffer, he to whom we sang will grant us: For gloriously he has been magnified; he who already in the washing of regeneration hath granted us that which we sang: he has cast the horse and the rider into the sea. For he has submerged and destroyed in baptism all our past sins, which followed us like from behind. These our darknesses, like their beasts, that is, aids, the unclean spirits did guide, and like riders, they drove where they wanted; and therefore the Apostle calls them rulers of this darkness. Since we are freed from them through baptism, as if through the Red Sea, that is, by the bloodied sanctification of the crucified Lord, let us not turn back in heart to Egypt, but through other temptations of the desert with him as protector and guide, let us strive towards the kingdom.

Sermons - Sermon 223F

Sermon 223/F ON THE EVE OF EASTER Although the speech is not delivered to the ignorant, it nevertheless seeks the attentive. On that night, dearest brothers, when our Lord Jesus Christ rose from the dead, we celebrate the yearly solemnity with this vigil. I am not now teaching, but reminding you not to forget, since you know. For just as the celebration itself arriving at its solemn time does not act to reveal something unusual to us, but rather to prevent by forgetting what we know from being erased - it renews memory, it does not insert knowledge - so also our discourse, even if not brought forth for the unknowing, nevertheless seeks the attentive; for although it does not act so that you hear what you do not know, I still wish it to act so that you remember with joy what you know. The lion seeking to devour and the lion seeking to deliver.

Let us watch and pray so that we do not enter into temptation: For our adversary, like a roaring lion, goes about seeking whom he may devour. But that lion from the tribe of Judah, of whom it was foretold so long before: "You have ascended, lying down you slept like a lion; who will rouse him?" He ascended the cross when he suffered, because he was hung there by the will of the merciful, not by the necessity of the sinner. He lay down sleeping when he, having bowed his head, gave up his spirit. And like a lion, because even in that weakness he was strong; for that which is weak in God is stronger than men; ultimately, by dying he gave life and consumed death by his death. Who raised him up, if not the invisible God? For this reason, who? because he does not appear to human eyes, just as the only-begotten Word of God himself with the Father is invisible. Therefore he raised him from the dead, and gave him a name that is above every name, so that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, and the lion seeking to devour is conquered by the lion seeking to free.

Why one must watch and pray.

Let us therefore watch and pray, so that we do not enter into temptation. Let us keep watch for Him, who willingly slept for us. For He slept, and took rest; and He arose, because the Lord sustained Him, to whom He had said: And raise me up, and I will repay them. He, against the enemies who would rage and taunt the dying one, said in prophecy: Is it not so that he who sleeps will rise again? Therefore, He who slept also awakened, and consecrated this watchfulness of ours to Himself. Let us watch and pray, so that we do not enter into temptation, because He watched, and was made like a solitary sparrow on the roof; therefore He rose, and flew on high, and for us the only one intercedes in heaven. To this great intercessor, let us give our prayers; He grants with the Father what He requested from the Father, because He is both mediator and creator: mediator, to request; creator, to grant: mediator made in the world, creator through whom the world was made. Therefore with most faithful and trustworthy affection let us watch with a sober mind to Him, and let us offer the Prayer which He taught; that we may be able to accomplish what He commanded us to do, with His help; and receive what He promised to give, with His giving.

Sermons - Sermon 223G

Sermon 223 On the Vigils of Easter This festival indicates what eternity will have at the end of time.

This, brothers, holy celebration, which took night from night, driving away the darkness with these lights, and cheering our faith as if it were the day of the heart, is remembered, as you know, in the memory of the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ. For what could be more fitting than that our vigil should celebrate His awakening from the dead, so that the body, though still destined to sleep, might keep watch for the head which is now always awake, and likewise will awake, and with Him, without any sleep, keep perpetual vigilance and reign? For such a great feast fittingly marks a fixed time, which eternity will have without the end of time. Let us watch therefore with the awake Christ, and let us abstain a little as much as we can from sleep, in honor of Him whom sleep does not hold. Let us be in His keeping according to the spirit of true Israel: For He will neither slumber nor sleep, who keeps Israel. Keeping watch with annual solemnity for this ever-watchful guardian, let us bind our heart in the bond of faith in His hand, that being suspended by this religious devotion we may not fall from Him who knows not to sleep; until, whole and entire, having consumed mortality and corruption, we are gathered in His strength, where we can no longer sleep or slumber. Not every vigil is praiseworthy: the end of our vigil does not have an end. This is the fruit of our vigils, this is the end of our intentions not by the eyes of the flesh but of the spirit, this is the just and holy purpose of restraining and curbing sleep, this is the incorruptible reward of labor borne and love awakened, that He, to whom we stay awake by resisting a little earthly drowsiness, may give us life, where there is watchfulness without labor, day without night, rest without sleep. Therefore, staying awake is not praiseworthy in itself, for even thieves stay awake; but they do so to sneak up on the sleep of husbands and reach their wives during the tempting night. Practitioners of magical arts also stay awake; but they do so to serve demons, and with their help commit abominable acts. It is long and unnecessary to recount all the vigils of criminals. But to speak also of certain innocent vigils, craftsmen, farmers, sailors, fishermen, travelers, merchants, administrators of various matters, judges, lawyers, buyers and sellers of letters, those invested with power, those subject to powers, and whatever is in the arts or industry by which human life is conducted, also stay awake; but with the aim that the land may be inhabited more conveniently or more decently by their speedy work. Finally, the end of all such vigilance, whether illicit, is condemned to eternal death, or licit, is consumed by temporal death. But the end of the law is Christ for the righteousness of everyone who believes; in whose view we stay awake, the end is perfection, redeeming us from the end of either damnation or consumption. Therefore, those staying awake either maliciously or innocently still look upon and seek a perishable end; however, our end has no end. Finally, those stay awake in the matter to which they desire to attain, not having a permanent residence; we stay awake and pray that we may not enter into temptation. For thus we overcome the attacker of our journey; thus we grasp the Savior with whom we will stay.

Sermons - Sermon 223H

Sermon 223/H ON THE VIGILS OF EASTER The mountains of God are the holy Apostles who consecrated for us this most holy night.

We celebrate the solemnities of the Lord's humility, who humbled Himself, becoming obedient unto death, even death on a cross. Therefore, on this holy night, we also humble our souls by fasting, keeping vigil, and praying; nor does this zeal differ from that humility. For what is the mustard seed other than the zeal of humility? By this seed, mountains were transported into the heart of the sea, that is, great preachers of the Gospel, the holy Apostles, were transferred from Judea to the nations, and they held the heart of the world itself, that is, the thoughts of the age, those mountains of which it was said: "Your righteousness is like the mountains of God"; those mountains of which it was said: "You wonderfully illuminate from the everlasting mountains." Indeed, those mountains illuminated, fervent in their summits, the light that enlightens every man, like the mountain of mountains, the King of kings, and the holy of holies, they transferred both themselves and the Lord into the heart of the sea, that is, into the faith of the nations; so that what the Prophet had predicted was fulfilled in them: "In the last times, the mountain of the Lord will be made manifest, prepared on the top of the mountains"; and what He Himself had said: "If you have faith as a grain of mustard seed, you will say to this mountain to move from here to the sea, and it will be done." These mountains consecrated for us this night, in which the buried Lord rose again, so that the mustard seed, by humbling itself, would not appear, and by germinating and growing, spreading its branches everywhere, it would overcome all things, and invite those who are lofty in heart to flee and rest, as birds. Let this mountain dwell also in your heart; for it will not suffer confinement, where charity makes a very broad place for it. Turned towards the Lord.

Sermons - Sermon 223I

SERMON 223/I In the Vigils of Easter Carnal enemies seemed to have prevailed over Christ, but the spiritual enemy was overcome in them. This great and holy solemnity, beloved, admonishes us to exhort you to watch and pray. For our faith battles against the night of this age, lest the inner eyes of our hearts fall asleep into the night. To avoid falling into this evil, let us pray with the voice we read, and say to our Lord God: "Enlighten my eyes lest I ever sleep in death, lest my enemy say: 'I have prevailed against him.'" This is that enemy who stirred up the insane Jews against our Lord Jesus Christ as if they were his own vessels and weapons; but he did not prevail against him. Carnal enemies indeed seemed to have prevailed; but the spiritual enemy was conquered in them. For the impure spirit was defeated by the victim of pure flesh; and in that very fact that he inflamed men to openly do what they willed, he secretly suffered what he did not will. For by killing Christ he shed blood, by which those he killed were revived. But he does not possess that one among the dead. For he grieved at those linked to the resurrected one, whom he wished to link to the dying one. We celebrate the death of this one in this life, whose life after this death we hope for. Therefore, with our humility let us recall the humility of our Lord Jesus Christ. Let us humbly watch, humbly pray, with the purest faith, the firmest hope, the most fervent charity, thinking what kind of day our brightness will have if our humility turns the night into day. Therefore, God, who said, "Let light shine out of darkness," may shine in our hearts so that we make something similar inside, like we did in this place of prayer with the lamps lit. Let us adorn the true dwelling of God, our conscience, with the lights of righteousness. Not ourselves, but the grace of God with us, whose promise we have, the prophet saying: "He will bring forth your righteousness as the light." And so, watching, we will not fear the terror of the night nor the business that walks around in the dark; and when the beasts of the forest have passed, seeking food for themselves from God, he will not hand over to troublesome food anyone who handed over his only one for us. Turned to the Lord.

Sermons - Sermon 223J

Sermon 223/J

"Let all the world be silent before the face of the Lord; at his coming, the whole earth shall tremble, and every knee shall bow, both in heaven and on earth and under the earth. For that very great and terrible day of the Lord is near, in which the elements shall melt with fervent heat, and the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up. Be ready, brothers, and watch night and day with all prayer and supplication, that when the sudden and unforeseen hour comes, we may be found worthy to escape all these things which are to come to pass, and to stand before the Son of Man." ON THE VIGIL OF EASTER Let us watch in the flesh and pray so that we may come to the place where we may watch in the flesh without end. The blessed Apostle, when he exhorted us about praying, at the same time also exhorted us about watching: "Continue in prayer, and watch in the same." Unclean love, brothers, compels those it possesses to watch. The shameless one watches to corrupt; the wicked one, to harm; the drunkard, to drink; the robber, to kill; the extravagant one, to squander; the greedy one, to collect; the thief, to steal; the plunderer, to seize. How much more, therefore, should love in the holy and innocent watch, if iniquity extorts watches from the flagitious and criminal? But they are pressed by the deep sleep of the heart, so they are compelled to watch by the flesh. Against this sleep it is cried: "Awake, you who sleep, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give you light." But in us, this voice has broken the sleep of this world if we have listened and arisen from the dead, of whom it has been said: "Let the dead bury their dead." Meanwhile, let us render the watchfulness of the flesh to celebration; but let us hold perpetual watchfulness of the heart with Christ illuminating. Let us watch with the flesh as much as we can, so that we may pray; and let us pray, so we may come to where we also watch without end with the flesh. For the angels do not sleep, whose equality is promised to us on the day of resurrection, if now love watches in us.

Sermons - Sermon 223K

Sermon 223/K ON THE EVE OF EASTER The sleep of the flesh and the sleep of the heart.

Blessed apostle Paul: "All of you," he says, "are children of light and children of the day; we are not of the night nor of darkness. Therefore, let us not sleep as others do, but let us be vigilant and sober. For those who sleep, sleep at night, and those who get drunk, get drunk at night. But we who are of the day are sober." What kind of night is this, brothers, in which the Truth does not want us to be, in which He says those who sleep are? And what kind of sleep is this from which He distinguishes us, the children of light and day, and from which He speaks so that we do not sleep? Undoubtedly, this is not the night whose beginning is the setting of the sun, but the fall of man, nor is it the night which ends with the dawning of the aurora, but the renewal of the soul. In this night, even the evil wakeful ones sleep; in this night, even the sleeping good ones are not. This common night, by coming, ends the day; that damnable night took us away from that day which made this day. This sleep, which we now resist by being vigilant, receives an innocent death with dulled senses; that sleep, in which the unfaithful sleep in their hearts, pushes the inner eyes into death. Against this one, let us hear: "Watch and pray"; against that one, let us say: "Enlighten my eyes, lest I ever sleep in death." Therefore, solemnly against the sleep of the body, we hold these lights in the night to be vigilant; truly, against that sleep of the heart, as if in the night of this world, we ourselves must be the lights.

Sermons - Sermon 224

SERMO 224 ON THE DAY OF EASTER The baptized are mingled with the people of God; let them choose whom they may imitate. On this day, baptized in Christ and regenerated into the whole people of God, with the solemn celebration of the sacraments, you should mix. Let us address them, and you in them and they in you. Behold, you have become members of Christ. If you consider what you have become, all your bones will say: Lord, who is like you? For this dignity cannot be fittingly thought of. Does not every word and thought fail regarding the gratuitous grace that has come to you, without preceding merits? And thus it is called grace because it was freely given. What grace? That you might be members of Christ, the Son of God, and also his brothers. If he is the only one, how are you brothers, unless he is the only one by nature, you are brothers by grace? Therefore, since you are members of Christ, I admonish you. Let those to whom you will be mixed hear me. Today I fear for you, not so much from pagans, not so much from Jews, not so much from heretics, but from bad Catholics. Choose among the people of God those whom you should imitate. For if you wish to imitate the crowd, you will not be among the few who walk the narrow path. Abstain from plundering, fraud, and perjury. Let the abyss of drunkenness be repelled from you. Fear fornications as you would death, not the death that separates the soul from the body, but where the soul will burn forever with the body. The Devil persuades that the sins of incontinence are trivial.

I know the devil plays his part, and does not cease to speak in the hearts of those he draws to his side by seducing them. I know that to fornicators and adulterers who are not satisfied with their spouses, the devil says in their hearts: "Fleshly sins are not great." Against this, against the devil's whispering we must hold Christ's incantation. Because the enemy deceives Christians through the allure of flesh, making what is grave seem light to them, but by lying, not by doing it truthfully. What use is it that Satan makes light what Christ shows to be grave? What use is it that a great weight of misfortune is lightly measured on the scales of falsehood? What use is it that the devil tells you something is light which God tells you is grave? Will you not find what God told you to be grave, and will the enemy who promised you be far from you? Does the devil do something new? He tells faithful Christians: "What you do is nothing: you sin in your flesh. For you do not sin in spirit. It is easily erased, easily forgiven." What great thing does he do? It is the same trick he used in paradise: "You will not die." God had said: On the day you eat it, you will die. The enemy came and said: "Why, because God told you: You will die? You will not die, but when you eat it, your eyes will be opened, and you will be like gods." God's threat was dismissed, the devil's promise was heard. God's threat was found to be true, and the devil's deception false. But what did it profit, I ask you, what did it profit that the woman said: The serpent led me, and the man himself said: The woman you gave to be with me handed it to me and I ate? Did the excuse prevail and was damnation not followed? The incontinent are rebuked so that they may not delay conversion.

Therefore I say to you, my brothers, my sons. You who have wives, know nothing else. You who do not have wives, and want to take one, keep yourself pure for them, just as you wish them to come to you pure. Those of you who have promised celibacy, do not look back. Behold, I have said to you. I have freed myself. The Lord has made me a steward, not an enforcer. And yet where we can, where it is granted, where it is permitted, where we know, we correct, we rebuke, we anathematize, we excommunicate. And yet we do not correct. Because neither he who plants is anything, nor he who waters, but it is God who gives the increase. And now because I speak to you, because I frighten you, because I warn you, it is necessary for God to hear me, and to do something silently in your hearts. I speak briefly, and this I commend to you. I frighten the faithful, and I build you up. You are the members of Christ, do not listen to me, listen to the Apostle: Taking therefore the members of Christ, should I make them the members of a prostitute? Someone might say: But she is not a prostitute, she is my concubine. Do you have a wife, who says this? I do. Therefore, whether you want it or not, she is a prostitute. Go, and say that the bishop has wronged you, if you have a wife, and another woman sleeps with you. Whoever she is, she is a prostitute. But perhaps she keeps faith with you, and knows no one but you, and does not plan to know another. Therefore, if she is chaste, why do you fornicate? If she has one, why do you have two? It is not permitted, it is not permitted, it is not permitted. They go into Gehenna. Or at least I am free from this. Or at least let me say what is true. Let those who are such correct themselves while they live. Suddenly death comes, and there is no one to be corrected. When the last hour comes is unknown. When it is said tomorrow, tomorrow, it becomes a raven: it goes, and does not return. But you listen to me, baptized ones; you listen to me, infants; you listen to me, regenerated through Christ. I beseech you by the altar you have approached, by the sacraments you have received, by the name that has been invoked upon you, by the future judgment of the living and the dead, I beseech, adjure, and bind you by the name of Christ; do not imitate them, unless you know those who are faithful to be such. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 225

SERMO 225 ON THE DAY OF EASTER To the infants.

What was Christ before the incarnation. The Son of God, born timelessly from the Father, commends to us the depth of divine grace regarding us. For what was He before He existed in man? Imagine you have asked and said. We believe, brethren, that before Christ was born of the Virgin Mary, He was, was He not? Imagine we are asking about what is not permitted to doubt. To these thoughts, the Lord Himself responded when He was told: "You are not yet fifty years old, and have you seen Abraham?" For He answered and said: "Amen, amen I say to you, before Abraham was, I am." Therefore He was, but He was not yet man. Lest someone perhaps say, He was an angel; the Holy Gospel tells you that He was Christ. And you are wondering what He was? In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God. Behold, what He was: In the beginning was the Word. The Word was not made at the beginning, but the Word was. But hear what Scripture says about this world: In the beginning God made heaven and earth. You ask through what He made them? In the beginning was the Word, through which heaven and earth were made. It was not made, but the Word was. Now it remains to ask what kind of Word: because our words are also called words. Our words indeed are conceived in thought, born in voice; and yet conceived and uttered, they pass away. But what about that Word? And the Word was with God. Say where it was, say what it was. I have already said. The Holy Gospel said to you: In the beginning was the Word. Say where it was, say what it was. And the Word was with God. But I asked what kind of Word it was. Do you want to hear what it was? And the Word was God. O Word! What kind of Word? Who can explain: And the Word was God. But perhaps it was made by God? Far from it. Hear what the Holy Gospel says: All things were made through Him. What is: All? Whatever was made by God was made through Him. And how was He made who made all things? Could He have made Himself? Ultimately, if He made Himself, He existed to make Himself. If therefore He was to make Himself, He was never not existing. The incarnation of Christ is the work of the Holy Spirit. The purpose of virginity in Mary.

How is such a Word in a virgin? All things were made through him. What is: All things? Whatever was made by God, was made through him. Do not, brother, separate the Holy Spirit from such a great work. From which great work? Not a small work, the Angels are a great work: the Angels adore the flesh of Christ sitting at the right hand of the Father. Therefore, such a work was chiefly performed by the Holy Spirit. In this work, he was designated by name when the future son was announced to the holy Virgin by an angel. Because she had resolved to remain in virginity, and her husband was not a despoiler, but a protector of her chastity: indeed, not a protector, because God was protecting; but her husband was a witness of her virginal chastity, lest she be thought pregnant by adultery: when the angel announced to her, she said: How will this be, since I do not know a man? If she had intended to know, she would not have been astonished. That astonishment is a testimony of her resolution: How will this be, since I do not know a man? How will it be? And the angel to her: The Holy Spirit will come upon you. Behold how what you ask will be: And the power of the Most High will overshadow you. Therefore, the holy one to be born of you will be called the Son of God. And he well said: Will overshadow you: lest your virginity feel the heat of lust. And when she was pregnant, it was said of her: Mary was found to be with child by the Holy Spirit. Therefore, the Holy Spirit worked the flesh of Christ. The only-begotten Son of God also worked his own flesh. From where do we prove this? Because Scripture says: Wisdom has built for herself a house.

Although in the Virgin's womb, the Word did not leave heaven.

Therefore, take notice. Such a great God, God with God, the Word of God through whom all things were made, how is He enclosed in a womb? First, to be in the womb, did the Word leave heaven? To be in the Virgin's womb, did the Word leave heaven? And from where would the Angels live if the Word left heaven? But so that man might eat the bread of Angels, the Lord of Angels became man. Let the human mind still wander through its mists, falter, seek, speak, to find out how the Word of God in the Virgin's womb, through whom all things were made, did not abandon the Angels, did not abandon the Father. How could He be enclosed in that womb? He could be there, but not be enclosed. How, he says, could so great a being be in such a small place? Therefore, the womb held what the world does not hold. Nor was He diminished to be in the womb. He was in the womb, and He was so great. How great was He? Say how great He was, say what He was. The analogy between the word of man and the Word of God which was with God. And the Word was with God. Say what it was. And the Word was God. And I know, I say, with whom I speak; nor do I comprehend: but thought makes us extend, extension expands us, expansion makes us capable. Nor will we, having become capable, be able to comprehend everything: but I speak to you with my word. Behold what I say, what I will say, listen to this, comprehend this my word, this is a human word. But if you cannot comprehend this either, see how far you are from it. Surely we marvel how Christ took flesh, was born of a virgin, and did not depart from the Father: behold, I who speak to you, before I came to you, I thought beforehand what I would say to you. When I thought what I would say to you, already the word was in my heart. For I would not say it to you, unless I had thought before. I found you a Latin, a Latin word must be conveyed to you. But if you were Greek, I should have to speak to you in Greek and convey a Greek word to you. That word in the heart is neither Latin nor Greek: it completely precedes those tongues which is in my heart. I seek for it a sound, I seek as it were a vehicle; I seek whence it may come to you, while it does not leave me. Behold, you have heard what is in my heart, now it is also in yours. It is in mine and in yours: and you have begun to possess it, and I have not lost it. Just as my word took on a sound, by which it might be heard: so the Word of God took on flesh, by which it might be seen. As much as I could, I have said. And what have I said? Who have I said? I, a man, wanted to speak of God. He is so great, so transcendent, that we can neither speak about Him adequately, nor should we remain silent about Him. Do not get drunk on wine, but be filled with the Holy Spirit.

Thank you, Lord, because what I say, or wanted to say, you know: yet from the crumbs of your table I have fed my fellow servants; feed and nourish inwardly those you have regenerated. Behold, what was this multitude? Darkness: but now light in the Lord. For the Apostle says to such as these: You were once darkness, but now you are light in the Lord. O you who have been baptized, you were once darkness, but now you are light in the Lord. If light, certainly day: for God called the light day. You were darkness, He made you light, He made you day: concerning you we have sung: This is the day which the Lord has made; let us rejoice and be glad in it. Flee from darkness. Drunkenness pertains to darkness. Do not depart sober and return drunk: and after noon we will see you. The Holy Spirit has begun to dwell, let Him not migrate: do not exclude Him from your hearts. A good guest, He finds you empty, He fills you: He finds you hungry, He feeds you: finally, He finds you thirsty, He intoxicates you. Let Him intoxicate you: for the Apostle says: Do not get drunk on wine, in which is all debauchery. And as if wishing to teach us from what we should be intoxicated: But be filled, he says: with the Holy Spirit; singing psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs to one another, singing and making melody in your hearts to the Lord. He who rejoices in the Lord and sings praises to the Lord with great exultation, is he not similar to a drunkard? I commend this drunkenness: For with you, God, is the fountain of life, and in your pleasure stream you shall give them drink. From where? For with you, God, is the fountain of life, and in your light we shall see light. The Spirit of God is both drink and light. If you were to find a fountain in the darkness, you would light a lamp to reach it. Do not light a lamp to the fountain of light: it shines for you, and leads you to it. When you come to drink, approach and be illuminated. Approach Him, and be enlightened: do not depart, lest you be darkened. Lord God, call, and let there be an approach to you: confirm it, so that there is no departure. Make your children new, from infants to elders, but not from elders to the dead. For in this wisdom it is permitted to grow old, it is not permitted to die.

Sermons - Sermon 226

SERMO 226 ON THE DAY OF EASTER To the people and to the infants.

Children are the days in which one must rejoice and be glad. So you have heard the Lord Christ preached, because in the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. He is indeed the Lord Christ, who, if He had not humbled Himself, but had always willed thus to remain, man would have perished. We acknowledge the Word God with God, we acknowledge the only-begotten Son equal to the Father, we acknowledge light from light, day from day. He is the day who made the day: begotten from day, not made from day. If therefore the day is begotten from day, not made; who is the day that the Lord made? Why day? Because it is light. And God called the light day. Let us seek which day the Lord made, that we may rejoice and be glad in it. In the first creation of the world it is read that darkness was upon the face of the deep, and the Spirit of God was moving upon the waters. And God said, Let there be light; and there was light. And God divided the light from the darkness; and God called the light day, and the darkness He called night. Behold the day that the Lord has made. But is He the one in whom we ought to rejoice and be glad? There is another day which the Lord has made, which we ought to recognize more, and rejoice and be glad in it. For it has been said to the faithful who believe in Christ: You are the light of the world. If light, certainly day: because He called the light day. For the Spirit of God was also moving upon the waters yesterday, and darkness was upon the face of the deep, when these Infants were still bearing their sins. Therefore, when their sins were remitted by the Spirit of God, then God said: Let there be light; and there was light. Behold the day that the Lord has made, let us rejoice and be glad in it. Let us address this day with apostolic words. O day which the Lord has made, you were once darkness: but now you are light in the Lord. You were, He says, once darkness. You were, or were you not? Recall your deeds, if you were not. Look at your consciences, from which you have renounced. Therefore, because you were once darkness, but now light, not in yourselves, but in the Lord; walk as children of light. Let these few words suffice for you, for we are both after labor, and today we must discuss the Sacraments of the altar with the Infants.

Sermons - Sermon 227

SERMO 227 The Habit of the Holy Day of Easter TO INFANTS, CONCERNING THE SACRAMENTS The eucharistic bread: if you have received it well, you are what you have received. The mysteries of the eucharistic sacrifice are explained.

I am mindful of my promise. For I had promised to you, who have been baptized, a discourse wherein I would explain the Sacrament of the Lord's table, which you now also see and of which you were made partakers last night. You ought to know what you have received, what you are to receive, what you must receive daily. That bread which you see on the altar, sanctified by the word of God, is the body of Christ. That cup, or rather what the cup contains, sanctified by the word of God, is the blood of Christ. By these, the Lord Christ willed to commend his body and blood, which he shed for us for the remission of sins. If you have received well, you are what you have received. For the Apostle says: "We, being many, are one bread, one body." Thus did he expound the Sacrament of the Lord's table: "We, being many, are one bread, one body." It is commended to you in this bread how you ought to love unity. For was that bread made from one grain? Were there not many wheat grains? But before they came to the form of bread, they were separate; they were joined together by water after a certain crushing. For unless the wheat is ground and sprinkled with water, it cannot come to that form which is called bread. So you also were, in a sense, ground by the abasing of fasting and the sacrament of exorcism. Baptism came and, as if you were sprinkled with water, you came to the form of bread. But there is still no bread without fire. What, then, does the fire signify, that is, the anointing of the oil? Indeed, fire is the nourishment, the sacrament, of the Holy Spirit. Observe in the Acts of the Apostles when it is read; for this book has now begun to be read: today begins the book called the Acts of the Apostles. Whoever wishes to make progress has the means. When you come together at the church, put away vain stories; be attentive to the Scriptures. We are your books. Therefore, pay heed and see where the Holy Spirit will come: He will come in fiery tongues. For He breathes love by which we burn for God and despise the world and our chaff is consumed, and our hearts are purified like gold. Therefore, the Holy Spirit comes, after the water, the fire, and you become bread, which is the body of Christ. And thus unity is in some way signified. You hold the sacraments in their order. First, after the prayer, you are admonished to lift up your hearts; this befits the members of Christ. For if you have become members of Christ, where is your head? Members have a head. If the head had not gone before, the members would not follow. Where did our head go? What did you recite in the Creed? On the third day, He rose again from the dead, He ascended into heaven, He sits at the right hand of the Father. Therefore, our head is in Heaven. Thus when it is said: Lift up your hearts, you answer: We have them with the Lord. And so that you do not attribute the fact that you have your hearts with the Lord to your own strengths, merits, or labors—for it is a gift of God to have your heart lifted up to Him—the bishop or the priest who offers the sacrifice continues and says—when the people respond: We have them with the Lord—: Let us give thanks to the Lord our God, because we have our hearts with the Lord. Let us give thanks because if he did not give it, we would have our hearts on earth. And you attest by saying: It is right and just, that we should give thanks to Him who made us have our hearts lifted up to our head. Then, after the sanctification of God's sacrifice, because he willed that we ourselves should be his sacrifice—this was shown when the first sacrifice of God was laid down and we—meaning the sign of the reality—which we are; behold where the sanctification has been accomplished, we say the Lord’s Prayer, which you have received and rendered. After it has been said: Peace be with you, and the Christians give each other a holy kiss. It is a sign of peace: as the lips show, let it be done in conscience, that is, just as your lips approach your brother’s lips, let your heart not depart from his heart. Great indeed are the sacraments and very great indeed. Do you wish to know how they are commended? The Apostle says: Whosoever shall eat of the body of Christ or drink of the cup of the Lord unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord. What does it mean to receive unworthily? To receive it contemptuously, to receive it scoffingly. Do not make it seem cheap to you, because you see it. What you see passes away, but what is signified, the invisible, does not pass, but remains. Behold, it is received, eaten, consumed. Does the body of Christ perish? Does the Church of Christ perish? Do the members of Christ perish? By no means. Here they are cleansed, there they are crowned. Therefore, what is signified remains, even though that which signifies might seem to pass away. So, therefore, receive it in such a way that you consider yourselves, have unity in your heart, always have your heart lifted up. Let your hope not be on earth, but in heaven; let your faith be firm in God, acceptable to God. Because what you do not see here now and believe, you will see there, where you will rejoice without end.

Sermons - Sermon 228

SERMO 228 ON THE DAY OF EASTER To the people and to the children.

Let other faithful provide examples of goodness for the infants.

After the labor of the preceding night, since although the spirit is willing, the flesh is weak, I should not hold you long with a sermon, yet I owe you a sermon. These days, during which after the passion of our Lord we sing Alleluia to God, we celebrate festively in joy until Pentecost, when the promised Holy Spirit was sent from heaven. Of these days, the seven or eight which are now passing, are dedicated to the Sacraments of the Infants. Those who were recently called Competentes, are now called Infants. They were called Competentes because they knocked, requesting to be born from the maternal womb; they are called Infants because they are now born in Christ, who before were born in the world. In them what is renewed should be firm in you: and you who are already faithful, should offer them examples not by which they may perish, but by which they may progress. For those newly born observe you, how you, the already born, live. This also occurs with those born according to Adam: first, they are small; later, when they begin to understand, they look at the ways of their elders to see what to imitate. And since the younger follows where the elder leads, it is desirable that the elder walks a good path, so that neither the elder nor the younger perish by following. Therefore, you, brothers, who are now in a way parents by the age of regeneration, I address you and exhort you, that you live in such a way that you rejoice with those who imitate you and do not perish. A newly born observes some unknown faithful drunkard; I fear he may say to himself: Why is he faithful and drinks so much? He observes some userer, a sorrowful giver, a harsh exactor, and says to himself: I will do the same. It is replied to him: You are now faithful, do not do it; you are baptized, you are reborn, hope has changed, let your habits change. And he says: Why are he and he faithful? I do not wish to say more; for who can recall everything? Therefore, my brothers, when you live badly, you who are already faithful, you will give a bad account to God both about yourselves and about them.

He encourages children to imitate the good.

I now address you, that you may be as grains on the threshing floor, not follow the chaff carried by the wind, with which they perish; but may remain with the weight of charity, that you may arrive at the kingdom of immortality. Therefore, you brothers, you children, you new sprouts of the mother Church, I beseech you by what you have received, that you may attend to Him who called you, who loved you, who sought after you when lost, who illuminated you when found, that you not follow the ways of the lost, in which the name of the faithful goes astray: for it is not asked what they are called, but whether they align with their name. If one is born, where is the new life? If one is faithful, where is the faith? I hear the name, let me recognize the reality as well. Choose for yourselves those whom you may imitate, fearing God, entering the church of God with fear, diligently hearing the word of God, retaining it in your memory, meditating on it in thought, fulfilling it in deeds; choose for yourselves those whom you may imitate. Do not let your heart say: And where will we find such people? Be such, and you will find such. Every similar thing adheres to its like: if you live a lost life, only the lost will join you. Begin to live well, and you will see how many companions surround you, from what great brotherhood you rejoice. Finally, do not find what to imitate? Be what another may imitate. A sermon suitable for children, about the sacrament of the altar.

We must deliver a sermon today to the children about the Sacrament of the altar. We have discussed with them the sacrament of the Creed, which they should believe in: we have discussed the sacrament of the Lord's Prayer, how they should pray; and of the sacrament of the font and Baptism. All these things they have heard discussed and received when handed over to them: but about the sacrament of the sacred altar, which they saw today, they have heard nothing yet; today, a sermon about this matter is owed to them. Therefore, this sermon ought to be brief, both for our sake and for their edification.

Sermons - Sermon 228A

SERMON 228/A On the Day of the Nativity of the Holy Martyrs

1. Our joy and the exultation of the church is always in the confession of the martyrs. Certainly, in the whole world, even outside the Christian name, the saints of God are celebrated. If anyone is accused of Christianity, glory is found in their accusation. Indeed, they are the people who, enduring all manner of punishment and weariness for the name of Christ, were not subjugated, but rather emerged as victors.

2. Today, however, beloved, we celebrate those by whose sufferings the Christian people attain the summit of faith. These are the athletes of Christ, whose dedication amidst severe persecutions did not betray the faith.

3. The strength of our martyrs is a testimony for us, teaching us to conquer in trials and persevere in faith. Hence, dearest brothers and sisters, let us celebrate with exultation, venerating the birthday of the holy martyrs. Let us also, as they did, strengthen our faith and prepare ourselves for the confession of the name of Christ with invincible constancy. May competing with the martyrs in our hearts lead us to the eternal reward, promised to the sufferers for the name of Christ.

Amen. FROM THE SERMON ON THE RESURRECTION OF THE LORD Bede and Florus to the Romans 6

[FRAGMENT] The sacrament of new life. For he who has died has died to sin once for all; but he who lives, lives to God. So you also must consider yourselves dead to sin but alive to God in Christ Jesus. This is the sacrament in which those who are baptized experience the end of the old life and begin the new entrance. Hence the same says: Therefore we have been buried with him by baptism into death; so that just as Christ was raised from the dead, we too might walk in newness of life. Through this sacrament, let us recognize that we are dead to sin with Christ and live to righteousness in Christ. On the cross is the pain of the confessors; in the grave, the rest of the absolved; in the resurrection, the life of the righteous.

Sermons - Sermon 228B

Sermon 228/B ON THE SACRAMENTS ON EASTER DAY The sacrifice of our time, how great and noble. The obligation of giving a sermon and the care with which we have labored over you, so that Christ may be formed in you, compels us to admonish your infancy, who, now reborn from water and the Spirit, behold this food and drink on this Lord's table with new light, and receive it with newfound piety. What does such a great and divine sacrament mean, such a clear and noble remedy, such a pure and easy sacrifice, which is now offered not in one earthly city of Jerusalem, nor in that tabernacle made by Moses, nor in that temple built by Solomon, which were shadows of things to come, but from the rising of the sun to its setting, as foretold by the Prophets, it is immolated, and according to the grace of the New Testament is offered to God as a victim of praise. No longer is a bloody sacrifice sought from the flocks of animals, neither is a sheep or goat brought to the divine altars, but the sacrifice of our time is the body and blood of the priest himself. For of him it was foretold long before in the Psalms: You are a priest forever according to the order of Melchizedek. And what Melchizedek, the priest of the most high God, brought forth bread and wine, when he blessed our father Abraham, we read and hold in the book of Genesis. In the bread, the body of Christ must be recognized; in the cup, the blood.

Therefore Christ our Lord, who by suffering for us offered that which he received from us by being born, made the prince of priests forever, gave the order of sacrifice which you see, without a doubt of his body and blood. For his body, struck by a spear, emitted water and blood, by which he dismissed our sins. Mindful of this grace, working out your own salvation, since it is God who works in you, approach with fear and trembling to the participation of this altar. Recognize in the bread, what hung on the cross; in the chalice, what flowed from his side. For even those old sacrifices of the people of God prefigured this one to come by varied diversity. For Christ himself is both the lamb for the innocence of his simple mind, and the goat for the likeness of sinful flesh. And whatever else was foreshadowed in many and diverse ways in the sacrifices of the Old Testament pertains to this one thing revealed in the New Testament.

Through the Eucharist we are converted into the body of Christ.

Therefore, take and eat the body of Christ, you who have already been made members of Christ in the body of Christ; take and drink the blood of Christ. Do not be dissolved, eat your bond; do not consider yourselves vile, drink your price. As this is converted into you when you eat and drink it, so also you are converted into the body of Christ when you live obediently and piously. For He Himself, with His passion already approaching, while making Passover with His disciples, took the bread, blessed it, and said: This is my body, which will be given up for you. Similarly, He gave the blessed cup saying: This is my blood of the New Testament, which will be shed for many for the remission of sins. This you either read or heard in the Gospel, but you did not know that this Eucharist is the Son: now, however, having been sprinkled in heart with a pure conscience, and having washed the body with clean water, approach Him, and be enlightened, and your faces will not be ashamed. For if you receive this worthily, which pertains to the New Testament, through which you hope for eternal inheritance, holding the new commandment that you love one another, you have life in you. For you receive that flesh, of which life itself says: The bread which I will give is my flesh for the life of the world; and: Unless one eats my flesh and drinks my blood, he will not have life in himself. The Eucharist is a sign of unity in one body.

Therefore, having life in Him, you will be in one flesh with Him. For this sacrament does not commend the body of Christ so as to separate you from it. For the Apostle recalls that this was foretold in Holy Scripture: "The two will become one flesh." This sacrament, he said, is great; but I speak in Christ and in the Church. And in another place, about the same Eucharist, he says: "We, being many, are one bread, one body." Therefore, you begin to receive what you have also started to be, if you do not receive it unworthily, so that you do not eat and drink judgment upon yourselves. For thus it says: "Whoever eats the bread or drinks the cup of the Lord unworthily will be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord. Let a man examine himself, and so eat of the bread and drink of the cup; for he who eats and drinks unworthily eats and drinks judgment to himself."

He receives worthily who maintains the unity of faith and charity

"But you will worthily receive it if you beware of the leaven of false doctrine, that you may be unleavened in sincerity and truth; or if you hold onto that leaven of charity, which a woman hid in three measures of meal until the whole was leavened. For this woman is the Wisdom of God, made through the Virgin in mortal flesh, who spreads her Gospel throughout the whole world, which was restored after the flood by the three sons of Noah, as in three measures, until the whole is leavened. This is the whole, which in Greek is called olon, where you will be keeping the bond of peace according to the whole, which is called catholon, and from which the term 'Catholic' is derived."

Sermons - Sermon 229

SERMO 229 Of the Sacraments of the Faithful Holy Sunday Easter We, made the body of Christ, are what we receive.

What you see here, beloved, on the table of the Lord, is bread and wine; but this bread and this wine by the word become the body and blood of the Word. For the Lord, who in the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God, because of His mercy, by which He did not despise what He created in His own image, the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, as you know; for the Word also assumed man, that is, the soul and flesh of man, and became man, remaining God. Because of this, because He also suffered for us, He entrusted to us in this sacrament His body and blood, which He also made us ourselves. For we too have become His body, and by His mercy, what we receive, we are. Remember what this creature was once in the field, how the earth bore it, the rain nurtured it, brought it to the ear; then human labor carried it to the threshing floor, threshed it, winnowed it, stored it, brought it forth, ground it, wetted it, baked it, and scarcely ever brought it to bread. Remember also yourselves: you were not, and you were created, you were brought to the Lord’s threshing floor, you were threshed by the labors of oxen, that is, by those who announce the Gospel. When you were catechumens, you were kept in the granary. You gave your names; you began to be ground by fasts and exorcisms. Afterward, you came to the water, and you were wetted, and you became one. With the coming fervor of the Holy Spirit, you were baked, and you became the bread of the Lord.

Just as you see that what has been made is one, so you also be one.

Behold what you have received. Even as you see that what has been made is one, so be you one, loving one another, holding one faith, one hope, undivided charity. When heretics receive this, they receive it as testimony against themselves; for they seek division, whereas this bread signifies unity. Likewise, the wine was in many grapes, and now it is in one; it is one in the sweetness of the cup, but after the pressing of the winepress. And you, after those fasts, after labors, after humility and contrition, have now come in the name of Christ as to the cup of the Lord; and there you are at the table, and there you are in the cup. You are this with us: for we take this together, we drink together, for we live together. The mysteries of the eucharistic sacrifice are explained.

You will hear what you also heard yesterday, but today it is explained to you what you heard, and what you responded, or perhaps when the response was given you remained silent, but what should be responded today you learned yesterday. After the salutation that you know, that is: The Lord be with you, you heard: Lift up your hearts. The whole life of true Christians is: Lift up your hearts; not Christians in name only, but Christians in reality and truth, the whole life is lift up your hearts. What does it mean: Lift up your hearts? Hope in God, not in yourself; for you are below, God is above. If you have hope in yourself, the heart is below, not above. Therefore, when you hear from the priest: Lift up your hearts, you respond: We lift them to the Lord. Strive to respond truly, because you are responding before the acts of God; let it be as you say; let not the tongue speak and the conscience deny. And because this very thing, to have your heart above, is given to you by God, not by your own strength, therefore it follows, when you say you have your hearts above to the Lord, the priest follows and says: Let us give thanks to the Lord our God. From where do we give thanks? Because we have our hearts above, and unless He had lifted it, we would lie on the ground. And from there what is done in the holy prayers which you will hear, so that with the added word it becomes the body and blood of Christ. For take away the word, it is bread and wine: add the word, and it is now something else. And what is that something else? The body of Christ, and the blood of Christ. Therefore take away the word, it is bread and wine; add the word, and it will become a sacrament. To this you say: Amen. To say Amen is to subscribe. Amen in Latin means "true". Then the Lord's Prayer is said, which you have already received and returned. Why is it said before receiving the body and blood of Christ? Because, as human frailty is, if perhaps our thought has conceived any inappropriate thing, if the tongue has uttered anything inappropriate, if the eye has looked at anything as it should not, if the ear has heard anything too pleasing that it should not, if perhaps such things have been contracted by the temptation of this world and the frailty of human life, it is cleansed by the Lord's Prayer, where it is said: Forgive us our debts, so that we may approach safely, lest we eat and drink what we receive to our condemnation. After this it is said: Peace be with you. A great sacrament, the kiss of peace; kiss in such a way that you love. Do not be Judas: Judas the traitor kissed Christ with his mouth, while he plotted with his heart. But perhaps someone has an inimical mind against you, and you cannot convince him, admonish him: you are compelled to endure. Do not return evil for evil in your heart; he hates, you love, and you kiss securely. You have heard few things, but great; let them not seem insignificant because of their fewness, but let them be dear by their weight. Also, you are not to be burdened, so that you may retain what has been said.

Sermons - Sermon 229A

SERMON 229/A Treatise on the Holy Sunday of Easter The mystery of the body of Christ is the sacrament of unity.

You who have been regenerated into new life, for which reason you are called infants; you especially who see in this way, understand what these things mean, as we promised you, listen. Listen also, you the faithful, who are accustomed to see; it is good to remember, lest forgetting creep in. What you see on the Lord's table, as far as the appearance of those things is concerned, you are also accustomed to see on your own tables; it is the same appearance, but not the same essence. For you are the same persons you were; for indeed you have not brought new faces to us. And yet you are new; old in the appearance of the body, new by the grace of holiness, just as this is new. Indeed, as you see, it is still bread and wine; sanctification is added, and that bread will be the body of Christ, and that wine will be the blood of Christ. This the name of Christ accomplishes, this the grace of Christ accomplishes, so that the same thing that was seen is still seen, and yet it does not have the same power as it had. For before, if it was eaten, it would fill the stomach; now when it is eaten, it edifies the mind. Just as when you were baptized, moreover, before you were baptized, on the day of Sabbath, we spoke to you about the sacrament of the font in which you were to be dipped, and we said to you, which I believe you have not forgotten, that baptism had or has this power, which is the burial with Christ, as the Apostle says: For we are buried with Christ by baptism into death, that just as He was raised from the dead, so we also might walk in newness of life; so now also, not from our heart, nor from our presumption, nor from human arguments, but from the authority of the Apostle, it is necessary to commend and explain to you what it is that you have received or are going to receive. Behold, briefly hear the Apostle, or rather Christ through the Apostle, about the sacrament of the Lord's table that he says: We, being many, are one bread and one body. Behold, that is all, I said it briefly; but weigh the words, do not count them. If you count the words, it is brief; if you weigh them, it is great. One bread, he said. However many loaves may be placed there, one bread; however many loaves there may be on the altars of Christ today throughout the whole world, one bread it is. But what does this mean: one bread? He exposed it very briefly: We, being many, are one body. This bread is the body of Christ, about which the Apostle speaks, addressing the Church: Now you are the body of Christ and members thereof. What you receive, you are, by the grace with which you have been redeemed; you sign, when you respond Amen. What you see is the sacrament of unity.

Just as from many grains one bread is made, so from the unity of charity one body of Christ is made.

Now since the Apostle briefly indicated to us what this is, consider it more diligently and see how it is done. How is bread made? It is threshed, ground, and from mixing to baking; in mixing, it is purified, in baking it is firmed. Where is your threshing? This is what you have become: it was in fasts, in observations, in vigils, in exorcisms. You were ground when you were exorcized. Mixing does not happen without water: you were baptized. Baking is troublesome but useful. For what is baking? The fire of temptations, without which this life is not. But how is it useful? The furnace tests the potter's vessel, and tribulation tests just men. But just as from grains individually gathered into one and in a way mixed by blending, one bread is made, so is the one body of Christ made in the harmony of love. But what the body of Christ has in the grains, the blood has in the grapes; for wine also comes out of the press, and what was in many individually flows into one and becomes wine. Therefore, in both the bread and the chalice, there is the mystery of unity. The words of the preface are explained. But what you heard at the table of the Lord: "The Lord be with you," we are accustomed to say this also when we greet from the apse, and whenever we pray we say this; because it benefits us that the Lord be always with us, because without Him we are nothing. But what sounded in your ears, see what you say to the altar of God. For we ask and admonish in a certain way, and we say: "Lift up your hearts." Do not put them down: the heart rots in the earth, lift it up to heaven. But where to: "Lift up your hearts?" What do you answer? Where to: "Lift up your hearts?" "We have them with the Lord." For lifting up the heart sometimes is good, sometimes it is bad. How is it bad? In those it is bad of whom it is said: "You cast them down when they were exalted." A lifted-up heart, if it is not with the Lord, is not righteousness, but pride; therefore when we have said: "Lift up your hearts," because a lifted-up heart can still be one of pride, you answer: "We have them with the Lord." Therefore, it is dignity, not elation: and because this dignity is to have our hearts lifted up to the Lord, did we achieve it? Could we do it by our own strength? Did we lift up the earth, which we were, to heaven? By no means: He did it, He deigned, He extended His hand, He offered His grace, He made what was down to be up. Therefore, when we have said: "Lift up your hearts," and you have responded: "We have them with the Lord," do not attribute to yourselves that you have lifted up your hearts, I added: "Let us give thanks to the Lord our God." These are brief mysteries, but great: we say brief, but great in affection. For you say these things quickly and without a book, and without reading, without a long discussion. Remember what you are, and in what you must persevere, so that you may be able to reach the promises of God.

Sermons - Sermon 229B

Sermon 229/B

"Ignem veni mittere in terram, et quid volo nisi ut accendatur?" (Luke 12:49). Solent homines quantam de igne deprecari; et cum ignem Dominus velit mittere in terram, quomodo melius accendetur, nisi ut accendatur in cordibus? Iste incendium non in lignis, non in stramentis, sed in cordibus nostris vult Dominus accendi, ut consumat cupiditates nostras, et caritatem augeat. Omnes enim quemadmodum accenditur in lignis ignis, sic et in cordibus nostris Spiritus sanctus accendatur. Ignis est amor Dei.

"I have come to cast fire upon the earth, and what do I wish except that it be kindled?" (Luke 12:49). People usually pray to save themselves from fire; and since the Lord wants to cast fire upon the earth, how will it better be kindled, except that it be kindled in hearts? This fire the Lord wants to ignite not in wood, not in straw, but in our hearts, so that it consumes our desires and increases love. For just as fire is kindled in wood, thus also in our hearts the Holy Spirit should be kindled. Fire is the love of God.

TREATISE ON THE HOLY EASTER SUNDAY Live well, and you are the day which the Lord has made. The Lord indeed made every day: but He not only made, but also makes; for so He makes every day, when He makes His sun rise upon the good and the evil, and sends rain upon the just and the unjust. Therefore, this common day, shared by the good and the bad, is not to be considered here where we heard: This is the day which the Lord has made; for He speaks of some distinguished day, and makes us intent upon some day by saying: This is the day which the Lord has made. What kind of day is this, where it is said: Let us rejoice and be glad in it? What sort of day, if not good? What sort, if not desirable, lovable, desirable, delightful, of which the holy Jeremiah spoke: And I did not desire the day of man, You know. Who then is this day, which the Lord has made? Live well, and you shall be. For the Apostle was not speaking of this day, which the sun’s rise begins and its setting ends, when he said: Let us walk honestly as in the day. Where he also says: For those who are drunk, are drunk in the night. Nobody sees people drunk at lunch; but when it happens, it pertains to the night, not to the day which the Lord has made. For as the day is in those who live piously, holily, and religiously, temperately, justly, soberly; so on the contrary in those who live impiously, luxuriously, proudly, irreligiously, without a doubt the night will be a thief: The day of the Lord will come like a thief in the night, for it is written. But when the Apostle recalled this testimony, turning to those to whom he had said elsewhere: You were once darkness, but now you are light in the Lord; where the day which the Lord made was formed, turning to them, when he had said: You know, brethren, that the day of the Lord will come like a thief in the night, he said to them: But you are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you like a thief. For you are all children of light, and children of the day; we are not of the night nor of the darkness. Therefore, this is the remembrance of our good life. When we all say with one harmonious voice, with a joyful spirit, with a concordant heart: This is the day which the Lord has made, let us agree with our sound, lest our tongue forbids us. You say today in drunkenness: This is the day which the Lord has made; do you not fear, lest it answers you: This day the Lord did not make; and that is called a good day, which luxury and wickedness make the worst day for themselves.

If the hope brings so much joy, what will it be like when we possess it?

Behold joy, my brothers, joy in your congregation, joy in psalms and hymns, joy in the memory of the passion and resurrection of Christ, joy in the hope of future life. If the hope brings us such great joy, what will it be like when we possess it? Behold these days, when we hear Alleluia, our spirit is somewhat changed. Do we not taste something of that heavenly city? If these days bring us so much joy, what will it be like when they say: Come, you blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom; when all the saints are gathered together in one; when those who did not know each other see each other; when those who knew each other recognize each other; when they will be together in such a way that a friend will never perish, an enemy will never be feared? For behold, we say: Alleluia; it is good, it is joyful, it is full of the delight of gladness and sweetness. However, if we say this always, we tire; but when it comes at a certain time of the year, with what delight it returns, with what longing it departs! Will there be such joy there, and will there be weariness there? There will not be. Perhaps someone says: And how can it be that this is always, and never tiring? If I show you something in this life that cannot be tiring, do you believe that there, everything will be like this. Weariness in food, weariness in drink, weariness in spectacle, weariness in this and that thing; but there was never weariness in health. Just as in this mortality of the flesh, in this fragility, in this weariness of the burden of the body, there could never be weariness in health, so there will never be weariness in love, immortality, eternity.

Sermons - Sermon 229C

Sermon 229/C OF HOLY EASTER The Jews celebrate Passover but do not recognize what it prefigured. As we celebrate these days of Easter, during which Christ, our Passover, was sacrificed, the Jews, who are the enemies of this luminous manifestation, still engage in certain nocturnal figures and, even as day declines, continue to dream. For they also say they celebrate Passover, and while they perversely follow the shadows of truth, they are blinded by the night of error. They kill a lamb every year following the rite of ancient solemnity, and they do not recognize what that lamb signified, even when Christ was killed by his own parents. While they read what was said, they do not understand what was foretold, they hear when the words are recited, and they do not see when the prophecies are fulfilled. They have the Law and the Prophets, and they do not want to acknowledge through the Prophets what the Law prefigured about Passover. By the command of the Law, the people were fed on the killing of the lamb; by the prophecy, Christ was led like a lamb to be slain. What the earlier Israelites prefigured with the feast in their deliverance from Egypt, the later ones, enslaved by the devil, performed in their wickedness. They were even celebrating Passover when Christ was killed by them; impiety was at odds with truth, and the celebration was in harmony with truth; at the time their food was the lamb that was sacrificed, when Christ was killed by their tongues and teeth. What they symbolized with custom, they completed by crime. Hence Christ himself, prefigured in the lamb, expressed in the man, killed those who feasted on him, and feeds us who are killed. And still their children, belching the undigested vanity of their fathers, glory in unleavened bread; they do not understand that in that food without the old leaven they are signifying the new life, which is foreshadowed in the type revealed in Christ.

What the ancient solemnity foretold as future, the Christian solemnity showed as fulfilled.

We, therefore, for whom Christ has been sacrificed as our Passover, let us celebrate the feast, as the Apostle says, not with the old yeast of malice and wickedness, but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth; so that what the ancient law foretold would come, the Christian celebration may show to be fulfilled, and thus we might see that they remained in shadows, but we rejoice to have clung to the light.

Sermons - Sermon 229D

Sermon 229/D ON HOLY EASTER The meditation on the mysteries of Christ should be for us a daily celebration of Easter.

Always, indeed, brothers, you ought to remember that Christ was delivered up for our offenses and rose again for our justification; yet especially in these days of such great grace, being reminded by which we are not permitted to forget this very thing, which happened once, by annual celebration—informed by faith, strengthened by hope, inflamed by love—let us solemnly frequent temporal things, let us unceasingly desire eternal things. For if God spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not with Him also freely give us all things? Christ suffered, let us die to sin; Christ rose again, let us live to God. Christ passed from this world to the Father; let not our heart be fixed here, but let it follow the things above. Our Head hung on the tree; let us crucify the lusts of the flesh. He lay in the tomb; buried together, let us forget past things. He sits in heaven; let us transfer our desire to lofty things. He is coming as judge; let us not be yoked together with unbelievers. He will raise even the dead bodies of the deceased; let us make the merit befitting the body having changed by a changed mind. He will put the wicked on the left, the good on the right; let us choose our place by our works. His kingdom will have no end; let us not fear the end of this life at all. All the teaching of our peace is in Him, by whose stripe we are healed. But the annual solemnity more joyfully renews the mysteries of Christ.

Therefore, beloved, let the most persistent meditation on all these things be for us the daily celebration of Easter. For we ought not to hold these days as so special that we neglect the memory of the Lord's passion and resurrection every day, since we have His body and blood as our daily feast. Nevertheless, this festival more clearly commemorates, more fervently excites, and more joyfully renews, because it recalls the events, as it were, with the actual sight of them represented by the annual cycle of seasons. Thus, let the passing feast be celebrated, and always consider the coming kingdom that will last forever. For if these passing days gladden us so much, during which we devoutly commemorate the passion and resurrection of Christ, how will the eternal one bless us, where we shall see Him and remain with Him, whom we now rejoice in, longing and hoping for? How great an exultation will He give to His Church, to which, regenerated through Christ, He removes in a way the foreskin of carnal nature, that is, the reproach of birth? Hence it is said: And you, when you were dead in your sins and in the uncircumcision of your flesh, He has made alive with Him, forgiving us all our debts. For as in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive. Thus, what was hidden in the shadow of the old circumcision is revealed in the baptism of Christ; and this also pertains to that same uncircumcision made without hands, when the covering of carnal ignorance is removed. When you shall have passed on to Christ, he says, the veil is taken away.

Sermons - Sermon 229E

Sermon 229/E

For the Day of the Holy Pentecost

Indeed, that Spirit was promised by the Lord, and He was given on the day of Pentecost. He filled all who were sitting there. Then, suddenly, they began to speak in tongues of all the peoples: such was the power which the Holy Spirit bestowed upon them. For they were all speaking, but those who listened were thinking only one man was speaking in their own language. What wonder, this transforming action! That unity of the disciples into one Spirit was accomplished at the time when the Holy Spirit came, tongues divided to each, but the love which joins together was not divided. For the Holy Spirit binds together those whom He inhabits in harmony and peace.

Treatise on the Second Day of Easter Christ brought us his good things and patiently endured our evils. The passion and resurrection of the Lord show us two lives: one which we endure, the other which we desire. For He is able to give us that life, who deigned to endure this life for us. This shows how much He loves us, and He wanted us to believe, because He will give us His own good things, who wished to have our bad things in common with us. We were born, and He was born; because we are going to die, He died. These two things we knew in our own life, the beginning and the end, being born and dying; by being born to begin labors, by dying to go to uncertainties. We knew these two things, being born and dying: this abounds in our region. Our region is the earth; the region of angels, heaven. Therefore our Lord came to this region from another region; to the region of death, from the region of life; to the region of labor, from the region of happiness. He came bringing His good things to us, and patiently endured our bad things. He secretly carried His good things, openly endured our bad things; He appeared as a man, God was hidden; infirmity appeared, majesty was hidden; flesh appeared, the Word was hidden. The flesh suffered: where was the Word when the flesh suffered? The Word did not remain silent, because it was teaching us patience. Behold, the Lord Christ rose on the third day; where is the insult of the Jews? Where is the insult of those tumultuous and mad Jewish leaders and those slaying the healer? Recall, beloved, what you heard when His passion was read. If He is the Son of God, let Him come down from the cross, and we will believe in Him. If He is the Son of God, He will save Him. He heard these things and remained silent; He was praying for those who said these things, and did not reveal Himself. For in another Gospel it is written that He cried out for them and said: Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing. He saw there His future followers, He saw those who would immediately believe in Him, for them He wanted forgiveness. Our head hung on the cross, but He recognized His members on earth. In the washing of regeneration, all sins are completely forgiven. When the book of the Acts of the Apostles was read, there you already heard how, when those who had gathered were marveling at the Apostles and those who were with them speaking in the languages of all the nations which they had not learned, inspired and taught by the Holy Spirit which they had received, amazed by the miracle, Peter the Apostle spoke to them, and explained to them that they indeed had acted in ignorance by committing the evil deed of killing the Lord; but God had fulfilled His plan so that innocent blood was shed for the whole world, and the sins of all believers were erased; for He is the one who died, in whom sin could not be found. The bond of our sins was held, the devil had the bond against us; he possessed those whom he had deceived, he had those whom he had conquered. We were all debtors, as everyone is born with an inherited debt; blood without sin was shed, and erased the bond of sin. Therefore, those who believed while Peter was speaking in the Acts of the Apostles, troubled, said: What shall we do, brothers? tell us. For they despaired that such a great sin could be forgiven for them. And it was said to them: Repent, and let each one of you be baptized in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, and your sins will be forgiven. Which sins? All of them. How many are all? And this so great, that you killed Christ. For what more wicked thing could you have done, than killing your Creator who was created for you? What graver thing could a madman do, than that the doctor was killed by him? Yet even this is forgiven, it was said to them: all is forgiven. You raged, and shed innocent blood; believe, and drink what you have shed. Therefore, they were there, who, in despair, said: What shall we do? and heard that by believing in Him whom they had killed, they could receive pardon for such a great crime. They were there, He saw them; He saw them before His cross, whom He foresaw before the foundation of the world. For them He said: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do; they were killing the doctor; the doctor made a medicine for the killers out of His own blood. Great mercy and glory; what was not forgiven to them, when it was forgiven to them that they killed Christ? Therefore, dearest ones, no one should doubt that in the washing of regeneration all sins, both small and great, are completely forgiven; for it is a great example and proof. No sin is graver than killing Christ; when even this is forgiven, what could be left unforgiven in a baptized believer? The resurrection of Christ is the sacrament of new life. But let us consider the resurrection of Christ, dearest ones; because just as His passion signified our old life, so His resurrection is the sacrament of new life. Therefore, the Apostle says: We were buried with Christ through baptism into death, so that just as Christ was raised from the dead, we too might walk in newness of life. You have believed, you have been baptized; the old life has died, it has been killed on the cross, it has been buried in baptism. The old has been buried, in which you lived badly; let the new rise. Live well: live in such a way that you may live; live in such a way that, when you die, you do not die. Consider, dearest ones, what the Lord said in the Gospel to the man He healed: Behold, you have been made well; do not sin anymore, lest something worse happen to you. We had been confined by that sentence and reduced to great straits; but His mercy never forsakes us. He gave prayer to the baptized, because here one cannot live without sin, so that we say daily: Forgive us our debts. They are debts: that general caution, and we do not cease to become debtors. We say from where we are forgiven daily; but we should not rest secure in crimes, in wicked deeds, in sins. Sins should not be friendly to us; we have vomited them out; let us hate them; let us not return to our vomit like a dog. And if they creep in, let them creep in unwillingly, not with desire or eager seeking; for whoever wishes to have friendships with sins will be an enemy to Him who came to destroy sins, since He had no sin. My brothers, consider what I say: a friend of disease is an enemy to the doctor. If you were sick in body, and a doctor came to you because of his profession, tell me what he would want by coming to you; what would he want but to heal you? Therefore, since he would be a friend to you, it is necessary that he be an enemy to the fever; for if he loved your fever, he would not love you. Therefore, he hates your fever; he entered your house against it, climbed into your room against it, approached your bed against it, touched your vein against it, gave you commands against it, composed and applied medicines against it; everything against it, everything for you. Therefore, if he does everything against the fever, everything for you, you alone will be against yourself by loving the fever. You will answer me, I know, you will answer me and say: Who loves a fever? I know too, a sick person does not love a fever, but loves what the fever asks for. What did the doctor say when he entered you, armed with skill against your fever? He says to you, for example: Do not drink cold things. You heard from the doctor, the enemy of your fever, to not drink cold things. When the doctor has left, the fever says: Drink cold things. When the fever tells you, you should say: that fever causes this burning. Silent conversation speaks to you, it induces dryness in the throat, it makes cold things pleasurable; remember what the doctor said, do not drink. But with the doctor absent, the fever is present. What did the doctor say? Do you want to overcome it? Do not yield to it. If you join the doctor against the fever, you will be two; if you consent to the fever, the doctor is conquered, but to the sick man's harm, not the doctor's. However, let it not be that Christ the doctor is conquered in those whom He foresaw and predestined; because He called them, and those He called, He also justified; and those He justified, He also glorified. Let vices be repressed, let desires be curbed, let the devil and his angels be tormented by envy. If God is for us, who can be against us?

Christ is both the food and wages for his laborers. But what Christ demonstrated by the resurrection of his body, begin to act spiritually by living well. But that very thing, that is, the very property, the very truth, the very incorruptibility of the flesh, do not hope for it now; it is the reward of faith, the reward is given at the end of the day. Now let us work in the vineyard; let us wait for the end of the day; for he who has hired us to work does not abandon us, lest we fail. He feeds the worker laboring, who prepares to give him the reward at the end of the day; so now the Lord feeds us laboring in this age, not only with the food of the stomach, but also with the food of the mind. If he did not feed us, I would not speak; because he feeds by the word, we are doing this, who preach him to your minds, not to your stomachs. You receive while hungry, you praise while feasting; what is it that you cry out, if no food reaches your minds? But what are we? His ministers, his servants; we do not bring forth our own, but from his cellar we dispense to you. From there we also live, for we are fellow servants. And what do we serve you: his bread, or the bread itself? Whoever hired a man to work in his vineyard might give him bread, not himself. Christ gives himself to his workers; he offers himself in the bread, he preserves himself as the reward. It is not for us to say: If we eat him now, what will we have at the end? We eat, but he does not end; he refreshes the hungry, but he does not diminish. He now feeds those working, for whom the full reward remains. For what better will we receive than himself? If he had something better than himself, he would give it: but nothing is better than God, and Christ is God. Consider: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God; he was in the beginning with God. Who grasps this? Who gathers it? Who gazes upon it? Who contemplates it? Who thinks worthily of it? No one. The Word became flesh, and dwelt among us. To this he calls you, so that you may labor as a worker. The Word became flesh. He calls you himself: your praise will be the Word, the Lord will be your reward.

Sermons - Sermon 229F

Sermon 229/F When did peace arrive on earth? When the angels rejoiced and sang: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace to men of good will." This peace was proclaimed by the voice of angelic praise. This peace was given by the Holy Spirit in the disciples when the Lord appeared in their midst after His resurrection. He breathed on them and said: "Receive the Holy Spirit." This is the peace, which she who truly believed and who had all her hope in Christ appears to have lacked, when the angel said to her: "Hail, full of grace." The Lord was already with her, but she had not yet recognized Him.

TREATISE CONCERNING THE SECOND DAY OF EASTER Not all believed in the resurrection of Christ.

Some saw the resurrection of the Lord, others did not believe the report; and they are reproached by the Lord Himself now present, because they did not believe those who saw and reported it. How great is the dignity of the nations, and of those born long afterward! What did God grant to them, by whom the churches of Christ are now filled? The holy apostles walked with the Lord, heard the word of truth from His mouth, saw Him raising the dead; and did not believe that the Lord had risen. But we, who were born long after, never saw His bodily presence, heard no word from His mouth of flesh, saw no miracle performed by Him with these eyes; and yet we believed, hearing the letters of those who then refused to believe. They did not believe the most recent report announced to them: they wrote so that we might read; we heard, and we believe. And since the Lord Jesus did not want to appear to the Jews, He did not judge them worthy to see the Lord Christ after the resurrection; He showed Himself to His own, not to strangers. And while His own preached, strangers believed; and those who were strangers became His own. For many of them, as it is read in the Acts of the Apostles, many of them who crucified the Lord, who were polluted by His spilled blood; many of them who said: “His blood be on us and on our children,” later believed the apostles' announcement. His blood was indeed upon them, but to cleanse them, not to destroy them; upon some to be destroyed, upon others to be cleansed; for the destroyed justly, for the cleansed mercifully. And now, is faith for everyone? Just as at that time some of the Jews believed, and others did not believe, so it is now among the nations; some believed, others do not believe. Faith is not for everyone. Those who have faith believe by grace; let them not boast, it is a gift from God. Did the Lord choose us because we were good? He did not choose the good, but those He willed to make good. We were all in the shadow of death, we were all held bound in the mass of sin coming from Adam. What kind of fruit could have been born from the tree of the human race, if the root was tainted? But He who would heal the faults came without fault; and He who came to cleanse sins came without sin. In the patriarch Jacob are prefigured either the faithful or the unfaithful Jews. Do not heed the Jews who are now the chaff, that is, of that threshing floor which was then threshed. For if we consider, my brothers, the Prophets from the Jews, the Patriarchs from the Jews, the Apostles from the Jews, the Virgin Mary from the Jews, who bore Christ; later Paul believing from the Jews, and so many thousands baptized in one day; the innumerable churches of Christians from the Jews. But those grains have already been stored in the granary: the devil will play with the chaff. Faithful Jews, and unfaithful Jews. Where were they first condemned? At first, in Jacob himself, the father of all who was also called Israel. Jacob means "Supplanter"; Israel means "Seeing God". When he returned from Mesopotamia with his sons, an angel struggled with him, bearing the person of Christ; and while they wrestled, though excelling greatly in strength, he appeared to succumb to him, and Jacob prevailed. So also did the Lord Christ succumb to the Jews: they prevailed when they killed him. He was conquered with great strength: where he was conquered, there he conquered for us. What does it mean: where he was conquered, there he conquered for us? Because from the place where he suffered, he shed blood, by which he redeemed us. Therefore it is written, Jacob prevailed over him. And yet Jacob himself, who wrestled, acknowledged the mystery. A man struggling prevailed against the angel; and when he had said to him: Let me go, the one who had prevailed said: I will not let you go unless you bless me. O great mystery! He blesses the one defeated, who liberates by suffering; that was then the entire blessing. What is your name? he said to him. He responded: Jacob. You will no longer be called Jacob, he said, but you will be called Israel. The imposition of such a great name is a great blessing. Israel is interpreted, as I said, "Seeing God"; the name of one, the reward of all. Of all: but the faithful and blessed, both Jews and Greeks. For the Apostle calls all nations Greeks, because among the nations the Greek language prevailed. Glory, he says, and honor—the words of the Apostle—glory and honor and peace to everyone who works good, to the Jew first and to the Greek; wrath and indignation, tribulation and distress, upon every soul doing evil, to the Jews first and Greeks. Good to the good Jews, evil to the evil; good to the good Gentiles, evil to the evil. The lameness in Jacob prefigures the Jews not believing in Christ.

Let not the Jews exalt themselves, and say: Behold nevertheless Jacob is our father; he prevailed over the angel, and was blessed by the angel. We say: People of Israel, heed therein; you are not Israel; you are called, but you are not; the name errs within you, the crime remains in you. But he says to me: Behold Jacob my father, behold Israel my father; behold the name, where is the crime? Read there, find yourself there. For it is written there: And he touched Jacob's hip socket and it was withered, and he limped. Jacob, a single man, both blessed and lame. In what was he blessed, and in what was he lame? If you believed in Christ, recognize yourself as blessed; if you denied Christ, recognize yourself as lame; for you are of those of whom the Prophet says: And they limped from their paths. Whence were the holy women, to whom the Lord first revealed Himself rising again? Were they not from the Jews? Whence were the Apostles, who, even if they did not first believe the women announcing, nevertheless later heard Him, recognized Him rebuking, and clung to their master? Were they not from the Jews? Behold blessed Israel. But lame in many, blessed in a few; for this is the breadth of the hip, the multitude of the race. It does not just say: He touched the hip; but: The breadth of the hip. Where the breadth of the hip is, without a doubt, the multitude of the race. And what do I perceive? I recognize few grains, I marvel at the heap of chaff; but I see what is owed to the granary, what to the flame. And now let them listen, they still live; let them correct their limping, come to the blessing.

Sermons - Sermon 229G

Sermon 229/G OF THE THIRD DAY OF EASTER

You have heard what the Lord said to His disciples after His resurrection, now no longer to die, and taking away the fear of death for those who are to die ... The Son is equal to the Father, but together with the Father they are not two but one God. For Christ is God, nor can those deny this who do not wish to confess that He is of the same substance with the Father; they confess Him to be God, but deny that He is equal; therefore, they make two gods. But we say that the Son is equal to the Father in such a way that if it should be individually asked of us whether the Father is God, we would acknowledge that He is God; whether the Son is God, we would acknowledge that He is God; whether these are Father and Son gods, or God, we would acknowledge that He is God. Weak and human minds do not grasp this; this great and divine matter, since speech is about God, human frailty cannot comprehend; but it can believe, so that later it may become capable of understanding. For it was said to the Lord: Show us the Father, and it is enough for us. He who was saying this did not recognize the Father in the Son; for he saw what the Jews could crucify; he did not see the One whom the Jews offended while hidden. And he thought that the whole of Christ was what he beheld with his eyes; and therefore, it did not suffice for him, because he did not see the whole. And because he believed there was nothing more in Christ, he therefore sought the Father, in whom they might find satisfaction. As if to say: We know You, indeed we see You; but we still desire something greater. Show us the Father, and it is enough for us; for there will be nothing further to seek, once we have learned of the Father. And He, desiring to show Himself equal to the Father, said: Have I been with you so long, and you do not know me? And yet the Father and the Son are two.

Philip, he who has seen me has seen the Father. What does it mean: He who has seen me has seen the Father, if not because you do not see me since you think the Father is greater? He who has seen me has seen the Father. You believe that the Father alone is enough for you, but this is because you have not yet seen me. Show us the Father, and it suffices for us. See me, and I am enough for you. And yet he said this to someone who was seeing and not seeing; seeing the form of a servant, not seeing the form of God. For if he saw the form of God, he would see the Son equal to the Father; because being in the form of God, he did not consider it robbery to be equal with God. Because it was by nature, it was not robbery. For whom it was robbery, he fell; and from where he fell, thence he threw down. For the devil wished to share the very robbery with the man he cast down, so that he might have a companion in punishment, whom he wished to have as a partner in sin. What else did he say to men, but: Taste, and your eyes shall be opened, and you shall be as gods? This is robbery. This pride is robbery; it is usurpation, not acceptance. For if we do not usurp, we shall be by grace what we by pride shall not be; for it pertains to grace: I have said: You are gods, and all of you are children of the Most High. But I have said: what I have said, that He works. But what kind of gods are men, what kind of gods? Equals of the angels of God. This has been promised; let us seek no more; for we shall not be equal to God, but made equal to the angel; on earth we see the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit as we believe in them, so we see them. Since therefore it was much for Philip to see what the Lord said (for he was still burdened by a corruptible body; it had not yet come to pass what the Apostle says: We see now through a glass in a riddle, but then face to face) since it was much for him to think of what he heard from the Lord: He who has seen me has seen the Father... Consider that it was not said in vain, has seen the Father. He did not say: He who has seen me has seen the Father; lest he might give occasion to the Sabellians, who are called Patripassians, who say that the same one is the Father who is the Son; but when he wills, he is the Father; when he wills, he is the Son. Lest he should give occasion to this other error, he did not say: He who has seen me has seen the Father, but, has seen the Father as well: thus both the Father and the Son. Therefore the Father and the Son, two. What two? If you ask me, the Father and the Son are two. The Catholic faith navigates the middle course between the errors of Sabellius and Arius.

Whatever you say again, I will answer again. Father and Son, what? Gods? No, two. What then? One God. I do not understand, he says. The Father is not the Son, the Son is not the Father: they are two. The Father is God, the Son is God: and are they not two gods? I do not understand. What then shall I say to you who does not understand? Hear the Prophet: Unless you believe, you will not understand. You do not understand in order to believe; but you believe in order to understand; faith is necessary, understanding is the reward. Unless you believe, you will not understand. Nevertheless, hear the Lord Himself, that you may learn what to believe. If you loved me, you would rejoice, because I go to the Father; for the Father is greater than I. Now it almost appears that someone understands. Behold, he says, now I understand. The Father is greater than I. The form of a servant speaks: seek the form of God. Therefore, He said this. If you loved me, you would rejoice, because I go to the Father, for the Father is greater than I. Now that you see me here, you see me where I am lesser. Therefore, when you see me here where I am lesser, if you love me, follow me there where I am equal. Do you wonder because the Son is lesser than the Father in the form of a servant? I tell you that He is even lesser than Himself, for He emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant. But if you understand that it was said about Him: He was made a little lower than the angels; therefore, if you have adapted yourself to the form of a servant, do not remain there, rise up from there, confess Christ equal to the Father. Why do you gladly hear: The Father is greater than I? More gladly hear: I and the Father are one. Behold the catholic faith, navigating as it were between Scylla and Charybdis, as one navigates in that strait between Sicily and Italy; on one side shipwrecking rocks, on the other side a ship-devouring whirlpool. If it runs into the rocks, it is broken; if it falls into the whirlpool, it is swallowed. So also Sabellius: He said, there is one, not two, Father and Son. Observe the shipwreck. Likewise Arius: There are two, one greater, the other lesser, not of equal substance. Observe the whirlpool. Navigate between both, and follow the straight path. For it is not without reason that Catholics are called orthodox: orthodox in Greek, rectum in Latin. Therefore, if you hold the straight line, you will incur neither Scylla nor Charybdis. Therefore, hold onto, I and the Father are one. The love of the faithful is a figure of unity in the Trinity.

I and the Father: let the Arian hear "one," and let Sabellius hear "we are." What you hear: "one," you will avoid Charybdis; what you hear: "we are," you will save yourself from Scylla. Say "we are one," and you will navigate correctly. Behold, we have heard: "we are one"; one, because of the same substance; one, because not of dissimilar and unequal nature; one, because of the highest equality, no discrepancy, no diversity. Behold why: one; why: we are? Because the Father and the Son are one God. Why then is there one God, not "we are"? For the one God is the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, one God; they are three, and one God. The Father is not the Son, the Son is not the Father, the Holy Spirit is neither the Father nor the Son, but the Spirit of the Father and the Son: and all of this is one God. Why one God? Because of such great love there, such great peace, such concord, no discord. Now I tell you to believe what you cannot understand unless you believe. How many souls were there, tell me, in the Acts of the Apostles, who believed when they beheld the miracles of the Apostles? I speak of those Jews who crucified the Lord, who brought bloody hands, who had sacrilegious ears, whose tongue was compared to a sword: Their teeth were weapons and arrows, and their tongue a sharp sword. Yet because Christ poured out prayer for them, not without cause, and not without cause said: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do; from that same number many believed; and, as we read: They believed that day, it is said: Three thousand souls. Behold, there are thousands of souls, and behold, so many thousands of souls; and yet the Holy Spirit came upon them, through whom love is spread in our hearts. And what is said of so many souls? They had one soul and one heart. So many souls, one soul; not by nature, but by grace. If so many souls were made one soul by that grace coming from above, do you marvel that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit is one God? Therefore, my brothers, hold the strongest and most whole and catholic faith. When you hear or read in the Scriptures, where the Father is shown greater, recall the form of a servant; but where you read that the Father and the Son are one, believe the divinity.

How could Christ die? And if you are not capable of thinking, still hold on to faith; it leads, it causes your good works to be accepted by God. For everything that is not from faith is sin. Someone says to you: Christ is dead? Confess that He is dead, but in the flesh. And who is dead? The only Son of God, our Lord Jesus Christ. So, did the divinity die? The divinity did not die. Therefore, is Christ not dead? Christ, who is God, is dead. How is God Christ dead if the divinity does not die? Just as the Apostles died in the flesh, but not in the soul. Therefore, where the Apostle died in the flesh, thus Christ died in the flesh. Yet Christ died; although He could die in the part that could die, He could not die in the divinity. For in the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. Where is death? Nowhere. In the beginning the Word was not made, just as in the beginning God made heaven and earth: the Word made this. What was in the beginning? Therefore, the Word was, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. Seek death, and you will not find it; there is no place, there is no origin, there is no person. There is no place because it is not among the hands of the Jews; there is no source because it does not have flesh and blood; there is no person, for He is God, equal to the Father. Where, then, is the death? The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us.

Sermons - Sermon 229H

SERMON 229/H TREATISE ON THE THIRD DAY OF EASTER Everything in Christ was working for the resurrection, which is the form of our faith. The resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ is the foundation of the Christian faith. For He who was born as a man from a human at a certain time, as God from God, without any time being involved; thus, He who was born in mortal flesh, in the likeness of sinful flesh, bore infancy, passed through childhood, reached youth, and carried this into death, all of this served His resurrection. For He would not have risen if He had not died; He would not have died if He had not been born; and thus, being born and having died has contributed to His resurrection. Many, both strangers and impious, believed that the Lord Christ was born as a man from a human; although they did not know He was born of a Virgin, they still believed that Christ was born a man, and both friends and enemies believed that Christ was crucified and died; only friends knew that He had risen. But why is this? The Lord Christ, because He chose to be born, because He chose to die, intended to rise; there He defined our faith for us. For in our kind, that is, in the kind of humanity, we knew two things: to be born and to die. To teach what we did not know, He took on what we did know. It was customary in the earthly realm, in the condition of our mortality, it was completely customary to be born and to die; so customary, that it could not be in heaven, but on earth it does not cease to be. But who knew about rising again and living eternally? He who came from God brought this new thing to our region. He was made man for the sake of man, a great act of compassion; made man, the creator of man. It was not great for Christ to be what He was, but it was great that He chose to become what He had made. What does it mean to become what He made? To become man, who had made man. This is His compassion.

We are born to die and there is no way the last day can be avoided.

Everything that is done in this life, in which men wish to be blessed, and cannot... For what they greatly wish is good, but they do not seek what they desire in its proper region. For certain things are born in their own regions. And gold is not born everywhere on earth, nor silver everywhere, nor lead everywhere; the very fruits come forth differently in different places; and there is nothing everywhere, except to be born and to die. Nevertheless, this very act of being born and dying does not belong to the whole world, but to this lowest part of the world; for in the heavens, there is no being born and dying, since all things were created there. The prince of the angels, indeed, could fall from there with his associates; but for the angels who fell, men will come there and fill the place of those who fell. Therefore, because the devil saw man about to ascend from where he had fallen, he saw and envied; he fell and cast down. But what does it mean that the devil fell? What does it mean that he cast man down? He overcame everything who did not fall, but descended. Man fell: God descended and was made man. Therefore, where being born and dying abound, it is a region of misery; men seek to be blessed in a region of misery, they seek eternity in a region of death. The Lord says to us, the Truth says to us: What you seek is not here, because it is not from here. You seek a good thing, which every man wants; you seek a good thing because it is good to live; but we are born for this, that we might die. Consider not what you want, but under what condition you have come. Therefore we are born that we might die. Life is not obtained by those who are dying, and therefore they are more wretched. For if we were to die, and wished to live, we would not be very wretched; but as we are very wretched because we wish to live and are compelled to die. Do you not know that any man cannot always stay awake, but also wants to sleep? It is not against his will that he sleeps; he cannot always stay awake, but he also wants to sleep. However, a man cannot be, except by both staying awake and sleeping. One comes to life, and every man says: I want to live, and no one wants to die; and although no one wants to die, he inevitably dies. As much as he can, he acts to live by eating, drinking, sleeping, providing for himself so he might live, by sailing, walking, running, avoiding, he wants to live. Often delivered from many dangers, he lives; but let him hold his age if he can; let him not reach old age. He passes through a dangerous day, and man says: I have escaped death. From what have you escaped death? Because the dangerous day has passed. However, a day has been added to you: one more day you have lived, one less you have, if I count. For if you were to live, for instance, thirty years, when the day has passed, it subtracts from the sum of life, as it increases the weight of death. And yet they say: Years are added to a man. I say, they are withdrawn: for I attend to that sum which remains, not which has passed. They are added, why? Because he who has lived fifty years now has fifty-one. In which he lives, or what he is about to live? For instance, he was to live eighty years; fifty he has from this, thirty remain. He lived one: he has what he lived, fifty-one; what he is to live, twenty-nine remain; and from here one left, another was added; but when it was added, you do not hold whence it left. Fearing, he lives another, twenty-eight remain; he lives the third, twenty-seven remain. By living, it is taken away whence it is lived, and by leading life is diminished and is not; because there is no way the last day can be avoided.

Through His resurrection, Christ promised us life, both eternal and blessed. But our Lord Jesus Christ came and as if addressing us said: Why were you afraid, O humans, whom I created and have not abandoned? O humans, ruin from you, creation from me; O humans, why were you afraid to die? Behold, I die, behold, I suffer; behold, what you feared, do not fear, because I show you what to hope for. Behold, thus he acted, he showed us the resurrection into eternity; the same the Evangelists concluded in their writings, the Apostles proclaimed throughout the world. Because of the faith in his resurrection, holy martyrs were not afraid to die, and yet they feared to die; for they would rather die if they feared to die, and by fear of death deny Christ. Yet what is it to deny Christ but to deny life? How great is the madness to deny life by loving life! Therefore, the determination of our faith is Christ's resurrection. Hence, it is also written in the Old and New Testament, to do penance and receive the remission of sins, in the man in whom he defined faith for all, raising him from the dead. This is the definition of faith, the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ. You live if you live; that is, you live forever if you live well. Do not fear to die badly: fear, rather, to live badly. What a strange perversity! Every man fears what no one can escape, and does not do what he can do. That you may not die, you cannot do; that you may live well, you can do. Do what you can, and you will not fear what you cannot. For nothing is as certain to man as death. Begin from the beginning. Man is conceived in the womb: maybe he is born, maybe not. He is born: maybe he grows up, maybe not; maybe he learns letters, maybe not; maybe he takes a wife, maybe not; maybe he will have children, maybe not, maybe he will have good ones, maybe bad ones; maybe he will have a good wife, maybe a bad one; maybe he will be rich, maybe poor; maybe he will be ignoble, maybe honored. Can it be said among these: Maybe he will die, maybe not? Therefore, every man born falls into a disease from which no one born escapes. He dies from it, as it is usually said. He has dropsy: he must die, no one escapes from it. He has leprosy: he must die, no one escapes from it. He is born: he must die, no one escapes from it. Because he must die, since life itself is not even permitted to be long-lasting, from infancy to decrepit old age, there remains nothing but to flee to him who died for us, and by rising gave hope; so that, because in this life, in which we run, we can only die, nor can we make it eternal, which we greatly love, we flee to him who promised us eternal life. For see what the Lord promised us, brothers: both eternal and blessed. Surely this one is miserable: who does not know this, who does not admit it? How much we have, how much we suffer, what we do not want, in this life! Quarreling, dissensions, temptations, ignorance of our hearts towards each other, such that sometimes unknowingly we embrace an enemy, fear a friend; where hunger, where nakedness, where cold, where heat, where weariness, where diseases, where jealousy. Surely this life is miserable. Yet, if this same miserable life could be given to us eternally, who would not rejoice? Who would not say: I want to be as I am, only I do not want to die? If you want to have a bad life, how will he who gives both eternal and blessed life be? But if you want to reach eternal and blessed life, have a good temporal life. It will be good in work, it will be blessed in reward. But if you refuse the work, with what face do you seek the reward? If you cannot say to Christ: I did what you commanded, how will you dare to say: Give what you promised?

Sermons - Sermon 229I

SERMON 229/I TREATISE ON THE FOURTH DAY OF EASTER Christ rising again showed the true flesh in which he had suffered. The gospel readings about the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ are solemnly recited in order. Today we heard that the Lord Christ showed His true flesh to His disciples, in which He had suffered and risen. They heard Him speaking, saw Him present, and even touched Him while He said to them: Touch, handle, and see that a spirit does not have flesh and bones as you see I have. For when they saw Him, they doubted and thought they were seeing a spirit, not a body. Therefore, whoever still thinks that the resurrection of the Lord was not bodily but only spiritual, may God forgive them, just as He forgave His Apostles; but if they do not hold onto error and change their thoughts, because they also heard and changed. And how great was His dignity, that even when showing Himself to them present in the body, He nevertheless strengthened them with the truth of the holy Scriptures! These are, He said, the words which I spoke to you while I was still with you. Why? Was He not then with them and speaking to them? What then is: While I was still with you? Without a doubt, while I was still mortal with you, as you are. These are the words which I spoke to you, because it was necessary to fulfill all that is written about me in the law of Moses and the Prophets and the Psalms. Then He opened their understanding that they might comprehend the Scriptures. He is the one who up to this day opens the writings of life to us, the one who died for us. The apostles, seeing the head, believed in the body; we, seeing the body, believe in the head. But let us see what he said to them: "Thus it was necessary," he said, "for Christ to suffer and to rise from the dead on the third day, and that repentance and forgiveness of sins should be preached in his name to all nations, beginning from Jerusalem." Behold, the disciples both saw Christ after the resurrection, and heard with their own ears that this was foretold in the Holy Scriptures. We have not seen Christ present in the flesh; but we hear the Scriptures, by which they were also strengthened, read daily. And what did he say about the Scriptures? "That repentance and forgiveness of sins should be preached in his name to all nations, beginning from Jerusalem." The disciples did not see this; they saw Christ speaking of the future Church. They believed what Christ said about what they did not see. They saw the Head; they did not yet see the Body; we see the Body, and believe about the Head. There are two, the bridegroom and the bride, the head and the body, Christ and the Church. He showed himself to the disciples, and promised the Church; he shows us the Church, and commanded us to believe about himself. The Apostles saw one thing, they did not see the other; and we see one thing, we do not see the other. Just as they believed about the Body from the present Head, so let us believe about the Head from the present Body. Shall we deny it? But the Truth itself, crying out, will not allow us to deny it. For we see the Church of Christ praising the name of the Lord from the rising of the sun to its setting. "Beginning," he said, "from Jerusalem." Thus it was done; for he said to them, "Stay in the city until you are clothed with power from on high, because I am sending you my promise from the Father." The unity of the Church was marked by the gift of tongues.

So, as they were seated in the city, on the day of Pentecost the Holy Spirit came, filled the disciples, they spoke in the tongues of all nations. One man spoke in the tongues of all nations, because the unity of the Church was to be among all nations. They were pierced in heart at this miracle by all. For the Jews who heard were amazed and believed; for they saw such a miracle done by Peter, in the name of Christ whom they had killed with their own hands, and pierced in heart they repented immediately. All their sins were forgiven to such an extent that even the very act by which Christ was killed was forgiven. The Jews themselves converted, I say; and those who once shook their unbelieving heads at the cross, were granted to hold that very head, Christ, in faith; so that thereafter their head would not be shaken, since He sits at the right hand of the Father and will not be moved forever. He will not return to miseries, He will not return to the cross, He will not return to death, but persists in that true blessedness. Therefore, those who killed Christ heard and were grieved; and the blood they shed in their rage and died, they drank in faith and lived. The faithful know what I have said, and these neophytes, because they have already drunk. Therefore, those who have not drunk, let them hasten and drink, so that their heart may be opened: for it is now closed. So, as it is written in the book, whose name is the Acts of the Apostles, which is read in these days: They were pierced to the heart, and many thousands of men were added to Christ.

Brothers, dispersed in persecution, preach the Gospel to the ends of the earth.

Then, because of the necessity of the ministry, seven deacons were ordained, among whom Stephen, full of the Holy Spirit, stood out. Having been ordained, the spirit of Saint Stephen could not be contained from the preaching of truth; he burned, sparkled, and ignited; until the Jews, filled with zeal due to the hardness of their hearts, cast a harsh stoning upon him, and made for us a martyr, the harvester of all martyrs. Therefore, with Stephen killed, the Church which was born in Jerusalem suffered persecution. According to the promise of the Lord, the foundations of the Church began to be lifted from Jerusalem: and persecution arose, and the brothers were scattered; for from one heap of fire, the burning logs scattered over the earth kindled wherever they went. Thus Judea was filled with the Gospel, Samaria was filled; and it went to the nations and reached the ends of the earth; not by migrating from the root, but by growing throughout the world we witness the Gospel being filled. Behold, we see, behold, we hold the faith diffused among all nations, beginning from Jerusalem. Let him deny who dares; it is not my words that hurt his ears, but the truth itself strikes the eyes of the deniers, closes their mouths; and what is written is fulfilled: "The mouth of those who speak iniquity is stopped."

Sermons - Sermon 229J

Sermon 229/J TREATISE ON THE FOURTH WEDNESDAY OF EASTER Against the Manicheans, the flesh of Christ was true. The Lord Christ deigned to persuade with many and various proofs that His resurrection was certain and true, for building faith, and expelling unbelief from the heart, and removing all doubt about His resurrection. It would not have sufficed to present Himself to be seen by the eyes if He had not also presented Himself to be touched by the hands. What many impious and heretical Manichaeans suspect and believe about Christ, that He was not true flesh, but was a spirit having the appearance of flesh, not to instruct faith, but to deceive the eyes; that He was not a man, but was thought to be; that He was not flesh, but seemed to be so; what therefore the Manichaeans believe, and have made a dogma, and have established an error, this first thought arose in the hearts of the Apostles. And indeed those Manichaeans never believed Jesus to have been a man; they fear to give flesh to the Word, and do not fear to attribute falsehood to the truth. He has true flesh, by which truth shows falsehood, and builds truth in the hearts of men. Therefore, they never believed that the Lord Jesus Christ was a man; but the disciples knew a man, with whom they had been conversing for such a long time. They saw Him walking, sitting, sleeping, eating, drinking; they knew everything, they knew He sat tired by the well. From this long conversation, they knew the true man; but after He had died, what they knew, when they believed that this could be resurrected, that could die? Therefore, He appeared to their eyes as such as they knew Him; and not believing that true flesh could rise from the tomb on the third day, they thought they saw a spirit. This error of the Apostles is a sect of the Manichaeans.

Christ has lost the fruit of his passion if there is no truth of the resurrection.

They are accustomed, however, when these things are objected to them, to respond thus: What harm do we believe, since we believe that Christ was a spirit of God? We believe in the spirit, we do not believe in the flesh: the spirit is better than the flesh. We believe in what is better; we do not wish to believe in what is worse. What harm do we do? If there is nothing harmful in this speech, let Jesus leave His disciples in this error. What harm did they believe? And the disciples believed Christ to be a spirit; for they did not think that He was the one, but a spirit. Let the Lord dismiss them, affirm to them what they have believed rightly; finding them in falsehood, He should not teach them the truth. Hear what harm it is to believe thus. Hear the Lord. Do you think you are in peril from a minor illness? Listen to the doctor's verdict. What the disciples thought they were seeing—a spirit—you think too, Manichean. The doctor came to the disciples then: He found them believing what you now believe. If He left them uncured, err confidently; but if He deigned to heal them, why do you delight in being sick? Hear the Lord: Why are you troubled, and why do thoughts arise in your heart? What kind of thoughts surely, if not false, morbid, pernicious ones? For Christ has lost the fruit of His passion if there is no truth in the resurrection. Why are you troubled, and why do thoughts arise in your heart? As a good farmer would say: What I planted there, I will find; not the thorns, which I did not plant. Faith descended into your heart, because it is from above; but these thoughts did not descend from above, but arose like bad weeds in the heart itself. But He does not leave it, He uproots the weeds that were born badly, He clears the field, He sows the good. For indeed He says, why are you troubled? because they were troubled, not orderly. Why do thoughts arise in your heart? See my hands and my feet. If it is little to see, touch; you do not believe your eyes, believe your hands. Touch, and see, because a spirit does not have bones and flesh, as you see I have.

Christ was seen, touched, and furthermore ate with his disciples. And while they were still trembling with joy. And they rejoiced, and they doubted: and they saw, and they touched, and they scarcely believed. Great is the dignity of grace upon us; we neither saw, nor touched, and we believed. But to them, while they were still trembling with joy, he said: Do you have anything here to eat? Or do you then believe that I live, if I dine with you? They offered him what they had, a piece of broiled fish. Broiled fish signifies martyrdom, faith tested by fire. Why then a part? Because if I give my body to be burned, but have not love, it profits me nothing. So make the whole body as if of martyrs; some suffer from love, others suffer from boastfulness. Take away the part of boastfulness, the part of love. This is the food of Christ, give Christ his part; Christ loves martyrs, who have suffered for love. He ate, and he himself was, he himself who was seen and hanged; he who was seen, he was touched, food was provided to him, he himself was taking and eating before the eyes of the disciples; and all these things were insufficient. Pardon them, Apostles, still hard after these things. But their correction is our edification; see what the Lord followed, how he took away all doubts. He was seen, he was touched, he ate: certainly, it was he. The truth of the resurrection from the argument of the Scriptures.

Nevertheless, so that it might not seem that he trifled with human understanding in any way, he sent his hands to the Scriptures. Let the pagans say whatever they want: He was a Magus, he could show himself. But was the Magus before he was born able to prophesy about himself from the Scriptures? See, that which you see was foreseen beforehand, and what you perceive was foretold beforehand. Hear, daughter, and see. O holy Church, listen and see: hear the predictions, see the fulfillments. The head which persuaded was the Lord Christ; it was the head of the Church that persuaded by showing himself alive, true, whole, and certain, and led believers to faith. What then did he say of the Scriptures? Do you not know that it was necessary to fulfill all that was written in the Law and the Prophets and the Psalms concerning me? Then he opened their understanding, so they might comprehend the Scriptures. And he said to them: Thus it is written, and thus it was necessary for the Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead on the third day. Behold, it is done as it was written; behold, it is fulfilled as it was predicted; behold, it is shown as it was read. Hear the words, perceive the deeds; full truth, certain faith; now let heretical deceit perish. Behold, thus it is written: Thus it was necessary, what? For Christ to suffer, it was foretold. To rise from the dead on the third day, it was foretold. The Jews had read these things: they read, but they did not see; and so that others might believe, they stumbled over the stone lying there. For if they had known, they would never have crucified the Lord of glory; if they had never crucified the Lord of glory, the nations would not have believed in the one born and having suffered. Therefore, those disciples were separated from the Jews, whose hearts were closed so they might not understand the Scriptures, by the grace of the Lord. O Apostle, O Peter, O Matthew, O Thomas, O others, who indeed distinguishes you? Perhaps you say: My faith. , if he did not give, because you would not have it. Your faith distinguishes you. But what do you have that you did not receive? But if you received it, why do you boast, as though you did not receive it? Behold grace, behold it rises, behold it shows itself to the eyes of the Apostles who did not deign to show themselves to the eyes of the Jews. Behold, he presents himself to be seen by the eyes, presents himself to be touched by the hands. It is not enough: read, he recalls the Scriptures. And this is not enough: he opens the understanding so that you might understand what you read. The Church is announced as spread through all nations.

He persuaded himself to be the head. What about us? What about the body? Christ is the head, the Church is the body; the Apostles saw the head, but they did not see the future Church. Pay attention: they saw the head, touched the head, embraced the head, conversed with the head; they did not see the future Church. Therefore, what about us? In a certain way, in those wedding tablets, both the groom and the bride ought to have been named and expressed. But because he has already shown the groom, and was silent about the bride, half of the wedding is missing. Let the heavenly vows be fulfilled: the groom has appeared, let the bride also appear; he is present, she is future; he in the resurrection, she in the preaching; let him be seen, let her be believed. How has he been seen? See that a spirit does not have bones and flesh, as you see that I have. Then he opened their minds. It was necessary for Christ to suffer, and to rise again on the third day. Now we see the Lord, now we know the Lord, we touch, hear and believe in the Lord; what about the Church? Repentance and remission of sins must be preached in his name. Where? How far? Let not something foreign come out from this corner and substitute itself for your own. Where? How far? Through all nations, beginning from Jerusalem. Behold, you have heard the Church designated. When the disciples were hearing these things, they did not see the Church throughout all nations; they saw one thing, believed another; they saw the head, believed in the body. We see the body, let us believe in the head.

Sermons - Sermon 229K

SERMON 229/K On the Day of Pentecost, when the disciples were together, suddenly a sound like the blowing of a violent wind came from heaven and filled the whole house where they were sitting. They saw what seemed to be tongues of fire that separated and came to rest on each of them. All of them were filled with the Holy Spirit and began to speak in other tongues as the Spirit enabled them.

TREATISE ON THE FIFTH DAY OF EASTER Christ is better touched by faith than by flesh.

It is good to remember what you are used to hearing every year; for just as what is written is not enough to be read once, so is an explanation of what is not understood insufficient if done only once. Therefore, those who have heard and understood, holding it in their minds and remembering well, should listen patiently, when even those who might have forgotten are instructed or hear who perhaps have not yet heard. For it is puzzling why the Lord Jesus Christ, when the faithful woman sought to reach the body of her Lord which she could not find in the tomb, said: "Do not touch me, for I have not yet ascended to my Father." For if He did not wish to be touched before He had ascended to the Father, He had not yet ascended to the Father when He said to His disciples: "See my hands and feet; touch and see." He did not want to be touched, who wanted to be palpated. Hence arises a question that must be resolved: for no one has heard it said: He wanted to be touched by men before He had ascended to the Father; but He reserved Himself to be touched by women after He had ascended to the Father. When He ascended to the Father, or when He had ascended to the Father, who touched Him? Did He reserve Himself to be touched by women at a time when He could not be touched by men? And yet, out of love, not only was He being touched by Saul the persecutor, but also ravaged on earth, when He said from heaven: "Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me?" For the Lord Christ is both there at the right hand of the Father, and here laboring on earth; He is there, but here are His members; He is there to judge the living and the dead, and the same He is here in His own, about whom He will say: "When you did it to one of the least of these my brothers, you did it to me." So what does it mean: "Do not touch me, for I have not yet ascended to the Father"? Christ is better touched by faith than by flesh; to touch Christ by faith, that is to touch. Likewise, the woman who was suffering from a flow of blood approached with faith and touched the garment with her hand, touching majesty with faith. And see what it means to touch. Then the Lord, who was pressed upon by the crowds, was touched by one. For He said: "Who touched me?" The disciples were astonished, because the crowd was pressing on Him from all sides, and they responded: "The crowds press upon you and you say, 'Who touched me?'" And He said: "Someone touched me." For if the crowds press you, they do not touch you: whence did she touch you, unless it was because she believed? By faith must be touched either the humanity or the divinity of Christ. And now, my brothers, Jesus is in heaven. When He was before His disciples, according to His visible flesh, according to His tangible bodily substance, He was seen and touched. But now as He sits at the right hand of the Father, which of us can touch Him? And yet woe to us if we do not touch Him by faith. All of us who believe touch Him. Certainly, He is in heaven, certainly He is far away, certainly it cannot be imagined by what distance of spaces He is separated from us. Believe, and you touch Him. What am I saying, you touch Him? Because you believe, you have with you the One you believe in. Therefore, if to believe is to touch, indeed if to touch is to believe, what does it mean: Do not touch me, for I have not yet ascended to my Father? What is this? Why do you seek my flesh, since you do not yet understand my divinity? Do you wish to know how this woman was wanting to touch Him? She was seeking Him as if dead, who she did not believe would rise again. They have taken my Lord from the tomb; and she laments as a man. O touch! Because she saw herself occupied with the form of a servant, she did not know, nor believe, nor understand the form of God, by which He is equal to the Father, so He defers the touch to fulfill the touch. He says, Do not touch me, for I have not yet ascended to my Father. You touch me before I ascend to the Father, and you believe only in the man; what profit is it to you that you believe? Therefore, let me ascend to the Father. From whence I never departed, I ascend for you, if you would believe me equal to the Father. For our Lord Jesus Christ did not descend from the Father in such a way that He deserted the Father; because, even as He ascended from us, He did not depart from us. For about to ascend and sit at the right hand of the Father, He says finally to the disciples: Behold, I am with you even to the end of the world.

Sermons - Sermon 229L

Sermon 229 TREATISE ON THE FIFTH DAY OF HOLY EASTER The faith to be praised is not that which mourns the dead in the tomb. The reading of the Gospel today according to John recounted the Lord's resurrection, and we heard that the Lord was sought by the disciples and not found in the tomb; this was announced by the women, who did not believe He had risen but thought He had been taken away from the tomb through theft. But two disciples came, John himself, the evangelist (for he is understood to be the one whom Jesus loved), and with him Peter, and they entered and saw the linen cloths alone, but no body; what is written about John himself? If you noticed: He entered, it says, and saw and believed. What you heard, he believed, is not praised faith; for both true and false things are believed. For if his faith was praised or commended in what was said: saw and believed, the Scripture would not follow saying: For they did not yet understand the Scriptures, that it was necessary for Jesus to rise from the dead. Therefore he saw and believed; what did he believe then? what did he believe if not what the woman had said, that the Lord had been taken away from the tomb? For she had said: They have taken the Lord out of the tomb, and I do not know where they have laid him. They ran, entered, saw the linen cloths alone, no body; and they believed He had perished, not been raised. They saw He had been taken away from the tomb, believed the men had taken Him, and left. The woman stood and began to seek the body of Jesus with tears, began to weep at the tomb; they had less concern, stronger in sex, but lesser in affection. The woman searched for Jesus more because she first had lost Jesus in paradise; because through her death had entered, she sought life more intently. And yet, how did she search? As though for the body of the dead, not the incorruption of the living God; for she did not believe either that the body was not in the tomb because the Lord had risen. She entered and saw angels. Behold, the angels did not show themselves to Peter and John, and they showed themselves to the woman. Indeed, dearest ones, this is commendable, because the weaker sex sought more, what was first, as we said, lost. The angels see her and say: He is not here, He has risen. Still she stands and weeps, still she does not believe; she thought the Lord had perished from the tomb. She saw Jesus too: she doesn't think it is Jesus, she thought it was the gardener, still seeking the body of the dead. If you, she said, have taken Him, tell me where you have laid Him, and I will take Him away. What need do you have for what you do not love? She said, let it be given to me. She was seeking the dead that she might believe in the living. Then the Lord called her by name. Mary recognized the voice, turned towards the Savior; and she responded to Him as herself: Rabboni, which is interpreted, Lord.

Faith, when praised, believes in Christ, the only-begotten of the Father, coeternal, equal.

What does it mean when it follows: Do not touch me, for I have not yet ascended to my Father? Go and tell my disciples: I ascend to my Father and your Father, to my God and your God. This indeed has no question. I ascend to my Father, because I am the Only Begotten; and to your Father, because you are adopted, and you all say together: Our Father who art in heaven. And my God and your God. Not mine in the same way as yours: mine indeed as God, because I became man; yours as God, because you are always men. According to this, God is the Father of Christ, because he became man; therefore he is his God, the God of the creature of the Only Begotten Word. Ask the Psalm: You are my God from my mother's womb. Before my mother's womb, my Father; from my mother's womb, my God. This, therefore, has no question. It somewhat disturbs due to less understanding what it means: Do not touch me, for I have not yet ascended to my Father. Did she not touch him on earth; could she touch him when he had ascended? What then is: Do not touch me, for I have not yet ascended to my Father? Recall, when he appeared to his disciples, and they thought he was a spirit, what did he say to them? It was read yesterday. Why are you troubled, and why do thoughts arise in your hearts? See my hands and my feet: touch and see. He said to the men: touch, before he ascended to the Father; and the woman could not touch until he had ascended to the Father? What is it then, so we may understand? Let it not be from us, so we may understand. Mary sought to see, looking for the body; we, so we may understand, desire his spirit. Do not touch me, for I have not yet ascended to my Father. What is: Do not touch me? Do not believe only this, do not fixate on the man; there is something greater, which you do not understand. You see me humble on earth: you touch me, and you remain on earth. Touch me higher, believe in me higher, believe in the Only Begotten equal to the Father; for when you understand me as equal, then I ascend to the Father for you. To touch with the heart is to believe; for the woman who touched the hem, touched with the heart because she believed. Indeed, he feels the one touching him and did not feel the pressing crowd. Someone touched me, said the Lord: Someone touched me, believed in me. And the disciples not understanding what it was, someone touched me, said: The crowd presses you, and you say: Who touched me? I do not know what to say: Someone touched me? The crowd presses, faith touches. Therefore, let Christ ascend to us, and let us touch him if we believe in him because he is the Son of God, eternal, coeternal, not from when he was born of the Virgin, but eternal. For he will make us eternal, not because we have always been, but because we will always be. He is coeternal, equal to the Father, without time, before all times, through whom times were made; before the day, day from day, who created the day. Believe thus, and you have touched. Touch thus, so you may adhere; so adhere, that you may never be separated, but with him remain in divinity, who for us died in weakness.

Sermons - Sermon 229M

Sermon 229/M TREATISE ON THE SIXTH DAY OF EASTER Differences between the two fishings of the disciples of Christ. Your Charity knows that these readings of the holy Gospel are commemorated with annual solemnity as witnesses to the resurrection of the Lord. Just as the reading renews memory, so does the exposition of the reading; and so we will say, with the Lord's help, what you are accustomed to hear every year. But if the reading needs to be renewed in memory, which can be read at other times in the Gospel, how much more so the sermon, which is only heard once a year? The Lord appeared to His disciples after His resurrection at the Sea of Tiberias and found them fishing and catching nothing. They caught nothing while fishing at night; daylight broke, and they caught, for they saw Christ the day, and cast their nets at the word of the Lord to catch. We find, however, two fisheries made by the disciples of Christ, at the word of Christ; the first when He chose them and made them apostles; the second now, after He rose from the dead. Let us compare them, if you please, and carefully observe what distinguishes them; for it pertains to the edification of our faith. Therefore, first, when the Lord found the fishermen, whom He had not yet found before, even throughout the whole night they caught nothing, they labored without purpose. He commanded that they cast the nets: He did not say: To the right; He did not say: To the left; but: Cast, He said, the nets. They cast... so as to load two boats, so that they almost sank by the multitude of fish; then there was such a great multitude of fish that the nets were breaking. So held that fishing: what then of this one? He said: Cast the nets on the right side. Before the resurrection, the nets were cast everywhere; after the resurrection, the right side is chosen. Then in the first fishing, the boats were pressed, the nets were broken; in this latest one after the resurrection, neither boat is pressed, nor net is broken. In the first fishing, no number of fish is mentioned; in this one after the resurrection, the number of fish is certain. Let us bear the first, so that we may come to the latest. What did I say: Let us bear the first? Behold the nets, the nets of the word, the nets of preaching, behold the nets. Let the Psalm say: I have declared, and I have spoken; they were multiplied beyond number. It is certain that it happens now: the Gospel is proclaimed, Christians are multiplied beyond number. If all would live well, the ship would not be pressed; if heresies and schisms would not be divided, the net would not be broken. Why then, in the first fishing, were there two boats? Recall, brothers: they themselves are those two walls, circumcision and uncircumcision, which meet in the chief cornerstone and find the kiss of peace there. But in the latest fishing, there is perfect unity; for it is the right side, it has nothing of the left. It is the holy Church, which is now among the few laboring among many wicked; it will be in that certain and defined number, where no sinner is found; for it is the right side, it has nothing of the left. And there will be great fish: for all will be immortal, all will live without end. What is so great as that which has no end? And it pertained to the Evangelist to renew in memory the first fishing. Why did he add: And although there were so many great fish, the nets were not broken? As if he says: Recall that first fishing, where the nets were broken. Here will be the kingdom of heaven, no heretic will bark, no schismatic will separate himself; all will be inside, they will be in peace. The number seventeen is the fullness of the law through the gifts of the Holy Spirit. And all, how many will there be? Will there be one hundred and fifty-three? Far be it, far be it from us, that even in this people, who stand here before me, I should say there are so few who will be in the kingdom of heaven, where thousands, innumerable thousands, whom John saw clothed in white robes. This he said: They came from every tribe and tongue, a number which no one can count. What then does this number mean? I teach some, I remind others; those who have not heard, let them learn; those who have heard and forgotten, let them remember; those who hold it, let them be strengthened in memory by my reminder. The explanation of this number begins with seventeen: it is the symbol of all the saints, all the faithful, all the just who will be in the kingdom of heaven. Seventeen: ten for the law, seven for the spirit of grace. Place the law: no one does it, no one fulfills it. Add the aid of the Spirit: what is commanded is done, because God helps. What does the Law say? You shall not covet. Taking opportunity through the commandment, sin deceived me, he says, and by it killed me; and the Law came in so that the trespass might increase. Add the Spirit: the fulfillment of the Law is love. But from where comes love? The love of God has been poured out into our hearts through the Holy Spirit who has been given to us. The number seven recommends the Spirit, as one who reads knows: but let him hear, who reads carelessly, or perhaps cannot read. God recommends the Holy Spirit thus through the prophet Isaiah: The Spirit, he says, of wisdom and understanding, of counsel and might, of knowledge and piety, the spirit of the fear of God. This is the sevenfold Spirit, which is also invoked over the baptized. The Law is the decalogue: for ten commandments were written on tablets, but still stone, due to the hardness of the Jews. After the Spirit came, what did the Apostle say? You are our letter, written not with ink but with the Spirit of the living God; not on tablets of stone, but on tablets of human hearts. Remove the Spirit, the letter kills; because it makes one guilty, it does not liberate the sinner. For this reason the Apostle says: For we are not competent in ourselves to claim anything for ourselves, but our competence is from God. He has made us competent as ministers of a new covenant, not of the letter but of the Spirit. For the letter kills, but the Spirit gives life. Therefore, join seven to ten, if you wish to fulfill righteousness. When you are commanded to do something by the law, ask the Spirit to help you. The symbolism of the number one hundred fifty-three.

We have commended seventeen: but how far they are from one hundred fifty-three! However, many know what we are about to say: those who know, bear with the delays. When two walk on the road, one fast and one slow, it is in the power of the fast one to walk together, if he waits for the other. Therefore, he who knows what I am about to say is fast; but let him wait for the slow companion, until he too is instructed about the seventeen. One hundred fifty-three are formed if those seventeen are counted in such a way that you start from one and add all up to seventeen. For if you start saying: One, two, three, four, you reach ten, and you will not find more than ten in your hand. But if you count thus: one and two, already they are three; and three, already they are six; and four, already they are ten; and five, already they are fifteen; and six, already they are twenty-one; and seven, already they are twenty-eight; and eight, already they are thirty-six; and nine, already they become forty-five; and ten, already they are fifty-five. Behold, now we are close, and there is hope of reaching it because we have advanced so much. Therefore, add eleven, they become sixty-six; add twelve, they become seventy-eight; add thirteen, they become ninety-one; and add fourteen, they become one hundred five. Now even the slow follow the fast. Therefore, add fifteen, they become one hundred twenty; add sixteen, they become one hundred thirty-six; add seventeen, they become one hundred fifty-three. Therefore, there will be all those who run to seventeen, who fulfill the law of God, with the help of the Spirit of God.

Sermons - Sermon 229N

Sermon 229/N TREATISE ON THE SABBATH OF THE OCTAVE OF HOLY EASTER Peter is asked three times about his love for Christ and the sheep.

Behold, the Lord, appearing again to the disciples after the resurrection, asks the apostle Peter and compels him to confess his love three times, who had denied him three times out of fear. Christ was raised in the flesh, and Peter in spirit; for when Christ died by suffering, Peter was dead by denying. The Lord Christ is raised from the dead; He revived Peter with his love. He asked for the love of the confessor and entrusted his sheep to him. For what could Peter offer Christ in that he loved Christ? If Christ loves you, it benefits you, not Christ; and if you love Christ, it benefits you, not Christ. However, wanting to show where men ought to demonstrate their love for Christ, the Lord Christ clearly revealed it by entrusting his sheep. Do you love me? I love. Feed my sheep. This once, this a second time, this a third time. He responded with nothing else but that he loved Him; the Lord asked nothing else, whether he loved Him; He entrusted nothing else to the respondent but his sheep. Let us love, and we love Christ. For Christ is always God, a man born in time. As a man from man, He appeared as a man to men; He performed many miracles as God in man. He suffered many evils as man from men; He rose after death as God in man. He lived on earth for forty days as a man with men; He ascended into heaven before their eyes as God in man and sits at the right hand of the Father. We believe all this, we do not see; and we are commanded to love the Lord Christ, whom we do not see; and we all cry out and say: I love Christ. If you do not love your brother whom you see, how can you love God whom you do not see? By loving the sheep, show you have the love of the Shepherd; for the sheep themselves are also members of the Shepherd. That the sheep might be His members, He deigned to be a sheep; that the sheep might be His members, as a sheep He was led to be sacrificed; that the sheep might be His members, it was said of Him: Behold the Lamb of God, behold Him who takes away the sins of the world. But great is the strength in this Lamb. Do you wish to know how great the strength appeared in this Lamb? The Lamb was crucified, and the Lion was conquered. See and consider by what virtue the Lord Christ rules the world, who by His death conquered the devil. When the Lord was questioning Peter, He was questioning the Church.

Let us love Him, then, let nothing be dearer to us than Him. Do you think, then, that the Lord does not question us? Did Peter alone deserve to be questioned, and not us? Whenever that passage is read, every Christian is questioned in his heart. Therefore, when you hear the Lord saying: Peter, do you love me? consider it as a mirror, and regard yourself there. For what other thing did Peter symbolically represent but the Church? Therefore, when the Lord was questioning Peter, He was questioning us, questioning the Church. For to know that Peter bore the figure of the Church, recall that passage of the Gospel: You are Peter, and on this rock I will build my Church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it; I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven. One man receives. As to what the keys of the kingdom of heaven are, He Himself explained: Whatever you bind on earth will be bound in heaven; and whatever you loose on earth will be loosed in heaven. If it was said to Peter alone, did Peter alone do this? He passed away, and he is gone; who, then, binds, who looses? I dare to say that we also have these keys. And what can I say? That we bind, we loose? You also bind, you also loose. For the one who is bound is separated from your fellowship; and when he is separated from your fellowship, he is bound by you; and when he is reconciled, he is loosed by you, because by you also God is petitioned for him. When Christ entrusts the sheep to the shepherds, the entire number of shepherds is reduced to the body of one shepherd. For we all love Christ, we are members of Him; and when He entrusts the sheep to the shepherds, the entire number of shepherds is reduced to the body of one shepherd. For that you may know the entire number of shepherds is reduced to the body of one shepherd, certainly Peter is a shepherd, surely a shepherd; Paul is a shepherd, indeed surely a shepherd; John is a shepherd, James is a shepherd, Andrew is a shepherd, and the other Apostles are shepherds. All the holy bishops are certainly shepherds, indeed surely so. And how is it true: And there shall be one flock and one shepherd? Furthermore, if it is true: There shall be one flock and one shepherd, the whole innumerable number of shepherds is reduced to the body of one shepherd. But there you are also, you are members of Him. Saul, once a persecutor, later a preacher, was trampling those members, when the head was shouting for His members, breathing slaughter, deferring faith. His whole onslaught was laid low with a single voice. With which voice? Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me? Could Saul even throw a stone to heaven, where Jesus sits? Suppose Saul had been in the crowd when Jesus was hanging on the wood. Suppose Saul had said with the crowd: Crucify, crucify; and he had been among those who shook their heads in insult, and said: If he is the Son of God, let him come down from the cross. What could he do to the one sitting in heaven? What harm could a word do? What harm could a shout do? What harm could wood do? What harm could a lance do? Nothing could be done to Him anymore, and yet He shouted: You persecute me. When He shouted: You persecute me, He was indicating that we are His members. Therefore, the love of Christ, whom we love in you; the love of Christ, which you also love in us, through temptations, through labors, through sweats, through anxieties, through miseries, through groans, will lead us where there is no labor, no misery, no groan, no sigh, no annoyance, no one is born, no one dies, no one fears the wrath of the powerful, by clinging to the face of the Almighty.

Sermons - Sermon 229O

Sermon 229/O TREATISE OF THE SABBATH OF THE OCTAVE OF HOLY EASTER Peter, by the gift of God, healthily wept for his fault.

You heard the confession of the Apostle Peter when the Lord questioned, whose denial you had heard when the maid frightened him. For it was said to the one presuming: "You will deny me"; it was said to the one loving: "Do you love me?" For the Apostle Peter wavered, presuming upon his own strength of mind. Long ago the Psalm had said: "Those who trust in their own strength..." Thus Peter became like the one about whom it is sung in the Psalms: "I said in my abundance: I shall never be moved." In his abundance he had said to Christ: "With you until death"; in his abundance he had said: "I shall never be moved." However, the Lord, as a skillful physician, knew better what was happening in the frail than did the frail themselves. Physicians do the same in the illnesses of bodies, as the Lord can also in the illnesses of souls. For what do you think, I ask you, should the sick wait to hear from the doctor what is happening to them? They can perceive the pains they suffer; but whether they are dangerous, and what causes they have, whether they can escape them or not, the doctor inspects the vein and tells the sick what is happening within them. Therefore, when the Lord said to the blessed Peter, "You will deny me three times," he touched the vein of his heart. Behold, what the physician predicted happened, and what the frail presumed was found false. For in the same Psalm the Holy Spirit follows with: "I said in my abundance: I shall never be moved," as if presuming upon his own strength of mind. Immediately he added: "O Lord, in thy favor thou hast made my mountain strong. Thou didst hide thy face, and I was troubled." What did he say? What I had, I had from you, but I believed it was from myself. You hid your face; you took away what you had given; and I was troubled. I found who I was, because you had withdrawn. Therefore, the Lord deserted Peter for a time, to make him healthily humble: however, when he looked at him, then he wept. Thus you have it in the Gospel: after he denied him three times, and what the Lord had predicted was fulfilled, what is written? "The Lord looked at him, and Peter remembered." If the Lord had not looked at him, Peter would have forgotten everything. The Lord looked at him, and Peter remembered, because Jesus had said to him: "Before the cock crows, you will deny me three times." And he went out and wept bitterly. Therefore, Peter needed the baptism of tears to wash away the sin of denial, but where would he have this from, unless the Lord also gave it? For this reason, the Apostle Paul, when admonishing the people on how they should deal with those holding different views, said: "Correcting those who are in opposition in gentleness, if God perhaps may give them repentance." Therefore, repentance is also a gift of God. The hard heart of the proud does not soften to repentance unless it is watered by God's grace.

It was fitting that the threefold confession should erase the threefold denial.

Now, therefore, after the resurrection of the Lord, Peter is questioned: a confession is elicited, a passion is predicted; he is found in love, strengthened in virtue. The Lord says to him already after the resurrection: Peter, do you love me more than these? You who denied me, do you love me? It is now sufficient for you: you see alive the one whom you saw dying, when you feared death. Behold, I live, behold, I am: why did you fear to die? When you denied me, certainly you did not lose me. So, do you love me? because I am. And he: Lord, indeed, you know that I love you. Why do you ask me what you know? You knew, when you predicted to me that I would deny you. What I did not know in myself, you knew: and what I know, do you not know? For I see in my heart that I love you, but you see it too; for you did not see the present love, who saw the future fear. And again the Lord knows, and asks; and again Peter responds the same to the one asking the same. And the Lord asks a third time, so that a threefold confession may erase a threefold denial. Let us rejoice with the Apostle: He was dead and has come to life again; he was lost and has been found.

Feed the sheep, but remember that they are mine.

Arm yourself for better and greater things; it is said to him: Feed my sheep; where certainly he was going to be endangered in the flesh, to be glorified in the spirit. For by feeding the sheep of Christ, how much he was going to suffer for the name of Christ! Feed my sheep, feed my lambs. For what are you going to offer me if you love me? The chief Shepherd appoints Peter as the shepherd to feed the sheep of Christ, not his own. For indeed some, who wanted to be learned of the Apostles, are called back by the Apostles themselves to the full understanding. For the sheep were of Christ, and they desired to be of men; and others said: I am of Paul, I am indeed of Apollo, but I am of Cephas. There were sheep there who recognized the Lord: I, however, belong to Christ. But Paul, knowing that Christ entrusted his sheep to the Apostles, not those of men, rejected such lordship over himself; he confesses that he is not the Lord, so that he may be with the Lord. Was Paul crucified for you? or were you baptized in the name of Paul? You are his sheep, do you not know whose sheep you are? Read the character in which you were sealed. Feed my sheep. Why? Because you love me, because you cherish me, I entrust my sheep to you; feed them, but remember they are mine. However, the leaders of heresies want to make their own sheep, which are Christ's; but still, whether they wish it or not, they are compelled to impose the character of Christ. They make their own special flock and inscribe in the name of the Lord. But what does the divine Scripture say to such in the Songs of Songs? For the bridegroom calls the bride the Church, and says: Unless you know yourself, O beautiful among women. What does it mean: Beautiful among women? Catholic among heresies. Behold how he threatens. Unless you know yourself, whose you are, what you believe, to whom you belong, how far and wide you are spread, by whose blood you were redeemed; unless you know yourself, O beautiful among women, unless you know yourself, I cast you out, go you away. What does it mean: go you away? What John says in his epistle: They went out from us, but they were not of us. Go away in the footsteps of the flocks; not in the footsteps of the shepherd, but in the footsteps of the flocks; following the footprints of men, not of Christ. And feed your goats; not, like Peter, my sheep. And where do you feed your goats? In the tabernacles of the shepherds; divided in the tabernacles of the shepherds, not in the tabernacle of the shepherd. I have other sheep, that are not of this fold; I must bring them also, and they will heed my voice. So there shall be one flock, one shepherd.

Augustine announces that one of the four Eunomians has become a Catholic.

I announce therefore to your Charity, that yesterday we were not severe in vain; by the severity of discipline we gained profit. One of those four today anathematized the heresy of the Arians and Eunomians along with Arius and Eunomius himself, and became Catholic. Therefore, whom we showed yesterday as to be avoided, today we show as to be loved. Therefore, I commend him to you, so that you may see him now with joy, not suspicion. I also commend that you pray for the others.

Sermons - Sermon 229P

Sermon 229/P On the Love of Peter The Church is built upon the confession of Peter.

These things are read according to the evangelist John, which took place after the resurrection of the Lord. Among them, this was read today: how the Lord asked the apostle Peter whether he loved Him more than the others. In this Peter, remember the rock. For he is the one who, when the Lord asked who the disciples thought He was, responded: You are the Christ, the Son of the living God. Upon hearing this, Jesus said to him: Blessed are you, Simon Bar-Jona, because flesh and blood did not reveal this to you, but My Father who is in heaven. And I say to you - as if He said, "You have said to Me, I say to you." What? - You are Peter, and upon this rock, I will build My Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven. Whatever you bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatever you loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven. We see in Peter the commended rock. The Apostle Paul, however, says of the earlier people: They drank from the spiritual rock that followed them; and the rock was Christ. Therefore, this disciple from the rock is Peter, just as from Christ there is a Christian. Why did I want to preface these things? So that I may commend to you the Church to be recognized in Peter. For Christ did not build the Church upon a man, but upon Peter's confession. What is Peter’s confession? You are the Christ, the Son of the living God. Behold the rock, behold the foundation, behold where the Church is built, which the gates of hell do not overcome. What are the gates of hell if not the pride of heretics?

Peter is questioned by the Lord after the resurrection.

Therefore this Peter, bearing such a role as I have commended to you, is questioned by the Lord after the resurrection, as it is read, and it is said to him: Simon, son of John - for Simon was called by this name from his birth: he was the son of John - Simon, son of John, do you love me more than these? Who asks this? The one who knows all things. Like someone who doesn’t know? The one who bestowed knowledge. The Lord himself did not want to be instructed, but he wanted to make him confess. He asks once, and that man says to him: You know, Lord, that I love you. And he: Feed my lambs. And again he asks, as if once were not enough: Simon, son of John, do you love me? I love you, Lord, I love you, Lord: this again. And again he says: Feed my lambs. And for the third time - Who is not satisfied with once? The one who does not know is satisfied. How much more the one who knows beforehand! - he asks for the third time: Do you love me? Peter was grieved, as if he were being questioned continually because there was doubt about him, and he said: Lord, you know all things: you know that I love you. If anything were hidden from you, you would question me rightly. If you know all things, you know this which you question in all things. And he: Feed my sheep. Three times the love was confessed, which fear had denied three times. Therefore the Lord asked three times so that the threefold confession might erase the threefold denial. By denying Christ, Peter manifested that he was sick. This is that Peter, the denier and the lover; a denier by human weakness, a lover by divine grace. For when Peter denied, he was shown himself. For he had presumptuously and somewhat proudly displayed his strength when he said: "Lord, I am ready to go with you to prison and to death," presuming upon his own strength. And then indeed he heard who he was. For he was presuming out of his own sickness, and the doctor was touching the vein of his heart. In his innermost being, the doctor found him sick and, as a true and faithful doctor, foretold what would happen, as if saying: "Even though you see yourself as healthy, you do not know that you still have the fever, but now it is being revealed to you. You will be troubled when the attack comes." Therefore, when he was questioned by the maid and what the doctor predicted was fulfilled in him, not what the sick man had presumed, so that before the cock crowed, such a servant would deny the Lord three times, what is written in the Gospel after he denied three times? "The Lord turned and looked at him, and he wept bitterly." He would never have wept if the Lord had not looked at him. Finally, to understand how it is said: "The Lord turned and looked at him," observe the Gospel and see that the Lord was in that place when Peter denied, so that He did not look at him with physical eyes; for He Himself was being heard by the leaders of the Jews inside the house, but Peter denied in the courtyard. But where does He not look, who is everywhere?

Christ's sheep are entrusted to Peter. For this reason he was asked about love, and the sheep of Christ were entrusted to him. It was said to him: Feed my lambs. Feed my sheep. The lamb entrusted the lambs. He entrusted his lambs, who made himself a lamb. How did the lamb make lambs for himself? Behold the lamb of God. It was said about him: Behold the lamb of God. And how did he make lambs for himself? Behold him who takes away the sin of the world. So he also made these whom we now see dressed in white. May the wolves not devour them! You, Lord, protect them, who commended them to Peter. You protect them, who also protect Peter. He himself is also the sheep about which it is written: Like a sheep he was led to the slaughter. He is always a lamb because he is always without sin. And do not wonder he is without sin: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. Where could there be sin in him? Look at his human birth. He wanted to be born without sin, whom a virgin conceived, whom no carnal desire sought. Conception of the son: faith of the mother. He was born of the Holy Spirit and the virgin Mary, not drawing original sin from Adam, not drawing, not adding. He was born innocent, lived innocent, died innocent. Behold the lamb of God; behold him who takes away the sin of the world. When he commended his sheep to Peter, he commended us. When he commended us to Peter, he commended his members to the Church. Therefore, commend, Lord, your Church to your Church, let your Church commend itself to you. For we say: Not to us, Lord, not to us, but to your name give glory. For who are we without you, except Peter when he denied you thrice? The Lord, to show Peter himself, that is, to show Peter to Peter, turned his face slightly away from him, and he denied. He turned to him when he looked at him, and he wept. He washed away the guilt with his tears, he shed water from his eyes and baptized his conscience. Let us consider him in a certain Psalm where it is written: I said in my prosperity: I shall never be moved. What if it is not Peter saying: I am with you until death, and if necessary, I shall die for you and not depart from you? He says in his prosperity. What does he say? I shall never be moved. But after he was questioned, he denied thrice, and wept, see what he adds - they are the words of him now repenting -: I said in my prosperity: I shall never be moved. Lord, by your will you have provided my beauty with strength. You turned your face away from me and I was troubled. You turned your face away and showed me my own face: I do not know what you are saying; I do not know the man. Behold, Peter himself in himself; behold what it is: You turned your face away and I was troubled. Therefore, the Lord restored his face by looking at him, and he was confirmed.

Sermons - Sermon 229R

Sermon 229/R (partial):

"The Lord ascended into heaven Let us shout for joy. He reigns at the right hand of the Father; Let us rejoice and be glad." FROM THE SERMONS OF THE OCTAVE OF EASTER A fragment.

Light and firmament are explained allegorically.

Under the name of light, by allegory, we understand all the just and faithful, as the Apostle says: "You were sometime darkness, but now light in the Lord." But this light was made. However, there was the true light, which enlightens every man coming into this world, which was not made, but born of God. That light was not made, and by the one not made, this one was made. Thus also the firmament: as the light was made by the shining God, so the firmament was made by the firm God. And we find that the firmament in the Church ought to be understood as the authority of the divine Scriptures; and therefore first light, then firmament; because Scripture was made by just men, and unless they were first justified, so that they might be light, Scripture could not be propagated, so that it might become the firmament between the waters and the waters, a mediator between the inferior peoples of men and the superior peoples of angels. Why? Because angels do not desire to profit from the Scriptures, hence they are not under the firmament, under the authority of the Scriptures; because they contemplate the appearance of divinity and wisdom. But we rightfully are under the firmament, to whom the will of God is revealed through the authority of the Scriptures.

Sermons - Sermon 229S

Sermon 229/S FROM THE SERMONS OF THE PASCHAL OCTAVE

FRAGMENT The sea and dry land are allegorically described.

We see the land, we see the sea: they are the works of God; these are subject to our eyes, those are subject to our intellects; these are known to our flesh, those are known to our minds. What is the dry land in the Church? Every soul thirsting for God is called the dry land. For the waters were separated, and dry land appeared. This sea is the world and the evil waters are bitter; they were separated and gathered into one congregation, that is, predestined for one end, to which God directs all those whom He separates from the saints. But God separates; for man cannot separate these, and the dry land appears by separation. Place two men together: one desires a spectacle, the other the church. Joined in body, they are separated in desires. The former belongs to the bitter water, the latter appears as dry land. How do we know that this land, which signifies men desiring good, is dry? The Psalm says to God: "My soul is like a waterless land to You." My soul has thirsted for You. It thirsts, it is dry; it is separated from the waters of the sea. Let it not consider that it is not yet separated in body; desire has already caused the separation. Some desire God, others desire the world. What then does the dry land thirst for? Rain from heaven, rain from the clouds, rain from the Scriptures, rain from the firmament. When it desires rain, it desires sweet water separated from bitter water. But God knows that the dry land desires, for it is hidden and in secret. The desires of the sea, that is, secular desires, are apparent. If anyone desires money, they are moved towards that money, they want to acquire it; since money is a visible thing, its desire is apparent. But he who desires God, his desire is hidden; for God, whom he desires, is hidden; He is inward, a hidden thing. Indeed, he thirsts, and he is dry; but he appears to the eyes of God. And he did not omit the fruit, he immediately said: "Let the land sprout a plant of fodder." Let the land sprout on the very day it became dry. That dry land could not be without fruit for long. Let us also hear the word of God so that the land may sprout a plant of fodder, that is, good works of mercy, of which Isaiah says: "Share your bread with the hungry, and bring the needy without shelter into your house," and so on. Therefore, the firmament is the Scripture of God; the luminaries in the firmament are the understanding of the Scriptures; the lights in heaven are the intellect in the Scriptures. Do you wish to attain the heavenly light? First, be the land that gives fruits, that is, good works of mercy precede; for after the works of mercy comes the illumination of that light which you desire.

Sermons - Sermon 229T

Sermon 229/T FROM THE SERMONS OF THE EASTER OCTAVE

FRAGMENT The lights placed in the firmament are interpreted allegorically. The evangelists are luminaries, the firmament of God's Scripture. The Gospel, which has testimony from the Law and the Prophets, is the luminaries in the firmament of heaven. However, a little one in the Church cannot yet grasp solid food, but is content with milk, which signifies the lesser luminary and the stars. Therefore: The greater luminary for ruling the day, the lesser luminary for ruling the night. As long as men are carnal and cannot comprehend that wisdom by which all things are made, they are in the night: but He did not abandon the night; He provided faith. God did not abandon the night; He gave it His luminaries. The day seeks the sun, the sun suffices for it; the moon and the stars are given to the night, they illuminate it; and when the moon does not shine upon the earth, the light that is in the air comes from the stars. Hence, we go outside at night and see trees; and if we do not discern them clearly, we still see the light of the stars somewhat; thus, when the clouds are thick, the light of the stars is taken away, and man under the open sky is as if he were inside a room. Therefore, even the night has its own light. Let us see what the Apostle says about these gifts, these spiritual gifts: "To each is given the manifestation of the Spirit for common good." How is it given? Indeed, to one is given through the Spirit the word of wisdom, to another the word of knowledge. Whoever understands the difference between the word of wisdom and the word of knowledge understands the difference between the greater luminary and the lesser luminary. Let us hear the word of Wisdom: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God; He was in the beginning with God," and so forth. Those who comprehend, it is day for them, the sun shines for them; but if they did not come first from the night, they did not come to the light: "Darkness was over the face of the abyss, and God said: 'Let there be light.'" No one should say that light began as such. For we all are justified from sinners. Therefore, let those who can, grasp what I have said about the Gospel. But they say to me: We did not understand what "In the beginning was the Word" means. Therefore, if it is still night for you, consider that the Word assumed flesh and made for you as if a night-time light: "The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us." And God speaks through an angel in the bush to Moses. Listen to where the word of Wisdom is. Moses said: "What is your name? How do I proclaim you to the people? If it is said: Who sent you? What should I say?" Hear the word of Wisdom: "You shall say to the children of Israel: 'He who is has sent me to you.'" Who can grasp "He who is"? The things that are not. Who truly is? He who does not pass away, who always remains immutable. But this is the food of the mature, this is the sun of the day. And as if Moses said to Him: I am still night, illuminate the night, let me say something that the night can grasp, let me say something the little ones can retain: "I am the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." Therefore: "I am who I am" for the power of the day, "I am the God of Abraham" for the power of the night. Faith temporally administered shines in the night; wisdom eternally abiding shines in the day. It nourishes in the night so that we may proceed to the day. Thus, the other gifts are the stars. For when he said: To some is given the word of wisdom, as if the sun to the power of the day; to others is given the word of knowledge, as if the moon to the power of the night; he also gives stars: to others gifts of healing, to others prophecy, and so on.

Sermons - Sermon 229U

The text is locked for copyright reasons, and I cannot provide an exact translation without seeing the text. Please provide the excerpt you wish to have translated, and I will translate it for you. FROM THE SERMONS OF THE EIGHT DAYS OF EASTER Fragment Reptiles are allegorically narrated as living souls.

Let us therefore see what the Scriptures say. Light through light, the just through the Word. The firmament of the sky, the assurance of the Scriptures. Waters below the firmament, the earthly people; waters above the firmament, the heavenly people. Dry land separated from the waters of the sea, souls thirsting for God from the multitude of the world's sins. The earth brings forth grasses and fruit-bearing trees, the works of mercy. The lights in the firmament of the sky, the preachers of the word, Evangelists and Apostles, spiritual gifts. Let us therefore attend to the lights going around the whole world, and see how the waters bring forth reptiles of living souls. The Evangelists go forth, men are evangelized. Therefore the reptiles of living souls are understood as sacraments. Why? Because the sacraments are necessary for this purpose, that they may be evangelized to the gentiles and that men may be separated from the gentiles, that is, that those bitter waters may bring forth and become sweet fish. For it is a great thing. No one can taste the water of the sea, but can eat the fish; they are born and thrive in bitterness. These are the sweet sacraments, which have been sent through the whole world. But they are called reptiles of living souls; not yet a living soul. Why? This is somewhat thick to understand. You heard just now, when the reading was read, that Simon Magus was baptized and did not lay aside his evil mind; he had the form of the sacrament, he did not have the power of the sacrament. Hear the Apostle, what he says about the impious: Having, he says, a form of godliness, but denying its power. What is the form of godliness? The visible sacrament. What is the power of godliness? Invisible charity. Hear the power of godliness: If I speak in the tongues of men and of angels, but have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, and so on: and though I have this and that, but have not charity, I am nothing. For the sacraments are holy and great; but a man is nothing if he does not have charity. Therefore the power of the sacrament is charity. Which charity the heretic does not have when I find the form of the sacrament with him. Therefore, when a heretic comes to me, I respect the form of the sacrament, so as not to rebaptize; but I restore the power of the sacrament, so that I may instill the root of charity. Therefore, it will be a living soul which the earth brings forth, so that it may be a living soul, already having the power of the sacrament. This, therefore, is what was said: Let the waters bring forth reptiles of living souls, and so on.

Sermons - Sermon 229V

Sermon 229/V FROM THE SERMON OF THE OCTAVE OF EASTER

FRAGMENT The individual works of God the Creator are found in man. On the sixth day God said: Let the earth bring forth a living soul; not reptiles of living souls, but a living soul. And the earth produced all the cattle and beasts and serpents and whatever creeps upon the earth. And God saw that it was good. And God said, on the same sixth day, when the earth brought forth the living soul: Let us make man in our image and likeness, and the other things that follow. We said that God made the light, that is, all the faithful; He made the firmament in the world, the heaven between the waters and the waters; He made the firmament in the Church, the authority of the Scriptures between the people of angels, to whom this is not necessary, and the people of men, who would seek God there; God made in the world the separation of the sea from the land, God made in the Church the separation of the Gentiles from His servants; the dry land thirsts for rain, people in the Church thirst for heavenly rain; the earth brought forth the grass of food and fruit-bearing trees, and people in the Church also produce works of mercy; lights are made in the sky; the greater light, the word of wisdom; the lesser light, the word of knowledge; the stars, the gifts of healing, prophecy, faith, and other things; all these in the firmament of the sky. When they then began to walk and roam the whole world, the waters generated, that is, from the Gentiles emerged the reptiles of living souls, the holy sacraments; and consecrated men having the form; for the form of the sacrament is in man, and sometimes the virtue of the sacrament immediately follows, but already in the land which is separated; therefore the earth brings forth a living soul. And indeed, brothers, it is a work to be a living soul. The brothers received baptism, let the virtue follow the form. Let baptism not be for judgment, but for salvation. It was for judgment for Simon Magus, for salvation for Peter. Let us then see what a living soul is, which the earth brought forth. Attend to man: he has a body, he has a soul. In that soul he has many movements similar to beasts; and he has something else, which the beasts do not have. What movements does he have similar to beasts? Eating and drinking, sleeping and waking, and generating. Are these not common to us with beasts? Whoever casts these movements into luxury has a dead soul, not a living soul. How do we prove this? Hear the Apostle: But she who lives in pleasure is dead while she lives. What is it to live in pleasures, if not to relax those movements of the soul, which we have in common with cattle, into immoderate pleasures and lusts, into gluttony, into drunkenness, into fornication, into drowsiness? They live in pleasures, who live thus; but they are dead alive. If, however, all these affections are restrained, and these movements are held towards chastity, towards continence, the earth brings forth a soul; which, because it was dead in pleasures, remains that being restrained from pleasures it begins to live and to have the virtue of piety. But what is the virtue of piety? Love of God and neighbor. But he who has love restrains through faith all lusts, all desires, all movements of his soul, which he has in common with cattle, it will be a living soul. And it follows that man is already formed in the image and likeness of God. He is formed, however, when all these things that have been said are concluded in that man. Because as God made light, it was said about man in the Church; and He made the firmament, the authority of the Scriptures for man's sake; and He separated the waters from the land, the Gentiles from the faithful; and the earth brought forth grass of food, works of mercy; and the lights in the sky, the holy Evangelists in man; and the earth brought forth the reptile of living souls, the sacraments; and this in men. Afterwards, He brought forth a living soul, the restraints of all lusts; and this in man. Join all these to the understanding, and man was made in the image and likeness of God. Attend to where we prove it from. Therefore, He said of each: God saw that it was good. But when He made the better thing, He did not see that it was made better; but in man Himself, He concluded all things that were made, and it was said: God saw all things that He had made, and behold they were very good. For a long time He said of each that they were good; when man was made, He named all. It is understood that those individual things are found altogether in man. Do you seek light in man? You find faith. Do you seek the firmament? You find the authority of the Scriptures. Do you seek the separation of waters? You find the faithful separated from the Gentiles. Do you seek the sprouting of grass and fruit-bearing trees? You find good works, works of mercy. Do you seek the lights of the sky? You find the Evangelists. Do you seek the reptiles of living souls? You find the sacraments. Do you seek a living soul? You find continence. Do you seek man in man? You find the image and likeness of God.

God seeks His image in man. And now pay attention: man is set in his punishment, and how much the remnants of the image of God, which remained in him, are worth. He has trampled on that image through sin, and it is reformed through grace, which was worn out through lust. For just as a coin, if rubbed against the earth, loses the image of the emperor, so the mind of man, if rubbed against earthly lusts, loses the image of God. But the minter Christ comes, who will remint the coins. And how does he remint the coins? By forgiving sins through grace: and he will show you that God seeks his image. For when it was said to him about Caesar's tribute: Is it lawful to give tribute to Caesar? - for they were tempting him, so that if he said: "It should not be given", they might accuse him before the collectors of the tribute: "See who teaches that we should not pay tribute"; but if he said: "It should be given": "See who cursed Jerusalem, made it tributary" - what then did he say, and what did he advise? Why do you tempt me, hypocrites? Bring me a coin. And they brought it to him. Whose image and inscription does it have? They answered: Caesar's. Therefore, render unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's, and unto God the things that are God's; that is: if Caesar seeks his image on the coin, does not God seek his image in man?

Works of mercy are shown to the Lord himself. The earth brought forth grass for fodder and fruit-bearing trees; men in the Church also produce works of mercy, following those works which were also shown to the Lord when He was in the flesh, not only by men, such as Zacchaeus, but also by women, who ministered to Him from their substance.

Sermons - Sermon 22A

SERMON 22/A SERMON ON THE RESPONSE OF PSALM 70:

"My God, deliver me from the hand of the sinner."

God is to be worshiped freely.

Every soul that earnestly sings psalms to God must necessarily think at that time about its own dangers and be touched by a somewhat intimate feeling, if by chance it is enduring some tribulation externally or some difficulty internally, and it refers what it sings to what it endures. We responded: Lord, deliver me from the hand of the sinner and from the hand of the criminal and injurious one. Perhaps each of you, when hearing these words from the reader or responding yourselves, thinks only of some enemy of yours, or someone who slanders you, or who is preparing to throw you into prison, or who might be composing a false document against you: you call that person a sinner, that person a criminal, and you desire to be delivered from him. You see someone singing, and singing with feeling, even accommodating the expression of the psalm with his face, sometimes even wetting his face with tears, sighing between the words of the song. He who does not discern affections, already praises that person, and says: "He listens to the reading with great emotion. How he groans, how he sighs!". But he is thinking about that enemy of his, from whom he fears some slander, some violence, some fraud and circumvention; and with all his might, and with all his innermost feelings, with voice, face, and sighs says: Lord, deliver me from the hand of the sinner and from the hand of the criminal and injurious one. Such a person singing, sings as an old man, and understanding carnally, tries, being old, to sing a new song. Let the new man sing if he sings the new song. What is it for the new man to sing? Let him be renewed by the desire for a new life, let him covet something else, let him sigh to God for something else, let him be a lover of the heavenly kingdom. To put it more briefly: let him be a lover of God, love God, love freely. For this was what the devil wanted to object to and in this he wanted to convict the holy man Job, as if he were old, so that he could prevent him from reaching what is promised to the new, by saying: Does Job fear God for nothing? Therefore, if he worships freely, he has overcome the devil; if he does not worship freely, he is overcome by the devil. For the slanderer's objection would have been valid if Job had not worshiped God freely. "That is why he worships you," he says, "because you have given him so much." Therefore, God allowed Job to be tempted so that from whom He knew He was worshiped freely, He might also show us something to imitate. For He was known to God, but was hidden from us. Therefore, see what happened to the devil's perversion: when he wanted to show one sinner, he made many imitators of the holy man. For he did not subject him to himself but showed him to us. So then? How was Job understood to worship freely? Because he did not give thanks when he had and blaspheme when he did not have, but he placed God's pleasure above all his riches, as if saying: "I have Him who gave, why should I seek what He gave?" The Example of Job.

I will say then, Brothers, whoever worships the Lord for the sake of having wealth, having worldly honors, and asks these things from Him, it is clear that he does not worship freely. He worships for a reward. If God does not give him these things, he is to be forsaken. Whoever gives more is thought to be more worshiped. And only He gives. Nevertheless, if another gave, the lovers of these things would flee to him, abandoning God. Strive towards God, let God be your entire good, let God be your true good. Therefore, with all things taken away, since the devil did not take away the one who loved freely, even by his own voice the devil was cast down: The Lord gave and the Lord has taken away, as it pleased the Lord, so it has been done. He did not say: "And what shall I do against the Lord? I will mourn, because I cannot conquer Him." He said, the name of the Lord be blessed. Only for his sons, whose sin he feared, did he tear his garments, praying with fatherly affection for them. As for what God took away, he accepted it willingly, because he embraced God more willingly.

What it means to worship God freely.

Someone exists and says, "I do not worship God for riches, and He knows it, nor for vain and temporal honors." And for what reason then? Let us find a person worshiping and loving freely. And for what reason then? "I do not want riches," he says, "I desire the sufficiency of things. Nothing should be lacking in my house; I wish to be safe with my spouse, with my children. This is enough for me." Still, you do not yet worship God freely. Job shows us this himself. For the devil, indeed with the permission of God, who had taken away his riches—and he had not fallen, for he trampled them so that he might depend on God—also took away his health, and God permitted this. And Job was demonstrated to worship God freely, even though he worshiped and loved Him not for bodily health itself. And the devil did not strike him in one member. He made him putrid from head to foot. And this was for his greater subjugation so that he might be more greatly triumphed, so that the one who had seduced immortal Adam might be conquered by a putrid man. Hence, he struck him with a severe wound from head to foot, and while rotting with worms, he endured a tempting wife, left to him as an assistant by the devil. She herself was Eve, but he was not the same Adam. She subjected him to the persuasion of blasphemy so that he, losing patience, would lose Him whom he worshiped freely. But when would he lose Him, to whom he clung so? For what did he respond to the wife speaking such things? "You have spoken like one of the foolish women. Shall we accept good from the hand of the Lord, and not endure evil?" Behold one worshipping freely, even not for the health of the body itself, which we have in common with cattle.

Cling to God in faith, you will cling to His form.

Therefore, there is another thing that God keeps for us. For this reason let Him be worshiped, for this reason let Him be loved. He keeps Himself for those who love Him. He wishes to show His face to the purified, not with the eye of the flesh, but with the eye of the heart: Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. Love, so that you may see, for what you will see is not despicable, it is not trivial. You will see Him, who made whatever you love. And if these things are beautiful, what must He be like who made them? God does not want you to love the earth, God does not want you to love heaven, that is, what you see, but Himself whom you do not see. But you will not always not see, if you do not always not love. Love Him while absent, so that you may enjoy Him when present. Desire Him whom you may hold, whom you may embrace. Adhere to Him first by faith, later you will adhere by sight. For now you walk as a foreigner by faith and hope. When you arrive, you will enjoy Him whom you loved as a foreigner. He Himself established the homeland to which you hurry to come. From there He sent letters to you, so that you may not delay returning from the pilgrimage. Therefore, if you aim for that homeland where you will enjoy the founder of the homeland, now you are in the desert among many temptations, the enemy must be guarded against. Learn against whom you sing: O God, deliver me from the hand of the sinner and from the hand of the criminal and the injurious one. The sinner is the devil, brothers, the criminal is the devil, the injurious one. From his hand wish to be freed, so that once the way is completed, along which he dares to lay in wait, you may come to the homeland where he cannot be admitted. The enemy is the devil.

Hear that the devil is a sinner. It is written: From the beginning the devil sins. Now, who does not know that he is wicked and injurious? What is so wicked as being a murderer? Who killed a man first, if not he who deceived Adam? And he is injurious, who acts against righteousness, because he never stood in truth. Against this wicked and injurious one, it is sung: O Lord, deliver me from the hand of the wicked and injurious one. Do not contend with your neighbor who slanders, do not against the powerful who moves your boundary, do not against the one who ambushes you to kill you. For all these are men who ambush you. They are flesh and blood, they pass away. Hear the Apostle saying: Your struggle is not against flesh and blood. So, against whom is the struggle? Against whom is it said: Deliver me, O Lord, from the hand of the sinner and from the hand of the wicked and injurious one? It is not, he says, against flesh and blood, but against the rulers, against the authorities, against the cosmic powers of this present darkness, against the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly places. By avoiding man, you are cautious; by praying, you are cautious of the devil. You avoid a visible enemy, so where he is present, you are not; for you avoid what you see. How will you avoid what you do not see? By praying. Pray against him: your weapons are your prayers. You are silent, thus he ambushes; you pray, and he is consumed. But pray with affection, by which you freely love.

Sermons - Sermon 23

SERMO 23 SERMON GIVEN IN THE BASILICA OF FAUSTUS OF THE VERSE OF PSALM 72:

"You have held the hand of my right." On the Vision of God The office of a teacher is dangerous, but the discipleship is safe.

What we have sung to the Lord, let us believe it is our purpose to speak. From this, let our speech to you be derived. And to whom we said: "You have held my right hand, and with your will you have guided me, and with glory you have taken me," may He Himself lift up your hearts to clearer understanding, and may His mercy and grace help us—me in speaking, you in judging. For although we seem to stand on a higher place for the convenience of projecting our voice, nevertheless, in that higher place, you judge, and we are judged. We are called teachers, but in many things, we seek a teacher, nor do we wish to be considered masters. For it is dangerous and prohibited, as the Lord Himself says: "Do not wish to be called masters, for one is your master, Christ." Therefore, teaching is dangerous; discipleship is safe. Hence the psalm says: "To my hearing, you will give joy and exultation." For the hearer of the word is more secure than the speaker of the word. Therefore, he stands securely, and hears it, and rejoices with joy because of the voice of the bridegroom.

He who speaks, even if he does not offend, suffers with fear lest he offend. And because the Apostle Doctor had taken on the role by the necessity of dispensation, see what he says: "With much fear and trembling I was among you." Therefore, it is safer that both we who speak, and you who listen, know that we are fellow students under one teacher. It is altogether safer and expedient that you listen to us not as teachers, but as your fellow students. For see the anxiety imposed on us where it is said: "Brothers, do not become many teachers, for in many things we all offend." Who does not tremble when the Apostle says: "All"? And it follows: "Whoever does not offend in speech, he is a perfect man." But who would dare to say he is perfect? Therefore, he who stands and listens does not offend in speech. But he who speaks, even if, which is difficult, does not offend, what does he suffer when he fears he might offend? It is necessary, therefore, for you to be not only listeners of those speaking, but also sympathizers of those fearing, so that in what we say truthfully—since all truth is from the Truth—you praise not us, but Him; where however we offend as men, you pray to Him for us.

We do not corrupt it being corrupted, but the Scripture stands correct. The Holy Scriptures are, they are true, they are blameless. All Scripture inspired by God is useful for teaching, for rebuking, for exhortation, for doctrine. Therefore, there is no reason for us to accuse Scripture, if perhaps, not having understood it, we deviate in some way. When we understand it, we are upright. But when it is not understood, we are perverse, leaving it while it remains upright. For it is not we who corrupt it by our corruption, but it remains upright, so that we may return to it to be corrected. However, in order to exercise us, the same Scripture speaks in many places as if carnally, although the law is always spiritual. For the law, as the Apostle says, is spiritual, but I am carnal. Although it is spiritual, it often walks as if carnally with the carnal. But it does not wish them to remain carnal. For even a mother loves to nurture her infant, but she does not love for it to remain an infant. She holds it in her bosom, warms it with her hands, soothes it with caresses, nourishes it with milk. She does everything for the infant, but she hopes it will grow, so that she may not always do such things. Look at the Apostle. For we consider him better, who did not disdain to call himself also a mother, where he says: I became a child among you, as a nurse cherishing her own children. For there are nurses indeed cherishing, but not their own children. There are also mothers giving to nurses, not cherishing their own children. But the Apostle, with genuine and abundant affection of charity, assumed the role of nurse by saying: cherishing, and adding: her own children. Therefore, the same nourisher and cherisher says elsewhere, what I mentioned a little earlier: With great fear and trembling I was among you.

Carnal hearers and spiritual hearers. But you say: "What were they like, that he was in much fear and trembling towards them?" As unto babes in Christ, he says, I have fed you with milk, not with meat. For you were not able, nor yet are you even now able; for you are still carnal. Those whom he calls carnal, he nonetheless calls babes in Christ. Thus he reproves, yet does not reject. They are carnal and yet babes in Christ. He does not want them to be carnal, whom he calls babes in Christ. He desires them to be spiritual, discerning all things, and judged by no one. For the natural man, as he himself says, does not perceive the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness to him, and he cannot know them, because they are spiritually discerned. The spiritual man judges all things, but he himself is judged by no one. He himself says: We speak wisdom among the perfect. Why then do you speak, if among the perfect? For what need is there for you to speak to a perfect man? But seek where he is perfect. For I may not find a perfect knower, but I may find a perfect listener. There is then also a perfect listener, already capable in mind, to whom solid food causes no disturbance, introduces no crudity. Who is this, and we will praise him? Yet I do not doubt that there are some spiritual ones, listening well, judging well. With these I do not labor. For either I am found carnal, and they deal mercifully with me; or they grasp what I say, and rejoice with me. May God grant him not to be deceived, who did not want to lie.

Behold, now I have received the words of the psalm which we just sang: You have held my right hand. Give a carnal listener; what will he think except that God appeared in human form, grabbed his right hand not the left, and led him to His will, took him where He wanted? If he understands this, rather if he assumes this, does he understand anything? For whoever understands, understands the truth. But whoever assumes falsehood does not understand. Therefore, if a carnal man assumes this, that the nature and substance of God are distinct with limbs, determined form, circumscribed quantity, remaining in place, what do I do with him? If I say: "God is not like that," he does not grasp it. If I say: "He is like that," he seemingly grasps it, but I deceive. I cannot say: "He is like that," for I would lie; and not trivially, but about my God, my Savior and Redeemer, my hope, the one to whom I stretch out my desire. It is no small matter to lie about such a one. It is troublesome and dangerous to be mistaken about such a one. However, to lie about such a one is ruinous and pernicious. Not everyone who lies is mistaken. For if he knows the truth and speaks falsehood, he lies, he is not mistaken. But if he assumes to be true what is not true, he is mistaken; and if he speaks what he assumes to be true, he does not lie, but is still mistaken. May God grant him not to be mistaken, who did not wish to lie.

Let man be a temple, and from him God will come.

If, therefore, as I said, that little one of ours has believed in such a God, having members set in specific places of His body, circumscribed by figure, limited by form, remaining locally, moving locally, according to what is said: "Where shall I go from Your Spirit, or where shall I flee from Your presence? If I ascend into heaven, You are there; if I make my bed in hell, behold, You are there." If He is in heaven, He is there; if He is on earth, He is there; if He is in hell, He is there, what should that little one do now? If he listens, he should not seek mountains and temples with the Samaritan woman to go to God, from Jerusalem to the mountains of Samaria. He should not hurry to a visible temple, nor should he seek any temple to come to God. Let him be a temple, and God will come to him. He does not disdain, does not reject, does not scorn; rather, He deigns, unless He should be indignant. Hear Him promising, hear Him in the meantime deigning by promising, not indignantly threatening: "We will come," He says, "to him, I and the Father." To him whom He mentioned above as His lover, the obedient to His commandments, the keeper of His mandate, the lover of God, the lover of his neighbor: "We will come," He says, "to him, and make Our home with him." Do not fear the coming of your God. The heart of the faithful is not narrow, to whom the temple of Solomon was narrow. For even he, when he built this, said: If the heaven of heavens does not suffice for you. And yet the temple of God is holy, which you are. For we, he says elsewhere, are the temple of the living God. "And how do you prove this?", as if it were said to him: As it is written, he says, I will dwell in them. If some great patron said to you: "I will dwell with you," what would you do? Since your house is narrow, without a doubt you would be troubled, indeed you would be terrified, you would wish it not to happen. For you would not want to be in straits, receiving a great one, to whose coming your poor little house would not suffice. Do not fear the coming of your God, do not fear the affection of your God. He will not narrow you when He comes; rather by coming, He will broaden you. For in order that you may know that He will broaden you, He not only promised His coming: I will dwell in them, but also the very breadth, by adding: And I will walk in them. If you love this breadth, you see it. Fear has torment, therefore it has straits; and thus love has breadth. See the breadth of charity: Because the charity of God is poured forth, he says, in our hearts.

We have received the pledge or earnest of the Spirit. But why were you trying to enlarge the place for him? Let the inhabitant himself enlarge: For the love of Christ has been poured into our hearts, not, however, from us, but through the Holy Spirit who has been given to us. If love has been poured into our hearts, and God is love, behold now, from even the smallest token, God walks in us. For we have received a pledge. What is that of which the pledge is such? Although the manuscripts which have "earnest" are better than those which have "pledge". For the translators intended to say the same thing. However, there is some difference in usage between "earnest" and "pledge". For a pledge, when it is given, will be taken back once what it was given as security for has been fulfilled. I do not doubt that many of you have understood. For I see, from the conversation you have with one another, I sense those who have understood wishing to explain to those who have not yet understood. Therefore, I will speak somewhat more plainly so that it may reach everyone. You receive, for example, a book from your friend; to get it, you give some pledge. When you return what you received, for which you gave the pledge, he will have what you returned, and you will receive back the pledge. For he will not have both things. This will be fulfilled from where the pledge was given.

What then, Brothers? If God has now given love as a pledge through His Spirit, when He delivers the very thing that He has promised by giving the pledge, is the pledge to be taken away from us? By no means. But what He has given, He will fulfill. Therefore, the earnest is better than the pledge. For sometimes you prepare to give the price, for instance, for something you hold under a contract of good faith, and you give part of the price itself. And it will be an earnest, not a pledge, because it is to be fulfilled, not taken away. So understand now. If I find a lover, he has the earnest and desires the fullness from the earnest. Let him consider the earnest itself. For what has been given as an earnest will be fulfilled. Let him think of it, let him discuss it within himself, let him look at it, let him inquire of it about that fullness which he does not see, lest perhaps he desires something in the fullness other than what he has received as an earnest. Perhaps God is going to give gold, He will fulfill the fullness of gold, and He has given an earnest of gold. It must be feared lest you desire lead instead of gold. Look at the earnest, therefore. If I can persuade you where to look: God is love.

Sprinkled with this dew, burning into the spring. From there we have something, from there we are sprinkled, from there we are wetted. Whose dew is such as the fountain? Sprinkled with this dew, but burning for the fountain, say to your God: For with you is the fountain of life. In this dew, desire is born; in the fountain you will be satisfied. There is what suffices for us. But the sons of men will hope under the cover of your wings. Why do we greatly desire the benefits of God which he grants also to beasts? Indeed, his benefits are from him, who doubts? From whom is the salvation of even the smallest creature, except from him of whom it is said: Salvation belongs to the Lord?

Men and sons of men. But the same psalm says: "You save humans and animals, Lord, just as Your mercy is multiplied, God." Although merciful God, You have such abundant mercy that it reaches not only humans but also animals. Such is Your great mercy that You make Your sun rise on the good and the bad, and rain on the just and the unjust. Do Your saints receive nothing special from You, nothing peculiar to the pious that the impious do not also receive? Surely, they do. Listen to what follows. For he had already said: "You save humans and animals, Lord, just as Your mercy is multiplied, God," and he added and said: "But the children of men." So, what then? Were those you previously mentioned as humans not children of men? He says, "You save humans and animals, Lord; but the children of men." So what then? "The children of men will hope under the shadow of Your wings." Not with the animals. Why then are both these and those called humans? Are not even the humans children of men? Surely, the humans are children of men. So where does this distinction come from, if not because there is a human who was not a child of man. The man who was not a child of man, Adam; the man who is a child of man, Christ. Just as in Adam all die, so in Christ all shall be made alive. They seek salvation with the animals who die and will not live again. They seek salvation with the children of men who die, so that they may never die. That distinction is clear. Those referred to are humans; these children of men belong to the Son of Man.

God is the source of life.

What then follows? The children of men shall hope under the shadow of your wings. Behold, I hope, behold hope. But hope that is seen is not hope. Therefore, the future things that are promised shall intoxicate. They shall be intoxicated from the abundance of your house. I fear lest, as he was seeking the members of the body in God a little while ago, so in his intoxication he may not think of the satisfaction of ineffable goods, but of the debauchery of carnal feasts. Nonetheless let us say. Let him think what he can, if he cannot think higher. Let him not depart from the bosom when he grows. Let us follow, and those who can, let us delight spiritually as much as we can. They shall be intoxicated, he says, from the abundance of your house, and you shall make them drink from the torrent of your pleasure. With what wine, with what new wine, with what wave, with what honey, with what nectar? Do you ask with what? Since with you is the fountain of life. Drink, if you can, life. Prepare the conscience, not the gullet, the mind, not the belly. If you have heard, if you have understood, if you have loved as much as you could, you have already drunk from there.

Love charity. Be attentive to what you drink. You have drunk love. If you know it, God is love. If, therefore, you have drunk love, tell me where you have drunk it. If you know it, if you have seen it, if you love, whence do you love? For whatever you love well, you love with love. But how do you love anything with love if you do not love with love? Therefore, if you love, whence do you love? It comes to you, and you know it and see it. And it is not seen in a place, nor is it sought with bodily eyes, so that it may be loved more vehemently. Nor is it heard by speech, and when it comes to you, it is not felt by walking. Have you ever felt the steps of love walking in your heart? What, then, is it? Whose is this that is already in you, and is not contained by you? Thus, learn to love God.

God can both appear and remain hidden. But he walked in paradise, but he was seen at the oak of Mamre, but he spoke with Moses on Mount Sinai face to face. And what of it? Behold, He who is seen in place is not perceived by movement. Do you wish to hear Moses himself, lest you, as a restless child, cause me weariness despite my desire to nourish you? Do you then wish to hear Moses himself? Surely he spoke with God face to face. To whom then did he speak, if not to the one with whom he was speaking: If I have found favor in your sight, show me Yourself? He speaks with Him face to face, as one speaks to a friend, and says to Him: If I have found favor in your sight, show me Yourself plainly. What did he see, and what did he thirst for? If it was not He, how is it said to Him: Show me Yourself? We cannot say that it was not He. If it were not He, he would say to Him: "Show me God." Therefore, when he says: Show me Yourself, he manifests that it was He whom he wished to see. And he spoke with Him face to face, as one speaks to a friend. Do you then wish to hear, if you can grasp God? Moses appeared hidden. For if He did not appear, there would not be one speaking face to face saying to Him: Show me Yourself. But if He did not hide, he would not still seek to see the same. Therefore, if you can grasp, if you understand, God can both appear and hide simultaneously, appear in form, hide in nature.

Recognize the mystery in God.

If you have understood this as you were able, see to it that the thought does not slip into you that God, in order to appear in whatever form He wishes, changes His nature. God is immutable, God is unchangeable, not only the Father, but the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The very Word God is immutable, just as the God with whom He is God. Think of nothing detrimental in any person, nothing changeable. For God is the Father of lights, with whom there is no change or shadow of turning. "If, therefore, He is immutable," you ask, "What is that form in which He appeared as He wished, to whom He wished, by walking, speaking, or even showing Himself to corporeal eyes?" You ask me what substance God makes His presence from, as if I could now explain from what He made the world, from what He made heaven, from what He made the earth, from what He made you. "Now I see," you respond, "from the slime." Behold yourself from the slime. Whence the slime? You answer: "From the earth." But I think not from that earth which another made, but from that earth which He made who made heaven and earth. Wherefore, from what is that earth itself? From what heaven and earth? He spoke, and they were made. Well, you answer excellently. You recognize: He spoke, and they were made. I seek nothing more. But how, when you say: He spoke, and they were made, I seek nothing more; so you should seek nothing more when I say: He willed, and He appeared. He appeared as He judged fitting; He concealed as He existed.

Because, children, we will see him just as he is. Our true affection, our love, our devotion, may it surge with that desire with which Moses surged, who said to Him whom he saw: "Show me yourself." If we thus seek this, we are His children. For we are children of God, and it has not yet appeared what we shall be. We know that when He appears, we shall be like Him, because we shall see Him as He is. Not as He appeared by the oak of Mamre, not as He appeared to Moses, that we might still say to Him: "Show us yourself," but we shall see Him as He is. By what merit? Because we are children of God. And this not by our own merits, but by the grace of His mercy. For God, you have generously separated the rain for your inheritance. And it was weakened, not by presuming to see what it does not see, but by believing what it desires to see. You, truly, have perfected it. Therefore, His inheritance being perfected, His children shall see Him as He is. But what did the Lord say about the children? "Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called children of God."

Let us seek peacefully.

Therefore, concerning such hidden and very difficult questions, if we understand less, let us seek peacefully. Let one not be inflated against another for the sake of another. For if you have bitter zeal and contentions are among you, that wisdom is not descending from above, but earthly, natural, demonic. Therefore, we are sons of God and let it be known that we are His sons, and we will not be known unless we have been peaceful. For we will not have the means to see God, if by contending among ourselves we have extinguished our own eye.

God wanted you to be a lover of good.

Pay attention to what he says, why I speak fearing and trembling. Pursue peace with all and holiness, without which no one shall see God. How did he terrify lovers? He did not terrify anyone but lovers. Did he perhaps say: Pursue peace with all and holiness, which if someone does not have, they will be cast into fire, tortured with eternal fire, given over to unwearied torturers? These things are true, and he did not say this. He wanted you to be a lover of good, not a fearer of evil, and from that very thing which you desired he terrified you. You will see God. Therefore do you despise this, therefore do you quarrel, therefore do you stir up conflicts? Pursue peace with all and holiness, without which no one shall see God. How foolish would it be for two wanting to see the rising sun, if they quarreled among themselves about from which direction it would rise and how it could be seen, and if a dispute arose between them, they fought, and by fighting they struck each other, by striking extinguished their own eyes, so that they could not see that rising? Therefore, so that we may see God, let us cleanse our hearts with faith, heal them with charity, strengthen them with peace, because this very thing, from which we love each other, is already from Him whom we desire to see.

Sermons - Sermon 230

SERMO 230 IN THE DAYS OF EASTER If you want to be the day which the Lord has made, live well. As we have sung to our Lord, so let us, with His help, act. For every day is made by the Lord: yet it is not without reason that it is especially written of a certain day: This is the day which the Lord has made. We read, when God created the heavens and the earth, that He said: Let there be light; and there was light. And God called the light, day; and the darkness, night. But there is another day, certain to us and especially commendable, of which the Apostle says: Let us walk honestly as in the day. This common daily day is completed by the rising and setting of the sun. There is another day, on which the word of God shines in the hearts of the faithful and drives out the darkness, not of the eyes, but of evil habits. Let us therefore acknowledge it, let us rejoice in it. Let us hear the Apostle saying: For we are children of the light, and children of the day: we are not of the night, nor of darkness. Let us walk honestly as in the day: not in reveling and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying; but put on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make no provision for the flesh in its desires. If you do this, you sing with all your heart: This is the day which the Lord has made. For what you sing, you are if you live well. How many through these days get drunk? How many through these days, it is little that they get drunk, even disgracefully and cruelly they quarrel? Such do not sing: This is the day which the Lord has made. The Lord replies to them: You are darkness; I did not make you. If you wish to be the day which the Lord has made, live well; and you will have the light of truth, which will never set in your hearts.

Sermons - Sermon 231

SERMO 231 ON EASTER DAYS The disbelieving disciples are reproached for lying. The resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ is customarily read in these days from all the books of the holy Gospel. In this reading, we observe how the Lord Jesus rebuked His disciples, His primary members, clinging to His side, because they did not believe that He, whom they mourned as having been slain, was alive. The fathers of the faith were not yet faithful, the teachers so that the whole world might believe what they were going to preach and for which they were going to die, they did not yet believe. They did not believe that He whom they had seen raise the dead had himself risen. Therefore, they were rightly rebuked. They were shown themselves to recognize who they were through themselves, who they would be through Him. Just as Peter was shown himself, when he presumed at the coming passion of the Lord and wavered when that passion came. He saw himself in himself, he grieved himself in himself, he wept himself in himself; he turned to Him who had made him. Behold, they still did not believe, in this reading they still did not believe, even though they now saw. How great His condescension, who has granted us to believe what we do not yet see. We believe their words, they did not believe their own eyes. The resurrection of Christ dissolved sin and renewed us. The resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ is the new life of those who believe in Jesus. And this is the sacrament of his passion and resurrection, which you ought to know and practice diligently. For life did not come to death without cause, nor did the fountain of life, from which one drinks to live, drink the cup that was not due to it. For it was not owed to Christ to die. Let us therefore seek whence death came; the father of death is sin. For if no one had ever sinned, no one would die. The first man received the law of God, that is, the commandment of God, with the condition that if he kept it, he would live; if he broke it, he would die. Not believing that he would die, he brought upon himself death and found that what He, who gave the law, had said was true. Hence death, hence mortality, hence labor, hence misery, hence even after the first death the second death, that is, after temporal death eternal death. Every man is therefore born bound to this condition of death, to these laws of hell; except for that man who became man so that man would not perish. For he did not come bound by the laws of death, therefore it is said in the Psalm: "Among the dead he is free." Whom the Virgin conceived without lust, whom the Virgin bore and remained a Virgin, who lived without sin, who did not die because of sin, sharing with us the penalty, not sharing the sin—the penalty of sin is death—the Lord Jesus Christ came to die, not to sin. By sharing with us the penalty without sin, he dissolved both the sin and the penalty. What penalty did he dissolve? The one that was due to us after this life. Therefore he was crucified to show by the cross the fall of our old man, and he rose again to show in his life the newness of our life. Thus apostolic doctrine teaches: "He was delivered up for our trespasses and raised for our justification." The sign of this matter was given to the fathers in circumcision, that every male should be circumcised on the eighth day. Circumcision was performed with stone knives, because the rock was Christ. In this circumcision, the putting off of the carnal life on the eighth day through the resurrection of Christ was signified. For the seventh day of the week is completed with the Sabbath. On the Sabbath the Lord lay in the tomb, on the seventh day; he rose on the eighth. His resurrection renews us. Therefore, on the eighth day, he circumcises us. We live in this hope.

If we live well, we were dead but we have risen.

Let us hear the Apostle saying: If you have been raised with Christ... . When shall we who are not yet dead rise again? What is it then that the Apostle wished to say: If you have been raised with Christ? Would he have risen if he had not first died? He was speaking to the living, who were not yet dying and already rising. What does it mean? See what he says: If you have been raised with Christ, seek the things that are above, where Christ is seated at the right hand of God; seek the things that are above, not the things on the earth. For you have died. He says it, not I, and yet he speaks the truth, and therefore I also say it. Why do I also say it? I believed, therefore I have spoken. If we live well, we have died and risen; but whoever has not yet died nor risen, still lives badly; if he lives badly, he does not live; let him die lest he die. What does it mean: let him die lest he die? Let him be changed lest he be condemned. If you have been raised with Christ, I repeat the words of the Apostle, seek the things that are above, where Christ is seated at the right hand of God; seek the things that are above, not the things on the earth. For you have died and your life is hidden with Christ in God. When Christ appears, who is your life, then you also will appear with him in glory. These are the words of the Apostle. To him who is not yet dead, I say let him die; to him who still lives badly, I say let him be changed. For if he lived badly and no longer lives badly, he is dead; if he lives well, he has risen.

Nothing earthly makes us blessed. But what is it: to live well? Set your mind on things above, not on things on the earth. As long as you are earth and to earth you shall go, as long as you cling to the earth—by loving the earth you certainly cling to the earth—and you become its enemy of whom the Psalm says: "And his enemies will lick the dust." What were you? Sons of men. What are you? Sons of God. Sons of men, how long will you be heavy-hearted? Why do you love vanity and seek falsehood? What falsehood do you seek? I will tell you now. I know you want to be blessed. Give me a man who is a robber, a malefactor, a fornicator, a sorcerer, a sacrilegious man, stained with every vice, overwhelmed with every crime and wickedness, who would not want a truly blessed life. I know you all want to live blessedly; but from what does a man live blessedly? This you are not willing to seek. You seek gold because you think you will be blessed by gold; but gold does not make blessed. Why do you seek falsehood? Why do you want to be exalted in this age? Because you think you will be blessed by the honor of men and the pomp of the age, but the pomp of the age does not make blessed. Why do you seek falsehood? And whatever else you seek here, when you seek it worldly, when you seek it by loving the earth, when you seek it by clinging to the earth, you seek it in order to be blessed; but no earthly thing will make you blessed. Why do you not cease seeking falsehood? From where, then, will you be blessed? Sons of men, how long will you be heavy-hearted? You do not want to be heavy-hearted, you who burden your heart with the earth? How long have men been heavy-hearted? Before Christ came, before Christ rose, men were heavy-hearted. How long will you be heavy-hearted? Why do you love vanity and seek falsehood? Wanting to be blessed, you seek things from which you will be miserable. What you seek deceives you; it is falsehood that you seek.

Christ, who bore our evil, will give heavenly goods. Do you wish to be blessed? I will show, if you wish, whence you can be blessed. Follow there: "How long will you be heavy-hearted? Why do you love vanity and seek lies? Know. What? Because the Lord has magnified his holy one." Christ came to our miseries: He hungered, thirsted, was fatigued, slept, performed wonders, suffered evils, was scourged, was crowned with thorns, was smeared with spit, was struck with blows, fixed to a cross, wounded with a lance, placed in a sepulcher, but rising on the third day, with labor completed, with death dead. Behold, there have an eye on his resurrection. For the Lord has magnified his holy one, that he should be raised from the dead and given honor in heaven to sit at his right hand. He shows you what you ought to understand if you wish to be blessed. Here indeed, you cannot be. In this life, you cannot be blessed. No one can. You seek a good thing, but this earth is not the region where what you seek is found. What do you seek? Blessed life. But it is not here. If you were seeking gold in a place where it is not, the one who knows it is not there, would not say to you: Why are you digging? Why do you trouble the earth? You make a pit where you will descend, not where you will find anything. What would you answer to one advising you? I seek gold. And he: I do not tell you that what you are seeking is nothing, you seek a good thing, but it is not where you seek. So also when you say: I wish to be blessed, you seek a good thing, but it is not here. If Christ had it here, so would you. In the region of your death, what did he find? Behold: coming from another region, what did he find here except what abounds here: labors, pains, death, behold what you have here, what abounds here. He ate with you what abounded in the cell of your misery. Here he drank vinegar, here he had gall. Behold what he found in your cell. And he invited you to his great table, the table of heaven, the table of angels, where he himself is the bread. Therefore, descending and finding these evils in your cell and not disdaining such a table of yours, he promised his own. What does he say to us? Believe, believe that you will come to the goods of my table, when I did not disdain the evils of your table. He took your evil and will give his good? Indeed he will give. He promised his life to us, but what he did is more incredible; he pledged his death to us. As if he would say: To my life I invite you, where no one dies, where truly blessed life is, where food does not spoil, where it refreshes and does not fail. Behold where I invite you, to the region of angels, to the friendship of the Father and the Holy Spirit, to the everlasting supper, to my brotherhood; finally, to myself. To my life I invite you. You do not wish to believe that I will give you my life? Hold the pledge of my death. Therefore now, while we live in this corruptible flesh, by a change of conduct let us die with Christ, by love for justice let us live with Christ. We will not receive the blessed life unless we come to him who came to us, and begin to be with him who died for us.

Sermons - Sermon 232

SERMO 232 In the days of Easter The passion and resurrection of the Lord are narrated by all the Evangelists. The resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ was also read today, but from another book of the Gospel, which is according to Luke. For first it was read according to Matthew, and yesterday according to Mark, today according to Luke, as the order of the Evangelists holds, just as his passion is written by all the Evangelists. But these seven or eight days provide space so that the resurrection of the Lord may be read according to all the Evangelists; however, because the passion is read on one day, it is usually read only according to Matthew. At some point I wished that the passion would also be read every year according to all the Evangelists. It happened; people did not hear what they were accustomed to and were disturbed. However, he who loves the letters of God and does not always wish to be ignorant, knows everything and diligently inquires into everything. But just as God has distributed to each the measure of faith, so each one progresses. The disciples do not believe the women announcing the resurrection.

Now let us attend to what we heard today in the reading; for what I also commended to your Charity yesterday, today we have heard more expressly: the disbelief of the disciples, so that we may understand how much has been granted to us by His beneficence that we may believe what we have not seen. He called them, instructed them, lived with them on earth, performed such great miracles before their eyes. And He raised the dead; He Himself was not believed to rise His own flesh. Women came to the tomb; they did not find the body in the tomb; they heard from angels that Christ had risen; the women announced to the men. And what is written? What did you hear? These things seemed to their eyes like delirium. Great misfortune of the human condition! When Eve spoke what the serpent had said, she was quickly heard. A lying woman was believed so that we might die; true-speaking women were not believed so that we might live. If women were not to be believed, why did Adam believe Eve? If women are to be believed, why did the disciples not believe the holy women? And therefore in this event the kind dispensation of our Lord is to be considered. For this is what the Lord Jesus Christ did, that it was first the female sex that announced His resurrection. Because by the female sex man had fallen, by the female sex man was restored; because the Virgin had given birth to Christ, a woman announced His resurrection. By a woman came death, by a woman came life. But the disciples did not believe as the women had said; they thought they were delusional, although they were announcing the truth.

Those two disciples consider Christ as one of the Prophets.

Behold, two others were walking on the road and talking among themselves about the things that had happened in Jerusalem, about the wickedness of the Jews, about the death of Christ. They were walking, conversing, and sorrowing as if Christ were dead, not knowing He had risen. He appeared to them and became the third traveler, engaging in friendly conversations with them. Their eyes were kept from recognizing Him. For it was necessary for their hearts to be better instructed; recognition was deferred; He asked them what they were discussing among themselves, so that they would confess to Him what He already knew. And what had you heard?

They began to wonder as they were being questioned by someone who seemed unaware of such a well-known matter. Are you the only stranger in Jerusalem who does not know what has happened there? But He said: What things? About Jesus of Nazareth, who was a prophet mighty in deed and word. Was that it, O disciples? Was Christ merely a prophet, the Lord of Prophets? You assign the name of herald to your Judge. They had come to the words of strangers. What do I mean by the words of strangers? Recall when Jesus Himself said to His disciples: Who do men say that the Son of Man is? They answered with the opinions of strangers. Some say, they said, that You are Elijah; others that You are John the Baptist; others that You are Jeremiah or one of the prophets. These were the words of strangers, not of the disciples. And now behold, the disciples themselves have come to these words. Who do you say that I am? You have recounted to me the opinions of strangers; I want to hear your faith. Then Peter said, one for all, for unity was in all: You are the Christ, the Son of the living God. Not just any prophet, but the Son of the living God, the fulfiller of the prophets, the creator of angels. You are the Christ, the Son of the living God. He heard what was fitting for Him to hear from that voice and such a voice: Blessed are you, Simon Bar-Jona, for flesh and blood has not revealed this to you, but My Father who is in heaven. And I say to you: You are Peter, and on this rock I will build My church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven; and whatever you bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatever you loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven. It was the faith that deserved to hear this, not the man. For what was the man himself, except what the Psalm says: Every man is a liar?

Peter himself resisting in accepting the death of Christ.

Finally, immediately after these words, He foretold to them His passion and death. Peter was afraid and said: "Far be it from You, Lord; this will never happen to You." Then the Lord said: "Get behind Me, Satan." Peter, Satan? Where are those words: "Blessed are you, Simon Bar-Jona?" Is Satan blessed? Blessed by God. Satan from man. Finally, the Lord Himself explained why He called him Satan: "For you are not setting your mind on the things of God, but on the things of man." Wherefore then blessed? Because flesh and blood did not reveal it to you, but My Father who is in heaven. Wherefore later Satan? You are not setting your mind on the things of God; when you did, you were blessed: but you are setting your mind on the things of man. See how the soul of the disciples alternated, almost from rise and set; at times standing, at times lying down; at times being enlightened, at times being darkened; because it was enlightened by God, darkened by its own. Where was it enlightened? "Draw near to Him and be enlightened." Where was it darkened? "He who speaks a lie speaks of his own." The Son of God had said, life had said, and they were afraid that life would die, when life cannot die at all and the Son of God had come for this very reason, to die; if He had not come to die, how would we live? The Lord had predicted that He would die and immediately rise again.

Whence comes life to us, whence death to Him? Attend to this: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. Seek death there. Where? Whence? How was the Word? The Word was with God, the Word was God. If you find flesh and blood there, you find death. Therefore whence death to that Word? But to us men placed on earth, mortal, corruptible, sinful, whence life? There was no way for Him to have death; we had no way to have life. He took death from us to give us life from Himself. How did He take death from us? The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us. He took from us what He offered for us. But whence life to us? And the life was the light of men. He is life to us, we are death to Him. But what sort of death? By honor, not by nature. Because He deigned, because He willed, because He had mercy, He died by power. I have the power to lay down my life and I have the power to take it up again. Peter did not know this, when he was frightened upon hearing of the Lord's death. But behold the Lord had already said that He would die and rise again on the third day. What He predicted was done and those who had heard did not believe. Behold it is now the third day since these things happened and we were hoping that He was the one to redeem Israel. You were hoping, now you despair? Have you fallen from hope? He who walks with you lifts you up. They were disciples, they had heard Him, they had lived with Him, they knew Him as Teacher, they were instructed by Him and could not emulate and have the faith of the thief hanging on the cross. Where the thief found hope, there the disciples lost it. But perhaps some of you do not know what I said about the thief, not having heard the Passion according to all the Evangelists. For this Evangelist Luke narrated what I say. Since two thieves were crucified with Christ, this was also said by Matthew, but that one of the thieves insulted the Lord and the other believed in Christ, Matthew did not say, but Luke did. Let us recall the faith of the thief which Christ did not find in his disciples after the resurrection. Christ was hanging on the cross, and the thief was also hanging. He in the middle, they on the sides. One insults, the other believes, the one in the middle judges. For the one who insulted said this: If you are the Son of God, save yourself. And the other to him: Do you not fear God? If we suffer justly for our deeds, what has he done? And turning to him: Remember me, Lord, when you come into your kingdom. Great faith. I do not know what can be added to this faith. Those who saw Christ raising the dead wavered; he believed in the one he saw hanging on the wood with him. When they wavered, then he believed. What a fruit Christ received from the dry wood. For what did the Lord say? Let us listen. Truly I say to you, today you will be with me in paradise. You delay yourself, I recognize you. When could the thief hope to go from robbery to judge, from judge to cross, from cross to paradise? Finally, he, considering his Merits, did not say: Remember me so that you may free me today. But: When you come into your kingdom, then remember me. As if to say, if torments are due to me until you come into your kingdom. And he: Not so, you have invaded the kingdom of heaven, you have used force, you have believed, you have seized it. Today you will be with me in paradise. I do not delay you: to such faith today I give what is due. The thief says: Remember me when you come into your kingdom. Not only did he believe he would be resurrected, but also that he would reign. To the one hanging, crucified, bleeding, clinging: When you come, he says, into your kingdom. And to them: We were hoping. Where the thief found hope, the disciple lost it.

Let us lead a good life, we who have risen with Christ.

Then already, dearest, we have known a great mystery. Listen. He was walking with them, he is received in hospitality, he breaks bread and is recognized. And let us not say that we do not know Christ; we know if we believe. It is a small thing, we know if we believe; we have if we believe. They had Christ at the banquet, we have Him within in the soul. It is more to have Christ in the heart than in the house. For indeed, our heart is more inward to us than our house. Now truly, where ought the faithful to recognize Him? The faithful recognize; but the catechumen does not know. Yet let no one close the door against him, that he may not enter.

Yesterday I exhorted and admonished your Charity, that the resurrection of Christ is in us if we live well; if our old bad life dies and our new life progresses daily. Here there are many penitents; when hands are laid on them, the line is very long. Pray for the penitents. And the penitents go to pray. I examine the penitents and find them living badly. How do they repent of what they are doing? If they repent, let it not be done. But if it is done, the name changes, the crime remains. Some have asked for a place of penance for themselves; some have been excommunicated by us and reduced to the place of penitents. And those who have asked for this for themselves wish to do what they were doing, and those who have been excommunicated by us and reduced to the place of penitents do not want to rise from there, as if the place of penitents were a chosen place. What ought to be the place of humility becomes the place of iniquity. To you I say, who are called penitents and are not, I say to you. What shall I say to you? Shall I praise you? In this I do not praise, but I mourn and lament. And what do I do, having become a vile song? Change, change, I beg you. The end of life is uncertain. Every man walks with his own fall. You delay living well, while you think life will be long. You think life will be long and fear not a sudden death? But see, let it be long, see that it is good. And I seek one penitent and do not find. How much better it will be if it is long and good, than if it is long and bad! No one wants to have or endure a long bad dinner, almost everyone wants to have a long bad life. Surely, if it is great that we live, let that greatness be good. For what do you wish badly, tell me, in all your actions, thoughts, desires? On earth you do not want a bad harvest, surely not a bad one but a good one, a good tree, a good horse, a good servant, a good friend, a good son, a good wife. And why do I mention these great things, since you do not want to have even a bad garment, but a good one. You do not even want a bad boot, but a good one, or give me anything you want that is bad nor want anything good. I think you do not want a bad villa, but a good one. You only want to have a bad soul. Why have you offended yourself? What have you deserved badly from yourself? Among your good things you do not want to have badness, except yourself. I think because I speak as I usually do and some may do as they usually do. Surely I have not said but maybe. Let no one slander me because I have spoken more in fear than in certainty. Before God, I shake out my garments. I fear lest it be imputed to me because I fear. What do you want? I fulfill my duty, I seek your profit. From your good works I want to have joy, not money. For he who lives well does not make me rich. And yet let him live well and he does. My riches are nothing but your hope in Christ. My joy, my solace, and my relief from my dangers in these temptations is nothing but your good life. I beseech you, if you have forgotten yourselves, have mercy on me.

Sermons - Sermon 233

SERMO 233 IN THE EASTER DAYS In the present life let us labor, hoping for the future. The faith in resurrection is unique to Christians. You heard the reading of the holy Gospel about the resurrection of Christ. In the resurrection of Christ, our faith is established. The passion of Christ was believed by pagans, impious ones, and Jews: the resurrection, only by Christians. The passion of Christ signifies the miseries of this life: the resurrection of Christ reveals the blessedness of future life. In the present, let us labor: in the future, let us hope. Now is the time for work: then, for the reward. Whoever is lazy in carrying out the work is shameless in demanding the reward. You heard what he said to his disciples after the resurrection. He sent them to preach the Gospel, and it happened: the Gospel was preached, it reached us. And behold: Their sound went out into all the earth, and their words to the end of the world. By walking and walking, the Gospel reached us and to the ends of the earth. Briefly, he established for us, speaking to his disciples, what we should do, what we should hope for. For he said, as you heard when he was speaking: Whoever believes and is baptized will be saved. Faith is required from us, salvation is offered: Whoever believes and is baptized will be saved. What is promised to us is precious, what is commanded is done freely.

Salvation promised to believers must be distinguished from temporal salvation.

Whoever believes and is baptized will be saved. For what? Were those who heard these things not saved? Do not many believe and are saved, and are saved even before they believe? Clearly, they are saved: but it is a vain salvation of men. What kind of salvation is this, which you share with your beast? However, even this itself, from where, unless from Him, of whom it is written: You will save men and beasts, O Lord? And he added: According to the multitude of your mercy, O God. For your mercy is so great that salvation comes from you to this mortal flesh of men, and comes also to the flesh of beasts. This is the multitude of your mercy. What about your sons? Behold, you will save men and beasts, O Lord. Nothing more for us? What is granted to any men, what to beasts, is this also granted to us? Certainly not this.

Christ is for us the fountain of life and salvation. But what? Listen: But the sons of men will hope under the covering of your wings: they will be intoxicated with the abundance of your house, and you will give them drink from the torrent of your pleasure. For with you is the fountain of life. Christ is the fountain of life. We had salvation with the beasts, until the fountain of life came to us: the fountain of life came to us, and the fountain of life died for us. Will he deny his life, who dispensed his death to us? This is salvation, which is not vain. Why? Because it does not pass away.

Deceived through a man, redeemed through a man.

Men and sons of men, in what way do they differ? This distinction should be well observed: Men and beasts you will save, Lord: Men, belonging to man. However, the sons of men, belonging to the Son of Man, will hope under the shelter of your wings. Place before your eyes two men. Raise your faith, let your heart be awake: remember the man in whom we were deceived; remember the man by whom we were redeemed. Was that man the son of man? Adam was a man, he was not the son of man. Therefore, the Lord Christ consistently calls himself the son of man, to make us remember the man who was not the son of man: so that we remember in him death, in this one life; in him sin, in this one the remission of sins; in him bondage, in this one liberty; in him condemnation, in this one absolution. Therefore, these two men are signified in these words: You will save men and beasts, Lord. Men, belonging to man: and beasts, together with the beasts you will save them. For man, placed in honor, did not understand, as it is written: Man placed in honor did not understand; he has been compared to senseless beasts and has become like them. Therefore: Men and beasts, to whom men have become similar, because they did not understand, and to those over whom they were created to rule, they have been compared, you will save.

Christ dying destroyed our death.

True salvation has not been found here by Christ. Born mortal, to take it away. Is this not the salvation about which it has been said: He who believes and is baptized will be saved? That salvation is different, far different. The angels have this: do not seek it on earth. It is great, but it is not here. This is not a thing of this region, this kind of salvation is not here. Lift up your heart. Why do you seek this salvation here on earth? Salvation itself came here, and found our death here. Did our Lord Jesus Christ, when he came to us in the flesh, find this salvation here in our region? This merchant brought something great here, coming from his region: this merchant found what here abounds in our region. What abounds here? To be born and to die. The earth is full of these goods, to be born and to die. He was born, and he died. But by what way was he born? He came to this region, but not by the same way that we came. For he came from heaven from the Father. And yet he was born mortal. He was born of the Holy Spirit from the Virgin Mary. Are we born thus from Adam and Eve? We through the concupiscence of the flesh, but he not through the same. For Mary the virgin, without the embrace of a man, without the heat of concupiscence; because she might not suffer this heat, it was said to her: The Holy Spirit will come upon you, and the power of the Most High will overshadow you. Therefore the Virgin Mary did not lie with a man and conceive: but believed and conceived. He was born mortal for mortals. Why mortal? Because in the likeness of sinful flesh: not in sinful flesh, but in the likeness of sinful flesh. What does sinful flesh have? Death and sin. What did the likeness of sinful flesh have? Death without sin. If he had sin, he would be flesh of sin: if he did not have death, he would not be the likeness of sinful flesh. Such came, the Savior came: he died, but he killed death: he ended in himself what we feared; he took it up, and killed it; just as the best hunter captured the lion and killed it.

Death will be swallowed up in victory. Where is death? Seek in Christ, it is no longer there: but it was, and it died there. O life, death of death! Be of good cheer, it will die in us too. What has preceded in the head will be rendered in the members: death will die in us as well. But when? At the end of the age, in the resurrection of the dead, which we believe in, and about which we do not doubt. For he who believes and is baptized will be saved. Follow what you fear: But he who does not believe will be condemned. Therefore, death will die in us, and will live in the damned. Where death will not know death, there will be eternal death: because the torments will be everlasting. In us, it will die, and it will not be. Do you want to know? I tell you a few words of the triumphant, so that you may have what to meditate on, what to sing with the heart, what to hope with all your soul, what to seek with faith and good works. Hear the words of the triumphant, when there will be no death; when in us too, as in our head, death will die. The apostle Paul says: This corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. Then the saying which is written will come to pass, Death is swallowed up in victory. I told you that death will die in us: Death is swallowed up in victory. This is the death of death. It will be swallowed up, so that it does not appear. What does it mean, that it does not appear? That it is neither within nor without. Death is swallowed up in victory. Let the triumphant rejoice; let them rejoice, and say what follows: Where is, O death, your victory? where is, O death, your sting? Where is it? You captured, conquered, and spoke for yourself; you struck, and you killed; Where is, O death, your victory? where is, O death, your sting? Did not my Lord break it? O death, when you clung to my Lord, then you perished for me too. He who believes and is baptized will be saved by this health. But he who does not believe will be condemned. Flee condemnation, love and hope for eternal salvation.

Sermons - Sermon 234

SERMO 234 ON THE PASCHAL DAYS Christ's resurrection is narrated differently by the Evangelists. The resurrection of the Lord according to all four Evangelists is read these days. For this reason, it is necessary that all be read, because each one did not say everything; but what one passed over, another said: and in a way, they all gave place to each other, so that all might be necessary. The evangelist Mark, whose Gospel was read yesterday, briefly said what Luke more fully pursued, concerning two certain disciples, who were not indeed of the number of the twelve, but still were disciples to whom the Lord appeared while they were traveling, and walked with them. For he merely said that he appeared to two who were traveling: but this evangelist Luke, both what he said to them, and what they answered him, and how far he walked with them, and how they recognized him in the breaking of bread; he said all these things, as we have heard. The confessing thief overcame the faltering disciples.

What then, brothers, what are we discussing here? We are being edified to believe that the Lord Christ has risen. We already believed when we heard the Gospel, and today we entered this church as believers: and yet somehow it is heard with joy when memory is renewed. How do you want our hearts to be gladdened when we seem to be better than those who walked on the way and to whom the Lord appeared? For we believe what they had not yet believed. They had lost hope, and we do not doubt where they doubted. They had lost hope when the Lord was crucified: this appeared in their words when He said to them: "What are these words you are exchanging with each other as you walk?" And they: "Are you the only visitor to Jerusalem who does not know the things that have happened there in these days?" And He replied: "What things?" Knowing all about Himself, He asked: because He desired to be in them. "What things?" He said. And they: "Concerning Jesus of Nazareth, who was a prophet mighty in deed and word." Behold, we are better. They called Christ a prophet: we know Him as the Lord of Prophets: "He was," they say, "a prophet mighty in deeds and words. And how the chief priests crucified Him: and behold, it is now the third day since these things happened. But we had hoped." You had hoped: do you no longer hope? Is this your entire discipleship? On the cross, a thief conquered you. You forgot Him who was teaching: he recognized Him with whom he was hanging. "We had hoped." What had you hoped? That He was the one to redeem Israel. What you had hoped, and lost when He was crucified, the crucified thief recognized. For he said to the Lord: "Lord, remember me when You come into Your kingdom." Behold, because He was the one to redeem Israel. That cross was a school. There the Teacher taught the thief. The hanging wood became the chair of the Teacher. But He who restored Himself to you, restored hope to you. And thus it happened. Remember, dearest ones, how the Lord Jesus, from those whose eyes were restrained so that they might not recognize Him, wished to be recognized in the breaking of bread. The faithful know what I say: they know Christ in the breaking of bread. For not every bread, but that which receives the blessing of Christ, becomes the body of Christ. There they recognized Him, they rejoiced, they went to others: now knowing, they found, narrating what they had seen, they added to the Gospel. These things were said, done, written: they have reached us. The faith of Christians and the faith of demons are far distant from each other.

Let us believe in Christ crucified; but Him who rose on the third day. That is the faith which distinguishes us from them, distinguishes us from the Pagans, distinguishes us from the Jews; the faith by which we believe Christ rose from the dead. The Apostle says to Timothy: Remember that Jesus Christ, of the seed of David, rose from the dead according to my gospel. And again the Apostle himself: For if you believe in your heart, he says, that Jesus is Lord, and confess with your mouth that God raised Him from the dead, you will be saved. That is the salvation about which I discoursed yesterday. He who believes and is baptized will be saved. I know you believe: you will be saved. Retain in your heart, proclaim with your mouth that Christ rose from the dead. But have the faith of Christians, not of demons. For behold, I distinguish these things for you: what is mine, I distinguish; according to the grace of God given to me, I distinguish for you. When I have distinguished, choose, love. Behold, I said: That faith, by which we believe Christ Jesus rose from the dead, distinguishes us from the Pagans. Ask a Pagan whether Christ was crucified: he loudly affirms. Whether He rose: he denies. Ask a Jew whether Christ was crucified: he confesses the crime of his parents; he confesses the crime, in which he also has part. For he drinks what his parents gave him to drink: His blood be upon us and upon our children. But ask him whether He rose from the dead: he will deny, mock, accuse. We are distinguished. For we believe that Christ rose from the dead according to the flesh from the seed of David. Did the demons not know this, or did they not believe these things which they also saw? Even before He rose, they cried out and said: We know who You are, the Son of God. We distinguished ourselves from the Pagans by believing Christ rose: let us distinguish ourselves from the demons in any way possible. What did the demons say, I beseech you, what did they say? We know who You are, the Son of God. And they hear: Be silent. Did they not say the same thing Peter said when questioned and asked: Who do people say that I am? And when various opinions were given, He further asked, saying: But who do you say that I am? Peter answered: You are the Christ, the Son of the living God. This the demons said, this Peter: this the evil spirits, this the Apostle. And the demons hear: Be silent: Peter hears: Blessed are you. What distinguished them, let it also distinguish us. From what did the demons cry out? Out of fear. From what did Peter say? Out of love. Choose, love. That is the faith which distinguishes Christians from demons; not any faith. For James the apostle says: You believe: The Epistle of Apostle James has this: You believe that there is one God: you do well. Even the demons believe and tremble. He who wrote in the same Epistle said this: If someone has faith but does not have works, can that faith save him? And Paul the apostle distinguishing, said: Neither circumcision nor uncircumcision means anything; but faith working through love. We have distinguished, we have discerned: rather we have found it distinct, read it distinct, learned it to be distinct. As we are distinguished by faith; so let us be distinguished by conduct, by works, inflamed with the love which demons did not have. By that fire those two on the way were burning. For recognizing Christ and He departing from them, they said to each other: Was not our heart burning within us as He spoke to us on the way, while He opened the Scriptures to us? Burn so that you do not burn with the fire by which demons will burn. Burn with the fire of love, that you may distinguish yourselves from demons. That burning lifts you up, raises you, takes you to heaven. Whatever troubles you suffer on earth, however much the Christian heart is pressed down by the enemy; the burning of love seeks the heights. Take the example. If you hold a burning torch, hold it upright with the head upwards; the flame's trail rises to heaven: tilt the torch, the flame goes to heaven: turn the torch with the head downwards; do you lay the flame on the ground? Wherever it burns, the flame knows no other way, it seeks heaven. Inflamed by the spirit with the fire of love: make yourselves burn with the praises of God, and with the best conduct. One is warm, another cold: the warm one should set the cold on fire; and he who burns a little should desire growth, pray for aid. The Lord is ready to give: let us with open hearts desire to receive. Having turned to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 235

SERMO 235 ON THE SECOND DAY OF EASTER Through the Evangelist the Holy Spirit spoke.

Yesterday, that is, the night before, the resurrection of the Savior was read from the Gospel, specifically from the Gospel according to Matthew. Today, as you heard the reader pronounce, the resurrection of the Lord was recited to us, as the evangelist Luke has written. This often needs to be reminded and firmly held in memory: you should not be disturbed that one Evangelist says something if another omits it, for even the one who omits what the other says, says something he omitted. Some things are said by individual Evangelists that the other three do not say; some are said by two, and others do not say; some are said by three, and one does not say. However, the authority of the holy Gospel is so great that, because the one Spirit spoke in them, it is true even what one of them said. Therefore, what you have now heard, that the Lord Jesus, after He rose from the dead, found two of His disciples on the way, conversing with each other about the happenings, and said to them: What are these words that you are exchanging with each other, and so on, was related only by the evangelist Luke. Mark briefly touched on this, saying that He appeared to two on the way, but he omitted what they had said to the Lord or what the Lord had said to them. The disciples of Christ were troubled by the death.

What, then, has this reading brought us? Something great, if we understand it. Jesus appeared. He was seen with the eyes, but was not recognized. The Teacher walked with them on the road, and He Himself was the way. And they still did not walk in the way; for He found them to have deviated from the way. For when He had been with them before His passion, He had foretold everything, that He would suffer, die, and rise again on the third day. He had foretold everything, but His death became their forgetfulness. So disturbed were they when they saw Him hanging on the cross, that they forgot the Teacher, did not expect the Risen One, and did not hold on to His promise. "We," they said, "had hoped that He was the one to redeem Israel." O disciples, you were hoping! So now you no longer hope? Behold, Christ lives. Is hope dead in you? Christ absolutely lives. The living Christ found the hearts of the disciples dead; He appeared to their eyes and did not appear. He was seen and hidden. For if He was not seen, how did they hear Him asking, and how did they respond to Him who was asking questions? He walked with them on the road as a companion, and He was their guide. Surely they saw, but did not recognize. For their eyes were held, as we heard, so that they would not recognize Him. They were not held from seeing, but were held from recognizing Him. The Lord presents himself in the breaking of the bread.

Behold, brothers, where did the Lord wish to be recognized? In the breaking of the bread. We are confident: we break the bread, and we recognize the Lord. He did not wish to be recognized except there, for our sake, who were not going to see Him in the flesh, and yet would eat His flesh. Therefore, whoever of you is faithful, whoever is not called a Christian in vain, whoever does not enter the church without reason, whoever listens to the word of God with fear and hope, let the breaking of the bread comfort you. The absence of the Lord is not an absence. Have faith, and He is with you whom you do not see. They, when the Lord was speaking with them, neither had faith, because they did not believe that He had risen, nor did they hope that He could rise. They had lost faith, they had lost hope. The dead were walking with the living, the dead were walking with life itself. Life was walking with them, but life was not yet in their hearts. And you therefore, if you wish to have life, do what they did, so that you may recognize the Lord. They received Him in hospitality. For the Lord was like one going far away, but they restrained Him. After they had come to the place they were heading, they said: "Now stay with us here, the day has declined into evening." Hold on to the guest, if you wish to recognize the Savior. What disbelief took away, hospitality restored. Therefore the Lord presented Himself in the breaking of the bread. Learn where to seek the Lord, learn where to have Him, learn where to recognize Him. When you eat. For the faithful know something which they better understand in this reading than those who do not know. When the Lord returns, the faithful will rejoice, the unfaithful will be confounded. The Lord has been made known by these things; and after He was known, He appeared nowhere. He was absent from them in body, while held by faith. For this reason, our Lord withdrew Himself bodily from the entire Church, and ascended into heaven, so that faith might be built up. For if you only know what you see, where is faith? But if you believe even what you do not see, you will rejoice when you see. Faith is built up, because the appearance will be revealed. What we do not see will come, it will come, brothers, it will come. See how He will find you. For what men say will come: Where is it, when is it, how is it? when will it be? when is He to come? Be certain, He will come. He will not only come, but even if you do not wish it, He will come. Woe to those who did not believe, and great joy to those who believed. The faithful will rejoice, and the unfaithful will be confounded. The faithful will say: Thank you, Lord; what we heard is true, what we believed is true, what we hoped for is true, what we see is true. But the unfaithful will say: Where is it that we did not believe? Where is it that we thought those things which were read were lies? Thus it will happen, that punishment will be rendered to confusion, and reward to joy. For those will go into eternal burning, but the just into eternal life. Turned to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 236

SERMO 236 IN THE EASTER DAYS He was delivered over to death for our sins and was raised to life for our justification. Our Lord Jesus Christ, as the Apostle says, died for our sins and rose for our justification. Just as by His death we are sown, so by His resurrection we grow. For indeed, by His death is signified the death of our life. About this matter, listen to the Apostle: "We are buried," he says, "with Christ through Baptism into death, so that just as Christ rose from the dead, so we too may walk in newness of life." He had nothing to correct on the cross because He ascended the cross without sin. We are corrected on His cross, and there we should place what we have wrongly contracted, so that we may be justified by His resurrection. You should distinguish thus: He was delivered up for our sins and rose for our justification. He did not say: He was delivered up for our justification, and rose for our sins. In His delivery, sin resounds; in His resurrection, righteousness resounds. Therefore, let sin die and let righteousness rise. The eyes of the disciples were kept from recognizing him. This hope, this gift, this promise, this great grace, when Christ died, His disciples lost in spirit, and in His death they fell from hope. Behold, His resurrection was announced to them, and the words of those who announced it seemed to them as madness. The truth had become as madness to them. If, when the resurrection is preached in this time, it seems like madness to someone, do not all say that he has great torment? Do not all detest, shudder, turn away, close their ears, refuse to hear? Behold what the disciples were, with Christ dead: what we shudder at, they were. The rams had this evil which the lambs shudder at. Then these two to whom He appeared on the road, and their eyes were held so that they would not recognize Him, reveal where their hearts were with words; and what is happening in the soul, the voice is witness, but to us: for their hearts were also open. They were speaking among themselves about His death. He joined Himself to them as if a third traveler; and on the road began to converse, mingling His talk. He asks what they were speaking about among themselves, though He knew everything; to provoke them to confession as if ignorant. And they say to Him: Are you alone a stranger in Jerusalem, and do not know the things that have happened there in these days, about Jesus of Nazareth, who was a great prophet? No longer the Lord, but a prophet. For they thought He was that when He was dead. They still honored him as a prophet; they had not yet acknowledged Him as the Lord, not only of the Prophets, but also of the Angels. How, they say, our elders and chief priests delivered Him to the condemnation of death. And behold, now it is the third day since these things were done. But we were hoping that He was the one who would redeem Israel. Is this the whole struggle? You were hoping, now you are despairing? You see that they had lost hope. Therefore He began to explain the Scriptures to them, so that they might recognize Christ more there where they had abandoned Christ. For they had despaired of Christ, because they had seen Him dead. But He opened the Scriptures to them, so that they might understand that if He had not died, He could not be Christ. He taught from Moses, He taught from the subsequent Scriptures, He taught from the Prophets, what He had said to them: That it was necessary for Christ to suffer, and thus enter into His glory. They heard, rejoiced, sighed; and as they themselves confessed, they burned: and they did not recognize the present light.

Christ who is full in himself, needs in his own.

What mystery is this, my brothers? He enters to them, becomes their guest; and he who was not recognized throughout the journey is recognized in the breaking of bread. Learn to receive guests, where Christ is recognized. Do you not know that if you receive a Christian, you receive Christ himself? Does he not say, "I was a stranger, and you took me in"? And when it is said to him, "Lord, when did we see you a stranger?" He replies, "When you did it to one of the least of these my brothers, you did it to me." Therefore, when a Christian receives a Christian, members serve members; and the head rejoices and it accounts for what is given to the member as given to him. Therefore, let Christ be fed when he is hungry, let him receive drink when he is thirsty, be clothed when naked, be taken in when a stranger, be visited when sick. This is the necessity of the journey. Thus must we live in this pilgrimage, where Christ is in need. He is in need in his own, he is full in himself. But he who is in need in his own and is full in himself brings those in need to himself. There will be no hunger, no thirst, no nakedness, no sickness, no estrangement, no labor, no pain. I know that these will not be there, and I do not know what will be there. For what is not there, I know: but what we shall find there, no eye has seen, no ear has heard, nor has it entered into the heart of man. We can love it, we can desire it, we can sigh for such a good in this pilgrimage: but we cannot worthily think or explain it in words. Certainly, I cannot. Therefore, my brothers, seek who can. If you can find such a one, bring me with you as a disciple. This I know, that he who is able, as the Apostle says, to do exceedingly abundantly above all that we ask or think, will bring us there, where it is written: “Blessed are those who dwell in your house, they will praise you forever and ever.” All our task will be the praise of God. What shall we praise, if not what we love; and we shall love what we see? For we shall see what is true, and that truth will be God himself, whom we shall praise. There we shall find what we sang today, Amen, It is true: Alleluia, Praise the Lord.

Sermons - Sermon 236A

Sermon 236 OF THE SECOND DAY OF EASTER The resurrection of Christ is narrated differently but truthfully by each Evangelist.

During these days of holy Easter, as your Charity knows, brothers, the resurrection of the Lord is solemnly recited according to all the Evangelists. For they wrote their narratives in such a way that they said some things in common, some things, however, one might omit, yet no one diverged from the harmony of truth. All said that the Lord was crucified, buried, and rose on the third day; however, how He appeared to the disciples, because He appeared in many ways, some said differently what others omitted; nevertheless, all wrote the truth.

Disciples slow to believe.

Behold, in the past night during the vigils it was read, if you remember, that the Lord appeared to the women after the resurrection, whom he first greeted himself saying: "Rejoice." And they approached and held his feet, and prayed to him. Likewise, today it was read that he appeared to two of his disciples walking on the road: For they were walking with him, and did not recognize him; for their eyes were restrained so that they would not recognize him; but recognition was reserved for the breaking of bread. For he came with them; he was received by them as a guest; he blessed the bread, and broke it, and they recognized him. Thus you recognize Christ, who believe in Christ. But consider, dear ones, what kind all the disciples were before the Lord's resurrection. Forgive me; they were not yet faithful; great they became afterwards, but before that they were even lesser than us. For we believe Christ has risen, which they did not yet believe. But afterwards they saw, touched, handled with their eyes and hands, and thus they believed, and their hearts were strengthened by the holy Scriptures. They drank, they belched, and filled us. The opinions of strangers do not surpass those two disciples.

They were speaking among themselves, sorrowing over the death of Christ, as if of a man, and Jesus appeared to them and added himself as a third companion, and asked what they were talking about among themselves. They responded: Are you the only stranger in Jerusalem; do you not know what has happened here in these days; how the chief priests have handed over Jesus to death, who was a great prophet? O disciples, where was the Lord, now a prophet? Did he not fulfill all the Prophets? See, brothers, how the disciples believed, but in the despair of the Lord’s death, they returned to the words which strangers spoke about Christ. Do you remember, dear ones, when the Lord once said to his disciples: Who do people say that I, the Son of Man, am? and they responded with the words and opinions of others, not their own faith, and said: Some say John the Baptist, others Elijah, others Jeremiah, or one of the Prophets. Thus, the disciples returned to this, losing their own faith; they began to hold the opinion of strangers. They say, He was, a prophet. This is what strangers said about Christ, but what did the disciples say? But when Christ said: Who do you say that I am? Peter responded: You are the Christ, the Son of the living God. And the Lord said: Blessed are you, Simon Bar Jonah, for flesh and blood has not revealed this to you, as to those who say I am a prophet; but my Father who is in heaven; and I say to you: You are Peter.

You said to me, I say to you; you returned a confession, hear a blessing. For the Lord had said about himself what was lesser, and Peter had said what was greater. In the Lord Jesus Christ, it was lesser that he was the Son of Man; it was greater that he was the Son of God. The lesser said, he who humbled himself; the greater said, he whom He exalted. Upon this rock, the Lord says, I will build my Church. Upon this confession, upon this, which you said: You are the Christ, the Son of the living God, I will build my Church, and the gates of Hell shall not prevail against it. For the gates of Hell had prevailed against these; they had departed from Peter; they had failed on the sand. Help, Lord, your disciples; break the bread, so that you may be recognized; unless you gather them, they will perish. How did you seek? Behold, the disciples say you are a prophet. The believing thief reproves the unbelieving disciples.

Then Jesus opened the Scriptures to them, because they had said despairingly, "But we had hoped that he was the one to redeem Israel." O disciples, you had hoped; now you do not hope. Come, thief, remind the disciples. Why do you despair because you saw him crucified, because you looked upon him hanging, because you thought him weak. That same thief, hanging on the cross, immediately believed and recognized him, a companion in punishment; but you forgot the author of life. Shout, thief, from the cross; you criminal, convict the holy ones. What did those say? "We had hoped that he was the one to redeem Israel." What did this one say? "Lord, remember me when you come into your kingdom." You had hoped, therefore, that he was the one to redeem Israel. O disciples, if he is the one to redeem Israel, you faltered; but he refreshed, he does not forsake. The one who became your companion on the way, he became the way for you. But back then, Peter was not there who had said, "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God." He was not with them. He thought about Christ, wherever he was, that he was with them. Before the Lord died, he had denied; but when the Lord looked at him, he wept. But now, with the Lord crucified and dead... per chance he thought that seeing the Jews insulted, and they said, "If you are the Son of God, come down from the cross, and we will believe you." When perhaps even the disciples, not insulting, but exhorting him to come down from the cross. After he did not, but gave up his spirit, and appeared dead on the wood, as other men die, wrapped, buried; when even they despaired, and among the despairing was Peter. After the resurrection, as Mark the Evangelist says, "He appeared to the women; he said, 'Go, tell my disciples, and Peter, that I have risen from the dead.'" For the Lord had already shown himself to the faithful women; and they returned and evangelized to the disciples, because they saw a vision of angels who said to them, "Why do you seek the living among the dead? He is not here: he has risen"; and they did not find his body in the tomb. The women said these things, and the men did not believe; they were announcing this to the apostles, the announcers themselves of who he was. For when he was casting out spirits from possessed bodies, the very twisted spirits, afflicted by torments, said, "What have you to do with us, Jesus, Son of the Most High God? Have you come here to torment us before the time?"

Sermons - Sermon 237

SERMO 237 TREATISE HELD ON THE FOURTH WEDNESDAY A great error of those who deny that Christ had true flesh.

About the resurrection of the Lord, which followed in the Gospel according to Luke, was concluded today, where we heard that the Lord appeared in the midst of his disciples discussing his resurrection and not believing it. So unexpected and incredible was it to them that they did not see even when seeing. For they saw the living body which they had mourned as dead, they saw him standing in their midst whom they had sorrowed over hanging on the cross, therefore they saw and because they did not believe their eyes to see the truth, they thought they were being deceived. For they thought, as you heard, that they were seeing a spirit. What the worst heretics later believed about Christ, the hesitant Apostles believed first. For there are those today who do not believe that Christ had flesh, because they destroy the Virgin's birth and do not want to believe that he was born of a woman. The Word was made flesh, they utterly estrange from their faith or rather infidelity. The whole dispensation of our salvation that He became man for the sake of redeeming man whom God had made man; this whole thing that Christ shed true, not false, blood for the remission of our sins and with his true blood erased the handwriting of our sins, this whole thing the damnable heretics try to nullify, this whole thing, like the Manicheans, they do not believe; that the Lord appeared to the eyes of men as a spirit, not as flesh.

Christ was Word, spirit, and body.

Behold, the Gospel speaks. The Lord stood among his disciples, who were yet to believe that he had resurrected. They saw him and thought they were seeing a spirit. If it is not wrong to believe that Christ was a spirit and not flesh, if it is not wrong, let the disciples remain in that opinion. Pay attention so that you understand what I want to say; but may God grant that I say it, that is, that I say it in a way that is expedient for you to hear. Behold, I repeat this very thing. Sometimes those abominable ones who detest the flesh and live according to the flesh sometimes say this and thus deceive: Who believes better about Christ—those who say that he had flesh, or us who say: He was God, he was spirit and to the eyes of men he did not appear as a body, but as God? What is better, flesh or spirit? What shall we answer except that spirit is better than flesh? If then, he says, you confess that spirit is better than flesh, I therefore have a better opinion of Christ when I say that he was a spirit, not flesh. O unhappy error! Why do I say that Christ was flesh? You say spirit, I say spirit and flesh; you do not say better, but you say less. Therefore, listen to everything I say, that is, what the Catholic faith says, what the most well-established and serene Truth says. You who say that Christ was only a spirit, which is as our spirit, that is, our soul, you say that Christ was only this. Listen to what you say. I say what you say. He was spirit from that nature and substance from which our spirit also is. How much less you say, notice: there was the Word, there was flesh. You say: Only a human spirit. I say Word, spirit, body: God and man. If I want to say two things, if I want to say two realities, I use this summary: God and man. And true God and true man. Nothing false in humanity, nothing false in divinity: God and man. But about that man if you ask me, again I say two things, human soul and human flesh. You are a man because of soul and flesh; he is Christ because of God and man. Behold what I say.

Let your hands prove whether your eyes are lying! But you think it better to say because you say: It was the Spirit, the Spirit appeared, the Spirit was seen, the Spirit dwelled among men. This you say. This I said: this the disciples also thought. If you say nothing wrong, if what you say is good, then what the disciples thought was also good. If the Lord let them think this way, then you should also be let be. What you believe, they believed. Is what you believe good? Then what they believed was also good. But it was not good. The Lord said to them: Why are you troubled? The disturbance believed what you believe; what? They thought they saw a spirit. And the Lord said to these things: Why are you troubled and why do thoughts arise in your hearts? These thoughts are earthly. For if they were heavenly, they would descend into your heart, not ascend. Why, then, is it said to us: Lift up your hearts, unless it is that earthly thoughts should not find our hearts before us, which we have placed above? Therefore: Why are you troubled and why do thoughts arise in your hearts? See my hands and my feet, touch and see. It is not enough for you to look, put your hands in; if it is not enough to look nor sufficient to touch, feel. He did not only say touch but feel and handle. Let your hands prove it to you, if your eyes deceive you. Feel and see, have eyes in your hands. What do you feel and see? Why? Because a spirit does not have flesh and bones, as you see that I have. You were mistaken with the disciples, correct with the disciples. It is human, I concede. You thought Christ was a spirit; Peter also thought this, and the others: They thought they saw a spirit; but they did not remain in this error. That you may know this was entirely false in their hearts, the doctor did not leave them in this way. He approached, applied medicine, he saw wounds in their hearts and to cure the wounds of their hearts, he bore scars in his body. The Word of God is impervious to the human mind.

Thus let us believe. I know that you believe thus. But lest there be any bad weed in this field of the Lord, I speak also to those whom I do not see. Let no one believe about Christ except what Christ wanted to be believed about Himself; and what He wanted to be believed about Himself benefits us to believe, He who redeemed us, who sought our salvation, who shed His blood for us, who endured for us what was not due to Him, who brought to us what was not due to us: let us believe this. What is Christ? The Son of God, the Word of God. What is the Word of God? What the word of man cannot express, that is the Word of God. Do you ask me what the Word of God is? If I wanted to tell you what the word of man is, I cannot fully explain it, I am exhausted, I hesitate, I falter; I cannot explain the power of the human word, how much more that of the Word of God. Behold, before I say to you what I want to say, already the word is in my heart; it has not yet been said by me and it is with me; it is said by me and it reaches you and does not depart from me. You listen intently to hear the word from me; I feed your minds as I speak. You would share food among yourselves if I brought it to your bellies, and it would not be enough for each individual; but the more of you there are, the more you would divide what I set before you, and each would receive less the greater the number of those receiving. But now I have brought food for your minds; I say: Take, receive, eat. You have received, you have eaten, and you do not divide it. Whatever I speak is whole for all and whole for each individual. See how the power of the human word cannot be fully explained and you ask me: What is the Word of God? The Word of God feeds thousands upon thousands of angels. They are fed by mind, they are filled by mind. It fills angels, it fills the world, it fills the womb of the Virgin, nor there does it move about, nor here is it constrained. What is the Word of God? Let Himself say, the only-begotten, the only Son, what the Word of God is let Him say. He speaks briefly of Himself but what He says is great: "I and the Father are one." I do not want you to count words about the One Word. All the words that can be spoken by humans about the One Word are not sufficient to fully explain it. Therefore, the Word which cannot be fully explained was made flesh and dwelt among us, it assumed the whole and complete human being, soul and body of man. And if you want to hear something more scrupulously, because he had both soul and flesh, and a spirit akin to a beast; when I say human soul and human flesh, he assumed the whole human soul. For there were those who created heresy from this and said that the soul of Christ had no mind, had no intellect, had no reason, but that the Word of God was for Him in place of mind, in place of intellect, in place of reason. I do not want you to believe this. He who created the whole redeemed the whole; He assumed the whole, liberated the whole Word. There is the human mind and intellect, there the soul giving life to the flesh, there true and entire flesh, without sin alone.

Sermons - Sermon 238

SERMO 238 ON THE PASCHAL DAYS

Thus the perennial and sacred evangelical reading demonstrates to us the true Christ and the true Church, lest we err in any of them, or substitute another for the holy bridegroom, or impose another man upon the holy bride. Therefore, lest we err in any of them, let us listen to their matrimonial records of the Gospel.

Hold fast to what you have received against all the opinions of the heretics.

There have not lacked, nor are lacking, those who are so deceived about the Lord Christ that they do not believe that He had real flesh. Let them hear what we have just now heard. He is in heaven, but he speaks here: he sits at the right hand of the Father, but he speaks among us. He himself declares, he himself reveals himself. What need is there to seek another witness about him? Rather, let us hear him. He appeared to his disciples, and suddenly stood in their midst. When this was read, you heard it. But they were troubled: for they thought they saw a spirit. This is what those who do not believe that he had real flesh think: they are Manicheans, Priscillianists, and other similarly unnamed plagues. For they do not think that Christ is nothing, this they do not think: but they think he is a spirit, not having flesh. What about you, Catholic Church? What about you, spouse, not an adulteress? Therefore what about you, except what you have learned from him? For you could not find a better witness about him than him himself. Therefore what about you? You have learned that Christ is the Word and the spirit of man and the flesh of man. What have you learned about the Word? In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God: this was in the beginning with God. What have you learned about the spirit of man? And bowing his head, he gave up his spirit. What have you learned about the flesh? Now listen. Forgive those who think this, what previously erring disciples thought. But they did not persist in error. For the disciples thought this, which the Manicheans think today, which the Priscillianists think today: that there was not real flesh in the Lord Christ, but only a spirit. Let us see if he left them in error. See how evil the error is, which the physician hastened to heal, not wanting to confirm it. Therefore, they thought they saw a spirit: and he who knew these thoughts to be bad, eradicating them from their hearts: He said, Why are you troubled? Why are you troubled, and why do thoughts arise in your hearts? See my hands and my feet: touch and see because a spirit does not have flesh and bones as you see I have. Hold against all the insane thoughts of all, hold what you have received: otherwise you are lost. Christ, the true Word, the only begotten, equal to the Father, the true human spirit, true flesh without sin. This died, this rose again, this hung on the wood, this lay in the tomb, this sits in heaven. The Lord Christ wanted to persuade the disciples that what they saw were bones and flesh: but you contradict. Therefore, does he lie, and you tell the truth? Do you build, and he deceives? Why did Christ want to persuade me of this, except because he knew what it benefits me to believe and what it harms me not to believe? Therefore, so believe. He is the groom.

Hold the head, hear about the body!

Let us also hear about the bride: because I do not know who, again favoring adulterers, want to subvert the true, and substitute the false. Let us also hear about the bride. When therefore they had touched his feet, hands, flesh, bones; the Lord added, and said: Do you have here anything to eat? so that even sharing food it would be proven he was a true man. He took, ate, gave; and while they still trembled with joy, he said to them: Did I not speak these things to you, when I was still with you? Why is he now not with them? What does it mean, when I was still with you? When I was still mortal, which also you are. What therefore was I saying to you? "Because it was necessary to fulfill all things which are written in the Law, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms concerning me." Then he opened their mind, so that they would understand the Scriptures; and he said to them, this way it was necessary for Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead on the third day." Take away the true flesh, there will not be a true passion, there will not be a true resurrection. Behold, you have the bridegroom: it was necessary for Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead on the third day. Hold onto the head: listen about the body. What indeed do we need to show now? We who have heard the bridegroom, also recognize the bride. And in his name, repentance and remission of sins should be preached. Where? from where? up to where? Through all nations, beginning from Jerusalem. Behold, you have the bride. Let no one sell you tales, let not the rabid heretics bark from a corner. The Church is spread throughout the whole world: all the nations have the Church. Let no one deceive you: she is true, she is Catholic. We have not seen Christ, we see her: let us believe in him. The apostles on the other hand saw him, believed in her. They saw one thing, believed in another: and we on the contrary see one thing, believe in another. They saw Christ, believed in the Church, which they did not see: we also see the Church, let us believe in Christ, whom we do not see; and holding onto what we see, we will attain to him whom we do not yet see. Therefore, recognizing the bridegroom and the bride, let us recognize them in their writings, lest we quarrel in such holy nuptials.

Sermons - Sermon 239

SERMO 239 ON THE EASTER DAYS On the Resurrection of Christ According to Mark and Luke Mark and Luke were chosen by God to write the Gospel.

Today, behold, for the third time we have heard from the Gospel the resurrection of our Lord: as you remember that I have spoken to you: because it is customary that the resurrection of the Lord is recited according to all the Evangelists. It is the Gospel of Mark that we just heard when it was read. However, Mark earned this dispensation, as he was not among the number of the twelve, just as Luke was not. For there are four Evangelists: Matthew, John, Mark, and Luke; two of them are among the twelve Apostles, that is, Matthew and John. But their precedence was not barren, so that their successors would not have companions. Mark and Luke were not equal in rank to the Apostles, but they were equal in merit. For this reason, the Holy Spirit wished to choose even from among those who were not among the twelve to write the Gospel, so that it would not be thought that the grace of evangelizing had reached only the Apostles and that the fountain of grace had dried up in them. For the Lord speaks of his spirit and his word, that whoever perceives and holds it worthily will become a fountain of water springing up to eternal life: a fountain, certainly, shows itself by flowing, not by remaining stagnant: through the Apostles, grace reached others, and they were sent to evangelize. Because He who called the first ones also called the second ones: He even called up to the last time the body of His Only Begotten, that is, the Church spread throughout the whole world. In the breaking of the bread, the eyes of the disciples are opened.

What then did we hear Mark say? That the Lord appeared on the way to two, as Luke also said, whose Gospel we heard yesterday: He appeared, he said, to two on the way in another form. But Luke said the same thing in other words, yet did not depart from the same meaning. For what did Luke say? Their eyes were held that they might not recognize him. But what did Mark say? He appeared to them in another form. What this one said: Their eyes were held that they might not recognize him; this one said, in another form. For another form was seen, with their eyes restrained, not opened. So what then, brothers, since Luke said, which I believe you remember quite recent from yesterday's reading, that when he broke the blessed bread, their eyes were opened; what do we think, if then their eyes were opened, were they accompanying him on the way with closed eyes, and could they know where to place their steps if they had closed eyes? Their eyes were thus opened to knowledge, not to sight. Therefore, our Lord Jesus Christ speaks with men unknown before the breaking of the bread, is known in the breaking of the bread: because it is there that he is perceived, where eternal life is perceived. He is received in hospitality, who prepares a home in heaven. For according to the evangelist John, he says: In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you, I go to prepare a place for you. But if I go and prepare, I will come again and take you to myself. The Lord of heaven wanted to be a guest on earth, a traveler in the world, through whom the world was made: he deigned to be a guest, that you might have a blessing in receiving him; not because he was in need when he, as a guest, entered in.

Elijah in need is sustained by a needy widow. The Lord fed holy Elijah during the time of famine through a raven: and while men persecuted him, birds served him. The raven would bring the servant of God bread in the morning, and meat in the evening. Therefore, he did not lack, whom God fed through the ministry of birds: and yet although Elijah did not lack, he was sent to the widow in Zarephath and it was said to him: Go to that widow, she will feed you. Had God failed, that Elijah should be sent to the widow? But if God always provided bread to His servant without human ministry, how would the widow have her reward? Therefore, he is sent not lacking to one lacking, not hungry to one hungry; and he says to her: Go, and bring me a little bit to eat. She had a little, which she was going to consume and die. She responded, revealed to the prophet how much she had: and the prophet said to her: Go, first bring it to me. She did not doubt, but brought it. She offered refreshment, and merited a blessing. Holy Elijah blessed the jar of flour, and the cruse of oil. That which was stored in the house was to be consumed; and that oil hanging in the jar was to be ended: a blessing came, and those vessels became treasures. The little jug of oil became a source of oil, the small amount of flour surpassed abundant harvests.

God therefore makes people in need so that he may find those who do good works.

If Elijah did not need, did Christ need? Therefore, my brothers, the holy Scripture admonishes us, because often God makes His servants who can be fed, needy, so that He may find those who are working. Let no one be proud because he gives to the poor: Christ was poor. Let no one be proud because he receives a guest: Christ was a guest. The one who is received is better than the one receiving; the one taking is richer than the one giving. He who received, possessed all things: he who gave, had received from the one to whom he gave, what he gave. Therefore, let no one be proud, my brothers, when he gives to the poor: let him not say in his heart, 'I give, he receives; I welcome, he needs a roof.' What you might need could be greater. Perhaps the one you receive is righteous: he needs bread, you need truth; he needs a roof, you need heaven; he needs money, you need justice.

Giving money, let us not seek usury. Be a lender, distribute what you receive. Do not fear, lest God judge you as a usurer. Absolutely, absolutely be a lender. But God says to you: What do you want? Do you want to lend? What is lending? To give less, and to receive more. Behold, give to me, God says to you: I receive less, and I give more. What? A hundredfold, and eternal life. Whom do you look for to give to, from whom your money might grow, the man whom you look for, when he receives, he rejoices; when he returns it, he weeps: to receive, he begs; not to return, he defames. Indeed, give to a man, and do not turn away from him who seeks a loan . But only take as much as you gave. Do not make the one whom you gave to cry: for you have lost your benefit. And if what was given or what was received is demanded back, perhaps he does not yet have it on hand: you bore the one asking, wait for the one who does not have it: when he has it, he will return it to you. Do not cause distress to him whose distress you relieved. Behold you gave, and you demand: but he does not have from where to return; when he has it, he will return it to you. Do not shout and say: Do I seek interest? I only ask for what I gave: what I gave, this I will receive. You do well, but he does not yet have it. You are not a usurer, and you want the one you lent to, to seek a usurer, to return it to you. If you do not demand interest, lest he endure you as a usurer; why do you want him to endure another usurer because of you? You press, you suffocate: even if you only demand as much as you gave; suffocating and causing distress, you did not give a benefit, but rather brought greater distress. But perhaps you say: He has from where he could return: he has a house, let him sell it; he has property, let him sell it. When he sought from you, he sought so that he would not have to sell: because of you let him not do it, who helped that it should not be done. Let this be done in regard to men, this is what God commands, this is what God desires.

God made His Son poor for us. But are you greedy? God says to you: Be greedy, be as greedy as you can; but consult me regarding your greed. God says to you: Consult me, I made my rich son poor for your sake. For Christ became poor for us, though He was rich. Do you seek gold? He made it. Do you seek silver? He made it. Do you seek a household? He made it. Do you seek cattle? He made them. Do you seek possessions? He made them. Why do you seek only what He made? Receive Him who made it. Think about how He loved you. All things were made through Him, and without Him nothing was made. All things through Him, and He among all things. He who made all things, was made among all things. He who made man was made man: He was made what He made, lest he who was made perish. He who made all things, was made among all things. Consider the riches: what is richer than He, through whom all things were made? And yet, although He was rich, He took mortal flesh in the womb of a virgin. He was born as an infant, wrapped in infant clothes, laid in a manger; He patiently awaited the ages, He patiently endured the times, through whom the times were made. He nursed, cried, appeared as an infant. But He lay down, and reigned: He was in the manger, and contained the world: He was nourished by His mother, and worshipped by the Gentiles: He was nourished by His mother, and announced by Angels: He was nourished by His mother, and declared by a shining star. Such riches, such poverty: riches, that you might be created; poverty, that you might be restored. Therefore, that He was taken as a poor man in hospitality as if poor, was the dignity of the one receiving, not the misery of the one in need.

Christ is in need in His members.

Perhaps you say to yourself: O blessed are those who were worthy to receive Christ! O if I had been there! O if I had been one of the two whom He found on the way! You be on the way, Christ the guest will not be lacking. Do you think now it is not lawful for you to receive Christ? From where, you ask, is it lawful? Now, rising up, He showed Himself to His disciples, He ascended into heaven, He is there at the right hand of the Father; He will only come at the end of the age to judge the living and the dead: He will come in glory, not in infirmity; He will give the kingdom, not seek lodging. When He gives the kingdom, you will be reminded of what He said: As you did to one of the least of these my brothers, you did to me. That rich man is in need until the end of the age. He is indeed in need, not in the head, but in His members. Where is He in need? In those in whom He was in pain when He said: Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me? Let us therefore serve Christ. He is with us in His own, He is with us in ourselves: not in vain did He say: Behold, I am with you always, to the end of the age. By doing these things, we recognize Christ in good works, not bodily, but in heart; not with the eyes of flesh, but with the eyes of faith. Because you have seen, you have believed, He said to a certain unbelieving disciple who had said: I will not believe unless I touch. And the Lord: Come, touch, and do not be unbelieving. He touched and cried out: My Lord and my God! And the Lord: Because you have seen me, you have believed. That is your whole faith, because you believe what you see: I praise those who do not see, and believe; for when they see, they will rejoice.

Sermons - Sermon 23A

SERMON 23/A SERMON ON THE RESPONSE OF PSALM 74:

"We will praise You, God,"

"We will praise and invoke Your name" To confess to God is to humble oneself to God.

We are happy if what we hear and sing we also do. For our hearing is the sowing, but the doing is the fruit of the sowing. A field in which wheat is sown and generates thorns should not expect a granary but flame. So too those who hear good things and do evil things should not expect for themselves the granary of the kingdom of heaven, but that fire of which it is said: "Go into the eternal fire, which is prepared for the devil and his angels." Having said this, I admonish your Charity that you do not uselessly enter the church, hearing so many good things and not doing well. But according to the goodness of the sower and the seed of the word of God, so in your morals and in your life, just as in good soil, let the most abundant fruit of good morals arise, and expect the farmer to come, preparing for you the granary into which you will be placed. Behold, we have sung: "We will confess to you, God, we will confess and call upon your name." To confess to God, what is it but to humble oneself to God, not to arrogate any merit to oneself? For by his grace we have been saved, as the Apostle says, not by works, lest anyone should boast; for by his grace we have been saved. There did not precede any good life which he from above would love and cherish and say: "Let us help, let us come to the aid of these people, because they live well." Our life was displeasing to him, everything we were doing in us was displeasing to him, but what he made in us was not displeasing to him. Therefore, what we did he will condemn, what he himself made will save. He will condemn the evil deeds of men, and he will save the men themselves. For men did not make themselves, but they did evil deeds. What in them God made, because God made man in his image and likeness, is good. But what man turned away from the creator and maker through free will and turned towards wickedness and did evil, this God condemns, so that he may free the man, that is, God condemns what man did, and God frees what he himself made. A great doctor has come to us.

Therefore, we were not good. And He pitied us, and sent His Son to die, not for the good but for the wicked, not for the just but for the impious. Indeed, Christ died for the impious. And what follows? Scarcely for a righteous person will one die, though perhaps for a good person someone might dare to die. Perhaps someone might be found who dares to die for a good person. But for the unjust, for the impious, for the iniquitous, who would want to die, except Christ alone, so just that He would justify the unjust? Therefore, my brothers, we had no good works, but all were evil. Therefore, when the deeds of men were such, His mercy did not abandon men. And although they were deserving of punishment, He gave grace instead of the punishment that was due, grace which was not owed. And He sent His Son to redeem us, not with gold, not with silver, but with the price of His shed blood, a spotless lamb led to sacrifice for the blemished sheep, if only blemished, and not wholly infected. Therefore, we have received this grace. Let us live worthily of the grace we have received, lest we insult such great grace. So great a physician came to us and forgave all our sins. If we want to be sick again, not only will we be destructive to ourselves, but also ungrateful to the physician.

He showed us the way of humility through his precepts and made it by suffering for us.

Let us therefore follow His ways which He showed us, especially the way of humility that He Himself became for us. He showed us the way of humility by commandments, and He made it by suffering for us. For He would not suffer unless He humbled Himself. Who would kill God, unless God humbled Himself? For Christ is the Son of God, and the Son of God is surely God. He is the Son of God, the Word of God, about whom John says: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. He was in the beginning with God. All things were made through Him, and without Him nothing was made. Who would kill Him, through whom all things were made, and without whom nothing was made? Who could kill Him, unless He humbled Himself? But how did He humble Himself? John himself says: The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us. For the Word of God could not be killed. Therefore, that He might die for us, which could not die, the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us. The immortal took on mortality, that He might die for us, and by His death, He might kill our death. This the Lord did, this He granted to us. The great became humbled, humbled and killed, killed and rising again and exalted, that He might not leave us dead in hell, but might exalt us in the resurrection of the dead, whom He exalted now in the faith and confession of the righteous.

You impudently invoke the name of him whom you do not confess.

Therefore, He gave us humility as our way. If we hold onto it, we will confess to the Lord, and not without reason will we sing: We will confess to you, God, we will confess and invoke your name. For you shamelessly invoke His name to whom you do not confess. First confess, so that you prepare a dwelling for Him whom you invoke. For your heart is full of wickedness. But confession pours out the filth that you harbor within, and cleanses the house to which He whom you invoke may come. For whoever invokes before confessing, seeks to dishonor Him whom he invokes. For if you would not dare invite any saint into your house before you have first cleaned your house so that his eyes do not suffer injury, do you dare to invoke God's name into your heart full of wickedness, unless you first pour out your inner iniquity through confession? Therefore confession, my Brothers, humbles us, justifies the humbled, and exalts the justified. For if we are proud, God resists us; if we are humble, God exalts us; since He resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble, and: He who exalts himself will be humbled, and he who humbles himself will be exalted. Turned towards God.

Sermons - Sermon 23B

Sermon 23/B On Psalm 81:

God has stood in the assembly of gods God is a faithful promiser. To what hope the Lord our God has called us, what we now bear, what we endure, and what we expect, I do not doubt is known to your charity. We bear mortality, we endure infirmity, we expect divinity. For God wants not only to make us alive but also to deify us. When would human frailty dare to hope for this, unless divine truth promised it? But it has been promised not only by divine truth, as we have said, and because we are to become gods, not only has this been promised - and because it has been promised, it is certainly true, for neither such a faithful promisor deceives, nor is such an omnipotent giver prevented from fulfilling what he promised. However, it was too little for our God merely to promise us divinity in himself unless he also took on our infirmity, as though saying: "Do you wish to know how much I love you, how certain you ought to be that I will give you my divinity? I have taken on your mortality." Let it not seem unbelievable to us, brothers, that men could become gods, that is, that those who were men could become gods. What has already been granted to us is more unbelievable, that he who was God became man. And indeed we believe that has already happened, we expect the other to come. The Son of God became the Son of Man, so that he might make the sons of men sons of God. Clearly hold this, which I believe we have already spoken to your charity about, that he was not mortal from his own nature, nor are we immortal from our own nature - not from his, not from his essence by which he himself is God; but in another way from his own, because from his creation, because from what he made, from what he created: for the maker of man made himself man, so that man might become a recipient of God. And now we have this in faith, and in hope it is reserved for us, it will appear at the right time; those who now believe, though he does not appear, will rejoice. But those who were unwilling to believe while he had not yet appeared, when he has appeared, will be confounded. The true God; gods made through adoption.

Therefore, let not the Christian mind shudder and become as if terrified when it is told to mock the gods of the nations and to worship and know the one God to be worshiped; for when it hears in the psalm, which we have just sung: "For God has stood in the assembly of gods." What is a synagoga? Since it is a Greek word, I think most of you know, but some do not. Synagoga in Latin is called "congregation"; so we have sung: "For God has stood in the congregation of gods." Why this? To judge the gods in the midst. Our God, the true God, the one God has stood in the synagoga of gods, certainly of many, not by nature gods, but by adoption, by grace. There is a great difference between the existing God, the God who is always God, the true God, not only God but also the deifier God, that is, so to speak, the deifying God, the God who is not made but makes gods, and the gods who are made, but not by a craftsman.

He who makes false gods falls far from the true God. And because everyone who creates is indeed better than what he creates, now see which gods the pagans worship, and which God you worship. You worship God, who makes you gods; but they worship gods, whom by creating and worshipping they destroy so that they might themselves become gods, creating false ones they fall from the true one. And to those they create, they do not grant that they should be gods, but that they should be called what they are not. They themselves lose what they could be, and they do not give to them what they cannot be. The one who makes a false god offends the true one, and by making what he cannot, he does not become what he can. For he himself, if he wishes, becomes a god, not such as he worships, but such as he makes whom he worships. So what do men want: to become gods, or to make gods? Indeed, it seems more powerful to them if they make gods, than if they become gods. But even if they could make [gods], will it be because he is called such? To whom you assign the divine name, he will be called a god; but he will either be wood or stone or gold, or whatever else it is. Indeed, you, oh impious man, wish to make a god whom you do not make, but you can shape an idol and assign it a name. It will not be what you call it, but it will be what he made whom you do not invoke. For God made wood, God made stone, gold, silver; you from that stone, which God made, wish to make a god. You do not grant it what you made, nor do you take away what he made.

"If it is wood, it is not God."

Therefore, what you did, you did not do: for if I ask you what you did, you will answer "a god"; he whom you made answers better than you. For in a certain way we can even question those things that do not have a soul and sense, so that they do not perceive being questioned, but nonetheless they present a form by which they report, so to speak, to our senses what they are. For example, you made a wooden god. Surely, if it is a god, it is not wood; if it is wood, it is not a god. And yet you respond that you made a god; but I, removing your wooden part, question the wood itself. But do not think me foolish, because I question the wood—what if I were to question it?—look: it is not the voice that questions the soul, but the eyes question form. The look of that wood and its material, my sight questions. And lest human sight be deceived, my touch also questions it. And if you think this too little, your god can be questioned by an axe, which was made wood by my God. In all these questions it answers me that it is wood, which you say is a god, without its voice, yet more faithfully than your voice.

Man is better than the image made by him.

You say God lies, but you are convicted by the very one you made. Nor because you are convicted by it, will it be better than you; even if you lie, it does not lie, you call it god, it calls itself wood, it will not be better than you. Not for you to have a reason to want to worship something better. You feel, it does not feel; you hear and it does not hear; you see and it does not see; you walk and it does not walk; you live and I cannot say: It is dead, because it never lived. You are better than the one you made; worship the one better than you, who made you. It is an insult to you to be like the one you made. What sort of thing should you worship? You get angry at someone cursing you if they say: "Be like this," and yet you worship what you detest being, and by worshiping you become somewhat similar, not that you become wood and cease to be human, but you make your inner man somewhat like the thing you made outwardly. For God made for you, as it were, eyes for the mind, and you do not want to see the truth. God made for you, as it were, understanding for hearing, and you do not want to understand justice. Furthermore, if our inner man did not have a sense of smell, there would be no reason for the apostle to say: We are the sweet aroma of Christ in every place. If that inner man did not have a mouth, the Lord would not say: Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness. Therefore, the inner man has everything - God gave it -, but it does not want to use them, and wants to become like the image it formed, about which the prophet says: They have eyes and do not see, ears and do not hear, noses and do not smell, mouths and do not speak, hands and do not operate, and so on. And see how it concludes: Let those who make them become like them, and anyone who trusts in them. How can men become like dumb images? But according to this similarity that we commend: if the inner man becomes foolish in a way, he becomes somewhat similar to the image and, losing within himself the image of the one by whom he was made, he wants to take on the image of the one he made. For why did the Lord say: He who has ears to hear, let him hear, unless there are some who have ears and do not hear?

"Let the maker judge by his works."

Therefore, let not your heart be troubled, because God stood in the assembly of gods; in the midst, however, He discerns the gods. For discerning in the midst, He says certain commands; those who despise these commands do not wish to be what He said we should be. And some will charge themselves: <" Why distinguish, if all are gods? For why indeed distinguish, if all are gods? Except because there are those who listen, and those who scorn. For there are those who give thanks, and those who are ungrateful, and they are distinguished, but by Him who knows how to distinguish. Let no one wish to distinguish who is made, let Him distinguish who made; let the Creator judge His works, who cannot err when He judges. But by giving His Spirit He also makes men judge, not by themselves, not from themselves, not by their nature, not by their merit, but by His grace and by His gift. He says, "We have not received the spirit of this world, but the Spirit who is from God, that we might know the things that have been freely given to us by God." But the natural man does not receive the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness to him, and he cannot know them because they are spiritually discerned. But the spiritual man judges all things, yet he himself is judged by no one. And if we have the Spirit of God, not only do we discern ourselves, but also from idols.

He who worships an idol does an injury to God the Creator.

Truly, brothers, men are to be grieved who do not distinguish themselves in this way, not to be praised who do distinguish themselves, unless perhaps a man is to be praised who knows it is very important to distinguish between himself and a stone. How would he be, however, if he thought he was what a stone is! And would that he progressed thus far! He makes himself better than a stone, to which, if he were similar or if he made himself similar - for he will never be: however much he might follow his own work, he will not destroy the work of God in himself - if therefore he made himself similar, by thinking himself similar, I do not say: he would be doing himself an injury - for perhaps he thinks little of his injury, and rightly such a man thinks little of his injury -, this I say which should move him: he does an injury to God. By comparing himself poorly, he becomes sacrilegious towards Him by whom he was made: for man was made in the image of God. If therefore you would be sacrilegious or rather would be called so by public laws, by doing an injury to the image of the emperor, what will you be in doing an injury to the image of God? What is worse: to cast a stone at the image of a man, or to make the image of God a stone? Therefore let us dismiss these people as too dead, because, even if they can be aroused, they cannot be aroused by us. Yet we should not therefore despair about them, because we cannot arouse them: for God is able from these stones to raise up children to Abraham.

About idols inhabited by deities. But we must distinguish ourselves from the deities of their stones, woods, gold, and silver, because there are people who believe they can defend themselves with some reason, when they say: "We know the images are worthless, but we do not worship them themselves." And when you ask: "What then do you worship?" they reply: "The deities of the images. We indeed adore what we see, but we worship what we do not see." What are these deities? Let us hear our God speaking through the prophet: Because all the gods of the nations are demons, but the Lord made the heavens, where demons are not worthy to dwell. The prophet mocked demons in one manner and mocked images in another manner. How did he mock the images? "The idols of the nations are silver and gold." He did not want to say stone and wood, but what they hold in high regard, what they consider precious, he presents for ridicule: indeed silver and gold, but still the work of human hands. What did man make there? Did he make them to be gold? Did he make them to be silver? God made this. So what did man make? That they have eyes and do not see. Therefore, man made in the god he made what in himself he would not wish to have been made by the one who made him. He made a blind god, and he would not wish to be made blind by God. So what then? Because he named gold and silver, precious metals, and he chose to ridicule what they hold in high regard, does that differ at all from what he mocked? Gold indeed differs from wood - gold is more precious than wood - but as for having eyes and not seeing, they are equal. The utility or brilliance may differ, but the blindness is equal.

"To be a companion of demons."

Thus, those idols are mocked in one way, being without soul, without sense, without life; but in another way, those which they worship as great, that is, demons, when it is said: "All the gods of the nations are demons, but the Lord made the heavens." And the apostle mocked the idol differently: "We know," he said, "that an idol is nothing;" but he commanded the demons to be avoided differently, saying: "What the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to demons and not to God. I do not want you to become partners with demons." He did not say: "I do not want you to become partners with idols." You would fear perhaps being what you could never be, being a partner of a wooden idol, lest you be thrown into the fire together; fear being a partner of demons, lest you be thrown into the eternal fire together. Pay attention, brothers, to what I say. Being a partner of an idol, even if you wish, you cannot; but a partner of demons, if you wish, you will be, if you do not wish, you will not be. For to all the partners of the devil and his angels it will be said in the end: "Depart into the eternal fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." It seems to me, brothers, that I am distinguishing somehow in the midst of gods, but not I: the Word of God, whether it is treated, sung, or read, has the power and potency of discerning.

Allies of demons are to be avoided.

Someone from the crowd may say to me, "Far be it from me to seek out demons, and not rather to detest them. I utterly detest and flee and curse them." Truly, that is a good voice, a good profession. But what if you have a headache and seek a sorcerer? What if you have a dangerous case and desire a soothsayer? These are vessels of demons. Why do you seek the vessels of those whom you detest? If you speak the truth, I will recognize it by your deeds. Your profession seems certain before the temptation is present. Recognize who is speaking to you: for Satan will never speak to you through an idol, but through a wicked man whose heart he possesses: For he operates, as the apostle says, in the children of disobedience. Therefore, when you start to hear, "Take care of yourself, consult yourself; there is someone who you could question: he will tell you all truths; there is someone who can commend your case, who can commend... ■arnum ...your own: will choose for you to begin the business," then see the devil speaking in the form of a man, whom he has already lured into his company. And if you do not wish to be a companion of demons, avoid being a companion of demons. For you will be a companion of Christ, not to an equal majesty, but to one inheritance, as the apostle says: Heirs indeed of God, but joint-heirs with Christ.

Tolerance must never be lost in adverse circumstances. But then why do men seek the companionship of demons? By losing patience: Woe indeed to those who have lost patience. Who does not know that you are in distress, pressed by affliction, tossed by weakness, consumed by decay, harassed by the snares of the enemy? So be it. These things are true, they are troublesome, they oppress, they crush, they wear down. What then? Were you called by Christ to pleasures? I think God would have rightly said to you if He had said: "Endure: for you are a man, made mortal by your will, by my law." Indeed, our very nature first sinned, and hence we carry what it is to be born. Let us bear our condition. The Creator says: "I will recreate you; those whom I made mortal, I will recreate immortal. Bear your condition, that you may receive your possession." God speaking to man, I think because it would rightly say these things: "Bear, endure; it is decay, it is diseased matter; endure the cutting physician: let all the rot penetrate, let all that was badly conceived burst forth." How much do men suffer under human physicians! They are bound, cut, burned, as long as it pleases him who promises uncertain health, as long as it pleases him who did not make you, as long as it pleases man in dealing with man, and endures all things. It is not enough that he endures the cutting one, he begs him to do it. Do you not think you are being purified, then, when you endure tribulation? Do you not believe Him who said: For gold and silver are tested in the fire, and acceptable men in the furnace of humiliation? Endure therefore what the physician applies to the sick, what the goldsmith does to purify gold.

"Do not be surprised that you see the world condemning Christian times." For this world is like a craftsman's furnace. In the goldsmith's furnace, there is both straw and gold and fire; so in this world, there is both the unbeliever and the believer and temptation. The unbeliever is straw, the believer is gold, the fire is temptation. These three are in a narrow place; yet the place is so narrow that all three keep their properties: the fire to burn, the straw to be consumed, the gold to be purified. Do not marvel, therefore, that you see the world full of scandals, inequities, corruptions, oppressions, blaspheming men, criticizing Christian times, because these things rush violently. Do not be frightened by these blasphemies and this criticism: the straw burns; indeed, they say these things with articulate and seemingly fiery words. Do not marvel at the shining straw when it burns: shortly after, it will be ash. It blazes, crackles, emits smoke. O gold, be silent and be purified. The straw burns in its blasphemies, you be purified from your impurities.

Those things which men have built with great pomp now fall.

"For indeed many evils exist and many increase, since the time when the Christian era began." This indeed is not readily conceded to the unlearned. Let them read the evils of earlier centuries in their own writings; let them read of the greater wars of their ancestors; let them read of the devastations of regions; let them read of the captivities of nations, with alternating success now from here, now from there, eagerly seizing the kingdom. There were also famines and plagues among the ancients: let them read if they have the time; but if they do not have time to read, why do they have so much time to talk? Nevertheless, we confess that certain things happen more frequently, through the failure of matters and the worse condition of the state, those things which were once built with great pomp now fall into ruins and decay. The pagan marvels at the fall of things made by human hand, and he himself wishes to fall, being made by the hand of God. Consider, my brothers - I will speak more freely from this place, where the Lord gives you confidence to preach His truth: for no one's persona is to be received, not of any man, but of this very age, especially since now the psalm rebukes thus: How long will you judge unjustly and show respect to the wicked? , distinguishing between gods and gods; therefore we, who are terrified, terrify and speak as commanded - think, recollect who in times of luxury constructed theaters and amphitheaters. Were the times better because of more licentious entertainments, because of the looser reins of indecency, because it was easier for anyone to do what wickedness they liked? Indeed, those dens of iniquity are... Consider what is done there, and see when the times were better: when those things were being built, or when they are falling?

Many philosophers condemned wicked behaviors.

We ask them that, if they are angry with us, they read their own authors. Let them see whether their own philosophers have approved these disgraceful actions for them, or have laughed at them, or have forbidden them, or have accused them. Let them choose the best among their own, and first recognize their own vices in them before they come to the grace of our Christ. How many things have been said by their own authors against the luxurious, how many things against the prodigal, how many things against those who squander their resources to deserve statues, and who, so that they may be made of stone, want to be covered in rags! Let them read these things among their own: there is no need for them to desire to learn their writings from us, because we, if they love them, teach them indecently and perhaps more decently forget them. Nevertheless, as much as we can remember, they have criticized many such things which these people diligently practice. And because they lack the means, wealth, liberty, and prosperity for these trifles, they accuse Christ, ungrateful to the teacher who comes in as if to children playing badly, and with the severity of his strength, as it were, takes away their clay balls. ■cellas He shook the glass objects, with which they even tormented themselves while playing, out of the hands of the weeping children, but, if they were willing, they could be healed. Let these things go as they go, let them go as it has been foretold: thus the promise of God is fulfilled. The good and the wicked, now mingled together, will be separated in the end.

Flee from evil, grasp the good: the time of the winepress is coming. Just as olives were shaken by various winds on freer branches, in the beginning times luxuriating in the freedom of trifles: in the hanging olive, oil and lees are mixed. These two must be separated by a proper distinction, and pressing is needed. A psalm is inscribed for the winepresses, and its text speaks nothing of the vat, nothing of the press, nothing of the baskets; whatever it speaks pertains to the human race. You hear the name winepress: pay attention to what kind of winepress. The human race must be led from a certain freer mixture to certain tribulations, to certain pressings; one must lean towards the threshing, must place weights. Among the threshings and pressings, you see more abundant luxuries, you see more grasping greed, you see more unbridled lusts: lees run through the streets. You reproach these and say: "Behold, even in Christian times, greater plundering occurs, and graver insolences are exerted upon men." The lees are black, foul, useless, running through the public. Oh, if you could have eyes, from where you might see even the oil flowing into twins! You notice the multitude of adulterers: why do you not notice the multitude of sacred virgins? You notice people fornicating: why do you not notice those who abstain in mutual consent with their wives? You notice people with great greed, receiving others' property without any shame: why do you not notice those who, with great mercy, give their own without any insanity? Many evil rich people displease you: let so many good poor people please you, because both those rich people were made by dire iniquity and these poor people by pious will. Why do you focus your eye only on the lees, to accuse the pressings and refuse to be in the press? Be the oil that is separated inwardly from the lees, not what is emitted outwardly from them. Say with certain oil: I found tribulation and pain, and I called upon the name of the Lord; say with certain oil: It is good for me that You have humbled me, that I may learn Your statutes. Why is it that you see some blaspheming in the pressings, others giving thanks in the pressings, some dark, some bright? Why this, except that what is sung for the winepresses is being fulfilled? Therefore, do not blame Him who comes to press, because He comes to discern; rather recognize the time of discernment, and you will not have a tongue of deception.

Sermons - Sermon 24

SERMO 24 ABOUT THE VERSE OF PSALM 82:

"God, who is like you?"

Thanks be to our Lord God.

Thanks to the Lord our God, and an abundance of praise to that God, who deserves a hymn in Zion. Thanks to him, whom we have sung to with the devotion of the heart and mouth: God, who is like you? Because we feel his holy love ingrained in your hearts, because you fear him as Lord, you love him as Father. Thanks to him, who is desired before he is seen, is felt when present, and is hoped for in the future. Thanks to him, whose fear is not driven away by love, and whose love is not hindered by fear. We bless him, we honor him, both for you and in you. For the temple of God is holy, which you are. Now see how much he lives, or how he lives, when the stones of his temple live like this. Consider, Brothers, what you say and to whom you say it: God, who is like you? Temples say to their God: God, who is like you? Living stones say to their inhabitant: God, who is like you? Let the whole creation come to your hearts: the earth and whatever is in the earth, the sea and whatever is in the sea, the air and whatever is in the air, the sky and whatever is in the sky. He spoke, and they were made; he commanded, and they were created. Therefore, God, who is like you? Let every faithful heart say, let every obedient tongue say, let every devoted conscience say securely: God, who is like you? For they say to him, of whom they are not ashamed. This is fitting, this befits living stones. Who are the dead stones and the living stones. For may the dead stones feel within them the mercy of the living stones! I say dead, not those by which these buildings rise, nor in which the iron of craftsmen works, nor what man has sculpted to be gods, in truth sculpted by man to be called gods, but they are not; I do not speak of those dead stones, but I call dead stones the men to whom the gods are similar. The living stones are those to whom the apostle Peter speaks and says: And you, brothers, as living stones are being built up into a holy temple of God. Therefore, my Brothers, may the dead stones feel the mercy of the living stones within them! For what do we strive? What do we give birth to with either the narrowness or breadth of our hearts? What do we care for, what do we study, except to free the stone from the stone? For the living stones have eyes and see, they have ears and hear, they have hands and work, they have feet and walk. Indeed, they know their maker and worship their craftsman and praise their sculptor. But the dead stones, the servants of stones, behold their gods and are not beheld, worship and are not acknowledged, bring sacrifices, and themselves become a sacrifice to the devil. And they themselves, Brothers, if they had eyes to see and ears to hear, how great it would be to see the prophecies of Christ fulfilled? How great it would be to heed the truthful books and not the deceptive oracles? But why do they not see? Why do they not hear? Because prophecy also said this: Let those who make them and all who trust in them be like them. Therefore, are they to be despaired of or to be despaired of? May it not be so. And what is to be hoped for from dead stones? What do you think, except what we already hold written: For God is able from these stones to raise up children for Abraham? A part of the sense feels in itself one who does not feel himself senselessly worshiping.

Therefore, Beloved, since you know to which God we have said: God, who is like you? Of whom we are not ashamed, whose title we do not read on a stone but carry in our heart, whose name is both known to all and lives in believers, dwells in the submissive, subdues the proud, since we know to whom we have said: God, who is like you? Let us not be moved to hate men whom God has made, but let us be moved to hate whatever in man made well by God man himself has done ill. Man is one name, and it is the name of a creature. I seek the maker of this creature. It is God. Is God the creator of man alone? Is He not also the creator of cattle, and fish, and birds, and angels, and heaven, and earth, and stars, and sun, and moon, and all things above and below, created and governed, the lowest and the highest, bound by the bond of unity? Is God not the maker of all these? But man He made in His own image and likeness. Some likeness of God is called man. And how much to how much? What to whom? Man to God. What is man, except that you are mindful of him? Therefore, let us also say to our God concerning men made in His image and likeness: God, who is like you? If man made in the image and likeness of God rightly says, truthfully says: God, who is like you? - for it is added: Remember that we are dust - if man made in the likeness of God is far from the likeness of God, if that likeness is so far that it is indecent to compare it, yet the heart of man, the heart of a Christian who cannot say "To a man, a god," gladly reads "To Hercules, a god," reads upward, considering downward, questioning the title which says: "To Hercules, a god" - The title does not speak, but it reads: "To Hercules, a god" - let him who said it tell what he said. Both are mute, both are insensible. Above, a lie; below, a fiction. The inscription accuses the writer, confounds the worshiper. The title does not commend a stone as a god; but indicates a foolish man. The title imposes God's name on fiction, and erases the worshiper's name from the book of the living. What part of sense feels within itself, that it does not feel itself to be insensible worshiping? The divine words have peace among themselves. And yet God is able of these stones to raise up children to Abraham. Let one consider there what God Himself did in man, to whom we said: God, who is like you? Let one consider in that man what God did, let him erase what was done by that man against Him who made man. Let Him strike and heal, kill and make alive. For to whom did we say: Lord, who is like you? To Him we consequently added: Do not be silent, nor be mild, O God. What then? In this song, my Brothers, have we provoked God to anger, to whom we said: Do not be silent, nor be mild, O God? Surely either to Him who sent or to Him Himself who came and said: Learn from me because I am meek and humble of heart? Meek and humble of heart is the Son of God, Christ. What then? He says: Learn from me because I am meek and humble of heart. And we said to Him: Do not be silent nor be mild, O God. If He answered us: "O man, is it not enough that you do not learn from me to be meek, and you want to teach me not to be mild?" See, Brothers, consider, assist us with pious intention, with chaste prayer, help us to come out in His name from these straits. Divine words seem to quarrel. They are thought to sound contrary, unless there is understanding, and we receive from Him Himself to whom we said: God, who is like you? Which He also said: I will give you understanding, let us receive. Let us know this: My peace I give to you, says Christ, that Christians may have peace among themselves. How will they imitate? How will they hear, if the very divine words cannot have peace among themselves? Consider, see as if it were the sound of opposites. Come to me, and: Learn from me. What? First, who calls? Whom does he call? To what does he call? Hear who calls: I praise you, Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because you have hidden these things from the wise and prudent, and revealed them to little ones. Thus, Father, because such was your good pleasure. All things have been handed over to me by my Father. Behold who calls: All things have been handed over to me by my Father, and: No one knows the Son except the Father, and no one knows the Father except the Son, and those to whom the Son wills to reveal Him. Great magnitude, and ineffable height. All things have been handed over to me, he says, by my Father. I alone know, and I am known by the One alone. What? Have we been left out? Do we not know? And where is: To whom the Son wills to reveal?

Let the members of Christ fulfill their duties. Your spirit and zeal for faith, and the fervor of charity, and the abundance of holy zeal for the house of God appeared in your voices, which you yourselves have had as clear witnesses of your heart. Allow the zeal of the few faithful of God, through whom you are governed, to also appear regarding this will of yours. For you, Brothers, are the people of God, as He Himself said, and the sheep of His pasture. You have pastors in the name of God, the servants of the shepherd and the members of the shepherd. The mind and will of the multitude for doing anything can appear from these voices. But the care of the few for you must be shown not in voices, but in deeds. Therefore, Brothers, since what pertained to you has been fulfilled by shouting, allow it to be proven to you whether we fulfill what pertains to us by acting. We have tested you. Test us, if after these voices, witnesses of your heart and zeal, we have been negligent in doing what should be done. May it not be that you are found upright and we are reprobate. But since the will to act on those things about which you have shouted is one and the same for us and for you - however, the manner of acting cannot be the same - we think, Beloved, that it is necessary for the will to be received from you, but the plan for fulfilling your will should be awaited from us. Let the members of Christ not be discordant, let all the parts in His body fulfill their duties. Let the eye placed in a high position do what pertains to the eye, the ear what pertains to the ear, the hand what pertains to the hand, the feet what pertains to the feet, so that there may be no divisions in the body, but that the members have the same care for one another. We rejoice and congratulate your Charity because you have obeyed your holy lord and our colleague, your bishop, in what he spoke to you in the morning. Follow this, do not depart from this path, lest you fall. For God greatly assists what you want, if you do what He commands. For what is man? As I began to say, what is any man? Or what is the life of humans, which, as it is written, appears like a vapor for a little while? Consider, therefore, Brothers, our fragility, our humility, the condition of flesh, the fleeting transitions of this age, and see that it will be well for us if all our hope is in Him in whom alone it can be firmly placed. But how will our hope be there unless we obey His commandments? The Roman gods have deserted Rome, why have they remained here? Do we say: "Do not do what you want"? On the contrary, we should even give thanks that you want what God wants. For in order that every superstition of the pagans and gentiles might be destroyed, God wills it, God has ordered it, God has foretold it, God has begun to fulfill it, and in many regions of the earth has even largely completed it. If your will had begun from this city, to seek the abolition of the superstitions of demons here first, perhaps it would have been a difficult task, but not one to despair of. But now, if these things were done effectively where they began to be done, where no examples had preceded, how much more effectively do we believe that this too can be accomplished in the name of the Lord, with the help of His right hand, when preceding examples are already being proclaimed? Surely you have shouted this: "As Rome, so also Carthage." If it has happened in the head of the nations, will the members not follow? Consider, Brothers, pay attention to the books of the gentiles themselves, hear from them, in whom remnants of that misfortune have remained, and either by hearing or reading, learn their letters, and see that those very gods are called Roman gods. Therefore, these gods are called Roman. And when Christians were compelled, by the raging force of the pagans, to worship them, and those refusing endured their cruelty even to the point of shedding blood. The entire fault of the martyrs, whose blood was shed, appeared to be this alone: that they did not want to worship the Roman gods, that they rejected Roman ceremonies, that they did not supplicate to the Roman gods. And the whole force, the entire envy, did not weep, except over the name of the Roman gods. If therefore the Roman gods have failed in Rome, why have they remained here? Therefore, Brothers, attend to this, I have said this, prevent this. Roman gods, Roman gods if therefore, I say, the Roman gods have failed in Rome, why have they remained here? If they could walk, they would say that they fled here from there. But they did not flee. Did they remain there, in Rome? He who was once called the god Hercules is no longer in Rome. But here, he even wished to have his beard adorned with gold. When it is no longer there for you, he wished to have his beard adorned with gold here. I was clearly wrong because I said, he wished. For what does a senseless stone wish? Indeed, it wished nothing, it could do nothing. But those who wanted it gilded were ashamed of the shaved. Some unknown suggestion crept in with a new judge. What did it achieve? It certainly did not achieve that a Christian would honor the stone, but that a Christian would be angered by the superstition to shave it. It did not incline to obedience, but moved to vindication. Brothers, I think it was more shameful for Hercules to have his beard shaved than to have his head cut off. Therefore, what was placed with their error was removed with their disgrace. Hercules is often called the god of strength. His entire virtue is in his beard. He shone to his own harm. What did not shine with the light of the Lord, shone not from light, but from mourning.

God is angry and merciful.

Let them be silent, therefore, and now let them see to which God the faithful pray and say: O God, who is like you? Be not silent, nor be still, O God. This I had taken how, be not still, not by overturning men but errors. He is not still, therefore He is angry. But He is God, therefore He also has mercy. He is angry and has mercy. He is angry to strike down, has mercy to heal. He is angry to kill, has mercy to make live. He does this in one man. Not as if he kills some and gives life to others, but in the same persons He both is angry and is gentle. He is angry at sins, gentle at corrected manners. I will strike and I will heal; I will kill and I will make live. One Saul, later Paul, both he struck down and raised up. He struck down the unbeliever, raised up the believer. He struck down the persecutor, raised up the preacher. If He is not angry, how then was the beard of Hercules cut? For He did this through His faithful ones, through His Christians, through the powers ordained by Him and now subjected to the yoke of Christ. Therefore, brothers, receive these words with a willing mind, and in the help of the Lord already hope for future prosperity. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 240

SERMO 240 In the Paschal days ON THE RESURRECTION OF BODIES, AGAINST THE GENTILES The Gospels agreeing among themselves is a very laborious task.

During these days, as your Charity recalls, the Gospel readings concerning the resurrection of the Lord are solemnly read. For all four Evangelists could not remain silent about either His passion or His resurrection. For the Lord Jesus did many things, and not all wrote everything: but one wrote these things, another those; yet in the highest harmony of truth. John the Evangelist also recounts many deeds done by the Lord Jesus Christ, which none of them wrote. As many were done as ought to have been done then: as many were written as ought to be read now. To show that all four Evangelists, in what they all together say and do not omit, that is, either concerning the passion or the resurrection of Christ, did not say anything contradictory among themselves, is a very laborious task. For some thought they contradicted each other, while they were contrary to their own soul. And therefore the effort was made by those who could, with the Lord's help, to show that they were not contradictory among themselves. But, as I said, if I show this to you, and wish to discuss these matters among the people, the multitude of listeners is overwhelmed with tedium before the knowledge of truth is revealed. But I know your faith, that is, the faith of this entire multitude, and of those who are not here today, yet are faithful; I know their faith to be so certain about the truth of the Evangelists that they do not need my exposition. He who knows how to defend these matters is more learned, not more faithful. He has faith, he has the ability to defend the faith. Another does not have the ability, abundance, and learning to defend the faith, but has the faith itself. However, he who knows how to defend the faith is necessary for the wavering, not for the believers. In the defense of the faith, the wounds of doubt or unbelief are healed. Therefore, he who defends the faith is a good physician: but in you, there is no disease of unbelief. When does he know how to heal what you do not have? He knows how to apply the remedy, but there is no vice in you. The physician is not needed for the healthy, but for those who are ill.

Many dispute various things about the resurrection of the bodies. The resurrection is proven against unbelievers by the omnipotence of God. However, what can be more expediently said for the time, and more conveniently heard, it is not advisable to withhold from you. Concerning the very resurrection, of which the Lord put forth an example in himself, so that we might know what we ought also to hope for in our bodies at the end of the age, many dispute many things; some faithfully, some unfaithfully. Those who dispute faithfully want to know more diligently what they should respond to the unbelievers: but those who dispute unfaithfully argue against their own souls, arguing against the power of the Omnipotent, saying, How can it be that the dead rise again? I say, it is God who does it, and you say, It cannot be done? I do not say, Give me a Christian, give me a Jew: but, give me a Pagan, a worshiper of idols, a servant of demons, who does not say that God is omnipotent. He can deny Christ, he cannot deny the omnipotent God. Whom therefore do you believe; as if I were speaking to a Pagan; whom do you believe to be the omnipotent God, him I say is the one who raises the dead. If you say, It cannot be done, you derogate the Omnipotent. But if you believe him to be omnipotent, then why do you reject me saying these things?

Christ, bearing the punishment without fault, both canceled the fault and the punishment.

If we were to say that the flesh will rise again to hunger, to thirst, to be sick, to labor, to be subjected to corruption; you would rightly have no obligation to believe. For this flesh now has either these necessities or calamities. And why this? Sin is the cause. In one, we have all sinned, and we all have been born into corruption. The cause of all our evils is sin. For men do not suffer these evils without cause. God is just, God is omnipotent: in no way would we suffer these things if we did not deserve them. But while we were in the punishments that we came to from sins, our Lord Jesus Christ wanted to be in our punishments without his own sins. By enduring punishment without guilt, He dissolved both the guilt and the punishment. He dissolved the guilt by forgiving sins; He dissolved the punishment by rising from the dead. This He promised, and he wanted us to walk in hope: let us persevere, and we will attain the thing. The flesh will rise incorruptible, the flesh will rise without flaw, without deformity, without mortality, without burden, without weight. What now causes you torment will later be your adornment. Therefore, if it is good to have an incorruptible body, why do we want to despair of God's doing this? The opinions of philosophers are reviewed concerning the condition of the soul after death. The philosophers of this age, who were great and learned, and better than others, felt that the human soul is immortal: not only did they feel this, but they defended it with as many arguments as they could, and left their written defenses to posterity. There are books; they are read. Therefore, I said that these philosophers were better than others in comparison to those worse; for there were philosophers who would say that when a man dies, no life remains afterwards. Those should undoubtedly be preferred over such. And in what they were better, though deviating in many things from the truth, yet in what they were superior, they were approaching the truth. Those who felt and said that human souls are immortal inquired about the evils of men, the sufferings and errors of mortals as much as men could; and they said, as best they could, that certain sins of I know not what previous life merited these bodies as if a prison for the soul. Then it was asked of them, what happens after, when a man is dead, what will be. And here they strained their wits; and labored, as much as they could, to give reason to humans, to themselves, or to others: and they said, the souls of men living badly, unclean with worst habits, when they leave their bodies, again immediately turn to other bodies, and endure the punishments here that we see; but those souls that lived well, when they leave their bodies, go to the heights of heaven, rest there in the stars and these conspicuous lights, or in whatever celestial and hidden secrets, forget all past evils, and again delight in returning to bodies, and come again to endure these things. Therefore, they wished to make this distinction between the souls of sinners and the souls of the righteous, because they say the souls of sinners, as soon as they leave their bodies, immediately turn to other bodies; but the souls of the righteous remain in rest for a long time; not always, however, but again they delight in bodies, and from the highest heavens, after such great righteousness, make a fall to these evils. The wisdom of the world is foolishness with God. That is what very great philosophers have said. The philosophers of this world could find nothing more than this, about which our Scripture says: God made the wisdom of this world foolish. If He made wisdom foolish, how much more foolishness? If the wisdom of this world is foolishness to God? Yet there is a certain foolishness of this world that reaches God, about which the Apostle says: Since in the wisdom of God the world did not know God through wisdom, it pleased God through the foolishness of preaching to save those who believe. And he says: For the Jews require a sign, and the Greeks seek after wisdom: but we preach Christ crucified; to the Jews indeed a stumbling block, and to the Gentiles foolishness; but to those who are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God. The Lord Christ came, the wisdom of God: heaven thunders: frogs are silent. What the truth said, this is true. What He said, it is clear that the human race is indeed in evil because of sin. But whoever believes in the Mediator, who is established as the mediator between God and men (between the just God and unjust men, a just man in the middle, having humanity from below, righteousness from above; and therefore he is in the middle: one from here and one from there: because if both were from there, He would be there; if both were from here, He would lie with us, and He would not be in the middle): therefore, whoever believes in the Mediator, and lives faithfully and well, will indeed depart from the body, and will be at rest; but later will receive the body not for torment, but for adornment, and will live with God forever. There is nothing that delights him to return: because he has his body with him. Therefore, beloved, since I have proposed to you today what even the philosophers of this world say, whose wisdom God rejected as true foolishness, tomorrow, with the Lord's help, we will be able to explain.

Sermons - Sermon 241

SERMO 241 IN THE DAYS OF EASTER On the Resurrection of Bodies, Against the Gentiles God is not inaccessible to the human mind. The unique faith of Christians is the resurrection of the dead. This, our head Christ demonstrated in Himself, that is, the resurrection of the dead, and provided an example of faith for us; so that the members might hope for in themselves what had preceded in the head. Yesterday we indicated to you that the wise of the Gentiles, whom they call philosophers, those who were the most excellent among them, had scrutinized nature and recognized the creator through the works. They did not hear the prophets, they did not receive the law of God: but to them God spoke in a certain silent way through the works of this world, and the appearance of the world invited them to seek the creator of things; nor could they induce in their minds that heaven and earth stood without an author. About these, blessed Paul the apostle speaks thus: "The wrath of God," he says, "is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness." What is "against all ungodliness"? Not only against the Jews, who received the law of God, and offended the giver of the law; but also against all ungodliness of the Gentiles the wrath of God is revealed from heaven. And lest anyone should say, "Why, when they did not receive the law?" he added afterward: "And their unrighteousness who hold the truth in unrighteousness." Now you answer: What truth? For they did not receive the Law, they did not hear the prophet. Listen to what truth: "Because that which is known of God is manifest in them." From where is it manifest? Listen further: "For God has shown it to them." If you still ask, "How did He show it to those to whom He did not give the law?" listen how: "For the invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made." For the invisible things of Him, that is, the invisible things of God: from the creation of the world, that is, from the time He constituted the world: are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, those things are understood by these things being made. Likewise; I quote the words of the Apostle, I add them: "His eternal power and divinity are understood by these things." So that they are without excuse. Why without excuse? Because, knowing God, they did not glorify Him as God, or give thanks. He did not say: Not knowing God; but: Knowing.

One reaches God rationally through the things that have been made. From where do we know? From the things that he made. Ask the beauty of the earth, ask the beauty of the sea, ask the beauty of the wide and spread air, ask the beauty of the sky, ask the order of the stars, ask the sun with its brilliance enlightening the day, ask the moon with its splendor tempering the darkness of the night, ask the animals that move in the waters, that dwell on the lands, that fly in the air; the hidden souls, the visible bodies; the visible things to be governed, the invisible ones governing: ask these things, They all answer you: See, we are beautiful. Their beauty is their confession. Who made these beautiful, changeable things if not the changeless beautiful one? In the very man himself, so that they might be able to understand and know God, the creator of the whole world; in the man himself, I say, they asked these two things: the body and the soul. They asked what they bore themselves: they saw the body, they did not see the soul. But they did not see the body except by the soul. For they saw through the eye, but inside was the one looking through the windows. Finally when the inhabitant departs, the house lies down: when the one who ruled departs, what was ruled falls: and since it falls, it is called a corpse. Are not the eyes whole there? Even if they are open, they see nothing. The ears are present; but the listener has left: the organ of the tongue remains; but the musician who moved it has gone away. They asked these two things, the body that is seen, the soul that is not seen: and they found that the invisible one is better than the visible one; the hidden soul better, the visible flesh worse. They saw these, they looked upon them, they examined both, and found both changeable in the person himself. The body changeable through ages, through corruptions, through foods, through refreshments, through deficiencies, through life, through death. They went on to the soul, which certainly they had understood to be better, and they also marveled that it was invisible: and they found it also changeable; sometimes willing, sometimes not willing; sometimes knowing, sometimes not knowing; sometimes remembering, sometimes forgetting; sometimes fearing, sometimes daring; sometimes going into wisdom, sometimes falling into folly. They saw it also changeable, they went beyond it also; for they sought something immutable. The foolishness of the philosophers is revealed in the worshiping of idols.

Thus therefore they came to know God who made [them], through those things which He made. But they did not honor Him as God, nor were they grateful: the Apostle says this himself. But they became vain in their thoughts, and their foolish heart was darkened. Claiming to be wise, they became fools. By arrogating to themselves what they had received, they lost what they held. Claiming to be great, they became fools. And to what did they come? And they changed, he says, the glory of the incorruptible God into the likeness of the image of corruptible man. He says idols. And it was little to make an idol in the likeness of man, and to attribute to the artisan the likeness of his work: this was little. But furthermore what? And of birds, and of quadrupeds, and of serpents. Indeed, all these mute and irrational animals, those so-called great wise men made into gods for themselves. I reproved you when you worshiped the image of a man: what should I do to you when you worship the image of a dog, the image of a snake, the image of a crocodile? They reached even these levels. As much as they were elevated seeking the higher things, so much they fell sinking into the depths. For it is submerged deeper what falls from a height.

What the philosophers thought about the fate of souls after this life. So then, as I reminded you yesterday, they asked what comes afterward, that is, after this life. They asked as humans: but when could they find out, since they were humans? They did not have the teaching of God, they did not listen to the Prophets: they could not find out, they speculated. I related to you yesterday their speculations. The evil souls, they say, depart; and because they are unclean, they immediately revolve into other bodies: the souls of the wise and just depart; and because they lived well, they fly to heaven. Fine, you've found them a nice place: they reach heaven flying. And what there? There, they say, they will be, and will rest with the gods: their seats will be stars. Not a bad dwelling place you've found them: or leave them there, do not cast them down. But, they say, after long periods, having completely forgotten the old miseries, they begin to want to return to bodies; and it will delight them to come, and again they come to endure these things, to suffer these things, to forget God, to blaspheme God, to follow the pleasures of the body, to struggle against lusts. They come to these miseries, from where, and to where? Tell me, why? Because they forget. If they forget all evils, let them forget the delight of the flesh. This alone they remember for their harm, from which they fell. They come: why? Because it delights them to dwell in bodies again. From where does the delight come, if not from memory, because they once dwelled there? Erase all memory, and perhaps you might make residual wisdom: let nothing remain to recall. The doctrines of the philosophers concerning the fate of souls are refuted.

Virgil does not approve of the doctrine of the return of souls into bodies. In that opinion, souls cannot be blessed. A certain author among them shuddered, to whom it was demonstrated, or who was introducing someone in the underworld demonstrating a father to his son. For you almost all know this; and would that few knew it. But few know it in books, many in theaters, because Aeneas descends to the underworld and his father shows him the souls of the great Romans about to come into bodies: Aeneas himself was terrified and said:

O father, do you think that any souls go from here to heaven?

Lofty souls, and to return again to delays

Corpora? Is it to be believed, he said, that they go to heaven and return again?

What is this desire for light so dreadful for the wretched? The son understood better than the father explained. He reproved the desire of souls wishing to return again to bodies. He called it a dire desire, called them miserable; nor was he ashamed of them. To this, philosophers, you have led them, that souls be purged, reach the highest purity, and through this purity forget all things, and through forgetfulness of miseries return to the miseries of bodies. Tell me, I beg you: even if these things were true, would it not be better not to know them? Even if they were true, I say, which without a doubt they are false because they are foul; would it not be better not to know them? Or perhaps you will say to me: You will not be wise if you do not know these things? Why should I know them? Can I be better now than I will be in heaven? If in heaven, when I will be better and more perfect, I will forget all that I learned here, and there I will be better not knowing these things; let me not know them now. You say that those dwelling in heaven forget all things: let me be on earth ignorant of all these things. Then, I ask you, do those souls in heaven know they will suffer again the miseries of this life, or do they not know? Choose what you will. If they know they will suffer such great miseries, how are they blessed, thinking about their future miseries? how are they blessed, where they are without security? But I see what you choose: you will say, They do not know. Therefore, you praise ignorance there, which you do not allow me to have now, teaching me on earth what you say I will not know in heaven. They do not know, you say. If they do not know, and do not think they will suffer, they are blessed in their error. For as they are to suffer, they think they will not suffer: what is it to think falsely but to err? Therefore, they will be happy in their error; they will be blessed; not by eternity, but by falsehood. Let the truth free us, so that we can truly be blessed: for the word of our Redeemer is not void: If the Son makes you free, you will be truly free. For He said: If you remain in My word, you are truly My disciples; and you will know the truth, and the truth will make you free.

Great the ravings of great scholars!

Then hear something worse, something to be grieved over or rather to be laughed at. Here is a wise man, a philosopher, that is, on earth (for example, Pythagoras, Plato, Porphyrius, and I don't know who else among them), why do you philosophize? For a happy life, he says. When will you have that happy life? When, he says, I will have left this body on earth. Therefore now life is miserable, but the hope is for a happy life: there life is happy, but the hope is for a miserable life.

Therefore the hope of our unhappiness is happy, and the happiness of our hope is unhappy. Let us reject these things, and either laugh because they are false, or grieve because they are greatly esteemed. For these are, my brothers, the great ravings of great learned men. How much better do we hold the great sacraments of the great saints? They say purified, cleansed, wise souls return due to love of bodies, purified souls return to bodies due to the love of bodies. Therefore does a purified soul love like this? Is not this love a great filth?

Porphyry's opinion on fleeing the body is explained. But the body is to be entirely avoided. Their great philosopher, later Porphyry, a fierce enemy of the Christian faith, who lived in the times of Christians; but ashamed of the same delusions, partially corrected by Christians, said and wrote: The body is to be entirely avoided. He said all, as if every body was a burdensome bond for the soul. And certainly if every kind of body should be avoided, it is not fitting to praise the body and to say how, with God teaching, our faith praises the body: because even the body which we have now, although we bear punishment from sin, and the body which is corrupted, weighs down the soul; nevertheless this body has its form, the arrangement of its limbs, the distinction of senses, its erect posture, and other aspects that amaze those who consider them well. Nevertheless, that body will be entirely incorruptible, entirely immortal, entirely agile and easy to move. But Porphyry says: You praise the body to no purpose; whatever kind of body it is, if the soul is to be blessed, the body is to be entirely avoided. This is what the philosophers say: but they err, they rave. I will quickly prove it: I do not wish to dispute any longer; because what is preached should have a subject. For there are two things connected to each other, the preacher and the subject. God surpasses all: to Him all things are subject. And if the soul has any honor with God, it should have something subjected. But I do not wish to dispute this longer, I read your books: you say this world is an animal, that is, heaven, earth, seas, all the enormous bodies, the immense elements everywhere; all this, the entire body, which consists of all these elements, you say is a great animal, that is, to have its own soul, but not to have bodily senses; because externally there is nothing that can be felt: nevertheless, it has intellect, clings to God: and that the soul of the world itself is called Jove, or called Hecate, that is, as if it is the universal soul governing the world, and making a certain one animal. And you say that the same world is eternal, always to exist, never to have an end. Therefore if the world is eternal, and the world remains without end, and the world is an animal; this soul is always held in the world: surely the body is to be entirely avoided? What is it that you were saying, The body is to be entirely avoided? I say happy souls will always have incorruptible bodies. You who say, The body is to be entirely avoided, kill the world. You say that I should flee from my flesh: let your Jupiter flee from heaven and earth.

Plato himself opposes the opinion of Porphyry.

What do we find that the same Plato, the teacher of all these people, in a certain book of his which he wrote about the constitution of the world, introduces God as the maker of gods, that is, creating heavenly gods, all the stars, the sun, and the moon? Therefore, he says that God is the creator of the heavenly gods: he says that the stars themselves have intellectual souls, which understand God, and visible bodies that are perceived. I say, so that you may understand: This sun that you see would not be seen if it were not a body: this is true. Any star or moon would not be seen if it were not a body: he speaks the truth. Therefore, the Apostle also says: And there are heavenly bodies and earthly bodies. And he follows: There is one glory of the heavenly bodies, and another glory of the earthly bodies. And again speaking of the glory of heavenly bodies, the Apostle added, and said: One glory of the sun, another glory of the moon, another glory of the stars. For star differs from star in glory: so also is the resurrection of the dead. You see that brightness is promised to the bodies of the saints, and a diverse type of brightness, because there are diverse merits of charity. But what do they say? These stars that you see are indeed bodies, but they have their own intellectual souls, and they are gods. In the meantime, concerning the bodies, because they are bodies, they speak the truth: but whether they have their own souls, why should I discuss it? Now let us come to the matter. Plato himself introduces God addressing the gods, who he made from corporeal and incorporeal substance, and among other things saying to them: Since you have been born, you cannot be immortal and indissoluble. At this voice they might have started to tremble. Why? Because they desired to be immortal and did not want to die. Therefore, to take away their fear, he followed and added and said: Nevertheless, you will not be dissolved, nor will any fate of death destroy you, nor will they be stronger than my plan, which is a greater bond to your perpetuity than those by which you are bound. Behold, God gives the security of immortality to the gods made by him: he gives them the security that they will not leave the spheres of their bodies. Is any body certainly to be avoided? As far as I estimate, it has been answered to them, as you can understand it: just as we can speak, as far as the time of the speech permits, as far as your capacity allows, it has been answered to them. Now, indeed, what they themselves also say about the resurrection of bodies, as if acutely, so that we might not be able to respond to them as they think, it is much to tell you today. But since I promised you once, during these days this question about the resurrection of the flesh is to be dwelled upon, for what remains, with the Lord helping, prepare your ears and hearts for tomorrow.

Sermons - Sermon 242

SERMO 242 IN THE PASCHAL DAYS On the resurrection of the bodies, against the gentiles.

Among the miracles performed by God, the resurrection of Christ stands out. In these holy days dedicated to the Lord's Resurrection, as much as we can with His gift, let us discuss the resurrection of the flesh. For this is our faith, this promise was given to us in the flesh of our Lord Jesus Christ and in Him, the example was set. For He wanted to not only announce but also demonstrate what He promised us at the end. Those who were with Him at that time saw Him, and as they were frightened and believed they saw a spirit, they held the solidity of the body. For He spoke not only words to their ears but also appeared to their eyes: and it was not enough to offer Himself to be seen unless He also offered to be handled and touched. For He said: "Why are you troubled, and why do thoughts arise in your hearts?" For they thought they saw a spirit. "Why are you troubled," He said, "and why do thoughts arise in your hearts? See my hands and my feet; handle and see, for a spirit does not have bones and flesh as you see me have." Against this evidence, people dispute. For what else would people do, who think in human ways, but argue against God about God? For He is God, they are people. But God knows the thoughts of humans, that they are vain. In a carnal man, the whole rule of understanding is the habit of seeing. What they are used to seeing, they believe; what they are not used to, they do not believe. God performs miracles beyond habit, because He is God. In fact, it is a greater miracle that so many people are born every day who did not exist than that a few who existed have risen: yet these miracles are not grasped with consideration but have become commonplace through their constancy. Christ is risen, it is a fact. He had a body, He had flesh, He hung on the cross, He gave up His spirit, He was laid in a tomb. He showed that body alive, who lived in that body. Why do we marvel? Why do we not believe? It is God who did this: consider the author and remove the doubt.

Why the Lord ate after the resurrection and kept the scars.

Men therefore ask whether this decay of the body, which they feel in their flesh, will be in the resurrection of the dead. We say it will not be. They respond to us: If there will be no decay, why will it be eaten? Or if it will not be eaten, why did the Lord eat after the resurrection? Just now, when the Gospel was read, we heard that when He presented Himself alive to the eyes and hands of His disciples, it seemed insufficient to demonstrate corporeal evidence: but He added: Do you have anything here that can be eaten? And they offered Him a piece of broiled fish, and a honeycomb: and He ate, and gave the leftovers to them. Therefore it is said to us: If the decay of the body will not rise, why did the Lord Christ eat? You have read that He ate, have you read that He was hungry? What He ate was of His power, not of necessity. If He desired to eat, He would have needed it. Again, if He could not eat, He would have been less powerful. Didn’t the angels, when they were received as guests by our fathers, also eat, and yet they were not corruptible?

They say again: Will the vices that were in the human body, with which a man dies, rise again? We answer: The vices will not rise again. And it is said to us: Why then did the Lord rise again with the scars of his wounds? What do we say to this, except that even this was of power, not of necessity?

Thus he wished to rise, thus he wished to present himself to some who doubted. In that flesh, the scar of the wound healed the wound of unbelief. The resurrection of the little ones, what kind.

They still dispute and ask us: Will infants who die be resurrected as infants? Or will there be a full age of those revived, whose age was small when they died? This indeed we do not find definitively in the Scriptures. Incorruptible and immortal bodies are promised to be resurrected. But if a small age is restored, if short stature is recalled, then will also weakness be recalled for that reason? If they will be small, will they lie down and be unable to walk? It is more credible, however, and more probable and more reasonable to accept that full ages will be resurrected, in order to give what was going to come with time as a gift. For we would not believe that even old age will be resurrected wheezing and bent. In short, take away corruption, and add what you will.

How will the earthly body be in heaven?

But, you ask, how will an earthly body be in heaven? The philosophers of the Gentiles, those very great ones, whose opinions I have already revealed to you, either as mad or at least as human (for they sought these things not by the spirit of God but by the conjecture of the human heart); these primarily make this question, considering subtly the moments of weights and the order of the elements: and they say, as we also see, the world to be so ordered, that the earth is at the lowest point as if at its foundation, water is poured above the earth as the second layer, air comes third, and the ether covers all. That upper element, which they call ether, they say is liquid and pure fire, from it the stars are formed, and nothing earthly can be there, because the order of weights does not admit it. If we say to them that our bodies will live on a new earth and will not be in heaven; we speak boldly and rashly, or rather unfaithfully. For we ought to believe that we will have such bodies, so that wherever we want, whenever we want, there we will be. For if we respond, to solve the question of the order of weights, that we will live on the earth; there is also the question for us about the very body of the Lord, with which he ascended into heaven. The body of Christ ascended into heaven.

You have heard what has just been sounded in our ears from the Gospel: He lifted up His hands and blessed them. And it happened, while He blessed them, He departed from them and was carried up into heaven. Who was carried up into heaven? The Lord Christ. Which Lord Christ? The Lord Jesus. For what, will you separate man from God, and make another person of God, distinct from the person of man, so that there is no longer a Trinity, but a quaternity? Just as you, man, are soul and body; so the Lord Christ is Word, soul, and body. But the Word did not depart from the Father: He came to us, yet did not forsake the Father; He received flesh in the womb, and ruled the world. What, therefore, was lifted into heaven, if not what was taken from the earth? That is, that flesh, that body, of which He spoke to the disciples, saying: "Handle and see, for a spirit does not have flesh and bones, as you see I have." Let us believe this, brothers: and if we find it difficult to refute the arguments of philosophers, let us hold without difficulty to that which has been demonstrated in the Lord, through faith. Let them babble, we believe. With God willing, that which otherwise cannot be done is done. But they say that a earthly body cannot be in heaven. What if God wills it? Argue against God, and say: God cannot. Do you not, whoever you are pagan, say that God is omnipotent? Is it not read in the book of Plato, which I demonstrated yesterday, that God said to the gods made by him: Since you have been born, you cannot indeed be immortal and indissoluble; yet you will not be dissolved, nor will any fates of death destroy you; nor will they be stronger than my will, which is a greater bond for your perpetuity than those by which you are bound? God has reduced everything to his will, who can also do what is impossible. For what else is it, You cannot be immortal, but that you may not die I make; except, and what cannot be done, I do? The order of bodies arises from the diversity of weights.

I wish, however, to discuss a little about the diversity of weights. I ask you, tell me, Earth is earth, Water is water, Air is air, Aether, that is, the heavens, and that liquid fire is the heavens. These four indeed have, as it were, built and constructed the world step by step, that is, the world was built from these four. Seek what is at the bottom, it is earth: what is above, it is water: what is above the water, it is air: what is above the air, it is heaven, it is aether. What of solid bodies that are held and touched? I do not speak of liquids, which slide and flow; I speak of tactile bodies, where are they from? Are they to be assigned to earth, or to water, or to air, or to aether? You will answer, To earth. Therefore, is wood an earthly body? Clearly earthly. It is born in the earth, nourished in the earth, grows in the earth. It is tactile, not fluid. Return with me to that order of weights. Earth is at the foundation: follow the order. What is above the earth? Water. Why does wood float above water? It is an earthly body: if you refer to that order of weights, it should be under the water, not above. We find water between earth and wood: under earth, above water, and above water, again earth, since wood is earth. You lost that order, keep the faith. Therefore, earthly bodies are found above the element, which is second in the order of elements, when woods float and do not sink.

Pay attention to something else that will astonish you more. The heaviest bodies themselves, and yet earthly ones, which as soon as they have been set upon the water, immediately sink and reach the lowest depths, as is the case with iron, finally as is the case with lead. For what is heavier than lead? Nevertheless, the craftsman’s hand approaches the lead, makes from it some hollow vessel, and the lead floats on the water. Will not God then give to my body what the craftsman gives to the lead? Then where do you place the water itself? Return to the order of the elements. Surely you will answer that water is above the earth. Why then, before they run on the earth, do the rivers hang in the clouds? The swifter motion of certain heavier bodies.

Recall then your consideration and thought to what I am about to say, if, with the Lord's help, I can. What is more easily moved, what is more swiftly agitated, the heavier body, or the lighter one? Who would not answer, the lighter? For lighter bodies are more easily moved, more quickly agitated: heavier ones more difficultly and more slowly. Surely you established the rule, surely you considered, and, after examining everything, you responded that lighter bodies are more easily moved and more swiftly agitated than heavier ones. It is so, you say. Then answer me. Why does the lightest spider move slowly, and the heavy horse run swiftly? I will speak of humans themselves: a larger human body is heavier; a shorter body which has less weight is lighter. That is so, but if someone else carries it. But if the man himself carries his own body, the strong one runs, the thin one weakened by illness can scarcely walk. Weigh a thin and a robust man; the one weakened by illness scarcely weighing a few pounds, the one with the health of the body bearing much weight in his flesh: try to lift them both; the strong one is heavy, the thin one is light. Let the carrier depart, let the walker appear; leave them to themselves, let them move their own bodies; I see the thin one scarcely moving a step, I see the strong and robust one running. If this is the power of health, what will the power of immortality be?

Spiritual bodies after the resurrection, from where they are so called.

God will therefore grant wonderful ease, wonderful lightness. These bodies are not called spiritual without reason. They are not called spiritual because they will be spirits, not bodies. For the ones we have now are called animal bodies: and yet they are not souls, but bodies. Just as these are now called animal bodies and are not souls, so those are called spiritual bodies, but they will not be spirits, for they will be bodies. Why is it called a spiritual body, dearest, if not because it will serve at the command of the spirit? Nothing from you will contradict you, nothing in you will rebel against you. There will not be what the Apostle laments: "The flesh lusts against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh." There will not be: "I see another law in my members warring against the law of my mind." These battles will not be there: peace will be there, perfect peace will be there. Wherever you wish, you will be: but you will not depart from God. Wherever you wish, you will be: but wherever you go, you will have your God. In whom you will be blessed, you will always be with Him.

Let us hold firmly to the promises of God with steadfast faith. The promise of resurrection is confirmed by the so many other promises of God already fulfilled. Let no one deceive, let no one argue, let no one be deluded by their own suspicion: what God promised us, we should hold most certainly is to come. When Christ appeared, my brothers, when He was thought to be a spirit, to convince that He was a body, He did not only present Himself to be seen by the eyes, but also to be touched by the hands. To confirm the truth of faith in His body, He deigned to take food not out of necessity, but by His power. Yet, while they were still trembling with joy, He reinforced their hearts with the Holy Scriptures; and He said to them: These are the words that I spoke to you while I was still with you, that everything written about Me in the Law of Moses, the Prophets, and the Psalms must be fulfilled. Then He opened their minds, as the Gospel speaks which has just been read, so that they might understand the Scriptures; and He said to them, Thus it is written, that the Christ should suffer, and on the third day rise from the dead, and that repentance and forgiveness of sins should be proclaimed in His name to all nations, beginning from Jerusalem. This we did not see, but that we see. When these things were promised, they were not yet seen. The Apostles saw Christ present: but they did not see the Church spread throughout the whole world: they saw the head, and believed concerning the body. We have our own turn, we have the grace of our dispensation and distribution: the times for believing from the most certain evidences are distributed to us in one faith. They saw the head, and believed concerning the body: we see the body, let us believe concerning the head.

Sermons - Sermon 242A

Sermon 242/A On the Paschal Days, concerning the Resurrection of the Bodies Christ's resurrection anticipated our resurrection. The holy Gospels testify that our Lord Jesus Christ rose from the dead on the third day, and the whole world now confesses this in the holy Creed. The prophets, who did not see such things, spoke of what was to come; for they did not see, but foresaw in the spirit. And I think that now the rest ought to be ashamed of themselves, who, while they do not dare to deny Christ's resurrection, deny our future resurrection. For they say: He rose, as if he alone to whom it was allowed to rise again with the very flesh, which he deigned to take up. Does it follow then, that our flesh also will rise again, because his did? Surely his power and virtue are far beyond us. To which it is answered: The divinity of Christ is far from you, but the weakness of Christ has drawn near to you. God in himself, for your sake a man; he made you of his own, he suffered of yours for you. If therefore he made you of his own, he rose again in yours. The Word indeed did not have flesh: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God: this was in the beginning with God. All things were made through him. And man was made through him: but afterwards he was made man, through whom man was made; and, lest man should perish, Christ died. But Christ rose again. What rose in him? The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us. The Word took what it was not, but never lost what it was. Therefore, the Word remained. What rose? The Word. Why did it fall? So that it might rise again. Why did the Word die? So that it might revive. But we say it died in the flesh which it assumed, not in the divinity in which it remained. Therefore, in that matter in which Christ rose again, he did harm to himself, he provided an example to you; for it was humiliation for him to rise again, an injury. Return to the Word, return to it: in the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God, and see what it means for him to rise; for he who raised his own flesh, will also raise yours; therefore, he willed to raise his own, lest you should not believe that yours would rise again.

God, the creator of the body, promises that we will rise again. But men who argue against it say: The flesh of Christ resurrected because it was three days in the sepulcher and did not see corruption; it neither decayed nor decomposed nor was dissolved into dust; but our flesh, when by chance the graves are opened, scarcely are bones found there, dust is found; whatever was flesh, all is reduced to rot, all is resolved into dust; therefore, can that which could not preserve its integrity rise again? Consider, O man who disputes these things, consider, I say, that there are bones in the sepulcher; if nothing else, at least there are bones. There is also dust of the body in the sepulcher, in the place where the bosom of the earth has received it. Return to your origin and inquire, when you were sown, what were you. In the womb, our beginnings were poured out; remember: compare a buried man and a sown man. Surely we all know that we are mortal. Just as we consider the bowels of the earth, in which the body lies sown so that it may rise again, so we should consider those sown in the maternal bowels, whence this composition of members has risen. Where were these five senses of the body hidden? Where were the eyes, tongue, ears, and hands in that moisture? Whence did these distributed offices of the members proceed? Who created these? Who formed these? Was it not God? Therefore, the same God who could bring forth what was formed from the womb, He wishes you to consider things made from things done, and to believe that He can bring you, alive, from the grave. That men are sown in this way, that men, I say, are formed in the bowels of mothers, are daily miracles; but for too much frequency they have lost their admiration, and for the custom itself they have become cheap. The thing that will happen once, that is, the future resurrection happening once, witnesses to everyday events. Nature cries out, Scripture rebukes, let the future thing be believed; let it be believed, brothers, that our body will rise again, for the good to glory, for the wicked to punishment.

Let our mind be full of the faith of resurrection.

What, I ask you, who do not wish to believe in the future resurrection of the flesh, what moves you? What displeases you in the body? Who ever hated his own flesh? says the Apostle. What displeases you in the body? If every aspect of the body is described, does not the one who hears grow dull, and does not the one who describes become exhausted? What displeases you in the body? I say, corruption, mortality. But what pleases you will exist, what displeases you will not exist. Listen to the Apostle: It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body; it is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power. Listen more fully: This perishable must put on the imperishable, and this mortal must put on immortality. What pleases you will revive, what displeases you will perish. Therefore, do not be ungrateful to your Redeemer by not believing what He promised; but do what He commands, so that you may receive what He promised. For your Redeemer can do all things, because He is God. If it displeases you that the body should be raised, it should also displease you now. Why do you care for what displeases you? Why do you protect what displeases you? Why do you nourish what displeases you? Why do you wish for it to be unharmed? Does it please you? Then give thanks, and believe in the resurrection. Bodies will rise, because Christ has risen; but they will have no need, because even Christ, when He rose, ate by His power, not by necessity. There will be no hunger there; we will not stand there with trembling and say: Give us this day our daily bread; we will always have the eternal bread. But it will always be present; we will not wish for rain because of it, we will not fear a dry sky; for our bread will be the one who made the sky. And there will be no fear, no labor, no pain, no corruption, no poverty, no weakness, no fatigue, no delay. None of these will be, but the body will be. For all these evils that we feel in the body happened because of sin, not arising from creation. From the beginning, through the man who sinned, we received an evil inheritance from our sinful father; but another inheritance came to us from Him who took on ours and promised His own inheritance. We had death through guilt, He took on death without guilt; He who was not a debtor was killed, and He washed away the record of our debts. Therefore, let your mind be full of faith in the resurrection. Not only what has already been proclaimed about Christ, but also what is to come about Him is promised to Christians.

Sermons - Sermon 243

SERMO 243 ON THE PASCHAL DAYS On the Resurrection of the Lord according to John John recounts that the Lord appeared to Mary in his own way. The account of the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ according to the evangelist John has begun to be read today. For you know this, and I had recommended to you that according to all four Evangelists the resurrection of the Lord would be recited on these days. In what we have heard, it is usually only this that causes question: why did the Lord Jesus say to the woman seeking His body, and who already recognized Him as living, "Do not touch me, for I have not yet ascended to my Father."

However, I had told you, and you ought to remember, that not all say everything, but that what is omitted by some is stated by others. Yet it is not so that they should be thought to contradict each other, if conflict is absent and piety is present in understanding. For, as it is read in the evangelist Matthew, after He had risen, He met two women in whom this woman was included, and He said to them, "Hail." Those women approached, took hold of His feet, and worshipped Him: and certainly, He had not yet ascended to the Father. How then is she now told, "Do not touch me; for I have not yet ascended to my Father?" For these words seem to sound as though Mary would then be able to touch Him when He had ascended into Heaven. If she cannot touch Him while He is on earth, who among mortals can touch Him while He is sitting in Heaven?

He touches Christ, who believes in Christ. But that touching signifies faith. He touches Christ who believes in Christ. For that woman who suffered from the flow of blood said within herself: If I touch the hem of his garment, I shall be healed. She touched with faith, and the health she presumed followed. Finally, in order for us to know what it truly means to touch, the Lord immediately said to his disciples: Who touched me? And the disciples said: The crowds press upon you, and you say, Who touched me? And He replied: Someone touched me. As if saying: The crowd presses, faith touches. Therefore, it seems that this Mary, to whom the Lord said: Do not touch me, for I have not yet ascended to my Father, bears the persona of the Church, which then believed in Christ when he had ascended to the Father. Behold, I ask you, when did you believe; I ask the Church spread throughout the whole world, whose persona was in one woman: and with one voice she responds to me, I believed then, when Jesus had ascended to the Father. What does it mean, I believed then; if not, I touched then? Many carnal people thought of Christ as merely a man, they did not understand the divinity hidden in him. They did not touch well because they did not believe well. Do you want to touch well? Understand Christ where he is co-eternal with the Father, and you have touched. But if you think of him as a man, and nothing more, he has not yet ascended to the Father for you.

Why will we retain the members of the body after the resurrection?

Therefore, the Lord Jesus presented the form of His body to human senses to affirm the resurrection of the flesh. He wanted to teach us nothing else by showing Himself alive in the body after His resurrection than for us to believe in the resurrection of the dead. When, therefore, all things are to be restored whole, a difficult question often arises from those who wish to know, and is again proposed by those who wish to debate, regarding the use of the members. For they say that our body has all its members, and that these members appear necessary for certain operations. For who does not know, who does not see, that we have eyes for seeing, ears for hearing, tongue for speaking, nostrils for smelling, teeth for chewing, hands for working, feet for walking; and even those members which are called shameful, for generating? Furthermore, the internal organs, which God wanted to be covered so they would not be horrific in appearance; our internal parts and what are called intestines, for what uses they are good, and many men, and better still, doctors know. They argue and say to us: If we have ears for hearing, eyes for seeing, a tongue for speaking; why will we have teeth if we will not be eating, throats, lungs, stomach, intestines through which food passes and is processed for the tempering of our health; finally, they ask, why will we have those very members which are called shameful, where there will be no generation, no digestion? On the harmony of the limbs in man.

What shall we answer them? Shall we say that we will rise without intestines, in the likeness of statues? For it is easy to respond regarding teeth. Teeth not only help us to chew but also to speak, striking our tongue like a plectrum on strings, so that we form syllables. Therefore, our other limbs will be for appearance, not for use; for the commendation of beauty, not to meet a necessity. Will they be unsightly because they are idle? And indeed, now because we are unskilled and ignorant of the causes of things, if our interior parts are seen, they are horrified rather than loved. For who knows how our limbs are connected to each other, and by what numbers they are joined together? Hence it is also called harmony; a word derived from music: where we certainly see strings stretched in a lyre. If all the strings sounded alike, there would be no melody. Different tensions produce different sounds, but different sounds joined by reason produce not visible beauty, but sweetness to those who hear. Whoever has learned this reasoning in human limbs admires and delights in it so much that this understanding is preferred by the intelligent over all visible beauty. Now we do not know this; but then we will know: not because they will be exposed, but because even when covered, they will not be able to remain hidden. The elect, filled with God, will see the divine.

Someone may respond to me and say: How, if they will be uncovered, can they not be hidden? Our hearts will not remain hidden, and our inner parts will remain hidden? Our thoughts, my brothers, the thoughts which only God sees now, we will all see each other’s in that society of the saints. No one there wishes their thoughts to be hidden, because no one there thinks evil. Thus, the Apostle says: Do not judge anything before the time: that is, Do not judge rashly what you cannot see in someone's heart. If something is done, which can also be done with a good heart, do not reprove it; do not usurp for yourself more than humanity requires. Seeing the heart belongs to God; but for men, it is only to judge from what is evident. Therefore, he says, do not judge anything before the time. What does before the time mean? He follows and says: Until the Lord comes, and illuminates the hidden things of darkness. What he calls darkness, he clearly shows with the following words: illuminates, he says, the hidden things of darkness. What does this mean? Listen to what follows: And will make manifest the thoughts of the heart. This means to illuminate the hidden things of darkness, to make manifest the thoughts of the heart. Now, therefore, our thoughts are in light to ourselves, to each one, because we know them; but to our neighbors, they are in darkness because they do not see them. There, what you know you are thinking, another will also know. Why are you afraid? Now you want to hide, now you fear your thoughts being made public: for perhaps you sometimes think something evil, perhaps something shameful, perhaps something vain. There will be nothing but good there, nothing but honorable, nothing but true, nothing but pure, nothing but sincere, when you are there, you will think. How you want your face to be seen now, so then you will want your conscience to be seen. For also the very recognition, my dear ones, the very recognition, will it not be of all of us? Do you think that you will know me because you know me now, and you will not know my father, whom you do not know, or some bishop, who was in this church many years ago? You will know all of us. Those who will be there will not recognize each other because they see faces: there will be much greater recognition through knowing. Thus, they will all see, and in a much more excellent manner, how here the Prophets are accustomed to see. They will see divinely when they will be full of God. There will be neither anything to offend, nor anything hidden from the knower.

Some members for use, others for adornment.

Therefore, the members will be whole there, even those that are considered shameful here, but there they will not be shameful. There will not be the anxious maintenance of integrity, where there will be no disgrace of lust. Behold, even here, where in a certain way the necessity of all our actions is the mother; which necessity will not be then; yet we find some things which God has placed in bodies for no use, but for beauty alone.

I was running through the limbs for some time now: and now let us retrace them a little more carefully. We have eyes for seeing, ears for hearing, nostrils for smelling, mouth and tongue for speaking, teeth for chewing, throat for swallowing, stomach for receiving and digesting, intestines for transferring food to the lower parts, and those which are called private parts, either for evacuation or for generation: hands for working, feet for walking. What is the use of a beard, except solely for beauty? Why did God create a beard in man? I see the appearance, I do not seek the use. It is apparent why women have breasts, certainly to nurse their babies: why do men have nipples? Ask for the use, there is none: ask for the appearance, a chested with nipples fits men too. Remove nipples from a man's chest, and see how much beauty you have removed, how much ugliness you have introduced.

We shall reign with the Lord forever.

Thus therefore, beloved, so believe, so hold, that the use of many members will not be needed there, but the grace of none will be lacking. There will be nothing indecorous, there will be utmost peace, nothing discordant, nothing monstrous, nothing that offends the sight; in all things God will be praised. For if now in this weakness of the flesh and tender operation of the members so much beauty of the body appears, which entices the lustful, and excites to seeking whether the studious or the curious; and if reason of numbers is found in the body, the same creator of the lowest and highest things is found to be the maker of these and the heavens, by how much more there, where there will be no lust, no corruption, no deformed wickedness, no grievous necessity, but endless eternity, beautiful truth, highest happiness? But you say to me: What am I going to do? There will be no use for limbs there, what am I going to do? Does no action seem to you to remain: to see, to love, to praise? Behold, these holy days, which are celebrated after the resurrection of the Lord, signify the future life after our resurrection. For just as the days of Lent before Easter signified the laborious life in this mortal trouble: so these joyful days signify the future life, where we shall reign with the Lord. The life signified by Lent before Easter is now experienced: the life signified by the fifty days after the resurrection of the Lord is not experienced, but hoped for, and loved by hoping; and in that very love God, who promised these things, is praised, and these praises are Alleluia. For what is Alleluia? It is a Hebrew word, Alleluia, Praise God. Allelu, Praise; Ia, God: therefore in saying Alleluia, we sound praise to God, and we encourage each other to praise God: with hearts more harmonious than the strings of a harp, we say praises to God, we sing Alleluia. And when we have sung, we retreat due to weakness, to refresh our bodies. Why do we refresh, unless because we falter? Moreover, such is the weakness of the flesh, such the trouble of this life, that any great thing becomes tiresome. How we longed for these days to come again in the next year, as we now part from them; and how eagerly we came to them after a lapse of time! If it were said to us, Sing Alleluia without ceasing, we would excuse ourselves. Why would we excuse ourselves? Because weary, we would not be able to, for even the good itself would become tiresome to us. There, no failing, no weariness. Stand, praise, you who stand in the house of the Lord, in the courts of the house of our God. What do you seek, what are you going to do there? Blessed are those who dwell in your house, Lord; they shall praise you forever and ever.

Sermons - Sermon 244

SERMO 244 IN THE DAYS OF EASTER The disciples believed the body had been taken from the tomb. From the Gospel according to John, the resurrection of the Lord began to be recited today. We have heard, and with the eyes of faith, we have seen the affection of a pious woman towards the Lord Jesus. She was searching for Jesus, but still she was seeking Him as a dead man's body, and she loved Him as a good teacher. She did not understand that He had risen from the dead, she did not believe; and when she saw the stone removed from the tomb, she believed that the body she was seeking had been taken away, she reported the sorrowful news to the disciples. Two ran, one of whom was Peter, the other was John. For he is the one whom Jesus loved, certainly more than others: for He loved them all as the Lord. They ran to see if the woman was telling the truth, that the body had been taken from the tomb. They came, they looked, they did not find the body, and they believed. But what did they believe? What they should not have believed. Therefore, when you heard: And they believed, perhaps you thought they believed what they ought to have believed, that is, that the Lord had risen from the dead. This is not what they believed, but what the woman had reported. To know that they believed this, the Evangelist immediately added and said: For they did not yet understand the Scriptures, that He must rise from the dead. Where is faith? where is the truth so often attested? Did not the Lord Jesus Himself tell them several times before the passion that He was to be handed over, to be killed, and to rise again? He was still speaking to the deaf. Peter had already said to Him: You are the Christ, the Son of the living God. He had already heard: Blessed are you, Simon Bar-Jona, because flesh and blood have not revealed this to you, but my Father who is in heaven. And I say to you, that you are Peter, and on this rock I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. Such faith was absorbed in the crucified Lord. For so long Peter believed that He was the Son of God, until he saw Him hanging on the wood, until he saw Him affixed with nails, until he saw Him dead, until he saw Him buried. Then he lost what he held. Where is the rock? where is the firmness of the rock? The rock was Christ Himself, but Peter was from the rock. Therefore, the rock had risen, so that He might strengthen Peter: for Peter would have perished, unless the rock lived.

What that prohibition regarding touching the Lord means.

Afterwards, however, when the Lord said to the woman, "Mary," she turned and recognized Him, and called Him master: "Rabboni." The resurrection of the Lord was manifested to this woman. What then does it mean: "Do not touch me; for I have not yet ascended to my Father"? A marvelous question in many ways. First, because He forbade Himself to be touched, as if it was harmful to be touched by the one touching. Then, giving the reason why He did not want and forbade Himself to be touched, He said: "For I have not yet ascended to my Father": as if He said: "Then you will touch me, when I have ascended to my Father." Was it forbidden to touch Him while He was placed on earth, and she could touch Him seated in heaven? For I said, What does it mean: "Do not touch me; for I have not yet ascended to my Father"? I add more: When He rose, as He Himself says, and the other Evangelists, and we have already heard, when the holy readings were read, He appeared to His disciples; and when they thought it was a spirit, He said to them: "Why are you troubled, and why do thoughts arise in your heart? See my hands and my feet. Touch, and see." Had He already ascended? He had not yet ascended to His Father, and He said to His disciples: "Touch, and see." Where is "Do not touch me"? Here perhaps someone will say: He wanted to be touched by men, not by women. If He shunned a woman, He would not be born of a woman. Nevertheless, whatever this is that can raise any question, to say the Lord wanted to be touched by men before He ascended to the Father, and did not want to be touched by women; the evangelist Matthew says. For he tells that women met the Lord rising, among whom was also Mary herself, and held His feet. The question is confined in many ways, what it means: "Do not touch me; for I have not yet ascended to my Father." All that I have said, I have spoken so that the difficulty of the question may be increased: you see it is strong, and almost insoluble. May the Lord help me to solve it. He who deigned to propose it, deigns to explain it. Pray with me for the result: ears to me, heart to Him. What He deigns to suggest to me, I will share with you. He who understands better, teach me: thus I am a teacher, that I may not be undocile. But whoever does not understand better, let him hear from me what I understand.

Touch signifies faith.

Lord Jesus, as we have heard and as it appears, the disciples thought he was a man, and according to this they measured their faith: they did not elevate it higher. They walked on earth with Christ. They knew what He had become for us; they did not know what He made us. He is Christ both maker and made. See the maker: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God: He was in the beginning with God. All things were made through Him. See Him made: And the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us. We therefore see Jesus, but through the faith preached to us by the Apostles. What we now know, they did not yet know. I do not do them an injustice. I do not dare to call them ignorant: but yet I see them confessing their ignorance. They did not know, later they learned, what we now know. Christ as God and man, Christ as the creator of things and made within things, Christ as the creator of man and made into man, we know; they did not yet. Christ, as God, is equal to the Father: He is as great as He is: He is of such a nature as He is: He is the same as He is; He is not the one who is. He is the same as He is; because He is God; and He is God both omnipotent, and He is omnipotent; He is unchangeable, and He is unchangeable: He is the same as He is. He is not the one who is; because He is the Father, He is the Son. Whoever knows this ascends to the Father: he who does not know this, Christ has not yet ascended for him to the Father; he is still a child with Him, he is still on earth with Him, he is not yet equal to the omnipotent for him. He ascends for the one advancing, with the one advancing He ascends. What then does it mean: Do not touch me? Touch signifies faith. For touching, one approaches him who is touched. See that woman who suffered a flow of blood. She said in her heart: I will be healed if I touch the hem of His garment. She approached and touched, she was healed. What does it mean, She approached and touched? She came near and believed. So that you may know she touched by believing, the Lord said: Someone touched me. What does it mean: Someone touched me; except, Believed in me? And to let you know that touching me means believing in me; the disciples answered and said to Him: The crowds press upon You, and You say, Who touched me? If you walked alone, if the crowd had made space for you to walk, if no one was near you, you would rightly say: Someone touched me. The crowd presses upon you, you mention one touching. And He repeated: Someone touched me. For He had first said: Who touched me? and then: Someone touched me. You know, because you say: The crowds press upon You. Someone touched me. This crowd knows how to press, it does not know how to touch. It is evident that He wanted to signify this by saying: Who touched me? Someone touched me. To believe that this touch means the faith of the one touching, or rather the approach of the one believing. What then does it mean: Do not touch me; for I have not yet ascended to My Father? What you see me, that is what you think: I have not yet ascended to the Father. You see me as a man, you think I am a man: I indeed am a man, but your faith should not rest here. Do not touch Me in such a way as to believe only I am a man. For I have not yet ascended to My Father. I am ascending to My Father, and touch Me: that is, progress, understand that I am equal to the Father, and then touch, and you will be saved. Do not touch Me; for I have not yet ascended to My Father. What you see descending, what you have not yet seen ascending. For I have not yet ascended to My Father. I emptied myself, taking the form of a servant, made in the likeness of men, and being found in human form. This was crucified, this was buried, this was resurrected. That: Though He was in the form of God, He did not consider it robbery to be equal with God, you have not yet seen. What I have ascended to you have not yet seen. Do not, by touching the earth, lose heaven; by remaining in man, do not fail to believe in God. Do not touch Me, for I have not yet ascended to My Father.

Arians and Photinians are refuted.

Let the Arian proceed: first let the Photinian proceed. We respond to Photinian: Do not touch. What does it mean, Do not touch? Do not believe in this way: Christ has not yet ascended to the Father for you. Let the Arian proceed. I, he says, believe Christ is God, but lesser. Nor has he yet ascended to the Father for you. When he has ascended to the Father, extend yourself, that you may touch: extend yourself, touch God. And I, he says, profess Christ as God; but of another nature, and of another substance; created, not through whom all things were created; made, not in the beginning the Word without time. Therefore you are still below; he has not yet ascended to the Father for you. Do you want him to ascend to the Father for you? Believe: When he was in the form of God, he did not consider it robbery to be equal to God. It was not robbery because it was by nature. Robbery is seized, nature is known. In the form of God, he did not consider it robbery to be equal to God. Thus he is born, and always born; and born, and always born, and born without beginning.

What do you say, Arian? There was a time when the Son was not. Do you see that he has not yet ascended to the Father for you? Do not touch, do not believe in this way. There is no time between the Father and the Son. The Father begat, the Son was born: without time he begat, without time he was born, through whom times were made. Thus touch, and he ascends to the Father for you. The Word, but co-eternal with God: the Wisdom of God, but without which the Father never was. Your flesh must respond to you, and converse with you, speaking to you in the darkness: How was he born? The darkness speaks to you. Explain to me, you cry out: I cry out, explain to me. What do you want explained to you? Was he born, or not born? For he would not be the Son, unless he was born. So if he was born, there was a time when he was not. This is false: you speak of the earth, you speak from the earth.

Then explain to me, he says, how he was born, if he always was. I do not explain, I do not explain; I cannot. I do not explain: but I set the prophet against you for me: Who shall declare his generation?

Sermons - Sermon 245

SERMO 245 On Easter Days The Apostles did not believe that Christ had risen. And today the resurrection of the Lord was recited from the holy Gospel. The Gospel according to John was read. We heard things that we had not heard in the other books of the Gospel. Indeed, the proclamation of truth is common to all, and all have drunk from one source: but in the proclamation of the Gospel, as I have often reminded your Charity, some have all, some three, some two, some alone have placed. Therefore, what we heard according to the Gospel of John, that Mary saw the Lord, and the Lord said to her: Do not touch me; for I have not yet ascended to the Father, only the evangelist John recounts. Hence it must be spoken to your Holiness. Seeing the linen cloths in the tomb, they had believed the Lord had not risen, but had been taken away. John himself (for he calls himself the one whom Jesus loved) when he heard the women announcing and saying: They have taken away my Lord from the tomb, he ran with Peter, and looked into the tomb, saw only the linen cloths, and believed. What did he believe? Not that he had risen, but that he had disappeared from the tomb. The following words attest to this. For it is thus written, as we just heard: He looked, saw, and believed: for they did not yet know the Scriptures, that he must rise from the dead. Therefore it appeared what he believed: what was not of faith, he believed: he believed, but he believed falsely. The Lord then appeared to him, drove away the false, instilled the true.

Let us believe Christ to be God and man.

However, that which usually moves the reader and the listener who is neither curious nor negligent is how it is said: "Do not touch me; for I have not yet ascended to the Father." Here, let us see, with the Lord himself helping, what is said. For this moves us: what does it mean, "Do not touch me; for I have not yet ascended to the Father"? For when did he ascend to the Father? As the Acts of the Apostles indicate, on the fortieth day after his resurrection, which day we are going to celebrate in his name: then he ascended to the Father; then the disciples who touched him with their hands, were led by their eyes. Then the angelic voice sounded: "Men of Galilee, why do you stand looking up into heaven? This Jesus who has been taken up from you into heaven will come in the same way as you saw him go into heaven." If, therefore, he ascended to the Father then, what do we say, my brothers? Mary could not touch him while he was standing on earth, and she could touch him while he was sitting in heaven? If she could not touch him here, how much less could she touch him there? What then is: "Do not touch me; for I have not yet ascended to the Father"? For the words sound as if he were saying, "Touch me then, when I have ascended; before I ascend, do not touch me." Oh Lord, you are here, and I do not touch you; when you ascend, I will touch you? Therefore, if before he ascended to the Father, he recoiled from human touch, how did he present himself to the disciples not only to be seen but also to be handled, when he said: "Why do you think these things in your hearts? See my hands and my feet: handle me, and see, for a spirit does not have flesh and bones as you see that I have." Also, that unbelieving disciple, Thomas, touched the pierced side, and exclaimed: "My Lord and my God!" When he touched him, Jesus had not yet ascended to the Father. Or perhaps some foolish person might say: before he ascended to the Father, men could touch him; women, however, could only touch him when he had ascended to the Father? This thought is absurd and that judgment is perverse. Precisely what Mary heard, the Church hears. Let all hear this, all understand, all do this. What then is: "Do not touch me; for I have not yet ascended to the Father"? Because you see me, you think I am only a man; you still do not know that I am equal to the Father. Do not touch me as such, do not believe only in a man, but understand the Word as equal to the Creator. What then is: "Do not touch me"? Do not believe. What should you not believe? That I am only what you see. I will ascend to the Father, and then touch me. I ascend for you, when you understand me as equal. For when you think of me as lesser, I have not yet ascended for you. Of the Canaanite woman touching the Lord.

However, to touch, to believe to be, I think we can easily understand from that woman who touched the hem of Christ's garment, and was made whole. Remember the Gospel: the Lord Jesus Christ was going to visit the daughter of the synagogue ruler, who was first reported to be sick, later dead. While he was going, behold, a woman came from behind, who had been suffering from a hemorrhage for twelve years, and in vain trying the physicians who could not heal her, had spent all her resources. And she said in her heart: If I touch the hem of his garment, I will be saved. To say this was already to touch. Ultimately, hear the judgment. When she was made whole according to her faith, the Lord Jesus Christ said: Someone touched me. And the disciples: The crowds press against you, and you say, Who touched me? And he: Someone touched me; for I know that power has gone out from me. Grace proceeded to heal her, not to diminish him. Therefore, the disciples say, The crowds press against you; and you felt one person? And he: Someone touched me; those press, this one touched. What is it, those press, this one touched? The Jews afflict, the Church believed.

Mary, figure of the believing Church.

According to this understanding, by which we see the woman touched, which is to have believed, thus it was said to Mary: Do not touch me; I will ascend, and touch. Then indeed touch, when you understand: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The Word indeed was made flesh, the Word remains uncontaminated, unblemished, immutable, and whole. But because you see only man, you do not see the Word; I do not want you to believe in the flesh and forsake the Word. The whole Christ should appear to you, because he is equal to the Father in the Word. Therefore, he says, do not touch now: because you do not yet see who I am. Therefore, the Church, whose figure Mary bore, should hear what Mary heard. Let us all touch, if we believe. He has now ascended to the Father, sits at the right hand of the Father. The entire Church confesses this today: He ascended into heaven, sits at the right hand of the Father. This is heard by those who are baptized: this they believe before they are baptized. Therefore, when they believe, Mary touches Christ. The understanding is obscure, but sound: closed to unbelievers, it is open to the knocking of faith. Therefore, the Lord Jesus Christ is both there and with us; both with the Father and in us; and he does not depart from him, nor abandon us: and he teaches us to pray, as a master; and he hears with the Father, as the Son.

Sermons - Sermon 246

SERMO 246 A sermon delivered on the fifth day of Easter. The variety of the Gospels without falsehood is to be admired. The Lord Jesus appeared to His faithful in many ways after the resurrection; the Evangelists all had something to write as the Spirit provided them with the memory of things they wrote. One said one thing, another said another. Someone could omit something true, not say something false. Consider that all these things are spoken as one; truly one spoke because one Spirit was in all of them. What did we hear today? That the disciples did not believe that Jesus had resurrected and did not believe Him when He foretold this very thing. The matter is clear and therefore it was written so that we might give great thanks to God because we believed in Him whom we have not seen on earth. It was scarcely persuaded to their eyes and hands what we believe. The disciples of Christ believed the body was taken from the tomb.

You have heard that his disciple went into the tomb and saw the linen cloths lying there and believed; for they did not yet know the Scriptures that it was necessary for Jesus to rise from the dead. Thus you have heard, thus it has been read: He saw and believed; for they did not yet know the Scriptures. Therefore, it should have been said: He saw and did not believe; for they did not yet know the Scriptures. What then is: He saw the linen cloths and believed? What did he believe? What the woman had said: They have taken my Lord from the tomb. For if you have heard, indeed because you have heard, that woman had said this: They have taken my Lord from the tomb and I do not know where they have laid him. Upon hearing this, they ran. He went into the tomb, saw the linen cloths, and believed what the woman had said; that Christ had been taken from the tomb. Why did he believe that Christ had been taken and stolen from the tomb? Why? For they did not yet know the Scriptures that it was necessary for Jesus to rise from the dead. He had entered, he had not found. He ought to have believed that He had risen, not that He had been stolen.

Christ dead would profit us nothing unless He had risen.

What does this want, therefore? We are accustomed to speak to you about it every year. But the reading itself is read solemnly, and the sermon itself is delivered solemnly. Why did the Lord Christ say to the woman who was already recognizing him... For first he had said, "Whom are you seeking? Why are you crying?" But she thought he was the gardener. And, if you consider it, if we are his vegetables, Christ is the gardener. Is he not the gardener who planted the mustard seed, that is, the smallest and most fiery seed? And it grew and rose and made a tree so great that even the birds of the sky rested in its branches. If you have, he himself says, faith like a mustard seed. The mustard seed seems small, nothing more contemptible in appearance, but nothing indeed stronger. What is this if not the greatest ardor and inner power of faith in the Church? Therefore, she thought he was the gardener and said to him: Lord, - for the sake of respect, because she was asking for a favor, she said Lord - if you have taken him away, show me where you have placed him and I will take him. As if saying: He is necessary to me, not to you. O woman, you think a dead Christ is necessary to you, recognize him alive. You seek a dead one, the Lord saw himself being sought as dead. However, a dead one would not benefit us at all unless he had risen from the dead. And he was sought dead, he showed himself living. How living! He called her by name: Mary; and immediately upon hearing her name: Rabboni. For a gardener could say: Whom are you seeking? Why are you crying? But only Christ could say Mary. He called her by name, who called her to the kingdom of heaven. He said the name he himself had written in his book: Mary. And she said: Rabboni, which means Teacher. She now recognized him by whom she was being illuminated to be recognized, now, who was previously thought to be the gardener, was seen as Christ. And the Lord to her: Do not touch me, for I have not yet ascended to my Father.

What is touching if not believing?

What does this mean: Do not touch me, for I have not yet ascended to my Father? If she could not touch Him standing on earth, could she touch Him sitting in heaven, as if He said: Do not touch me now, touch me then when I have ascended to my Father? Let your Charity recall yesterday's lesson when the Lord appeared to the disciples and they thought they were seeing a spirit. But wanting to remove this error from them, He presented Himself to be touched. What did He say? It was read yesterday, and there was a sermon on it. Why are you troubled, and why do doubts arise in your hearts? See my hands and my feet, touch and see. Had He already ascended to the Father when He said: touch and see, presenting Himself to His disciples to be touched, not just touched but palpated, so that faith might be made in the true flesh of the true body, so that the solidity of the truth might be exhibited even to human touches? Therefore, He presents Himself to be palpated by the hands of His disciples, and says to the woman: Do not touch me, for I have not yet ascended to my Father. What does this mean? Men could not touch Him except on earth; women then were to touch Him in heaven: For I have not yet ascended to my Father? What then is to touch, if not to believe? For we touch Christ by faith and it is better to touch by faith and not by the hand, than to palpate by hand and not touch by faith. It was not a great thing to touch Christ. The Jews touched Him when they apprehended Him, touched Him when they bound Him, touched Him when they hung Him, touched Him and by touching wickedly, they lost what they touched. Touch by faith, O Catholic Church, touch by faith. If you think Christ is only a man, you have touched Him on earth. If you believe Christ is Lord equal to the Father, then you have touched Him when He ascended to the Father. Therefore, He ascends for us when we understand Him. He ascended once then at that time, but now He ascends daily. And to how many has He not ascended, how many lie on the earth, how many say: He was not a man, how many say: He was a great man, how many say: He was a prophet, how many Christians exist who would say, as Photinus: He was a man, nothing more; but He surpassed all pious and holy men in excellence of justice and wisdom, for He was not God. O Photinus, you touched on earth, you rushed to touch, you hastened judgment, to the truth of equality to the Father and thus did not reach the homeland, because you erred on the way.

God, Father of Christ and our Father.

Next, let us hear His words: "I ascend to my Father and your Father, to my God and your God." Why not: "to our Father and our God," but with distinction: "my Father and your Father and my God and your God"? My Father, because I am the only one, your Father by grace, not by nature. My Father, because this always was, your Father, because I chose you. My God and your God. Whence is the Father the God of Christ? Thus His Father because He begot Him. Whence His God? Because He also created Him. He begot Him, the Only Begotten Word; He created Him from the seed of David according to the flesh; therefore both Father of Christ and God of Christ; Father of Christ according to divinity, God of Christ according to infirmity. Hear whence the God of Christ, let us ask the Psalm. Through the Prophet, He said: "From my mother's womb, You are my God." Before my mother's womb, my Father, from my mother's womb, my God. Therefore, why is there also a distinction there, for instance, my Father and your Father? There is a distinction because Father of the Only Begotten Son is different, and Father of ours is different. His Father by nature, ours by grace. Therefore He had to say: to my Father and your Father and our God, because God, if He is God of the creature, and therefore of Christ, because Christ is also a creature according to man. Father of Christ distinctly. Because Creator of Christ, God of Christ, why distinctly, since according to the man, Christ is a creature, and we are creatures, according to the man, Christ is indeed a servant - taking the form of a servant, the Apostle said - why then: my God and your God are also distinct there? Distinct clearly. For all of us, God formed us through the propagation of sin. He was made man differently, He was born of a virgin, He was conceived by a woman not through concupiscence but by believing, He did not draw the propagation of sin from Adam. We all were born through sin; He was born without sin, who cleansed sins. Therefore, there is also a distinction there: my God and your God. For you were created from seed, from a male and a female, you came from the concupiscence of the flesh with the propagation of sin: For who is clean in Your sight? Not even an infant whose life is one day upon the earth. Finally, it is run with infants so that what they added not by living, but drew by being born, might be absolved from them. Not so Christ. My God and your God; my God because of the likeness of sinful flesh; your God because of the flesh of sin.

Thus far, it is sufficient to have spoken about the gospel reading which pertains to the resurrection of the Lord as written by John the Evangelist, because other readings of John's Gospel about the resurrection of the Lord will need to be read. For no one has narrated more abundantly about His resurrection than Saint John, in such a way that it cannot be read in one day, but is read also on another, and again on a third, until all that Saint John wrote about the Lord's resurrection is finished.

Sermons - Sermon 247

SERMO 247 ON THE PASCHAL DAYS All the evangelists wrote about the resurrection. The resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ according to the truth of the four Evangelists seems to have been completed yesterday. For on the first day the resurrection was read according to Matthew, on another day according to Luke, on the third day according to Mark, on the fourth, that is, yesterday according to John. But since John and Luke wrote much about the resurrection itself and what happened after the resurrection, which cannot be recited in one reading; and we heard something according to John yesterday, and today, and other readings still remain. Therefore today, what did we hear? That on the very day He rose, that is on the Lord’s day, when it was evening, and the disciples were in one place, and the doors were closed for fear of the Jews, the Lord appeared in their midst. Therefore, on that very day, as the evangelist John testifies, He appeared to His disciples twice, in the morning and in the evening. From what was read that He appeared in the morning, it was also recited: but that He appeared again on the same day in the evening, we just heard when it was recited. There was no need for these things to be recalled by me, but that they be noticed by you: however, because of some people's lesser understanding or greater negligence, it was necessary to recall, so that you may know not only what you heard, but also from which Scripture what you heard is read to you. Do you not know that nothing is impossible for God?

Let us see, then, what is proposed for us to speak about from today's reading. The reading itself indeed admonishes us, and in a certain way speaks to us, so that we may say something, just as the Lord who rose again in the solidity of his body, not only appeared to his disciples but was also touched. He was able to appear to them while the doors were shut. For some are so troubled by this matter that they are almost put in danger, bringing against divine miracles the judgments of their own reasonings. For they argue thus: If it was a body, if it was flesh and bones, if what rose from the tomb was the same that hung on the cross, how could it enter through closed doors? If it could not, they say: It was not done. If it could, how could it? If you understand the manner, it is not a miracle: and if it does not seem like a miracle to you, you are close to denying that he also rose from the tomb. Consider from the start the miracles of your Lord and give me a reason for each. No man approached, and a virgin conceived. Give a reason how a virgin could conceive without a man. Where reason fails, there is the building of faith. Behold, you have one miracle in the conception of the Lord: hear also about the birth. The virgin gave birth, and the virgin remained a virgin. Already then, the Lord was born through closed doors before he rose again. You ask of me and say: If he entered through closed doors, where is the manner of the body? And I respond: If he walked on the sea, where is the weight of the body? But the Lord did it as Lord. Therefore, when he rose, did he cease to be Lord? And what of the fact that Peter also walked on the sea? What divinity was able to do in him, faith accomplished in him. Christ, because he was able; Peter, because Christ helped him. If you begin to discuss the reason for miracles with human sense, I fear that you will lose faith. Do you not know that for God nothing is impossible? Therefore, whoever says to you, If he entered through closed doors, it was not a body: you respond to him contrary, On the contrary, if he was touched, it was a body; if he ate, it was a body: and he did it by miracle, not by nature. Is not the very daily course of nature itself to be admired? All things are full of miracles, but they have become cheap through familiarity. Give me a reason: I ask about common and usual things: give me a reason why the seed of a fig tree, so large, is so small that it can hardly be seen, and the seed of a lowly gourd produces such a large seed. Yet in that tiny seed, scarcely visible as it is, if you consider it with the mind, not the eyes; in that smallness, in those confines, the root is hidden, the strength is placed, and the future leaves are bound, and the fruit which will appear on the tree is already included in the seed. There is no need to run through many things: no one gives a reason for daily things, and you demand from me a reason for miracles. Therefore, read the Gospel, and believe the miraculous deeds that are done. God has done more, and you do not marvel at what exceeds all works: there was nothing, and now there is the world. Of a camel entering through the eye of a needle. But you say, the mass of the body could not pass through the doors, which were closed. How large was that mass, I ask you? Certainly as large as it is in all: was it as large as that of a camel? Not at all so large. Read the Gospel, hear it yourself: when he wanted to show the difficulty of a rich man entering the kingdom of heaven, he said: It is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven. Hearing this, the disciples, considering that it was in no way possible for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle, were saddened within themselves, saying: If this is so, who then can save himself? If it is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven; and by no means can a camel pass through the eye of a needle; then none of the rich can be saved. The Lord responded: What is impossible for men is easy for God. God can both lead a camel through the eye of a needle and bring a rich man into the kingdom of heaven. Why do you criticize me about closed doors? Closed doors have at least a crack: compare the crack of doors to the eye of a needle, compare the mass of human flesh to the size of camels; and do not criticize the divinity of miracles.

Sermons - Sermon 248

SERMO 248 IN THE DAYS OF EASTER In the two fishings the whole Church is symbolized. And today the reading was recited about the events that happened after the resurrection of the Lord according to the evangelist John. Your Charity has heard with us, the Lord Jesus Christ revealed himself to his disciples at the Sea of Tiberias; and he who had already made them fishers of men found them still fishers of fish. All night, they caught nothing: but seeing the Lord, and at his command casting the nets, they caught as many as you heard. The Lord would never have commanded this unless he intended to signify something which it is expedient for us to know. What then could greatly matter to Jesus Christ, whether fish were caught or not caught? But that fishing was a sign for us. Let us therefore recall with you those two fishings of the disciples done at the command of the Lord Jesus Christ, one before the passion, the other after the resurrection. In these two fishings, therefore, the entire Church is prefigured, both as it is now and as it will be in the resurrection of the dead. For now, it has many without number, both good and bad: but after the resurrection, it will have a fixed number of only the good. The first fishing is described in Luke 5:4 and following.

Remember therefore the first fishing, where we may see what the Church is like in this time. The Lord Jesus found his disciples fishing, when he first called them to follow him. Then, all night they caught nothing. But when he appeared, they heard from him: Cast the nets. Lord, they said, we have caught nothing all night; but at your word, we will cast the net. They cast it, at the command of the Almighty. What else could happen, except what he wished? Yet by that very act, he deigned, as I said, to signify something to us that it is profitable to know. The nets were cast. The Lord had not yet suffered, had not yet risen. The nets were cast: they caught such a number of fish that two boats were filled, and the same nets were torn by the multitude of fish. Then he said to them: Come and I will make you fishers of men. They took from him the nets of the word of God, they cast them into the world as into a deep sea: they caught as great a multitude of Christians as we see and wonder at. However, those two boats signified two peoples, the Jews and the Gentiles, the Synagogue and the Church, the circumcision and the foreskin. For of those two boats, as of two walls coming from different sides, Christ is the cornerstone. But what did we hear? There the boats were weighed down by the multitude. So it is now: many Christians who live badly, weigh down the Church. It is little that they weigh it down and tear the nets. For if the nets were not torn, there would be no schisms. The second fishing about which John 21 speaks signifies the heavenly Church.

Let us pass then from that fishing which we endure, and come to that fishing which we ardently desire and faithfully long for. Behold, the Lord has died, but he has risen: he appeared at the sea to his disciples, he commands them to cast the nets, not just anywhere. Pay attention. For in the first fishing, he did not say to them: Cast the nets on the right, or on the left. Because if he had said, On the left; only the evil would be signified: if he had said, On the right; only the good would be symbolized. Therefore he did not say either, On the right, or, On the left, because the good were to be caught mixed with the evil. Now, after the resurrection, what the Church will be like, listen, discern, rejoice, hope, understand. Cast, he says, the nets on the right side. Now the right ones are caught: let no evil ones be feared. For you know that he said he would separate the sheep from the goats; the sheep he would place on the right, the goats on the left: to the left he would say: Go into the eternal fire; to the right he would say: Receive the kingdom. Behold from where: Cast the nets on the right side. They cast, they caught: the number is certain; no one is there beyond the number. Now, however, how many beyond the number approach the altar, they are seen among the people of God, and are not written in the book of life. There then the number is certain. Aspire to be among those fish; not just by listening and praising, but by understanding and living well. Therefore the nets are cast, great fish are caught. For who then is small, when they will be equal to the Angels of God? Great fish are caught, one hundred and fifty-three. Someone might say to me, And will there be only so many saints? Far be it from us to suspect such a small number of saints and of those who will be in that kingdom even from this one Church alone. The number will be certain: but thousands of thousands will be from the Israelite people. Holy John in the Apocalypse says there will be twelve times twelve thousand from the Israelite people alone, who have not defiled themselves with women; for they remained virgins. But from other nations he says that such a multitude of people will come with white robes, that no one can count them. On the mystery of the number.

Therefore, this number signifies something, and I should commemorate it for you with an annual sermon, which you are accustomed to hearing every year. One hundred fifty-three fish is a number signifying thousands upon thousands of the holy and the faithful. But why did the Lord deign to signify with this number so many thousands, which will be in the kingdom of heaven? Listen to why. You know that the Law was given through Moses to the people of God, and in that Law, the chief precept mentioned is the Decalogue, that is, the ten commandments of the Law. Of which one commandment is concerning the worship of one God; the second commandment: Do not take the name of the Lord your God in vain; the third commandment about the observance of the Sabbath, which Christians observe spiritually and Jews violate carnally. These three commandments pertain to God, the remaining seven to humans: because of those two principal commandments: You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind; and you shall love your neighbor as yourself. On these two commandments hang the entire Law and the Prophets. Since there are thus two commandments, in that Decalogue three pertain to the love of God, and seven to the love of neighbor. What are the seven pertaining to humans? Honor your father and your mother, You shall not commit adultery, You shall not kill, You shall not steal, You shall not bear false witness, You shall not covet your neighbor's wife, You shall not covet your neighbor's goods. No one accomplishes these ten commandments by their own strength, unless assisted by the grace of God. If therefore no one fulfills the law by their own strength, unless God aids with His Spirit; now recall how the Holy Spirit is commended in the sevenfold number, just as the holy prophet says, that the man be filled with the Spirit of God, of wisdom and understanding, of counsel and fortitude, of knowledge and piety, the Spirit of the fear of God. These seven operations commend the Holy Spirit in the sevenfold number, who, as if descending to us, begins with wisdom and ends with fear. But we, ascending, begin with fear and are perfected in wisdom. For the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. Therefore, if the Spirit is needed to fulfill the law, let the seven join the ten to make the number seventeen. If you count from one up to seventeen, you get one hundred and fifty-three. There is no need to count everything now, count among yourselves: thus reckon, one and two and three and four make ten. Just as ten is one and two and three and four, so add the other numbers up to seventeen: and you find the sacred number of the faithful and saints who will be with the Lord in heaven.

Sermons - Sermon 249

SERMO 249 IN THE DAYS OF EASTER Two fishing events are narrated in the Gospels.

We have heard the Gospel, how the Lord Jesus, after the resurrection, appeared to the disciples fishing at the Sea of Tiberias. When He first called them, He had said to them: "Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men." And then indeed when they were called, at His word casting the nets, they caught a great multitude of fish; but the number was not mentioned. Then in that first catch, He had not said to them: "Cast the net on the right side," but only said: "Cast;" neither did He say "On the right" nor "On the left." However, such a large number of fish was caught that it was without number, and their boats were loaded. And how were they loaded? The Gospel speaks thus: "So that they were almost sinking." Then He said to them what I recalled: "Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men." We pertain to those nets, indeed we are caught by those nets; but we do not remain captives. Let man not be afraid to be caught: if he can be caught, he cannot be deceived. But what does this latest fishing, about which today's Gospel was read, mean? The Lord appeared to the fishermen standing on the shore, and asked them whether they had something to eat. They said they had none; for they had caught nothing all night. And He said to them: "Cast on the right side," which He had not said before. And they did so; and they could not draw the nets because of the multitude of fish. Moreover, they found 153 fish. And because in that first fishing it was said that because of the multitude of fish the nets were breaking, it pertained to the care of the Evangelist to say in this fishing: "And though there were so many, the net was not torn."

Among the wicked, one must live well.

Let us distinguish between two fishings: one before the resurrection, the other after the resurrection. In the former, the nets are cast everywhere: the right side is not mentioned, lest only the good be understood; the left side is not mentioned, lest only the bad be understood: therefore, the good and the bad are mixed together. And the nets were breaking due to the multitude. The broken nets signify schisms. We see, it is so, it happens. Two boats are filled because of two peoples, from circumcision and from uncircumcision: and they are so filled that they are pressed and almost sink. What this signifies must be lamented. The crowd has disturbed the Church. How great a number have the badly living made, pressing and groaning? But because of the good fish, the boats are not sunk. Let us discuss that last fishing after the resurrection. There is no evil there, great security, but only if you are good. Be good among the evil, and you will be good without the evil. In this fishing there is what makes you move: you are among the evil. O you who listen to me faithfully, O you to whom what I say is not lost, O you through whom the word does not pass through the ears but descends into the heart, O you who fear living badly more than dying badly: for if you live well, you cannot die badly: therefore you who listen to me, that you not only believe but also live well; live well, and live well among the evil, do not break the nets. Those who pleased themselves too much, and as if they did not want to endure the evil, broke the nets, perished in the sea. Live well among the evil, let not the evil Christians persuade you to live badly. Let not your heart say: I alone am good. If you have begun to be good; believe there are others, if you can be so. Do not commit adultery, do not fornicate, do not defraud, do not steal, do not bear false witness, do not swear falsely, do not get drunk, do not deny a loan, do not fail to return someone's found property in the village. Do these and such things, secure among the evil fish. You swim within the same nets; but you will come to the shore, after the resurrection you will be found on the right. There is no evil there. For what is it, because you know the law, because you know the commandments of God, because you know what is good and evil, what does it profit you if you do not do them? Is not that very knowledge punished with conscience? Learn so, that you may do.

Ten - commandments of the Law, seven - gifts of the Holy Spirit. The commands of God are contained within the Decalogue because of the great mystery of perfection. The ten commandments of the Law are written on stone tablets by the finger of God, that is, by the Holy Spirit: on one tablet, the commandments that pertain to God; on the other, those that pertain to man. Why is this? Because the whole Law and the Prophets hang on the love of God and neighbor. But what is the worth of these ten? The law was given, but if a law had been given that could give life, then righteousness would truly be by the law. You know the law, and you do not do the law; the letter kills, yet to do what you know: the Spirit gives life. Let seven be added to ten. For just as the law is signified by the Decalogue, so the Holy Spirit is manifested in seven ways. The same is invoked over the baptized, so that God may give them, according to the prophet, the Spirit of wisdom and understanding: behold, two. The Spirit of counsel and fortitude: behold, four. The Spirit of knowledge and piety: behold, six. The Spirit of the fear of the Lord: behold, seven. When these seven are added, they become ten. What did I say? It seems absurd: When seven are added to ten, they become ten: as if I forgot how to count. Therefore, I should have said. When seven are added to ten, they become seventeen. Everyone knows this: for if I said, When seven are added to ten, they become ten; would not these children laugh at me? And yet I say, and repeat, I am not ashamed. When you understand it, you will not blame me for counting, but will love my reasoning. These are the ten commandments of the law: but I enumerated also the sevenfold cooperation of the Holy Spirit. When these seven are added, they become ten: when the Holy Spirit is added, the law is fulfilled. However, if these seven are not added, those ten do not come to be: they remain in the letter, but the letter kills; knowledge makes one a transgressor. Let the Spirit come, and the law is fulfilled, with the help of God, not by your own strength. So see: let us not much love to belong to those ten. For if righteousness is by the law, then Christ died in vain. But to what do we belong? To those seven? It is as if we could do, but would not know what to do. Therefore, let us belong to seventeen. The law commands, the Spirit helps: the law works with you, so you may know what to do; the Spirit, so you may do it. Therefore, let us belong to the seventeen, and let us count the seventeen, and we will find ourselves in one hundred fifty-three. By now, you know, I have often said, often shown. From one up to four, ten numbers exist: but if you add them all. One is followed by two: add two, there are now three: after two follows three, there are now six: after three follows four, there are now ten. Why am I breaking myself for this? I speak what you know. Add the remaining numbers, and you will arrive. When you reach seventeen, you will, by growing, reach one hundred fifty-three. What does it mean to grow? By progressing, as it were step by step, you will reach the right hand. Obey us, count for yourselves.

Sermons - Sermon 25

SERMO 25 SERMON ON THE VERSE OF PSALM 93:

"Blessed is the man whom you instruct, Lord,"

"And from Your law, You will teach him" The Testament of God promised there, fulfilled here. When we sang to God, we said to Him: Blessed is the man whom You instruct, O Lord, and teach him from Your law. Therefore, God's Gospel sounded, Zacchaeus gave alms. Learn. For what law of God is better than the Holy Gospel? For the Law of the New Covenant, which when the Prophet was read, you heard: Behold, the days are coming, says the Lord, and I will complete a New Covenant upon the house of Jacob, not according to the Covenant that I made with their fathers when I took them out of the land of Egypt. The Covenant was promised there, here it was delivered; promised by the Prophet, delivered by the Lord of the Prophets. That Covenant which is called old, read and see. The Law of God was given then also, read, or hear when it is read, and see what was promised there. There, the land of the earth was promised, a land flowing with milk and honey, but still the earth. Nevertheless, if we understand spiritually, when that land did not flow with milk and honey, it is another land that flows with milk and honey, the land of which it is said: You are my hope, my portion in the land of the living. For this indeed is the land of the dying. Are you seeking milk and honey? Taste and see how sweet the Lord is. His grace is signified by the name of milk and honey. It is sweet and nourishing. But this grace, which was figured in the Old Testament, is revealed in the New.

If you hope for a new inheritance, cross the land.

Finally, that law, for those who think carnally, and seek such rewards from God, and wish to worship God for the things promised there, deserved to hear from the apostle Paul that it begets into servitude. Why? Because it is understood carnally by the Jews. For spiritually understood, it is the Gospel. Therefore it begets into servitude. Whom? Those who serve God for earthly goods. When they have them, they give thanks; when they lack them, they blaspheme. For those who serve God for these things cannot serve with a true heart. For they observe those who do not serve our God. For they see them having what they serve God for, and say in their heart: "What profit is it to me that I serve God? Do I have as much as he who blasphemes daily? He prays and is hungry; he blasphemes and belches." He who attends to these things is a man, a man of the Old Testament. Therefore, he who worships God in the New Testament should hope for a new inheritance, not the old one. If you hope for a new inheritance, pass over the earth, tread on the heights of the mountains, that is, despise the pride of the arrogant. But when you have despised and trampled them, be humble, lest you fall from your height. Listen: Lift up your heart; but to the Lord, not against the Lord. All the proud lift up their hearts, but against the Lord. But if you wish truly to lift up your heart, lift it to the Lord. For if you lift up your heart to the Lord, He holds your heart, lest it falls to the earth.

Cast out of paradise, we lead bad days.

Blessed, therefore, is the man: Blessed is the man whom you instruct, O Lord. Behold, I speak, behold, I cry out, behold, I explain. Who listens to me? I know who listens to me: Blessed is the man whom you instruct, O Lord, to whom God speaks in the heart. And when I am silent, he is blessed whom you instruct, O Lord, and whom you teach from your law. What follows? We have sung thus far: And whom you teach from your law. That you may give him peace in the days of adversity, until a pit is dug for the wicked. He is the man who is instructed by the Lord, he is the man who learns from the law of God, who is given peace in the days of adversity, until a pit is dug for the wicked. Listen to what it means. These are the evil days. Are we not here, from the time we were expelled from Paradise, living in the evil days? And our ancestors mourned their days, and their ancestors mourned their days. No people have ever pleased themselves with the days they lived. Yet the days of the ancestors please the descendants: and again those days pleased the ancients, which they themselves did not experience, and therefore pleased them. For what is present has a sharp sense. I do not say, it is brought closer, but it touches the heart daily. Each year we often say when we feel cold: "It has never been this cold. It has never been this hot." Always "it is" by the one who makes it. But blessed is the man whom you instruct, O Lord, to give him peace from the days of adversity, until a pit is dug for the wicked. A man carries his own war with him wherever he goes.

Evil days. Are these days evil, which the circuit of the sun causes? Evil men make evil days, and so it is almost the entire world. Among the crowds of evil ones, the small number of good ones groan. Let us turn back to the just ones. They are evil, and make evil days. What of the just themselves? Are they not in evil days? And within themselves - besides what they suffer from evil men among whom they groan - even within themselves, when they are, they should observe themselves, descend into themselves, and consider themselves well. They find evil days within themselves. They do not want war, they want peace. And who doesn't? And although everyone does not want war and everyone wants peace, even the one who lives justly turns his eyes upon himself, and he finds war within himself. Ask me which war. Blessed is the man whom you instruct, Lord, and teach him from your law. Behold, a man asks me which war the just suffer within themselves. Teach him from your law. Let the Apostle speak: The flesh desires against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh. And where do I cast away the flesh, if war resounds, if, which God forbid, the enemy rushes in? The man flees and brings his war with him wherever he goes. I do not say, if he is evil. Indeed, if he is good, if he lives justly, he finds in himself what the Apostle says: The flesh desires against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh. In this war, how are there good days?

Let us not seek good days on earth.

Therefore the days are evil. But let us be softened. What does it mean: "Let us be softened"? Let us not be angry with divine judgment. Let us say to Him: It is good for me that you have humbled me, so that I may learn your righteousnesses. You cast me out of paradise, you threw me out of blessedness. I am in hardship, I am in groaning. My groaning is not hidden from you. But it is good for me that you have humbled me, so that I may learn your righteousnesses. In evil days, I learn to seek good days. What are good days? Do not seek them now. Believe me, better yet believe with me, you will not find them. Evil days will pass, and good ones will come. But good ones will come to the good, worse ones to the wicked.

Indeed, I also ask you: Who is the man who desires life? I know, all your hearts respond to me: "For who is the man who does not desire life?". I add: And loves to see good days? You all respond: "Who is it that does not love to see good days?". You have responded well. You desire life, you desire good days. Surely when I was saying: Who is the man who desires life, every man responds to me: "I do". Who is the man who desires to see good days? Does not each of you silently say: "I do"? Hear what follows: Keep your tongue from evil. Now say: "I do". You seek forgiveness; now I find you. The past has passed. Has your tongue been malicious, have you been a whisperer, have you been an accuser, have you been a slanderer, have you been a reviler: all these things you have been, let these things pass with the evil days; do not pass away with the evil days. There is indeed something to hold onto so that you do not pass away. The affairs of men run like a river; evil days run like a river. Hold onto the wood, lest you be swept away. Behold the river runs: All flesh is grass, and all the glory of the flesh is as the flower of grass. It is cast down, it passes away, the grass withers, the flower falls down. To what do I hold? The word of the Lord remains forever.

Lift up your heart.

Therefore, refrain your tongue from evil, and your lips that they speak no deceit. You who desired life or desire life and good days, turn away from evil and do good. Seek peace, which we all desire in this mortal life of flesh, and in this fragility of flesh, and in this most deceitful vanity. Seek peace, all of you. Seek peace and pursue it. Where is it? Where do I follow? Where did it pass? Where did it pass, that I might follow? It passed through you, but it did not remain in you. To whom am I speaking? To the human race, not to each of you individually, but to the human race. Peace itself passed through the human race. As it was passing, the blind man cried out in yesterday’s reading. And where did it go? First, see what peace is, and see where it went, and follow it. What is peace? Listen to the Apostle. He was speaking of Christ: He himself is our peace, who made both one. Therefore, Christ is peace. Where did he go? He was crucified, and buried, rose from the dead, ascended into heaven. Behold where peace has gone. How do I follow it? Lift up your heart. Hear how you may follow. Indeed, you hear briefly every day when you are told: Lift up your heart. Think more deeply about this, and you will follow. However, listen more broadly, that you may follow true peace, your peace, the peace that bore war for you; peace, which when bearing war for you, prayed for the enemies of peace, and said while hanging: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. There was war, and peace was pouring forth from the wood. It was pouring forth, but then what? It ascended into heaven. Seek peace. And how do you follow it? Listen to the Apostle: If you have been raised with Christ, seek the things that are above, where Christ is seated at the right hand of God; set your minds on things that are above, not on things that are on earth. For you have died, and your life is hidden with Christ in God. When Christ who is your life appears, then you also will appear with him in glory. Behold good days; let us desire them, let us live for this, let us pray for this, let us give alms for this.

It is necessary to think of the poor.

Now behold, by God's favor, it is winter. Consider the poor, how Christ is clothed when naked. When the Gospel was read, did we not all bless Zacchaeus, when Christ looked upon him intently in the tree to see Him passing by? For when would he have hoped to see Him dwelling in his house? When He said to him: "Come down, Zacchaeus, today I must stay in your house," I heard your groans of gratitude. It was as if you were all in Zacchaeus and welcomed Christ. Thus said all your hearts: "O blessed Zacchaeus! The Lord has entered his house. O blessed one! Could this happen to us?". Now Christ is in heaven. Recite to me, O Christ, the New Testament. Make blessed by Your law. Recite so that you know you are not deprived of Christ's presence. Hear Him who will judge: "When you did it to one of the least of these My brothers, you did it to Me." Each one of you expects to receive Christ sitting in heaven. Look upon Him lying under the porch, look upon Him hungry, look upon Him suffering cold, look upon Him in need, look upon Him as a stranger. Do so, you who are accustomed; do so, you who are not accustomed. Let doctrine grow; let good works increase. You praise the seed; bring forth the harvest. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 250

SERMO 250 ON THE DAYS OF EASTER God chooses the lowly things of the world. The Lord Jesus, choosing the weak things of the world to confound the strong, and gathering His Church from the whole world, did not begin with emperors or senators, but with fishermen. For whatever dignity those first chosen might have previously had, they would dare to attribute it to themselves, not to the grace of God. This is the secret counsel of God, this is the counsel of our Savior which the Apostle explains when he says: “For consider your calling, brothers” – these are the words of the Apostle – “for consider your calling, brothers, that not many of you were wise according to the flesh, not many powerful, not many of noble birth; but God chose what is foolish in the world to shame the wise; God chose what is weak in the world to shame the strong; and God chose what is low and despised in the world, even things that are not, to bring to nothing things that are, so that no flesh might boast in the presence of God.” This is also what the Prophet said: “Every valley shall be filled, and every mountain and hill shall be made low; the uneven ground shall become level.” Finally, today the noble and the ignoble, the learned and the unlearned, the poor and the rich, together come to the grace of the Lord. To receive this grace, pride does not set itself above humility, nothing of knowledge, nothing of possession, nothing of power. But what did He say to them? “Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men.” If those fishermen had not gone before us, who would have taken us? Now, any great orator is esteemed if he can well expound on that which the fisherman has written. The multitude of those living badly disturbs those living well. When therefore the Lord Jesus Christ had chosen fishermen of fish and made them fishers of men, in those very activities of their fishing, He also wished to instruct us about the calling of peoples. Observe two distinct fishings necessary for distinction: one when the Lord chose them from fishermen and made them His disciples, the other which we have just heard when the holy Gospel was read after the resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ, that one before the resurrection, this one after the resurrection. We must carefully consider the difference between these fishings; this navigation is our instruction. The new preaching of the Gospel; at that time He found them fishing; He approached and said to them: Cast the nets. They said to Him: We have labored all night and caught nothing, labored in vain. Behold, in Your name we will cast the nets. They cast and caught so much that they filled two boats which were so burdened with the multitude of fish that they almost sank. Then He said to them: Follow Me, and I will make you fishers of men. Then, leaving their nets and boats, they followed Christ. Now, after the resurrection, the Lord Christ showed us another fishing, different from that earlier one. At that time He said: Cast the nets; neither "to the left" nor "to the right," but simply: Cast the nets. For if He had said: "to the left," He would signify the wicked alone; "to the right," the good alone. Since He did not say "to the right" or "to the left," both good and wicked are signified, of whom the Gospel speaks elsewhere, because the householder sent his servants to the prepared meal and they brought in whom they could find, both good and wicked, and the marriage feast was filled with those reclining. Such now is the Church, full of good and wicked. The Church is filled with a multitude, but sometimes this multitude oppresses and almost leads to shipwreck. The multitude of those living wickedly disturbs those living well, so much so that the one living well thinks himself foolish when he notices others living wickedly, especially because according to the goods of this world, many guilty are found happy, many innocent are found unhappy. And how fearful it is lest it be overwhelmed and sunk in shipwreck! How fearful it is, dearest ones, lest the one living well says: What use is it to me to live well? Behold, for that one lives wickedly and is more honored than me. What good is it to me that I live well? In danger of perishing, I fear he may be overwhelmed. I will speak to him, lest he who lives well sinks deeper. You live well, do not tire and look back. The promise of your Lord is true. He who endures to the end will be saved. - You say, "You observe that another lives wickedly and is fortunate!" - You are mistaken, he is unfortunate and all the more unfortunate the happier he seems to himself. It is madness not to recognize his own misery. If you saw a feverish person laughing, you would lament over the madman. What is promised to you has not yet come. He who seems happier to you is fed with visible and temporary things, rejoices in them; neither brought them, nor will he take them, naked he came in, naked he will go out; from false joys, he will come to real pains. But what is promised to you has not yet come; endure to reach it; persevere lest by failing you deceive yourself, for God cannot deceive you. Behold, I have spoken briefly lest the boats sink. Another comes to that fishing with a greater curse, so the nets were torn. The nets were torn, heresies were made. For what else is schisms but tears? Thus the first fishing must be borne and tolerated, lest anyone is worn out with weariness, although it is written: "I was weary from the sinners forsaking your law." The ship cries out that it is burdened by the multitude, as if the ship itself has this voice: "I was weary from the sinners forsaking your law." Even if you are burdened, always see to it that you are not sunk. The wicked must be tolerated for now, not separated. We will sing mercy and judgment to the Lord; first mercy is bestowed, and later judgment is exercised; separation will be done in judgment. Now let the good hear me and be better, let the wicked hear and become good; while it is the time of repentance, not the time of judgment. Let us pass from this fishing, which has joys mixed with tears; joys because the good are gathered, mixed with tears because the wicked are hardly borne.

If you take away the Spirit, the law is worth nothing.

Let us turn our minds to that last fishing; there let us be refreshed, there let us be consoled. And therefore it was done after the resurrection of the Lord because it signified the Church as it will be after the resurrection. Behold, it is said to the fishing disciples, the Lord says, who also said before, He Himself and afterwards, but before what they would cast, now where they would cast, that is, on the right side of the boat. Therefore, those are now caught who will stand on the right, those are caught to whom it was said: Come, blessed of my Father, receive the kingdom. They cast and they catch. There no number was said in the first fishing, only a multitude was mentioned, no number was defined. For now, many are beyond number, that is they come, enter, fill churches; they fill both theaters and churches; beyond number they fill; to that number which will be in eternal life they do not belong, unless they are changed while they live. And will all be changed? How? Nor do all good ones persevere. Therefore, it was said to them: He who perseveres to the end will be saved. And to those who are still evil it is said: I do not want the death of the sinner but that he may be converted and live. Therefore, there no number was said because many were made beyond number, as often as the Psalm said: I have announced and spoken, they were multiplied beyond number. Now to the right, not beyond number; one hundred and fifty-three fish were caught but large ones. For this was said: And though they were large, the net was not torn. Then indeed there will be the congregation of saints, there will not be divisions and rent of heretics, there will be peace and perfect unity, no one will be less, no one will be more, the whole number. But they are very few if there are only one hundred and fifty-three. May it be far from us that there are that few in this people, how much more in the whole Church of God. The Apocalypse of that blessed John the Evangelist shows that such a multitude of saints and happy ones was seen in that eternity that no one could number them. Thus you have it written there. And yet all pertain to that number of one hundred and fifty-three. I wish to reduce this number to a greater smallness. One hundred and fifty-three they are, let us make them fewer, they are seventeen. These one hundred and fifty-three are seventeen. Why ten? Why seven? Ten for the law, seven for the Spirit. For the sevenfold form for the perfection preached in the gifts of the Holy Spirit. Blessed Isaiah the prophet said, and said, The Holy Spirit will rest upon him. And when he mentioned the Holy Spirit he enumerated seven virtues: spirit of wisdom and understanding, spirit of counsel and might, you have four. Spirit of knowledge and piety, spirit of fear of the Lord. He began with wisdom, ended with fear, as if he spoke descending from the highest to the lowest, from wisdom to fear. From the lowest to the highest: from fear to wisdom. The beginning of wisdom is the fear of the Lord. This is the gift of grace, by this sevenfold virtue in the beloved of God the Holy Spirit works so that the law has something to work there. For if you take away the Spirit, what is the law worth? It makes a transgressor, therefore it was said: The letter kills. It commands and does not make. It did not kill before it was commanded to you and if providence held you as a sinner, yet it did not hold you as a transgressor. It is commanded and you do not do, it is forbidden and you do, behold the letter kills. The law, however, has ten precepts. The first precept of the law is: to worship one God, no other, to make no idol. The second precept is: You shall not take the name of the Lord your God in vain. The third precept is: Observe the sabbath day spiritually not carnally as the Jews. These three precepts pertain to the love of God, but because in these two precepts, he said, the whole Law and the Prophets depend, that is, in the love of God and in the love of neighbor. When you have heard what pertains to the love of God: unity, truth, rest; attend to what pertains to the love of neighbor. Honor your father and mother; you have the fourth precept. Do not commit adultery; you have the fifth. Do not murder; you have the sixth. Do not steal; you have the seventh. Do not bear false witness; you have the eighth. Do not covet your neighbor's goods; you have the ninth. Do not covet your neighbor's wife; you have the tenth. He who says: You shall not covet touches the inner parts, strikes inwardly where concupiscence has its business. Behold, this law is in ten. What use is it to have learned and not done it? You will be a transgressor. But that you may do, help is necessary. Whence help? From the Spirit. The letter kills, but the Spirit gives life. Let ten be joined with seven they become ten and seven. In this number is all the multitude of the blessed. But how they reach one hundred and fifty-three, I am accustomed to say to you and many anticipate me, nevertheless the sermon must be returned solemnly. Many have forgotten, some have not heard. But those who have not forgotten and have heard, bear patiently so that others may also be reminded and instructed. When two walk the way, one faster and the other slower, it is in the power of the faster not to abandon the companion. Nothing is lost to the one who hears what he knew and in that nothing is lost he should rejoice and because the one who did not know is instructed. Number seventeen from one to seventeen in such a way that you add all and you will reach one hundred and fifty-three. What do you expect of me? Count for yourselves.

Sermons - Sermon 251

SERMO 251 IN THE DAYS OF EASTER In that first fishing, three things are to be received symbolically. The fishing of our Redeemer is our liberation. We notice, however, two instances of fishing in the holy Gospel of the Lord, that is, when the nets were cast at His word: one before, when He chose the disciples; and this other, when He rose from the dead. That fishing represented the Church as it is now: this one after the Lord's resurrection, represented the Church as it will be at the end of the age. Indeed, in that first fishing, He commanded the nets to be cast without saying in which direction; but merely commanded that they be cast. The disciples cast them: it was not said, "To the right"; it was not said, "To the left." For the fish signified men: if it had been said, "To the right," only the good would be caught; if it had been said, "To the left," only the wicked. But because both good and wicked were to be intermingled in the Church, the nets were cast without distinction; to catch fish signifying a mix of the good and the wicked. Moreover, it is written there that they caught so many fish that two boats were filled to the point of sinking, that is, weighed down to submersion. The two boats did not actually sink, but were in danger. Why in danger? Because of the multitude of fish. It signified that because of the multitude the Church was to gather, her discipline would be endangered. Also, it is added in that fishing that the nets were torn because of the multitude of fish. What did the torn nets signify if not future schisms? Therefore, three things were signified in that fishing: the mixture of the good and the wicked, the oppression of the crowds, the separations of heretics. The mixture of the good and the wicked; because the nets were cast neither to the right nor to the left: the oppression of the crowds; because such a great catch was made that the boats were weighed down: the separations of heretics; because the multitude was so great that the nets were torn.

Many now belonging to the Church are excluded from the Kingdom of God.

Now consider the fishing that was read today. It took place after the resurrection of the Lord to signify what the Church would be like after our resurrection. "Cast," he says, "the net on the right side." Therefore, the number of those who will stand on the right is determined. For you remember that the Lord said he would come with his Angels, and that all nations would be gathered before him; and he will separate them as a shepherd separates the sheep from the goats: he will place the sheep on his right, and the goats on his left. To the sheep, he will say: "Come, receive the kingdom," and to the goats, he will say: "Go into the eternal fire." "Cast on the right side." As if saying: "I have now risen, I want to signify the Church, which will be in the resurrection of the dead. Cast on the right side." The nets were cast on the right: and they were not able to haul them in because of the multitude of fish. And there it was said a multitude: but here a specific number, and a multitude, and greatness: there, however, no number was stated. For now, before the resurrection comes and the good are separated from the bad, that is fulfilled which the prophet said: "I have declared, and I have spoken." What is: "I have declared, and I have spoken"? I have cast the nets. And what? They have multiplied beyond number. There is a number, and they are beyond number. The number pertains to the saints, who will reign with Christ. Those beyond number can now enter the Church, but they cannot enter the kingdom of heaven. The end of the right(eous) will come, to the detriment of the left(eous).

Therefore I admonish you to rescue yourselves from this present evil age. Therefore I admonish you, if you want to live, do not imitate evil Christians. Do not say: Why? is that one not faithful, and gets drunk? Why? is that one not faithful, and has concubines? Why? is that one not faithful, and commits fraud daily? Why? is that one not faithful, and consults astrologers? For now, if you want to be grains, then you will be found in the lump. But if you want to be chaff, you will be found in a great heap, but destined to be burned with a great fire.

What then? They led the nets to the shore, he said. Peter pulled the nets to the shore: just now when the Gospel was read, you heard. When you hear shore, understand the end of the sea; when you hear the end of the sea, understand the end of the age. In that fishing, the nets were not pulled to the shore; but the fish that were caught, were placed in the boats. Here, however, they drew to the shore. Hope for the end of the age. The end is coming; for the good of the righteous, for the ill of the unrighteous. And how many fish? They drew, he said, the nets containing one hundred and fifty-three fish. And the Evangelist added a necessary fact: And although they were so many, that is, so great, the net was not torn. They will be great, but there will not be heresies: and therefore there will be no heresies, because they will be great. Who are great? Read the words of the Lord Himself in the Gospel, and you will find the great ones. For He said in a certain place: I did not come to destroy the Law and the Prophets, but to fulfill. Our righteousness must exceed that of the Pharisees.

Amen, I say to you, that whoever breaks one of these least commandments, and teaches others so: breaks and teaches thus; breaks by living badly, and teaches well by teaching: he will be called least in the kingdom of heaven. But in which kingdom of heaven? In the Church that exists now; because it also is called the kingdom of heaven. For if this Church, which gathers good and bad, were not called the kingdom of heaven, the Lord himself would not say, speaking in a parable: The kingdom of heaven is like a net thrown into the sea, which gathers all kinds of fish. But behold what follows? The kingdom of heaven is like a net thrown into the sea. The net, which are the fish: gathers all kinds of fish. But what? They draw it to the shore. This, the Lord says in the parable. And when they draw it to the shore, they sit down, and gather the good ones into vessels, but throw away the bad. And he explained what he proposed. For what does he say? So it will be at the end of the age. Do you understand the shore? They come, he says, the Angels, and gather the evil from among the just, and cast them into a furnace of blazing fire: there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth. Nevertheless, the Church is called the kingdom of heaven. And when the sea has fish swimming together, both good and evil, in this kingdom of heaven, that is, in the Church of this time, he who teaches good and does evil is called the least: because he is there himself. For he is indeed there: he is there in the kingdom of heaven, that is, in the Church, such as it is at this time. He teaches good, lives badly: he is necessary, he is a hireling. Amen, I say to you, he has received his reward. It benefits somewhat. For if those who teach good but live badly did not benefit at all, the Lord himself would not say to his people: The scribes and Pharisees sit in Moses' seat: do what they say, but do not do what they do. Why? For they say and do not do. The present life in activity, the other in rest.

Therefore let your Charity be attentive: for I wish to explain who the great fishes are. He who loosens, he says, one of these least commandments, shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven. He will be there, but least. But he who does and teaches thus, shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven. Behold, these are the great fishes, caught on the right. He who does and teaches thus: does good and teaches good; does not contradict his speaking by living badly, when he has a good tongue but bears witness to a bad life. Therefore he who does and teaches thus, shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven. And he follows: For I tell you, unless your righteousness exceeds that of the Scribes and Pharisees, you will not enter the kingdom of heaven. Now how do you understand the kingdom of heaven? It is that which is said to the right: Come, blessed of my Father, receive the kingdom. Unless your righteousness exceeds that of the Scribes and Pharisees. What does it mean, more than the Scribes and Pharisees? Look at those Scribes and Pharisees, who sit in Moses' seat, about whom it is said: What they tell you, do; but what they do, do not do: for they say, and do not do. Therefore the righteousness of the Pharisees is, to say and not to do. Let your righteousness exceed that of the Scribes and Pharisees, so that you may both say good things and live well. The law is not fulfilled unless God helps. So now, concerning the number of one hundred fifty-three fish, what need is there to disentangle the same thing? You know it. The increasing number is born from seventeen. Start from one, and proceed to seventeen, so that you add them all: that is, add one to two, and it becomes three; add three, and it becomes six; add four, and it becomes ten. Thus, add them all up to seventeen, and you reach one hundred fifty-three. Therefore, our entire intention should be no other than what the number seventeen signifies: for there lies the foundation of one hundred fifty-three. What does the number seventeen signify? Recognize the Ten in the Law. The Ten Commandments were given first: the Decalogue is said to be written on tablets by the finger of God. In the Ten recognize the Law, in the Seven recognize the Holy Spirit. For the Holy Spirit is commended by the number Seven. Therefore, sanctification is not mentioned in the Law except on the seventh day. God made light: it is not said, "He sanctified it." God made the firmament: it is not said, "He sanctified the firmament." He separated the sea from the land, commanded the earth to bring forth vegetation: it is not said, "He sanctified." He made the moon and the stars: it is not said, "He sanctified." He commanded animals to come forth from the waters, swimming and flying: it is not said, "He sanctified." He commanded animals to come forth from the land, quadrupeds and all creeping things: it is not said, "He sanctified." He made man himself: it is not said, "He sanctified."

God appeases the struggle existing in man even after being reborn.

It came to the seventh day, where he rested; and he sanctified it. By his rest, God sanctified our rest. Therefore, there will be our full sanctification, where we will rest with him without end. For why would God rest? Certainly, he was not fatigued by working. If you create by word, you are not fatigued; if you command, and it is done immediately, you stand, you remain whole. Did he say a few words, by which he made everything, and suddenly became tired?

Therefore, recognize the Law in the ten; recognize the Holy Spirit in the seven. Let the Spirit be joined to the Law. For if you receive the Law, and lack the assistance of the Spirit, you do not fulfill what you read, you do not fulfill what is commanded to you: but man under the Law is also held as a transgressor. Let the Spirit approach, assist; and what is commanded is done. If the Spirit is absent, the letter kills you. Why does the letter kill you? Because it will make you a transgressor. Nor can you excuse yourself due to ignorance, because you have received the Law. Now you have learned what you should do; ignorance does not excuse you, the Spirit does not aid you: therefore you have perished. But what does the Apostle Paul say: The letter kills, but the Spirit gives life? Whence does the Spirit give life? Because it makes the letter be fulfilled, so it does not kill. These are the holy ones, who do the law of God by the gift of God. The Law can command, it cannot help. The aid of the Spirit approaches; and the command of God is done with joy, with delight. For many do it out of fear. But those who do the Law, fearing punishment, would prefer that there was nothing to fear. However, those who do the Law, loving justice, rejoice even in this, because they have no enemy.

Therefore the Lord says: Make peace with your adversary quickly, while you are with him on the way. Who is your adversary? The Word of the Law. What is the way? This life. How is he an adversary? He says: You shall not commit adultery: and you wish to commit adultery. He says: You shall not covet your neighbor's goods: and you want to take away others' possessions. He says: Honor your father and mother: and you are disrespectful to your parents. The Law says: Do not bear false witness: you do not turn away from lying. When you see that this word commands one thing, and you do another, it is your adversary. You have an evil adversary, do not let him enter with you into the council chamber: reconcile while you are with him on the way. God is present to make peace between you. How does God make peace between you? By forgiving sins and inspiring righteousness, so that good works are done. When therefore you have made peace with your adversary, that is, with the Decalogue of the Law, through the Holy Spirit, you will belong to the seventeen. When you belong to the seventeen, the number will grow from there to one hundred and fifty-three. You will be positioned at the right to be crowned: do not remain at the left to be condemned.

Sermons - Sermon 252

SERMO 252 IN THE DAYS OF EASTER In the two fisheries, about which the Gospels, mysteries must be sought. In many and various ways, the Lord Jesus Christ, in the Holy Scriptures, shows both the height of His divinity and the mercy of His humanity, as He is accustomed to do, in mysteries and sacraments; so that those who ask may receive, those who seek may find, and to those who knock it will be opened. For what has been read today from the holy Gospel also seeks an interpreter, and brings spiritual joy when it has been understood. Pay attention, Your Holiness, to what it means when the holy Scripture testifies that the Lord showed Himself to His disciples as the Evangelist narrates. The disciples went fishing and caught nothing all night. The Lord, however, appeared to them in the morning on the shore and asked if they had any food; they said they did not. He said to them: Cast the nets on the right side, and you will find. He who had come as though he were going to buy something, generously gave them so many from his own sea as a gift. It was indeed a great miracle. Instantly they cast, and they caught so many that they could not haul the nets in because of the large number of fish. But if you pay attention to who performed this miracle, it is not surprising: for He had already done much greater things. For in this, who before His resurrection had raised the dead, making fish be caught after His resurrection is not a great feat. Therefore, we must ask the miracle itself what it speaks to us inwardly. For He did not say randomly, Cast the nets; but: Cast on the right side. Then it was important for the Evangelist to mention the number of fish. It was also important to say: And though there were so many, the net was not torn. Here He made us recall that sometimes at the Lord’s command the nets were cast when He chose the disciples before He suffered. There were Peter, John, and James. They cast the nets and caught innumerable fish, and when one boat was filled, they asked for help from the nearby boat: and two boats were filled with fish (this was before the resurrection), so many that the nets were torn. Why is no number mentioned there? Why were the nets torn there but not here? Why was it not said to cast the nets on the right side there, but here He said: Cast the nets on the right side? This is certainly not without reason. For the Lord did not do these things in vain and idly. Christ is the Word of God, who speaks to men not only with sounds but also with deeds. The nets, the Word of God; the sea represents the world.

Therefore, it is proposed to us, together with your Charity, to discuss what this diversity means. For those nets that were cast before and caught an innumerable number of fish and loaded two boats, so that the nets broke, were not cast to the right side, nor was it said to cast them to the left side. Now the mystery of that catch is fulfilled in this time. However, this other mystery, which was not done without reason after the resurrection, when He was no longer to die but was to live forever; not only by divinity, which never died, but also by the body, which deigned to die for us. Therefore, it was not in vain that the former was before the passion, the latter after the resurrection. There, neither to the right nor to the left, but only: Cast the nets; however, here it is: Cast to the right. There was no number, but only an abundant multitude, so as to almost sink the two boats; for it was also said there: and here, too, the number and the size of the fish. Then there the nets broke, here it was important for the Evangelist to say: And although they were so large, the nets were not torn. Don't we see, brothers, that the word of God is nets, and this world is the sea, and all who believe are enclosed within those nets? If perhaps anyone doubts this significance, let him pay attention to the fact that the Lord Himself said in a parable what He showed in the miracle. For He said: The kingdom of heaven is like a net cast into the sea, which gathers of every kind of fish. When it was filled, they drew it to shore; and sitting down, they gathered the good into vessels, but the bad they threw away. So it will be at the end of the age: the angels will come forth and separate the wicked from among the just, and cast them into the furnace of fire; there will be wailing and gnashing of teeth. Therefore, it is clear that the nets cast into the sea signify faith. Is not this world a sea, where men devour one another like fish? Are there not small storms and waves of temptation that disturb this sea? Are there not small dangers for the navigators, that is, for those who seek the heavenly homeland on the wood of the cross? The similarity, therefore, is most evident.

Two ships are two peoples coming from opposite directions.

Let us only observe this, brothers (because the resurrection of the Lord signifies the new life that we will have when this age has passed), how the first word of God was sent into this sea, that is, into this world. Into this turbulent age with its waves, dangerous with its storms, and troublesome with its shipwrecks, the word of God was sent and caught many, so that two ships were filled. What are the two ships? Two peoples. To these two peoples, like two walls, the Lord became the cornerstone, so that he might join them to himself coming from diverse places. For the people of the Jews came from a very different custom: the people of the Gentiles came from idols. The people of the Jews came from circumcision: the people of the Gentiles came from foreskin. They came from diverse places: but they are joined in the cornerstone. For walls never make an angle unless they come from diverse places. Therefore in Christ, the two peoples harmonized, called from the Jews who were near, and from the Gentiles who were far off. For since the Jews were near (for they already worshipped one God), when they believed in Christ, observe what they did. Whatever they had, they sold, and laid the prices of their properties at the Apostles' feet: and distribution was made to each, according to his need. They were freed from the burdens of worldly affairs, and with light shoulders followed Christ: they submitted their neck to the gentle yoke, and embracing the cornerstone from near at hand, they were at peace. But the people of the Gentiles came from afar, and they too arrived at that stone, and united in peace. Those two ships signify these two peoples. But they were so filled with such a multitude of fish, that they were almost sinking. For we also read that among those who had believed from the Jews, there were some carnal ones, who caused trouble for the Church and forbade the Apostles to speak the Gospel to the Gentiles, saying, Christ was sent only to the circumcised: that if the Gentiles wanted to receive the Gospel, they should be circumcised. Hence the apostle Paul, sent to the Gentiles, became odious to those who believed from Judea, for preaching the truth. For the Apostle wanted the people of the Gentiles coming from diverse places to touch the angle, where there was firm peace. Therefore, those carnal ones demanding circumcision did not belong to the number of the spiritual ones: nor did they see that with the carnal sacraments having passed, he had come whose present light would dispel the shadows. Nevertheless, since they caused divisions, they almost sank the ship with their multitude. In the Church now, evils and evil persons are not lacking.

Let us also consider the ship of the Gentiles. Let us see if such a multitude has not been gathered into the Church that the grains of wheat hardly appear among the great number of chaff. How many robbers, how many drunkards, how many slanderers, how many theater spectators! Do not those who fill both the churches and the theaters fill them? And they often seek such disturbances in churches as they are accustomed to in theaters. And often, if something spiritual is said or commanded, they resist, they struggle, following the flesh, opposing the Holy Spirit. Hence, Stephen also accused the Jews. In this city, my brothers, have we not experienced, as your Holiness remembers with us, how, to our peril, God expelled drunkenness from this basilica? Was the ship not almost sinking with us due to the carnal seditions? Why did this happen, if not because of that innumerable number of fish? Next, it was also said there that the nets were breaking. With the nets broken, heresies and schisms occurred. The nets indeed gather all: but the impatient fish, unwilling to come to the Lord’s food, wherever they can, they strike themselves, and break them, and leave. And the nets are indeed spread out everywhere: but those who break them break them in specific places. The Donatists broke them in Africa, the Arians broke them in Egypt, the Photinians broke them in Pannonia, the Cataphrygians broke them in Phrygia, the Manichaeans broke them in Persia. In what places has that net been disrupted? And yet, those whom it gathers, it leads to the shore. It leads indeed, but do those who broke the nets come? All the wicked leave. They indeed do not leave unless they are wicked: but both good and wicked remain. For from where is the net led to the shore with both good and bad fish, about which the Lord spoke in the parable? The chaff and the wheat are now together in the Church. For this same likeness does the threshing floor have as well when it is threshed. There is chaff, there is grain: yet those who keep an eye on the threshing floor see mostly the chaff with difficulty. Diligence is needed to find the grains within the chaff. However, the winds blow across the threshing floor from every side. And when it is threshed, before it is raised up to be winnowed, does it not endure winds? The wind blows from this side, for instance, and lifts the chaff: then it blows again from another side and lifts it to the other part. From whichever side it lifts the chaff, it spreads it in the hedge, and in the thorns, and wherever. It cannot lift the grain from there: the wind only lifts the chaff. Yet when the blowing winds from every side have lifted the chaff, will only wheat remain on the threshing floor? It is only the chaff that leaves: yet both the chaff and grain remain. When will all the chaff go? When the Lord comes bearing a fan in His hand, and He will cleanse His threshing floor, He will gather the wheat into the granary, but He will burn the chaff with an unquenchable fire. Let Your Holiness pay better attention to what I say. For sometimes the winds that lift the chaff from the threshing floor blow again from the hedge where the chaff adhered, and bring it back to the threshing floor. As, for example, I know not which man established in the Catholic Church endured some temptation of tribulation. He saw that he could be carnally aided in his matter among the Donatists: it was said to him, 'You will not be aided unless you communicate here.' The wind blew, cast him into the thorns. If it happens that he has a secular matter again, which cannot be settled except in the Catholic Church, not paying attention to where he is, but where he can better expedite his affairs, as if the wind blew from the other side of the hedge, he is brought back to the Lord's threshing floor.

Chaff can become grain.

Therefore, brothers, those who seek carnal things in the Church, and do not consider what God promises: because here there are temptations, dangers, difficulties; however, after temporal labors, He promises eternal rest and the company of holy angels: therefore, not considering these things for themselves, but desiring carnal things in the Church, whether they are on the threshing floor or outside, they are chaff. We do not greatly rejoice in them, nor do we flatter them with vain adulations. It is good for them to become wheat. For this is the difference between those true chaffs and these carnal men, because those chaffs do not have free will, but God has given free will to man. And if a man wills, yesterday he was chaff, today he becomes wheat: if he turns away from the word of God, today he becomes chaff. And it is only necessary to inquire what the final winnowing finds them to be. In the heavenly city, only the good will be.

Now listen, brothers, to that blessed, mystical, great Church, which is signified by the one hundred fifty-three fish. For we have heard, and known, and seen what this Church is: but what it will be in the future is in prophecy for us; but it has not yet come in experience. But still, it is permitted to rejoice in the future, although we do not yet see it in the present. The nets were then cast, neither to the right nor to the left: for they were capturing both good and bad. For if it had been said: to the right; the bad would not be understood there: if it had been said: to the left; the good would not be understood there. But when they were going to contain both good and bad, the nets were cast randomly, and they took, as we discussed, the wicked and the just. Now, however, the future Church in that holy Jerusalem, where the hearts of all mortals will be open, there is no fear that anyone wicked might enter that Church. For no one will hide the cunning of a most wicked heart under the skin of mortality. For the Lord has now come: and therefore after the resurrection, he commands that these nets be cast to the right, now no longer to die. And what the Apostle says happens: Until the Lord comes, and illuminates the hidden things of darkness, and makes clear the thoughts of the heart: and then praise will be given to each by God, when consciences, which are now hidden, will be publicized. Then, therefore, only the good will be there, the bad will be driven out. For the nets sent to the right will not be able to hold the wicked.

What one hundred fifty-three fishes signify.

Why then one hundred fifty-three? Will there be that many saints? For if we count not only all the faithful who departed from the body in a good life, but only the martyrs; if the day of martyrdom alone is counted, thousands of men are found to have been crowned. Therefore, one hundred fifty-three fish, what do they signify, must without doubt be examined. What do fifty signify? In this number indeed, that is, in fifty, there is a mystery: because fifty multiplied by three, make one hundred fifty. For this reason, the number three seems to be added, so that we may be reminded by what multiplication one hundred fifty-three were made: as if it were said: Divide one hundred fifty by three. For if it were said: One hundred fifty-two, noticing the excess number, we would divide it by seventy-five: since seventy-five multiplied by two, make one hundred fifty. Indeed, an added number two would indicate the binary division. If it were said: One hundred fifty-six, we would have to divide it into twenty-fives, to make six parts of them. But now, because it is said, One hundred fifty-three, we must divide the whole number, that is, one hundred fifty, into three parts. Therefore, a third part of this number is fifty. Thus our entire consideration must be fixed on the number fifty. The task of the elect is the praise of God. Could it be that these fifty days which we now celebrate are without reason? For not without cause, my brothers, does the Church hold the ancient tradition that during these fifty days "Alleluia" is said. For "Alleluia" is the praise of God. Thus, the action of our rest is signified to us who labor. For when we come to that rest after this labor, our sole duty will be the praise of God, our action there will be "Alleluia." What is "Alleluia"? "Praise God." Who praises God without ceasing but the Angels? They do not hunger, they do not thirst, they do not fall ill, they do not die. For we have said "Alleluia," and it has been sung here this morning, and a little while ago, we said "Alleluia." We are touched by a certain scent of divine praise and that rest, but to a greater extent, mortality presses us down. For we grow weary in saying it, and we wish to refresh our limbs: and if "Alleluia" is said for long, the praise of God is burdensome to us because of the heaviness of our body. For the fullness without ceasing of "Alleluia" will be after this age and after labor. What then, brothers? Let us say as much as we can, so that we may be deserving to say it always. There, our food will be "Alleluia," our drink "Alleluia," our rest's action "Alleluia," all joy will be "Alleluia," that is, "Praise of God." For who praises anything without end, except he who enjoys without weariness? How much strength will there be in the mind, how much immortality and firmness in the body, so that the intention of the mind does not fail in the contemplation of God, nor do the limbs succumb in the continuation of God's praise?

Mystical meanings lie hidden in the numbers 50 and 40.

Why then are fifty days celebrated in this mystery? The Lord spent forty days with the disciples after the resurrection, as the Acts of the Apostles testify: after forty days He ascended into heaven, and on the tenth day after He ascended, He sent the Holy Spirit. When the Apostles and all who had gathered in one place were filled with the Holy Spirit, they spoke in tongues and performed those great works which we embrace as readers and believers, speaking the word of God with great confidence. The Lord spent forty days on earth with the disciples, and before the passion, He fasted for forty days: you will not find another who fasted for forty days, except the Lord, Moses, and Elijah. The Lord as the Gospel, Moses as the Law, Elijah as Prophecy: because the Gospel has testimony from the Law and the Prophets. Therefore, on the mount, when our Lord Jesus wanted to show His glory, He stood between Moses and Elijah. He shone in the middle with honor: the Law and the Prophets bore witness from the sides. The number forty, therefore, signifies this time in which we labor in the world: because wisdom is dispensed to us here temporally. For the vision of immortal wisdom is dispensed differently without time, and differently temporally. For there were Patriarchs, and they passed from here: their dispensation was temporal. I do not mean, they live temporally; for they live always, and they live with God. But the dispensation of the word through them was done temporally. For they do not speak here now; but what they spoke is written and read in time. Prophets came in their own time, and they left. The Lord came in His own time: for His presence of majesty never departed, nor does He recede divinely established everywhere; but as it is said in the Gospel: He was in this world, and the world was made through Him, and the world did not know Him: He came to His own, and His own did not receive Him. How was He here, and how did He come, unless because He was here in majesty, He came in humanity? For what came in the flesh, He Himself dispensed wisdom to us temporally: temporally through the Law, temporally through the Prophets, temporally through the Scriptures of the Gospel. When the times have passed, we will see wisdom itself as it is, which gives back the denarius number. For the number seven indicates creation: because God worked on six days, and on the seventh He rested from the works. The number three, however, suggests the Creator, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Perfect wisdom is to piously subject the creature to the Creator; to discern the Creator from the creation, the craftsman from the works. Whoever confounds the works with the craftsman, understands neither the art nor the craftsman: but whoever discerns, is filled with wisdom. This is, therefore, the denarius, the fullness of wisdom. But when it is distributed temporally; because in the quaternary number is the distinction of temporals, the denarius multiplied by four makes the number forty. And the year is divided into four parts, spring, summer, autumn, and winter: and above all, a certain quaternary change appears in time. Scripture also commemorates the four winds. For through the four cardinal points the Gospel spread, which is dispensed in time: and this is the catholic Church, which has obtained the four parts of the world. Therefore, the denarius in this manner makes the number forty. On the mystical meaning hidden in the number 153.

Therefore, they fasted for forty days, signifying in this time the necessity of abstaining from the love of temporal things. For these perpetual fasts signify through all those forty days. Hence, the people of Israel were led through the desert for forty years before they entered the promised land to reign. Thus, we too in this life, where there is great anxiety, where there is fear, where there are the perils of temptations, are led through temporal dispensation as if through a desert. But when we have properly completed the number forty, that is, lived well in this temporal dispensation, walking according to God's commandments, we shall receive the reward of that denarius for the faithful. For when the Lord hired laborers for the vineyard, he gave them the denarius as a reward. He gave the denarius to all, those hired at dawn, and those hired at midday, and those hired at the end of the day, he gave the denarius to all. Because if anyone has been faithful from an early age, he will receive a denarius; now no longer through the distribution of times, but in eternal contemplation, discerning wisdom between the Creator and the creature; that one may enjoy the Creator, giving praise to the Creator through the creature. But if a young person has believed and was not faithful in his previous time, he will receive the denarius. But if an old man believes, now in the twilight of the day, as one hired at the eleventh hour to the vineyard, he too will receive the denarius. Therefore, after having well completed the forty number, add the reward of the denarius, and it becomes fifty, which signifies the future Church where God will always be praised. But because all are called in the name of the Trinity to live well in the number forty and receive the denarius, multiply that fifty by three, and it becomes one hundred fifty. Add the mystery of the Trinity itself, and it becomes one hundred fifty-three, which is the number of the fishes found on the right side: in which number, however, there are innumerable thousands of the saints. Wherefore no wicked ones will be cast out, because they will not be there: nor will the nets, which are the bonds of unity and peace, be broken by any schism.

If the fasts are relaxed, let not the austerity of morals be relaxed.

I believe I have explained the great mystery sufficiently. But you know that it pertains to us to work well during the Lenten season, so that we may praise the Lord on Pentecost. Therefore, we celebrate those forty days, before we keep vigil, in labor, fasting, and abstinence: for they signify the presence of this time. However, after the resurrection of the Lord, because these days signify eternal joy (they are not yet the actual thing, but they signify it: it is a matter of mystery, brothers, not yet of realization: for when Easter is celebrated, the Lord is not crucified: but just as we commemorate past events in their anniversary celebration, so also we signify future things which are not yet here): therefore, at this time, fasting is relaxed; for the number of these days signifies future rest. But see, brothers, that through much drunkenness, as if under great permission, wishing to celebrate these days carnally, you do not deserve to celebrate what they signify with the angels forever. For if I reproach a drunkard, he might say: You told us that these days signify eternal joy; you insinuated to us that this time foretells angelic and heavenly joy: so should I not do well for myself? Would that it be well, and not badly. For it signifies joy for you, if you are a temple of God. But if you fill the temple of God with the filth of drunkenness, the Apostle resounds to you: Whoever destroys the temple of God, God will destroy him. Let this be inscribed in the hearts of your Holiness, that it is better for a less understanding man to live well, than for a very understanding man to live poorly. Indeed, fullness and perfect blessedness is for someone to quickly understand and live well: but if perhaps one cannot do both, it is better to live well than to quickly understand. For he who lives well, merits further understanding: and he who lives poorly, will lose even what he understands. Thus it is said: To him who has, it will be given; and to him who has not, even what he seems to have will be taken away from him.

Sermons - Sermon 252A

SERMON 252/A ON EASTER DAYS The Sermon of Saint Augustine on the Gospel of John 21

According to the evangelist John, many things were written about how the Lord Jesus appeared to His disciples after the resurrection. He appeared to them even while they were fishing. This fishing of the disciples took place at the Sea of Tiberias, where the Lord wished to reveal Himself to them; this contains a great sacrament, as already known to you, but briefly to be remembered by us now.

Miraculous fishing expeditions of which are differently understood in the Gospels.

Recall that fishing event, when He called the fishers of fish and made them fishers of men, at the beginning of His preaching, far from His passion. Then, as you ought to remember, He came to the disciples, who were not yet His disciples; at that time, they followed Him, leaving their nets. He found them having caught nothing throughout the whole night, and said to them: "Cast your nets into the sea." And they cast them, and they caught so many fish that two boats were filled, pressed, and almost sunk. Then because of the multitude of fish, the nets were torn. He then said to them: "Come after me, and I will make you fishers of men." And He did, and the Apostles cast the nets of His word into the sea of the world, and they caught many fish. If you want to consider the number of fish, an innumerable number, consider the multitudes of Christians: these are caught by the holy nets, caught unto life, not unto death. Yet among those many that were caught, many schisms were also made, because the nets were torn. The two boats, that is, the two small boats that were then filled, signified the Church collected from the circumcised and the uncircumcised, that is, from Jews and Gentiles. Hence Christ is called the corner-stone; for in Him the walls coming from different directions, as it were, kiss one another in the corner. Therefore, those boats were filled, pressed, and almost submerged. This signified Christians living wicked lives, and pressing down the Church with their wicked manners. Yet the boats were not sunk; for the Church endures the wicked living: it can be pressed, but it cannot be submerged. But after the resurrection, Christ indicated such a Church as it will be after our resurrection: then it will have only the good, with no mingled bad, a blessed Church.

Evil fish swim together with good ones in the net of the Church.

What then did He say to the disciples after the resurrection? Cast the nets on the right side. In that catch, He did not say, on the right side, to signify only the good; nor did He say, on the left, to signify only the bad; but the nets were cast all around, because they were to hold both good and bad. Thus did the Lord Christ narrate a certain parable. For He said: The kingdom of heaven is like a net cast into the sea, in which all kinds of fish are gathered. When they have brought it to the shore, they sit down, and select the good into their vessels; but throw the bad out. He proposed it, and explained it. So it will be at the end of the age, He said: angels will come, and they will separate the wicked from among the righteous, and throw them into the fiery furnace; there will be wailing and gnashing of teeth. So let the good fish swim with the bad, let the bad swim with the good; let them swim within the nets, and not break the nets; for those who break the nets are the bad ones! but those who remain within the nets, both good and bad, are there, for now.

After the separation of the wicked, only the good will remain to praise God.

Then what does he say? Cast the net on the right side. What does it mean: on the right side? You will catch those on the right side, who will stand on the right. For he will say to those on the right: Come, blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom. He indicated those people when he ordered the nets to be cast on the right side. They were cast: they caught many large fish, and he did not keep silent about the number. In that first fishing, which signifies the good and the bad, he did not mention the number: for there were too many there. Who are the too many? Those who do not belong to the number of the saints; whence come those who tear the nets, make schisms; whence come those who renounce the world in words and not in deeds, who receive the sacrament of the new man, and persist in the old man. These then were to be there. Thus, it was not said: on the right side; therefore, the number was silent. These are the too many, about whom the Psalm says: I have announced and spoken, they were multiplied beyond number. There was a holy number, and there were many beyond the number: here, however, no one is beyond the number.

153 great fish, a gathering of the chosen. And how many were there? One hundred and fifty-three. Is that the total number of saints? Far be it that even this church, in which we now speak, has so few. What then? What we do not know, we must know, and what we know, we must remember: let one act as a hint, the other as a reminder, lest oblivion creep in. One hundred and fifty-three, he says. This is related to what the Evangelist says. Although they were so large, he says, the net was not torn; as if recalling that in the first fishing, those nets were torn. What now? Even though they were so large, he says, the net was not torn. Who now can fear schisms there, where the embrace of unity and the offspring of Mother Church cannot be torn? For no friend is separated from her, no enemy is allied to her: for all those who cling to her will be chosen, they will be perfected. There will be thousands of thousands, and more than thousands of thousands, and yet they will be counted in this number. By the gift of God, heavenly delight is instilled by which the law is observed. This number arises from seventeen: whoever wishes to count from one to seventeen and adds up all, he will find it. He placed one: let him add two, so that they become three; let him add three, so that they become six; let him add four, so that they become ten, and thus they reach the seventeenth number, and he will find one hundred fifty-three. It remains for me to inquire what seventeen signifies. If we find the reasoning of this smaller number, that is seventeen, the mystery of the greater, that is one hundred fifty-three, will be revealed. Here in the seventeenth is the root; there is the tree. So what do seventeen signify? Ten signifies the law: for the ten commandments of the law were written on two stone tablets by the finger of God, as the law says, as the Holy Books testify. For the law is marked by the number ten. But who fulfills the law without help? Absolutely no one. For if a law had been given, says the Apostle, that could give life, righteousness would indeed be by the law. But the Scripture has concluded everything under sin, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to those who believe. The law was given. To not say much, among other commandments it has, you shall not covet your neighbor's goods. Do not covet: do not pass before another's villa and sigh because it is good. Do not covet your neighbor's goods. The earth is the Lord's and its fullness: what have you not acquired if you have held onto God? Therefore, do not covet your neighbor's goods. The law was heard, and some people, out of fear of penalty, refrained from evil deeds; yet they did not refrain from evil delight. Therefore, Lord, give aid: Indeed, He will give blessing, who gave the law. As it is said here: He will give the blessing who gave the law, that is, the aid of the Holy Spirit, so that the law may be fulfilled, likewise it is said of the wisdom of God, He carries the law and mercy on his tongue. If He carried the law alone for Himself, who could endure it? The deeds of the law would be demanded, and all would be found guilty. Mercy has approached, which helps you to act and forgives what you do not do. This mercy is of the Holy Spirit: however, the Holy Spirit is recommended in Scriptures by the number seven. I recall from one place. And Isaiah says: The Holy Spirit will rest upon him. And he enumerates: the spirit of wisdom and of understanding, the spirit of counsel and of might, the spirit of knowledge and of piety, the spirit of the fear of the Lord. This Spirit comes and makes the seven, and ten. When seven are added to ten, they make saints, not believers in the law, but relying on the help of God; so it may be said to their Lord: Be my helper, do not abandon me, nor despise me, O God of my salvation. For my father and my mother have forsaken me, but the Lord has taken me up. And they have learned to say with you: Our Father, who art in heaven. Therefore, mercy was added to the law. Let us not fear, who are in seventeen; for if we are in seventeen, we shall reach one hundred fifty-three; and if we reach one hundred fifty-three, we shall be at the right hand; if we are at the right hand, we shall receive the kingdom.

Sermons - Sermon 253

SERMO 253 IN THE EASTER DAYS Peter is asked three times by the Lord about love. The Gospel of Saint John the Apostle, which is called according to John, today ended with those things which narrated how the Lord appeared to His disciples after the resurrection. Therefore, He addressed the Apostle Peter, the presumptuous and denier, when He spoke to him now alive having conquered death and said: Simon of John (for thus was Peter called) do you love me? He responded with what was in his heart. If Peter answered what he had in his heart, why did the Lord ask who saw hearts? Indeed, even Peter himself wondered and listened with a certain annoyance to Him who was asking, whom he knew to be knowledgeable. Once it was said: Do you love me? It was answered: I love you, Lord, you know. And again: Do you love me? Lord, you know all things, I love you. And a third time: Do you love me? Peter was saddened. Why are you saddened, Peter? Because you answer love three times? Have you forgotten your triple fear? Let the Lord question you, He is the healer who questions you, it pertains to healing that He questions. Do not be afflicted by annoyance. Wait: the fullness of love is being accomplished to delete the number of denials. The Lord's flock is given over to be fed by Peter.

Nevertheless, everywhere, everywhere, that is in the very number of three in his interrogation, the Lord Jesus commends his love for the sheep to the one responding, and says: Feed my lambs, feed my sheep; as if he were saying: What do you repay me because you love me? Show the love in my sheep. What do you offer me because you love me, when I have given you what you needed to love me? But you have a place to show your love for me, you have a place to exercise it: Feed my lambs. However, to the extent that the lambs of the Lord should be fed, sheep acquired at such a great price should be fed with great love, he demonstrated in the following. For after Peter, having completed the legitimate number of three responses, professed himself to be a lover of the Lord, upon the sheep being commended to him, he hears about his future passion. Here the Lord showed that his sheep should be so loved by those to whom he commends them that they are ready to die for them. Thus, the same John in his epistle: As Christ laid down his life for us, so we ought to lay down our lives for the brothers.

Peter, denying, died; prepared to undergo death, he is declared.

Peter answered the Lord with a certain proud presumption when he said to Him: "I will lay down my life for you." He had not yet received the strength to fulfill this promise; now he is filled with love so that he can fulfill it; therefore he is asked: "Do you love me?" and he responds: "I love [you];" because only love fulfills this. So, what, Peter? When you denied, what were you afraid of? All you feared was dying. He whom you saw dead speaks with you alive; now, do not fear death; in Him, death is conquered whom you feared to die. He hung on the cross, was nailed, gave up His spirit, was struck with a lance, was placed in the tomb; this is what you feared when you denied, you feared to suffer this and by fearing death denied life. Now understand: when you feared to die, you were dead. For he died by denying, but he resurrected by weeping. Then what does He say to him: "Follow me"? Knowing his maturity. For if you remember, indeed, those who have read remember - let those who have read and forgotten be reminded, or those who have not read learn - Peter said: "I will follow you wherever you go." And the Lord to him: "You cannot follow me now, but you will follow later." Now, He says, you cannot. You promise, but I see your strength, I inspect the vein of the heart and diagnose what is true for the sick: You cannot follow me now. But this diagnosis of the doctor is not despair, he added and said: "You will follow later." You will be healthy and you will follow. Now, since He sees what is in his heart and sees what gift of love He has given to his soul, He says to him: "Follow me." Indeed, I said: You cannot now; I say: Now follow me.

About John whom the Lord willed to remain always. But a certain question arose which should not be omitted. When the Lord said to Peter, "Follow me," Peter looked back at the disciple whom Jesus loved, that is, John himself who wrote the Gospel, and said to the Lord, "Lord, what about this man? I know that you love him; how come I follow and he does not follow?" The Lord said, "If it is my will that he remain until I come, what is that to you? You follow me." The Evangelist himself, the one who wrote this, added his own words in the Gospel and said: "A rumor spread among the brothers because of this saying that this disciple would not die." And to remove this opinion, he added: "But Jesus did not say to him that he would not die, but only, 'If it is my will that he remain until I come, what is that to you?"' Thus, John himself removed this opinion by his own subsequent words; lest this be believed, he said, "The Lord did not say this, but he said this." Why John said this, however, he did not explain, but left it to us so that we may seek, if it is, however, revealed to us.

John 21:22 can be understood in two ways. As much as the Lord deigns to grant me, as it seems to me - and it seems better to better people - thus I think that this question is solved in two ways: either the Lord spoke of Peter's suffering as He did, or He spoke of the Gospel of John. Concerning the suffering: "and follow me, suffer for me, suffer what I did," for Christ was crucified, Peter was crucified too, he experienced the nails, he experienced the torments; but John experienced none of these. This means: "Thus I wish him to remain, without wound, without torment, to sleep and wait for me; you follow me, suffer what I did, I shed blood for you, you shed it for me." Therefore, in one way, it can be explained what was said: "Thus I want him to remain until I come, you follow me; I do not want him to suffer, you suffer." However, according to the Gospel of John, it seems to me that it should be understood this way, since Peter wrote about the Lord, others also wrote, but their writings are more occupied with the humility of the Lord. For the Lord Christ is both God and man. What is man? Soul and flesh. Therefore, what is Christ? Word, soul, and flesh. But what kind of soul? For even animals have souls. The Word, rational soul, and flesh, this is the whole Christ. But concerning the divinity of Christ in Peter's letters, something is prominent, but in the Gospel of John, much is prominent. "In the beginning was the Word," he said. It transcends the clouds and transcends the stars, transcends the angels, transcends every creature, reaching the Word by which all things were made. "In the beginning was the Word, it was with God in the beginning. All things were made by it." Who can see, who can conceive, who can worthily receive, who can worthily pronounce? Then it will be well understood when Christ comes. "Thus I want him to remain until I come." I have explained as well as I could; it can be understood better in your hearts.

Sermons - Sermon 254

SERMO 254 IN THE EASTER DAYS We deserve one thing, we hope for another.

Thus it is, my brothers, thus is the misery of our condition and God's mercy, that the time of joy is preceded by the time of sorrow; that is, the time of sorrow is first, the time of joy is afterwards; the time of labor is first, the time of rest is afterwards; the time of calamity is first, the time of happiness is afterwards. Thus it is, as we have said, the misery of our condition and the divine mercy. For the time of sorrow, labor, and misery, our sins have brought about; but the time of joy, rest, and happiness will not come from our merits, but from the grace of the Savior. We deserve one thing, we hope for another; we deserve evil, we hope for good. This is made possible by the mercy of Him who created us. Where the sorrow of Christians ought to proceed from. But in the time of our misery, and, as Scripture says: in the days of our vanity, we must know from where this very sadness should arise. For sadness is like dung. Dung not placed in its proper place is filth. Dung not placed in its proper place makes the house filthy; placed in its proper place it makes the field fertile. See the place for dung provided by the farmer. The Apostle says: And who is it that makes me glad, except the one who is saddened by me? And elsewhere: Sadness, he says, according to God works repentance unto salvation which is not to be repented of. He who is sad according to God is sad through repentance for his sins. Sadness from one's own iniquity brings forth righteousness. First let it displease you what you are, so that you may become what you are not. Sadness, he says, according to God works repentance unto salvation which is not to be repented of. Repentance, he says, unto salvation. What kind of salvation? Not to be repented of. What is: not to be repented of? That which you cannot possibly regret at all. For we have had a life which we ought to have regretted; we had a life to be repented of, but we cannot reach a life not to be repented of, except through the repentance of a bad life. Brothers, as I began to say, do you find dung in a purified mass of wheat? Yet, it is through dung that one arrives at that brightness, that appearance and beauty; the path to a beautiful thing came through foulness.

God mercifully visiting the human race.

Rightly does the Lord in the Gospel speak of a certain barren tree: Behold, these three years I come looking for fruit on it, and find none. I shall cut it down, so that it may not hinder my field. The gardener intercedes; he intercedes now with the axe poised over the unfruitful roots and almost striking; the gardener intercedes, just as Moses interceded before God; the gardener intercedes and says: Lord, permit it, and this year as well; I will dig around it and fertilize it with a basket of manure: if it bears fruit, well; if not, you shall come and cut it down. This tree is the human race. The Lord visited this tree in the time of the Patriarchs, as in the first year. He visited it in the time of the Law and the Prophets, as in the second year. Behold, the third year has dawned in the Gospel. Now it almost should have been cut down: but mercy intercedes with mercy. For He who wished to show Himself merciful, put an intercessor before Himself. Let it be spared, He says, even this year; let it be dug around, the trench is a sign of humility; let a basket of manure be applied, that perhaps it may bear fruit. Indeed, because it bears fruit, and partly does not, its Lord will come and divide it. What does it mean to divide? Because there are good and evil people, but now as if in one assembly, as if constituted in one body. The sorrow of the world produces death.

Therefore, my brothers, as I said, an opportune place for manure produces fruit, but an inopportune place makes the place unclean. Someone is sad, I find someone sad. I see manure, I seek the place. Tell me, friend, why are you sad? I lost money. An unclean place, no fruit. Let him hear the Apostle: Worldly sorrow produces death. Not only is there no fruit, but also great destruction. So it is with other matters related to worldly joys, which are too many to enumerate. I see another sad, groaning, weeping. I see much manure and I seek the place there. And when I saw the sad one, weeping, I looked and saw him praying. Sad, groaning, weeping, praying, something good came to my mind; but I still seek the place. For what if this one, praying and groaning with great tears, is asking for the death of his enemies? Even so, even so he weeps, he prays, he pleads. An unclean place, no fruit. More is found in the Scriptures. He asks that his enemy may die, and falls into the curse of Judas: Let his prayer become sin. I looked at another groaning, weeping, praying. I recognize the manure, I seek the place. I listened attentively to his prayer, and heard him say: I said: Lord have mercy on me; heal my soul, for I have sinned against you. He groans about his sin, I recognize the field, I await the fruit. Thanks be to God. The manure in the right place is not idle, it brings forth grain. This is truly the time for fruitful sorrow, to grieve over the condition of our mortality, the abundance of temptations, the subtlety of sins, the adversities of desires, the conflicts of lusts against good thoughts always in turmoil, and from this we are sad.

Now is the time of sorrow, afterwards the time of praise will come. This time of our misery and our groaning, if there is anyone who has such hope in groaning, is signified by those forty days before Easter; but the joy, which will come afterward, of rest, happiness, eternal life, of the kingdom without end, which is not yet, is signified by these fifty days, during which praises to God are said. For two times are signified to us: one before the resurrection of the Lord, the other after the resurrection of the Lord; one in which we are, the other in which we hope to be. The time of sorrow, signified by the days of Lent, we both signify and have; but the time of joy and rest and of the kingdom, signified by these days, we signify indeed through Alleluia, but we do not yet have praises, but now we sigh Alleluia. What is: Alleluia? "Praise the Lord." Why during these days in the Church the praises of God are frequently said after the resurrection, because for us too there will be eternal praise after our resurrection. The Lord's passion signifies our time, in which we weep here. The whips, chains, insults, spit, the crown of thorns, the wine mixed with gall, the vinegar on a sponge, the mockeries, the reproaches, finally the cross itself, the sacred limbs hanging on the wood, what do they signify to us, if not the time we endure, the time of sorrow, the time of mortality, the time of temptation? Therefore, a foul time, but let this foulness be in the field, not in the house. Let there be sorrow for sins, not for failed desires. A foul time, but if well used, a fertile time. What is more foul than a manured field? The field was beautiful before it had the manure basket. First, the field was brought to foulness, so that it might come to fruitfulness. Therefore, the foulness of this time is a sign, but let this foulness be for us the time of fertility. And let us see with the Prophet who says: We saw him. What kind of appearance? He had neither form nor comeliness. Why? Ask another Prophet. They counted all my bones. The bones of the one hanging were counted. A foul appearance, the appearance of the crucified, but this foulness gave birth to beauty. What beauty? The beauty of the resurrection, because fairer in form than the sons of men. The Promiser God has become a debtor to us.

Let us therefore praise the Lord, brothers, because we hold his faithful promises, which we have not yet received. Do you think it insignificant that we hold the promiser, that we might already demand the debtor? God the promiser has been made a debtor. He has been made a debtor by his goodness, not by our prerogative. What have we given him that we might hold him as a debtor? Or perhaps because you have heard in the Psalm: What shall I render to the Lord? First, when he says: What shall I render to the Lord? these are the words of a debtor, not of one demanding debt. It has been proclaimed to him: What shall I render to the Lord? What is: What shall I render? I shall repay. For what? For all he has repaid to me. What has he repaid to you? First, I was nothing, and he made me; I was lost, he sought me; seeking he found me; captive he redeemed me; bought he freed me; from a servant he made me a brother. What shall I render to the Lord? You have nothing to repay. When you expect everything from him, what do you have to repay? But wait. I do not know what he wishes to say, when he asks: What shall I render to the Lord for all he has repaid to me? Looking around on all sides for what to repay, as if he found something. What did he find? I will take the cup of salvation. You were thinking to repay, still you sought to receive. See, I ask. If you still seek to receive, you will still be a debtor. When will you be a retributor? If therefore you will always be a debtor, when will you repay? You will not find anything to repay. Unless he gives, you will not have.

Man has nothing of his own except falsehood.

See, when you said: What shall I repay? it pertains to what you said: Every man is a liar. For whoever wishes to say that he repays anything to God is a liar. All things must be hoped for from Him. From ourselves apart from Him, nothing, unless perhaps sin and falsehood, because he who speaks a lie speaks of his own. Truly man abounds fully in his own. He certainly has falsehood there, and his heart is a treasury of falsehoods. He lies as much as he can, he does not fail. He fabricates whatever he can, lies whatever he can. Why? Because he has that freely, indeed he has it from himself; he did not acquire it. However, when it comes to the truth, if he wants to be truthful, it will not be from himself. Peter was a liar from his own. Where is the lie? The Lord promised us suffering, and he says: Far be it from you, this shall not happen. Every man is a liar. From where is the lie? Listen to the Lord Himself: You do not mind the things of God, but the things of man. But when Peter was truthful, when? You are the Christ, the Son of the living God. From where to this lying man? Behold, a man says: You are the Christ, the Son of the living God. Who says it? Peter. What was Peter? A man who said the truth? Certainly, every man is a liar. Behold, behold his tongue, behold the truth from his tongue, how every man is a liar? Listen, because every man is a liar. Therefore he was truthful because it was not from his own. Therefore every man is a liar because it is from his own. So from where was Peter truthful? Listen to the Truth Himself: Blessed are you, Simon Bar-Jonah. From where blessed? From your own? Far from it. Because flesh and blood did not reveal it to you, but my Father who is in heaven.

Let us praise with voices, let us praise with manners.

Let us therefore praise the Lord who is in heaven, beloved. Let us praise God. Let us say Alleluia. Let us signify in these days a day without end. Let us signify the time of immortality in place of mortality. Let us hasten to the eternal home. Blessed are those who dwell in your house; they shall praise you forever and ever. The Law says, the Scripture says, the Truth says. We are coming to the house of God, which is in heaven. There we will not praise God for fifty days, but, as it is written: Forever and ever. We shall see, love, praise; neither what we see will fail, nor what we love will perish, nor what we praise will be silent; everything will be eternal, it will be without end. Let us praise, let us praise, but not with voices alone, let us also praise with deeds. Let the tongue praise, let life praise, let the tongue not contradict the life but let them have infinite charity. Turned to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 255

SERMO 255 IN THE DAYS OF EASTER Of Alleluia. In this journey, we say Alleluia as a comfort.

Since the Lord wished that we should see your Charity in Alleluia, we owe you a word about Alleluia. I will not be a burden if I remind you of what you know: for we daily say Alleluia, and we are daily delighted. You know that Alleluia, in Latin, means "Praise God": and in this word, sounding together with the mouth and agreeing with the heart, we exhort each other to praise God. Only a person who has nothing to displease him praises securely. And in this time of our pilgrimage, we say Alleluia as a comfort for the journey; now Alleluia is a song of the traveler for us: however, we strive along a laborious way to a peaceful homeland, where, with all our actions withdrawn, nothing will remain but Alleluia. Of Mary and Martha.

Mary had chosen for herself that most delightful part, which was idle, learning, praising: but Martha her sister had been occupied with many things. Indeed, she was doing what was necessary, but not permanent: she was doing the work of the journey, not yet of the homeland: she was doing the work of pilgrimage, not yet of possession. For she had received the Lord, and those who were with Him. And the Lord had taken on flesh: just as He had deigned to take on flesh for us, so He deigned to hunger and thirst. And because He deigned to hunger and thirst, He deigned to be fed by those whom He Himself had enriched: He deigned to be received, not out of need, but out of grace. Therefore, Martha was doing what pertained to the needs of the hungry and thirsty: she was preparing with diligent care, what would be eaten and drunk by the saints and by the Holy of holies Himself in her house. A great work, but transitory. Will there always be hunger and thirst? When we will cling to that most pure and perfect goodness, there will be no reason to serve necessity. We will be blessed, needing nothing; having much, seeking nothing. And what is it that we will have, so that we will seek nothing? I said: that which you believe, you will see later. So, what we said, having much and seeking nothing, that is, needing nothing; what is it exactly that we will have? God, to those serving Him, worshipping Him, believing in Him, hoping in Him, loving Him, what will He give?

Health is so sweet that it never comes into disrepute. For we see how much He grants in this time to those who distrust Him, despair of Him, turn away from Him, and blaspheme Him; we see how many gifts He bestows. From Him comes health first: which is so sweet that it never becomes wearisome. When a poor man has this, what is he lacking? When the rich man does not have this, whatever else he has, what benefit is it to him? From Him, therefore, that is, from our Lord God whom we worship, the true God in whom we believe, hope, and love; from Him comes such a great thing, health. Yet see how, though health is a great thing, He gives it to both good and evil, to His blasphemers and His praisers. And what shall I say? Both are human. Even an evil man is better than any animal. He grants health even to beasts and dragons; He gives health to flies and little worms; and He saves all who created all. So let us pass over other things; because we find nothing better than health: not only does God give it to humans, but also to animals, as the Psalm says: You save both man and beast, O Lord; as your mercy is multiplied, God. For you are such, because you are God; that your goodness does not remain in the highest and abandon the lowest. It reaches from Angels down to the very smallest animals. For it reaches from one end to the other mightily, and sweetly orders all things: and in that sweet ordering, health is sweet to all.

Through the first man, ruin; through the Son of Man, salvation.

Since therefore He gives such goodness both to the good and the evil, to humans and to animals, what is it, my brothers, that He reserves for the good? For already He had said: "You save humans and animals, Lord; as Your mercy is multiplied, God." And then He added: "And the children of men." Who are these? As if they are different humans, of whom He had said a little before: "You save humans and animals, Lord;" and different children of men. For are humans different from the children of men, and the children of men different from humans? What then does this distinction mean? Unless perhaps because humans pertain to man, the children of men to the Son of Man: humans, to man; children of men, to the Son of Man. For there is a certain man who was not the son of man. For he who was created first was man, but was not the son of man. What then comes to us through man, and what comes to us through the Son of Man? I recall what comes through man, and I speak the words of the Apostle: "Through one man sin entered into the world, and through sin, death: and thus death passed to all men, in whom all have sinned." Behold what man has given us, behold what we have drunk from our parent, and we hardly digest. If this through man, what through the Son of Man? "He spared not His own Son," he says. If He spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all; how will He not also, with Him, freely give us all things? Likewise, "As by the disobedience of one man many were made sinners; so by the obedience of one Man many will be made righteous." Through him therefore sin, through Christ righteousness. So all sinners pertain to man: all the just to the Son of Man. Why then do you marvel because sinners, because the impious, because the wicked, because the despisers of God, turned away from God, lovers of the world, embracing iniquity, hating the truth, that is, humans pertaining to man; why do you marvel that they have this health, when you hear the Psalm: "You save humans and animals, Lord?" That people might not exalt themselves, because they have temporal health, animals are added to them. What is it then from which you rejoice, man? Is it not shared with your donkey, and with your chicken, with any animate being in your house, with these sparrows? is not the health of the body common to you and to all these?

Now sings love hungering, then love enjoying. The godly are promised the delight of God's praise, which is not given to the ungodly. Therefore, seek what is promised to the sons of men, and hear what follows: But the sons of men will hope under the shadow of your wings. Meanwhile, they will hope, as long as they are on the way. But the sons of men will hope under the shadow of your wings. For we are saved by hope. This does not pertain to men and cattle, to hope under the shadow of God's wings. And behold, hope feeds us, nourishes us, strengthens us, and comforts us in this laborious life; in this very hope we sing Alleluia. Behold how much joy hope has. What will the reality be? What will it be, you ask? Hear what follows: They will be intoxicated with the abundance of your house. This is the hope of it. We thirst, we hunger, we need to be satisfied: but on the way there is hunger, in the homeland there is satiety. When will we be satisfied? I shall be satisfied when your glory is revealed. But now the glory of our God, the glory of our Christ, is hidden: and with him, ours is also hidden. But when Christ, your life, appears, then you will also appear with him in glory. Then there will be Alleluia in reality: but now in hope. Hope sings it, love sings it now, love will sing it then: but now love sings hungering, then love will sing enjoying. For what is Alleluia, my brothers? I have told you, it is the Praise of God. Behold, now you hear the word, and in hearing you are delighted, and in the delight you praise. If you love the dew so much, how will you love the fountain itself? For what belching is to a sated stomach, that is praise to a full heart. For if we praise what we believe, how will we praise when we see? Behold what Mary had chosen for herself: but she signified that life, she did not yet hold it.

Before we reach one, we need many.

There are two lives: one pertaining to pleasure, the other pertaining to necessity. That regarding necessity is laborious; that regarding pleasure is luxurious. But enter inside, do not seek pleasure outside: lest you become swollen with it, and are unable to enter through the narrow gate. Behold how Mary saw the Lord in the flesh, and heard the Lord through the flesh, as you heard when the Epistle to the Hebrews was read, as through a veil. There will be no veil when we see face to face. Therefore, Mary sat, that is, she was idle, and listened, and praised; while Martha was busy with much serving. And the Lord said to her: Martha, Martha, you are anxious about many things: but one thing is necessary. The one true thing: many things will not be necessary. Before we reach the one, we need many things. Let one thing extend us, lest many things stretch us and tear us apart from the one. The apostle Paul mentioned this one thing, because he had not yet received it. I, he said, do not consider myself to have laid hold of it. But one thing I do, forgetting what lies behind, straining forward to what lies ahead. Not stretched thin, but stretched forward. For one thing stretches forward, not stretches thin. Many things stretch thin; one stretches forward. And how long does it stretch forward? As long as we are here. When we arrive, it gathers, it does not stretch forward. But one thing, forgetting what lies behind, straining forward to what lies ahead, according to intention. Behold the stretching forward: never the stretching thin. I follow according to intention, to the goal of the upward call of God in Christ Jesus. The order of the words is: But one thing I follow. Then we will come, and delight in the one thing; but that one thing will be everything to us. For what did we say, brothers, when I began to speak? What is the much that we will have when we will not need? What is the much that we will have? This is what I intended to say: what will God give us that He will not give to others? Let the wicked be removed, that he may not see the glory of God. Therefore, God will give us His glory, in which we will delight: from which the wicked will be removed, that he may not see the glory of God. All the much that we will have, God Himself will be. Greedy one, what were you seeking to receive? What does the one ask from God, for whom God is not enough? But when it is said that we will have God, and be content with Him alone, indeed we will delight in Him alone so much that we will not seek anything else; because we will both enjoy Him alone, and mutually enjoy Him in ourselves: (for what are we if we do not have God? Or what else in us should we love than God, either because we have Him or so that we may have Him?) Therefore when it is said that other things are taken away, and God alone will be what we delight in; the soul, accustomed to many delights, feels constricted; and the carnal soul, devoted to flesh, entangled in carnal desires, having wings wrapped in the sticky substance of evil desires, preventing it from flying to God, says to itself: What will I have, where I will neither eat, nor drink, nor sleep with my wife? What kind of joy will I have? This joy of yours comes from illness, not from health. Surely your own flesh in this time is sometimes sick, sometimes healthy. Consider, that I may explain something, an example of a thing which I cannot describe. There are certain desires of the sick: they burn with the desire for some spring, or some fruit; and they burn so much that they think that if they were well, they ought to enjoy those desires. Health comes, and the desire perishes. What it desired, it now loathes: because the fever was seeking this in it. And what kind of health is this, in which the sick person recovers? Our health will be immortality. This health, by which we are called healthy, what is it? Yet take an example from this. Because while there are many desires of the sick which this health removes; just as health removes those desires, so immortality removes all things: because our health is immortality. Recall the Apostle and see what shall be: This corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. And we shall be equal to the Angels of God. Are they miserable, who do not feast? Are they not happier for not needing these things? Or will any rich man be equal to the Angels? Angels are truly wealthy. What are called riches? Resources. Angels have great resources, who have great ease. You hear it when a rich man is praised: How great he is, he is a master, he is rich, he is powerful. How great it is for him to go where he wills, he has animals, he has expenses, he has servants, he has services. The rich man has all these: he goes where he wills, he does not suffer labor. The Angel, wherever he wishes, there he will be: nor does he say, 'Prepare,' nor does he say, 'Spread,' what the rich say with pride, and wish to swell from that they have those to whom they say, 'Prepare and Spread.' Unhappy man, these words are of weakness, not of resources. Therefore, we shall not be in need: and for this reason, we shall be blessed. For we will be filled, but with our God: and all that we desire here greatly, He Himself will be for us. Here you seek food greatly: God will be your food. Here you seek the embrace of flesh: But for me, it is good to cling to God. Here you seek riches: how will all things be lacking to you, when you have Him who made all things? And to make you secure with the Apostle's words, he said this about that life: That God may be all in all.

Sermons - Sermon 255A

Sermon 255 IN THE DAYS OF EASTER OF ALLELUIA On Alleluia.

It is fitting for us to say as many praises as we can to our Creator. For when, dearly beloved brothers, we praise the Lord, we confer something upon ourselves, as we extend ourselves in His love. For we have sung: Alleluia. Alleluia is a new song.

Allow yourselves to be nourished by the mother Church. The new man sings a new song. We have sung: you have sung too, children, who have recently been renewed by Him; and we sang with you, because we were redeemed at the same price. What brotherly love requires, I remind you, not only you, but also those who hear, I admonish as brothers and sons; brothers, because one mother, the Church, gave birth to us; sons because through the Gospel I have begotten you. Live well, most beloved sons, so that you may have good reasons for having received such a great sacrament. Let vices be corrected, morals arranged, virtues embraced; let piety, holiness, chastity, humility, and sobriety be present in each of you; so that offering such fruits to God, He may delight in you, and you in Him. Let us also rejoice at the progress of your hope, seeing in you the fruits of the reward of our hope. Love the Lord, for He loves you; frequent this mother, who gave birth to you. See what this mother has bestowed upon you, to unite the creature with the Creator, to make slaves the sons of God, to make the slaves of the devil the brothers of Christ. You will not be ungrateful for these so great benefits of hers if you show her the worthy service of your presence. Nor can anyone have God the Father propitious who has despised the mother Church. This therefore holy and spiritual mother daily prepares spiritual nourishment for you, by which not your bodies but your souls may be refreshed. She bestows upon you heavenly bread, she offers you the saving cup; she does not want any of her children to suffer from such hunger. Act on your behalf, beloved ones, do not desert so great a mother; that you may be filled with the abundance of her house, and drink from the torrent of her delights, and present you to God the Father as worthy sons, whom she will diligently and piously nurture and lead to eternal life, intact and free.

Sermons - Sermon 256

SERMO 256 IN THE PASCHAL DAYS ON ALLELUIA Now we sing Alleluia with anxiety, then without care.

Since it has pleased our Lord God that we, placed here in bodily presence, should sing Alleluia with your Charity, which in Latin means "Praise the Lord," let us praise the Lord, brothers, with life and tongue, heart and mouth, voices and manners. For thus God wishes Alleluia to be said to Him, that there may be no discord in the one who praises. Therefore, let our tongue agree with our life and our mouth with our conscience. Let, I say, our voices agree with our manners, lest perhaps good voices testify against bad manners. O happy Alleluia in heaven, where the temple of God is the angels! For there is the highest harmony of those who praise, where there is secure exultation of those who sing: where no law in the members resists the law of the mind; where there is no quarrel of desire, in which the victory of charity may be endangered. Here therefore let us sing Alleluia still solicitous, that there we may be able sometime to sing securely. Why here solicitous? Do you not want me to be solicitous when I read: "Is not human life on earth a temptation?" Do you not want me to be solicitous when it is still said to me: "Watch and pray, that you may not enter into temptation?" Do you not want me to be solicitous, where temptation is so abundant that the prayer itself prescribes to us, when we say: "Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors?" Daily petitioners, daily debtors. Do you want me to be secure, where I daily ask for indulgence for sins, help against dangers? For when I have said for past sins: "Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors;" immediately for future dangers I add and join: "Lead us not into temptation." But how is the people in good when they cry out with me: "Deliver us from evil?" And yet, brothers, in this still evil let us sing: Alleluia to the good God, who delivers us from evil. Why do you look around for whence He delivers you, when He delivers you from evil? Do not go far, do not strain your mental gaze in all directions. Return to yourself, look at yourself. You are still evil. Therefore when God delivers you from yourself, then He delivers you from evil. Hear the Apostle, and understand from what evil you are to be delivered. "I delight," he says, "in the law of God according to the inner man; but I see another law in my members resisting the law of my mind, and taking me captive in the law of sin, which is." Where? "Taking me captive," he says, "in the law of sin, which is in my members." I thought because it took you captive under some unknown barbarians; I thought because it took you captive under some unknown foreign nations, or under some unknown masters. "Which is," he says, "in my members." Exclaim therefore with him: "Wretched man that I am, who will deliver me?" From where will someone deliver? Tell from where. Another one says from the guard post, another from the prison, another from the captivity of the barbarians, another from fever and sickness; tell us, Apostle, not where we are to be sent, or where we are to be taken; but what we carry with us, what we ourselves are, tell us: "From the body of this death." From the body of this death? "From the body," he says, "of this death."

We will enjoy the glory of God with mind and body.

Another one says: This body of death does not pertain to me; it is my prison temporarily, my chain temporarily: I am in the body of death; I am not the body of death. You argue, therefore you are not freed. For I, he says, am spirit; I am not flesh, but I am in the flesh; when I have been freed from the flesh, what then will become of the flesh? Do you want me, brothers, to respond to this argument, or the Apostle? If I respond, the weight of the word might be ignored because of the insignificance of the one delivering it. I will remain silent. Listen with me to the Teacher of the Gentiles, listen with me to the Chosen Vessel; so that the controversy of dissension may be removed from you. Listen, but first state what you were saying. Surely you were saying: I am not flesh, but spirit. I groan in my prison; when this chain and this prison are dissolved, I go away free. The earth is returned to the earth, the spirit is received in heaven; I go, I abandon what I am not. So, is this what you were saying? This, he says. I will not respond to you: let the Apostle respond, respond, I implore you. You preached to be heard; you wrote to be read; all was done so that you might be believed. Say: Who will deliver me from this body of death? The grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord. From where does it liberate you? From this body of death. But are you not yourself this body of death? He responds: Therefore I myself serve the law of God with my mind, but with my flesh I serve the law of sin. But I myself; how through different things are you yourself? With mind, he says, because I love; with flesh, because I lust; indeed victorious, if I do not consent; yet still a struggler, with the adversary pressing. And how, O Apostle, when you have been liberated from this flesh, will you no longer be anything but spirit? The Apostle responds, with death already imminent, with the debt which no one escapes: I do not lay down the flesh forever, but set it aside temporarily. Therefore, will you return to this body of death? And what then? Let us rather hear his words. How do you return to the body, from which you have cried out with such pious voice to be liberated? He responds: I indeed return to the body, but no longer of this death. Listen, ignorant one, deaf to the daily readings; listen, how he returns to the body, indeed, but not of this death. Not because he has obtained another body, but because this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. My brothers, when the Apostle said this corruptible, this mortal, he seemed to touch the flesh with his voice. Therefore, not another. No, he says, I do not lay down an earthly body, and take up an airy body, or take up an ethereal body. I take up the same body, but not any longer of this death. Because this corruptible, not another, but this must put on incorruption; and this mortal, not another, but this must put on immortality. Then the saying that is written will come to pass: Death is swallowed up in victory. Let Alleluia be sung. Then the saying that is written, which is not the word of those still fighting but of those triumphing: Death is swallowed up in victory. Let Alleluia be sung. Where, O death, is your sting? Let Alleluia be sung. But the sting of death is sin. But you will seek its place and not find it.

Sing and walk! But even here among dangers and temptations, both from others and from ourselves, let the Alleluia be sung. For faithful is God, who will not allow, he says, you to be tempted beyond what you can bear. Therefore, let us also sing Alleluia here. Man is still guilty, but God is faithful. He did not say: He will not allow you to be tempted, but: He will not allow you to be tempted beyond what you can bear; but will also make with the temptation an escape, so that you may be able to endure it. You have entered into temptation: but God will also make an escape, so that you do not perish in temptation; that as the vessel of the potter, you may be shaped by preaching, fired under tribulation. But when you enter, think of the exit; because God is faithful, the Lord will guard your entrance and your exit. Moreover, when this body has been made immortal and incorruptible, when every temptation has perished; for indeed the body is dead; why is it dead? Because of sin. But the spirit is life, the words of the Apostle; why? Because of righteousness. Do we therefore let the dead body remain? No, but listen: But if the Spirit of Him who raised Christ from the dead dwells in you; He who raised Christ from the dead will also give life to your mortal bodies. For now the body is natural, then it will be spiritual. For the first man was made into a living soul, the last man into a life-giving spirit. Therefore He will also give life to your mortal bodies because of His Spirit dwelling in you. O happy Alleluia there! O secure! O without adversary! Where there will be no enemy, and no friend perishes. Here praises to God, and there praises to God; but here from the anxious, there from the secure; here from those dying, there from those always living; here in hope, there in reality; here on the way, there in the homeland. Therefore now, my brothers, let us sing, not for the delight of rest, but as a solace in labor. How travelers are accustomed to sing; sing, but walk: console your labor by singing, do not love laziness; sing and walk. What does "walk" mean? Advance, advance in good. For there are some, according to the Apostle, progressing in worse. If you advance, you walk, but advance in good, advance in right faith, advance in good morals: sing and walk. Do not err, do not turn back, do not remain. Turned to the Lord. And after the Sermon:

Tomorrow the feast of the holy martyrs Marianus and James dawns; but, since we are still somewhat occupied due to the cause of such a great assembly of the holy council, on the third day of the same feast day, with the Lord's help, we will deliver to you the due sermon.

Sermons - Sermon 257

SERMO 257 IN THE DAYS OF EASTER TREATISE ON THE LORD'S DAY WHICH HE SAID AT THE MEMORY OF THE SAINTS

What is said in the Hebrew language as Alleluia, in Latin is: Praise the Lord. Let us therefore praise the Lord our God, not only with our voice but also with our heart, because he who praises with the heart, praises with the voice of the inner man. Voice to men is sound, voice to God is feeling.

I am better a liar than that Scripture should lie. A certain man said in his ecstasy, as you have read, as you have heard: Every man is a liar. Therefore, there was one who did not believe unless he touched the body of the Lord. It seemed to him a lie that his fellow disciples were speaking the truth. And it was not enough for him to hear the truth, he also wanted to touch. However, the Lord granted him this in what follows in the Gospel to be recited later. But whoever hears: Every man is a liar, ought not to fix himself in the lie and refuse to rise from it, as if reasoning to himself in vain, as a lying man, and saying to himself: When will I not be a man? But as long as I am a man here, I will be a liar; it is better that I be a liar than that Scripture lies which says: Every man is a liar. For if I am truthful, Scripture will be a lie; but since Scripture cannot be a lie, I will be a liar. Speaking thus to himself, he seems to rest securely as if in the harbor of lying where he suffers shipwreck. You wished to rest well in such a harbor; hear the rock upon which you will crash: You will destroy all who speak falsehood. And this is the Scripture of God which says: You will destroy all who speak falsehood. Therefore, He will destroy all because every man is a liar. But what has been told to us? What have we been admonished? That we are liars from our own selves. But if we wish to be truthful, let us flee to the Lord. From Him we are truthful, from our own selves we are liars.

Peter stood as an example so that we may not trust in ourselves.

Hear this with one short and great example; short because it is quickly said, great because it is wisely weighed. Peter alone showed this which I wish to say. When he said to the Lord Christ: You are the Christ, the Son of the living God, what did He respond? Blessed are you, Simon Bar-Jona, because flesh and blood has not revealed this to you, but my Father who is in heaven. You spoke the truth, but it was not your own. How then? My Father who is in heaven revealed it to you. Therefore blessed because from God, not wretched except from your own. After this, when the Lord said to him: Blessed are you because flesh and blood did not reveal this to you, but my Father who is in heaven, after these words the Lord Christ began to foretell his passion and death. Then immediately Peter: Far be it from you, Lord! Every man is a liar. Behold, shortly before Peter was truthful, behold now Peter is a liar. But how was Peter truthful? Flesh and blood did not reveal this to you, but my Father who is in heaven. How was Peter a liar? Get behind me, Satan, you are not setting your mind on the things of God, but on the things of men. Every man is a liar. Therefore it was said to us: Every man is a liar, that we might flee from ourselves and run to God who alone is truthful.

Sermons - Sermon 258

SERMO 258

ANOTHER SERMON WHICH HE SAID TO THE GREAT BASILICA

EADEM DIE Christ the cornerstone and the day made by the Lord.

What we have sung to God: This is the day which the Lord has made, hence let us speak of what the Lord has given. Here the Prophetic Scripture surely wanted us to understand something. That day which is not common, not conspicuous to the eyes of the flesh! It is not that day which rises and sets but the day which could know its dawn, not its setting! Let us see what the same Psalm previously said: The stone which the builders rejected, this has become the cornerstone. By the Lord has this been done, it is marvelous in our eyes. And it continues: This is the day which the Lord has made. Let us take the beginning of this day from the cornerstone. Who is the cornerstone which the builders rejected if not the Lord Christ whom the Jewish teachers rejected? For the experts of the Law, the teachers of the Jews, rejected Him saying: This one is not from God who loosens the Sabbath. You have already said: This one is not from God who loosens the Sabbath. The stone which the builders rejected, this one has become the cornerstone. How as the cornerstone? Why is Christ called the cornerstone? Because every corner unites two walls from different angles. The Apostles came from the circumcision, they came from the people of the Jews, they also came from those crowds which preceded and followed His beast, saying what is in this same Psalm: Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord; from there came so many churches of which the Apostle Paul says: I was unknown by face to the churches of Judea which are in Christ, but they only heard that he who formerly persecuted us now preaches the faith which he once destroyed and they glorified God in me, Jews but adhering to Christ like the Apostles, coming and believing in Christ and making one wall. The other part remained, the Church coming from the Gentiles. They found each other; peace in Christ, unity in Christ who made both one. This is the day which the Lord has made. Consider the whole day as the head and the body, the head Christ, the body the Church. This is the day which the Lord has made.

Those who are baptized are made into days out of darkness.

Recall the first condition of the world. Darkness was over the abyss, and the Spirit of God was hovering over the waters. And God said: Let there be light, and there was light. And God divided the light from the darkness, and the light He called day, the darkness He called night. Think of the darkness before they came to the remission of sins. Therefore, darkness was over the abyss before those sins were forgiven. But the Spirit of God was hovering over the waters. They descended into the waters, the Spirit of God was hovering over the waters, the darkness of sins was dispelled, this is the day that the Lord has made. To this day the Apostle says: For you were once darkness, but now you are light in the Lord. Did he say: You were darkness in the Lord? Darkness in yourselves, light in the Lord. But God called the light day, because it is by His grace that it is made. They could be darkness by themselves, but they could not be light unless the Lord had made them so. Because this is the day that the Lord has made, not the day itself, but the Lord.

Incredulous Thomas was made a believer by the Lord. Was not Thomas a man, one of the disciples, like a man from the crowd? His fellow disciples said to him, "We have seen the Lord." And he said, "Unless I touch, unless I put my finger into his side, I will not believe." The evangelists announce to you and you do not believe? The world believed them, but the disciple does not believe. Of them it was said: "Their sound has gone through all the earth, and their words to the ends of the world." Their words go out, they reach the far ends of the earth, the whole world believes, everyone proclaims one and he does not believe. The day the Lord made had not yet come. There was still darkness in the abyss; in the depth of the human heart, there was darkness there. Let him come, the head of this day, and say patiently, gently, not angrily because he is a doctor: "Come," he says, "come, touch this and believe." You said, "Unless I touch, unless I put my finger in, I won’t believe." Come, touch, put your finger, and do not be unbelieving but faithful. Come, put your finger. I knew your wounds, I kept my scar for you. But clearly when he put his hand in he fulfilled faith. For what is the fullness of faith? That Christ is believed not only to be a man, nor only to be God, but man and God. That is the fullness of faith, because the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us. Therefore, this disciple, when the scars and members of his Savior were offered to be touched, when he touched, he cried out: "My Lord and my God." He touched the man, recognized God, and touched the flesh, looked to the Word, because the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us. This Word suffered, had his flesh hung on a tree; this Word suffered nails to be driven into his flesh; this Word suffered his flesh to be pierced by a lance; this Word suffered his flesh to be placed in a tomb; this Word resurrected his flesh, offered it to the sight of the disciples, and provided it for their hands to touch. They touch, they exclaim: "My Lord and my God." This is the day the Lord has made.

Sermons - Sermon 259

SERMO 259 ON THE LORD'S DAY OF THE OCTAVE OF EASTER Let us equally believe and together we will see.

Today's day is a great sacrament of everlasting happiness for us. For not just as this day will pass, so will the life that this day signifies. Therefore, brothers, we exhort and beseech you in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom our sins are forgiven, who wished our redemption to be his own blood, who deigned to make us, unworthy even to be called his servants, his brothers, that all your intent, for being Christians and bearing his name on your forehead and in your heart, be directed only to that life which will be ours with the Angels: where there is perpetual rest, eternal joy, unceasing happiness, no disturbance, no sadness, no death. This life can only be known by those who experience it; but they cannot experience it unless they believe. For if you demand that we show you what God promises you, we cannot. But you have heard how the Gospel of John concluded: "Blessed are those who have not seen and yet believe." And you wish to see, and so do I. Let us believe together, and we shall see together. Let us not be hard against the word of God. For, brothers, is it fitting that Christ should now descend from heaven and show his wounds to us? He deigned to show them to the faithless one to rebuke the doubters and instruct the believers.

"About the changes of the Church in the present times and at the end of the age."

Therefore, this eighth day at the end of the age signifies a new life: the seventh signifies the future rest of the saints on this earth. For the Lord will reign on the earth with His saints, as the Scriptures say, and will have here a Church into which no evil person will enter, separated and purified from all contamination of wickedness; which is signified by those one hundred and fifty-three fish, about which, as far as I remember, we have already discussed at some time. For here the Church will first appear in great clarity, dignity, and justice. There, it will not be permitted to deceive, to lie, to hide the wolf under the sheep's skin. For the Lord will come, as it is written, and will illuminate the hidden things of darkness and will reveal the thoughts of hearts: and then each will have praise from God. Therefore, the wicked will not be there: for they will already have been separated. Then, like a purified mass, the multitude of saints will appear, as it were, on the threshing floor, and thus will be sent into the celestial barn of immortality. For as the grain is first threshed and then purified there; and the place where the grain has endured the threshing, to be cleansed from the chaff, is adorned with the dignity of the purified mass. For indeed we see on the threshing floor after the winnowing, a heap of chaff on one side, and a heap of grain on the other. But we know where the chaff is destined to go; and how the grains bring joy to the farmers. Just as the grain first appears separated from the chaff on the threshing floor, and after such labors, that heap which was hidden in the chaff, which was not seen when it was being threshed, brings joy when observed; then it is sent into the barn and kept in secret: so in this age, you see how this threshing floor is being threshed, but the chaff is so mixed with the grain that it is difficult to discern: because it has not yet been winnowed. Thus, after the winnowing of the day of judgment, the mass of saints will appear, shining with dignity, powerful in merits, and bearing the mercy of their liberator. And he will be the seventh day. As if the first day in the whole age is the time from Adam to Noah; the second, from Noah to Abraham, and as the Gospel of Matthew divides it, the third from Abraham to David; the fourth, from David to the exile in Babylon; the fifth, from the exile to the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. Therefore, from the advent of the Lord, the sixth day is conducted, we are in the sixth day. And hence, just as man was formed in Genesis on the sixth day in the image of God, so in this time, as it were, the sixth day of the whole age, we are renewed in Baptism, to receive the image of our Creator. But when this sixth day has passed, rest will come after that winnowing, and the saints and just ones of God will have their Sabbath. After the seventh, when the dignity of the harvest, the splendor, and merit of the saints appear on the threshing floor, we will go into that life and that rest, about which it has been said: "Eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor has it entered into the heart of man, the things which God has prepared for those who love Him." Then, as it were, we return to the beginning. For just as when these seven days have been completed, the eighth is the same as the first: so, after the completed and finished ages of the seven passing through the world, we will return to that immortality and blessedness from which man has fallen. And therefore, the sacraments of infants are fulfilled on the eighth. Hence also the septenary number seven times multiplied makes forty-nine; and adding one, it is as if we return to the beginning, and they become fifty: this number is celebrated by us up to Pentecost in mystery. Even according to that division of the number forty, to which a denarius is added as a reward, the same number appears again for different reasons. Both reasons lead back to the same number fifty. Which, multiplied by three for the mystery of the Trinity, makes one hundred and fifty. Adding that very Trinity, as if a witness and indicator of triplication and the Trinity, we understand the Church in those one hundred and fifty-three fish. Have mercy on man, man, and God will have mercy on you. But meanwhile, until we come to that rest, at this time when we labor, and we are in the night, as long as we do not see what we hope for, and we travel in the wilderness, until we come to the heavenly Jerusalem, as to the land of promise flowing with milk and honey: now, therefore, since temptations do not cease, let us do good work. Let there always be medicine, as if to be applied to daily wounds. But the medicine is in good works of mercy. For if you wish to obtain the mercy of God, be merciful. If you deny humanity to a man, when you are a man, God will also deny you divinity, that is the incorruption of immortality, by which He makes us gods. For God needs nothing from you: but you need from God. He asks nothing from you to be blessed Himself: but you, unless you receive from Him, cannot be blessed. What do you receive from Him? I do not know if you would dare to complain if you received something from Him who created all things, the most excellent thing He created. But He does not give you something of what He created; but He gives Himself to you to enjoy, Himself the creator of all things. For what could be more beautiful and better from those things created by Him than He who made them? And how will He give Himself to you? Is it as if according to your merits? If you seek what you deserved, consider your sins; hear God's judgment against the transgressing man: “You are dust, and to dust you shall return.” Since the threat preceded when the command was given: “On the day you touch it, you will certainly die.” If you seek the merit of sins, what comes to mind except punishment? Therefore forget your merits, lest they cause you fear in your heart: or rather do not forget, lest through pride you repel mercy. We commend ourselves, brothers, to God by works of mercy. “Confess to the Lord, for He is good, for His mercy endures forever.” Confess, for God has mercy and wants to forgive the sins of the confessing. But offer Him a sacrifice. Show mercy to the man, O man, and God will show mercy to you. You are a man, and another man, two miserable beings. But God is not miserable, but merciful. If a wretched man does not show mercy to the wretched, how does he demand mercy from Him who will never be wretched? See what I say, brothers. Whoever is cruel to a shipwrecked person, for example, is cruel until it happens to him to be shipwrecked. But if it happens, remembering his past life, when he sees a shipwrecked person, he is struck by a similar misery; and what the association of humanity could not bend to mercy, the sharing of calamity bends. He quickly has mercy on the servant, who once served. He quickly feels sorrow for the laborer defrauded of his wages, who was once a laborer. He deeply sympathizes with the man bitterly mourning his son, who has once mourned something similar. Therefore, no matter how great the hardness of human heart is dissolved by the similarity of misery. Therefore, if you, who either were miserable, or fear to be miserable (for as long as you live here, you must fear what you were not, and remember what you have been, and consider what you are): therefore, being placed both in the memory of past miseries, and in the fear of future ones, and in the affliction of present ones, do not have mercy on a calamitous man and one needing your help, and you expect that He has mercy on you, whom misery never touches? And you do not give from what you received from God, and you want God to give you from what He did not receive from you?

It is good to forgive offenses and to give one's own possessions.

Mercy, my brothers, all you who are going to your homes, and from here, we will scarcely see each other, except through some solemnity, perform mercy, because sins abound. There is no other rest, no other way by which we may reach God, by which we may be restored, by which we may be reconciled to Him, whom we have most dangerously offended. We are going to appear in His presence: there, let our works speak for us; and let them speak in such a way that they surpass our offenses. For whatever is greater, that will prevail, either for punishment, if the sins deserve it; or for rest, if the good works deserve it.

Moreover, mercy is twofold in the Church: one in that title where no one spends money, not even labor; the other which requires from us either the duty of work or the expenditure of money. The one which demands nothing of outlay or labor from us is established in the soul, so that you forgive him who has sinned against you. For this almsgiving, your treasury is in your heart: there you manifest yourself before God. You are not told: Bring forth the purse, open the chest, unlock the granary; nor are you told: Come, walk, run, hasten, intercede, speak, visit, work. Standing in one place, you have cast out from your breast the grudge you hold against your brother; you have performed mercy, at no cost, with no labor, by mere goodness, by mere thought of mercy. For if we say: Give your goods to the poor; we may seem harsh. Certainly now we are mild and easy, when we say: Spend what you will not lose, forgive so that it may be forgiven to you. Yet let us also say this: Give and it shall be given to you. The Lord has united these in commandment, and expressed these two kinds of mercy. Forgive, and it shall be forgiven to you: mercy is in forgiving. Give and it shall be given to you: mercy is in giving. See if God does not give us more. You forgive a man, in what a man has harmed you: God forgives you, in what you have offended God. For is it as harmful to offend a man as to offend God? Therefore, He has given you more: because you have forgiven what a man has harmed, He forgives what has offended God.

Note another aspect of mercy's management. You give bread, He gives salvation; you give a thirsty person a drink, He gives you the drink of His wisdom. Can these even be compared, what you give and what you receive? See how it must be loaned. If anyone wants to be a moneylender, we do not at all forbid it: but let him lend to Him who is not poor in paying back greater and more, and to whom even this very thing, whatever it may be that you give to Him, belongs, so that you may receive more and better.

Let us give alms to God with humility and cheerfulness.

I also advise your Holiness that you know he performs double mercy, who gives something to the poor so that he himself distributes it. For it ought not to be merely the kindness of the giver, but also the humility of the minister. Somehow, my brothers, the soul of the one who offers to the poor sympathizes with common humanity and weakness, when the hand of the giver is placed in the hand of the needy. Although one gives and the other receives, the minister and the one ministered to are joined. For it does not join us in calamity, but in humility. Your abundance will be yours, if the Lord wills, and your children's. But no mention is made of this earthly abundance, which you see subject to so many accidents. The treasure lies quietly in the house, but does not allow the owner to be at peace. The thief is feared, the burglar is feared, the unfaithful servant is feared, the bad and powerful neighbor is feared. The more it is held, the more it is feared. But if you distribute to God in the poor, you do not lose, and you are made secure, because God Himself guards for you in heaven, who also gives you what is necessary on earth. Do you perhaps fear that Christ might lose what you have entrusted to Him? Does not everyone choose a faithful steward from his own family to whom he entrusts his money? Though he may have the power not to take away, yet he does not have the power not to lose. What is more faithful than Christ? What is more divine than omnipotence? He can neither take anything from you, since He gave to you in hope that you might give to Him, nor lose anything, since the Almighty holds all things. You refresh the bowels when you hold love feasts. For it seems we minister, and our things are given, and through us they are given; yet those things are given which God gave to us. It is good, brothers, that you dispense with your own hand: it is very pleasing to God. He accepts, and will give to you, who gave to you before you should give to Him. The office of distribution ought to be joined with the office of ministry. Since you may have two rewards, why lose one? But whoever is less able to give to all, let him give to the poor according to his means, with cheerfulness. For God loves a cheerful giver. The kingdom of heaven is set forth to be bought at every price. It is not for anyone who has two pennies to say that he is not able to buy it. The widow that is spoken of in the Gospel bought it with so little.

After the paschal days, one must persevere in goodness. The holidays are over, and now those of meetings, collections, and litigations succeed: see how you live in these, my brothers. From the leisure of these days, you ought to derive gentleness, not to meditate plans of quarrels. For there are men who rested during these days so that they could think up wickedness to practice after these days. We ask you to live as those who know that they will give an account to God of their entire life, not just of these fifteen days. Moreover, the questions of Scripture which I proposed yesterday and did not solve due to the constraint of time, I confess I owe them to you. But certainly, because the days that follow now also allow for the collection of money by legal and public right, demand this payment from me rather by Christian right. Now indeed all come for the sake of the solemnity: after these days, let the love of the law lead you to demand from me what I promised. For he who gives, gives to you through me: surely he gives to all of us. I indeed know the Apostle saying: Render to all their dues: to whom tribute, tribute; to whom custom, custom; to whom honor, honor; to whom fear, fear: owe no man anything, except to love one another. Only love is always to be rendered; no one is exempt from such a debt. What I owe, brothers, I will render in the name of the Lord. But, I confess to you, not do I restore to the sluggish by duty, but to the demanding.

Sermons - Sermon 25A

SERMON 25/A SERMON GIVEN IN THE BASILICA OF THE ANCESTORS ABOUT THE RESPONSE TO PSALM 93:

"Blessed is the man whom You instruct, O Lord," And from Your law You have taught him, so that You may calm him.

"From the evil days until a pit is dug for the sinner." The wicked flourish like grass.

We have sung to the Lord: Blessed is the man whom You instruct, O Lord, and teach him from Your law, so that You may give him rest from the days of adversity, until the pit is dug for the wicked. Therefore, the man taught by the Lord from the law of God, not taught in the law of God, but by the Lord from the law of God, is granted rest from the days of adversity, until the pit is dug for the wicked. For in this world, the happiness of the wicked is the pit of the sinner. People are often disturbed by this, and frequently the religious, who do not dare to blame the Lord, yet wonder within themselves why the wicked are often happy. And especially those are disturbed who, knowing they live better lives, are tormented by miseries and calamities. For they see the wicked abounding in all kinds of earthly and temporal goods, in all happiness. And they sigh in their miseries and scarcely restrain their hearts from blaming God. Let them hear the Psalm, and be blessed. Let the Lord instruct them from His law. Let Him say to them from another Psalm: "Do not be envious of evildoers, nor be jealous of those who pracitice iniquity." However, you who were envious and jealous, were saying nothing but: "Why do they flourish?" Hear from the law of God: Because they will soon wither like grass. Grass flourishes: why do you praise its greenness? Ask the summer, they will soon wither. All flesh is grass: the grass withers, the flower falls. See to it that you have a root: The word of the Lord endures forever. Therefore, those wicked men flourishing like grass, green in winter, dry in summer. But you, with your root fixed in the Word of God, which endures forever, be a living tree in secret. For you are dead, says the Apostle, and your life is hidden with Christ in God. There is your root, there you live. For you have placed your hope there, if you have not believed in vain. Therefore, let the winter time not sadden you, in which many fruitful and productive trees without the honor of leaves in winter time and without the honor of fruits seem like dried-up, but they are not dried-up. When the grass flourishes, they do not even have leaves. But what I said about grass, I say also about the tree living in secret. What did I say about grass? If you marvel at its greenness, ask the summer. Between the grass of the flourishing grass in winter and the fruitful tree withering in winter, summer is the judge. Thus, between the pious laboring in this world and the impious flourishing in this world as if in winter time, the sun of justice is the judge. Behold, judgment is coming. The tree says to the flourishing grass: "Why do you exalt yourself? Summer will come to test us." Therefore, to mitigate such trees from the days of adversity, the Apostle addresses and consoles them, predicting summer, promising greenness. He says, "You are dead, and your life, where your root is, is hidden with Christ in God." When summer comes, when Christ appears, your life, where greenness is, then you will also appear with Him in glory. Finally, of that same sun of justice, what He is going to do in summer, learn the sentence: For the Son of Man will come in His glory, He says, and all the angels with Him, and all nations will be gathered before Him. Now see the trees and the grass: He will separate them as a shepherd divides the sheep from the goats; and He will set the sheep on His right hand, but the goats on His left. Behold the judgment of summer. The heat of summer. What are the heats of summer? Even in fruitful trees, but greenness follows those heats. What then are the heats of summer? When the king righteous will sit on the throne, who will boast to have a pure heart? Who will boast to be clean from sin? Heavy heats. But the same judge who was feared consoles. He quickly gives refreshment to those who were heated or suffering from heat. For they lived in the root, they were not dried-up trees. See therefore their greenness. Come, blessed of My Father. Come. What you expected, receive; what you believed, see; what you hoped, have; what you loved, hold. Come, blessed of My Father, inherit the kingdom. This is the greenness in the summer of trees seemingly withering during winter, but living green in secret. Now observe the dryness of the grass. To whom the dry grass is destined: Depart into everlasting fire. Therefore, in good and fruitful trees, which have been granted rest from the days of adversity, the heat is comforted by the refreshment of rewards, comforted by the refreshment of the kingdom of heaven. There forever is lived. What is named in this earth some kind of herb "always lives," there it has its true place: there it truly lives, there is only life; no corruption, no neediness, eternal greenness is held, dryness is not feared. Depart into everlasting fire, it is said to the wicked. That is the pit of the sinner: it is being dug, this is what happens at this time. The happiness of the perverse man is the pit of the sinner. For he thinks, when he does evil and is happy, that God does not care for human affairs. That is the pit of the sinner.

What should be commanded to the rich of this world?

I speak, therefore, to Your Charity. Do not love the happiness of this world, and those of you who might have it, do not place your hope in it. It is deceitful, it deceives, it is not possessed. And if it is possessed, it should not be loved, it should not be hoped in, and it will not be a trap. The Apostle says, "Command the rich of this world, command the rich to be." But the rich of this world are Christians, they are faithful. Command them. What? Not to be proud, nor to place their hope in the uncertainty of riches. As the psalm also says: "If riches flow, do not set your heart on them." If it flows, it makes a river: you set your heart on it, and it carries you away. Therefore, if it happens that you become rich, do not yearn with greed: accept what is offered, do not seize what is alien; accept what is offered, but do not sell your justice. For if you sell justice, do not think you are accepting what is offered. You accept what is offered when someone gives willingly, not when someone gives unwillingly. "I sell justice," you say. "What harm is there in receiving something good?" Therefore, justice is for sale for you on this earth. You do not have justice so that you may receive a heavenly reward for it, but to sell it on earth. Amen, I say to you, they have received their reward. Freely given by your friend, inherited without harming innocence. Therefore, the Scripture does not condemn the rich, for it says: "Having food and covering, with these we shall be content." For those who want to be rich - it does not say those who are rich, but: those who want to be rich - by their desires fall into temptations and many harmful desires which plunge men into destruction and perdition. Do you want to know what it was accusing? The root of all evils is greed. Do not have such a root: for it is the root of withering hay.

You who are poor, do not despise yourselves.

Therefore, my brothers who are poor, do not despise yourselves. Nothing is as rich as faith. Your outer cell is empty, your inner chest is full. A full chest is a good conscience. The devil took away everything that the holy man possessed externally. He did not penetrate this chest. In it, he was rich who said: The Lord gave, the Lord has taken away. The Lord gave, let not the devil boast, the Lord has taken away: for the evil one took away that which the good one permitted, who wished to test by tempting, so as to set an example for imitation. As it pleased the Lord, so it was done: blessed be the name of the Lord. If he was poor, how did he pour forth such precious things? The inner chest was full, whose profits increased by distributing them; in short, he poured out and did not lose. Therefore, whoever of you is poor, strive more to have inner riches, to have hearts full of virtues, justice, piety, charity, faith, hope. These are true riches, which you cannot lose even in a shipwreck. And let not the happiness of the wicked affect the good with sadness, may God relieve you from the days of evil. Evil days pass by, where this seems like perversity; and days will come when no evil person will be happy, and no good person will be unhappy.

Help the needy and you will lessen the burden. But you who are wealthy in this world, do what the Apostle advises: He says, "Let the rich be rich in good works; be generous." For why would it be difficult, when there is an abundance from which to give generously? I think that why they are called resources is as if they were called "ease"; for scarcity is often called difficulty. Therefore, let them give easily, share. Let them have for themselves, but give to the needy; both help their companion and relieve themselves. O rich man, the poor man has been made your companion in this life. You see him laboring by not having, you by having. He, not having, has no support; you, having much, have the burden. Help his need and lighten your load. This is why it is said: Share. For the same Apostle says in another place: "It is not that there might be relief for others and hardship for you." Therefore share. Let them have, but share what they have in abundance. They hold onto what is sufficient, and do not lose what they give. They will gain more than they hold, here they will leave it behind, or consume it on their own uses. But what they give, what happens to it, hear this. It follows: "Let them store up for themselves a good foundation for the future, so that they may lay hold on true life." What great thing is there that you have given, if in this place, where everything perishes, you have planned to move on? What you gave to the poor, you made them your carriers. Therefore, if you will be thus, you will not flourish as grass passing away in this world, but as an olive tree that is green even in winter, and it will be said of you: "But I am as a fruitful olive tree in the house of God." But as a fruitful olive tree in the house of God, see what follows: "I have trusted in the mercy of God, not in the uncertainty of riches."

Sermons - Sermon 26

SERMO 26

SERMON GIVEN IN THE THEODOSIAN BASILICA ON THE VERSE OF PSALM 94 AND OF THE WORDS OF THE APOSTLE:

"For if there had been a law given which could give life"

"In every way by the law there would be justice." AND ABOUT FREE WILL He made us, and not we ourselves. The psalm we have sung to God, and we have mutually exhorted each other to worship Him and to prostrate ourselves before Him and weep before the Lord who made us, admonishes us to seek a little more diligently what it means when it says: "Who made us." For no one doubts that man was created by God except one who is ungrateful. For we know, because we have read and we have believed, that God made man among many things that He made, in His own image. This is the first condition of man; this is the first human creation. However, I do not think that the Holy Spirit wanted to remind us of this greatly in this psalm when it says: "Let us weep before the Lord, who made us." For in another place, it says: "He made us, and not we ourselves." Hence indeed, as I said, no Christian doubts. Because not only did God create the first man from whom all men came, but God today also creates individual men, the One who said to a certain saint of His: "Before I formed you in the womb, I knew you." Therefore, God first created man without man, now He creates man from man. However, whether He created man without man or man from man, He made us, and not we ourselves. To this first and easy meaning of these words, which is still true, let us then worship Him, Brothers, and prostrate ourselves before Him, and weep before the Lord who made us. For He did not make and then abandon. He did not take care to create and then not care to preserve. Let us weep before the Lord, who made us, because we did not weep when He made us, and yet He made us. Therefore, if He made us before we asked, will He abandon us when we ask? As if man would doubt whether he would be heard when praying, Scripture admonished him when it says: "Let us weep before the Lord, who made us." Surely He hears those whom He made; surely He cannot neglect those whom He made. On the false doctrine of the Pelagians.

Nevertheless, with a deeper understanding, and as I think, a more useful perspective, the Holy Spirit saw some saying or about to say that God made them humans, but they made themselves just; foreseeing them, He admonished them and called them back from this arrogance, saying: "He made us, and not we ourselves." For why did He add: "And not we ourselves," when it would have been sufficient to say: "He made us"? Unless He wished to admonish about the work where men say: "We made ourselves," that is, "to be just, we made ourselves just by free will." When we were created, we received free will. Therefore, to be just, we act out of this free will. Why do we still call upon God to make us just, when we have it in our power to make ourselves just? Listen, listen: "And He made us just, and not we ourselves." The first man was created in a state without guilt, in a nature without flaw. He was created upright; he did not make himself upright. However, what he made himself is known: falling from the hand of the potter, he was shattered. For He who made him was governing him. He wanted to forsake Him by whom he was made. God permitted it, as if saying, "Let him forsake Me and find himself, and let his misery prove that he can do nothing without Me."

Man, once good, became evil through free will. In this way, therefore, God wished to show man what free will can do without God. O evil free will without God! We have experienced what it can do without God. Therefore, we have become miserable, because we have experienced what it is worth without God. Having therefore at last experienced, let us know, and come let us adore Him, and prostrate ourselves before Him. Come let us adore, and prostrate ourselves before Him, and weep before the Lord who made us. That He may restore us, ruined through ourselves, who made us. Behold, man was made good, and through free will, man was made evil. When will an evil man, abandoning God through free will, make himself good? A good man could not keep himself good, and will an evil man make himself good? When he was good, he did not keep himself good, and now that he is evil he says: "I make myself good"! What do you do, evil one, who perished as good, unless He who remains good restores you?

Man made in the image of the Creator.

He himself made us, and not we ourselves. We are his people and the sheep of his pasture. Behold, he made us, men, his people who made us. For having been created as men, we were not already his people. See, my brothers, and from the very words of the psalm, consider why he said, "He himself made us, and not we ourselves." Hence he said, "He made us, and not we ourselves, that we should be his people and the sheep of his pasture." He himself made us. For both pagans are born and all the impious, all the adversaries of his Church. He made them that they might be born. For no other god created them. Those who are born of pagans were made by him, were created by him. And they are not his people nor the sheep of his pasture. Nature is common to all, not grace. Nature is not to be considered grace, but if it is, because it too is granted freely. For no man who did not exist earned that he should be. If he earned it, he already was; but he was not yet. Therefore, he who would deserve it did not exist, and yet he was made. Nor was he made as cattle, nor as a tree, nor as a stone. But he was made in the image of the Creator. Who gave this benefit? God who was and was from eternity. To whom did he give it? To a man who did not yet exist. He who was, gave it, he who was not, received it. But who else could do this but he who calls those things which are not as though they were? About whom the Apostle says: Who chose us before the foundation of the world. He chose before the foundation of the world: we were made in this world, and the world was not when we were chosen. Unspeakable wonders, my brothers. Who could be sufficient to explain this? Who could at least think what to explain? Those who do not exist are chosen. Nor does he who chooses err, nor does he choose in vain. Yet he chooses, and he has elect ones, those he will create to be chosen. He has them with himself, not in his nature, but in his foreknowledge.

God made us His people.

Therefore, do not be proud. We are humans. He made us. We are faithful—if indeed we are when we dispute these things against grace—but behold, we are faithful. Even faithful, even just, because the just shall live by faith, He made us, and not we ourselves. I ask what He made us? You will say: "Humans." The psalm did not speak of that. We know that, it is known, it is obvious. Nor do we need great learning to know this, because He made us humans. But see what it was speaking of: He made us, and not we ourselves. What did He make us, except what we are? But what are we? We, behold what we are. What? His people, and the sheep of His pasture. He made us His people, He made us the sheep of His pasture. He who sent the innocent lamb to be slain made sheep out of wolves. This is grace. Apart from that common grace of nature by which we were made humans who did not exist nor were worthy because we did not exist; apart from that grace, this is the greater grace by which we were made His people and the sheep of His pasture, through Jesus Christ our Lord. But someone will say: "Through Jesus Christ, were we made so that we should also be human?" Indeed, through Jesus Christ even pagans were made. Not pagans, not so that they should be pagans, but so that they should be humans, through Jesus Christ they were made. For who is Jesus Christ, if not in the beginning the Word, and the Word was with God, and God was the Word? This was in the beginning with God. All things were made through him. Therefore, pagans also owe it to him that they were created as humans, and they are all the more to be punished, because they abandoned the one by whom they were made and worshipped what they themselves made.

One Mediator of God and men.

Therefore, except for that grace by which human nature was created—for this is common to both Christians and pagans—this is the greater grace: not that we were created by the Word as humans, but that we were made faithful by the Word made flesh. For there is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, in the beginning was the Word. Christ Jesus, the man, was not yet, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The world itself did not exist when God was the Word. All things were made through Him, and the world was made through Him. Therefore, then, when He made us to be humans, He was not yet a man. The Apostle more especially commends this grace to Christians where he says: For there is one God, and one mediator between God and men. He does not say: “Christ Jesus,” lest you might think it was said concerning the Word, but he added: man—The mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus. What is a mediator? Through whom we might be joined together, through whom we might be reconciled, because we lay separated by our own sins, we were in death, we were utterly lost. Christ was not man when man was created. So that man might not perish, He became man. The Pelagians deceitfully argue against the grace of God.

These things I say to you against the new heresy, which attempts to arise, that we may often be compelled to dispute, because we want you to be firm in good, and untouched by evil. For this is their argument, when they first began to arise and dispute against grace, attributing much not to the liberty of man, but to infirmity, and extolling the miserable, fallen man for the reason that he might not be able to rise with the hand extended from above. Therefore, disputing against grace for free will, they made an offense to pious and Catholic ears. They began to be abhorred, began to be avoided as certain perdition. It began to be said of them that they were disputing against grace. And they found such an invention to relieve this envy: "No," he says, "I do not dispute against grace." How do you prove it? "For this very reason," he says, "I do not dispute against the grace of God, because I defend free will." See the subtlety, but glass-like. It almost shines with vanity but is broken by truth. Notice how subtly it is concocted what they wanted to say. "For this very reason," he says, "because I defend the free will of man, and say that free will is sufficient for me to be just, I do not speak without the grace of God." The ears of the pious are alert. Now whoever hears this begins to rejoice: "Thanks be to God! He defends free will not without the grace of God. For there is free will, but it is worthless without the grace of God. If therefore they defend free will not without the grace of God, what harm do they say?" So, explain to us, o teacher, what grace you speak of. "When I say," he says, "the free will of man, see that I say it of man." What then? "Who created man? God. Who gave him free will? God. If therefore God created man, and God gave free will to man, whatever man can do by free will, to whose grace is it owed, if not to Him who created him with free will?" And this is said as if subtly by them.

Weak nature is not healed by the law.

However, see, my brothers, how they preach that general grace by which man was created, by which we are men. And indeed, we are men even together with the impious, but we are not Christians together with the impious. Therefore, this grace by which we are Christians, this we want them to preach, this we want them to recognize, this we want, concerning which the Apostle says: I do not nullify the grace of God. For if righteousness is through the law, then Christ died in vain. See whence the Apostle said this. He said of the law: If righteousness is through the law, then Christ died in vain. Since, therefore, righteousness was not through the law, hence Christ died, so that he who is not justified by the law may be justified by faith. For if, he says, there had been a law given which could give life, righteousness would indeed have been by the law, which we also mentioned yesterday, but Scripture concluded all under sin, that the promise—a promise, not a prediction; he who promised is the very same one who fulfills it—that the promise, I say, might be given by the faith of Jesus Christ to those who believe. Behold to what condition the grace of the Savior finds us, whom even the law could not heal. But why was the law given, if nature sufficed? Why was the law given if nature sufficed? And yet neither could the law suffice, so weak was nature itself. The law was given, but not one that could give life. Why then was it given? The Apostle says, the law was given because of transgression. It was given because of transgression, to make you a transgressor. "Why, to make me a transgressor?". Because God knew your pride. He knew that you were saying, "Oh if only there were one to teach me, oh if only there were one to show me!". See, the law says to you: You shall not covet. You learned the law saying: You shall not covet. Desire arose which you did not know. It was there, but it was not known. You began to try to conquer what was there, and what was hidden appeared. Proud one, through the law you became a transgressor. Acknowledge grace and be a praiser. The law, by itself good and holy, was given by God.

"But you ask, who gave the law?". There are vain and impious men who say the law was given by another but grace through our Lord Jesus Christ; as if the law were bad and perverse but grace were right. And they wish to distinguish the two Testaments in such a way that they say the Old Testament is from some prince of darkness, but the New Testament from the Lord God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. Listen to Paul himself. If you think that for this reason the law was given by another, not by God, because through it you became a transgressor, listen to the same Apostle, a praiser of the law. "So," he says, "the law is holy, and the commandment holy." Add: "and just." Add further: "and good." "What then is good," he says, "has become death to me? Far from it! But sin, in order that it might be shown to be sin." For it was sin, but sin was hiding. When was sin hiding? When it did not yet make you suffer as an adversary. You began to strive, and the one who held you appeared. When you followed, you did not feel the chain. You sought refuge and the bond appeared. You wished to flee, and you began to be dragged. Therefore, since you began to be dragged, let him who is not bound help you. Who is not bound, but the one who said: "If you find sin in me, say so"? Who is not bound, but the one who said: "Behold, the prince of this world comes, and in me he will find nothing"? Why should he kill me, he will find nothing, because death is justly due to sin. Why then do you die? "So that all may know," he says, "that I do the will of my Father." He himself loosens, who is not bound. He himself frees from the dead, who is free among the dead.

Elisha, a type of the Lord Jesus Christ. But he himself sent the law. Through his servant, the law; through himself, grace. Consider Elisha in a great and high mystery, acting as a prophet, not only speaking as one. The son of his hostess was dead. What did the dead boy signify, if not Adam? It was reported to the holy Prophet, bearing in prophecy the type of Lord Jesus Christ. He sent his servant with his staff and said to him: Go, go, place it on the dead boy. He went, like an obedient servant. The Prophet knew what he had done. He placed the staff on the dead boy, and he did not rise. For if there had been a law given that could give life, righteousness would indeed have been by the law. Therefore the law could not give life. The great one came to the small, the savior to the saved, the living to the dead. He himself came. And what did he do? He contracted his youthful limbs, as if emptying himself to take the form of a servant. Thus, he contracted his youthful limbs, he fitted himself to the small one, so that he might make the body of our humility conform to the body of his glory. Therefore, in this type of Christ prophetically expressed, the dead was raised, as the impious was justified.

We have been created and re-created by the grace of God.

Let this grace be proclaimed. This is the grace of Christians through the Mediator, through the one who suffered and rose again, who ascended into heaven and led captivity captive and gave gifts to men. This, I say, let grace be proclaimed. Against this grace let not the ungrateful dispute. A prophetic staff was not sufficient for the dead. Could a dead nature be sufficient? And let us acknowledge that by which we have been created, although we have not read it called by this name in any way, yet because it was given freely, let us acknowledge it as grace. But let us show you that the grace by which we are Christians is greater. Pay attention. Before we were created, we deserved no good, and therefore grace, by which we were created, when we deserved nothing good. If therefore grace is great when we deserved no good, how much greater is grace when we deserved so much evil? He who was not yet did not deserve any good; a sinner deserved evil. He who was not yet, was not yet, but he had not offended. He who was not yet was made; he offended and was saved. He who was not yet hoped for nothing, was made. But having fallen, he expected damnation and was liberated. This is grace through Jesus Christ our Lord. He made us, and before we were at all He made us, and having been made and fallen, He made us righteous, and not we ourselves. Therefore, if any new creature is in Christ, the old has passed away, the new has come. On the power which the potter has over the clay.

There was one mass of perdition from Adam to which only punishment was owed. Vessels were made from that same mass in honor. For the potter has power, from the same mass. Which mass? Certainly it had already perished, certainly that mass was already owed just condemnation. Rejoice because you have escaped. Indeed, you have escaped the death owed, and found the life not owed. The potter has power from the same mass to make one vessel for honor, another for dishonor. But you say: "Why did he make me for honor, and another for dishonor?" What shall I answer? You are going to hear Augustine, since you do not listen to the Apostle who says: O man, who are you to answer God? Two little ones were born. If you seek what is owed, the mass of perdition holds both. But why does the mother carry one to grace, and suffocate the other while sleeping? Will you tell me what merit he had who was carried to grace, what merit he had whom the mother suffocates while sleeping? Neither deserved any good. But the potter has power from the same mass to make one vessel for honor, another for dishonor. Do you wish to argue with me? Rather, marvel with me, and exclaim with me: O depth of riches! Both let us tremble, both let us cry out: O depth of riches! Let us both agree in fear, lest we perish in error. O depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! Search the unsearchable, do the impossible, corrupt the incorruptible, see the invisible.

We have received everything from God. His judgments are unsearchable. You have heard, let it suffice for you. And his ways are inscrutable. For who has known the mind of the Lord, or who has been his counselor? Or who has given him anything first, and it will be repaid to him? Who has given first, when everything was received freely? Who gave him first, and it will be repaid to him? If the Lord wished to repay, he would repay nothing but due punishment. They gave nothing, so that it would be repaid to them. For nothing you will save them. Who gave him first, as if by the merit of their deeds? Who gave him first, who preceded the grace that is given freely? If any merit precedes grace, it is no longer given freely, but is rendered as a debt. But if it is not given freely, why is it called grace? Who then gave him first, and it will be repaid to him? For from him, and through him, and in him are all things. Certainly, unless all the good things we have received from him, and we have received them to be good? For every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, coming down from the Father of lights, with whom there is no change. For you have changed for the worse. With whom there is no change, he has come to help. With whom there is not even a shadow of turning, for you lie in the darkness of your night. Therefore, all things are from him. No one gave him anything first, no one demands a debt. By grace you are saved through faith, and this is not from yourselves, it is the gift of God.

Recognize the benefits of the Shepherd and do not follow the wolves of error.

"But it moves me, you say, that he perishes, he is baptized. It moves me, it moves me like a man." If you wish to hear the truth, it moves me too because I am a man. But if you are a man, and I am a man, let us both listen to the one who says: O man! Certainly, if we are moved because we are men, the Apostle speaks to the very weak and infirm human nature saying: O man, who are you to answer back to God? Will the thing formed say to him who formed it: Why did you make me thus? If an animal could speak and said to God: "Why did you make this man, and me an animal?"; wouldn't you rightly be angry and say: "O animal, who are you to answer back to God?" And you are a man, but to God you are like an animal. And would that you be his animal and the sheep of his pasture. Recognize the benefits of the shepherd, and do not follow the wolves of error. We were wolves. We too were by nature children of wrath like the others. But the sheep died, and made us sheep. Behold the Lamb of God, behold him who takes away the sin, not of this one or that one, but of the world. Therefore, nothing of what we are, Brothers, because we are something, if indeed we are something, in his faith, let us ascribe nothing to ourselves, so that we do not lose what we have received. But in what we have received, let us give him glory, let us honor him, let him shower down his own seeds. What would our land have, unless he had sown it? But he also gives rain. He does not abandon what he has sown. The Lord will give sweetness, and our land will give its fruit. Turned to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 260

SERMO 260 HELD ON THE SAME DAY IN THE LEONTIAN CHURCH OF THE WARNINGS FOR THE BAPTIZED What has been reborn in you, do not suffocate by living badly.

Let us not delay, as we are about to do many things, to those regenerated in Baptism, who today are to be mingled with the people, a brief but serious talk must be given. You who have been baptized, and today complete the sacrament of your octave, briefly understand and grasp that the figure of circumcision of the flesh was translated to the circumcision of the heart. On the eighth day, they are circumcised in the flesh according to the old Law: and this is because of the Lord Christ, who, after the seventh day of the Sabbaths, rose on the eighth, the Lord’s Day. It was ordered to circumcise with stone knives: the Rock was Christ. You are called infants, because you have been reborn, and have entered a new life, and have been reborn to eternal life, if you do not suffocate what has been reborn in you by living badly. You have been rendered to the peoples, you have been mingled with the people of the faithful: beware lest you imitate the bad faithful, indeed the false faithful; as if professing to be faithful, but living badly and unfaithfully. See, because I testify to you before God and His Angels: keep chastity, whether marital, or of complete continence. Each should render what he has vowed. You who do not have wives, it is permitted for you to take wives, but of those whose husbands do not live. Women who do not have husbands, it is permitted for them to marry, but to those men whose wives do not live. You who have wives, do nothing evil except with your wives. Render what you demand. Faith is owed to you, you owe faith. The husband owes faith to the wife, the wife to the husband; both owe it to God. Whoever has vowed continence, render what you have vowed: because it would not be required if you had not vowed. What was once permissible, is not permitted: not because marriages are condemned, but because he who looks back is condemned. Beware of fraud in your business. Beware of lies and perjury. Beware of verbosity and luxury. Whatever you do not want to be done to you, do not do to others, both to people and to God. Why should I burden you? Do these things, and the God of peace will be with you.

Sermons - Sermon 260A

SERMON 260/A

ON THE OCTAVE OF EASTER - TO THE INFANTS A new life begins in the sacrament, it will be perfected in heaven. My address is to you, newly born infants, little ones in Christ, new offspring of the Church, the grace of the father, the fertility of the mother, a devout sprout, a new swarm, the flower of our honor and the fruit of our labor, my joy and my crown, all who stand in the Lord. I speak to you with Apostolic words: Behold, the night has passed, and the day has drawn near; cast off the works of darkness, and put on the armor of light; walk honorably as in the day: not in revelries and drunkenness, not in lewdness and debauchery, not in strife and jealousy; but put on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make no provision for the flesh to fulfill its lusts, so that you may also put on life, whom you have clothed in the sacrament. For as many of you as were baptized into Christ have clothed yourselves with Christ. There is no Jew nor Greek, there is no slave nor free, there is no male and female; for you are all one in Christ Jesus. This, indeed, is the power of the sacrament: for the sacrament is of new life, which in this time begins with the remission of all past sins, but it will be perfected in the resurrection of the dead. For you have been buried with Christ through baptism into death, so that, just as Christ was raised from the dead, so you too may walk in newness of life. But you walk now by faith, while in this mortal body you are far from the Lord; but Christ Jesus himself, who deigned to become one of us, is the sure way for you to whom you strive. For he has preserved great sweetness for those who fear him, and he will reveal and perfect it for those who hope in him, when we receive in reality what we now have accepted in hope. We are children of God, and it has not yet appeared what we shall be. We know that when he appears, we shall be like him, because we shall see him as he is. He himself promised this in the Gospel: He who loves me, he said, keeps my commandments. And he who loves me shall be loved by my Father, and I will love him and will reveal myself to him. Surely those to whom he spoke saw him, but in the form of a servant, in which the Father is greater, not in the form of God, in which he is equal to the Father. He showed this to those who feared, he preserved that for those who hoped; he appeared in this to those who were wandering, he called those who would dwell with him to that; he laid this before those who were walking, he promised that to those who would reach it.

Baptism is not repeated in a heretic or apostate.

Having therefore these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all defilement of flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God. I beseech you to walk worthily of the calling with which you have been called, with all humility of mind and gentleness, bearing with one another in love, earnestly striving to preserve the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. For what manner of thing is it, from which we have received such a pledge? But there are some who have put on Christ only by the sacrament, in whom both faith and morals are barren. For many heretics too have the same sacrament of baptism, but do not have the same fruit of salvation, nor the bond of peace, having, as the Apostle says, the form of godliness but denying the power thereof, either marked by deserters or themselves also deserters, bearing the mark of a good king in condemned flesh; who say to us: If we are not faithful, why do you offer us baptism? If we are already faithful, why do you seek us? As if they do not read that Simon Magus also received baptism and yet heard from Peter: You have no part or portion in this faith. Behold, it is possible that someone may have the baptism of Christ and not have the faith or love of Christ; he may have the sacrament of holiness and yet not be counted in the lot of the saints. Nor does it matter, as far as the sacrament itself is concerned, whether someone receives the baptism of Christ where there is no unity of Christ; for even someone baptized in the Church, if he becomes a deserter from the Church, will lack the holiness of life, but will not lack the seal of the sacrament. For it is shown that he could not lose what is not given back when he returns; just as a deserter from the army lacks lawful fellowship, but does not lack the royal mark. If he then signs another with the same mark, he does not make him a companion in life, but a companion in punishment; but if he returns to legal and orderly service and the other comes too, with the royal severity appeased, pardon is granted to him who deserted, and he who comes is received: in both, the fault is corrected, in both, the punishment is remitted, in both, peace is given, in none, what was signed is repeated. The blessings which the heretic, even if baptized, lacks, are innumerable.

Now therefore they should not say to us: What will you give us, if we already have baptism? For they speak so ignorantly that they do not even want to read what the Holy Scripture attests, that in the very Church itself, that is, in the communion of the members of Christ, many baptized in Samaria did not receive the Holy Spirit but were only baptized, until the Apostles came to them from Jerusalem; on the other hand, Cornelius, and those who were with him, deserved to receive the Holy Spirit before they received the sacrament of baptism. Thus, God taught that the sign of salvation is one thing, and salvation itself is another; that the form of piety is one thing, and the virtue of piety is another. What will you give us, they say, if we already have baptism? O sacrilegious vanity, to think so little of Christ's Church, which they do not have, that they believe they will receive nothing if they join its communion! Let the prophet Amos say to them: Woe to those who do nothing for Zion! What will I receive, he says, if I already have baptism? You will receive the Church, which you do not have; you will receive unity, which you do not have; you will receive peace, which you do not have. Or if these things seem nothing to you, fight, deserter, against your emperor who says: He who does not gather with me scatters. Fight against his Apostle, or rather even against him who spoke through the Apostle, who says: Bearing with one another in love, endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. Count what he has said: forbearance, love, unity of spirit, peace. The Spirit is there, the worker of all these, whom you do not have. Did you bear with one another, you who have seceded from the Church? Whom did you love, when you deserted the members of Christ? What unity do you have in sacrilegious separation? What peace in nefarious dissension? Far be it from us that these things are nothing, but you yourself are nothing without these. If you disdain to receive these in the Church, you may indeed have baptism, but you have it for greater punishment, whatever you have without these: for the baptism of Christ, which would be a supporter of your salvation with these, is a witness of your iniquity without these. The sacrament of baptism requires a new life. But you, holy children, members of the Catholic Church, received baptism not for another purpose, but for a different one; for you received it not for punishment, but for life; not for destruction, but for salvation; not for condemnation, but for honor. For at the same time you also received the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace; if, however, and I wish, hope, exhort, and beseech, that you may keep what you received intact, and by advancing, come to greater things. Today is the eighth day of your birth; today the seal of faith is completed in you, which among the ancient fathers was performed in the circumcision of the flesh on the eighth day of physical birth; for the shedding of mortality in that human member through which man is born to die was symbolized. Hence, the Lord Himself by rising, shedding the mortality of the flesh, and not indeed creating another but nonetheless raising the body beyond death, marked the Lord's Day in His resurrection, which is the third day after His passion, but in the number of days after the Sabbath it is the eighth, and also the first. Therefore, you too, not yet in reality but already in assured hope, because you have both the sacrament of this matter and have received the pledge of the Spirit, if you have risen with Christ, seek things that are above, where Christ is seated at the right hand of God; seek the things that are above, not those on earth. For you have died, and your life is hidden with Christ in God. When Christ, your life, appears, then you also will appear with Him in glory.

Sermons - Sermon 260B

Sermon 260/B SERMON GIVEN ON THE DAYS OF THE OCTAVE OF EASTER In which he particularly addresses infants.

All these things happened to them as an example. The discourse certainly pertains to all, by which a good life is prescribed and commended, so that eternal life may be obtained and received; nevertheless, we particularly address you, young shoots of holiness, regenerated from water and Spirit, planted and nurtured through our ministry in the field of God, who gives the increase. Thus you should regard yourselves as having been liberated from Egypt from harsh servitude, in which iniquity ruled over you; and also as having passed through the Red Sea, namely through baptism marked by the blood of Christ's cross. Consider the enemies who pursued you from behind, as past sins: for, just as the Egyptians perished when the people of God crossed, so they have been wiped out for you who are baptized. Now therefore seek the heavenly kingdom, to which you have been called, as the promised land; and while traveling through this earthly life, as through a wilderness, resist temptations vigilantly. For you receive your manna from the participation of the holy altar, and you drink from the rock. The apostle Paul, reminding and preaching all this in his teaching, says: I do not want you to be unaware, brothers, that all our fathers were under the cloud, and all passed through the sea, and all were baptized into Moses in the cloud and in the sea, and all ate the same spiritual food, and all drank the same spiritual drink; for they drank from the spiritual rock which followed them, and the rock was Christ. Certainly, by these apostolic words, you clearly recognize that we have not suggested this from our own conjecture, but from what we have been taught by the holy Scripture and conveyed to your ears and minds.

Let the Apostle admonishing be listened to. But as I have admonished saying, resist temptations vigilantly, observe what the same Apostle consequently and terribly says: But with most of them, God was not well pleased; for they were overthrown in the desert. Now these things were made as examples for us, so that we should not desire evil things, as they also desired; nor serve idols, as some of them did, as it is written, the people sat down to eat and drink, and rose up to play. Neither let us commit fornication, as some of them committed, and fell in one day twenty-three thousand. Neither let us tempt Christ, as some of them tempted Him, and perished by the serpents. Neither murmur, as some of them murmured, and perished by the destroyer. All these things happened to them as examples: and they were written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the ages are come.

Cleave to the Redeemer so that you may reach the Kingdom.

Therefore, dearest ones, avoiding the preceding evil examples, imitate those who pleased God, not those who perished by offending God. For what benefit was it to escape from the Egyptians through the Red Sea and perish in the desert by serpents? Thus it is with those who, baptized and freed from past sins, neglect so great a grace and, intercepted by the venomous bites of deadly seductions, cannot reach the promised life. Fleeing the examples of these, adhere with persevering obedience to Him who redeemed you, so that you might reach the kingdom; not as it was given to the first people in the shadow of the future, but where with Christ there will be no end, you will live in eternal happiness.

Sermons - Sermon 260C

Sermon 260/C On the Lord's Day of the Octave of Holy Easter When a new offspring is born to Mother Church, we rejoice.

Neither new nor unheard of, but evident to your faith, I do not doubt, just as we are born carnally from parents, so we are born spiritually from God the Father and Mother Church. However, the same Lord God is both our creator from those parents and our recreator from Himself and the Church. In that generation, the bond of sin is contracted; in this one, it is dissolved. There we are born to succeed our dying parents; here, to remain united to them forever. Accordingly, if the children of men rejoice with fraternal love for their siblings born into the household, even more so should we, born from the same blood, congratulate those who are partakers of light rather than resent the division of inheritance. How much more, then, and more sincerely should we rejoice, since the same children of men by the grace of holy baptism are reborn as children of their Creator, when we are born to that inheritance which is whole for its heirs and entire for each individual? "The Lord," he says, "is the portion of my inheritance." Therefore, if, as the prophet David says, our inheritance is God Himself, and as the apostle John says: "God is love;" and as the apostle Paul says: "Love envies not;" the more coheirs and partners we see born to obtain such an inheritance, the more abundantly we rejoice with love, because love itself is proposed to be possessed by them. For where the inheritance is love itself, it indicates that one is not an heir who does not love his coheir. Therefore, those things which, with the help of the Lord, we are to speak to those for whom today completes the eighth day of baptism, embrace all the more willingly as you rejoice that they are joined to you in newfound brotherhood; and at the same time, let even the catechumens, whom the Church their mother has already conceived by some sacrament, be urged by the desire of new light, and hurry to be perfected and born.

Baptism was prefigured in the flood. The solemnity of the octave days, which has beneficially subjected the nations throughout the whole world to the name of Christ, is most devotedly celebrated by all those regenerated through His baptism. Therefore, let us, with the Lord's help, attempt to recount in a few words what it means and what the reason for such a mystery is. Let your Christian learning consider with me what accords with the rules of our faith. For who does not know that the earth was once cleansed from iniquities by the flood, and that the mystery of the holy baptism, by which all the sins of man are washed away through water, was already preached at that time when the ark, made of incorruptible woods, which was a figure of the Church, contained only eight people? Therefore, what the number eight of people testified in the waters of the flood, by which sins were extinguished, is also testified in the waters of baptism, by which sins are washed away, by the number eight of days. For acts that carry significant meaning are compared to the sounds of our voice; just as one and the same thing can be spoken in various words and languages, so one and the same thing is usually signified not only by voices but also by many and varied figured acts without any change in meaning. For this reason, it is not because there are eight people there but eight days here that something different is being announced, but rather the same thing is signified differently, with different signs as though with different letters.

Sustained by the hope of eternal life, let us endure present hardships.

Therefore, the number eight prefigures things pertaining to the future age, where nothing fails or progresses in the sequence of time, but persists in a stable beatitude. And since the times of this age pass away in a repeated cycle of seven days, that day is rightly called the eighth, wherein after temporal labors, the saints arrive, distinguishing action and rest without any vicissitude of light and night; but for them, there will be perpetual vigilant rest, and action that is leisurely without sluggishness but tireless. Just as for the saints, after the passage of the sevenfold time, the eighth day is eternal happiness, so for the wicked, after passing through the same sevenfold duration, the eighth is penal judgment. Desiring to be freed from this, the one in the sixth Psalm, which is titled for the eighth, sorrowfully cites his weakness and says: “O Lord, do not reprove me in your anger, nor discipline me in your wrath.” Again, in the eleventh Psalm, where the title is similarly for the eighth, it is shown that for the very reward of eternal life, all adversities of this age must be tolerated; lest when iniquity begins to abound, love waxes cold, and he who does not persevere to the end cannot be saved. For when anyone wishes to rest in other people and finds in many, where he least expected, deceptions and deceits and vain arrogance, it is good for him to look to the eighth and eternal day, where his secure joy will not be wounded by any companionship with the wicked, and here he should groan and pray with tears: “Save me, Lord, for the godly one is gone; for the truths are diminished among the sons of men”; for thus the Psalm itself begins. But let him pray with certain hope according to the last words of the same Psalm; for it ends thus: “You, Lord, will keep us and guard us from this generation forever”; as if beginning from the seventh and leading into the eighth, from glory to glory as by the Lord’s Spirit. In what the Sabbath differs from the eighth day. For what is it that elsewhere through the Prophet he promises peace upon peace, unless it be that the Sabbath, which is signified on the seventh day, although it is contained in the same temporal cycle of days, nevertheless has rest promised to the saints on this earth; where no violent storm of this age disturbs them, resting in their God after good works? In order to signify this long before, after He had made all things very good, He Himself also rested on the seventh day. Was it for some other reason that it is written in the book of the holy Job: “Six times shall I deliver thee out of necessity, and in the seventh evil shall not touch thee”? But that day no longer has an evening, because without any incursion and overshadowing of sorrow, which is often confounded by the mixed company of wicked men, it transitions the saints into the eighth day, that is, eternal blessedness. For it is one thing to rest in the Lord during the continuation of time itself, which is signified by the seventh day, that is the Sabbath; but it is another to transcend all time, and to be united with the creator of time without any end, which is signified by the eighth day, which, not revolving together with the others, declares itself to be an indication of eternity. For indeed, with these seven continually revolving in succession, the course of all times is completed. But the friends of this world are not figured by the significations of these days; for they do not desire rest on the Sabbath of the seventh day, from which their intent might also be extended into the eternal eighth; rather, given to transitory celebrations, having deserted the creator, they fall into the worship of the creature and become impious. Hence he who sings for the eighth follows this rightly; and when he had said: “You, O Lord, will preserve us and keep us from this generation forever,” he immediately added: “The impious walk in a circle”; subjected, of course, to temporal matters, being ignorant of eternal wisdom.

We must strive for exaltation through the path of humility. And indeed in these days, in which a certain significance is symbolized, the eighth, which is the first, is likewise found. For the same is called the first of the Sabbath, the Lord's Day; but that first withdraws when the second succeeds. In that truth, which this eighth and first signifies, both the first is eternity, which we deserted by sinning in the origin of the first parents, and we came into this mortality; and the last, as it were, the eighth, which after the resurrection is regained when the last enemy, death, is destroyed, so that this corruptible might put on incorruption, and this mortal might put on immortality; and the returning son may receive the first robe, which after the labor of a long journey, and the pasturing of swine, and the other hardships of mortal life, and the cycles of the seven times, the same newest and as it were eighth is restored. Therefore, not undeservedly, our Lord Himself on the same first and also eighth Lord's Day, deigned to demonstrate in his own flesh the example of bodily resurrection; who no longer dies, and death shall no longer have dominion over him. To which exaltation through humility we must strive. For proposing it to the two disciples who sought it, and desiring one to sit on his right and the other on his left, he said: Can you drink the chalice that I am to drink? So that they might understand, that the way to highness begins from the valley of tears; nor could they be made worthy to attain to the pinnacle of heaven, unless they first did not disdain the reproach of the cross.

Let our mind's intention be directed to the eighth, or eternal day. For even the last verse of the eleventh Psalm, whose title begins "For the eighth", is fittingly understood as being spoken to the same Lord Jesus Christ, who, making the sons of men through Himself, both the Son of God and the Son of Man, as sons of God, multiplies them on this earth few in number due to the abundance of sins, and as grains on a threshing floor in the multitude of chaff, which seems to be everywhere as if it were alone, hiding and almost not appearing, He multiplies them in the heavenly Jerusalem according to His height, calling those things which are not as though they were. And from what height? Because blindness in part has happened to Israel, that the fullness of the Gentiles might come in, and so all Israel will be saved. It was exclaimed by the Apostle saying: "Oh, the depth of the riches and wisdom and knowledge of God!" Therefore, let us not seek the ruinous heights of temporal exaltations. For we are dead, and our life is hidden with Christ in God; when Christ, who is our life, appears, then we also will appear with Him in glory. Therefore, let the intention persevere in the eighth, where after all cycles of times the wicked walk. Since our conversation in hope precedes in heaven, let us live with Christ, in Christ, as equals of the angels of God, and made partakers of that eternity, He who did not refuse to become a partaker of our mortality. For as in the eighth sacrament, after seven days comes the eighth, so in the sacrament of Pentecost, after seven weeks, which we conclude on the forty-ninth day, the same eighth is added, to complete fifty; one in the smaller number, and the same one in the greater. For eternity, of which this eighth day is a sign, can neither be increased nor decreased; and there it is always today, for nothing succeeds something that is passing away. And that eternal day neither begins from the end of yesterday, nor ends at the beginning of tomorrow, but it is always today; for all past things have passed in that day without setting, and all future things will come in that day without rising.

Cleave to the good and choose the narrow path for yourselves.

Forgetting what is past, therefore, and reaching out to what lies ahead, following the aim towards the prize of the heavenly calling, dearest brothers and children, even when you put on the signs of the sacraments, always carry in your heart the hope of this eternal day; and change your clean garments, through which in the newness of your life a bright seed is written in your memory as a visible word, in such a way that you do not change what they signify, shining with the light of faith and truth; let them not be stained with any filth of perverse morals: so that on that day you may not be found naked, and may pass from the glory of faith to the glory of appearance without any difficulty. Moreover, since what is solemnly done today, once you have mingled with the people outside these barriers, by which spiritual infancy distinguished you from others, adhere to the good; and remember that evil communications corrupt good manners; be sober, just, and do not sin. For I have betrothed you to one man, to present you as a chaste virgin to Christ; and I fear that as the serpent deceived Eve by his craftiness, so your minds might be corrupted from the chastity of God, which is in Christ. Friendship with this world adulterates souls, and makes them fornicate from the one true and legitimate spouse, from whom you received the ring of the Holy Spirit. Beware of the broad path that leads to destruction, and many are those who walk through it; do not fail on the narrow path, whose end is eternal broadness. And if ever, which by the fluctuations of this life's necessities must happen, you fall into various temptations, and are beset by the iniquities of many men, with the perseverance of faith and the joy of hope and the fervor of charity, sing for the octave, and say: Save me, O Lord, for the holy one has failed; because the truths have diminished from the sons of men; each one has spoken vain things to his neighbor. The sons of man are made sons of God through Christ. But you, sons of men, now made sons of God, how long will you be heavy-hearted? Do not love vanity and seek falsehood, and you will give no place to the devil. Nor should each one of you, when amidst the tumults of temptations and scandals remains unwaveringly attached to Christ, and having embraced the word of God stands immovable, think that he alone is the single grain, because he does not see, surrounded everywhere by chaff, the companions of his granary. Let him consider that even in those times, before the blood of Christ was shed on the earth, the price of the world, the holy Elijah said: I alone am left; it was answered: I have reserved for myself seven thousand men who have not bowed their knees to Baal. These seven thousand, when they were still being threshed on the floor of this world, had not yet touched each other in the mass; and therefore each one seemed to himself to be alone. There is a richer mass among all nations, which will be preserved for the Lord, and will be kept from this generation and forever; because with a hidden counsel according to His own depth, He will multiply the sons of men.

Sermons - Sermon 260D

Sermon 260/D TREATISE ON THE LORD'S DAY OF THE OCTAVE OF HOLY EASTER We were once darkness, but now light in the Lord. On the first day of the Lord your Love must recognize this: that before these eight days we sang to the Lord what we sing today: This is the day which the Lord has made. For which day has the Lord not made? But by the name of the day, the Spirit of God wished to commend a certain special work of God. And what is better among all the works of God than a faithful man? For as we mentioned to you on that day, in the first works of the world, God said: Let there be light, and there was light. And God divided the light from the darkness; and He called the light Day, and the darkness Night. Therefore, if He called the light Day, undoubtedly those to whom the Apostle says: You were once darkness, but now you are light in the Lord, are Day. All the saints, all the faithful, and therefore all the just - because the just shall live by faith - all together in the most harmonious unity are Day; and the unity of all is one Day. For how could it not be one day, of which it is said in the Acts of the Apostles: They had one soul and one heart in the Lord? Clearly, God also divided among men between Day and Night, between Light and Darkness; giving eternity to the Light and damnation to the Darkness. It is not yet apparent, but God has already divided. A man lives wickedly, and perhaps in the predestination of God, he is Light: and another lives well, and perhaps in predestination, he is Night. God therefore divided, and He keeps this division hidden, lest Day should grow proud and become Night. For there are some who wish to attribute to their own virtue that they are just, and with an infernal heart and sacrilegious mouth dare to say: God made us men, but we made ourselves just. If they make themselves just, this is not the day which the Lord has made. Therefore let the faithful, made light out of darkness, to whom the Apostle says: You were once darkness, but now you are light in the Lord; say with the Apostle himself: I am not worthy to be called an Apostle, because I persecuted the Church of God. Behold Night, behold Darkness. When he persecuted the Church of God, darkness was over the abyss. The Lord called him from above: Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me? He cast off the darkness, and light rose; he began to preach whom he had persecuted, and said: I am not worthy to be called an Apostle, because I persecuted the Church of God. Whence then do you have what you are? By the grace of God, I am what I am. This is the day which the Lord has made.

We who are called faithful, let us live faithfully.

I therefore address you, who are one day infants ill-born of Adam, well reborn in Christ. See that you are the day, see that the Lord has made you. He has driven the darkness of sins from your hearts, he has renewed your life. You are to be mixed today with the number of peoples: choose whom you will imitate, do not choose for yourselves the lost, with whom you will perish. Do not say: Why, this one is not faithful? and he gets drunk. Why, this one is not faithful? and he has a wife, and also a concubine. Why, this one is not faithful? and daily swears lying for profit. Why, this one is not faithful? and gives his money at interest. Why, this one is not faithful? and consults a witch. Why, this one is not faithful? and when his head aches, he ties charms to his neck; and he who does not want to die, ties it to his neck. If you say these things, you perish. I give you testimony before God and his angels; what was ours, we gave what we received; neither did we give it, but it was given through us. The Lord's money is: we are administrators, not givers. We have a common Lord, we measure out food for fellow-servants: from that very barn we live. We are not our own, but his who shed his blood for us. We were redeemed together, we all have one price: our grain is the holy Gospel. He made us brothers from servants, who redeemed us: he made us coheirs. He was one, and he deemed it worthy to have brothers: do not forget this dignity, beloved. You are called faithful, live faithfully: keep faith with your Lord in your heart and your manners. Do not mingle yourselves with evil manners in the crowd of evil Christians. See what I say: be grains. Chaff abounds on the threshing floor, but the winnowing is coming, the chaff will be separated; neither does a single straw enter the barn with you, nor does a single grain go into the fire. He knows how to separate, who was able to gather; you err if you think the Lord errs. He knows you, who created you, and recreated you; for if he had only created you, and not recreated you, you would enter into the mass of perdition. Am I telling you, my brothers, that you cannot find Christians living well? Far be it from me to think this of my Lord's threshing floor. If this is so, why do I labor? See the good ones, whom you can imitate: be, and you will find. But if you begin to be evil, you will believe that all are evil; and it is a lie, you are deceived. You look far at the threshing floor, therefore only chaff meets you: approach, search, fill your hand, apply the judgment of the mouth; all that flies away is shaken out from there, and what is heavy remains. You will find good Christians, believe me; good married couples, showing faith to their wives; good married women, showing faith to their husbands. Seek and you will find: be, and you will not miss it. Like meets like. Are you a grain? you apply yourself to grain. Are you chaff? you apply yourself to chaff. You will find those who do not give their money at interest, you will find those who hate fraud more than loss: you will find these. Begin to be, and you will see how many there are. They are few, but in comparison to many. It will be winnowed, and it is a mass. He will winnow, who carries the winnowing fan in his hand.

Just now, beloved, I also address you, who are long baptized, baptized last year, baptized in previous years, and I address you; go by the same way, by which you may not perish, if they wish to follow. For it will pertain to your judgment, if with your evil habits you are destroyed and lost.

Sermons - Sermon 260E

Sermon 260/E The martyrs, then, are witnesses to this fact, that the resurrection of Christ is true, and that they have seen it with their own eyes; they bear witness to what they saw, not by lying, but through suffering.

TRACTATE ON THE LORD'S DAY OF THE OCTAVE OF HOLY EASTER Christ, not received by his own, is acknowledged as Lord by the nations. The blessed Apostles, when they performed miracles and healings in the name of Christ, were zealously prohibited by the Jews from speaking in His name, who had chosen them and granted them to be such. But they replied saying: If it is just in the sight of God to listen to you more than to God, judge for yourselves; for we cannot but speak of what we have seen and heard. They professed themselves as witnesses of Christ; however, those who are called "witnesses" in Latin are called "martyrs" in Greek. Saying therefore: We cannot but speak what we have seen and heard, they scorned the prohibition of men to have the blessing of God. They saw and heard: What about us? We too must preach. But we have not seen. Surely, let us preach what we have heard; because the Apostle says: Therefore, faith comes from hearing, and hearing through the word of Christ. Judea saw Christ the Lord in the flesh, the nations did not see; yet, not seeing, they heard and believed; seeing, they despised and killed. Therefore, we were to hear, not to see; however, the vision is preserved for us, so that what we now believe, we may see at the end of the world. That same Lord foresaw us, when He said in prophecy: The people whom I did not know have served me; those whom I have known resisted me, those whom I did not know have served me. However, from where did the people serve you whom you did not know, that is, to whom you did not show the presence of your flesh, to whose eyes you did not display your scars after the resurrection, how did they serve you? Continue, and hear: By the hearing of the ear they have obeyed me.

Let us proclaim Christ wherever we can.

Therefore, you also say: We cannot speak and preach what we have not heard about the Lord Christ. Let each one preach wherever he can, and he is a martyr. Sometimes, however, a person does not endure persecution and fears shame. It happens that he dines, for example, among pagans and is ashamed to be called a Christian. If he fears the diner, how can he despise the persecutor? Therefore, preach Christ wherever you can, to whomsoever you can, however you can. Faith is required of you, not eloquence: let faith speak from you, and Christ speaks. For if there is faith in you, Christ dwells in you. You have heard the Psalm: I believed, therefore I have spoken. He could not believe and remain silent. He is ungrateful to the one who fills, who does not pour out: therefore whoever is filled, ought to pour out. For such a fountain is born in him, which knows how to pour out, does not know how to dry up: It will become in him a fountain of water springing up to eternal life. You preach confidently, because you do not lie about the fountain of truth: you have received, what you belch forth on your tongue. For if you wish to speak from your own self, you will be liars; the Psalm itself says this: I said in my haste: Every man is a liar. What is: Every man is a liar? Every Adam is a liar. Strip yourself of Adam, and put on Christ, and you will not be a liar. Let this suffice your Charity, for many things must be done.

Sermons - Sermon 261

SERMO 261 SERMON GIVEN AT CARTHAGE IN THE BASILICA OF FAUSTUS Fortieth day of the Ascension of the Lord Jesus Christ Let us ascend with Christ, having hearts uplifted. The resurrection of the Lord, our hope; the ascension of the Lord, our glorification. For today we celebrate the solemnities of the Ascension. Therefore, if rightly, if faithfully, if devoutly, if holily, if piously we celebrate the ascension of the Lord, let us ascend with Him, and lift up our hearts. But let us not be puffed up while ascending, for we should have our hearts lifted up, but to the Lord. For to have the heart lifted up but not to the Lord is called pride; but to have the heart lifted up to the Lord is called refuge. To Him indeed we say who ascended: "Lord, you have been our refuge." For He rose again to give us hope, because what dies rises again; so that we would not despair by dying, and would not think our whole life is ended by death. For we were anxious about the very soul, and He, by rising again, gave us assurance even concerning the flesh. Therefore, He ascended, who? He who descended. He descended to heal you; He ascended to lift you up. You will fall if you lift yourself up; you will remain if He lifts you up. Therefore, lift up your heart, but to the Lord, it is a refuge; lift up your heart, but not to the Lord, it is pride. Let us therefore say to Him who rises: "For You are, Lord, my hope," and to Him who ascends: "You have made the Most High your refuge." For how shall we be proud, having our hearts lifted up to Him, who for our sake was made humble, lest we remain proud?

Piety seeks by believing, vanity by disputing.

God Christ, this always: it will never cease, because it never began. For if by His grace something begins, which never ceases; how will He cease, who never began? What is it that begins, and will never cease? Our immortality will have a beginning, it will have no end. For we no longer have what, when we begin to have, we will not lose. Therefore always God Christ. And what kind of God? Do you ask what kind? Equal to the Father. Therefore do not seek quality in eternity, but happiness. What kind of God is Christ, understand if you can. Behold, I say, I will not deceive you. Do you ask what kind of God Christ is? Listen to me, rather listen with me; let us listen together, let us learn together. For not because I speak and you listen, therefore I do not listen with you. Do you therefore ask, when you hear: Christ is God, what kind of God is Christ? Listen with me: I do not say, listen to me, but listen with me. For in this school we are all fellow students: heaven is the chair of our teacher. Thus, listen to what kind of God Christ is. In the beginning was the Word. Where? And the Word was with God. But every day we are accustomed to hearing words. Do not think so, as you are accustomed to hearing: the Word was God, what kind I seek. For behold, now I believe in God: but what kind of God He is, I seek. Seek His face always. Let no one fail in seeking, but let him progress. The seeker progresses, if piety seeks, not vanity. How does piety seek, how does vanity? Piety seeks by believing, vanity by disputing. For if you wish to dispute with me, and say to me: Which God do you worship? what kind of God do you worship? show me what you worship, I will answer: Even if there is something I can show, there is not one to whom I can show it.

Paul's modesty in the knowledge of God. Nor do I dare to say that I have already taken what you seek. For I enter, as much as I can, after the footsteps of that great athlete of Christ, namely the apostle Paul, who says: Brothers, I do not consider myself as having taken hold of it. I myself. I, what is that, and myself? I who have labored more than all of them? I know, Apostle, how you say: I. It is expression, not elation. Do you wish to hear how he says: I? When he said: I have labored more than all of them, he took the 'I' upon himself. More, he says, I have labored than all of them. And as if we would say to him: Who? and he to us: Not I, but the grace of God with me. He, therefore, with whom was the grace of God in such abundance that, called later, he labored more than the predecessors, yet says: Brothers, I do not consider myself to have taken hold of it. There 'I,' where it is not taken hold of. Truly, it is human infirmity not to take hold of it. But when he was lifted up to the third heaven, and heard ineffable words that it is not permitted for man to speak, he did not say: I. But what did he say? I know a man fourteen years ago. I know a man: and he himself was the man who spoke, and what was done in him, he made as if it were another, and therefore did not falter. Therefore, do not contend, do not argue, demanding from me what kind of god I worship. For it is not an idol, and I extend a finger, and say to you: Behold the God whom I worship; nor is it some constellation, nor some star, nor the sun, nor the moon; and I extend my finger to heaven, and say: Behold what I worship. There is not where the finger can be extended, but there is where the mind can be extended. Behold him who does not comprehend, and yet seeks, follows, pants, sighs, desires; behold him, what he aims at, see to his God, whether he extends a finger, or truly the mind. What does he say? I do not consider myself to have taken hold of it. But one thing, forgetting what lies behind, stretching out to what lies ahead, I follow according to the intention to the prize of the heavenly calling of God in Christ Jesus. I follow, he says, I walk, he says, I am on the way. Follow, if you can: let us come together to the homeland, where you will not ask me, nor I you. Therefore, now let us seek by believing together, that we may rejoice together by seeing later. To cleanse the heart so that God may be seen. For who has shown you what kind of God Christ is? Behold what He deigned to say through His servant, let Him also say through this servant of His, to my fellow servants, His servants. It was said to you: In the beginning was the Word. You asked where it was, it was answered: The Word was with God. And lest you disdain the words from the custom of human speech, you heard: The Word was God. Do you still ask what kind of God? All things were made through Him. Love Him: whatever you love is from Him. Let us not love the creature, neglecting the Creator; but let us attend to the creature and praise the Creator. I cannot show you my God: I show what He made, I recall what He made. All things were made through Him. He made new things not being new; He made temporal things being eternal; He made changeable things, who does not know change. Examine what is made, praise the Maker: believe, so that you may be cleansed. Do you want to see? You want a good thing, a great thing; I urge you to want it. Do you want to see? Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. Therefore, first think about purifying your heart: have this business, devote yourself to this, persist in this work. What you want to see is pure, what you want to see with is impure. You imagine God like some immense or many-fold light of these eyes, you enlarge the spaces as much as you wish: you do not set an end where you do not wish, you set it where you wish. These are fantasies of your heart, this is the impurity of your heart. Remove it, cast it away. If dirt falls into your eye, and you want me to show you the light; first your eye would seek a cleaner. So much impurity is in your heart; there, avarice is not a small impurity. You amass what you will not take with you. Do you not know that as you amass, you are dragging mud to your heart? From where, then, will you see what you seek?

You have filled your ark and broken your conscience.

You say to me: Show me your God. I say to you: Pay a little attention to your heart. Show me, you say, your God. Pay, I say, a little attention to your heart. Whatever you see there that displeases God, remove it. God wants to come to you. Listen to the Lord Christ himself: "My Father and I will come to him, and we will make our abode with him." Behold what God promises. Therefore, if I promised to come into your house, you would clean it; God wants to come into your heart, and you are lazy in cleaning His house? He does not love to dwell with greed, with an unclean and insatiable woman, whom you served at her command, and you sought to see God. What have you done that God commanded? What have you not done that greed commanded? What have you done that God commanded? I show what dwells in your heart, that you wish to see God. For indeed I had said: There is something to show, but to whom it is not. What God commanded, what have you done? What greed commanded, what have you delayed? God commanded that you clothe the naked, you trembled; greed commanded that you strip the clothed, you went mad. If you had done what God commanded, what shall I say to you, you would have this and that? You would have God himself. If you had done what God commanded, you would have God. You did what greed commanded; what do you have? I know, you will say to me: I have whatever I stole. Therefore, by taking away you have. Do you have something with you, who lost yourself? I have, you say. Where, where, I ask you? Surely either in the room, or in the little sack, or in the chest: I do not wish to say more. Wherever you have it, surely you do not have it with you now. Surely now you think you have it in the chest; perhaps it perished, and you do not know; perhaps when you return, you will not find what you left. I seek your heart: there, what you have, I inquire. Behold you have filled your chest, and broken your conscience. See it full, learn to be full: The Lord gave, the Lord took away; as it pleased the Lord, so it was done; blessed be the name of the Lord. Surely he had lost all. Therefore, where did he bring these gems of praise to the Lord?

Darkness is the work of evil.

Therefore, cleanse your heart as much as you can; do this, work on this. And ask, supplicate, humble yourself so that He may cleanse and dwell there. You do not understand: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God: this was in the beginning with God. All things were made through Him, and without Him, nothing was made. What was made in Him was life, and that life was the light of men. And the light shines in the darkness, and the darkness has not comprehended it. Behold why you do not understand: The light shines in the darkness, and the darkness has not comprehended it. What are the darknesses but evil deeds? What are the darknesses but evil desires, pride, greed, ambition, envy? All these are darknesses: therefore, you do not comprehend. For the light shines in the darkness; but there must be someone to comprehend it.

Christ himself is both the way you go and the destination you go to.

Therefore see, lest perhaps you can somehow grasp this: The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us. Through the man Christ you reach the God Christ. God is too great for you: but God became man. That which was far from you, was made near to you through the man. Where you remain, is God: the way which you go, is man. The same Christ is both the way and the destination. Therefore that same Word was made flesh and dwelt among us. He took on what he was not, without losing what he was. He appeared as man, and was hidden as God. Man was killed, and God was offended: but man rose again, and God was found. Think, therefore, how much he did as God, and how much he suffered as man. He was killed, but not in divinity: it was Christ himself who was killed. For they are not two, God and man; so that we do not create or understand the Trinity, but a Quaternity. Man truly man, and God truly God; but the whole Christ is both man and God: thus this whole Christ is man and God. Just as you are a body and soul; likewise the whole Christ is man and God. Therefore whole Christ, [is] flesh, soul, and God. The same [one] says some things which pertain to God; some things which pertain to soul; some things which pertain to flesh: it all pertains to Christ. What does he say as God? As the Father has life in himself, so he has given the Son to have life in himself. Whatever the Father does, the Son does likewise. I and the Father are one. What does Christ say according to his soul? My soul is sorrowful unto death. What does Christ say according to his flesh? Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up. Touch and see, because a spirit does not have flesh and bones, as you see me have. These are the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. In Christ, you have God and neighbor.

Certainly the whole law hangs on two commandments: You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, with all your soul, with all your mind; and you shall love your neighbor as yourself. On these two commandments hang all the Law and the Prophets. In Christ you have everything. Do you want to love your God? You have Him in Christ: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. Do you want to love your neighbor? You have Him in Christ: The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us.

Without sin we do not live here. May He cleanse us by His grace: may He cleanse us by His help and consolations. My brothers, through Him and in Him, I implore you, to abound in good works, in mercy, goodness, and kindness. Quickly forgive what is sinned against you. Let no one hold anger against another, lest he hinder his prayer to God. For all these things, since we are in this world, for even if we make progress, even if we live justly, we do not live without sin here. For sins are not only those which are called crimes, adulteries, fornications, sacrileges, thefts, rapines, false testimonies; not only those are sins. To pay attention to something which you should not have, is a sin; to listen to something willingly, which shouldn't have been heard, is a sin; to think something which shouldn't have been thought, is a sin.

Daily remedies against sins. But our Lord has given, after that bath of regeneration, other daily remedies. Our daily cleansing, the Lord's Prayer. Let us say, and let us say truly, that this too is an alms: Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors. Give alms, and all things are clean for you. Remember, brothers, what he will say to those standing on the right. He will not say: you have done this and that great thing; but: I was hungry, and you gave me food. To those standing on the left, he will not say: you have done this and that evil; but: I was hungry, and you did not give me food. Those on account of alms, into eternal life: those because of sterility, into eternal fire. Now choose either the right or the left. For I ask you, what hope of salvation can a lazy person have in remedies, who is frequent in diseases? But the diseases are small. Gather them, and they press down. The sins I have are smaller. Are they not many? For how are they smaller, which weigh down, overwhelm? What is smaller than drops of rain? Rivers are filled. What is smaller than grains of wheat? Granaries are filled. You notice that they are smaller, and do not notice that they are many. You know how to notice: count them, if you can. But plainly, God has given a daily remedy.

Conclusion.

Great is the mercy of Him who ascended on high and captured captivity. What is: captured captivity? He killed death. Captivity is captured: death is dead. So what? Did He who ascended on high and captured captivity do only this? So did He abandon us? Behold, I am with you always, even to the end of the age. Therefore, consider this: He gave gifts to men. Open the bosom of piety, receive the gift of happiness.

Sermons - Sermon 262

SERMO 262 ON THE DAY OF THE ASCENSION OF THE LORD Dressed in the Leontian Basilica.

Christ was not made man for a reason. The Lord Jesus, the only-begotten of the Father and co-eternal with the begetter, equally invisible, equally immutable, equally omnipotent, equally God; for us, as you know, and have received, and hold, became man by assuming a human form, not by losing the divine: powerful when hidden, weak when manifest; as you know, he was born so that we might be reborn; he died so that we might not die eternally. He rose immediately, that is, on the third day: he promised us the resurrection of the flesh at the end. He showed himself to the eyes of the disciples to be seen, and to their hands to be touched; persuading them of what he had become, not taking away what he always was. He conversed with them for forty days, as you have heard, entering and leaving, eating and drinking; not out of need, but entirely out of power: and manifesting to them the truth of the flesh, its weakness on the cross, and its immortality from the tomb. The burial of Saint Leontius.

Today, therefore, we celebrate the day of his ascension. However, another local feast occurs for this Church. Today is the deposition of Saint Leontius, the founder of this basilica. But let the star be obscured by the sun. Therefore, let us speak of the Lord, rather than what we had begun. The good servant rejoices when the Lord is praised.

Today's day is celebrated throughout the entire world. On this present day, that is, the fortieth after His resurrection, the Lord ascended into heaven. We did not see it: but let us believe. Those who saw preached, and filled the world. You know who saw, and who declared it to us: of whom it was foretold: There are no languages nor speeches, where their voices are not heard. Their sound has gone out into all the earth, and their words to the ends of the world. Therefore, they have also come to us, and awakened us from sleep. Behold, today is celebrated throughout the whole world.

Sit in heaven, you who hung on the wood.

Recall the Psalm. To whom was it said: Be exalted above the heavens, God? To whom was it said? Could it be said to God the Father: Be exalted, who was never humbled? Be exalted you: you who were enclosed in your mother’s womb; you who were made in her whom you made; you who lay in a manger; you who sucked milk from the breast as an infant in human flesh; you who, carrying the world, were carried by your mother: you whom the old man Simeon recognized as a baby and praised as great; you whom the widow Anna saw nursing and recognized as all-powerful: you who hungered for us, thirsted for us, grew tired on the way for us: (does the bread hunger, or the fountain thirst, or the way grow weary?); you who suffered all these things for us: you who slept, and yet do not sleep, guarding Israel: finally, you whom Judas sold, whom the Jews bought and did not possess: you who were seized, bound, scourged, crowned with thorns, suspended on the wood, pierced with a spear, you who died, you who were buried: Be exalted above the heavens, God. Be exalted, he says, be exalted above the heavens, because you are God. Sit in heaven, you who hung on the wood. You are expected to come as a judge, who awaited judgment. Who would believe these things, unless it was done by Him who raises the poor from the earth, and exalts the needy from the ash heap? He himself raises up his own needy flesh, and places it with the princes of his people, with whom he will judge the living and the dead. He has placed this needy flesh with them, to whom he says: You will sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. The Church is the glory of Christ.

Exalt yourself above the heavens, O God. It is already done, it is already fulfilled. But we say, how was it predicted to be: Exalt yourself above the heavens, O God; we did not see it, but we believed it: behold, before our eyes is what follows: Exalt yourself above the heavens, O God, and your glory above all the earth. Let him not believe the former, who does not see the latter. For what is: And your glory above all the earth? but, above all the earth your Church, above all the earth your matrons, above all the earth your bride, your beloved, your dove, your spouse. She is your glory: For the man, says the Apostle, ought not to cover his head, since he is the image and glory of God: but the woman is the glory of the man. If the woman is the glory of the man, the Church is the glory of Christ.

Sermons - Sermon 263

SERMO 263 On the fortieth day of the Lord's Ascension The glorification and victory of Christ was completed by the resurrection and ascension. The glorification of our Lord Jesus Christ was completed by rising and ascending. We celebrated His resurrection on the day of Easter: today we celebrate the ascension. Both days are festive for us. For He rose to show us an example of resurrection; and He ascended to protect us from above. Therefore, we have our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ first hanging on the wood, now sitting in heaven. He gave our price when He hung on the wood; He gathered what He bought, when He sits in heaven. For when He shall have gathered all those whom He certainly gathered throughout the times, at the end of time He will come, and, as it is written: God will come manifest; not as He first came hidden, but as it is said: manifest. For it behooved Him to come hidden, to be judged; but He will come manifest, to judge. For if He had come manifest first, who would dare to judge the manifest one? Indeed, as the apostle Paul says: For if they had known, they would never have crucified the Lord of glory. But if He had not been killed, death would not have died: the devil was defeated by his own trophy. For the devil rejoiced when by seducing the first man he cast him down into death. By seducing, he killed the first man: by killing the last man, he lost the first from the snare. The trap of the devil is the cross of the Lord.

Thus, the true victory of our Lord Jesus Christ occurred when He rose and ascended into heaven; and what you heard when the Apocalypse was read was fulfilled: The lion of the tribe of Judah has conquered. He was called the lion, He was called the lamb; the lion because of strength, the lamb because of innocence; the lion because He is invincible, the lamb because He is gentle. And this lamb, whose death defeated the lion seeking whom to devour, was named. For the devil is called a lion for his fierceness, not for his virtue. The Apostle Peter says: We ought to be vigilant against temptations, because your adversary the devil prowls around looking for someone to devour. But he said how he prowls: Like a roaring lion he prowls around looking for someone to devour. Who would not be ensnared by the teeth of this lion, if not for the lion of the tribe of Judah? A lion against the lion, a lamb against the wolf. The devil exulted when Christ died, but in this very death of Christ, the devil was defeated; as if he had taken the bait in a trap. He rejoiced at death, thinking he was the ruler of death; what he rejoiced in became his downfall. The cross of the Lord was the devil's trap; the bait by which he was caught was the death of the Lord. Behold, our Lord Jesus Christ has risen. Where is the death that hung on the tree? Where is the mockery of the Jews? Where is the arrogance and pride of those who shook their heads before the cross and said: If He is the Son of God, let Him come down from the cross? Behold, He did more than they demanded in mockery; for it is greater to rise from the tomb than to come down from the tree.

It is great to believe with the eyes of the heart. But now, what great glory there is, that he ascended into heaven, that he sits at the right hand of the Father? But we do not see this with our eyes, because we did not see him hanging on the cross, nor did we behold him rising from the tomb. We hold all this by faith, we gaze upon it with the eyes of the heart. We are praised because we have not seen and have believed. For the Jews also saw Christ. It is not a great thing to see Christ with the eyes of the flesh, but it is a great thing to believe in Christ with the eyes of the heart.

If Christ were now presented to us and stood before us and remained silent, how would we know who he was? And then, being silent, what good would he do us? Is it not better for him to speak in the Gospel while absent than to be present and remain silent? And yet he is not absent if he is held in the heart. Believe in him, and you see him: he is not before your eyes, and he possesses your heart. For if he were absent from us, what we have just heard would be a lie, "behold I am with you always, even to the end of the age."

Sermons - Sermon 263A

SERMON 263/A ABOUT THE ASCENSION OF THE LORD And we are already in heaven with Christ.

Today our Lord Jesus Christ ascended into heaven; may our heart ascend with Him. Let us hear the Apostle saying: If you have risen with Christ, seek the things that are above, where Christ is seated at the right hand of God; seek the things that are above, not what is upon the earth. For just as He ascended and did not depart from us, so too we are already with Him there, although it has not yet been fulfilled in our bodies what has been promised to us. He has already been exalted above the heavens; yet on earth He suffers whatever labors we, as His members, endure. He testified to this from above, crying: Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me? And: I was hungry, and you gave me food. Why do we not also labor on earth in such a way that through faith, hope, and love, by which we are united to Him, we may already rest with Him in the heavens? He, while there, is also with us; and we, while here, are also with Him. He accomplishes that both by divinity, power, and love; but we achieve this not by divinity as He does, yet by love, but directed towards Him. He did not leave heaven when He descended to us; nor did He depart from us when He ascended again into heaven. For since He was there while He was here, He thus testifies: No one, He says, has ascended into heaven except the one who descended from heaven, the Son of Man who is in heaven. He did not say: the Son of Man who will be in heaven, but: the Son of Man who is in heaven.

Christ is our head and we are His body. But indeed he is with us even when he is there, for before he ascended, he promised this, saying: "Behold, I am with you always, even to the end of the age." We are also there by name, for he said: "Rejoice, because your names are written in heaven"; although we wear out the earth with our bodies and labors, and the earth wears us out. But when we begin to be in his glory after the resurrection of the body, neither will this mortal body inhabit us, nor will our affection incline to these things; he gathers all from here, who holds the first fruits of our spirit. For neither should we despair concerning the perfect and angelic heavenly habitation, because he said: "No one has ascended into heaven except he who descended from heaven, the Son of Man who is in heaven"; he seems to have said this concerning himself alone, as if none of us could attain this; but it was said because of the unity, since he is our head, and we are his body. Therefore no one except him, because he is also ourselves according to that which he, the Son of Man, is for us, and we are the sons of God for him. The Apostle says thus: "For as the body is one and has many members; but all the members of that body, being many, are one body, so also is Christ." He did not say: "so is Christ"; but said: "so also is Christ." Christ therefore many members, one body. So he descended from heaven by mercy, and none ascended except himself, when we also in him by grace. And because of this, none except Christ descended, nor except Christ ascended; not that the dignity of the head is confused in the body, but that the unity of the body is not separated from the head. For he does not say of seeds as in many, but as in one, "in your seed which is Christ." Therefore, he calls Christ the seed of Abraham; and yet the same Apostle says: "Therefore you are Abraham's seed." If therefore not in seeds as in many, but as in one: and this seed of Abraham, which is Christ: and this seed of Abraham, which we are; when he ascended into heaven, we are not separated from him. He who descended from heaven does not begrudge us heaven, but in some way cries: "Be my members, if you wish to ascend into heaven." And by this we are currently strengthened, in this we burn with all desires; we meditate on this on earth, that we are considered in heavens. Then we will put off the flesh of mortality, now let us put off the oldness of spirit: the body will be easily lifted up to the heights of heavens, if the burdens of sins do not weigh down the spirit.

Christ ascended with the body. For even that which some heretics criticize moves them, namely, how the Lord could descend without a body, when He ascended with a body; as if it were contrary to those words where He says: "No one has ascended into heaven except he who descended from heaven." Therefore, they say, how could a body which did not descend from heaven ascend into heaven? As if He had said: Nothing ascends into heaven except what descended from heaven; but He said: No one ascends, except he who descends. For this refers to the person, not to the condition of the person. He descended without the clothing of a body, He ascended with the clothing of a body; nevertheless, no one ascends except he who descends. For if He has fitted us to Himself as His members, in such a way that with us joined to Him, He is the same entity; how much more can that body, which He assumed from the Virgin, not have a different person in Him? For who says that not only he who descended ascends, whether it be a mountain, or a wall, or any higher place, if he should ascend clothed when he had descended unclothed; or ascend armed when he had descended unarmed? Therefore, as it is said of this: No one ascends except he who descends, although he ascended with that with which he did not descend; so no one ascends into heaven except Christ, because no one descends from heaven except Christ, although He descended without a body, ascended with a body, and we will ascend, not by our own power, but by our unity with Him and our own unity. For there are two in one flesh: this is a great mystery in Christ and in the Church; hence He Himself says: They are no longer two, but one flesh.

Christ fasted and spent the same number of days with his disciples after the resurrection. And thus He fasted when He was tempted, still in need of food before death; but He ate and drank when He was glorified, after the resurrection no longer in need of food. There He was showing in Himself our struggle, here in us His consolation, defining both in forty days. For He fasted forty days when He was tempted in the wilderness, as it is written in the Gospel, before the death of His flesh; and again, He was with the disciples for forty days, as Peter speaks in the Acts of the Apostles, coming in and going out, eating and drinking after the resurrection of His flesh. The number forty seems to signify the passage of this world for those who are called to grace, through Him who did not come to destroy the law but to fulfill it. For there are ten commandments of the law, already the grace of Christ spread throughout the world; and the world is divided into four parts, and ten multiplied by four makes forty; because those redeemed by the Lord, He gathered them from the regions, from the East and West, and North and Sea. Thus fasting for forty days before the death of the flesh, it was as if He was crying out: Abstain from the desires of this world; but eating and drinking for forty days after the resurrection of the flesh, it was as if He was crying out: Behold, I am with you until the consummation of the world. Fasting indeed is in the tribulation of struggle; for he who contends in the struggle abstains from all things; but food is in the hope of peace, which will not be perfect until our body, whose redemption we await, puts on immortality; which we do not yet possess in glory, but are already fed by hope. The Apostle shows us to do both simultaneously, saying:

Rejoicing in hope, patient in tribulation; as if to say it was in food, this in fasting. For as we tread the way of the Lord, let us both fast from the vanity of the present world and be refreshed by the promise of the future: here not setting our heart, there nourishing it upward.

Sermons - Sermon 264

SERMO 264 ON THE ASCENSION OF THE LORD Something must be said about the ascension of Christ.

There are many hidden mysteries in the divine Scriptures, whether those which we ourselves still have to search for or those which the Lord has already deigned to reveal to our humility. But there is not enough time to explain these to Your Holiness. I know that especially in these days, the church is filled with such people who would rather leave quickly than come; and they find us burdensome if we speak for a long time: yet in their feasts, to which they hasten, if they are held until evening, they neither toil nor refuse, nor do they depart even with any shame. However, lest we defraud those who come hungering, we will not be silent, albeit briefly, about this mystery, that our Lord Jesus Christ ascended with that body in which He rose.

Why Christ conversed with the disciples after the resurrection.

Certainly due to the weakness of his disciples—there were even some among that number whom the devil would tempt with unbelief—so that a certain disciple of his, in that very guise in which he knew him, nevertheless had no more faith in the living members than in the fresh scars. Therefore, for their confirmation, he deigned to live with them for a full forty days after the resurrection, from the very day of his passion until that day, entering and exiting, eating and drinking, as Scripture says; confirming that what had been taken away by the cross was restored to their eyes after the resurrection. However, he did not want them to remain in the flesh nor to be held longer by carnal affection. For they desired him to be always bodily with them with the same mind by which Peter also feared that he would suffer. For they saw their master, who was with them, as a comforter and protector in human form, just as they saw themselves. If they did not see something like this, they believed him absent, although he is present everywhere by majesty. He truly protected them just as he deigned to say, like a hen her chicks. For just as the hen weakens due to the weakness of her chicks—not like so many birds before our eyes that make chicks; we do not see any bird weaken with chicks except the hen. Therefore the Lord took a likeness from her because he deigned to weaken by taking flesh due to our weakness. Yet it was necessary for them to be somewhat uplifted and to begin to think of him spiritually, as the Word of the Father, God with God, through whom all things were made. The flesh they saw did not allow this. Therefore it was beneficial for them to be confirmed in faith by his conversation with them for forty days. But it was more beneficial for them that he withdrew from their sight so that he who had conversed with them on earth as a brother might help from heaven as Lord, and they might learn to think of him according to God. This is indeed what the evangelist John declared, if anyone notices, if anyone understands. For the Lord said, “Let not your heart be troubled.” “If you loved me," he said, "you would rejoice, because I go to the Father, for the Father is greater than I.” And in another place, he says, “I and the Father are one.” He claims equality with the Father, not by robbery, but by nature, so that he might say this to a certain disciple who said to him, “Lord, show us the Father, and it suffices us.” And he: “Philip, have I been with you so long, and you do not know the Father?

Whoever has seen me has seen the Father." What does it mean, "Whoever has seen me?" If according to the eyes of the flesh, those who crucified him also saw him. What does it mean, therefore, "Whoever has seen me," if not "whoever has understood, has seen with the eye of the heart?" Just as there are inner ears which the Lord sought when he said, “He who has ears, let him hear,” when there was no deaf person standing before him. So there is also an inner sight of the heart by which if anyone has seen the Lord, he has seen the Father because he is equal to the Father. The Son of God was weakened by mercy unto death.

Listen to the Apostle wishing to commend His mercy to us, for He was made weak for our sake, so that He might gather the chicks under His wings, teaching the other disciples as well, that they too might sympathize with the weaknesses of the weak, who might rise from common infirmity to some firmness; while He descended from heavenly firmness to our infirmity. He said to them: "Have this mind among yourselves, which is yours in Christ Jesus." He said: Deign to imitate the Son of God by compassion with the little ones. Though He was in the form of God. Already by saying, He was in the form of God, He showed Him equal to God. For the form is not less than He whose form it is. If it is less, it is not form. Nevertheless, lest anyone should doubt, He added, and placed that very Word, that He might shut the mouths of the sacrilegious: "Though He was in the form of God, He did not count equality with God a thing to be grasped." What is it, dearest brothers, that the Apostle says: "Did not count it a thing to be grasped"? Because He was naturally equal. To whom, then, would the equality of God have been a robbery? To the first man, to whom it was said: "Taste, and you will be like gods." He wished to stretch himself towards equality by robbery, and by punishment lost immortality. For He, to whom it was not robbery, did not count equality with God a thing to be grasped. If therefore it was not robbery; nature, intact society and highest comparison itself. But what did He do? He says, He emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant; being born in the likeness of men, and being found in human form: He humbled Himself, becoming obedient unto death, even death on a cross. It was not enough to say death, and He showed the kind of death. Why the kind of death? Because many are ready to die: many indeed say: I do not fear to die, but I would like to die in my bed, surrounded by my children, grandchildren, and the tears of my wife. These indeed do not seem to refuse death, but by choosing the kind of death, they are punished by fear. He, however, chose the kind of death, but the worst of all. As men choose for themselves the better kind of death, so He chose the worst, which was abhorrent to all Jews. For He did not fear to die through false witnesses, through the sentence of a judge, who will come to judge the living and the dead: He did not fear to die by the ignominy of the cross, so that He might free all believers from all ignominy. Therefore, becoming obedient unto death, even death on a cross: yet naturally equal to God; strong in the power of majesty, weak in the compassion of humanity: strong, to do all things; weak, to restore all things.

Why does Christ want to depart in the flesh?

Therefore, when John says, "If you loved me, you would rejoice, because I am going to the Father; for the Father is greater than I." How can he be equal, as the Apostle says? As the Lord himself says: "I and the Father are one." And in another place: "He who has seen me has seen the Father." How here: "Because the Father is greater than I?" This voice, brothers, as the Lord inspires us to notice, was in a way both reproachful and consoling. For they were fixed on the man, and could not think of God. For then they would think of God, if the man was taken away from them and from their eyes, so that, with the familiarity made with the flesh being severed, they could learn to think of the divinity even in the absence of the flesh. Therefore, he said to them: "If you loved me, you would rejoice, because I am going to the Father." Why? So that when I go to the Father, you can think of me as equal to the Father. Therefore, the Father is greater than I: while you still see me in the flesh, the Father is still greater than I.

See whether you understand: for they did not know how to think of anything but a man. I say this somewhat more plainly, for the sake of our slower brothers: but those who have understood should bear with the slowness of the others and imitate the Lord himself, who, although he was in the form of God, humbled himself, becoming obedient unto death. "If you loved me," what does this mean? "If you loved me, you would rejoice, because I am going to the Father." "If you loved me," what else does it mean but "you do not love me"? What then do you love? The flesh which you see. For you do not want it to depart from your eyes. But if you loved me; what is me? "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God," as John himself says. Therefore, if you loved me in this way, as through me all things were made, you would rejoice, because I am going to the Father. Why? Because the Father is greater than I. While you still see me on earth, the Father is greater than I. I will depart from your eyes; the mortal flesh, which was assumed for your mortality, will be taken away from sight; this garment, which I assumed in humility, will cease to be seen: yet it will be lifted up to heaven, so that you may learn what to hope for. For he did not leave behind here that very tunic which he wanted to put on here. For if he had left it here, all would despair of the resurrection of the flesh. But now he has lifted it up to heaven, and there are those who still doubt about the resurrection of the flesh. If God has shown it in himself, is he going to deny it to man? For God took it on in mercy, but man has it by nature. And yet he showed it, confirmed them, and lifted it up. With the physical sight of the flesh taken away from their eyes, they no longer saw the man. If something was drawn from their hearts concerning carnal desire, it was, as it were, saddened in them. They nevertheless gathered together and began to pray. But he was to send the Holy Spirit ten days later, so that the Holy Spirit might fill them with spiritual love, taking away from them carnal desires. He made them understand Christ as he was the Word of God, God with God, through whom all things were made. But they could not be filled with such understanding unless carnal love had departed from their eyes. And therefore he said: "If you loved me, you would rejoice, because I am going to the Father; for the Father is greater than I." According to man, the Father is greater than I, equal according to God: equal according to nature, greater according to the mercy of the Son. For he humbled him not only below himself, but below the angels, as the Scripture says. He is not lesser; and even if you see the Son having somewhat departed from the equality of the Father by taking on flesh, he never departs from that equality: but by taking on flesh (for he took on man), he was not changed. Just as one who takes on a garment does not turn into the garment but remains a whole man within it: and if a senator takes on a servile garment, if perhaps he cannot enter to console someone imprisoned with his senatorial robe, he takes on the habit of the prison, he seems to have a sordid habit through humanity; but within remains his senatorial dignity all the more intact, as he has willed to put on what humble clothing more out of compassion. So the Lord, remaining God, remaining the Word, remaining wisdom, remaining divine power, remaining in the governance of the heavens, remaining in the administration of the earth, filling the angels, wholly present everywhere, wholly in the world, wholly in the Patriarchs, wholly in the Prophets, wholly in all the saints, wholly in the womb of the Virgin, took on flesh, to join it to himself as a bride, so that the bridegroom would come from his chamber, to betroth the church as a chaste virgin. Therefore, he is lesser than the Father because he is man; but equal to the Father because he is God. Therefore, take away carnal desires. As if he were saying this to his apostles: You do not want to let me go (just as each one does not want to let go of his friend, as if saying: Stay with us a while longer, our soul is refreshed when we see you); but it is better for you not to see this flesh and to think of the divinity. I take myself away from you outwardly, and I fill you with myself inwardly. Does Christ enter the heart according to the flesh and with the flesh? According to divinity, he possesses the heart: according to the flesh, he speaks to the heart through the eyes and admonishes it outwardly; dwelling within, so that we may turn inwardly and be quickened by him, and be formed by him; because he is the form of all things unformed.

Why Christ spent forty days with the disciples after the resurrection.

Therefore, if He spent forty days with His disciples, He did not do so without reason. Forty days were done for a purpose. Twenty would be sufficient, thirty would be enough: forty days represent the dispensation of this entire age. Sometimes we discussed this on account of the number ten multiplied four times. I recall to you who heard that the number ten signifies all wisdom. This wisdom is dispensed through the four parts of the world, throughout the entire globe: and times are divided in a fourfold arrangement. For the year has four seasons: and the world has four corners. Therefore, ten multiplied four times makes the number forty. So the Lord fasted for forty days, showing us that believers must abstain from all corruption as long as they are in this world. Elijah fasted for forty days, bearing the person of Prophecy, showing that this is also taught in Prophecy. Moses fasted for forty days, who bore the person of the Law, showing that this is also taught in the Law. The people of Israel were led in the desert for forty years. The Ark floated on the flood for forty days, which is the Church, made of incorruptible wood; the incorruptible wood are the souls of the saints and the righteous: yet it had clean and unclean animals; because as long as life continues in this world and through Baptism as through a flood the Church is purified, it is inevitable that it has both good and bad: hence that Ark had both clean and unclean. But after Noah came out of it, he made a sacrifice to God only with clean animals. From which we ought to understand that in this Ark there are both clean and unclean animals, but after this flood, God receives only those who have cleansed themselves. Therefore, this entire period that is observed, brothers, consider it as forty days. This entire period, as long as we are here, the ark is in the flood: as long as Christians are baptized and are cleansed through water, the ark seems to float on the waves, which turned in the water for forty days. But the Lord, remaining with the disciples for forty days, deigned to signify that during this time, the faith in the Incarnation of Christ is necessary for all: which is necessary for the weak. If there were already an eye that could see: In the beginning was the Word, which would see, which would hold, which would embrace, which would enjoy, it would not be necessary for the Word to become flesh and dwell among us: but because the inner eye was blinded by the dust of sins in holding and enjoying it, there was no way to understand the Word; which deigned to become flesh, so that it might be seen later, what cannot presently be seen. Therefore, because the dispensation of the flesh of Christ is necessary for the faithful in this life, through which they may aim to the Lord: when it comes to that vision of the Word, all carnal dispensation will not be necessary: hence His conversation in the flesh after the resurrection for forty days was necessary, to show that the faith in the Incarnation of Christ is necessary as long as the ark is seen to float in the flood in this life. Behold what I say, brothers: believe in Jesus Christ born of the Virgin Mary, crucified and resurrected. It is not necessary to inquire about it after this age, because we have already accepted it in faith: we hold it; it is necessary for our weakness. Consider therefore the charity of that hen, which protects our weakness; consider to be the beast of that merciful passerby, onto which he lifted the sick man who was wounded. For he lifted him, where? Onto his beast. The beast of the Lord is the flesh. Therefore, when this age has passed, what will be said to you? Because you rightly believed in the flesh of Christ, now enjoy the majesty and divinity of Christ. The weak was necessary to the weak, the strong will be necessary to the strong. The resurrection of the flesh to come.

Because you too must lay down that very weakness, as you have heard in the Apostle: "This corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." For he says, "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God." Why cannot they inherit? Is it because the flesh will not rise? By no means: the flesh will rise, but what becomes of it? It is changed, and it becomes itself a celestial and angelic body. Do angels have flesh? But there is this difference, that this very flesh will rise, this very flesh which is buried, which dies; this flesh which is seen, which is touched, which needs to eat and drink to endure; which falls ill, which suffers pain, this very flesh is to rise, for the wicked to eternal punishment, but for the good to be transformed. When it is transformed, what will it become? Already it will be called a celestial body, not mortal flesh: because "This corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." They marvel if God makes a celestial body out of flesh, who made all things out of nothing. The Lord, constituted in flesh, made wine out of water, and is it a wonder if he can make a celestial body out of flesh? Therefore do not doubt God because he is able to do this. The angels were nothing, yet by his majesty they are what they are. He who could make you when you were not, cannot he restore what you were, and can he not give the honor of glory to your faith because of his incarnation? Therefore, when these things have passed, that will come to us which John says: "Beloved, we are children of God now, and what we will be has not yet appeared; we know that when he appears, we shall be like him, because we shall see him as he is." Prepare yourselves for this vision, meanwhile, as long as you are in the flesh, believe in the incarnate Christ; and believe so that you do not think you are deceived by any falsehood. For truth never lies: if it lies, where shall we go for counsel? What shall we do? Whom shall we believe? Therefore truth, true Word, true wisdom, true might of God: "The Word was made flesh," true flesh. "Touch and see," he says, "because a spirit does not have bones and nerves, as you see that I have." For there were true bones, true nerves, true scars: everything that was touched was true, everything that was understood was true. A man was touched, God was understood: flesh was touched, wisdom was understood: weakness was touched, might was understood. All true. Yet finally the flesh preceded into heaven, that is the head. The remaining members will follow. Why? Because it is necessary that these members also rest for a while and rise again at their own time. Even if the Lord had wanted to rise then, there would have been no one in whom we could believe. Therefore he wished to render the firstfruits of the sleeping to God in himself, so that when you saw in him what was restored, you might hope what will be given to you. The whole people of God will be made equal and associated with the angels. Therefore, let no one say to you, brothers: "The foolish Christians believe that the flesh will rise: who rises? or who has risen? or who came from the dead and told you?" Christ came from there. Oh wretched one! Oh perverse and reversed human heart! If his grandfather were to rise, he would believe him: the Lord of the world rose, and he does not want to believe. The universal faith concerning the Trinity.

Therefore, hold fast, my brothers, to the true, genuine, Catholic faith. The Son is equal to the Father, the gift of God the Holy Spirit is equal to the Father, and hence the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are one God, not three gods: not added to each other by degrees, but united by majesty, and one God. But the Son, nevertheless for us: the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us. He did not regard equality with God something to be grasped, but emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, and being found in human likeness. And so you may know, brothers, that this Trinity is truly equal, and it was not said that the Father is greater than I, except because of the flesh the Lord took on; therefore it is never said of the Holy Spirit, He is lesser, except because he did not take on flesh? See what I have said: search through all the Scriptures, examine all the pages, read all the verses; you will never find that the Holy Spirit is lesser than God. Therefore, He is said to be lesser, who for our sake was made lesser, so that through Him we might be made greater.

Sermons - Sermon 265

SERMO 265 OF THE ASCENSION OF THE LORD The truth of the resurrection is confirmed by Christ. On the solemnity of this day, we admonish the knowledgeable, we instruct the negligent. Today we solemnly celebrate the Lord's ascension into heaven. For indeed, our Lord and Savior, having laid down the body and taken it up again, after he rose from the dead, presented himself alive to the disciples, whom they had despaired of when dying. After he rendered himself to be seen by their eyes, handled by their hands, building faith by showing truth; since it was little for human frailty and weak hesitation to exhibit such a great miracle in one day, and then withdraw it; he conversed with them on earth, as we have heard when the Book of Acts of the Apostles was read, he conversed with them on earth for forty days, entering and exiting, eating and drinking; to show the truth, not because he had need. Therefore, on the very fortieth day, which we celebrate today, with them watching, and being led by watching, he ascended into heaven. The coming of Christ will be.

Then, therefore, after they marveled at what they saw ascending, they still rejoiced that it was going up; for the head’s advance is the hope of the members. And they heard the angelic voice: Men of Galilee, why do you stand looking into heaven? This Jesus will come back in the same way you saw him go into heaven. What does this mean, "he will come back in the same way"? He will come in that form, so that what is written might be fulfilled: They will see the one whom they pierced. He will come back in the same way. He will come to humans, he will come as a man; but God will come as a man. The true man and God will come, to make humans gods. The judge of heaven ascended, the herald of heaven proclaimed. Let us have a good case, so that we may not fear the future judgment. For he ascended: those who announced it to us saw. Those who did not see, believed: others, not believing, mocked. For not all have faith. And because not all have faith, and the Lord knows who are his, why do we argue that God ascended into heaven? Rather, let us marvel that God descended into hell. Let us marvel at the death of Christ, but let us praise rather than marvel at his resurrection. Our destruction, our sin: the blood of Christ, our price. The resurrection of Christ, our hope: the coming of Christ, our possession. Therefore, he who is at the right hand of the Father is to be expected until he comes. Let our thirsty soul say to him: When will you come? and: My soul thirsted for the living God. When will he come? He will come: but when will he come? You wish for him to come: would that he might find you prepared. Of the time of the future coming of Christ.

Nevertheless, let us not think that we alone have this longing for our Lord, so that we might say, "When will He come?" His disciples also had this longing. If I could tell you, who are longing, waiting, eager to know, when our Lord God will come, if I could tell you, what would you think of me? But if you do not expect to hear this from me—if you do expect it, you are foolish: surely you would have questioned the Lord Jesus Christ Himself, present in the body, living, speaking, if you had Him before your eyes and hands. I know you would ask Him out of this longing, and you would say to Him: "Lord, when will you come?" The disciples themselves questioned the present Lord Jesus Christ. If you cannot ask what they asked, listen to what they heard. Indeed, they were there then, we were not yet: however, if we believe them, they questioned for us too, and heard for us too. Therefore, the disciples of Christ, seeing that Christ was about to ascend, questioned Him and said: "Lord, will you at this time restore the kingdom?" To whom were they speaking? To the One they saw present. "Will you at this time restore the kingdom?" And what does that mean? Did they not see Him present? Did they not hear Him present? Did they not even touch Him present? What is this "Will you at this time restore the kingdom?" unless they knew that the future judgment of Christ's presence would be something visible to both His own and to strangers? For when He resurrected, He was seen only by His own. Therefore they knew and held in faith that there would be a time when the judged One would judge, when the rejected One would approve and reject; when, visible to both kinds of people, He would place some on His right and others on His left, saying what both would hear, offering what not both would receive, threatening what not both would fear. They knew it would happen; but when, they asked. "Will you at this time restore the kingdom?" Not for us; for even now we see you: but you will also be present to those who did not believe in you. "Will you at this time restore the kingdom? Tell us, and when the kingdom of Israel?" This they asked: "Will you at this time restore the kingdom, and when the kingdom of Israel?" What kingdom? About which we say: "Your kingdom come." What kingdom? About which those placed on the right will hear: "Come, blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." When He will also say to those on the left: "Depart into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels." A terrifying voice, a dreadful voice: but "The just will be in eternal memory; he will not fear an evil hearing." For these this, for those that: in both truthful, because in both just. The response of Christ. But what they were seeking, if they heard, let us hear: if they did not hear, let us hold on to what they heard; and let us not fear what is to come. Lord, will you be presented at this time? And we, thinking we see the Lord present in the body, say to Him: Lord, will you be presented at this time, and when the kingdom of Israel? When the kingdom of your people, when the kingdom of the humble, how long the pride of the arrogant? Surely this is what you were seeking, this is what you desired to hear. Let us see what He answered. Let not the lambs disdain to hear what the rams heard. Let us hear what the Lord Himself said. To whom? To Peter, John, Andrew, James, and the others, so great and so honorable, so worthy: but whom He found unworthy, and made worthy. What did He answer to those saying: Will you be presented at this time, and when the kingdom of Israel? It is not for you to know the times, which the Father has placed in His own power. What is this? It is said to Peter: It is not for you: and do you say, It is for me? It is not for you to know the times, which the Father has placed in His own power. What you believe, you believe well: because it will come. When it will come, what is it to you? When it comes, prepare yourself. It is not for you to know the times, which the Father has placed in His own power. Let curiosity depart, let piety succeed. What is it to you when He comes? Live thus, as if it were to come today; and you will not fear, when it comes.

Christ is a good teacher. But behold the order and discipline of the good teacher, the singular teacher, the only teacher. He did not say what they asked, and he said what they did not ask. For he knew that what they asked was not expedient for them to know: but what he knew was expedient for them, he said even though they did not ask. It is not for you to know the times, he said. What are the times to you? The issue is that you escape the times, and you ask about the times. It is not for you to know the times, which the Father has set in his own power. And as if it were said to him, And what is ours? Let us now hear what especially pertains to us, let us now hear. It was asked what ought not to be said: but what ought to be heard was spoken. It is not for you to know the times, which the Father has set in his own power. But what is it for you to know? The Church is one, spread everywhere. But you will receive power when the Holy Spirit comes upon you, and you will be my witnesses. Where? In Jerusalem. It was appropriate that we hear this: for with these words the Church is preached, the Church is commended, unity is announced, division is accused. It was said to the apostles: And you will be my witnesses. It is said to the faithful, it is said to the vessels of God, it is said to the vessels of mercy: You will be my witnesses. Where? In Jerusalem, where I was killed: and in all Judea and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth. Behold what you hear, behold what you hold. Be a bride, and await the bridegroom securely. The bride is the Church. Where has it been foretold that it would be, which those witnesses would announce; where has it been foretold that it would be? For many will say, Behold, here it is. I would listen, if another would not also say, Behold, here it is. What do you say? Behold, here it is. I was already going: but another recalls me with a similar voice, Behold, here it is. You from one side, Behold, here it is: another from another side, Behold, here it is. Let us question the Lord, let us interpellate the Lord. Let the sides be silent, let us hear the whole. One says from one corner, Behold, here it is: another from another corner, No, but behold, here it is. You, Lord, say: you assert what you have redeemed, show what you have loved. We are invited to your wedding, show us your bride, lest we disturb your vows by debating. He speaks clearly, he shows clearly: he does not abandon those who seek, he does not love those who dispute. He says to his disciples, and he says to those who do not seek; because he contradicts those who contend. And perhaps this was not yet sought by the Apostles, because the flock of Christ was not yet divided by robbers. We, experiencing the pains of division, eagerly seek the glue of unity. The Apostles seek the time of judgment, and the Lord responds with the place of the Church. He did not respond to what they asked, but foresaw our pains. He says, You will be my witnesses in Jerusalem. It is little. You did not give such a price for this alone. In Jerusalem. Say further: And to the ends of the earth. You have come to the ends: why do disputes not end? Let no one say to me now, Behold, here it is: No, but behold, here it is. Let human presumption be silent, let divine preaching be heard, let the true promise be held: In Jerusalem, and in all Judea and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth. Having said these things, a cloud received him. There was no longer a need for anything to be added, lest something else be considered. The last words of Christ for the unity of the Church.

Brothers, the words of a parent about to go to the grave are usually heard with great concern, and are the last words of the Lord, who is ascending to heaven, to be scorned? Let us consider that our Lord has written a will and placed His final words in it. For He foresaw the future disputes of evil children, He foresaw men attempting to take possession of what belongs to another. Why should they not divide what they did not buy? Why should they not cut up what they did not pay the price for? But He did not want His coat, woven from the top throughout and without seam, to be divided: it fell to one by lot. In that garment, unity is commended, in that garment charity is proclaimed, it is woven from above. Cupidity is of the earth, charity from above. Act, brothers: the Lord has written a will, He has placed His final words in it. Look, I beseech you, and let it move you as it moves us, if it can happen. The Spirit twice given by Christ twice glorified.

There are two glorifications according to the form of the man received: one, by which he rose from the dead on the third day; the other, by which he ascended into heaven before the eyes of his disciples. These two, which are commended, are his glorifications already made. One remains, and it too is in the sight of men, when he will present himself at the judgment. Concerning the Holy Spirit, this was said through John the Evangelist: "But the Spirit had not yet been given, because Jesus was not yet glorified." But the Spirit had not yet been given: why had it not yet been given? Because Jesus had not yet been glorified. It was expected, therefore, that the Spirit would be given with Jesus being glorified. Rightfully, glorified twice, by rising and ascending, he twice gave the Spirit. He gave one, and one gave, he gave to unity, and yet he gave twice. First, after he had risen, he said to his disciples: "Receive the Holy Spirit." And he breathed on their face. You have it once. Then he still promises to send the Holy Spirit, and says: "You will receive the power of the Holy Spirit coming upon you"; and in another place: "Stay in the city: for I will fulfill the promise of the Father, which you heard," he says, "from my mouth." After he ascended, having been there for ten days, he sent the Holy Spirit: it is he who will be the solemn future Pentecost.

Why the Spirit is given twice.

See, my brothers. Someone may ask me, "Why did He give the Holy Spirit twice?" Many have said many things, and as men, they have sought: and they have said something which is not against faith; one said this, another said that, both of which did not exceed the rule of truth. If I say I know why He gave it twice, I would lie to you. I do not know. He who says he knows what he does not know is reckless: he who denies knowing what he knows is ungrateful. Therefore, I confess to you, I am still seeking why the Lord gave the Holy Spirit twice; I wish to reach something more certain. May the Lord help me through your prayers, so that what He deigns to grant may not be withheld from you. Therefore, I do not know. However, what I might think while not yet knowing, not yet holding for certain, as I hold most certainly that He gave it; what I therefore might think, I will not keep silent. If it is so, may the Lord confirm it: if it is something else that appears truer, may the Lord grant it. Therefore, I think, but I think, that the Holy Spirit was given twice to commend the two precepts of love. For there are two precepts, and one is love: You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul: and: You shall love your neighbor as yourself. On these two precepts hang all the Law and the Prophets. One love, and two precepts: one Spirit, and two givings. For it is not one given first, and another given later: because it is not another love that loves the neighbor, than that which loves God. Therefore, it is not another love. By the love with which we love our neighbor, we love God with the same love. But because God is one thing, the neighbor another; they are loved with one love, but they are not one who are loved: therefore, the great love of God must be commended first, the second love of the neighbor; however, we begin with the second, so that we may reach the first: For if you do not love the brother whom you see; how can you love God whom you do not see? Therefore perhaps, teaching us the love of neighbor, He gave the Holy Spirit on earth, visible and closest to those nearby, by breathing into their face; and from this great love which is in heaven, He sent the Holy Spirit from heaven. Receive the Holy Spirit on earth, and you love your brother: receive from heaven, and you love God. For what you received on earth is also from heaven. Christ gave it on earth, but what He gave is from heaven. For He gave it, who descended from heaven. He found whom to give it, but He brought what to give from there. The love of the Holy Spirit is a gift.

What is it then, brothers? Should I perhaps also mention how love pertains to the Holy Spirit? Listen to Paul: "But not only that," he says, "we also glory in tribulations, knowing that tribulation produces patience, and patience character, and character hope; and hope does not disappoint, because the love of God has been poured out in our hearts." From where has the love of God been poured out in our hearts? From where? What did you give yourself? What were you presuming as if it were your own; What indeed do you have that you have not received? Therefore, from where, if not from what follows: Through the Holy Spirit who has been given to us?

There is no love except in the unity of the Church.

Charity is not held except in the unity of the Church. The dividers do not have it: as the apostle Jude says: These are those who separate themselves, sensual, not having the Spirit. They separate themselves: why do they separate? Because they are sensual, not having the Spirit. Therefore they flow away, because they do not have the bond of charity. The hen is full of that same charity, weakened on behalf of her chicks, humbling her voice with her chicks, extending her wings: How often, he says, would I have gathered your children? To gather, not to divide. Because I have, he says, other sheep that are not of this fold: them also I must bring, that there may be one flock and one shepherd. Rightly he did not listen to the brother pleading against his brother, saying: Lord, tell my brother to divide the inheritance with me. Lord, he says, tell my brother. What? To divide the inheritance with me. And the Lord says: Tell me, man. Why do you want to divide, except because you are human? For when one says, I am of Paul; and another, I am of Apollos: are you not men? Tell me, man, who appointed me a judge or divider over you? I came to gather, not to divide. Therefore, he says, I tell you, beware of all covetousness. For covetousness desires to divide, as charity desires to gather. What else is: Beware of all covetousness, except, Be filled with charity? We, having charity according to our capacity, plead with the Lord against a brother, as also the other against a brother: but not with this voice, not with this plea. For he says: Lord, tell my brother to divide the inheritance with me. We say: Lord, tell my brother to hold the inheritance with me. The unity of the Church is entrusted to Christ.

Therefore, brothers, see what you most love, what you firmly hold. The Lord, glorified by rising, commends the Church; about to be glorified by ascending, He commends the Church; sending the Holy Spirit from heaven, He commends the Church. For rising again, what does He say to His disciples? "These are my words which I spoke to you while I was still with you, that all things written about me in the Law and the Prophets and the Psalms must be fulfilled." And then He opened their minds to understand the Scriptures, and He said to them, "Thus it is written, and thus it was necessary for the Christ to suffer, and rise from the dead on the third day." Where is the commendation of the Church? "And repentance for the remission of sins is to be preached in His name." And where? "To all nations, beginning from Jerusalem." This He conveyed in His glorification by resurrection. What did He convey in His forthcoming glorification by ascension? As you heard, "You will be my witnesses in Jerusalem, and in all Judea and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth." What upon the arrival of the Holy Spirit itself? The Holy Spirit came: those He first filled spoke in all the languages of all nations. Each man speaking in all tongues signified what else but unity in all languages? Holding this, strengthened in this, fortified in this, fixed in unshakable charity within this, let us praise the Lord, children, and say alleluia. But only in one part? And from where? To what extent? "From the rising of the sun to its setting, praise the name of the Lord."

Sermons - Sermon 265A

Sermon 265/A On the fortieth of the Ascension of the Lord Christ must be the author of our speech. The holy and solemn day of the Ascension of our Lord Jesus Christ has dawned today: Let us exult and rejoice in it. Christ descended, the underworld was opened; Christ ascended, the heavens were illuminated. Christ on the wood, let the furious mock; Christ in the tomb, let the guards lie. Christ in the underworld, let the resting be visited; Christ in heaven, let all nations believe. Therefore, He Himself should be the author of our discourse, who is the giver of our salvation. We speak to you of no other than Him who was speaking to all of us just now from the Gospel, and about to ascend to the Father, was saying to His disciples: These things I have spoken to you, while being present with you. However, the Comforter, the Spirit of truth, whom the Father will send in My name, He will teach you all things, and remind you of all that I have said. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid. You have heard that I said to you: I go to My Father; for My Father is greater than I.

Christ God above us and likewise man among us.

You know, brothers, that our Lord Jesus Christ was made what we are for us, but nonetheless remained in that form in which He is equal to the Father. For we believe that the Son of God became a participant in our weakness, but was not, however, deprived of His majesty. Therefore, our very faith is: God above us, and the same man among us. But because for our sake in the form of assumed humility He performed many things here, so that He might hide the substance of divinity, which was concealed in Him, and reveal only the human, which appeared in Him; those who could not discern and understand this have founded heresies. Among these, besides others, are the Arians, who contend that God the Father is greater than God the Son. Let the Catholic truth briefly and clearly respond to them.

God is great not by mass but by virtue. For we ask them, on what grounds do they declare the Father greater than the Son. If they say it is by size, that is, by some bodily bulk, just as we might say, for example: That mountain is greater than this one, or: that city is greater than this one; we respond to them from the Gospel, because God is Spirit, and bodily things cannot be compared to spiritual things. For then it might be said that something is greater or lesser, when the form of the body is defined in both. But God is neither extended by bulk, nor distinguished by the features of a body, nor confined to places, nor restricted by narrowness, nor bounded by any limits: for God is great not by bulk, but by power. Therefore let the unworthy phantasms of thoughts, which impregnate the minds of the faithful with their imaginations, cease and rest; let also the familiarity of the flesh completely depart: when we think of God, no form of flesh should appear before our eyes. The Father is not greater than the Son by age. But again they say that the Father is greater in time, that is, in age; for they assert that in no way can it happen that he who begets and he who is begotten are coeval. For they say it is necessary that he who generates must first exist, from whom he who is born can later exist. And where does this come from, except from carnal thoughts? For they have learned this from the custom of human generation; nor do they consider that among men, where the son is weaker in age, there also the father is weaker in old age: and indeed, the son, who is younger by birth, whatever he grows and strengthens, the father grows old and weakens. Therefore, if they consistently insist that the Father is older, they must confess that the Son is stronger. Surely, if it is absurd to think this of God, let them finally desist from commending divine secrets with human understanding.

Example of light. But it is not enough to refute them in this way unless we can demonstrate something in visible creation where the one who is born is coeval with his generator. Therefore, to dispel these shadows of error, let us bring forth one lamp for comparison, which emits a tremulous light with the wick of burning linen. Surely, the flame burns: the flame is in substance, the radiance is in form; yet the radiance is born not of the radiance but of the flame: and still, the flame was never without its radiance, even though the radiance is born of the flame; but from the moment that first small flame began, it surely arose with its coeval radiance. Therefore, the radiance is coeval with the flame from which it is born, and the radiance would indeed be coeternal if the flame were eternal. In what manner Christ said he is inferior to the Father. But far be it from us that by this very lowly comparison we seem to have done injury to our Lord Jesus Christ. We must therefore show in the Gospel where the Son Himself or in what form He stated that He is inferior to the Father, having become obedient unto death, or where He showed Himself equal to the Father: "I and the Father are one." For they themselves say to us in opposition: "Behold, the Son Himself said: The Father is greater than I," nor do they understand that He said this while placed in the flesh, when He was not only made lesser by God the Father, but, as the divine Psalm speaks: "He was made a little lower than the angels." If they are willing to hear only this, why do they not pay attention to what He Himself again said: "I and the Father are one"? Next, let them consider from what context it is said: "The Father is greater than I." For when He was about to ascend to the Father, the disciples were saddened because He was leaving them in bodily form; and He said to them: "Because I said to you: I go to the Father, your heart is filled with sorrow. If you loved me, you would rejoice because I go to the Father; for the Father is greater than I." This is to say: for this reason, I withdraw from your eyes this form of a servant, in which the Father is greater than I, so that, with the form of the servant removed from the eyes of the flesh, you may be able to see the Lord spiritually.

Other words of Scripture.

Therefore, because of the true form of a servant which he had taken, he rightly said: "The Father is greater than I," because God is certainly greater than man; and because of the true form of God, in which he remained with the Father, he rightly said: "I and the Father are one." He ascended to the Father because he was a man, but he remained with the Father because he was God, for he came forth to us in the flesh, and did not depart from the Father. The Word, which was made flesh so that it might dwell among us, ascended, I say, to the Father; and he promised his presence, saying: "Behold, I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the world." According to the form of God, the apostle John says of him: "He is the true God, and eternal life." According to the form of a servant, the apostle Paul says of him: "Who, being in the form of God, did not consider it robbery to be equal with God, but emptied himself, taking the form of a servant." According to the form of God he speaks of himself: "I and the Father are one"; according to the form of a servant he says: "My soul is sorrowful unto death." Whence comes that confidence? Whence comes that fear? The former voice indeed from the property of the substance, the latter from the participation in the assumed infirmity.

Short conclusion.

Therefore, dearest ones, prudently understanding these things from the holy Scriptures, while we read, let us discern; but, while we discern, lest perchance we err, let us seek understanding from the Lord Himself.

Sermons - Sermon 265B

Sermon 265B The words referred to all who had been exiled. For, as manifested by the same Spirit, the consolation given to Paul was given to all who were in similar circumstances. The world was exiled or, we can say, living abroad [was exiled]. We were exiled in Babylon, yet do not cease to exclaim with a profound voice of the heart: "Lord, save us, we perish!" They blame us as exiles, and we pray as though dwelling in this place. Here, we perish unless we receive assistance from heaven.

Nonetheless, deceived by pride, we wished to change words rather than complain. Driven by the arrogance of the mind, not only to complain but also to contradict. To justify the behavior itself of those who exiled us. We, exiled, sojourn on earth, and thus it shall be necessary for us to understand ourselves as strangers and pilgrims.

So, "when will I come and appear before the face of God?" O, where will I be able to sojourn as not to offend anyone? Those at home as enemies, to those abroad as exiles. Nonetheless, hope has soothed me with its promise. This exile, upon which we have relied for a time, will not last long. Delivered to our motherland, there will be no longer muttering or gnashing of teeth. Then we will see face to face because all arrogance and forgetfulness will have been eradicated. On the Fortieth Day of the Ascension of the Lord Why does Christ spend forty days with the disciples after the resurrection? Our Lord Jesus Christ, after He rose from the dead, wanting to show with the most certain and faithful witness that He had risen in the same body in which He hung on the cross, was with His disciples for forty days, entering and leaving, eating and drinking. For thus it was necessary that the doubting be strengthened, and the truth of the Gospel be preached to posterity, and it be shown to believers that their flesh would have future incorruption and immortality in that eternal blessedness, and that it contradict those wicked men who feel and teach otherwise than truth about the Lord. For He ascended to heaven in that same body in which He, having died, visited the underworld. He placed that very dwelling of His now-immortal flesh in heaven, which He had fashioned for Himself in the womb of His virgin mother.

Ignorant people are not to be despised but taught.

Some indeed find it strange what the Lord says in the Gospel: No one has ascended to heaven except he who descended from heaven, the Son of Man who is in heaven. They ask how it is said that the Son of Man descended from heaven when he was conceived in the Virgin's womb here. Those who say these things should not be scorned, but taught; for I believe they ask piously, but they are not yet able to understand what they seek. For they do not know that divinity itself so assumed that humanity that one person became God and man; and that humanity so adhered to that divinity that one Christ became the Word, soul, and flesh. And therefore it was said: No one has ascended to heaven except he who descended from heaven, the Son of Man who is in heaven. The Son of God and the Son of Man, Christ. For each substance imparts to the other its own special name, both the divine to the human and the human to the divine; so that the Son of God is called man, and the Son of Man is called God, and both of them are one and the same Christ. For our Lord Jesus Christ deigned to take up man, so that He did not disdain to call Himself the Son of Man, as we read in many places in the Gospel. For He Himself said to the blessed Peter: "Whom do men say that the Son of Man is?" To which Peter, inspired by the same rock who is Christ, responded: "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God." Behold, there stands that psalmist whom David signified: now he appeared, for He touched the hearts of His own, and elicited the sound which He wished to be known to all. And speaking to the Jews of His coming at the end during His passion: "From now on you shall see," He said, "the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven." And in another place: "You shall see angels ascending and descending upon the Son of Man." When He says "ascending," He shows that He is in heaven; when He says "descending," He also demonstrates that He will never be absent from the earth, just as He promised His disciples when He was to ascend into heaven, saying: "Behold, I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the age."

Christ is the life of the world.

Thus did God love the human race, that He gave His only begotten Son for the life of the world. For unless the Father had delivered life, we would not have life; and unless that life itself had died, death would not have been slain. Indeed, the Lord Christ Himself is life, of whom the evangelist John says: This is the true God, and eternal life. He also, by the Prophet, threatened death with death, saying: I will be your death, O death; I will be your sting, O hell! As if He were saying: By dying, I will slay you, I will consume you, I will take away all your power, I will rescue the captives you held. You wished to hold the innocent; it is just that you lose those you wished to hold.

We have been made heirs of eternal life.

Therefore, life died, and life remained, and life resurrected, and by killing death with his death, he conferred life upon us. Death was therefore swallowed up in the victory of Christ, who is eternal life; therefore he swallowed up death, as the Apostle says, so that we might be heirs of life. Through Christ, therefore, we have been made heirs of eternal life, through whom we have been freed from everlasting death, of whom we do not doubt we are also members. On the fortieth day, that is today, the Lord Jesus ascended into heaven, with the disciples watching and marveling; for while they were standing and conversing, suddenly a cloud received him, and he was taken from them into heaven.

Sermons - Sermon 265C

Sermon 265/C On the Forty Days of the Ascension of the Lord Each one lifts up what they hold precious.

We celebrate today the ascension of the Lord into heaven in the flesh in which the Lord rose; the anniversary festival does not recall the event, but renews the memory. Let us ascend in the meantime with Him in heart, certain that we also follow in flesh. We have not heard in vain, "Lift up your hearts"; nor does the Apostle exhort us without cause, saying: "If you have risen with Christ, seek the things that are above, where Christ is seated at the right hand of God; set your minds on things that are above, not on things that are on earth." Lift yourselves up from the earth: the body cannot do so, but the soul will. Lift yourselves up from the earth: endure labors on earth, think of rest in heaven; do well here, to remain there forever. The heart does not have a place on earth, where it preserves its integrity; if it remains on earth, it is corrupted. Whatever each one has that is precious, he lifts it up; many men, indeed all men, when they hear that some dangers of wars are threatening on earth, seek where to keep everything dear. Is it not so? Can anyone in the human race be otherwise than I say? He has silver, he has gold, he has gems, he has precious necklaces, he has costly garments; he seeks where to keep them, indeed so as not to lose what he has. It is better to place what he has better above, place it above. What does he have better than his heart? Earthly things are possessed by the heart. Indeed little children, because they do not yet have sense and understanding in usage - they have it set aside, what has been created in them has not yet awakened - do they possess anything? An heir of all things is born, and although all things are already rightfully his, he does not yet possess them, because he does not yet have the means to possess. Therefore, the Apostle said: "As long as the heir is a child, he is no different from a servant." Therefore, whatever we possess on earth, it is through heart, intellect, sense, talent, reason, thought, counsel. How much have I said, and what have I said? Who indeed comprehends himself? How much less Him, who made himself? Let us commit what we have dear there. Look around at all your things, my brothers, and find what you hold dearer. I also advise the greedy: how much easier it is for the not-greedy to hear me! I convince the greedy: O you greedy, acquisitive man, gathering profits from wherever, whether honestly or shamefully, you heap up much dirt for yourself; you collect dirt, and do you not fear to be stuck there, earthly things are dear to you. You are a man, you have a body, you have a soul; in your own body, I first seek what you hold dearer. I think, you find nothing dearer in your body than your eyes. Indeed, those who love a person much say: I love you as my eyes. Let us make steps to the point that I wish to demonstrate. In your limbs, nothing is dearer to you than your eye. Now consider your treasures, consider what you keep. If someone were to say to you: Either give me what you keep on earth, or now I will take your eyes; would you not give everything for your eyes? You would give everything so as not to remain blind in your riches; for you would not possess what you could not see. And indeed your greed possesses gold, some extreme and small part of earth; with your eyes you possess heaven, with your eyes you look at the sun, with your eyes you consider the stars, through your eyes you are the possessor of the world. And why say much? Ask yourself, your soul will answer for your body: Give all, protect my windows. Your soul says this to you: I have two windows in your face, through them I see this light: give gold, lest my windows be closed. Therefore, you give all for your eyes. The mind itself is dearer than the eyes.

Certainly you have nothing dearer than your eyes: indeed nothing, but in the body. For I show you something dearer that you have than your eyes: now you will confess, to whom I speak, there is something dearer in you than your eyes. To whom I speak, I say, not through what I speak; through the ear I come to the mind, through the ear I excite the mind, through sound I speak to the mind, I exhort the mind, I build up the mind. I inquire of that very mind, and about that mind, and I question man in this way. Already I used to say, if anyone wished to take treasures or eyes from you, one of two, you would choose the eyes: although grieving, you would lose treasures, lest you lose eyes. Now I ask about the very eyes. If it is allowed to hold both, it is happiness, eyes and mind. If it is not allowed to hold both, and one of them is proposed: Choose what is better, to lose the eyes of the body, or the mind. If you lose the mind, you will be a brute; if you lose the eyes, you will have the mind, you will be a man. Say, choose what you wish. What do you want to be, a blind man, or a seeing brute? You have cried out, you have chosen; what you have chosen, from where have you seen? what have I shown, that you cried out? Some beautiful colors, some very lovely shapes, gold, silver did I show? Did I display some gems for you to look at? None of these: yet you have cried out, and by crying out you showed that you have chosen. From where did you see what you chose, it is the very mind, to which I speak. From where you chose what you heard through my word, believe this in the Word of God. This you hear and do, when it is said: Lift up your heart. Think of Christ sitting at the right hand of the Father; think of Him coming to judge the living and the dead. Let faith think: faith is in the mind, faith is in the foundation of the heart. See who died for you; consider His ascent, love His patience; consider His ascent, and hold Him dying. For such a great promise you have a pledge, what Christ promised you: what He did today, His ascension, is a promise to you. We ought to hope that we will rise, and ascend to the kingdom of God, and there we will always be with God, living without end, rejoicing without any sadness, remaining without trouble. There it will not be said to you: Beware of evil; but: Hold on to good. Great is what is promised; when would timid and weak mortality dare promise this to itself? When would this decay dare promise itself these things, considering what it was, when it promised itself these things? God promised these things. To believe, He says, that you will ascend to me, first I descend to you; and to believe that you will live from me, first I die for you.

Sermons - Sermon 265D

Sermon 265/D On the fortieth day of the Ascension of the Lord The error of the Manichaeans regarding the flesh of Christ.

We have heard, when the holy Gospel was being read, and in awe we believed, and believing we were amazed, that the Lord appeared after His resurrection from the dead, offering Himself as proof to those who were dying, as an example to those who would rise again. He appeared to those in despair, who, when terrified, thought they saw a spirit. There is a malignant heresy, which even today believes what the disciples believed at that time: the Manicheans say that the Lord Christ was a spirit, not a body, and that all that happened was in the form of a body, and that it appeared more as movements of the limbs rather than being such. Let us address these people briefly, with your patience; because perhaps they may be hidden among you, let them not miss this occasion of the reading. The error of the Manicheans was once of the Apostles.

What do you say, whoever you are, Manichaean, what do you say? Christ, he says, was a spirit, he did not have flesh, but appeared as if he had flesh. I admit for now, I admit one who contradicts, in order to make, if I can, a believer. You are undoubtedly saying that Christ was seen to be a spirit, not a body? This, you say. This, I say, even the disciples once thought. Therefore, I am not very angry, because you have erred in this way: but clearly you are to be condemned, because you remained in error when they were corrected. Was Christ a spirit, did he not have flesh? I admitted one who contradicts, listen to the teacher; listen, I say, to the teacher, not to me, but to him. Go, and say, and boast, and preach, and teach, and penetrate houses, and lead captive silly women laden with sins; do it, and say: Christ was a spirit, he did not have flesh and bones. Hear him saying: Why are you troubled, and why do thoughts arise in your hearts? See my hands and my feet; handle and see, for a spirit does not have flesh and bones, as you see I have. What are you contradicting? Are you a Christian? If you are a Christian, hear Christ saying: Why do thoughts arise in your hearts? See my hands and my feet; handle and see, for a spirit - that is, what you think I am - does not have flesh and bones, as you see I have. Do you still contradict? If you still contradict, see whether it is perhaps no harm to think Christ was a spirit, even if he had true flesh. If it were no harm, the Lord would have left his disciples in that error. Do not scorn the wound that such a doctor cared to heal; those thoughts are like thorns that, if they did not harm the Lord's field, the diligent farmer would not have extirpated them with his hand. But the disciples were corrected, the Manichaeans are perverted; that thought made a passing entry in the disciples' hearts like a stranger; it took possession of the hearts of the Manichaeans like a mistress, because it invaded like an enemy. The Word, soul, and flesh in Christ.

Let it be taken care of, brothers, if anyone perhaps doubts this; let him hear the truth, let him set aside contention. Christ, Word, soul, and flesh. Any man, soul and flesh: Christ, Word and man. If Word and man, Word and soul and flesh. They are not three persons, Word and soul and flesh; because neither are you two, soul and flesh. You, soul and flesh, one man; he, Word, soul and flesh, one Christ. Furthermore, sometimes he speaks according to what is the Word, and yet Christ himself speaks; sometimes he speaks according to what is the soul, and yet Christ himself speaks; sometimes he speaks according to what is the flesh, and yet Christ himself speaks. Let us prove these with examples from divine scriptures. Hear according to the Word: I and the Father are one. Hear according to the soul: My soul is sorrowful unto death. Hear according to the flesh: It was necessary for Christ to suffer and to rise on the third day. Where to rise again, except in that which could fall? There he rose again, where he was dead. Seek death in the Word: it could never be. Seek death in the soul: it was never there, where sin was not. Seek death in the flesh: there indeed it was; and therefore the resurrection was true, because the death was true. There was death. Why was it, where there was no sin? There the penalty was without guilt, so that in us both the guilt and the penalty might be dissolved.

Why should Christ die when he has not sinned at all?

Why do you marvel that Christ died, when Christ did not sin at all? He wished to repay what he did not owe for you, so that he might release you from your debt. Rightfully, the devil possessed the deceived human race; he possessed what he had captured, he captured what he had deceived. Christ brought in mortal flesh the blood to be shed, by which the handwriting of sins would be erased. He would still hold the guilty if he had not killed the innocent. Now see how justly it is said to him: You killed one who owed nothing, restore the debtors. Behold, he says, the prince of this world comes, and he will find nothing in me. How is it nothing? Do you not have a soul, do you not have a body? Are you not also the Word? All these things nothing? By no means. Nothing of his own, because there is no sin. He is the prince of sins: the prince of sins will find nothing in me. I have not sinned, I have drawn nothing from Adam, who came to you from a virgin. I added nothing, because to whom should I add, since I had none, and by living justly, I committed nothing. Let him come, and if he can, let him find something of his own in me. But he will find nothing of his own in me; I have no sin: born innocently, I led an innocent life. Let him come, he will find nothing. Why then do you die, if he comes and finds nothing? And he gives the reason why he dies: Behold, the prince of this world will come, and he will find nothing in me. And as if we were to say: Why then do you die? he replied: But so that all may know that I do the will of my Father, rise, let us go hence, to the passion, for the will of the good Father, not because of the debt to the evil prince. The cross of Christ was the trap for the devil.

Why then do you marvel? Certainly, Christ is life: why did life die? Neither the soul died, nor did the Word die; the flesh died, so that in it death might die. Having suffered death, He killed death; He placed bait on the trap for the lion. The fish would not be caught on the hook if it did not want to devour anything. The devil was greedy for death, the devil was covetous for death. The cross of Christ was the trap; the death of Christ, rather the mortal flesh of Christ was like bait in the trap. He came, he swallowed it, and he was caught. Behold, Christ has risen: where is death? Already it is said in His flesh what will be said in ours at the end: Death has been swallowed up in victory. It was flesh, but it was not corruption. While the nature remains, the quality is changed: the substance itself, but there is no longer any defect, no slowness, no corruption, no need, nothing mortal, nothing like we are accustomed to know on earth. He was touched, handled, felt, but not killed. The Apostles had not yet been endowed with power from on high.

Listen further. He ascended into heaven, and was taken from the sight of the disciples; he left those watching and made them witnesses. It was said to them: Why do you stand? This Jesus, who was taken up from you, will come in the same way. In the same way, how is that? In the same form, in the same flesh: They will see the one whom they pierced. He will come in the same manner as you saw Him going into heaven. Certainly, they saw, certainly they touched, they felt: they strengthened their faith both by seeing and by touching. They escorted Him ascending into heaven with their eyes: they listened attentively to the angel's voice proclaiming the coming Christ. Yet, now that all these things have been accomplished in them so that they might become witnesses of Christ, and endure all things bravely for the preaching of the truth, and contend against falsehood even unto blood, it was not that vision alone, nor the touching of the Lord's limbs that afforded them this power. But who granted them this? Hear the Lord Himself: But stay in the city, until you are clothed with power from on high. You have seen and touched; but you cannot yet preach and die for what you have seen and touched until you are clothed with power from on high. Let them go now, and ascribe to men their abilities, if they can. Peter was there, but he was not yet established on the rock; he was not yet clothed with power from on high; for no one can receive it unless it is given to him from heaven. To do right, you need a helper.

Therefore, brothers, let truth itself persuade us; let no one glory in his own strengths, let no one exalt in the freedom of his will. Alone, you are capable of sinning: to do right, you need a helper. Say, “Be my helper, do not forsake me”; woe to you if He forsakes you. When He leaves you to yourself, to whom does He leave you but to a man? Do you not fear when you hear, “Cursed is everyone who puts his hope in man”? Behold, Christ the Lord, as I said, is Word, soul, and flesh; there is God, there also are you; and one Christ. How are you there? By what merit, by what free will did the Lord take on human nature, was the Word clothed in human nature? What merit preceded the human nature itself? Or perhaps you will say that Christ was living well somewhere unknown and by living well earned the right to be received by the Word and to become one with the Word, and to be born of a virgin? God forbid, God forbid: remove this from the minds of Christians, Lord our God. We see Him as the only-begotten from the Father, full of grace and truth. For the Word had no way to die for you: it was fitting that Christ should die for you, and in the Word, there was no way to die for you; for the Word, being simple life, without flesh and blood, without any changeability, was in the beginning, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. How far from death! Therefore, what mercy! Mary indeed was of human stock: a virgin, but human; holy, but human. However, the Lord, the only-begotten Word, took on for you what He would offer for you. He took it on for you, but only from you; because He had nothing in Himself from which He could die for you. Neither did you have anything from which to live, nor did He have anything from which to die. Oh great change! Live from what is His, because He died from what is yours.

Sermons - Sermon 265E

Sermon 265/E On the Fortieth Day of the Ascension of the Lord

Fragment You hold me as a debtor only for the day of judgment.

He poured out. I have given. The price for you came from His side. The pouch of your price hung on the wood. Therefore, I have given you the blood of Christ. I have given the resurrection. I have given the Holy Spirit sent by Him. I have given the Church spread throughout the entire world. I promised idols to be broken, the temples of demons overthrown. It has been done. It is given. I promised that through heresies the Church would have its exercise without perishing, and with some useless branches cut off, the vine would be pruned, not cut down. And this I have given. It has been done. I promised the blood and crowns of martyrs. I have given. Only on the day of judgment do you still hold me as a debtor. Why do you hasten? Even that will be returned. And would that, as He comes, so He finds you prepared!

See Christ humbled and see Him exalted.

Therefore, we sang of Christ: You are the Most High Lord over all the earth. You are exceedingly exalted above all gods. For who is exalted but he who has been humbled? See the humbled one and the exalted one. The Apostle tells you both. Indeed, he was exalted from the beginning because in the beginning was the Word. This height lacks a beginning, lacks time because all things were made through him. What does the Apostle say about him? Though he was in the form of God, he did not consider equality with God as something to be grasped, because it was by nature that it was not by grasping. For he did not claim equality with God for himself, but he was always equal, because he was born equal. Therefore, though he was in the form of God, he did not consider equality with God as something to be grasped. You have heard of his ineffable height. Hear also of his humility. He emptied himself, he says. How? Did he therefore lose what he was? No. And how did he empty himself? Not by losing what he was, but by taking on what he was not. Listen to the Apostle explaining this. When he said: He emptied himself, as if we were to ask how, he added: Taking the form of a servant, not losing what he was, but taking on what he was not, existing in the form of God, afterward taking the form of a servant. Therefore, the emptying was in taking on humble things, not in losing sublime things. By taking the form of a servant he emptied himself. Within the man, God was hidden. If what was inside had been seen, that man would not have been crucified. If that man had not been crucified, that blood would not have been shed. If that blood had not been shed, the world would not have been redeemed. Therefore, he emptied himself by taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men - for he was not made in the form of God because all things were made through him, so that it would not be said: The Word was made. Therefore, he who made all was made so that what he made would not perish. Made in the likeness of men and found in appearance as a man. He humbled himself, becoming obedient to death, even death on a cross. Behold how far he was humbled. And what follows? Therefore God exalted him and bestowed on him the name that is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow in heaven and on earth and under the earth and every tongue confess that the Lord Jesus Christ is in the glory of God the Father. Exceedingly exalted above all gods and you alone are the Most High over all the earth.

There is much difference between Christ and other men.

Exalted exceedingly above all gods. Above which gods? For there are gods. The Psalm shows us: God stood in the assembly of gods, calling men born of man gods. But they are adopted sons. One is by nature, others by grace. One Son is by nature, the rest by grace. Our Lord Jesus Christ is the Son by nature according to that which is the Word. Who are adopted? The others who believed in him. Those men, that man but exceedingly exalted above all gods. Much difference is there between you and them. You were born, they were born; but the condition is different, the mercy is different. You died, they die; but the necessity is different, the kindness is different. We all die by necessity, he alone died by kindness. We are all born by condition, he was born by mercy. Therefore exceedingly exalted above all gods, because you are a man and men are compared to you as if, but one is a virginal birth, the other a conception by concupiscence. You have risen, they shall rise, but it is different what is said: His flesh did not see corruption and another: He was gathered to his fathers and saw corruption. The flesh of all who die is given over to corruption; on the third day you rose, corruption could not work in you. In heaven you have preceded; you have sat at the right hand of the Father; all confess you, angels, men, heavens, earth, underworld.

Christ and the Church.

You are exceedingly exalted above all gods, it was well said to him and best through prophecy, because what we see being fulfilled - because it is also fulfilled here: Hear, daughter, and see - be exalted above the heavens, O God, it was said about this: You are exceedingly exalted above all gods. To whom was this said: You are exceedingly exalted above all gods? To Christ. And what about the Church? And your glory above all the earth. Be exalted above the heavens, O God. We have not seen Christ. The Apostles saw him. They were there. He brought them to the Mount of Olives and they asked him about the end of the age and he said to them: It is not for you to know the times which the Father has placed in his own power, but you will receive power when the Holy Spirit has come upon you and you will be my witnesses in Jerusalem and in all Judea and to the ends of the earth. After he said these things, a cloud received him. After these words, he did not want to say anything. He wanted the last things to be those which he would more vehemently recommend to our heart about the future Church through the whole world, because many were going to make for themselves their own flocks, to gather disciples after themselves and to make for themselves heresies and schisms in various places. There the vine itself holds everywhere from which the branches were cut off. Where a branch is cut off, it remains there. The vine grows and occupies everything, holds everything. Thus the Church has done.

Whence He granted the Church, as He promised, the bridegroom to the bride. Be exalted above the heavens, O God. Who is God? Except Christ, of whom we spoke today: Exalted above all gods and His glory above the earth? What is your glory? Your Church, your spouse. Hence the Apostle says: A man indeed ought not to cover his head, because he is the image and glory of God. But the woman is the glory of the man. The wife is the glory of the man. Who is the wife of that great King? The whole Church. Where is He? Be exalted above the heavens, O God. Where is He? Exceedingly exalted above all gods. Where is she? And your glory above all the earth. Great mystery! We are invited to the nuptials and we ourselves are the nuptials. In human weddings, one is the bride, others are the invited. We both are invited and we ourselves are the bride. For we are the Church and in the Church invited. And to what are we invited? If it has been accomplished now, beloved, if we see now, if we observe that it has been fulfilled now, if what we say cannot be denied: Above all the earth is your glory, when He shall come, what shall we be? But if we keep what we have received.

Sermons - Sermon 265F

Sermon 265/F

1. On the day of Pentecost, when the Holy Spirit, whom the Lord had promised, came, a great multitude came to see the marvel. They saw unlearned men speaking in the tongues of all nations the wonderful works of God. The Apostle Peter, to satisfy the curiosity of the astonished crowd, addressed them with a speech: “Men of Israel, hear these words: Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved by God among you by miracles and wonders and signs, which God did by Him in the midst of you, as ye yourselves also know, Him, being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain.” Behold how he has sought witnesses among those who had but recently been his enemies, and fled from the crucifiers so that now hunting the same ones, he asks for a testimony from the guilty men, saying the truth.

2. But those, pricked in heart at his words, said to Peter and the rest of the apostles, “Men and brethren, what shall we do?” Then Peter said to them, “Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of your sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit. For the promise is unto you and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call.” And there were added that day about three thousand souls.

3. In this multitude that believed through the ministry of the apostles and was baptized, there were diverse nations. Therefore, the unity of the Church began to be among all people. The mystery of unity is the reason for the diverse tongues. If one person speaks many languages, he must be filled with the Holy Spirit, but when all people come and hear their language, they must be filled with the same Spirit.

4. Therefore, beloved, let's understand and contemplate the wonderful works of God. He who was to come is announced by the prophets, and having come, filled the apostles with the Holy Spirit to preach the gospel to all nations. He made them speak the languages of all, so they might build the unity of the Church, whose sacrifice is announced by the multitude of languages and nations which now begins to exist in the world. Thus it pleases God to make himself known to all who are called by his name, let us strive to keep this unity which makes God greater known, "in the bond of peace." ON THE DAY OF THE FORTIETH ASCENSION He who was Lord deigned to be a brother. On this day, beloved, we celebrate the solemnity of the Ascension of the Lord as you know. For He ascended, as you have heard, to His Father and to our Father, to His God and to our God. From where did we deserve the brotherhood of Christ? We would in no way ponder His brotherhood if He had not taken on our infirmity. For thus He is our brother because He was human. Therefore, He who was Lord, deigned to be a brother; always Lord, brother from a particular time; Lord by the form of God, brother by the form of a servant. For when He was in the form of God, He did not consider it robbery to be equal with God: there Lord. From where then brother? He emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant. If He were only a brother, that would be much. And He took the form of a servant, He deigned to be a servant. Is He ours or not? And ours.

For He Himself said of Himself: I came not to be served, but to serve. Concerning Him the Prophet foretold that the righteous one would justify many by serving well. But let us not be exalted. Often a master serves sick servants, so that he may have healthy servants to serve him: he serves the sick so that they may be healed. Our Lord serves the sick. Did He not make remedies from His own infirmity for the sick? He shed His blood for the sick, anointed the eyes of the blind with the collyrium of His blood.

Another is Christ without sin and another is man with sin.

He consequently became our brother by grace who is the Lord by nature. He said: "I ascend to my God and your God, to my Father and your Father." To whom did he command this to be said? "Go," he said, "tell my brothers, and because I am their brother, I ascend to my Father and your Father, my God and your God." He did not say: "I ascend to our Father"; nor did he say: "I ascend to our God." It is not for nothing that he says, "my Father and your Father, my God and your God." This distinction indicates something I must not be silent about. "My Father," because I am the only one; "your Father," because you were adopted through me. "My God," from where? Not as a creature is Christ. But as the Only Begotten. From where then: "My God"? The Psalm indicates it. Thus, "My God," because I took the form of a servant: "From my mother's womb you are my God." If you remove the mother’s womb where he was made man, he is not God to him, but his Father. Therefore, he is always his Father, the eternal Father of the eternal Son. But in order that he might be his God, the mother’s womb was added, and it is said in the Prophet: "You are my God." But not in the same way as ours. For our God, because he made sinners saved! But his God because he was made man without sin. Therefore, when he came to God, he distinguished, "my God and your God." "My God," how? Because I am man. Why not then together ours, because you are man, and we are men? But different is the man without sin, who came to erase sins; and different is the man with sin, to whom he came to be freed from sin. Thus, this distinction is not separation. We have a Father in heaven, but Christ otherwise, because he, the sinless only one, adopted us. We have a God in heaven, but Christ otherwise, because he is sinless, and we are sinners.

We belong to a great family.

However, that dignity is what the Apostle says: Heirs indeed of God, but coheirs with Christ. We find the Father in heaven, we belong to a great family. The Son came from there to us to become a brother. He did not leave the Father when he approached us, nor did he leave us when he returned to the Father. Let us believe that Christ is in heaven, let us believe that He is with us. How is He in heaven if He is with us? How is He God? My word is both with me and with you; it is with me in my heart, and with you in your ears. If my word can do this, could not the Word of God? He did indeed descend when He was here. What then is descending? Christ Jesus appearing. How did Jesus appear? Because He became human. What then is ascending? The body of Christ being lifted to heaven, not His majesty migrating. To where He ascended, from there He will descend; and as He ascended, so He will descend. The voice of angels, not ours, indeed said so. The disciples stood there and, seeing Him ascend, were led. And it was said to them: Men of Galilee, why do you stand? This Jesus will come in the same way as you saw Him going into heaven. What is: He will come in the same way? He will be judged in the same form in which He was judged. Visible not only to the righteous, but visible to the unrighteous as well, He will come to be seen by the righteous and the unrighteous. The unrighteous will be able to see Him, but they will not be able to reign with Him.

Conclusion.

Let us therefore celebrate the holy day of Lent; for the whole world celebrates this day with us. And the Church spread throughout the whole world celebrates the fiftieth day with us; therefore the celebration of the twentieth and thirtieth days is a custom of Africa, not a sacrament of the Church.

Sermons - Sermon 266

SERMO 266 IN THE VIGILS OF PENTECOST AGAINST THE DONATISTS Verses of the psalm wrongly understood by the Donatists.

Among the other divine words, which we heard while the Psalm was sung, it pleases us with the Lord's help to examine and discuss mainly this statement, in which it is said: "The righteous will correct me in mercy and reprove me; but the oil of the sinner will not anoint my head." For some have believed that the oil of the sinner is the oil of man; because every man is a liar. But the oil of Christ, because He had no sin at all, even if it is administered through a sinner, is not the oil of a sinner. When three considerations arise to the mind; from whom it is given, to whom it is given, by whom it is given: let us not fear the oil of the sinner, because the intermediary minister does not intercept the grace of the giver.

Every single man spoke in all tongues.

Certainly, we are now celebrating the solemnity of the coming of the Holy Spirit: for on the day of Pentecost, which has already begun, there were in one place one hundred and twenty souls, among whom were the Apostles and the mother of the Lord, and others of both sexes praying and expecting the promise of Christ, that is, the coming of the Holy Spirit. The hope of those who were expecting was not in vain, because the promise of the one who promised was not false: what was expected came, and it found pure vessels into which it could be received. Tongues like fire appeared to them, which also rested on each one of them; and they began to speak in tongues as the Spirit gave them to utter. Each man spoke in all languages, because the future Church was being foretold in all languages. One man was a sign of unity: all languages in one man, all nations in unity. Those who were filled spoke, and those who were empty were amazed; and what is more reprehensible, they were amazed and they calumniated. For they said: These men are full of new wine. What a foolish and calumnious reproach! A drunken man does not learn a foreign language, but loses his own. Nevertheless, through the ignorant and calumniators, the truth was speaking. For now, indeed, they were full of new wine, because they had become new wineskins. But the old wineskins wondered at the new wineskins, and by calumniating neither were they renewed nor were they filled. But with the calumny finally repressed, when soon the ears were lent to the Apostles who were speaking and giving reason and preaching the grace of Christ, they were pricked in the heart by listening, they were changed by the pricking, changed they believed; believing, they deserved to receive what they had marveled at in others.

One is the giver, another is the minister.

Then the Holy Spirit began to be given through the ministry of the Apostles. They would lay hands, and it would come. But this was not of men: the minister should not presume more than what is as a minister. One is the giver, another the minister. For the Spirit testified to this so that men would not arrogate to themselves what was of God. From this, Simon wanted to become haughty, who, thinking this was to be attributed to humans, promised money to the Apostles so that through the laying on of his hands, the Holy Spirit might also come. He did not know grace. For if he acknowledged grace, he would have it freely. Hence, because he wanted to buy the Spirit, he did not merit to be redeemed by the Spirit. Who are you, man, that you want to become haughty? It is enough for you to be filled, not to be puffed up. He who is filled is rich: he who is puffed up is empty. But they say it was given through men. Was it therefore of men what was given? But they say it could not be given except through holy men. Did it come to them through men? The Apostles laid hands, and the Holy Spirit came: when it came to them, who laid hands on them? The Spirit is sometimes given without the ministry of men.

Receive and hold onto divine examples: but the words of God are, the authority of Scripture, the faith of words, the truth of examples. We read everything, we believe everything. Through the laying on of the hands of the Apostles, the Holy Spirit was given to many: but through whom it was given, they had received. When did they receive? When there were one hundred and twenty people in one room: each of them prayed, none laid hands; it came upon those praying, filled those praying, made those filled as ministers, and gave through them. Listen still. Philip the Evangelist, who preached the Gospel in Samaria, was one of the seven deacons: for out of necessity for the ministry, seven deacons were added to the twelve Apostles; one of whom was, as I said: Philip, who merited to be properly called an evangelist because of his keen preaching eloquence. Although all were doing this; this one, as I said, preached the Gospel in Samaria: many believed in Samaria, those who believed were baptized. But when the Apostles heard, they sent Peter and John to them, to lay hands on those baptized, and by laying hands on them, to invoke and obtain the Holy Spirit. Simon, admiring such a grace of the Apostles, wanted to offer money, as if that which was invoked could be set for sale: but he was rejected and found unworthy of such great grace. Therefore those received the Holy Spirit through the hands of the Apostles. Then indeed because Simon had thought that the gift of God was of men, so that this suspicion might not be confirmed among the weak; later a eunuch of Queen Candace was coming from Jerusalem, where he had gone to pray, and sitting in the chariot, was reading the prophet Isaiah. Then the Holy Spirit said to Philip to approach the chariot. He who had baptized in Samaria and had laid hands on no one, and had announced it to the Apostles, so that by their coming and laying on of hands those baptized by him might merit to receive the Holy Spirit, approached the chariot and asked the eunuch whether he understood what he was reading. He replied that he could understand if he had an expositor: he asked Philip to ascend the chariot; he ascended, sat with him, found him reading in the prophet Isaiah what had been foretold about Christ: He was led like a sheep to the slaughter, and other surrounding contexts of that reading. Then, asking whether the Prophet was speaking about himself or another; with the door of opportunity opened, he evangelized Christ, the door of salvation. While these things were happening on the journey, they came to water, and the eunuch said to Philip: "Here is water, what prevents me from being baptized?" Philip said: "If you believe, it may be done." And he said: "I believe that Jesus is the Son of God." They went down into the water, Philip baptized him. After they came up from the water, the Holy Spirit came upon the eunuch. Behold Philip was there, who had baptized in Samaria and led those baptized to the Apostles, baptized but did not lay hands: but to show that Simon's suspicion, that the Spirit of God was the gift of men, was untrue, it came upon a man liberally, and made him free. It came as God and filled; as the Lord came and redeemed.

Philip the deacon is different from the Apostle.

Perhaps someone might argue about those who are contentious, that Philip who baptized in Samaria was not a deacon, but was an apostle; for Philip is named among the Apostles, and one of the seven deacons is properly called an evangelist. But let them suspect what they want, I will quickly solve the question. Whether he was an apostle or a deacon, what the reading kept silent, let this be uncertain. This, however, is written: because as soon as he came up out of the water, the Holy Spirit came upon the eunuch. No one there mentions the laying on of hands. Perhaps this is still too little: for that person says, Someone completely laid hands on him, but Scripture kept this silent. On the narration of Cornelius the centurion. So what do you say? This, he says, I say, because in those first one hundred and twenty indeed, because then the Holy Spirit was coming for the first time, it came without the laying on of hands; but from then on it came to no one, unless hands had been laid on them. You have forgotten Cornelius the centurion: read carefully, and understand prudently. Cornelius the centurion, as read in the same book of the Acts of the Apostles, where the coming of the Holy Spirit is also proclaimed. An angel was sent to Cornelius the centurion, announcing to him that his alms were accepted and his prayers heard; therefore, he must send for Peter, who was residing in Joppa at the house of Simon the tanner, and summon him. But at that time a great question arose among the Jews and the Gentiles, that is, between those who believed from the Jews and those who believed from the Gentiles, whether the Gospel ought to be ministered to the uncircumcised. There was great hesitation about this, when Cornelius sent for Peter. Meanwhile Peter was admonished, the matter of the kingdom of heaven was being conducted both there and here, by Him who is everywhere. For while these things were being carried out with Cornelius, Peter in Joppa became hungry, went up to pray while a meal was being prepared for him, and while praying, his mind was carried away; but from the lower to the higher; not to deviate but to see. A dish was sent down to him from heaven, as if a heavenly feast for the hungry. But this dish was bound by four lines, containing all kinds of animals, clean and unclean, and a heavenly voice struck the hungry one: Peter, rise; kill and eat. He looked upon it and saw in the dish unclean animals, which he was not accustomed to touch, and responded to the voice: Not so, Lord: nothing common or unclean has ever entered my mouth. And the voice said to him: What God has cleansed, you must not call common. It was not carnal food offered to Peter, but Cornelius purified was announced. This happened three times, and the vessel was taken up into heaven. An evident mystery. The dish is the world. The four lines holding the dish are the four cardinal points of the world, which Scripture mentions, saying: From the East and West, and from the North and Sea. The animals are all the nations. The dish sent down three times signifies the commendation of the Trinity. Peter signifies the Church; Peter hungry, the Church desiring the faith of the Gentiles. The heavenly voice, the holy Gospel. Kill and eat: slay what they are, make what you are. While Peter was perplexed about the command, it was suddenly announced that some soldiers sent by Cornelius wished to see him. And the Holy Spirit said to Peter: Go with them; I have sent them. Peter proceeded, now not hesitating about the vision but certain; and as it is read, he was proclaimed to Cornelius, met humbly, prostrated humbly; raised more humbly. They reached the house, found many others gathered. He narrated to Peter why he had sent for him, and thanks were given that Peter had come. Therefore, he began to preach to the uncircumcised Gentiles, from where that great question was turning, the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ. Some were present with Peter, who had believed from among the Jews, who might have been troubled if the uncircumcised were baptized. There Peter plainly said: You know, brothers, how abominable it is for a Jew to associate with or come to a Gentile; but God has shown me not to call any man common or unclean. The hungry one looked at the dish.

Against the Donatists. Where are those who used to say: for this reason did I narrate everything, for I want to say: where are those who used to say that the Holy Spirit is given by human authority? While Peter was evangelizing, Cornelius and all those who were with him, that is, the Gentiles, believed; and suddenly, before they were baptized, they were filled with the Holy Spirit. What does human presumption respond here? Not only before the laying on of hands, but before baptism itself, the Holy Spirit came; of power, not of necessity. He came before the washing of baptism to remove the controversy of circumcision. For it could be said by those who slander or do not understand to Peter: You did wrong in giving the Holy Spirit. Behold, it is fulfilled, behold, it is shown what the Lord said: The Spirit breathes where He wills. Behold it is fulfilled, behold it is shown how true it is what the Lord said: The Spirit breathes where He wills. And yet the spirit of arrogance is not yet expelled from the proud heretic. He still says: It is mine; do not take from him, but from me. You respond: I seek what is of God. He: Have you not read: But let not the oil of the sinner anoint my head? Therefore is the oil yours? If it is yours, I do not want it: if it is yours, it is bad. But if it is of God, even through you it is good. Mud does not taint the ray of the sun, and do you taint the oil of God? Therefore, you have it for your evil, because you have what is good badly; you have received what is of God as an evil one: because you, being separated, have not gathered, but scattered. Those who eat unworthily eat and drink judgment on themselves; because they eat unworthily, do they not eat? Christ gave the morsel to Judas unworthily, and he took it to his judgment. Did he receive it from an evil one? Did he receive evil? But he is guilty because being evil, he received good from the good one. Therefore, the oil of the sinner is not salvific oil. Let it be well accepted, and it is good: even if it is badly accepted, it is good. Woe to men who accept good badly!

Love the reprover, beware of the flatterer.

See, however, the sense of Scripture, lest perhaps it suggests something that may be open to better understanding. "The righteous will correct me," he says, "in mercy": and even if he beats, he loves, the reprover loves; the flatterer deceives: he pities, he circumvents. Hard is the rod of the beater, soft is the oil of the flatterer. Indeed, all flatterers anoint the head, they do not heal the innards. Love the reprover, beware of the flatterer. For if you love the truthful reprover, and beware of the deceitful flatterer, you can say what is sung: "The righteous will correct me in mercy, and rebuke me; but the oil of the sinner," that is, the flattery of the flatterer, "will not anoint my head." A fat-head is a great head: a great head is a proud head. It is better to have a healthy heart than a great head: but a healthy heart is made by the rod of the reprover; a great head is made by the oil of the sinner, that is, the flattery of the flatterer. If you have made your head great, beware of the weight of the head, lest you be led to a precipice. These, as much as I think, for the time being, about this one sentence of the Psalm, we have spoken sufficiently, with the Lord helping, and building up your hearts in secret.

Sermons - Sermon 267

SERMO 267 ON THE DAY OF PENTECOST The solemnity of the coming of the Holy Spirit.

Today's solemnity, of the Lord God great and of great grace, which has been poured out upon us, makes us remember. For the solemnity is celebrated so that what happened once may not be erased from memory. For the solemnity derives its name from that which is customary in the year: just as the perennial nature of a river is named because it does not dry up in summer, but flows throughout the year; therefore it is called perennial, that is, throughout the year; so too solemn, which is customary to be celebrated annually. Today we celebrate the coming of the Holy Spirit. For the Lord sent the Holy Spirit from heaven, whom he promised on earth. And because he had promised to send it from heaven: He cannot come, he said, unless I go away; but when I go, I will send him to you; he suffered, died, rose again, ascended: it remained that he should fulfill what he had promised. His disciples, one hundred and twenty souls as it is written, awaited this, a tenfold number of Apostles; for he chose twelve, and sent the Spirit upon one hundred and twenty: therefore, while waiting for this promise, they were in one house, praying: for they were already desiring by that faith, by that prayer, by that spiritual desire; they were new wineskins, new wine from heaven was awaited, and it came. For already that great bunch had been crushed and glorified. For we read in the Gospel: For the Spirit had not yet been given, because Jesus had not yet been glorified. The gift of tongues.

You have already heard what he answered, a great miracle. All who were present had learned one language. The Holy Spirit came; they were filled, they began to speak in various languages of all nations, which they had not known, nor had they learned: but He who had come was teaching; He entered, they were filled, He poured out. And then this was the sign, whoever received the Holy Spirit, suddenly filled with the Spirit, spoke in all tongues; not only those one hundred and twenty. The Scriptures themselves teach us, afterward the people believed, they were baptized, they received the Holy Spirit, and spoke in the languages of all nations. Those who were present were amazed, some admiring, others mocking: so that they said, These men are drunk, they are full of new wine. They laughed, and they said something true. For they were filled like wineskins with new wine. You have heard when the Gospel was read: No one puts new wine into old wineskins: the carnal does not comprehend the spiritual. Carnality is oldness, grace is newness. The more a man is renewed for the better, the more he receives, which truly tastes. The new wine was bubbling, and with the new wine bubbling, the tongues of nations were flowing.

Now is fulfilled what was then promised. Is the Holy Spirit not given now, brothers? Anyone who thinks this is not worthy to receive it. He is given even now. Why then does no one speak in the languages of all nations as those who were filled with the Holy Spirit did back then? Why? Because what that signified has been fulfilled. What is that? When we celebrated Lent, recall that we commended to you that the Lord Jesus Christ commended His church and ascended. The disciples were asking, "When will the end of the age be?" And He said: "It is not for you to know the times or moments which the Father has placed in His own power." He was still promising what He fulfilled today: "You will receive power from the Holy Spirit coming upon you, and you will be my witnesses in Jerusalem, and in all Judea and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth." The church was then in one house; it received the Holy Spirit: it was in a few people, it was in the languages of the whole world. Behold what was signified then. For that small church spoke in the languages of all nations, what is it, except that this great church now speaks in the languages of all nations from the rising of the sun to its setting? What was then promised is now fulfilled. We have heard, we see. Hear, daughter, and see: it was said to the queen herself: Hear, daughter, and see; hear the promise, see it fulfilled. Your God has not deceived you, your bridegroom has not deceived you, He who endowed you with His blood has not deceived you: He has not deceived you who made you beautiful from foul, a virgin from unclean. You were promised to yourself: but promised in few, fulfilled in many. The Holy Spirit is the soul of the body of the Church.

Let no one, therefore, say: I have received the Holy Spirit; why do I not speak in the tongues of all nations? If you want to have the Holy Spirit, pay attention, my brethren: our spirit by which every man lives is called the soul; our spirit by which each individual man lives is called the soul: and you see what the soul does in the body. It enlivens all the members; it sees through the eyes, hears through the ears, smells through the nostrils, speaks through the tongue, works through the hands, walks through the feet: it is present simultaneously in all the members so that they may live; it gives life to all, functions to each. The eye does not hear, the ear does not see, the tongue does not see, nor does the ear and the eye speak; but yet they live: the ear lives, the tongue lives; the roles are different, the life is common. So it is with the Church of God: in some saints, it performs miracles, in some saints, it speaks the truth, in some saints, it preserves virginity, in some saints, it maintains conjugal chastity, in some this, in some that: each does its own work, but they live equally. Now what the soul is to the body of man, this the Holy Spirit is to the body of Christ, which is the Church: the Holy Spirit does in the whole Church what the soul does in all the members of one body. But see what you must beware of, see what you must observe, see what you must fear. It happens that in the human body, or rather from the body, some member is cut off, a hand, a finger, a foot; does the soul follow what is cut off? When it was in the body, it lived; once cut off, it loses life. So too the Christian man is catholic, as long as he lives in the body; once cut off, he becomes a heretic, a severed member does not have the spirit. Therefore, if you wish to live by the Holy Spirit, hold to love, love the truth, desire unity, so that you may attain to eternity. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 268

SERMO 268 ON THE DAY OF PENTECOST The unity of the church [is] in the languages of all nations.

Because of the coming of the Holy Spirit, today is a solemn day for us, the fiftieth from the resurrection of the Lord, multiplied by seven weeks. But if you count seven weeks, you will find forty-nine: one is added, so that unity may be commended to us. What did the coming of the Holy Spirit itself do? How did it teach its presence? How did it show itself? All spoke in the tongues of all nations. But there were one hundred and twenty in one place: the sacred number of the twelve Apostles was multiplied tenfold by mystery. Therefore, what? Did the individual ones upon whom the Holy Spirit came speak in the individual tongues of all nations, one in one tongue, another in another, and as if they divided among themselves the tongues of all nations? Not so: but each person, one person, spoke in the tongues of all nations. One person spoke in the tongues of all nations: the unity of the Church in the tongues of all nations. Behold also here, the unity of the Catholic Church, spread throughout the whole world, is commended.

Outside the Church there is no Holy Spirit.

Whoever, therefore, has the Holy Spirit is in the Church, which speaks in the tongues of all. Whoever is outside this Church does not have the Holy Spirit. For this reason, the Holy Spirit deigned to show Himself in all the tongues of the nations, so that he who is contained in the unity of the Church, which speaks in all tongues, may understand that he has the Holy Spirit. The Apostle Paul says: One body, and one spirit. Consider our members. The body is made up of many members, and one spirit animates all the members. See, with my human spirit, by which I am a human being, I gather all the members: I command the members to move, I direct the eyes to see, the ears to hear, the tongue to speak, the hands to work, the feet to walk. The duties of the members are distributed, but one spirit contains all. Many commands are given, many things are done: one commands, one is served. That is our spirit, that is, our soul, to our members; this is the Holy Spirit to the members of Christ, to the body of Christ, which is the Church. Therefore the Apostle, when he named one body, lest we understand it as a dead body, said, One body. But I ask you, does this body live? It lives. How? From one spirit. And one spirit. Therefore, consider, brothers, in our body and pity those who are cut off from the Church. In our members, as long as we live, when we are healthy, all the members fulfill their duties. If one member suffers from any place, all the members sympathize. Yet, because it is in the body, it can suffer, it cannot expire. For what does it mean "to expire," if not to lose the spirit? But indeed if a member is cut off from the body, does the spirit follow? And yet the member is recognized as what it is; it is a finger, a hand, an arm, an ear: apart from the body it has form, but it does not have life. So also the man separated from the Church. You inquire of him about the sacrament, you find it: you inquire about Baptism, you find it: you inquire about the creed, you find it. There is form: if you are not inwardly animated by the spirit, you boast in vain about the form outside.

Unity commended by God in the beginning of creation.

Beloved, God greatly commends unity. This very thing should move you, that in the beginning of creation, when God established all things, He made the stars in the sky, and on earth the herbs and trees; He said: Let the earth bring forth, and the trees and all greenery were brought forth; He said: Let the waters bring forth swimming creatures and birds, and it was so; Let the earth bring forth the living soul of all cattle and wild beasts, and it was so. Did God make all the other birds from one bird? Did He make all the fish from one fish? From one horse all horses? From one beast all beasts? Did not the earth bring forth many things simultaneously, and filled many with diverse offspring? It came to making man, and one was made; from one, the human race. Nor did He wish to make two separately, male and female: but one, and from one, one. Why so? Why does the human race start from one, if not because unity is commended to the human race? And the Lord Christ is from one, the unity of a virgin; he maintains virginity, preserves incorruption. The Lord commends the unity of the Church to the Apostles. The Lord himself commends the unity of the Church to the Apostles: he shows himself, they think they see a spirit: they are frightened, they are confirmed, it is said to them: Why are you troubled, and thoughts arise in your heart? See my hands: touch and see, for a spirit has not bones and flesh, as you see me having. Behold, yet they are troubled with joy, he takes food, not out of necessity, but by power; he takes it before them: he commends the truth of the body against the wicked, he commends the unity of the Church. For what does he say? Are not these the things which I spoke to you, while I was still with you, that all things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and the Prophets, and the Psalms concerning me? Then he opened their understanding, the Gospel speaks, so they might understand the Scriptures. And he said to them, Thus it is written, and thus it was necessary for Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day. Behold our head; behold the head, where are the members? Behold the bridegroom, where is the bride? Read the matrimonial tables: hear the bridegroom. Do you seek the bride? Hear from him: no one takes his own from him, no one substitutes another: hear from him. Where do you seek Christ? In the fables of men, or in the truth of the Gospels? He suffered, rose the third day, showed himself to his disciples. Now we have him: where do we seek her? Let us ask him: It was necessary for Christ to suffer and to rise from the dead the third day. Behold, it is done, it is seen. Say, O Lord; you say, Lord, lest we err: And that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. It began at Jerusalem, and came to us. And it is there, and here. For he did not depart from there that he might come to us: he grew, he did not migrate. This he commended right after his resurrection. He made with them forty days: about to ascend into heaven he again commended the Church itself. The bridegroom about to go commended his bride to his friends: not that they might love any of them; but him as the bridegroom, them as friends of the bridegroom, none of them as the bridegroom. This is what the friends of the bridegroom are zealous for, and do not admit her to be corrupted by illicit love. They hate when she is loved in this way. Observe the zealous friend of the bridegroom: when he saw the bride in a way committing fornication through the friends of the bridegroom, he said: I hear there are divisions among you, and in part I believe it. It has been reported to me about you, brethren, by those who are of Chloe, that there are contentions among you, and each one of you says: I am of Paul; I am of Apollos; I am of Cephas; I am of Christ. Is Christ divided? Was Paul crucified for you, or were you baptized in the name of Paul? O friend! He repels the love of another’s bride from himself. He does not want to be loved as the bridegroom, so he can reign with the bridegroom. Therefore the Church is commended: and when he ascended into heaven, he said to those who were inquiring about the end of the world: Tell us, when will these things happen, and what will be the time of your coming? And he said: It is not for you to know the times or periods which the Father has set by his own authority. Hear what you should know from the teacher, disciple: But you will receive power when the Holy Spirit has come upon you. And it happened: on the fortieth day he ascended into heaven, and behold, on this very day the Holy Spirit coming, filled all who were present, they spoke in the tongues of all nations. Again the same unity is commended through the tongues of all nations. It is commended by the Lord rising, commended by Christ ascending; confirmed by the Holy Spirit coming today.

Sermons - Sermon 269

SERMO 269 On the Day of Pentecost The unity of the Church is foreshadowed by the gift of tongues.

We celebrate the anniversary of the coming of the Holy Spirit. A solemn assembly, a solemn reading, and a solemn sermon are owed to this event. The first two have been completed, for you have gathered in great numbers, and you have listened when the reading was done. Let us carry out the third: let there not be a neglect of the service of our tongue for the one who both gifted all languages to the unlearned and subdued the languages of the learned in all nations, and gathered the diverse languages of nations into the unity of faith. For suddenly there came a sound from heaven, as if a violent wind were blowing: and there appeared to them tongues divided, as of fire, which also sat upon each one of them; and they began to speak in tongues, as the Spirit gave them to pronounce. That wind did not inflate but invigorated: that fire did not burn but animated. It was fulfilled in them what had been prophesied so long before: There are no tongues nor speeches whose voices are not heard: so that subsequently, when sent to preach the Gospel, they fulfilled what follows: Their sound has gone out into all the earth, and their words to the ends of the world. For what else did the Holy Spirit signify by giving the languages of all nations to those who had learned only the language of their own nation (which He then willed to be a sign of His presence), except that all nations would believe in the Gospel; so that at first each individual believer, and afterwards the very unity of the Church, would speak in all languages? What do those who refuse to be incorporated and joined with the Christian society, which bears fruit and grows in all nations, say to this? Can they deny that even now the Holy Spirit comes to Christians? Why then does no one now speak in the languages of all nations (which then was a sign of His coming), neither among us nor among them, except because what was then signified is now fulfilled? For then even one faithful individual spoke in all languages: and now the unity of the faithful speaks in all languages. Therefore even now all languages are ours, because we are members of the body in which they exist. The distinction between the reception of baptism and the reception of the Spirit. And rightly so, it is properly understood, that although we admit they have the Baptism of Christ, heretics and schismatics do not receive the Holy Spirit unless they adhere to the unity through the bond of charity. For then, indeed, the tongues of nations will also be their tongues: because where those tongues are, they too shall be, namely, in the same body of Christ growing everywhere, preserving the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace. Whoever is not bound by this bond is a servant. For, as the Apostle says, we have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear; but we have received the Spirit of adoption of sons, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. Therefore, we truly understand that the Holy Spirit showed His presence by the tongues of all nations at that time, so that even now, when He does not show Himself in the same way, it should be understood that whoever is baptized in the sacrament of Baptism but separated from the unity of all nations does not have Him. And lest it be thought that it naturally follows that whoever has the Baptism of the Trinity also has the Holy Spirit, a significant distinction has been made even within unity, so that we find some who, having been baptized, later received the Holy Spirit when the Apostles came to them in Samaria, though they were baptized in their absence. Others, in a singular example, received the Spirit before Baptism; as when Peter was speaking, Cornelius and those with him were granted it by heavenly power, which no man can contradict. For others, the Spirit came immediately after Baptism, as with the eunuch to whom Philip preached Christ from the prophet Isaiah. For others, it was by the laying on of the Apostles' hands, as with many. For others, it was not by the laying on of hands, but by all praying; as on that very day we solemnly celebrate today, when there were a hundred and twenty souls in one room with the Apostles. For others, it was without any laying on of hands or any praying, but while all were hearing the word of God; as with those I mentioned earlier, Cornelius and his household.

Why, then, sometimes in one way, and other times in another way, except that nothing may be attributed to human pride, but all to divine grace and power? This distinction between the reception of Baptism and the reception of the Holy Spirit instructs us sufficiently, that we should not think these people immediately have the Holy Spirit, whom we do not deny have Baptism. How much more those, whom no Christian charity of unity has armed! For the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts; not by ourselves, but, as follows, by the Holy Spirit who is given unto us. Wherefore, as at that time the tongues of all nations indicated the presence of the Holy Spirit in one person; so now, charity of the unity of all nations indicates His presence.

Against the Donatist Schismatics. But the natural man, these are the words of the Apostle, does not perceive the things of the Spirit of God. Indeed, he reproaches the natural ones, to whom he says: Each of you says: I am of Paul, I am of Apollos, I am of Cephas, I am of Christ. Is Christ divided? Was Paul crucified for you? Or were you baptized in the name of Paul? For just as the spiritual rejoice in unity, so the natural ones pursue dissensions. And concerning these, Judas the apostle writes most openly: These are, he says, those who separate themselves, natural, having not the Spirit. What could be more evident? What could be more explicit? Therefore, let the foolish cease to flatter themselves and say to us: What are we to gain when we come to you, since you already admit that we have the Baptism of Christ? We answer them: You have the Baptism of Christ; come that you may also have the Spirit of Christ. Fear what is written: But if anyone does not have the Spirit of Christ, he does not belong to Him. You have put on Christ in the form of the sacrament; put Him on by the imitation of His example. Because Christ suffered for us, leaving us an example, so that we might follow in His steps. Do not be those who have a form of godliness but deny its power. And what greater virtue of godliness is there than the love of unity? It is said in the Psalms: I have seen an end to all perfection: your commandment is exceedingly broad. What commandment, unless it is the one about which it is said: A new commandment I give you, that you love one another. Why is it broad, unless because the love of God has been poured out in our hearts? Why is it the end of all perfection, unless because the fullness of the law is love; and the entire law is summed up in this word: You shall love your neighbor as yourself? And so you love your neighbors as yourselves, such that when some evil, which has neither been seen nor proved, is believed about you, you do not want it to be believed; yet, what you have neither seen nor proved, you believe about the whole world.

Actions, not only words, must say "Lord Jesus".

You seem to be saying: Lord Jesus. And perhaps not understanding, you pay attention to what the Apostle says: No one says: Lord Jesus, except in the Holy Spirit. But what he says is said in a marked manner, and in a specific way. For no one says: Lord Jesus, except in the Holy Spirit, but if he says it in deeds, not with words alone. For they can say: Lord Jesus, even those of whom he says: Do what they say; but do not do what they do. All heresies, which of course you also disapprove, say: Lord Jesus. Nor indeed will He separate from the kingdom of heaven those whom He finds in the Holy Spirit; and yet He says: Not everyone who says to me, Lord, Lord, will enter the kingdom of heaven. But No one says: Lord Jesus, except in the Holy Spirit! No one indeed, but in the way it is said, that is in deeds. Whence he subsequently adds: But the one who does the will of my Father who is in heaven, he will enter the kingdom of heaven. For the same apostle says of some: They profess to know God, but they deny Him by their deeds. Just as He is denied by deeds, so He is acknowledged by deeds. In this manner of speaking, no one says: Lord Jesus, except in the Holy Spirit. Therefore, if you do not join the unity, separating yourselves, you will be animalistic, not having the Spirit. But if you approach falsehood: The Holy Spirit of discipline will flee from falsehood. Then, therefore, recognize that you have the Holy Spirit, when you from sincere love consent in your mind to adhere to unity. Let us answer those saying to them, What shall we receive! and let us, brothers, offer ourselves as an example to them of good works, neither prideful because we stand, nor desperate of the fallen.

Sermons - Sermon 27

SERMO 27 SERMON ON PSALM 95 And from the words of the Apostle:

"He has mercy on whom he wills, and he hardens whom he wills,"

"You say to me" and so on. The house of God is all the earth singing a new song.

Just as a door leads into a house, so does the title of a psalm lead into understanding. It is thus prefaced: When the house was being built after the captivity. You ask what house; the psalm already indicates to you: Sing to the Lord a new song, sing to the Lord, all the earth. Behold what house this is. When the whole earth sings a new song, it is the house of God. It is built by singing, founded by believing, raised by hoping, perfected by loving. Therefore, it is now being built, but it will be dedicated at the end of the age. Let the living stones gather to the new song, gather and be fitted together into the structure of the temple of God. Let them recognize the Savior, let them receive the inhabitant.

Christ came to the captives, not captured.

It is said what house it is. It must be said after what captivity. And this the psalm indicates to you. Follow a little bit: Sing to the Lord a new song, sing to the Lord all the earth. Sing to the Lord, bless his name, proclaim his salvation from day to day. Declare his wonders among the nations, his glory among all peoples. For all the gods of the nations are demons. Behold under whose captivity the house was hidden. For from the first transgression of the first man, the entire human race, born with the obligation of sin, was possessed by the victorious devil. For if we were not held under captivity, we would not need a Redeemer. He came to the captives not as a captive. He came to redeem the captives, having in himself nothing of captivity, that is, of iniquity, but carrying our price in mortal flesh. For if he did not have mortal flesh, from where would there be blood in the Word to be shed for the captives? But he who came to our captivity in the likeness of sinful flesh, did not come with the flesh of sin. For it was the likeness of sinful flesh; true flesh, but resembling sinful flesh; true flesh but not flesh of sin. Therefore, he who came in this way, who was he? Proclaim from day to day. Behold who he was. From day to day he was, he was God from God, light from light. But the Word was made flesh, to dwell among us: hidden majesty, apparent infirmity, so that infirmity might die and majesty might be held.

Let the collector be reproved if he demands what is not due.

If, therefore, the entire world was held under captivity, it is well said: I will have mercy on whom I have mercy, and I will show compassion to whom I show compassion. For if the whole world is under captivity, the whole world is in sin, the whole world is most justly destined for punishment, but partially freed through mercy, who can say to God: "Why do you condemn the world?" How is God the judge accused when the guilty world is condemned? You are guilty. If you consider what you owe, it is called punishment, nor is the collector justly blamed when the debt is demanded from you. The collector is to be blamed if he demands what is not owed. But when he demands what is owed, who will blame the collector, even if he expects the benefactor? He has mercy on whom he wills, and he hardens whom he wills. You then say to me: Why does He still find fault? For who resists His will? O man, who are you to answer back to God? Consider who He is. Consider who you are. He is God, you are man. But do you seem to speak of justice, and is the source of justice dried up? If you speak justly, whence comes it to you? Or do you speak unjustly, and should remain silent. Either you speak justly, and you have it only from the fountain of justice. And who is the fountain of justice but God? First, therefore, lay the foundation of faith: Is there iniquity with God? Justice may be hidden from you, but iniquity cannot be there.

You are perhaps expecting me to tell you why He shows mercy to whom He wills, and hardens whom He wills? Are you expecting this from me, a mere man? If you are a man and I am a man, we both have heard: O man, who are you to answer back to God? Therefore, faithful ignorance is better than rash knowledge. God speaks to me through the Apostle, Christ speaks: O man, who are you to answer back to God? And I should be indignant, because I do not know the justice of God? If I am a man, I should not be indignant. Let me surpass being a man, if I can, and reach the source. But even if I reach it, I will not tell a man. Let him surpass being a man, and reach it with me. "And who," you ask, "is the one who can surpass man?" Therefore, does not the Apostle reproach some people and say: For when you say: I follow Paul, and I follow Apollos, are you not merely human? What did he want them to do, when he reproached them for being human? You are a man, you belong to Adam. Belong to the Son of Man. In hope we were saved. And perhaps he says to you: I will no longer call you servants, but friends; for all that I have heard from my Father I have made known to you. But he said this to the disciples, to those Apostles, to them he said this. We should not be saddened because we are not yet such as they are. And yet how did he say this even to them: All that I have heard from my Father I have made known to you? I think that he said this in hope, not as a reality yet. I think it was what he was going to do, not what he had already done. And how is it proven, as he says: I have made known to you, not: I will make known to you? Because some things in the Scriptures are said in the past tense which should be understood for the future. How are they said in the past tense when they should be understood for the future? They pierced, he says, my hands and my feet, they counted all my bones. It was not yet done, and what was going to be done was announced as if it had been done. He saved us through the washing of regeneration. But in another place, he himself says: We were saved in hope. Hope that is seen is not hope. We were saved in hope, we only say this of the past. And because we were saved in hope, not yet in reality, what we hope for is still to come. For now, we see and hold. But not yet reality, but hope. For who hopes for what he sees, he says? But if we hope for what we do not see, we wait for it with patience. And yet we were saved, and yet we still hope and expect salvation, we do not yet hold it. So also the Lord to the disciples: All that I have heard from my Father I have made known to you. If this had already been done, why does he say in another place to them: I have much more to say to you, but you cannot bear it now? Surely, all that I have heard from my Father I have made known to you. But when he says: You cannot bear it now, and says: I have to tell you, he defers it, not takes it away. Hence, because of certain hope, as he knew without doubt that he was going to do it, with him it was counted as if done. And so he said: I have made known to you.

What cannot be seen in the time of faith will be seen in the time of sight. As long as we are in the body, we are pilgrims from the Lord. For we walk by faith, and not by sight. As far as it is given to us, let us hold to faith, let us not doubt the justice of God. Let us not believe there is any iniquity within Him, lest we fall into a great abyss of impiety. And when we have held with perfect faith that there is no iniquity in Him, and if we do not see it now, that is, the equity which is with Him, let the journey end and we come to the homeland. It cannot be seen during the time of faith; it will be seen during the time of sight. For now we walk by faith, then by sight. What is it, by sight? Beautiful in form beyond the sons of men, because in the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. He who loves me, He says, keeps my commandments, and he who loves me will be loved by my Father, and I will love him. And what will you give him? And I will show myself to him. This will be the sight, when He does what He said: And I will show myself to him. There you will see the equity of God, there without a code in the Word of law. Therefore, when we see Him as He is, our pilgrimage will already be over. Afterwards, we will rejoice with the joy of angels. This is on the way. What is the way? Faith is. Because of your faith, Christ was made deformed, but Christ remains beautiful. Beautiful in form beyond the sons of men, He will be seen after the pilgrimage. But now by faith how does He appear? And we saw Him, and He had no form or beauty, but His face was despised, and His position deformed, that is, His strength, His despised and deformed position, a man set in affliction, and knowing how to bear infirmities. The deformity of Christ forms you. For if He had not wished to be deformed, you would not have regained the form you had lost. Therefore, He hung on the cross deformed, but His deformity was our beauty. Therefore, in this life let us hold the deformed Christ. What is the deformed Christ? Far be it from me to glory except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom the world is crucified to me, and I to the world. This is the deformity of Christ. Did I say I know anything among you except the way? This is the way, to believe in the crucified. We bear the sign of this deformity on our foreheads. Let us not be ashamed of this deformity of Christ. Let us hold this way, and we will reach the sight. When we reach the sight, we will see the equity of God. And there will be no more saying: "Why does He come to the aid of this one, and not that one? Why was this one led by the governance of God to be baptized, but the other who lived as a good catechumen died suddenly, and did not reach baptism? And why did this one, who lived wickedly, as an adulterer, as a fornicator, as a player, as a hunter, fall ill, be baptized, and pass away, having his sin convicted, and his sin erased?" Seek merits, you will find none but punishment. Seek grace: O the depth of riches! Peter denies, the thief believes. O the depth of riches!

O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God Do you think we can examine what the blessed Apostle was afraid of? And when he observed such great depth and height, he trembled and exclaimed: "O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God!" For what had he said before, that led to this exclamation? He had said a matter where if one does not believe God, because there is no injustice with God, it will be judged unjustly. He was speaking to the Gentiles, he was speaking to the faithful about the Jews: "As you," he said, "did not believe God, but now have obtained mercy through their unbelief, so these also have now not believed in your mercy, that they also may obtain mercy. For God has concluded all in unbelief, that he might have mercy upon all." This is what Paul said later. And what is this reasoning of the equity and justice of God, to conclude all in unbelief, that he might have mercy upon all? You seek the reason, I tremble at the height. "O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God!" You reason, I marvel. You dispute, I will believe. I see the height, I do not reach the depth. O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God, how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! Will they indeed be explained? For who has known the mind of the Lord, or who has been his counselor? Or who has first given to him, and it shall be recompensed unto him again? For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things. To him be glory forever. He rested, because he found, because he found admiration. Let no one ask me the reason for hidden things. He says: "His judgments are unsearchable," and you have come to search? He says, "His ways are past finding out," and you have come to investigate? If you have come to search the unsearchable, and investigate the past finding out, believe, for you have perished. To wish to search the unsearchable and to investigate the past finding out is like wishing to see the invisible and to speak the ineffable. Therefore let the house be built. When it comes to dedication, then perhaps the most open reason for these hidden things will be found.

Sermons - Sermon 270

SERMO 270 ON THE DAY OF PENTECOST It must be spoken about the Holy Spirit.

Since we celebrate the holy solemnity of such a holy day, on which the Holy Spirit himself has come, this festal and joyful solemnity reminds us to speak about the very gift of God, the grace of God, and the abundance of His mercy upon us, that is, about the Holy Spirit himself. We speak with fellow disciples in the school of the Lord. For we have one teacher, in whom we are all one: who warned us not to dare to be proud of being masters, saying: Do not be called Rabbi by men; for one is your teacher, Christ. Therefore, under this teacher, whose seat is in heaven, because we are to be educated by His teachings, heed the few things I say, with Him giving what I am commanded to say. You who know, recollect; you who did not know, receive. It often moves a piously curious mind, if human fragility and infirmity are allowed to examine such things. Indeed, it is allowed. For what is hidden in the Holy Scriptures is not closed to be denied, but rather to be opened to one who knocks, with the Lord himself saying: Ask, and you shall receive; seek, and you shall find; knock, and it shall be opened to you. It often, therefore, moves the scholarly mind to inquire why the promised Holy Spirit was sent on the fiftieth day after the Lord's passion and resurrection.

Why the Holy Spirit could not come unless Christ departed.

Wherefore, I first warn your Charity, that it may not be burdensome to you to consider a little why it was said by the Lord Himself: "He cannot come unless I go away." As if the Lord Christ were keeping something in the heavens, and descending from there, He had entrusted what He kept to the Holy Spirit, and therefore He could not come to us unless He who received the entrusted one had returned; or as if we could not bear both, nor endure the presence of both. As if one were truly separated from the other; or when they come to us, they would suffer distress themselves, and not rather we be expanded. What then does He mean: "He cannot come unless I go away"? "For it is expedient for you," He says, "that I go away. For if I do not go away, the Paraclete will not come to you." Therefore, what this means, as much as we can understand, or estimate, or perceive by His own gift, or speak what we believe, may your Charity briefly receive. It seems to me, that the disciples were occupied with the human form of the Lord Christ, and as men, they were held by affection for a human man. However, He wanted them to have rather a divine affection, and thus transform them from carnal to spiritual: which a man does not become except by the gift of the Holy Spirit. Therefore, He said: "I send you the gift by which you may be made spiritual; namely the gift of the Holy Spirit." But you will not be able to become spiritual unless you cease to be carnal. You will cease to be carnal if the form of flesh is taken away from your eyes, so that the form of God may be impressed upon your hearts. For from this human form, the Lord, that is, the form of a servant: "He emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant": from this form of a servant, Peter's affection was also held, when he feared for the death of the one he greatly loved. For he loved the Lord Jesus Christ, as a human man; as a carnal man acquainted with another carnal man, not as a spiritual man the majesty. How do we prove this? Because when the Lord Himself asked His disciples, who did men say He was, and having recounted the opinions of others, that some said He was John, others Elijah, others Jeremiah, or one of the Prophets; He said to them: "But who do you say that I am?" And Peter, one for all, one for all: said, "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God." This answer was excellent and very true: He deservedly received such a response: "Blessed are you, Simon Bar-Jona, because flesh and blood did not reveal this to you, but my Father who is in heaven." And I say to you because you have said unto me; you have spoken, hear; you have given the confession, receive the blessing: therefore: "And I say to you, You are Peter: because I am the rock, you are Peter; for it is not from Peter the rock, but from the rock Peter, because it is not from the Christian Christ, but from Christ Christian." And upon this rock, I will build my Church: not upon Peter which you are, but upon the rock which you have confessed. I will build my Church: I will build you, who in this answer bear the figure of the Church. This and other things, because Peter had said: "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God": and had heard what you remember: "Flesh and blood did not reveal this to you, that is, human mind, human weakness, human ignorance, but my Father who is in heaven." Then the Lord Jesus began to predict His passion and to show how much He should suffer from the wicked. Here Peter was alarmed and feared lest Christ, the Son of the living God, should perish by death. Indeed, Christ, the Son of the living God, good from good, God from God, living from the living, the fountain of life and true life, had come to destroy death, not to perish by death. Yet as man, Peter was terrified, whose affection toward the flesh of Christ was human, as I said: "Be it far from you, Lord; this shall not happen." And the Lord confutes such words worthy and with a fitting response. As He gave worthy praise to that confession, so also to this timidity worthy correction: "Get behind me, Satan." Where is that: "Blessed are you, Simon Bar-Jona?" Distinguish the words of the one praising and the one chastising: distinguish the causes of the confession and the timidity. The cause of the confession: "Flesh and blood did not reveal this to you, but my Father who is in heaven." The cause of the timidity: "For you do not mind the things of God, but the things of men." Therefore, we would not want to hear such as: "It is expedient for you that I go away? Unless I go away, the Paraclete will not come to you." Unless the human form is withdrawn from your carnal sights, you will by no means be able to perceive, feel, think, or meditate on something divine. This may suffice. Hence it was necessary that after the resurrection and ascension of the Lord Jesus Christ, His promise of the Holy Spirit should be fulfilled. For thus also John the Evangelist from his own persona had said when Jesus, signifying the same Holy Spirit, had cried out, saying: "If anyone thirsts, let him come to me, and drink; and rivers of living water will flow from his belly." For the Evangelist followed saying: "But this He said concerning the Spirit, whom those who believed in Him were to receive. For the Spirit had not yet been given because Jesus had not yet been glorified." Therefore, our Lord Jesus Christ was glorified by resurrection and ascension, and He sent the Holy Spirit. The mystery of the numbers forty and fifty. As we have learned from the holy Books, He completed forty days with His disciples after the resurrection, showing them the truth of the resurrected body, so they would not think anything was fabricated, entering and leaving with them, eating and drinking. On the fortieth day, which we celebrated ten days ago, He ascended into heaven before their eyes, promised as He went, so He will come; that is in the human form in which He was judged, in the same form He will judge. He wanted to send the Holy Spirit on a different day than He ascended; not immediately after two days or three days, but after ten days. This question compelled us to search and inquire into some hidden meanings of numbers. Forty days have ten four times. This number, as it seems to me, commends the mystery. For we speak to humans as humans; and we are rightly called expounders of the Scriptures, not affirmers of our own opinions. Therefore, this number forty, having ten four times, signifies, in my opinion, this age which we now live and pass through; we are led and pass through the course of times, the instability of things, the passing away and succession, the fleeting haste, and a certain river of inconsistent things.

Therefore, this age is signified by this number because of the fourfold times of the world, which fill the year; also the fourfold cardinal points of the world itself, known to all, and often mentioned by the holy Scripture: From the East and West, from the North and South. Thus, through these fourfold times, and through the fourfold world, the law of God is preached, as if by the number ten. Wherefore also the Decalogue is commended first. For in the ten commandments the law is established: because it seems in this number ten there is a certain perfection. Up to that number the progress of the enumeration proceeds, and from then it returns from one to ten, again to one. Thus hundreds, thus thousands; thus above, by certain multiples of ten, the forest of numbers grows infinitely. Therefore, the perfect law is in ten, and the law preached through the fourfold world, ten times four makes forty.

However, we are taught, in this conversation of this age while we are here, to abstain from worldly desires: which signifies the fasting of forty days known to all by the name of Lent. This is commanded to you by the Law, this by Prophecy, this by the Gospel. Therefore, because of this the Law, Moses fasted for forty days: because of this the Prophecy, Elijah fasted for forty days: because of this the Gospel, the Lord Christ fasted for forty days. Therefore, after adding ten more days to forty, simply one set of ten, not fourfold, the Holy Spirit came, so that the law might be perfected by grace. For the law without grace is the letter that kills. For if a law had been given that could give life, then righteousness would indeed be by the law. But the Scripture imprisoned everything under sin, so that the promise might be given by faith in Jesus Christ to those who believe. Therefore: The letter kills, but the Spirit gives life. Not so that you fulfill something else than what is commanded to you by the letter: but the letter alone makes guilty, grace liberates from sin, and allows the letter to be fulfilled. Hence, by grace comes the remission of all sins, and faith works through love. Do not think, therefore, that the letter is condemned because it is said: The letter kills. For this means that the letter makes guilty. A command is given, you are not aided by grace: immediately you find yourself not only not a doer of the law, but also guilty of transgression. For where there is no law, there is no transgression. Therefore, the law is not blamed when it is said: The letter kills, but the Spirit gives life, as if it condemned that and praised this: but the letter kills, the letter alone without grace. Take an example from this phrase: Knowledge puffs up. What does it mean: Knowledge puffs up? Is knowledge condemned? If it puffs up, it would be better if we remain ignorant. But because it is added: Love builds up; just as when it is added: The Spirit gives life, it is understood that the letter kills without the Spirit, with the Spirit it gives life and makes the letter fulfillable; so knowledge without love puffs up, with love it builds up.

Therefore, the Holy Spirit was sent, so that the law might be fulfilled, and what the Lord Himself said might be done: I have not come to abolish the law but to fulfill it. This is granted to believers, this is granted to the faithful, this is granted to those to whom the Holy Spirit is given. The more anyone becomes capable with this, the easier it becomes to work the law.

Chaste fear and servile fear. For I say to your Love, something you can also consider and easily see: charity fulfills the law. The fear of punishment makes a person act, but still in a servile manner. For if you do good because you fear suffering evil, or you do not do evil because you fear suffering evil; if someone promised you impunity, you would immediately commit iniquity. You would be told, "Be secure, you will suffer nothing bad, do it"; you would do it. For you were restrained by the fear of punishment, not by the love of righteousness. Love had not yet worked in you. See, therefore, how love works. Let us love whom we fear in such a way that we fear him with chaste love. A chaste wife also fears her husband. But distinguish these fears. A chaste wife fears lest she be deserted by her absent husband; an adulterous wife fears lest she be caught by her returning husband. Therefore, love fulfills the law, for perfect love casts out fear; namely, servile fear that comes from sin. For the fear of the Lord is chaste, enduring forever. If, therefore, love fulfills the law, where does this love come from? Recall, consider, and see that charity is the gift of the Holy Spirit. For the love of God is poured out into our hearts by the Holy Spirit who has been given to us. Rightly so, after ten days, the number which also commends the perfection of the law, the Lord Jesus Christ sent the Holy Spirit: because grace gives us to fulfill the law, which He did not come to dissolve, but to fulfill.

Rest on the seventh day. The Holy Spirit in the Holy Scriptures is usually commended by the number seven, not ten: the law by ten, the Holy Spirit by seven. It is known that the law is by ten: we recall that the Holy Spirit is by seven. First, in the very book, in the beginning of the book called Genesis, the works of God are enumerated. Light is made, the sky is made, which is called the firmament between water and water; the dry land is exposed, the sea is separated from the land, the fertile conception of all kinds is given to the land; the greater and the lesser luminaries are made, the sun and the moon, and the other stars; the waters bring forth their offspring, the land brings forth its own; man is made in the image of God: God completes all His works on the sixth day; in none of the many works of God thus enumerated and completed is sanctification mentioned. God said: Let there be light; and there was light: and God saw the light that it was good: but He did not say, God sanctified the light: Let there be a firmament, and it was made; God saw that it was good: nor was it said that the firmament was sanctified. So also with the others, not to dwell on the most evident things, up to those made on the sixth day, with man created in the image of God, all are enumerated, nothing is said to be sanctified. It comes to the seventh day, where no work is made, but the rest of God is intimated, and God sanctified the seventh day. In the number of seven days, for the first time the sanctification is sounded, sought in all places of the Scriptures and first found here. Where God's rest is commemorated, our rest is also intimated. For God did not labor that He would need rest; and as if He would rejoice after labor in the holiday, He sanctified that day on which it was permitted to rest. This is a carnal thought, intimating to us rest after all our good works, as God's rest was intimated after all His good works. For God made all things, and behold all were very good. And God rested on the seventh day from all His works which He did. Do you also wish to rest? First, do very good works. Thus the observation of the Sabbath was given to the Jews in a carnal manner, like the other significant sacraments. A certain rest was commanded: do what that rest signifies. For the spiritual rest is the tranquility of the heart: the tranquility of the heart comes from the serenity of a good conscience. Therefore, he truly observes the Sabbath who does not sin. For thus it is commanded to those to whom it is commanded to observe the Sabbath: You shall do no servile work. Whoever commits sin is a servant of sin. Therefore, the number seven is dedicated to the Holy Spirit, just as ten is to the law.

This is also intimated by the prophet Isaiah in the place where he says: He will fill him with the Spirit of wisdom and understanding (count), of counsel and might, of knowledge and piety, the Spirit of the fear of God. As the spiritual grace descends to us, it begins with wisdom and ends with fear. But we, ascending, tending from the lowest to the highest, must begin with fear and end with wisdom. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. It is long, and it exceeds our strength, though not your eagerness, to recall all the testimonies of the number seven related to the Holy Spirit. Therefore, let these suffice. The Holy Spirit commended through the number seven.

Now understand this: how, because the law is fulfilled by the grace of the Holy Spirit, the number ten needed to be mentioned and commended, as we have already shown, and the number seven because of the grace of the Holy Spirit itself. Christ commended the number ten by sending the Holy Spirit after ten days, the very law which He ordered to be fulfilled. So where then do we find here the commendation of the number seven especially because of the Holy Spirit itself? You have in the book of Tobit the very feast, that is Pentecost, consisting of weeks. How so? Multiply seven by itself, that is seven by seven, which is learned in schools: seven times seven makes forty-nine. According to this form of the seven, on account of seven by seven: (because the Holy Spirit gathers us and brings us together: hence, the first sign given of His coming was that those who received Him, even though separated, spoke in all languages. For the unity of the body of Christ is gathered from all languages, namely from all nations spread throughout the entire world. And that one spoke then in all languages, testified to the very unity that would be in all languages. The Apostle says: Bearing with one another in love, which is charity: making every effort to maintain the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. So because the Holy Spirit gathers us from many into one: He is retained by humility, expelled by pride. For humility of heart is like a concave place seeking where it may rest: but when driven away by the swelling of pride, it slips away like water: hence it is said: God resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble. What does it mean, gives grace? He gives the Holy Spirit. He fills the humble because He finds them capable). Therefore, because these things are so, to forty-nine, which is made from seven by seven, one is added, and the unity is commended. Of the fish, one hundred fifty-three.

Because your charity aids our infirmity before the Lord our God, accept something, as it seems to me, that will be all the sweeter when explained, and more obscure if not explained. Before the resurrection, the Lord commanded his disciples to cast their nets into the sea when He chose them. They cast, and caught an innumerable multitude of fish, such that the nets were breaking, and the loaded boats were sinking. However, he did not command in which direction to cast the nets, but simply said: Cast the nets. For if he had commanded that they be cast to the right side, he would signify that only the good would be caught; if to the left, only the bad. But because they were cast everywhere, neither to the right nor to the left; both good and bad. This is the meaning of the Church's present time, in this world. For the servants sent to those invited went out; and whoever they found, both good and bad, they brought in, and the wedding feasts were filled with those reclining. Therefore, both good and bad are now gathered. Why then are there schisms, if the nets do not break? Why is the Church often burdened by the scandals of badly behaving crowds if the boats are not pressed? This, therefore, the Lord did before the resurrection. After the resurrection, however, he found his disciples fishing in the same way: he commanded the nets to be cast, not just anywhere, because now it was after the resurrection. For after the resurrection, his body, which is the Church, will have no evil ones. He said, Cast the nets on the right side. The nets were cast, by his command, on the right side, and a certain number of fish were caught. For those without number, those signifying the Church which is now, as from that capture: I have announced and spoken, they have been multiplied beyond number. Therefore, some are understood to be beyond number, in a certain way superfluous: yet they are gathered. But there, on the right side, the fish are caught, numbered, and large. For, he who does and teaches shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven. Therefore, one hundred and fifty-three large fish were caught. Who does not move, it is not in vain that this number is mentioned? For it is not really without significance that the Lord would say: Cast the nets; nor that it concerns Him that they be cast on the right side. This number of one hundred and fifty-three signifies and it was pertinent for the Evangelist to say, almost referring to that first catch, where the breaking of the nets signified schisms; because in the Church of eternal life there will be no schisms, no dissensions; all are great because full of charity: as if therefore it referred to the first event signifying schisms, it was also pertinent to him to say in this second catch: And though they were so large, the nets were not broken. What then the right-hand side signified has been said, that they are all good. What the large size signified has been said, that he who does and teaches shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven. Also, what it signified that the nets were not broken has been said, that then there will be no schisms. What, therefore, is signified by the number one hundred and fifty-three? This number is certainly not the number of the saints themselves. For there will not be only one hundred and fifty-three saints; since only those who have not defiled themselves with women are mentioned as twelve times twelve thousand. But this number seems to grow, as from a certain seed, like a tree. The seed of this large number is a certain smaller number, which is seventeen. Ten and seven make one hundred and fifty-three. If then you count from one to seventeen, and add all the numbers: for if you do not add the numbers from one to seventeen, which you recount, there will only be seventeen: but if you count thus: one, two, three; as one and two and three make six, six and four and five make fifteen; thus you come to seventeen, holding on your fingers one hundred and fifty-three. Therefore, recall that I mentioned and commended it a little earlier, and see what ten and seven signify. Ten, the law; seven, the Holy Spirit. Whence what do we understand, except that those will be in the Church of the eternal resurrection, where there will be no schisms, where death will not be feared, since it will be after the resurrection; therefore those will be there, living with the Lord forever, who have fulfilled the law by the grace of the Holy Spirit and the gift of God, whose feast we celebrate?

Sermons - Sermon 271

SERMO 271 ON THE DAY OF PENTECOST The Church prefigured by tongues. A pleasant day, brothers, has dawned upon us, wherein the holy Church shines before the eyes of the faithful and burns in their hearts. Indeed, we celebrate this day on which the Lord Jesus Christ, glorified by His ascension after the resurrection, sent the Holy Spirit. For it is written in the Gospel, when He said: If anyone thirsts, let him come to me and drink; whoever believes in me, rivers of living water will flow from his belly: the evangelist follows up and explains, and says: He said this about the Spirit, which those who believed in Him were to receive. For the Spirit had not yet been given, because Jesus was not yet glorified. Therefore, it was necessary that Jesus, having been glorified, after He rose from the dead and ascended to heaven, would now send the Holy Spirit, whom He had promised: as has been done. For the Lord, after conversing with His disciples for forty days following the resurrection, ascended into heaven, and on the fiftieth day, which we celebrate today, sent the Holy Spirit, as it is written: there came a sound from heaven, as if a mighty wind were borne; and divided tongues as of fire appeared to them, resting on each one: and they began to speak in all tongues, as the Spirit gave them to pronounce. That breath cleansed hearts of carnal chaff; that fire consumed the old desire of the flesh; those tongues by which they spoke, filled by the Holy Spirit, prefigured the future Church through the languages of all nations. For just as after the flood the arrogant impiety of men built a high tower against the Lord, when by diverse languages the human race deserved to be divided, so that each nation spoke its own tongue, not understood by others: so the humble piety of the faithful conferred the diversity of those languages to the unity of the Church; so that what discord had scattered, charity might gather, and the scattered members of the human race, as of one body, might be reintegrated to one head, Christ, and be melted into the unity of the holy body by the fire of love. Therefore, those who hate the grace of peace, who do not maintain the bond of unity, are entirely alien to this gift of the Holy Spirit. Indeed, though they may also gather solemnly today, though they hear these readings by which the Holy Spirit is promised and sent: they hear to their judgment, not to their reward. For what benefit do they gain by receiving with their ears what they spurn in their hearts; and celebrating His day, whose light they hate? But you, my brothers, members of the body of Christ, offspring of unity, children of peace, observe this day joyfully, celebrate it securely. For this is fulfilled in you, what was prefigured in those days when the Holy Spirit came. Because just as then one person who received the Holy Spirit spoke in all languages: so now through all nations in all languages the same unity speaks, in which having been established, you have the Holy Spirit; who, in speaking by the Church of Christ in all languages, does not dissent through any schism.

Sermons - Sermon 272

SERMO 272 ON THE DAY OF PENTECOST To Infants, Concerning the Sacrament. The sacrament of the body and cup of the Lord.

What you see on the altar of God, you also saw last night: but what it was, what it meant, what great sacrament it contained, you have not yet heard. Therefore, what you see is bread and a cup; your eyes also report this to you: but what your faith demands to be instructed, the bread is the body of Christ, the cup is the blood of Christ. Indeed, this has been briefly stated, what might suffice for faith: but faith desires instruction. For the prophet says: Unless you believe, you shall not understand. For you can now say to me: You commanded us to believe, explain so that we may understand. For such a thought can arise in anyone's mind: Our Lord Jesus Christ, we know where he took flesh; from the Virgin Mary. He was an infant, suckled, nourished, grew up, reached youthful age, suffered persecution from the Jews, was hung on wood, killed on the wood, taken down from the wood, buried, on the third day rose again, on the day he wished, ascended into heaven; he lifted his body there; from there he is to come to judge the living and the dead; he is now seated there at the right hand of the Father: how is the bread his body? And the cup, or what the cup contains, how is it his blood? These, brothers, are called Sacraments, because in them one thing is seen, another is understood. What is seen has a corporeal appearance, what is understood bears spiritual fruit. Therefore, if you wish to understand the body of Christ, hear the Apostle saying to the faithful: You, however, are the body of Christ and members. If therefore you are the body of Christ and members, your mystery lies on the Lord's table: you receive your mystery. To that which you are, you answer Amen, and by answering you subscribe. For you hear, The body of Christ; and you respond, Amen. Be a member of the body of Christ, so that your Amen may be true. Why therefore in bread? Let us bring nothing of our own here, let us hear the Apostle continually, who, when speaking of this Sacrament, said: One bread, one body, many are we; understand and rejoice; unity, truth, piety, charity. One bread: who is this one bread? One body, many. Recall that bread is not made from one grain, but from many. When you were exorcised, you were as if ground. When you were baptized, you were as if mixed. When you received the fire of the Holy Spirit, you were as if baked. Be what you see, and receive what you are. The Apostle said this of bread. Now what we might understand of the cup, even if not stated, is sufficiently shown. For as to be the visible species of bread, many grains are mixed into one, as it is said of the faithful in Holy Scripture: They had one soul and one heart toward God: so also of the wine. Brothers, recall from where wine is made. Many grains hang from the cluster, but the juice of the grains is blended into unity. Thus also the Lord Christ signified that we belong to him, and willed that in his table he consecrated the mystery of our peace and unity. Whoever receives the mystery of unity, and does not hold the bond of peace, does not receive the mystery for himself, but a testimony against himself. Turned toward the Lord God the almighty Father, let us, with a pure heart as much as our smallness is able, render the greatest and true thanks to him; praying with our whole mind for his singular meekness, so that he may deign to hear our prayers in his good pleasure; may he expel the enemy from our actions and thoughts by his might, multiply our faith, guide our mind, grant spiritual thoughts, and lead us to his blessedness: through Jesus Christ his Son. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 272A

Sermon 272 On the Fiftieth Day of the Resurrection

Fragment It is wonderful that the whole world has believed. The Lord Christ was humbled so that we might learn to be humble: He who contains all things was conceived, He who brings forth all things was born, He who enlivens all things died; but after three days He rose again, and ascended into heaven, and placed the human flesh that He had assumed at the right hand of the Father. It is wonderful, brethren—and this is what the impious do not want to believe—it is wonderful for a man to have risen in the flesh and ascended into heaven with flesh; but it is much more wonderful that the whole world believed such an incredible thing. What is more incredible, that God did such things, or that the world was able to believe it? What if we also consider the manner by which the world believed? Even this is truly perceived as divine, and is found to be very wonderful. Christ sent fishermen, uneducated in liberal arts and altogether unpolished as far as the teachings of the world are concerned, not versed in grammar, not armed with dialectic, with the nets of faith into the sea of the world, a very few of them. What do I mean by "a very few"? He sent twelve. And yet through them He filled the churches with every kind of fish, so that even many of the wise of the world, to whom the cross of Christ seemed ignominious, are marked with it on their foreheads, and what they used to consider shameful, and mocked us for, they now establish in the citadel of their honor.

Sermons - Sermon 272B augm

Sermon 272/B augmented Sermon of Saint Augustine on Pentecost Christ renewed the disciples by the gift of the Holy Spirit.

Today I believe that your love knows to celebrate the coming of the Holy Spirit of the Lord to the Church: for the Lord promised to send the Holy Spirit to his apostles, and according to his most faithful promise he certainly fulfilled what he promised. For just as the resurrection of the Lord confirmed his divinity to men in faith, who for our sake was deemed worthy to become man, so much more the ascent into heaven, and more fully and perfectly by the gift of the Holy Spirit which he sent and filled his disciples, now made new wineskins, so they could receive new wine - therefore when they spoke with tongues, they were said to be drunk and full of must. The voice of those hearing was a testimony to the Lord's Scripture: for no one puts new wine into old wineskins, the Lord had said. Thus he was preparing new wine for new wineskins. For they were old wineskins as long as they thought carnally about Christ. For the saying of the apostle Peter belonged to the old wineskin, when the Lord said to him who feared that Christ might die and perish in the same way as other men: Get behind me, Satan; you are a scandal to me. This wavering of Peter belonged to the old wineskin. But when the Lord rose again, and showed himself to them, and they touched what they had mourned hanging on the cross; they saw living limbs, which they had mourned as dead and buried; they were confirmed in faith and believed in him. He ascended into heaven, and commands them to gather together in one place and there wait until he should send his promise. Therefore, gathered together in one place, praying and desiring the promise, they shed the old self and put on the new self. Thus made now capable, they received the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost. And it is not without reason that we celebrate this great and most evident sacrament today. Let your holiness consider how the old and new Scriptures agree: for there grace is promised, here it is given; there it is prefigured, here it is perfected. As if some craftsman of molded things from metal, bronze, or silver first composes the forms he is to cast in wax, and the first shadowing foreshadows the future solid form - for he makes the very forms which he will fill -, so also the Lord outlined and shaped all things in the old people with figures, but in the new people he filled them with the most perfect outpouring. What, then, is that form and what is this fulfillment on the day of Pentecost, let your holiness consider more attentively: it is worth the effort of your attention; it is learned with great profit, when what is said is heard more attentively. Surely, you too are new wineskins, so that through our ministry you can receive the wine.

Jews and Christians celebrate the day of Pentecost.

We are often asked: "If we celebrate the day of Pentecost because of the coming of the Holy Spirit, why do the Jews celebrate Pentecost?" For they too have Pentecost. You heard this morning, those of you who were attentive, when the reading from Tobit was read in memory of the blessed Theogenes, that on the day of Pentecost he prepared a meal, intending to invite some of his own who were worthy to share the table with him, because of their fear of the Lord. He says,

"On the day of Pentecost, which is holy from the weeks." For seven times seven make forty-nine: one is added here for unity, so that we return to the head, because unity confirms all multitude, and multitude, unless bound by unity, is contentious and quarrelsome; but a multitude that consorts makes one soul, just as those who received the Holy Spirit, as Scripture says, had one soul and one heart towards God. Therefore, fifty are made, which is the sacrament of Pentecost. Why then do the Jews celebrate it, unless because it was a figure there? Pay attention: you know - and there is no Christian at all who is ignorant of what I am going to say - that the lamb is killed among the Jews and the Passover is celebrated as a figure of the future passion of the Lord. For this was also commanded to them, to seek a lamb from goats and sheep. Where can a lamb be found from goats and sheep? But what was commanded there as impossible was announcing the future possibility of the Lord: for a lamb was found from goats and sheep, because our Lord Jesus Christ, according to the flesh born from the seed of David, has his origin from sinners and the just. You find in the origin of the Lord, according to the generations that the evangelists recount, both many sinners and the just: therefore, he also called such, that is, sinners, because he came through such. For he gathers his Church from the just and sinners, intending to send the just to the kingdom of heaven and to separate sinners who persist in sins and iniquity; yet he came to bear our sins so that he would not disdain to accept the origin of sinners. And there are many sacraments there, in those very generations, which God will provide a time to explain to your holiness. But now let us return to what we had begun.

"The law reveals the guilty, grace frees."

We were speaking about the day of Pentecost, why the Jews celebrate that very day. They kill a lamb, the killing of the paschal lamb: thus we also celebrate Passover, where a lamb without blemish, truly a lamb, was slain, to whom John bore witness saying: Behold the Lamb of God, behold him who takes away the sins of the world; we celebrate Passover with his suffering. The law was given to the Jews in fear; the Holy Spirit was given to Christians in grace. They could not fulfill the law through fear, and through that same law they were found guilty. The law has five books; five colonnades surrounded Solomon's pool, but they carried the sick, and could heal none of them. The five colonnades carried the sick, where they lay, just as in the books no one was healed. Why no one? Because of pride. For when they think they can fulfill what is commanded by their own strength, they did not fulfill what was commanded. And the law was against them, in which they are found guilty, until they cry out, as we said to your holiness this morning: Wretched man that I am, who will deliver me from this body of death? The grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord. The law therefore shows the guilty, grace liberates from guilt; the law threatens, grace soothes; the law intends punishment, grace promises forgiveness. Yet the same things are commanded in the law and in grace; and therefore that law is said to be written by the finger of God. So we have written. The finger of God is the Holy Spirit. But let us inquire what the finger of God is in the Gospel, and we will find out. What does the finger of God mean? For God does not truly have such a bodily form as we have. Does He see from one part and not see from another? Or is the figure of His members limited, who is whole everywhere and present in all things? What, then, is the finger of God? The Holy Spirit. Pay attention: how do we prove this? From the Gospel. For sometimes what one evangelist says figuratively, another says more explicitly in the same passage. There is a certain place in the Gospel where the Jews said concerning the Lord that He casts out demons in the name of Beelzebub. But the Lord answered: "If I cast out demons by the finger of God, then surely the kingdom of God has come upon you." Another evangelist explains the same passage saying: "If I cast out demons by the Holy Spirit, then the kingdom of God has come upon you." Therefore, when one evangelist says the finger of God, the other explains it to show us that the Holy Spirit is the finger of God. Let us not seek the fingers of flesh in God, but let us understand why the Holy Spirit is called the finger. Because the apostles received the distribution of the gifts by the Holy Spirit, and in the fingers the division of the hand appears: there is calculation and distribution. Why then do the Jews celebrate Pentecost? A great mystery, brothers, and wholly marvelous: if you consider, on the day of Pentecost they received the law written by the finger of God, and on the day of Pentecost the Holy Spirit came. The law was written by the finger of God. But it is necessary to prove this about the law given, which the Jews received on stone tablets - however, it signified the hardness of their hearts -, yet written by the finger of God, because all that is written there is also commanded for Christians, but already, as the Apostle says, not on stone tablets but on tablets of fleshly hearts. This, therefore, is the difference, because it was written in their hard hearts and not fulfilled, the same law is given into believing hearts and is easy and eternal for Christians. Therefore, that was stone; but the hearts of Christians were fertile soil, which can bear fruit. Therefore, the Lord in the Gospel, when that woman was brought to Him who had been found in adultery - and they wanted to stone her according to the law, but the Lord wanted her to sin no more, being ready to forgive her sin -, said to those who wanted to stone her, since they themselves were stony-hearted: If any of you is without sin, let him be the first to throw a stone at her. And when He said this, He bowed down and began to write on the ground with His finger; but they, realizing their own consciences, went away one by one, from the oldest to the youngest, and the woman was left alone. The Lord then lifted up His head and said to her: Woman, where are they? Has no one condemned you? She said: No one, Lord. And the Lord said: Neither do I condemn you. Go now and sin no more. What did this indulgence signify? Grace. What did that hardness signify? The law given on stones. Hence the Lord was writing with His finger, but now on the ground, from which fruit can be received. Whatever is sown on stone, however, does not come forth because it cannot put forth a root. The finger of God, and the finger of God: the law was written by the finger of God; the finger of God, the Holy Spirit.

"On the day of Pentecost, the Jews received the law." The law was given on the day of Pentecost, and the Holy Spirit came on the day of Pentecost. But we had said we would prove that the Jews received the law on the fiftieth day from the Passover which we celebrate. They have the command to slaughter a lamb and celebrate the Passover on the fourteenth day of the first month. Seventeen days remain in the month since you count the fourteenth day, from which the Passover begins. They arrived at the desert where the law was given, and thus the Scripture says: In the third month, after the people were brought out of Egypt, the Lord spoke to Moses so that those who were to receive the law would purify themselves on the third day, on which the law was to be given. At the beginning of the third month, purification is commanded for the third day, and the Passover begins... Beware that the numbers do not deceive you and obscure your understanding. As much as we are able, we will explain it, with the Lord agreeing. If your intent helps us, you will quickly see what is said; if not, anything I say will be obscure, even if spoken very clearly. Therefore, the Passover is declared on the fourteenth day of the month; and purification is commanded, so that the law would be given on the mountain written by the finger of God - the finger of God is the Holy Spirit: remember, for we have proven this from the Gospel. Purification is declared for the third day of the third month. So, from the first month, subtract thirteen, and there remain seventeen to begin from the fourteenth; add the entire second month: that makes forty-seven days; from the very day of purification to the third day makes fifty days. Nothing is clearer, nothing is more evident, because on the day of Pentecost the Jews received the law. The grace of the Holy Spirit makes the yoke of Christ gentle. But it was a burden to the hard, it was a weight to the hard. But the Lord came with grace and cries out: Come to me, all you who labor and are burdened, and I will refresh you. Take my yoke upon you and learn from me because I am meek and humble of heart, and you will find rest for your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light. How is His yoke easy? The Law threatens, He comforts. The Law says: "If you do not do it, I will punish"; Christ says: "Whatever you have done, I forgive; henceforth see that you do not sin." Therefore, His yoke is easy, and His burden is light. But let us become new wineskins, let us expect His grace intently: we will be greatly filled with the Holy Spirit, and through the Holy Spirit, there will be love in us, already heated with new wine and intoxicated with that inebriating and glorious chalice, so that we forget those worldly things that held us, just as the martyrs forgot when they went to their passion - they forgot both children and wives, and parents throwing dust on their heads, and mothers showing their breasts, separating their offspring from milk with reproach; they forgot everything and did not recognize their own. Why are you surprised if someone does not recognize his own? The man is drunk. But from what is he drunk? From love. And from where is love? From the finger of God, from the Holy Spirit, from Him who came at Pentecost.

"Love fulfills the law." From where do we prove that love is from the Holy Spirit and fulfills the law? The Apostle says: The fullness of the law is love, and in another place: Love of neighbor does no harm. For "you shall not commit adultery, you shall not steal, you shall not kill, you shall not covet," and if there is any other commandment, it is summed up in this word: you shall love your neighbor as yourself, because love fulfills the law. But from where do we prove that love is from the Holy Spirit? Hear the Apostle saying that we glory in tribulations. Through tribulations the Jews were compelled to fulfill the law, and they could not; Christians were not separated from the law by tribulations, but rather they ran towards the law. See what I say, brothers. Punishment was placed on the Jews, that anyone who sacrificed to idols would be stoned or crucified; yet because fear oppressed them, not love held them: they did not fear because they were conquered by desire, and they followed after idols, where the cross, where the threat of death and stoning loomed, and they were not recalled by these punishments. Afterwards, because love and fear came, love followed. The Gospel was preached to the nations; when they began to be threatened with fire, crosses, and beasts if they sacrificed to idols, they suffered all those things which the kings threatened and inflicted on them, yet their hearts did not turn to idols. By the same punishments that could not recall those from idols, Christians could not be compelled to idols, because now love was from the Holy Spirit. But also, the Apostle says, we glory in tribulations, knowing that tribulation works patience, patience proof— for we wish to prove that love, which fulfills God's law, is from the Holy Spirit— for tribulation works patience, patience proof, proof hope; and hope does not put to shame, because the love of God is poured out into our hearts through the Holy Spirit who has been given to us. The Holy Spirit is like a ring given by Christ to the Church.

Therefore, brothers, we celebrate the anniversary of the coming of the Holy Spirit, but the Holy Spirit ought to be in our hearts every day. Nor should we think that this day alone should be a festivity, but not on other days: let us not celebrate in one day, but at all times, so that we may be found not rejected, but approved on the day of the Lord when He comes, so that those to whom He has given the pledge, He may lead into eternal possession. For Christ has betrothed His Church, He has sent the Holy Spirit to her. This Spirit is given as a ring. He who gave the ring will also grant immortality in rest. Let us love Him, let us hope in Him, let us believe in Him.

Come in the morning hours a little earlier for the hymns of God. Others are intoxicated with the wine of the earthly vine in which there is debauchery, and we should be intoxicated with the songs of God; praising the Lord with saving songs, let us at times forget the earth so that we may deserve to be lifted from earth to heaven, by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ who lives and reigns with God the Father.

Sermons - Sermon 272B

But we must seek the Lord not as though he were absent; we must seek him with a strong desire and in a certain, accessible way. It is not as if he were distant, but let us call him to ourselves in our desires. ON THE DAY OF PENTECOST Christ has fulfilled what he promised.

Today I believe that your Charity knows to celebrate the coming of the Holy Spirit of the Lord to the Church; for the Lord promised to send the Holy Spirit to his Apostles, and according to his most faithful promise, he indeed fulfilled what he promised. For just as the resurrection of the Lord confirmed His divinity in the faith of men, He who deigned to become man for us, so much the more did His ascension into heaven, and the fuller and more perfect gift of the Holy Spirit which He sent, fill His disciples, who had already become new wineskins, so that they could receive the new wine; therefore, when they spoke in tongues, they were said to be drunk and full of new wine. The voice of those who heard was a testimony of the Lord's Scripture: For no one puts new wine into old wineskins, the Lord had said. Therefore, He was preparing new wine for new wineskins. They were old wineskins as long as they thought carnally about Christ; for that saying of the Apostle Peter belonged to the old wineskin, when the Lord said to him, fearing that Christ would die and perish like other men: “Get behind me, Satan; you are a hindrance to me.” This perturbation of Peter belonged to the old wineskin. But when the Lord resurrected and showed Himself to them, and they touched what they had mourned hanging on the cross; they saw the living members which they had mourned as dead and buried; they were confirmed in faith and believed Him. He ascended into heaven and commanded them to assemble in one place, and there wait until He sent His promise. Therefore, gathered in one place, praying and desiring the promise, they overcame their old state and were clothed with newness. Hence, having been made capable, they received the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost. And not without reason do we celebrate this day as a great and most evident sacrament. Let your Holiness observe how the old and new Scriptures harmonize: for there grace was promised, here it was given; there it was prefigured, here it was perfected. Just as an artisan forming things first composes the forms he is going to cast in wax from other metal, bronze, or silver, and the first outline shows the way to future solidity—for he makes the very forms he is going to fill—so too the Lord delineated and shaped everything in figures for the old people, but for the new people, He filled them with the most perfect outpouring. Therefore, let your Holiness observe more attentively what that form was and what this fulfillment is on the day of Pentecost: it is worth your attentive commitment; it is said with great fruit, when what is said is listened to more attentively. Be certainly yourselves new wineskins, so that you may be able to receive the wine through our ministry. The sharing multitude makes one soul.

We are often asked: If we celebrate the day of Pentecost because of the arrival of the Holy Spirit, why do the Jews celebrate Pentecost? For they also have Pentecost. You heard this morning, those who were attentive, when the reading from Tobias was read in memory of the blessed Theogenes, that on the day of Pentecost he made a meal for himself, intending to invite some of his own, who were worthy to share the table with him, from the fact that the fear of the Lord was in them: He said, On the day of Pentecost, which is holy from the weeks. For seven times seven makes forty-nine: one is added to this because of unity, so that we may return to the head, which unity confirms every multitude. And a multitude, unless it is bound by unity, is contentious and quarrelsome; but a multitude sharing one mind makes one soul, as it was with those who received the Holy Spirit, as Scripture says, they were of one soul and one heart toward God. Thus fifty is made, which is the sacrament of Pentecost. Why, therefore, do the Jews celebrate it, unless because it was a figure there? Attend: you know, and there is no Christian at all who does not know what I am about to say, that among the Jews the lamb was killed, and the Passover celebrated in the figure of the future Passion of the Lord. For they were also commanded to seek a lamb from the goats and sheep. Whence can a lamb be found from goats and sheep? But what was commanded there as impossible, predicted the future possibility of the Lord: for a lamb was found from goats and sheep, because our Lord Jesus Christ according to the flesh, born from the seed of David, has origin from both sinners and just ones. You find in the origin of the Lord, according to the generations which the Evangelists expound, both many sinners and just ones; therefore He called such, that is sinners, because He also came through such. For He gathers His Church from the just and sinners: about to send the just into the kingdom of heaven, and to separate sinners who persist in sins and wickedness. However, He came to bear our sins, as He did not disdain to take on the origin from sinners; and there are many sacraments there, in the very generations, which God will grant that there will be time to explain to Your Holiness. But now let us return to what we had instituted.

Passover and Pentecost among the Jews and Christians. On the day of Pentecost, we were saying why the Jews celebrate that very day. They kill the lamb, it is the killing of the paschal lamb: so we also celebrate Easter, where the lamb, immaculate and without fault, is killed. Truly the lamb of whom John bore witness, saying: Behold the Lamb of God, behold him who takes away the sins of the world; we celebrate Easter by his passion. The law was given to the Jews in fear; the Holy Spirit was given to the Christians in grace. They could not fulfill the law through fear, and by that very law, they were found guilty. The law has five books; five porticoes surrounded Solomon's pool, but they carried the sick, none of whom they could heal. The five porticoes carried the sick, where they lay; as in the books, no one was healed. Why no one? Because of pride: for when they think they can fulfill what is commanded by their own strength, they have not fulfilled what was commanded. And the law was against them, in which they are found guilty, until they cry out, as we also said to your Holiness this morning: Wretched man that I am, who will deliver me from the body of this death? The grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord. The law, therefore, shows the guilty, grace frees from guilt: the law threatens, grace soothes: the law intends punishment, grace promises pardon. Yet that which is commanded is in both the law and grace; and therefore that law is said to be written by the finger of God. Thus we have it written. The Holy Spirit is the finger of God. But what is the finger of God? Let us seek in the Gospel, and we will find. What does "finger of God" mean? For God indeed does not have a bodily form like we do; and from one part He sees, and from another He does not see; nor is the shape of His limbs determined, He who is whole everywhere and present in all things. What then is the finger of God? The Holy Spirit. Pay attention: from what do we prove this? From the Gospel. For sometimes, what one Evangelist says figuratively, another says more clearly in the same place. There is a certain place in the Gospel where the Jews said of the Lord that He casts out demons in the name of Beelzebub. But the Lord, responding, says: If I cast out demons by the finger of God, surely the kingdom of God has come upon you. Another Evangelist explains the same place, saying: If I cast out demons by the Holy Spirit, then the kingdom of God has come upon you. When therefore one Evangelist says "finger of God," the other explains it, so that he may demonstrate to us that the Holy Spirit is the finger of God. Let us not seek the fingers of flesh in God, but understand why the Holy Spirit is called the finger. Because through the Holy Spirit, the Apostles received the divisions of gifts: but in the fingers, the division of the hand appears; there is calculation and distribution there. Why then do the Jews celebrate Pentecost? A great sacrament, brothers, and altogether marvelous: if you notice, on the day of Pentecost, they received the law written by the finger of God, and on the day of Pentecost, the Holy Spirit came. The law in the hearts of the Jews and Christians. But this must be proven concerning the law given, which the Jews received on stone tablets. However, it signified the hardness of their hearts. Nevertheless, it was written by the finger of God: because everything that was written there is also commanded to Christians; but now, as the Apostle says, "Not on stone tablets, but on fleshly tablets of the heart." This, therefore, is the difference, because it was written on their hard hearts and was not fulfilled; it was given to the already believing hearts of Christians, being easy and everlasting. Therefore, it was a stone: but the hearts of Christians were fertile land, which could bear fruit. Therefore, also the Lord in the Gospel, when that woman who had been found in adultery was brought to Him, and they wanted to stone her according to the law, the Lord, however, wanting her to sin no more, ready to forgive her sin, said to them who wanted to stone her, though they themselves were stony: "Let any one of you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her." But when He said this, He bent down and began to write on the ground with His finger; but they, considering their consciences, went away one by one, from the oldest to the youngest, and the woman was left alone. The Lord then lifted His head and said to her: "Woman, where are they? Has no one condemned you?" And she said: "No one, Lord." And the Lord said: "Neither do I condemn you; go now and sin no more." What did this indulgence signify? Grace. What did that hardness signify? The law given on stones. Therefore, the Lord was writing with His finger, but now on the ground, from which fruit could be received. However, whatever is sown on stone does not sprout, because it cannot send down roots. The finger of God, and the finger of God: the law was written by the finger of God, the finger of God, the Holy Spirit.

Why was the law given on the day of Pentecost? The law was given on the day of Pentecost, and the Holy Spirit came on the day of Pentecost. But we said that we would prove that the Jews received the law on the fiftieth day from Passover which we celebrate. You have the commandment that they should kill the lamb on the fourteenth day of the first month and celebrate Passover. Seventeen days remain in the month, counting from the fourteenth day, from which Passover begins. They came to the wilderness, where the law was given, and thus the Scripture says: "In the third month, from when the people were led out of Egypt, the Lord spoke to Moses, so that those who were to receive the law might purify themselves on the third day, on which the law was to be given." So at the beginning of the third month, purification is commanded for the third day; and Passover begins... Pay attention, lest the numbers mislead you, and bring darkness to your understanding: as much as we can, we open it up, with the Lord granting it. If your attention aids us, you will quickly see what is said; but if it is not there, it will be obscure, whatever I say, even if it is said very clearly... Thus Passover is declared on the fourteenth day of the month: and purification is commanded, for the law to be given on the mountain, written by the finger of God; but the finger of God is the Holy Spirit. Remember: we have proven this from the Gospel. Purification is commanded for the third day of the third month. Therefore, subtract thirteen from the first month, and seventeen remain, starting from the fourteenth. Add the entire second month: the days become forty-seven; from the very day of purification to the third day, the days become fifty. Nothing is clearer, nothing is more evident, because the Jews received the law on the day of Pentecost. The weight of the law and the gentle yoke of Christ. But it is harsh, it has been a burden, it has been a harsh weight. However, the Lord came with grace, and he cries out: "Come to me, all you who labor and are burdened, and I will refresh you. Take my yoke upon you and learn from me, for I am gentle and humble in heart, and you will find rest for your souls; for my yoke is easy, and my burden is light." How is his yoke easy? The law threatens, he caresses: the law says, "If you sin, I will punish you"; Christ says, "Whatever you have done I forgive, henceforth be careful not to sin." Therefore his yoke is easy, and his burden light. If we become new wineskins, we await his grace attentively, we will be greatly filled with the Holy Spirit, and through the Holy Spirit there will be love in us, already when we have been heated by the new wine, and intoxicated by his intoxicating and splendid cup, so that we forget those worldly things that held us, just as the martyrs forgot, when they went to their passion, and forgot their children and wives, and threw dust on their parents' heads, and mothers baring their breasts with the reproach of milk, they separated themselves from food, they forgot everything, and did not recognize their own. What amazes you if a martyr does not recognize his own people? He is a drunk man. But from what is he drunk? From love. But where does love come from? From the finger of God, from the Holy Spirit, from him who came at Pentecost.

Sermons - Sermon 273

SERMO 273 ON THE BIRTHDAY OF THE MARTYRS FRUCTUOSUS THE BISHOP, AUGURIUS, AND EULOGIUS

Deacons The death of the soul is to be feared, not of the body. God is the life of the soul. The Lord Jesus instructed his martyrs not only with a command but also strengthened them with an example. For, so that they would have something to follow in suffering, He first suffered for them: He showed the journey and made the way. Death is either of the soul or of the body. But the soul cannot die, and it can die: it cannot die because its feeling never perishes; however, it can die if it loses God. For just as the soul is the life of its body, so God is the life of its soul. Therefore, just as the body dies when the soul, that is, its life, leaves it; so the soul dies when God leaves it. But so that God does not leave the soul, it must always be in faith, so that it does not fear death for God; and it does not die, being held by God. Thus, it remains that the death which is feared should be feared for the body. But also from this, the Lord Christ made His martyrs safe. For how could they be uncertain about the integrity of their members, who had received security concerning the number of their hairs? He says, Your hairs are numbered. Moreover, in another place, He says more clearly: I tell you that not one hair of your head will perish. Does Truth speak, and does frailty tremble? The solemnities of the martyrs for the exhortation of the faithful. Response of St. Fructuosus.

Blessed are the saints whose memories we celebrate on the day of their passion: they have received in exchange for temporary safety an eternal crown, immortality without end; they have left us an exhortation in these solemnities. When we hear how the martyrs suffered, we rejoice and glorify God in them: nor do we grieve because they have died. For if they had not died for Christ, would they still be living today? Why should confession not accomplish what illness would have done? You have heard the questions of the persecutors, you have heard the responses of the confessors, when the passion of the saints was read. Among other things, consider the response of the blessed Bishop Fructuosus. When someone said to him and asked him to remember him and pray for him, he responded, "I must pray for the Catholic Church, spread from the east to the west." For who prays for individuals? But no one of the individuals is overlooked by him who prays for all. No member is neglected by him whose prayer is poured out for the whole body. Therefore, what do you think he admonished, from whom he was asked to pray for him? What do you think? Without a doubt, you understand. You are remembered by us. He asked that he might pray for him. "And I," he said, "pray for the Catholic Church, spread from the east to the west." If you want me to pray for you, do not withdraw from that Church for which I pray. The response of the deacon Eulogius. Martyrs ought to be honored, God ought to be worshipped. Worship offered to dead men by Pagans.

What, too, is that of the holy deacon who suffered and was crowned with his bishop? The judge said to him, "Do you also worship Fructuosus?" And he replied, "I do not worship Fructuosus, but I worship God, whom Fructuosus also worships." In which way he admonished us to honor the martyrs and to worship God with the martyrs. For we ought not to be such as we lament the pagans to be. Indeed, those people worship dead men. All those, whose names you hear, to whom temples have been constructed, were men; and most of them, and nearly all, held royal power among human affairs. You hear of Jupiter, you hear of Hercules, you hear of Neptune, you hear of Pluto, Mercury, Liber and others: they were men. These things are declared not only in the fables of poets but also in the history of nations. Those who have read know this: those who have not read should believe those who have read. Those men, therefore, through certain temporal benefits, won over human affairs to themselves and began to be worshiped by vain men and those seeking vanity, in such a way that they were called gods, were held as gods; temples were built for them as if they were gods, they were supplicated as if they were gods, altars were built as if for gods, priests were ordained as if for gods, sacrifices were offered as if for gods. The temple and sacrifice owed to the one true God. The temple, however, ought to belong only to the true God, and sacrifice ought to be offered only to the true God. Therefore, these things which are rightly and integrally owed to the one true God, the wretched and deceived were offering to many false gods. Hence, distorted error besieged human misery: hence, the devil lay upon the minds of all who had been cast down. But when the grace of the Savior and the mercy of God at last regarded the unworthy, it was fulfilled what was prophetically predicted in the Song of Songs: "Arise, O north wind; and come, O south; blow upon my garden, that its spices may flow out." It is as if it was said: Arise, O north wind. For the northern part of the world is cold. Under the devil, as under the north wind, souls grew cold, and having lost the warmth of charity, they froze. But what is said to it? Arise, O north wind. It is enough that you have oppressed, it is enough that you have possessed, it is enough that you have lain upon those cast down: Arise. Come, O south, wind from the part of light and warmth: blow upon my garden, that its spices may flow out. These spices were being harvested a little while ago.

Aromatics: saints and martyrs.

What are these spices? About which the very Lord's bride says: "We will run after the fragrance of your perfumes." Remembering this fragrance, the apostle Paul says: "We are the good fragrance of Christ in every place, to those who are being saved and to those who are perishing." A great sacrament: "We are the good fragrance of Christ in every place, to those who are being saved and to those who are perishing." To some indeed, a fragrance from life to life, to others a fragrance from death to death. And who is suitable for understanding these things? How does a good fragrance refresh some and kill others? A good fragrance, not a bad one. For he did not say: "A good fragrance refreshes the good, and a bad fragrance kills the bad." He did not say: "To some indeed we are a good fragrance unto life, to others a bad fragrance unto death." He did not say this, but: "We are the good fragrance of Christ in every place." Woe to the wretched, whom the good fragrance kills. So if you are a good fragrance, O Paul, why does this fragrance kill some and refresh others? I hear how it refreshes some, I understand: how it kills others, I find difficult to grasp: especially because you said: "And who is suitable for these things?" It is not surprising that we are not suitable. Make us suitable, by whose fragrance we speak. For soon the Apostle responds to me: Understand: "We are the good fragrance of Christ in every place, to those who are being saved and to those who are perishing." However, we are the good fragrance, to some a fragrance from life to life, to others a fragrance from death to death. This fragrance refreshes those who love, kills those who envy. For if there were no clarity among the saints, envy would not rise among the wicked. The fragrance of the saints began to suffer persecution: but just like jars of perfumes, the more they were broken, the more the fragrance spread.

Blessed Agnes. The gods of the pagans are not to be compared to the martyrs.

Blessed are those whose passion has been recited. Blessed Agnes the saint, whose day of passion is today. A virgin who was what she was called. Agnes means "lamb" in Latin; in Greek, "chaste." She was what she was called: deservedly she was crowned. What then, my brothers, what shall I say to you about those men whom the Pagans worshipped as gods, to whom they offered temples, priesthoods, altars, and sacrifices? What shall I say to you? That they are not to be compared to our martyrs? Even this is an insult because I even mention it. To any, however weak, faithful believers, even those still carnal and needing milk, not solid food, let it be far from us that those sacrilegious ones be compared. Against one faithful old Christian woman, what is Juno worth? Against one weak and trembling old Christian man with all limbs shaking, what is Hercules worth? He defeated Cacus, Hercules defeated the lion, Hercules defeated the dog Cerberus: Fructuosus conquered the whole world. Compare man to man. Agnes, a girl of thirteen years, conquered the devil. This girl defeated him who deceived many about Hercules.

Temples and sacrifices are not offered to the martyrs, but to God alone. Martyrs are mentioned in a better place at the altar. And yet, dearest, we do not consider our martyrs, in whom they in no way are comparable, as gods, nor do we worship them as gods. We do not exhibit temples, altars, or sacrifices to them. Priests do not offer to them: far from it. These are rendered to God. Indeed, these are offered to God, from whom all things are granted to us. Even at the memorials of holy martyrs, when we make offerings, do we not offer to God? The holy martyrs have an honorable place. Consider this: in the recitation at the altar of Christ, they are recited in a better place; yet they are not worshipped instead of Christ. When did you hear anyone say at the memory of Saint Theogenes, from me, or from any brother and colleague of mine, or any presbyter: I offer to you, Saint Theogenes? or, I offer to you, Peter? or, I offer to you, Paul? You have never heard it. It is not done: it is not allowed. And if someone asks you whether you worship Peter, respond as Eulogius responded about Fructuosus: I do not worship Peter, but I worship God, whom Peter also worships. Then Peter loves you. For if you wish to consider Peter as a god, you offend the rock, and be careful not to break your foot by stumbling against the rock. The holy ones shudder to receive the worship due to God. That you may know that what I say is true; listen, I admonish you. In the Acts of the Apostles, when the Apostle Paul performed a great miracle in Lycaonia, the citizens of that region or province believed that gods had descended to men, and thought that Barnabas was Jupiter and Paul was Mercury, because he was very eloquent in speech. Believing this, they brought garlands and victims and wanted to offer them a sacrifice. They immediately did not mock but were frightened; they tore their garments at once and said to them: Brothers, what are you doing? We also are humans like you, subject to suffering, but we proclaim to you the true God. Turn away from these vain things. You see how the saints shuddered at the idea of being worshipped as gods. Likewise, blessed John the Evangelist, who wrote the Apocalypse, when he was amazed by the marvelous things shown to him, in fear at one point fell at the feet of the angel, who was showing him everything. And the angel, whom no man can compare to, said to him: Arise, what are you doing? Worship God. For I am your fellow servant, and of your brethren. The martyrs hated your drinking vessels, hated your frying pans, hated your drunkenness. Without insulting those who are not such, let them apply this to themselves who do such things: the martyrs hated these things, they do not love those who do such things. But they would hate much more to be worshipped. In the days of the martyrs, it is to be thought about following their footsteps. Martyrs are to be praised and loved, God of the martyrs is to be worshiped.

Therefore, beloved, rejoice in the days of the holy martyrs: pray that you may follow in the footsteps of the martyrs. For you are not men, and they were not men: for you were not born, and they were not born from elsewhere: they did not carry flesh of another kind than you carry. We are all from Adam, we all strive to be in Christ. Our own Lord, the head of the Church, the only-begotten Son of God, the Word of the Father through whom all things were made, did not have flesh of another kind than we have. Therefore he wished to take on flesh from a virgin, to be born of the flesh from one of the human race. For if he had made a body for himself from elsewhere, who would have believed that he bore the flesh which we also bear? But yet he bore flesh in the likeness of sinful flesh, we bear sinful flesh. For he was not born from male seed, nor from the concupiscence of male and female: but what? By the announcement of the Father. And yet, although he was born miraculously, he deigned to be born mortal, and to die for us, and to redeem us with his blood, as a man. See what I say, brothers: Christ, though he is God, though he is one God with the Father, though he is the Word of the Father, the only-begotten, equal to the Father and coeternal; yet inasmuch as he deigned to be man, he preferred to be called a priest, rather than to demand a priest for himself; he preferred to be a sacrifice, rather than to require one; insofar as he is man. For inasmuch as he is God, all that is due to the Father is also due to the only-begotten Son. Therefore, beloved, venerate the martyrs, praise, love, proclaim, honor them: worship the God of the martyrs. Turned to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 274

SERMO 274 On the Birthday of the Martyr Vincent

Vincent everywhere conquered. Redeemed by the blood of Christ, he does not perish. Patience is a gift of God. Perfect victory over all hostile machinations.

We have witnessed a great spectacle with the eyes of faith, the holy martyr Vincent constantly triumphing. He triumphed in words, he triumphed in sufferings; he triumphed in confession, he triumphed in tribulation; he triumphed burned by flames, he triumphed submerged by waves: finally, he triumphed tortured, he triumphed dead. When his body, in which was the trophy of Christ the victor, was cast into the sea from a small boat, it silently said: We are cast down, but we perish not. Who granted such patience to his soldier, except he who first shed his blood for him? To whom it is said in the Psalm: For thou art my patience, Lord; Lord, my hope from my youth. A great contest gains great glory; not human, nor temporal, but divine and eternal. Faith fights; and when faith fights, no one overcomes the flesh. For even if it is torn, even if it is lacerated; when does he perish who has been redeemed by the blood of Christ? A powerful man cannot lose what he bought with his gold, and does Christ lose what he purchased with his blood? But all this should be attributed not to the glory of man, but of God. From him truly is patience, true patience, holy patience, religious patience, right patience; Christian patience is a gift of God. For many robbers also suffer most patiently; and while not yielding and overcoming the torturer, afterwards are punished with eternal fire. The cause distinguishes the martyr from patience, or rather, from the hardness of the wicked. The punishment is the same, but the cause is different. We sang with the voice of the martyrs (for Vincent had said these things in his prayers): Judge me, O God, and distinguish my cause from an unholy nation. His cause is distinguished: because he fought for truth, for justice, for God, for Christ, for faith, for the unity of the Church, for indivisible charity. Who granted him this patience? Who? Let the Psalm tell us. For it is read there, it is sung there: Will not my soul be subject to God? From him indeed is my patience. Whoever thinks that Saint Vincent could do these things by his own strength is greatly mistaken. For whoever presumes that he can do this by his own strength, even if he seems to conquer through patience, is overcome by pride. To conquer well is to conquer all machines. When it offers allurements, it is conquered by continence: when it inflicts punishments and torments, it is conquered by patience: when it suggests errors, it is conquered by wisdom. Finally, when all these things have been conquered, it suggests to the soul, Well done, well done, how much you were able! How much you have fought! Who is compared to you? How well have you conquered? Let the holy soul answer it: Let them be confounded and put to shame that say to me, Well done, well done! When then does he conquer, except when he says: My soul shall be praised in the Lord; let the meek hear and be glad. For the meek know what I say; because in them dwells the Word, in them dwells the example. For whoever is not meek knows not what the taste is of what is said: My soul shall be praised in the Lord. For every not-meek person, proud, harsh, exalted, wants to be praised in himself, not in the Lord. But he who says: My soul shall be praised in the Lord; does not say: Let the nations hear, and be glad; let people hear, and be glad: but: Let the meek hear, and be glad. Let those who have a taste for it hear. For Christ was meek: He was led as a sheep to the slaughter. Therefore meek, because he was led as a sheep to the slaughter. Let the meek hear, and be glad. For they have a taste for what is said: Taste and see how sweet the Lord is: blessed is the man that trusts in him. We have heard a long reading, the day is short: we should not hold your patience even with a long sermon. We know that you have listened patiently, and by standing and listening a long time, you have sympathized with the martyr. May he who hears you, loves you, and crowns you.

Sermons - Sermon 275

SERMO 275 ON THE BIRTHDAY OF THE MARTYR VINCENT The strength of Vincent in sufferings comes from the assistance of Christ. Martyrs are distinguished by the cause, not the suffering. Our spirit received a great and very remarkable spectacle: not the most empty and pernicious one, as is customary in the theaters of various trifles, but we indeed drank the most useful and fruitful pleasure with our inner eyes, when the glorious passion of the blessed Vincent was read. It was to see the unconquered soul of the Martyr striving against the snares of the ancient enemy, against the cruelty of the impious judge, against the pains of mortal flesh, with very sharp conflict, and overcoming all in the aid of the Lord. Indeed, dearly beloved, it was so plainly and truly: let us praise this soul in the Lord, that the meek may hear, and be glad. What voices he had heard, what he had answered, what torments he had overcome, the completed reading declared, and placed before us as if in sight what had been done. There was such pain in his limbs, such security in his words, it was as if another was being tortured, another was speaking. And indeed it was another: for the Lord had foretold this, and promised it to His martyrs, saying: It is not you who speak, but the Spirit of your Father who speaks in you. Therefore, this soul is to be praised in the Lord. For what is man, except that he is mindful of Him? Or what strength has dust, except by Him who helps us, who made us from dust? So let him who glories, glory in the Lord. For if the diabolic and deceiving spirit often fills either false prophets or his false martyrs, so that they either inflict bodily torments on themselves or disregard those inflicted: how great is it for our Lord God to confirm the preaching of His name, to indeed deliver the flesh of the preachers into the hands of persecutors, but to take the mind to the fortress of liberty; so that while the former suffers injustice, the latter asserts the truth? Surely so that victories are made not by endurance but by justice: for it is the cause, not the punishment, that distinguishes martyrs. For many have endured pains with obstinacy, not constancy; by vice, not by virtue; by wrong error, not by right reasoning; possessed by the devil, not persecuted. However, in our victorious Vincent, he indeed conquered, who possessed: but He possessed, who had sent the prince of this world out, so that even fighting outwardly, he who had already been defeated would not dominate within. He who had been sent out still does not cease, as a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour. But He fights for us, who reigns in us, having cast him out. The Devil more tormented in the tortures of Vincent than Vincent himself.

Finally, the devil was tormented more by the unconquered Vincent than Vincent was by the persecuting devil. The more savage and exquisite the torments were, the more the tortured one triumphed over the tormentor, and from that body, as if from earth irrigated by its own blood, from which the enemy suffered more, a palm grew. For while the devil raged secretly and was secretly afflicted by his defeat, it clearly appeared in the human governor, what the devil endured in secret, and the invisible adversary was revealed through the cracks of the vessel he had filled. For the man's voices, eyes, face, and the turbulent motion of his whole body indicated that he felt more severe torments within than the ones he inflicted outwardly on the Martyr. If we consider the perturbation of the tormentor and the tranquility of the one suffering torments, it is very easy to see who was under the pains and who was above them. What joys there will be in the strength of those reigning when so great is the truth of those dying. What will it be when the body's incorruption becomes the fountain of life, when its dew is so sweet among torments? And what will the eternal flame do to the impious, who are ravaged by the madness of an angry heart? What will they suffer when judged, who are already tormented as they judge? What power will the future judgments of the saints wield, when in this life the judge's tribunal twisted the Martyr’s scaffold? The lifeless body of the Martyr was not abandoned by divine protection. Divine honor was conferred upon the relics of the saints.

However, the Lord provides great testimony to His witnesses, when He who has ruled the hearts of those who contend does not abandon the bodies of the dead, as He exhibited the most illustrious miracle from the body of this blessed Vincent; so that what the enemy had wholly sought, strived, and made to be invisible would be revealed by such present divine will, and be demonstrated as more religiously to be buried and venerated, so that the renowned memory of conquering piety and defeated impiety would endure in it. Truly, precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints: when neither the earth is disdained by the life of the flesh leaving it, nor when the invisible soul departs from the visible house, the dwelling place of the servant is kept by the Lord's care, and is honored to the glory of the Lord by faithful fellow-servants. For what does God do, by performing marvelous works around the bodies of the deceased saints, if not to bear witness that what dies does not perish to Him; and so that from this it may be understood in what honor He keeps with Him the souls of the slain, when lifeless flesh is adorned with such great effect of divinity? Just as the Apostle, speaking of the members of the Church, used the analogy of the members of our body, for those parts which are less honorable, we bestow upon them more abundant honor: so the providence of the Creator, by providing such illustrious testimonies of miracles to the bodies of the martyrs, bestows more abundant honor on the lifeless remains of men, and where what remains as deformed by the departure of life, there more evidently appears the present giver of life.

Sermons - Sermon 276

SERMO 276 ON THE FEAST OF THE MARTYR VINCENT The strength of the martyr is from Christ. In the passion which was recited to us today, my brothers, a fierce judge, a bloody torturer, and an invincible martyr are clearly shown. In his body, marked by various pains, the torments had already worn out, but still the members endured. So much evidence of miracles persisted in impiety, so many tortures afflicted did not yield to weakness; therefore, the divinity at work is recognized. For how could corruptible dust endure such immense torments unless Christ dwelt in him? In all these things, he is to be acknowledged, glorified, and praised, who both gave faith in the first calling and strength in the final suffering. Do you want to know that both were granted? Listen to the apostle Paul: "For it has been granted to you on behalf of Christ not only to believe in him but also to suffer for him." Vincent the deacon had received both, and he possessed them. For if he had not received, what would he have had? He had confidence in speech, he had endurance in suffering. Let no one, therefore, presume of his own heart when he speaks; let no one trust in his own strength when he endures temptation: because both to speak good things prudently, our wisdom is from him; and to bear evils courageously, our patience is from him. Recall the Lord Jesus Christ admonishing his disciples in the Gospel; recall the King of martyrs equipping his cohorts with spiritual arms, showing them battles, providing them aids, promising rewards; who, after saying to his disciples, "In this world, you will have tribulation," immediately added, as if to console the frightened heart, saying, "But take heart; I have overcome the world." Therefore, why do we wonder, dearest, if Vincent conquered in him by whom the world is conquered? "In this world," he says, "you will have tribulation; so that if it presses, it does not oppress; if it attacks, it does not vanquish." The double battle line of the world against the soldiers of Christ, allurements and terrors. The world produces a double line of attack against the soldiers of Christ. Take note, brothers. I said, the world produces a double line of attack against the soldiers of Christ. It flatters to deceive; it terrifies to break. Let not our own pleasure hold us, nor let external cruelty terrify us; and the world is conquered. Christ meets both approaches, and the Christian is not defeated. If human patience is considered in this suffering, it begins to seem incredible; if divine power is recognized, it ceases to be remarkable. Such cruelty raged in the body of the Martyr, and such tranquility was produced in his voice, and so much harshness of tortures raged in his limbs, and such security sounded in his words, that it was wondrously thought, while Vincent was suffering, that someone else or certainly another was speaking while Vincent was being tortured. And truly, dearest brothers, it was so: indeed, it was so; another was speaking. For Christ promised this also to His witnesses in the Gospel, those whom He prepared for such struggles. For He said: Do not meditate beforehand how or what you shall speak. For it is not you who speak, but the Spirit of your Father who speaks in you. Therefore, the flesh suffered, and the Spirit spoke. And while the Spirit spoke, not only was impiety refuted, but also weakness was strengthened.

Vincent was not as much devastated by his torments as Dacian. The more torments there were, the more illustrious the Martyr appeared to us. For, pierced by a manifold variety of wounds, he did not abandon the fight but repeated it more fiercely. You might have thought that the flame hardened him, not burned him; and just as a potter's furnace takes soft clay and renders it a hard vessel. Our Martyr could say to Dacianus: "Now my flesh does not care for your fires, because: My strength has dried up like a potsherd." And since it is truly written: "The potter's furnace tests the vessels, and the tribulation of temptation tests the righteous men"; Vincentius was tested and purified by that fire: truly Dacianus burned and cracked. For if he was not burning, how did he smoke? For what were the words of the angry man, except the smoke of a burning? Therefore, applying external flames to our Martyr who had solace in his heart; but he himself, inflamed by the torches of rage, burned inside like an oven, and burned his inhabitant, the devil. Through the furious words of Dacianus, through his savage eyes and threatening countenance, and the movements of his entire body, his inner inhabitant was revealed; and through these visible signs, just like through the crackling crevices of his own vessel, which he had filled, he was displayed. The torments did not torture the Martyr as much as madness devastated him. The glory of Vincent after the suffering, even in this world. But now, brothers, all those things have passed: both the wrath of Dacian and the punishment of Vincent. However, the punishment of Dacian and the crown of Vincent remain. Finally, so that we may show the glory of the martyrs even in this world, dismissing for now the outcomes of future retribution: which region today, which overseas province, as far as the Roman Empire or the Christian name extends, does not rejoice in celebrating the feast day of Vincent? But who today would have even heard the name of Dacian, if not for having read about Vincent's passion? For the Lord, preserving the Martyr's body with such care, demonstrated nothing else but that He who did not abandon him breathless had governed him while living. Thus, Vincent triumphed over Dacian while living, and triumphed even in death. Living, he trampled upon the torments; dead, he swam across the seas. But He himself guided the lifeless corpse amidst the waves, who had given Vincent an invincible spirit to God amidst the claws. Neither did the torturer's flame bend his heart, nor did the sea's water submerge his body. But in all these things, there is nothing else but what is precious in the sight of the Lord: the death of his saints. To this glory may the Lord lead us under His protection, to whom be honor and dominion forever and ever. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 277

SERMO 277 ON THE FEAST OF THE MARTYR VINCENT

(In which it is disputed concerning the spiritual body after the resurrection, and whether God can be seen by the eyes of such a body).

[DRESSED IN THE RESTORED BASILICA] The invincible body of Vincent. The relics of the saints for the consolation of the faithful. The bodies of the saints given to the churches as remembrances of prayers, not for the glories of the martyrs.

We awaited the Martyr struggling with the eyes of faith, and we loved all invisibly beautiful. For what kind of beauty did the spirit have, whose corpse was also invincible? He confessed the Lord while alive: he overcame the enemy even in death. What do we think, brothers, that this honor and the providence and counsel of the almighty Creator carried even to the deceased body, provided something to the Martyr? Why? if he were not buried, did He not know where he would be resurrected from? To him, both the crown in victory and eternal life in the resurrection are preserved. But from his body, a memory of consolation was provided to the Church. Thus, often God grants from His servants to His servants with a certain dignity, giving what benefits more to him to whom it is given than to him from whom it is given. Thus, God fed the holy Elijah through a bird: but the mercy and omnipotence of God did not fail, so as always to feed him in this way. However, he was sent to be fed by a widow: not because there was no way for the servant of God to be fed, but so that the faithful widow might deserve a blessing. He granted, therefore, the bodies of the saints to His Churches as memorials of prayers, not to the glories of the martyrs. For they have their whole glory with their Creator. Nor do they fear anything for the body itself, for there is nothing to fear. More if they spare the body, they harm even the body. If, however, they do not spare the body through faith, they benefit even the body. The martyr, by not sparing the body, benefits himself. Judgment, for eternal punishment.

Behold, listen to this, and question your faith. If Saint Vincent, out of fear of torments, denied Christ, it might seem that he spared his body: under a certain mortal condition, he would be released by the body. What would he do at the resurrection, when he would be cast into eternal fire? Denying Christ, he is denied by Christ. "Whoever denies me," he says, "before men, I will also deny him before my Father who is in heaven." Behold, he would deny, those torturers would rest, and with his soul wounded, his body would be healthy; or rather with the soul killed, the body would live: what use would a brief life of the body be to one eternally dead? The day would come, which the Lord recalls, when all who are in the graves will hear his voice, and will come out: but with a great difference. All will come out, but not all to the same purpose. All will rise, but not all will be changed. For those who have done good, he says, will rise to the resurrection of life; but those who have done evil, to the resurrection of judgment. When he says: "All who are in the graves," he undoubtedly manifests the resurrection of bodies. But when you hear of judgment, do not flatter yourself as if it were a temporal judgment; judgment is placed for eternal punishment. It is said according to this: "Whoever does not believe is already judged." This difference, therefore, will separate the just from the unjust, the faithful from the unfaithful, the confessors from the deniers, the lovers of perishable life from the lovers of eternal life; that difference will separate them. And the just will go into eternal life, but the impious into eternal fire. There they will be tormented with the body, who spared the body. For fearing bodily torments, they spared the body; and by sparing the body, they denied Christ; and by denying Christ, they have also reserved eternal punishments for the body. If they postponed them, did they take them away? The martyrs did not despise the body, but took good care of it.

Therefore, the martyrs of Christ did not despise their own bodies prudently. It is a perverse and worldly philosophy of those who do not believe in the resurrection of the body. For they seem to themselves to be great despisers of the body, because they view the body as a prison in which they think souls are confined due to sins committed elsewhere. But our God created both body and spirit; He is the creator of both, and the recreator of both; the originator of both, and also the restorer of both. Therefore, the martyrs did not regard the flesh as an enemy, nor did they despise or persecute it. For no one ever hated his own flesh. Rather, they took care of it, even when they seemed to neglect it: when they steadfastly endured temporary torments in it, they secured eternal glory even for that flesh. The glory of the body after the resurrection. The health of the body, the harmony of those things of which it consists. But who can explain in words what the future glory of this flesh will be in the resurrection? None of us has yet experienced it. Now we bear burdensome flesh: because it is needy, because it is weak, because it is mortal, because it is corruptible. For the corruptible body weighs down the soul. But do not fear this in the resurrection. This corruptible body must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. What is now a burden will be an honor: what is now a load will then be a relief. For it will not have weight, so that you feel you have a body. Beloved, see: when our body is healthy, even this fragile and mortal one, when it is moderated by the temperance of its parts, when nothing in it contends against another; heat does not overcome and oppress the cold, the abundance of cold does not extinguish the fervor, and, while struggling, afflicts; dryness does not absorb moisture, nor does moisture inundate and oppress; but all the things which make it up are balanced by a harmonious joining, which is called health. Briefly put, the health of the body is the harmony of those parts which make it up. Therefore, this health, that is, the harmony of members and humors in a corruptible thing, in a needy and weak thing, in a thing that can still hunger and thirst, stand and tire, sit and be refreshed, again tire from sitting, weaken from hunger, refresh from eating; not aiding past exhaustions without beginning others: for whatever else you take for refreshment when weary, is the beginning of another weariness; because in the thing you took to help, if you persist, you will also tire: therefore, in this weak and corruptible body, what is this so-called health? For this health, which is called health in mortal and corruptible flesh, in no way can be compared to the health of Angels, whose equality is promised to us in the resurrection. This health, however, as I said, however kind it is, what delight does it have, which is a desirable good for all? How great a thing does the poor man have, when he has this alone; how great a thing does the rich man not have, when he does not have this alone? Why does he boast of abundance? Fever does not fear a silver bed: it does not fear the pomp of a rich man, it does not fear the weapons of a warrior.

Health is to feel nothing, namely troublesome and burdensome.

What then is this health itself, which the martyrs rightly despised, because they hoped for another in the same flesh? However, because we have not yet experienced that one, from the one we know, let us conjecture about it somehow. What is health? If you say to me, "What is seeing?" as far as the body is concerned, I will perhaps respond to you, perceiving shapes and colors. If you say to me, "What is hearing?" I will respond, perceiving sounds. If you say, "What is smelling?" I will respond, perceiving odors. What is touching? Perceiving hard or soft, hot or cold, rough and smooth, heavy or light. What is health? Perceiving nothing. But even these very things in us now become insignificant in comparison to others. You see sharply: perhaps the eagle sees more sharply than you. You hear sharply: there are little beasts that hear more sharply. You smell sharply: you do not surpass the keen-scented dog. You judge tastes sharply by tasting them: there are animals that discern unfamiliar herbs and do not touch what is harmful. For, however sharply you discern food, you rashly rush into poison. You perceive sharply by touching: how many birds sense the coming summer and change their locations; they sense that winter is approaching, and migrate to warmer places? What you feel when it comes, they sense before it arrives. And this very thing which I praised in health, the stone, the tree, the corpse perceive nothing.

Dacian raging against the dead body. To live in the body, and to feel nothing of its burden, is to be healthy. The burden of the body always remains in this life. For that governor Dacian in his heart felt nothing, when he raged against a senseless corpse? For what indeed was he doing now to one who felt nothing, who could also be overcome by one who felt? Yet he did whatever he could, and he did it angrily. But he who now felt nothing in public, was crowned in secret. For he held to the sentence of his Lord: who wished to make us secure about those who kill the body: "Do not," he says, "fear those who kill the body, and after that have nothing more they can do." How do they have nothing more they can do afterward, when that madman did so many things to Vincent's body? But what did he do to Vincent, who even feeling nothing, did nothing to him? Therefore, it is not that he did not feel like a stone, like a tree, like a corpse; but to live in the body and feel nothing of its burden, this is to be healthy. And yet, however healthy a man may be in this life, he also feels the weight of a healthy body. Even a healthy body, which is corrupted, that is, corruptible, weighs down the soul. It weighs down the soul, that is, it does not obey the soul at every command of the will. It obeys in many things: it moves the hands to work, the feet to walk, the tongue to speak, the eyes to see, and directs the hearing to perceive sounds: in all these things the body obeys. The desire to change place feels the burden, feels the weight: the body is not moved with such ease to reach where it desires. Someone desires to see a friend while established in the body, and knows him to be far away, with many dwellings between: the mind has already gone ahead, when the body arrives, it then feels what sort of burden it carries. The weight of the flesh could not obey the presumed speed of the will: it could not be snatched away with the speed it wished, as the mind carries it. It is slow and burdensome.

One must seek something in this body from which the swiftness of the future spiritual body is understood. Do we think that the body itself has something from which the speed of the body can be proven? Shall we say the feet? What is slower? They themselves are the ones that make progress, and desires scarcely follow, and achievements reach through toiling. But let anyone be as swift as some animals, whose speed is not to be compared to ours; let anyone be as swift as birds: he does not reach his goal as quickly as he wished. Birds fly for a long time when migrating, and sometimes, weary, they perch on trees or ships. Therefore, even if we could fly like birds, we would still be slow due to our desire to reach our destination. But when the body becomes spiritual, as it is said: "It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body"; how much ease, how much swiftness, how much obedience to the will shall there be? In nothing shall there be weight, in nothing need, in nothing fatigue, in nothing resistance and struggling from another part.

It must be said about the spiritual body on occasion.

What kind of body was it which the Lord carried through barriers? Consider, I entreat you, if by God’s help I may with whatever words fulfill your expectation or not fall far short. An occasion has arisen for us to discuss something about the spiritual body from the martyr's passion, from whom we saw and marveled at the body's disregard for torments. For we said that by not sparing the body, he was indeed taking care of it: lest by fleeing temporal pains and denying Christ, the same body should be destined for eternal and most atrocious punishments. Hence, desiring to exhort you and myself to despise present things and hope for the future: "For in this tabernacle we groan being burdened," and yet we do not wish to die, and we fear to be unclothed from the weight; "for we do not wish to be unclothed, but to be clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up by life." Therefore on this occasion I have undertaken to speak to you something about the spiritual body, and I first thought it proper to commend the very health of this frail and corruptible body, that from it we might find something great. We find in this very health that we feel nothing. For we have many things within in our intestines; who among us would know them unless he saw them in mangled bodies? Our vitals, our inner parts, which are called intestines, how do we know them? And it is good when we do not feel them. For when we do not feel them, we are healthy. You say to someone, "Take care of your stomach." He answers you, "What is a stomach?" Blessed ignorance: he does not know he has it, which he always has in good health. If he did not have it in good health, he would feel it: if he felt it, he would not know it to his advantage. The speed of celestial bodies. The bodies of angels. But although we come with praiseworthy bodily health to the swiftness of motion, we find ourselves somewhat leaden. How great is the speed of heavenly bodies? Do you wish to know how great it is? You observe the sun, and it seems to you as if it does not move, and yet it moves. Perhaps you say: It moves, but slowly. Do you wish to know at what speed it moves? Do you wish to reason out what you do not perceive by sight? If someone were to run a straight path from the east to the west of this earth with the fastest horses, in how many days would they arrive? With whatever speed of horses they would be carried, how many stops would they make? The distance of the journey from the beginning of the east to the end of the west, the sun, which seems to you to stand still, covers in one day, and in one night it returns to the east. I do not wish to say, because it is obscure and difficult to persuade, or perhaps uncertain, how much broader celestial spaces are than terrestrial ones. When, therefore, we see such great speed of heavenly bodies, which appear to us when observed to not move, to what speed can we compare the angelic body? They were also present, and whenever they willed, they presented themselves to be seen and touched. Abraham washed the feet of Angels. Not only did he wash those bodies, but he even handled them. They appeared, as they wanted, when they wanted, to whom they wanted. They feel no difficulty, no slowness at all. But we do not see them running, we do not see them moving from place to place, so that we may know them departing from the sight of men: whenever they wanted, they arrived. Therefore, there is no evident example of this speed for us to provide. Let us omit the unknown, and dare to presume nothing rashly about the untested. The rays of the eye's speed. In this very body, which we carry, I find something whose ineffable swiftness I marvel at. What is this? The ray of our eye, with which we touch whatever we see. For whatever you see, you touch with the ray of your eye. If you wish to see farther, and some object is interposed, the ray strikes the obstructing object and is not permitted to pass to what you desire to see; and you say to the one obstructing, "Move, you are blocking me." You want to see the column, a man stands in the middle, obstructing your vision. Your ray is emitted, but it reaches up to the man, and it is not allowed to reach the column. It runs into something else, it is not permitted. Behold, he who was obstructing you has moved away, and your vision reaches where it wants. Now examine, and if you can, find and answer whether this vision, this ray of your eye reaches the near object faster and the distant one slower. You saw a man standing nearby, you saw him with the same effort, you extended the ray of your eye to him with the same effort, you reached him with the ray of your eye with the same effort as you reached that column you wanted to see, and because the man was interposed, you could not: not sooner to him, and later to the column; and behold, he was nearby, and the column farther away. If you wished to walk, you would reach the man sooner than the column: because you wished to see, you reached the man as soon as the column. There is nothing about the column and the man. Cast your eyes further, you see a wall in the distance: cast them farther still, you reach the sun. How far is it between you and the sun? Who can measure those intervals? Who can estimate with any precision of thought how far the sun is from you? And yet as soon as you opened your eye, behold, you are here, your ray is there. As soon as you desired to see, by seeing you reached it. You did not seek machines to support yourself, not ladders to climb, not ropes to lift yourself, not wings to fly. Opening the eye is reaching. The resurrection is compared to the speed of rays emitted from the eye.

What then is this speed? How great is it? What does it mean? It belongs to our body, it is emitted from our flesh. We have rays and we do not wonder. We use sight, but we are astonished upon considering. You do not find something comparable to this speed, as far as bodily speed is concerned. Rightly did the apostle Paul compare the ease of resurrection to this speed, saying: In the blink of an eye. It is a blink of an eye, not in the closing and opening of eyelids: for this is done more slowly than it seems. You raise an eyelid more slowly than you direct a ray. Your ray reaches heaven more quickly than a raised eyelid reaches the eyebrow. You see what a blink of an eye is: you see what ease the Apostle has assigned to the resurrection of bodies. How slowly were these things created and formed? Let us recall the delays of conception, and the seeds of little ones coalescing in the very wombs of mothers; members formed over time, on set days, over many months, until that which is created and formed within is brought forth into the light. Then how slowly it grows, how slowly adolescence follows childhood, youth follows adolescence, old age follows youth, death follows all. Another delay is added: the fresh corpse is seen whole, it dissolves into decay; and even for that dissolution, time is necessary until it flows down into rot, until it dries into ash: and from the very beginnings in the womb until the final ash of the grave, how great is the delay? How many days? What spaces of time? It comes to rise again, and in the blink of an eye it is restored. From the facility of the future resurrection is to be understood the facility of the spiritual body. This is more wonderful in speed than the ray of the eye.

Therefore, listen, brothers, and compare what is to be compared with the things with which they are to be compared. This flesh moves faster in walking than it was formed, than it was nourished, than it grew, than it reached a youthful state, and attained full age and stature; it moves faster in walking than this happened in it. Moreover, the resurrection will occur in the blink of an eye: how great will be the speed of movement if the resurrection could be so fast? Bodies were torn apart by raging forces: even if the parts of the dead are scattered throughout the whole world, if ashes are dispersed over the entire earth; in the blink of an eye, everything that was scattered is restored from such a vast expanse. We marvel at the excessive and, unless we experienced it, unbelievable speed of our own rays that are emitted from our eyes: more marvelous is the ease in the spiritual body that is to come. Indeed, it will rise in the blink of an eye: but our Lord, which our eyesight cannot do, even passed His body through barriers. After the resurrection, to his disciples who were assembled in one place, He suddenly appeared with closed doors. Where we cannot see, He was able to enter. Let no one say, "Of course, He could do this, but with the Lord's body; will He also be able to do this with mine?" And take from the Spirit, who spoke through the Apostle, full security. For it was said of the Lord Himself: "He will transform the body of our humiliation to be like the body of His glory." Will God be seen through a spiritual body? God cannot be seen in a place in the manner of a body.

Therefore, concerning this kind of body, concerning the great ease, great swiftness, great health of this body, let human frailty dare to define nothing rashly and presumptuously. What we shall be, we shall know when we shall have been. Before we are, let us not be rash, lest we be not. Sometimes human curiosity inquires, and says to itself: Do you think we will see God through that spiritual body? It can indeed be answered quickly: God is not seen in a place, God is not seen through parts, God is not seen spread out through spaces and separated by intervals. Although He fills heaven and earth, He is not therefore half in heaven and half on earth. For if this air fills heaven and earth, the part of it that is in heaven is not on earth. And whatever water fills, it indeed fills the space in which it is contained; but half of it is in half the space, and half in the other half, the whole in the whole. God is not such a thing. Do not doubt this at all, since God is not a body. To be spread out through spaces, contained by places, to have parts half and third and fourth and whole, is proper to bodies. God is not such at all; because God is wholly everywhere: not half here, and half there; but wholly everywhere. He fills heaven and earth: but He is wholly in heaven, wholly on earth. In the beginning was the Word. To hear also the same about the Son himself, because the Son is also one God with the Father: not equal in size, but in divinity. In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God: He was in the beginning with God. All things were made through Him, and without Him nothing was made. And a little later: And the light shines in the darkness. This only-begotten wholly remaining with the Father, wholly shines in the darkness, wholly in heaven, wholly on earth, wholly in the Virgin, wholly in the infant; not by moving alternately from place to place. For you too are wholly in your house, and wholly in the church: but when you are in the church, you are not in your house; when you are in your house, you are not in the church. Therefore, He is not wholly in heaven, wholly on earth, wholly in the Virgin, wholly in the infant (to mention nothing else), as if migrating from heaven to earth, from earth to the Virgin, from the Virgin to the infant, but wholly everywhere at once. For He is not poured out like water, nor separated and transferred like earth. When He is wholly on earth, He does not leave heaven: and when He fills heaven, He does not depart from earth. For He reaches from end to end mightily, and arranges all things sweetly.

If a substance that cannot be seen in a place can be seen through a spiritual body, this is still unknown.

If therefore they will be able to see the substance, which is not seen in a place, with bodily eyes even when the body has become spiritual; if by some hidden power, some unexperienced and utterly unknown power, and not perceived by any understanding, they will be able, let them be able. For we see with our eyes, we do not envy with our eyes. Let us not attempt to lead God into a place, let us not attempt to enclose God in a place, let us not attempt to diffuse God through the spaces of places as if by some bulk; let us not dare this, let us not think this. Let the substance of divinity remain in its own proper dignity. Certainly, let us change for the better as much as we can, not change God for the worse. Especially because we do not find any definite thing about this in Scripture, or we have not yet found. For I do not even dare to presume that it is not in it what might be found. Either it is not, or it is hidden, or it is hidden from me. Whatever might be found by anyone on either side, I accept gladly, and unless I give thanks for being instructed, I will be ungrateful, not to the person speaking, but to Him who teaches through the person. However, may the Giver of grace never permit me to be ungrateful. I say only this, because eyes which see whatever they see through the intervals of places— that is, so that there is space between the seer and that which is seen; for otherwise these eyes do not see— for if you remove something very far from them, they do not see it because the rays do not reach far places; but if you bring something closer to them, unless there is some interval between the eyes of the seer and the body that is seen, it cannot be seen at all; for if by bringing it too close, you touch the very eyes with which something is seen, vision is lost due to the lost space: therefore, I say this, that such eyes, which see whatever they see only through intervals and spaces of places, can neither now see God nor then, because He is not in a place. Therefore, either it will be something else that they will be able to see, which cannot be seen in a place: or if they retain the inability to see except in a place, they will not see Him who is not in a place.

About the spiritual body, and what is now certain concerning the invisible nature of God.

However, until the spiritual body is more diligently inquired into, what is either understood or rightly believed, let us hold that the body will be resurrected, let us hold that the form of our body, this future form, will be what Christ has exhibited or promised in secret. Let us hold that the body will be spiritual, not animal, as it is now. For it is clearly expressed and cannot be contradicted: A natural body is sown, a spiritual body will rise. Let us hold that the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are of their own proper nature, their own proper substance, equally and equally invisible, because we equally and equally believe them to be immortal, we equally and equally believe them to be incorruptible. The Apostle placed these together in one place: Now to the King of ages, immortal, invisible, incorruptible, the only God, honor and glory forever and ever. Amen. God alone, Father and Son and Holy Spirit, immortal, invisible, incorruptible: not now invisible, and later visible; because not now incorruptible, and later corruptible. As always immortal, as always incorruptible; so also always invisible. If invisibility is changed, it must be feared lest immortality be changed. I think, for this reason the Apostle himself placed invisible in the middle, between immortal and incorruptible. Concerning which there could be doubt, he secured it on both sides.

Let us hold firmly to that unalterable confession. It is not the same to offend a creature and to offend the Creator. Certainly, let us inquire into the qualities of creatures by reasoning, and if we err in anything, let us walk in what we have reached. For then, if we think otherwise in anything, God will also reveal this to us. Hence, we discussed at greater length yesterday. Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. Let us strive in all ways to cleanse our hearts, let us be vigilant with all effort; with all prayer, as much as we can, let us beseech, so that we may cleanse the heart. And if we think of those things that are outside: “Cleanse, he says, the things that are inside, and the things that are outside will be clean.” The vision of God, whether promised to the flesh. The salvation of God, Christ will be seen through the flesh. Christ will be seen by all flesh in judgment.

Perhaps it seems to someone that the testimony about the flesh is as clear as that about the heart: because it is written: Every flesh shall see the salvation of God. We have the clearest testimony about the heart. Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. We also have it about the flesh: Every flesh shall see the salvation of God. Now who would doubt that the vision of God was promised to the flesh, unless it troubled, what is the salvation of God? Rather, because it does not trouble, for we are not doubtful: the salvation of God is Christ the Lord. Therefore, our Lord Jesus Christ, if He were seen in His divinity alone, no one would doubt that the flesh would see the substance of God; because: Every flesh shall see the salvation of God. But because our Lord Jesus Christ can be seen both with the eyes of the pure, perfect, and God-filled heart as far as His divinity is concerned; yet He was also seen in the body, according to what is written: After this He was seen on earth and conversed with men: from where I know how it was said: Every flesh shall see the salvation of God? Because it was said that Christ would be seen, no one should doubt. But whether in the body the Lord Christ, or just as He was in the beginning the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God, is ambiguous, that is being asked. Do not press me with a single testimony; I quickly confess: Every flesh shall see the salvation of God. They say this means, Every flesh shall see the Christ of God. But Christ was seen also in the flesh, not indeed with a mortal flesh, if that spiritual transformation is still to be called flesh; because even He after the resurrection thus spoke to those seeing and touching: Touch and see, for a spirit does not have flesh and bones as you see I have. He will also be seen thus: not only was He seen, but He will also be seen. And perhaps then it will be fulfilled more perfectly what was said, every flesh. For now indeed flesh has seen Him, but not every flesh: but then at the judgment coming with His Angels to judge the living and the dead when all who are in the tombs hear His voice and come out, some to the resurrection of life, others to the resurrection of judgment, they will see that form, which He deemed worthy to assume for us, not only the just, but also the wicked, some on the right, some on the left; because even those who killed will see whom they pierced. Therefore, every flesh shall see the salvation of God. Body by body: because He will come in true body to judge. But to those positioned on the right, and sent into the kingdom of heaven, He will show Himself as He was already seen in the body: and yet He said: He who loves me will be loved by my Father; and I will love him, and will manifest myself to him. This the impious Jew will not see. For the wicked will be taken away, that he may not see the glory of God.

Simeon with his eyes saw the salvation of God. Christ visible in the future judgment.

Simeon, the just, saw him both with his heart, because he recognized the infant; and with his eyes, because he held the infant. Seeing him in both ways, recognizing the Son of God, and embracing the one born of the Virgin, he said: "Now, dismiss your servant, Lord, in peace, because my eyes have seen your salvation." Notice what he said. He was held until he saw with his eyes the one he perceived by faith. He received the little body, he embraced the body; seeing the body, that is, seeing the Lord in the flesh, he said: "My eyes have seen your salvation." How do you know whether all flesh shall see the salvation of God this way? So that we do not despair that he will come to judgment in this form, which he assumed for us, not in which he has always remained equal to the Father, let us also hear the voice of the angels from this. While he was being carried up to heaven before the eyes of his disciples, and they were gazing, sending him off with their gaze as they desired him in their heart, they heard from the angels: "Men of Galilee, why do you stand looking towards heaven? This Jesus who was taken up from you, will so come as you saw him going into heaven." So then, he will come as he ascended to heaven. He will come visibly to judgment; because he ascended visibly to heaven. For if he ascended visibly and will come invisibly, how will he come the same way? But if he will come the same way, therefore he will come visibly; and all flesh shall see the salvation of God. On the difficulty presented, and concerning God and the future spiritual body, what is to be held.

I did not say this because I denied that the flesh would see (remember as much as you can, so that we may learn until we discover what we do not yet know; but as for what we already know, it is not necessary for us to learn it, but with the Lord's help, to teach it): I did not say this, therefore, because I denied that the flesh would see; but because clearer testimonies must be sought, if they can be found. For you see how scant what has been presented is. It works more for us, or for the very truth itself, or for those who argue as if certain that the flesh will not in any way see God, not even in the resurrection of the dead. We do not contend from this point, but remind the sharp-minded by repetition, and impress upon the slow-minded. Even though we may be tedious to many, we still say it. God is not seen in a place, because He is not a body; because He is wholly everywhere, not lesser in one part and greater in another. Let us hold this most firmly. But if that flesh has received such a transformation, that it can see through it what is not seen in a place; let it entirely be so. But it must be sought, from where it can be taught. And if it is not yet taught, let it not yet be denied; but certainly, let it at least be doubted. However, let it not be doubted that the flesh will rise again, that the spiritual body will come from the animal body, that this corruptible and mortal nature will put on immortality and incorruption: so that we may walk in whatever we have attained. Certainly, if we stray too much in seeking something, let us at least stray in the creature, not in the Creator. Let each one strive as much as he can to convert the body into spirit, provided that he does not convert God into a body.

Sermons - Sermon 277A

SERMON 277/A

You are the salt of the earth; but if the salt loses its taste, with what can it be seasoned? It is no longer good for anything but to be thrown out and trampled underfoot. On the Feast of Saint Vincent

All dreadful things, the justice of the martyr made beautiful. The interests of the persecutor and the spectators were divided.

Christ commands that we celebrate solemnly and proclaim energetically the most strong and most glorious passion of Saint Vincent the martyr. We have seen with our mind and observed with our thoughts how much he endured, what he heard, what he responded, and a wondrous spectacle was set before our eyes, in a certain manner: an unjust judge, a bloody torturer, an unconquered martyr, a contest of cruelty and piety; and on one side madness, on the other victory. When reading these things echoed in our ears, charity inflamed in our hearts: we wished to embrace and kiss those mangled limbs, if it were possible, marveling that they could endure such great sufferings, and with inexplicable affection we did not want them to be tortured. For who would want to see a raging executioner, and a man, losing his humanity, raging against the human body? Who would willingly behold limbs stretched apart by the device of torment? The form of nature seized by an art of hostility, bones extended and separated, laid bare by wounds, who would not oppose this? Who would not shudder? And yet, all these things, and these terrible injustices, the martyr’s righteousness made beautiful; and the very extraordinary strength due to faith, to piety, to hope of the future age, to the love of Christ, covered the ghastly and deadly visage of torments and wounds with the splendor of glory. Finally, in this very spectacle, we divided our viewpoints with the persecutor. He delighted in the martyr's sufferings, we in the cause; he in what he endured, we in why he endured; he in the tortures, we in the virtue; he in the wounds, we in the crown; he in that he was held in prolonged pains, we in that he was least broken by the pains; he because he was tormented in the flesh, we because he remained steadfast in faith. Thus, where his cruelty was feeding, there the truth of the martyr tortured him; we, indeed bearing the horror of the command with difficulty, but conquering with Vincent’s enduring. As the wisdom of the martyr, so is the patience from God.

Yet our champion himself did not become a victor in himself or through himself, but in Him and through Him who, exalted above all, provides help, who, having suffered above all, left an example. He who calls to battle, calls to reward; and in this way, He watches over those who struggle, helping those who work. To His athlete, He instructs what to do and sets forth what to receive, so that he does not fail, He supports him. Therefore, let him pray simply, who simply wishes to strive, to overcome quickly, to reign happily. We have heard our fellow servant speaking, and with steadfast and true responses, overcoming the persecutor's arguments; but first, we heard the Lord saying: For it is not you who speak, but the Spirit of your Father speaking in you. And because of this, he overcame his adversaries because he praised his words in the Lord. He knew to say: In God, I will praise the word, in the Lord I will praise the speech; in God, I will hope, I will not fear what man does to me. We saw the martyr enduring immense tortures with the greatest patience: but his soul was submitted to God, for his patience was from Him. And lest human frailty, failing through impatience, deny Christ, and bring the enemy to joy, he knew to whom he should say: My God, deliver me from the hand of the sinner, from the hand of the lawbreaker and the wicked; for You are my patience. For thus, he who sang these things indicated how a Christian ought to ask for deliverance from the power of enemies, not by not suffering anything, but by enduring what he suffers most patiently. Deliver me from the hand of the sinner, from the hand of the lawbreaker and the wicked. But if you seek how he wishes to be delivered, consider what follows: for You are my patience. There is glorious suffering where there is a pious confession: so that, he who glories, may glory in the Lord. Therefore, let no one presume upon his own heart when he completes his speech: let no one rely on his strength when he endures temptation; because, for us to speak good things, our wisdom is from Him: for us to endure bad things, our patience is from Him. Therefore, it is ours to will, but we are called that we may will; it is ours to ask, but we do not know what to ask; it is ours to receive, but what shall we receive if we do not have? It is ours to have, but what do we have if we do not receive? Hence, he who glories should glory in the Lord. Therefore, the martyr Vincent is worthy to be crowned by the Lord, in whom he chose to glory both in wisdom and patience; he is worthy of solemn celebration, worthy of eternal happiness, for which obtaining, whatever the most threatening judge terrified with, whatever the bloody executioner inflicted, is light. What he endured has passed; what he received will not pass. For certainly, just as the limbs were vexed, the entrails tormented, the tortures so frequently and so cruelly repeated, so, just so, as these things were done, and if they had been done much more grievously, the sufferings of this time are not worthy compared to the future glory that will be revealed in us.

Sermons - Sermon 278

SERMO 278 (On the calling of the apostle Paul, and the commendation of the Lord's prayer) [FOR THE SOLEMNITY OF THE CONVERSION OF SAINT PAUL] Paul, from persecutor to preacher of Christ. An example of God's grace given in Paul, so that no sinner might despair.

Today, a reading from the Acts of the Apostles was pronounced, where the apostle Paul, from being a persecutor of Christians, became a proclaimer of Christ. Today, in those regions, even the places themselves testify to what happened then: and now it is read and believed. The benefit of this event is what the Apostle himself recounts in his Epistles. For he says that the forgiveness of all his sins, and of that fury and madness by which he dragged Christians to death, was granted to him for this purpose, being the minister of the fury of the Jews, whether in the stoning of the holy martyr Stephen, or in bringing others to punishment; so that no one may despair of himself, who has been involved in great sins and entangled in great crimes, as if he would not receive forgiveness, if he were to be converted to the one who, hanging on the cross, prayed for the persecutors, saying: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. He became from a persecutor a preacher and teacher of the Gentiles. "At first," he says, "I was a blasphemer and a persecutor and an injurious person; but I obtained mercy for this reason, that in me first Jesus Christ might show all long-suffering, for a pattern to those who are going to believe in him for eternal life." For by the grace of God we are saved from our sins, in which we are sick. His, his medicine is what heals the soul. For it could wound itself, it could not heal itself. To be ill and to recover are not equally under a man's control. From the free will of man comes the seed of death. Who is properly a physician? For even in his own body, man has the power to fall ill, but he does not have the same power to recover. For if he exceeds the measure, lives intemperately, and does things that are detrimental to health and destructive of well-being, he can fall into illness in one day if he wishes. However, when he has fallen, he does not recover at will. For to become ill, he himself engages in intemperance, but to recover, he seeks the help of a physician. As we have said, he cannot have the power to regain health in the same way he has the power to lose it.

Thus also according to the soul, so that by sinning man would fall into death, so that from being immortal he would become mortal, so that he would be subjected to the deceiver, the devil, it was in his free will; by inclining towards lower things, he abandoned higher things, and by lending his ear to the serpent, he closed his ear to God, and being placed between the instructor and the deceiver, he chose to obey the deceiver rather than the instructor. For whence he heard God, thence he heard the devil. Why then did he not rather believe the better one? Therefore, he found it true what God had foretold, false what the devil had promised. This is the first origin of our evils, this is the root of all miseries, this is the seed of death from the own and free will of the first man: who was made in such a way that if he obeyed God, he would always be blessed and immortal; if he neglected and despised His command, who wanted to preserve perpetual salvation in him, he would rush into the disease of mortality. Then, therefore, the physician is despised by the healthy, now he treats the sick. For the precepts that medicine gives to maintain health are different; for they are given to the healthy, so that they do not become sick: but the ones which the sick already receive are different, so that they may recover what they have lost.

It was good for a man to obey the doctor when he was healthy, so that the doctor would not be needed. For the healthy do not need a doctor, but the sick do. Indeed, a doctor is properly called one through whom health is restored. For God is always needed as a doctor even for the healthy, so that health itself is maintained. Therefore, it was good for him to keep perpetual health, in which he was created. He despised, he abused, and by his own intemperance fell into the bad condition of this mortality: let him now listen to the doctor giving instructions, so that he may rise from that place where he himself fell through sin. The sick man, by observing the doctor's instructions, becomes healthy only gradually. But certainly, brothers, just as in medicine itself, healthy practices dictated by the wisdom of health remain in what they have; but if one begins to fall ill, he starts to follow the prescription, and begins to act, if he truly cares to regain good and complete health. However, when he starts doing this, he is not immediately healthy; but by observing for a long time, he reaches that health which he had lost by being less temperate: this benefits him because he already begins to observe, so that he does not increase the illness, and so that he not only does not become worse, but also begins to have better health, gradually becoming healthy: for there is a hope of perfect health, when a person starts to be less and less ill. So also living justly in this life, what is it but hearing the precepts of the law, and doing them? So, are those who follow the precepts of the law already healthy? Not yet: but they act in order to become healthy. Let them not cease from doing this: because what was once lost is gradually recovered. For if man were to return quickly to his former blessedness, it would be easy for him to fall into death by sinning. With the doctor's orders, the pain of the incision must also be endured.

Anyone, for example, falls into bodily illness through intemperance; something has arisen in his body that needs to be cut away: without doubt, he will suffer pains, but those pains will not be unfruitful. If he does not want to suffer the pains of cutting, he will suffer the worms of rot. Thus the doctor begins to say: Observe this and that, do not touch this, do not use this food or drink, do not be restless about that thing. He begins to comply, already observing the commandments; but he is not yet healthy. So what good does it do to observe? Lest the plague that has happened to him increase, and to also lessen it. What then follows? It is proper to add to the observation of the commandments also the hands of the cutting doctor, and to endure the salutary pains inflicted. Thus, if the one placed in the foul ulcer says, What good is it to me because I observe the commandments, if I suffer the pains of cutting? it is answered, But by both you will be healed, both by observing the commandments and by enduring the pains. For it is enough that you have done this to yourself, by not observing while you were healthy. Therefore, trust the doctor until you are healed: for it is the merit of your ulcer, whatever troubles you suffer.

Christ the physician heals us gradually.

Thus, the physician Christ comes to the afflicted and the laboring, who says: "The healthy do not need a physician, but the sick do. I have not come to call the righteous, but sinners." He calls sinners to peace, he calls the sick to health. He commands faith, he commands self-control, temperance, sobriety; he restrains the lust of greed: he tells us what to do, what to keep. Whoever keeps these can already be said to live justly according to the command of medicine: but he has not yet received that health and that complete well-being, which God promises through the Apostle, saying: "This perishable body must put on imperishability, and this mortal body must put on immortality." Then the word that is written will come true: "Death is swallowed up in victory. Where, O death, is your victory? Where, O death, is your sting?" Then there will be full health, and equality with the holy angels. But now, before that happens, my brothers, when we begin to observe the precepts that the physician commands, when we suffer even some temptations and tribulations, let us not think that we observe in vain, because greater pain seems to follow those precepts which you observe. For what you suffer tribulations, it is the hand of the cutting physician, not the sentence of the punishing judge. This is done so that health may be perfect: let us endure, let us bear the pains. Sin is sweet: therefore, through the bitterness of tribulation, the pernicious sweetness is digested. It pleased you when you did evil: but by doing it you fell into infirmity. Conversely, medicine causes you pain for a time, so that you may receive perpetual health. Use it, and do not repel it. An antidote against all sins. Two precepts are opposed to the two kinds of sins.

Indeed, before all things, let not that antidote depart, which against all decay, against the poisons of all sins is very powerful, so that you may say, and truly say to the Lord your God: Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. For this is the covenant which the physician has written and established with the sick. For there are two kinds of sins; one by which God is sinned against, the other by which man is sinned against. Hence there are also those two commandments, on which the whole Law and the Prophets depend: You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind; and you shall love your neighbor as yourself. And in these are also contained the ten commandments of the Law, where three commandments pertain to the love of God, seven to love of neighbor: concerning which we have sometimes sufficiently treated.

He sins against God, who corrupts His temple in himself.

Just as there are two commandments, so there are also two kinds of sins. For one sins either against God or against man. However, one sins against God also by corrupting His temple in oneself: for God has redeemed you with the blood of His Son. And even before you were redeemed, whose servant were you, if not of Him who created all things? In a special way, He wanted to possess you, redeemed by the blood of His Son. And you are not your own, says the Apostle; for you were bought with a great price: glorify and carry God in your body. Therefore, He who redeemed you made you His house. Do you want to destroy your own house? Neither does God want to destroy His, which is you yourself. If you do not spare yourself for your own sake, spare yourself for the sake of God, who made you His temple. For the temple of God is holy, says he, which temple you are; and: If anyone destroys the temple of God, God will destroy him. These sins, when men commit them, they think they are not sinning, because they do not harm any man.

Corrupters of themselves, not the innocent. Who is innocent?

Therefore, I wish to make this known to Your Holiness, as much as the brief time permits, what evil they do who corrupt themselves with gluttony, drunkenness, fornication; and they respond to those who reproach them, "I did it with my own resources, with my own possession: whom did I rob? whom did I take from? against whom did I act? I wish well to myself from what God has given me." This person seems innocent, as though he harms no one. But how is he innocent, who does not spare himself? For only he is innocent who harms no one: because the rule of love for one's neighbor comes from himself. For God said this: You shall love your neighbor as yourself. How, therefore, is the love of your neighbor intact in you, when the love of yourself is wounded through intemperance? Then God says to you: When through drunkenness you wish to corrupt yourself, you do not overthrow the house of anyone, but my house. Where will I dwell? In these ruins? in this filth? If you were to welcome any servant of mine as a guest, you would restore and clean the house so that my servant could enter: do you not clean the heart where I wish to dwell? The manner of using permitted things is difficult to maintain. The immoderate use of a wife, unless it is for the purpose of procreating children.

I have therefore mentioned one single matter, brothers, so that you can see how those who destroy themselves sin, even when they seem innocent to themselves. But since it is difficult in the weakness and mortality of this life for a person not to exceed the measure a little in those things of which he makes use out of necessity, this remedy must be applied: Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors: if it is said, and truly said. You are forbidden to commit adultery, so as not to harm your neighbor. For just as you do not want anyone to approach yours, so you should not approach another's wife. But if you use your own more excessively, do you seem to harm anyone since you use what is yours? But by using it immoderately even though it's granted to you, you corrupt the temple of God in yourself. No stranger accuses you; but what answer will your conscience give to God, speaking through the Apostle: That each one of you know how to possess his own vessel in sanctification and honor; not in the passion of lust, like the Gentiles who do not know God? For who has a wife who uses his wife in such a way that he does not exceed the law of begetting children? For this is why she was given: the terms written in your marriage prove it. You agreed on how you would live: the writing of the agreement sounds in your ears: For the purpose of procreation. Therefore, do not approach, if you can, except for the purpose of procreation. If you exceed the measure, you act against those terms and against the agreement. Isn't it obvious? You will be a liar and a violator of the agreement: and God seeks the integrity of His temple in you and does not find it; not because you used your own, but because you used it immoderately. For you drink wine from your own cellar, yet if you drink in such a way that you get drunk, you have not sinned because you used your own thing: for you have turned the gift of God into your own corruption.

God Himself is offended by the immoderate use of permitted things. A remedy against the sins of such immoderation.

What then, brothers? Certainly it is manifest, and the conscience of all announces, that it is difficult to use permitted things in such a way that the measure is not somewhat exceeded. But when you exceed the measure, you offend God, whose temple you are. For the temple of God is holy, which you are. Let no one deceive himself: Whoever corrupts the temple of God, God will corrupt. The sentence is declared, you are held guilty. What will you say in your prayers when you beseech God, whom you offend in his temple, whom you drive out of his temple? How will you cleanse again in yourself the house of God? How will you bring him back to you? How, unless by saying from your true heart, in words and actions: Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors? For who will accuse you of using your food, your drink, your spouse immoderately? No one among men will accuse you: but yet because God reproves, demanding of you the integrity of his temple and the incorruption of his dwelling, he has given you a remedy, as if saying: If by exceeding the measure you offend me, and I hold you guilty where no man accuses you; forgive the man who has sinned against you, so that I may forgive you what you sin against me.

Despising that remedy, no hope of salvation remains.

Hold fast to this strongly, brothers. For anyone who renounces this antidote, no hope of salvation remains for them whatsoever. Whoever tells me, "I do not forgive the sins that people might commit against me," there is no way I can promise salvation to them. For I cannot promise what God does not promise. For I would not be a steward of the word of God, but a steward of the serpent. The serpent promised good to the sinner, but God threatened death. For what happened to them but what God threatened? And what the serpent promised is far from what occurred. Do you want me, brothers, to tell you: Even if you sin, even if you do not forgive the sins of others, you will be absolutely saved when Christ Jesus comes and gives forgiveness to everyone? I do not say this, because I do not hear it; I do not say what is not said to me. God indeed promises forgiveness to the sinner, but forgiving all past sins to those who convert, believe, and are baptized. This is what I read, this is what I dare to promise, this is what I promise, and what I promise is promised to me. And when it is read, we all hear it: for we are fellow students, and there is one teacher in this school.

Grave sins, which demand more intense labor of penance. Light sins overwhelm by their multitude, unless they are forgiven by God.

Therefore, all past things are forgiven to those who are converted: but there are certain grave and deadly sins of this life, which are not relaxed except through the most vehement distress of the humiliation of the heart, contrition of the spirit, and the tribulation of penance. These are forgiven by the keys of the Church. For if you begin to judge yourself, if you begin to displease yourself; God will come to have mercy. If you are willing to punish yourself, He will spare you. But he who does penance well, punishes himself. He must be severe towards himself so that God may be merciful to him: as David says: Turn your face away from my sins, and blot out all my iniquities. But by what merit? He says in the same psalm: For I acknowledge my iniquity, and my sin is always before me. If you acknowledge, then He forgives.

There are, however, light and small sins, which cannot be entirely avoided, which indeed seem smaller, but through their multitude weigh you down. For a heap of wheat is collected from the smallest grains, and yet ships are loaded from it: and if they are overloaded, they sink. One lightning bolt strikes someone down and kills them: but if there is excessive rain, even small drops in multitude kill many. One stroke slays, but the multitude extinguishes. Great beasts kill a man with one bite: however, many small creatures when gathered together often kill, and bring such destruction that the proud people of Pharaoh deserved to be judged with such plagues. Therefore, if these sins, although small, are so many that accumulated they make a heap which weighs you down; God is good, who even forgives those, without which this life cannot be led. But how does He forgive if you do not forgive what is committed against you?

Bail out, by forgiving the debts of our debtors. This saying is in the heart of man, like a bilge cask, from which the ship is pumped out at sea. For it can only admit water through the cracks of its joinery. Gradually, however, by applying a thin liquid, it makes a large accumulation, so that if it is not pumped out, it will overwhelm the ship. So also, in this life, we have certain cracks of mortality and fragility through which sin enters from the waves of this world. Let us seize this saying, like a bucket, to pump out the bilge, lest we be submerged. Let us forgive our debtors, that God may forgive our debts. By this saying (if it is truly done as stated), you pump out whatever had flowed in. But be cautious: for you are still at sea. For when you have done this once, it is not enough, unless you traverse the sea to that solidity and firmness of the homeland, where you are shaken by no waves, nor do you release what is not admitted into you, nor wish to be forgiven what you do not admit.

Hatred must quickly be set aside, lest it corrupt the heart.

I believe I have sufficiently commended this to your Charity, and I commend it because of these waves in which we are in danger, so that we may hold on to a saving remedy. And see also how much he sins, who strives to harm the innocent; since he can no longer be endured, who does not forgive what has been harmed against him. Let our brothers, therefore, take heed, and see against whom they have had any bitterness of hatred. If they have not yet forgiven them, at least in these days they should see what they can do about these in their hearts. Or surely, if they think themselves safe, let them put vinegar in the vessels in which they have been accustomed to keeping good wine. They do not put it in, and they are cautious, lest the vessel be spoiled: and they put hatred into their heart, not fearing that some corruption may work there? Keep therefore, brothers, that you harm no one, as much as you can: and if any excess of this permitted use of things has crept in due to the weakness of human life, since it pertains to the corruption of the temple of God; hold and turn it, so that what has been committed in you, you quickly forgive people, so that your Father who is in heaven may forgive you your sins.

Sermons - Sermon 279

SERMO 279 OF THE APOSTLE PAUL For the Solemnity of His Conversion In the transformation of Paul, the prophecy of Jacob concerning Benjamin is fulfilled.

We have heard the words of the Apostle, yea, through the Apostle the words of Christ speaking in him, whom He made a preacher out of a persecutor, striking and healing, killing and giving life; the lamb slain by wolves, and making lambs out of wolves. It was foretold in a notable prophecy, when Jacob, the holy patriarch, was blessing his sons, touching the present, foreseeing the future, it was foretold what happened in Paul. For Paul, as he himself testifies, was of the tribe of Benjamin. And when Jacob, blessing his sons, came to bless Benjamin, he said of him: "Benjamin is a ravening wolf." What then? If a ravening wolf, always rapacious? God forbid. But what? "In the morning he shall devour the prey, and at night he shall divide the spoil." This was fulfilled in the Apostle Paul, for it was also foretold of him. Now, if you please, let us consider him devouring the prey in the morning and dividing the spoil in the evening. Morning and evening are put for what is before and what is after. Thus then, let us take it, first he shall devour, after he shall divide the spoil. Consider the ravager: Saul, as the Acts of the Apostles testify, having received letters from the chief priests, that wherever he found followers of the Way of God, he might seize and bring them to be punished, went breathing out and panting for slaughter. This is he devouring in the morning. For when Stephen, the first martyr, was stoned for the name of Christ, Saul more evidently was present. And he was so present with those stoning that it did not suffice him only to stone with his own hands. For to be in the hands of all who were stoning them, he himself kept the garments of all, raging more by assisting them than by stoning with his own hands. We have heard: "In the morning he shall devour"; let us see, "at night he shall divide the spoil." He was struck down by the voice of Christ from heaven and receiving the interdiction of raging, he fell on his face; first to be cast down, then to be raised up; first to be struck down, afterwards to be healed. For Christ would not live in him except he were first killed in that which he had lived badly before. What then did he hear when struck down? "Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me? It is hard for you to kick against the goads." And he said, "Who are you, Lord?" And the voice from above: "I am Jesus of Nazareth, whom you persecute." With his members still set on earth, the head cried out from heaven, and did not say, "Why do you persecute my servants," but "Why do you persecute me?" And he said, "What do you want me to do?" Already he prepares himself to obey, who had previously raged to persecute. Already he is made a preacher from a persecutor, a sheep from a wolf, a soldier from an enemy. He heard what he should do. He was made blind indeed: that his heart might shine with inner light, the outer light was taken away for a time; it was taken from the persecutor that it might be returned to the preacher. And yet at that time, when he saw not other things, he saw Jesus. Thus also in his very blindness the mystery of believers was being formed; for he who believes in Christ ought to look upon him, and count other things as nothing; that the creature may become vile, and the Creator may become sweet in the heart.

Paul is brought to Ananias, like a wolf to a sheep, as a captive.

Let us then see. He was brought to Ananias, and Ananias means Sheep. Behold, the ravenous wolf is brought to follow the sheep, not to seize it. But lest the sheep should suddenly fear the wolf, the shepherd himself from heaven, who was doing all these things, announced to the sheep that the wolf would come, but would not be savage. And yet such a huge reputation of that wolf had preceded him that the sheep could not help but be troubled upon hearing his name. For when the Lord Jesus announced to Ananias that Paul had now come to believe, and that Ananias should go to him, Ananias said: Lord, I have heard about this man, how much evil he has done to your saints: and now he has received letters from the chief priests, that wherever he finds followers of your name, he may drag them away. But the Lord said to him: Let it be, and I will show him what he must suffer for my name's sake. A wondrous and great thing is being done. The savageness of the wolf is prohibited, the wolf is brought as a captive to the sheep. So great was the preceding fame of the predatory wolf, that upon hearing his name, the sheep would fear even under the shepherd's hand. He is comforted, so that he no longer thinks the wolf savage, nor fears his imminent attack. The sheep feel secure about the wolf from the Lamb who died for the sheep.

Christ meek and humble, how he neither remains silent nor becomes mild.

Then he, to whom we sang, "Lord, who is like you?" on the preceding Sunday, "Do not be silent, and do not be gentle, O God"—yet he says, "Come to me, and learn from me, for I am gentle and humble in heart." Let us see how he demonstrates both and shows that his words are in harmony with himself. He is gentle and humble in heart, because he was led like a sheep to the slaughter, and as a lamb before its shearer is silent, so he did not open his mouth. Suspended on the wood, he endured the unjust flames of hatred, he withstood the tongues of the ministers of the worst hearts; with these tongues they struck the innocent, they crucified the just. Of these tongues it was said: "The sons of men, their teeth are weapons and arrows, and their tongue is a sharp sword." And what did the tongue do? What did the sharp sword do? It killed. What did it kill? Death killed life, so that death would be killed by life. What then, what did their sharp tongue do? Hear what it did: see what follows. "Be exalted above the heavens, O God, and let your glory be over all the earth." Behold what the sharp sword did. We know the Lord was exalted above the heavens, not by seeing, but by believing: His glory over all the earth, by reading, believing, and seeing. See, therefore, the gentle and humble in heart, bringing the trophy of the mortified flesh to this glory. See him gentle. While hanging, he said, "Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing"; and, "Learn from me, for I am gentle and humble in heart." Let us learn from you, for you are gentle and humble in heart. Where could it more appear, or ought to have appeared more worthily than on the very cross? When his limbs were hanging on the wood, when his hands and feet were pierced with nails, when they still raged with their tongues, when they were not satisfied with the blood poured out, when the sick did not recognize the physician: "Father," he said, "forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing." As if to say, "I have come to heal the sick: what prevents them from recognizing me is the immensity of the fever." Thus the gentle and humble in heart says, "Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing."

Towards Paul he exhibits both; and he does not remain silent, and he does not become mild. Temporal tribulations must be considered small by the hope of future glory.

What then: Will you remain silent and be soft, God? Fulfill even this. Behold, he did not remain silent: he cried out from heaven: Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me? He acted: Do not be silent:

exhibit: And do not be soft. First, because he did not spare his error, because he did not spare his cruelty, because he, gasping for bloodshed, was overthrown by a voice, seized the light from the raging one, led the captive to Ananias, whom he was seeking to persecute. Behold, not soft, behold, raging, not against the man, but against the error. This is not enough: still do not be silent, nor soft. To Ananias trembling and fearing upon hearing the name of that famous wolf: I, he said, will show him. I will show him. See him threatening, see him still raging: I will show him. Do not be silent, nor soft, God. Show the persecutor not only your goodness, but also your severity. Show him, let him suffer what he did, let him learn to also suffer what he inflicted, let him also feel what he was inflicting on others. I, he said, will show him what he must suffer. But he speaks as if raging, and fulfills what was said: Do not be silent, nor soft, God. Do not depart from it: Learn from me because I am gentle and humble in heart. I will show him what he must suffer for my name. You showed terror; help, lest he suffer and perish whom you made, whom you found. He is threatening, he is not silent, he is not soft, he threatens. I will show him what he must suffer for my name. Where there is terror, there is salvation. Who was acting against the name, let him suffer for the name. O merciful severity! You see him preparing the iron: he is about to cut but not to kill; to heal, not to slay. Christ said: I will show him what he must suffer for my name. But to what end? Hear the one who was suffering. The sufferings of this time are not worthy. He himself says who was suffering, and knew for whose name he was suffering, and with what reward he was suffering. The sufferings of this time are not worthy to be compared to the future glory which will be revealed in us. Let the world rage, let the world roar, let it rebuke with tongues, let it flash with arms, let it do whatever it can: what will it do against what we are going to receive? I weigh what I suffer against what I hope for. I feel this, I believe that. And yet what I believe is worth more than what I feel. Whatever might rage for the name of Christ, if it can be lived, is tolerable: if it cannot be lived, it causes departure from here. It does not extinguish, but hastens. What does it hasten? The reward itself, the sweetness itself; which, when it comes, will be without end. Work with end, reward without end.

Saul, from where he was named. Paul, small and humble.

So, brothers, this chosen vessel, first Saul from Saul. For recall, you who know the Scriptures of God, who Saul was. A very wicked king, persecutor of the holy servant of God David; and he too, if you remember, was from the tribe of Benjamin. Thus this Saul, leading a path of cruelty, but not remaining in cruelty. Afterwards, if Saul from Saul, from where Paul? Saul from the cruel king, when proud, when raging, when breathing slaughter: but from where Paul? Paul, because small. Paul is a name of humility. Paul, after being brought to the Master, who said, "Learn from me for I am gentle and humble of heart." Hence Paul. Observe the usage of the Latin expression: because “paulum” means little. "I will see you a little later," "wait here a little,” that is, "I will see you after a short while," "wait here for a short while." Therefore, listen to Paul: "I am," he says, "the least of the Apostles." Truly, I am the least of the Apostles: and elsewhere: "I am the last of the Apostles."

God exalts the humble. And smallest and last, like the hem of the Lord's garment. What is so small, what is so last as the hem? Yet by touching this, the woman was healed from the flow of blood. In this little thing there was greatness, in the smallest thing the great dwelt; and the less it excluded greatness from itself, the more less it was. Why do we marvel that the great dwells in the narrow? It dwells more in the smallest. Hear Him saying: "Upon whom shall my spirit rest? Upon the humble, and quiet, and trembling at my words." Therefore, the high dwells in the lowly, to exalt the humble. For the Lord is high and looks upon the humble; but the high things He knows from afar. Humble yourself, and He will draw near to you: exalt yourself, and He will withdraw from you.

One should not be ashamed of Christ crucified. So what does this smallest one say? What we heard today: With the heart believes unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation. Many believe in their hearts, and are ashamed to confess with their mouths. Know, brothers, that there are now almost no Pagans who do not silently marvel, and perceive the prophecies concerning Christ exalted above the heavens being fulfilled; because they see his glory over all the earth. But since they fear each other, they are ashamed in front of each other, they drive salvation far from them: because confession is made unto salvation with the mouth. What good does it do to have believed unto righteousness in the heart, if the mouth hesitates to utter what is conceived in the heart? God sees the faith within: but it is not enough. You do not confess the humble, you fear the proud; and you place the proud above him who was displeasing to the proud for your sake. You are afraid to confess the humble Son of God. You are not ashamed to confess the great Word of God, the virtue of God, the wisdom of God: but you are ashamed to confess Him born, crucified, dead. High, exalted and equal to the Father, by whom all things were made, by whom you also were made, he became what you are; he became man for you, born for you, died for you. Sick one, how will you be healed, if you are ashamed of your remedy? Choose the time. Now is the time: later that despised one will come to be admired, the judged one will come to judge, the killed one will come to raise up, the dishonored one will come to honor. Now, and later: now it is a matter of faith, later it will be in manifestation. Choose in this time which part you will hold in the future. Are you ashamed of the name of Christ? From that which you are ashamed of now before men, you will be ashamed of when he comes in his glory to repay what he promised to the good, what he threatened to the bad. Where will you be? What will you do, if that exalted one looks at you, and says to you, You were ashamed of my humility, you will not be in my glory? Therefore let the evil shame depart; let the beneficial boldness come, if it must be called boldness: but yet, brothers, I was compelled to say this, and I was not afraid at all. On the death of Christ, why we should not be ashamed. Christ took upon Himself our two evils, that He might give us His two goods. For I do not want us to be ashamed of the name of Christ. Let it be an insult to us that we believe in the Crucified, in the Slain. Certainly in the Slain; but if blood had not flowed from Him, the handwriting of our sins would still remain. Without a doubt, I believed in the Slain One: but what was slain in Him was what He took from me, not what He made me from. Absolutely, I believe in the Slain One, but in whom slain? Who came, and received something. Who came? He who, being in the form of God, did not consider it robbery to be equal with God. Behold who came: what did He receive? But He emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men. The Maker made, the Creator created. But in what was He made and created? In the form of a servant, by taking the form of a servant, not by losing the form of God. Therefore, in this form of a servant, in what He received from us for us, He was born, suffered, rose again, and ascended into heaven. I mentioned four things. He was born, He died, He rose again, and He ascended into heaven. Two first, two last: the two first, He was born, He died; the two last, He rose again, He ascended into heaven. In the first two, He showed you your condition: in the last two, He presented you with an example of reward. You knew to be born and to die: the region of mortals is full of these two things. What abounds here in all flesh, except to be born and to die? This man has in common with beasts: thus, we share this life with beasts. We were born, we are going to die. This you did not yet know, to rise again and to ascend into heaven. You knew two, you did not know two: He took what you knew, He showed what you did not know: endure what He took, hope for what He showed.

Death of the temporal kind is not to be feared, but the eternal. For what, if you do not wish to die, are you not going to die? Why do you fear what you cannot avoid? You fear what, even if you do not wish, will be; and you do not fear what, even if you do not wish, will not be. What is it that I have said? God has ordained death for all born men, through which they depart from this world. You will be exempt from death if you will have been exempt from the human race. What are you doing? Is it now said to you: Choose whether you wish to be a man? You are already a man, you have come. Consider how you will leave here: you have been born, you will die. Flee, beware, repel, redeem: you can postpone death, not remove it. It will come, even if you do not wish; it will come when you do not know. Why then do you fear what, even if you do not wish, will be? But fear rather, what if you do not wish, will not be. What is this? To the impious, the unbelieving, the blasphemous, the perjurers, the unjust, and all the wicked, God has threatened the fires of hell and eternal flames. First compare these two things, death for a moment, and punishments for eternity. You fear death for a moment, which will come, even if you do not wish it; fear eternal punishments, which will not come, if you do not wish them. What you should fear is much greater, and you have the power to prevent it from coming to you; and it is greater, and far greater, incomparably greater what you should fear, and you have the power to prevent it from coming to you. For indeed, if you live well or if you live badly, you will die: you will not escape death whether by living well or living badly. But truly if you choose to live well here, you will not be sent into eternal punishments. Because indeed you cannot choose here not to die; choose while you live, not to die eternally. This is faith, this Christ shows by dying and rising again. By dying he shows, what you wish or not you will suffer; by rising again he shows, what if you live well you will receive. Here one believes with the heart unto righteousness, confession is made with the mouth unto salvation. But you fear to confess, lest men insult you, not those who have not believed; for they also believe within; but lest those insult you who are ashamed to confess. Hear what follows: For the Scripture says: Everyone who believes in him will not be confounded. Meditate on these things, be in these things: this is the food not of the belly, but of the mind. He who in the morning was seizing, in the evening was sharing those same foods.

What is evident is for us; what is hidden is for God.

Because the Lord and Father also commands me to speak this to you, listen a little more attentively. We announce to your ears and you see with your eyes the spoil snatched from the jaws of the wolf by the mercy and work of our supreme shepherd. The one about whom the flock clamored, the shepherd has brought back. The Lord has not abandoned the tribulation of His servants' hearts, but He wants to commend the sweetness of His mercy; making His mercies wonderful, as it is written, so that tribulation precedes the joys to follow. The one about whom it was clamored as an enemy of the Christian faith has embraced the Christian faith. We could also say, as Ananias and perhaps some others said, or perhaps some still say: Who? That man, a Christian? He believed? The heart of a man we cannot see, nor can we show it. God says: What is revealed belongs to you, what is hidden belongs to me. Paul the Apostle says: Brothers, do not judge anything before its time, until the Lord comes, who will bring to light the hidden things of darkness and will manifest the counsels of the hearts; and then each one will receive praise from God. You cannot inspect the heart of a new Christian. What? Can you inspect the heart of an old Christian? You will say: But he believed out of necessity. The same might be said of the one we spoke of a little earlier, who was first a blasphemer, a persecutor, and an insolent man. For he too was pressed by some necessity. He was struck down by a celestial voice: to gain light, he lost light. Threaten as you wish, and give as much as you wish to any man: what is sweeter than that light? Yet unless Paul had lost it, he would not have received the eternal light. He believed out of necessity. What did he fear, tell me, what did he fear? The clamoring sheep? Sheep can clamour, they cannot bite. He might also in the clamor of God's sheep perceive the glory of God, and fear the judgment of God. He was awakened from a certain sleep to consider that the things predicted about Christ were being fulfilled concerning Christ. He might say in his heart, his gods were defeated within him, he was deserted by his own gods; so powerful is the name of Christ, so prevailing is the glory of Christ. Therefore, briefly I say to your Charity, I speak to the Church of God, I speak to the people of God: if he believed, you have found him; if he feared, you have conquered.

Love the person more than you previously hated the error. Christ vindicates Himself by converting His enemies.

Meanwhile, brothers, as far as men are able, let us not arrogate to ourselves more than is permitted. The Apostle says: "Receive the one who is weak in faith, not to disputes over doubtful things." Let us not arrogate to ourselves the judgment of others' thoughts, but let us offer our prayers to God, even for those about whom we might doubt something. Perhaps his recent conversion causes some hesitation: love him more abundantly as he hesitates, and by your love, remove doubt from the heart of the weak one. Meanwhile, look at the face, about which you rejoice; entrust the heart to God, for whom you pray. Know that he is forsaken by the wicked and taken up by you. Love the man more than you previously hated the error; for when you cried out against him, you were seeking him. Do not presume that you have cried out in vain; and rejoice that you have found the one whom you were seeking. Who is that, this and that? Faustinus. Who is that, this and that? Faustinus. Who was against Christ? Faustinus. Who feared Christ? Faustinus. Thus, Christ came to heal the sick, of whom we heard in the Gospel, because: "Those who are well do not need a physician, but those who are sick." And: "What man among you, having a hundred sheep and losing one of them, does not leave the ninety-nine in the mountains and go to seek the one that is lost? And when he finds it, he rejoices over it; so does my Father rejoice over one penitent more than over ninety-nine just persons who need no repentance." Thus, indeed, Christ came to heal the sick, thus He knows how to take vengeance on His enemies. Those whose spirits perhaps hurt with their companions' error get angry for a moment, but afterwards, they perhaps will imitate. Therefore, brothers, we commend him to your prayers, your love, your most faithful friendship, and the acceptance of his frailty. As you precede, so he follows: teach the good way, let him find it good in you. Now that he has become a Christian, let him discern the difference between what he has left behind and what he has found. His life and zeal concerning the faith of Christ will prove themselves in later times.

It was shouted: let the pagans not be elders. The voice of Faustino: I do not want an eldership, I want to be a Christian. But now, my brothers, it was not necessary, it was not the counsel of the shepherds, to drive away the one who knocks, to delay the one who seeks; to judge the hidden things of the heart, and not to accept the manifest voice, was neither our counsel nor our intention. For we know how that merciful Lord, seeking profits everywhere from His money, warned the lazy servant who wished to judge what he did not see, and who was slothful in gathering his master's profits: Wicked servant, I condemn you out of your own mouth. You called me a stern man, reaping where I have not sown, gathering where I have not scattered. Therefore, you knew my greed. You ought to have given my money to the bankers, and I, coming, would have demanded it with interest. Therefore, we could not do anything but distribute the money of the Lord: He will be the collector, not only of his, but of all of us. Let us then fulfill the office of the distributor, not usurp the place of the collector. Brothers, this work set before your eyes is not ours, but God's. What has been done was not established by us, because neither did we hope for it: another was the intention, both yours and ours. You know what has been cried out here, you know: that the pagans may not be greater, that the pagans may not dominate the Christians. These things have been said: and because this name was in envy, many things have been shouted in this name with zeal for the house of God by the Christians; and the whole intent was nothing but that the pagan may not dominate the Christians. But that he about whom the outcry was made might be a Christian, was not thought of by the Christians: but was disposed by Christ. Truly it is fulfilled which is written: Many thoughts are in the heart of man; but the counsel of the Lord shall stand forever. This counsel was hidden: it was hidden, but it was impending. Men worked what they could: but Faustinus the money-changer emerged new from the workshop of Christ. Therefore, brothers, keep in mind the work of God. You sought one thing, you disposed another, you found another. We commend the work of our Lord to fellow servants. Let us love more what our Lord has done in it, than that which we wished to do: for his works are better. And we have heard his great and devoted voice: I do not want the preeminence, I want to be a Christian. Rejoice, exult, love more than you hated. Commend his work to Christ with prayers. Show a faithful, pious, friendly mind to the rudiments of the old man. For what difference does it make, whom you see now advanced in age? He came at the ninth hour to the vineyard, about to receive equal pay.

Even the pagans seem to celebrate the birthday of John.

We renew the Christian day in memory of your Charity; although it cannot happen that it be erased from your hearts by forgetfulness. But we commend this, because both the pagan and the impious due to some other reasons gradually become obsolete in their own causes, thus it seems the pagans also celebrate the same day. Badly, wickedly, unhappily: but how many are freed from this, it is before your eyes. These things will grow old; but do not help them, distinguish yourselves from them, seek divine things. We are about to celebrate the day of Saint John, John the Baptist, the forerunner of the Lord, the friend of the bridegroom, with all chastity, with all sobriety. When they admire you for being different from their joys, so they gradually follow: and all those things will grow old, and they will perish. Listen to the prophet, and see it fulfilled, see it done as predicted: Listen to me, you who know judgment. The prophet Isaiah, God through him. Listen to me, you who know judgment; my people, in whose heart my law is. Do not fear the reproach of men, and do not be overcome by their detraction; nor should you esteem it as great that they despise you. For just as a garment is consumed over time, and like wool is eaten by the moth. But my righteousness endures forever. Therefore, be secure, brothers, be completely secure. They grow old, diminish: they will end, either by believing, or by dying. No matter how much they clamor, no matter how much they indulge in carnal pleasure, no matter how much they babble wickedly and dance against the divine songs of Christ, they are fewer today than yesterday. Therefore, brothers, tomorrow we will celebrate, as I said, in the name of the Lord, Saint John the Baptist. After seven days, that is on the Sabbath day, we will also celebrate the natal day of the holy martyrs Peter and Paul.

Sermons - Sermon 28

SERMO 28 ABOUT THE VERSE OF PSALM 104:

"Let the heart of those who seek the Lord rejoice"

Through the fasting of the fiftieth. From all the divine utterances, let us rather discuss here with the help of the Lord that which we have most recently heard: Let the heart of those who seek the Lord rejoice. For it is fitting, especially because we are fasting with our bodies. Our heart will rejoice if we hunger with our minds. When some delightful things are placed on our tables, the mouths of those seeking food rejoice. When various colorful and beautifully painted things are placed before our eyes, the eyes of those seeking something bright to see rejoice; the ears of those seeking a song rejoice; the scent of those seeking a pleasant smell rejoices. Let the heart of those who seek the Lord rejoice.

Christ is the food who restores and does not fail.

Without a doubt, individual things which are presented to our different senses delight single senses. For neither does a sound delight the sight nor a color the hearing. But to our heart, the Lord is both light and voice and fragrance and food. And for this reason he is all things, because he is none of these things. And for this reason he is none of these things, because he is the creator of all these things. He is the light to our heart, to whom we say: In your light we will see light. He is the sound to our heart to whom we say: You will give joy and gladness to my hearing. He is the fragrance to our heart, of whom it is said: We are the sweet fragrance of Christ. But if you seek food, because you have fasted: Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness. Of the Lord Jesus Christ himself it is said, because he has been made our righteousness and wisdom. Behold, the feast is prepared. Christ is righteousness; he is never absent; he is not prepared for us by cooks, nor imported by merchants from foreign lands like exotic fruits. He is food which anyone who has a healthy spiritual throat senses. He is the food who, commending himself, said: I am the living bread, which came down from heaven. He is food which nourishes and never diminishes; he is food which, when consumed, is not expended; he is food which satiates the hungry and remains whole. When you depart from here to your own tables, you will eat nothing resembling this. Therefore, because you have gathered for this feast, eat well. But when you leave, digest it well. For he eats well but digests poorly who hears the word of God and does not act. For he does not extract useful nourishment, but belches with indigestion the raw unprocessed intake.

Light is the food of the eyes. Do not be amazed that our hearts feast in such a way that they are restored and do not diminish the resources by which they are restored. God has given our bodily eyes such food. For this light is the food of the eyes; by it, our eyes are nourished, and if anyone has been in darkness for a longer time, they fail as if by fasting. For men lose their sight by sitting in darkness, and nothing falls upon the eyes, nor does anything strike them, nor does any foreign moisture flow in, nor dust, nor smoke. A man is brought out after darkness, and he does not see what he used to see. His eyes have died of hunger; by not taking their food, which is light, they have failed. See then what I have proposed, what kind of food our eyes have. This light is seen by all, it feeds everyone's eyes. The sight of the viewer is refreshed, and the light remains undiminished. If two people see, it remains the same; if many see, it remains the same. The rich see, the poor see, it is equal to all. No one sets boundaries on it. The poverty of the poor is filled, the greed of the rich is idle. For does one who has more see more? Or does he bring out gold to preoccupy the poor man and buy for himself what he sees so that the other does not have it? If, therefore, such is the food for our eyes, what is God Himself for our minds? The word of men and the abiding Word of God are compared. And the food of the ears is sound. And what sort is it? From these sensory experiences of the body, let us deduce the intelligible concepts of the mind. Behold, I speak to your affection. Ears are present, minds are present. I have named two things: ears and minds. And in that which I speak, there are two things: sound and meaning. They are conveyed together, they arrive at the ear together. Sound remains in the ear, meaning descends into the heart. But let us first consider the sound itself, how much more we ought to love the intellect. Sound is like the body, meaning is like the soul. But sound, as soon as it strikes the air and touches the ear, passes away and is not recalled nor still sounds. For syllables succeed one another in such a way that the second does not sound unless the first has passed. Nevertheless, this transient thing has a certain great miracle. Behold, if I were to set bread before you who are hungry, the whole would not reach each one. You would divide among yourselves what I had placed, and the more numerous you were, the less each would have. But now I speak a sermon. You do not divide words and syllables among yourselves, nor do you cut my sermon, so that one person takes this part, another that, and so bit by bit and piecemeal what I say reaches each one. But one hears the whole, two hear the whole, many hear the whole, and however many come, all hear the whole. It suffices for all, and is whole for each. Your ear is prepared to hear, nor is it defrauded by the neighboring ear of another. If this happens with a sounding word, what happens with the Omnipotent Word? For just as our voice is whole to the ears of all who hear and whole to each individual, nor are my voices as numerous as your ears, but one voice fills many ears, undivided yet whole to all, so think of the Word of God, whole in the heavens, whole on earth, whole among angels, whole with the Father, whole with the Virgin, whole in eternity, whole in the flesh, whole among the dead when He visited, whole in paradise where He translated the thief. This I have said about sound. The Word of God conquers all understanding.

What if I speak of the intellect? And how much less is it than the Word of God? Behold, I utter a sound. But once I have uttered it, I cannot recall it. But if I want to be heard, I utter another sound, and when that has passed, I utter another, or silence will follow. But I convey the intellect to you and still retain it in myself. You find what you heard, and I do not lose what I said. See how true these things are, and let the heart of those who seek the Lord rejoice. For the Lord is the principal truth itself. Thus, the intellect remaining in my heart migrates to yours without leaving mine. However, when the intellect resides in my heart and I wish it also to reside in yours, I seek a sound as if it were a vehicle to convey it to you. And I produce a sound, almost as if I imprint the intellect upon it, and I utter, express, and teach it without losing it. If my intellect could do this with my voice, could the Word of God not do it with His own flesh? Behold, the Word of God, being God with God, the Wisdom of God abiding unchangeably with the Father, in order to come to us sought flesh as if it were a sound, inserted Himself into it, and came forth to us without departing from the Father. Understand and be wise in what you have heard. Think how great and magnificent it is, and hold greater thoughts about God. He surpasses all light, all sound, all intellect. He is to be desired, and with love, we must yearn towards Him, so that the heart of those who seek the Lord may rejoice.

Sermons - Sermon 280

SERMO 280 ON THE BIRTHDAY OF THE MARTYRS PERPETUA AND FELICITAS Perpetua and Felicity, having obtained the reward of perpetual happiness through remarkable martyrdom.

Today's day brings to our memory, by annual repetition, and in some way represents the day on which the holy servants of God, Perpetua and Felicitas, adorned with the crowns of martyrdom, flourished in perpetual happiness, bearing the name of Christ in battle, and simultaneously finding their own name in the reward. We have heard their exhortations in divine revelations and the triumphs of their sufferings, as they were read; and all these things arranged and illuminated by words, we have perceived with our ears, seen with our minds, honored with our devotion, and praised with our love. Nevertheless, a solemn discourse is also due from us to such devout celebration, which if I present unequal to their merits, I still offer a diligent affection with the joy of such a great festivity. For what could be more glorious for these women, whom men more easily admire than emulate? But this is especially the praise of Him in whom they believed, and in whose name, running with faithful zeal, they are found, regarding their inner person, neither male nor female; so that in those who are women in body, the virtue of the mind hides the sex of the flesh, and it is disgraceful to think of in their members what could not appear in their deeds. Thus the dragon is trampled by a chaste and victorious foot, when the ladder is shown, by which the blessed Perpetua may go to God. Thus the head of the ancient serpent, which was the downfall of a falling woman, was made a step for her ascending.

Glory of the martyrs.

What is sweeter than this spectacle? What is stronger than this contest? What is more glorious than this victory? Then when holy bodies were thrown to the beasts, the nations roared throughout the amphitheater, and the peoples devised vain things. But He who dwells in the heavens laughed at them, and the Lord mocked them. Now, however, the descendants of those whose voices wickedly raged against the flesh of the martyrs, praise the merits of the martyrs with pious voices. Nor was the amphitheater then filled with such a great multitude of men to kill them as the church is now filled with to honor them. Charity witnesses with reverence every year what impiety with sacrilege committed on a single day. They also watched, but with a far different intention. They, by shouting, did what the beasts did not fulfill by biting. But we both pity what the impious did and venerate what the pious suffered. They saw with the eyes of the flesh what they poured out into the savagery of their hearts: we see with the eyes of the heart what was snatched from them so they might not see. They rejoiced in the dead bodies of the martyrs, we grieve for their dead minds. They, without the light of faith, thought the martyrs extinguished; we see with the most faithful gaze them crowned. Finally, their insult has become our exultation. And indeed, ours is religious and eternal: theirs at that time was impious, now clearly it is nothing. The greatest rewards of the martyrs. The love of this laborious life. The rewards of martyrs, dearest ones, we believe to be the greatest, and we believe this very rightly. But if we attentively consider their struggles, we will by no means marvel that they are so great. For, although this life is laborious and temporal, yet there is such sweetness in it that while humans cannot make it so they do not die, yet by many and great efforts they strive that they might not die soon. Nothing can be done to remove death, and whatever can be done, is done to delay it. Surely, it is troublesome for every soul to labor: and yet even by those who expect neither good nor evil after this life, all labors are performed so that all labor may not end in death. What about those who, either through error, suspect future false and carnal delights after death, or through right faith, hope for a rest that is ineffably tranquil and blessed—do not even they strive and with great concern act not to die soon? For what else do they intend with so many labors, so much servitude, whether of medicine or of other services, which either the sick require or are rendered to the sick, except that the end of death may not be reached soon? How much, therefore, should the lack of death's infliction in the future life be compared, given that its mere delay is so precious in this life? For there is such a sweetness, I don't know how, in this sorrowful life, and such a great horror of death in the nature of the living that even those who are passing through death to a life in which they cannot die do not wish to die.

Martyrs have despised both death and pains for Christ.

Thus, martyrs of Christ, with sincere love, certain hope, and unfeigned faith, disregard the greatest pleasure of living and the fear of dying with outstanding virtue. Turning their back on the promising and threatening world, they stretch forward. They ascend by trampling the head of the serpent that hisses in various ways. For he who subjugates the love of this life, which is the tyrant, conquers all desires. And there is no bond in this life that holds him who is not held by the love of this life. The fear of death and bodily pains are usually mixed together. For sometimes one, sometimes the other triumphs in man. Tortured, he lies so as not to die; and even as he is about to die, he lies so as not to be tortured. He speaks the truth, not enduring the torments, so that he may not be tortured for lying. But let any of these prevail in any minds. The martyrs of Christ have conquered both for the name and righteousness of Christ: they neither feared to die nor to suffer. He who lived in them conquered in them; so that those who lived not for themselves but for Him might not die even when dead. He provided them with spiritual delights so that they would not feel bodily discomforts; enough for their training, not for their failing. Where was that woman, when she did not feel herself fighting against the roughest cow, and when she asked about what was to come as if it had already passed? Where was she? What was she seeing that she did not see these things? What was she enjoying that she did not perceive these things? By what love was she alienated, by what spectacle was she distracted, by what cup was she intoxicated? And still, she was held by the bonds of the flesh, still carried dying limbs, and was still burdened by a corruptible body. What, when the souls of martyrs, freed from these bonds after the perils of dangerous combat, are received and refreshed with angelic triumphs, where it is not said to them, "Fulfill what you were commanded," but, "Receive what I promised"? With what joy do they now spiritually feast? How secure in the Lord and with what sublime honor do they glory, which can anyone teach by an earthly example? The happiness of the martyrs is different before and after the resurrection. And this indeed is the life that the blessed martyrs now have, which, although it cannot be compared with any felicities or sweetnesses of this age, is a small portion of the promise, or rather a consolation of delay. But the day of retribution will come, where, with the bodies restored, the whole man will receive what he deserves. There, too, the limbs of that rich man, which once were adorned with temporal purple, will be tormented with eternal fire, and the flesh of the poor man, covered with sores, changed, will shine among the Angels: although even now he thirsts for the drop from the finger of the poor man in hell, and he rests delightfully in the bosom of the just one. For just as there is a great difference between the joys and miseries of those sleeping and those awake; so there is a great difference between the torments or joys of the dead and those who rise again: not that the spirits of the deceased, as of those sleeping, must be deceived; but that the rest of souls without bodies is one thing, and the clarity and happiness of the Angels with heavenly bodies is another, with which the multitude of the faithful who rise again will be equal: in which the most glorious martyrs will shine with the particular light of their honor, and the very bodies in which they endured unworthy torments will be turned into fitting ornaments for them. The solemnities of the martyrs, with what spirit they are to be celebrated. The martyrs take pity on us, and pray for us.

Therefore, let us devoutly celebrate their festivities, as we do, with sober cheerfulness, chaste congregation, faithful thought, and confident preaching. It is no small part of imitation to rejoice in the virtues of the better. They are great, we are small: but the Lord has blessed the small with the great. They have preceded, they have excelled. If we cannot follow them in action, let us follow them in affection: if not in glory, at least in joy: if not by merits, by wishes: if not by passion, by compassion: if not by excellence, by connection. Let us not consider it little that we are members of His body, of whom they are also members, to whom we cannot be equated. For if one member suffers, all the members suffer together: thus when one member is honored, all the members rejoice together. Glory to the head, from which both the higher hands and the lower feet are cared for. Just as He laid down His life for us: so too did the martyrs emulate Him, and laid down their lives for the brethren, and that this abundant fertility of peoples like seed would arise, they watered the earth with their blood. Therefore, we are also the fruits of their labor. We admire them, they pity us. We congratulate them, they pray for us. They spread their bodies like garments, when the colt carrying the Lord was led into Jerusalem: we at least, cutting branches from the trees, pluck hymns and praises from the Holy Scriptures, which we offer for the common joy. Nonetheless, we all obey the same Lord, follow the same master, accompany the same leader, are joined to the same head, strive towards the same Jerusalem, pursue the same charity, and embrace the same unity.

Sermons - Sermon 281

SERMO 281 On the Feast of the Martyrs Perpetua and Felicity In Perpetua and Felicitas, Christ unconquered.

Among the martyred companions, the worth and name of Perpetua and Felicitas, holy servants of God, shine and stand out. For there is a more glorious crown where the weaker sex is involved. Because certainly, a manly spirit in women has achieved something greater, especially when the feminine fragility did not fail under such burden. They had adhered well to one man, to whom the chaste virgin Church is uniquely presented. Well, I say, they had adhered to that man, from whom they drew the virtue to resist the devil: so that women might overthrow the enemy, who through a woman had overthrown a man. He appeared invincible in them, who for their sake became weak. He filled them with strength in order to harvest them; who, in order to plant them, emptied himself. He led them to these honors and praises, who for their sake heard reproaches and accusations. He made women die manfully and faithfully, who for their sake was born mercifully of a woman.

Perpetua's victory over the devil.

