It delights a pious mind to behold such a spectacle as that which blessed Perpetua narrated had been revealed to her about herself, where she saw herself as a man contending with the devil. In that contest, she too was advancing into perfect manhood, into the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ. Deservedly, the old and cunning enemy, in order not to miss any stratagems, who had deceived the man through the woman, because he sensed the woman acting manfully against him, tried to overcome her through a man. He did not use a husband, so that she who was already dwelling with heavenly thought in the heavens might remain stronger by despising any suspicion of fleshly desire; but he instructed her father with words of deception, so that the religious mind, which would not be softened by the instinct of pleasure, might be broken by the force of piety. Here holy Perpetua responded to her father with such moderation that she neither violated the commandment, which requires honor to parents, nor yielded to the wiles by which the higher enemy acted. Overcome on every side, he made her same father strike her with a rod; so that the one whose words she had despised might at least mourn his beatings. She indeed grieved for the injury to her aged parent; and though she did not offer consent, she kept affection. For she hated the foolishness in him, not his nature; and his unbelief, not her lineage. Therefore, with greater glory she bravely rejected her beloved father who was ill-advising, whom she could not see beaten without sorrow. Hence, that grief did not detract at all from the strength of her fortitude, and it added something to the praises of her suffering. For to those who love God, all things work together for good. The birth and martyrdom of Felicitas.

Felicitas, however, was pregnant even in prison. In giving birth, she testified to the feminine condition with a feminine voice. Eve’s penalty was not absent, but Mary’s grace was present. What a woman owed was demanded: the one whom the Virgin bore helped. Finally, the birth was brought forth, mature at an immature month. For it was divinely ordained that the burden of the womb should not be laid down at its due time, lest the honor of martyrdom be deferred at its due time. It was, I say, divinely ordained that the fetus be brought forth on an unintended day, provided that Felicitas be returned to such a company: lest, if she had been absent, it might seem that not only had a companion to the martyrs been absent, but also the reward of the martyrs themselves. For that was the name of both, which is the gift of all. For why do the martyrs endure everything, if not to glory in perpetual happiness? Therefore, they were called by that which all are called. And so, when there was a great company in that struggle, the perpetuity of all was signified by the names of these two, the solemnity of all was marked.

Sermons - Sermon 282 augm

(ErfurtSermon 282 augmentations Sermon of Saint Augustine, Bishop The Passions of Saints Perpetua and Felicity. On the names of the martyrs Perpetua and Felicitas. The feast day of the holy martyrs, which we celebrate today, not only shone with remarkable virtues in their suffering but also marked their reward for such great devotion with their own names and those of their companions. Perpetua and Felicitas are indeed the names of two, but the reward belongs to all. For all the martyrs did not labor bravely in the struggle of confession and suffering for a time, except to rejoice in perpetual felicity. Therefore, by divine providence governing, these [martyrs] had to be not only martyrs but also the closest companions, as it happened, so that they would mark one day of their glory and propagate a common celebration to be observed by posterity. For just as they urge us to imitate them by the example of their most glorious struggle, so by their names they testify that we will receive an inseparable reward. Both hold each other, both bind each other; we do not hope for one without the other. For neither does Perpetua avail if Felicitas is not, and Felicitas forsakes if Perpetua is not. These few words about the names of the martyrs, to whom this day is consecrated for us, should suffice for the time.

These were not only women, but even wives.

However, as for those whose names these words bear, as we have heard when their passion was read, as we know from tradition, these women of such virtues and merits were not only females but also women, one of whom was a mother, so that to the weakness of her sex was added the attachment of affection. From the mother, take the example of faith, strength, patience, and piety, celibate women; from women, young men; from females, virgins! Added to this was that they were nurtured tenderly according to the customs and love of their parents for their native place, so that the enemy, attempting them in all things, immediately believed they would not be able to endure the hard and cruel burdens of persecution and would soon be his. But they, with the most cautious and firm strength of the inner person, crushed all his snares and broke his attacks. The martyrs, in their victorious determination, remained steadfast. In the army of the King Christ, that they might not yield to any adversities with the most unencumbered battle array, hindered neither by the weaker sex, nor softened by feminine thoughts, not softened by the world’s allurements, nor frightened by the threats, women ardently, females manfully, the delicate harshly, the weak strongly contended, conquering flesh by spirit, fear by hope, the devil by faith, the world by love. With these arms, our King’s army is invincible, and thus armed, Christ’s soldiers triumphed not by preserving but by slaughtering the body's members, not by killing but by dying. Indeed, they preferred the eternal King’s dominion over the temporal king's dominion and surrendered their bodies so that they would neither serve nor worship any god, but their own God, fearing not those who kill the body but Him who has the power to kill both body and soul in the fire of Gehenna, and thus not only preserving their spirits which they had set unmovable in victorious purpose, but also counseling for their bodies which they seemed to despise, so that the injustice of persecution might sow them in dishonor and the truth of judgment might raise them in glory.

Perpetua conquered the devil. In this struggle Perpetua, as it had been revealed to her through a vision, having been transformed into a man, overcame the devil, stripped of the world and clothed with Christ, arriving at the unity of the faith and the knowledge of the Son of God, made into a perfect man and a principal member in His body, for which the whole body had not discarded one member.

What happiness was in the suffering of martyrdom. In this struggle, Felicitas was not hindered from confessing martyrdom by the burden of her womb. For she was pregnant both in body and heart. One she had conceived by divine participation, the other by human union; the birth of the former nature's law deferred, the latter the force of persecution hastened; maturity was lacking to the former, the opportunity of interrogation was present to the latter; the former would be aborted if hurried, the latter would be killed if denied. Therefore, the most pious woman remembered both that she would endure the pain of childbearing and confess the child's virginity: she had made a place for one in her carnal womb, and for the other in her spiritual heart; laden with the human burden she languished, honored by the divine she rejoiced. Thus, she firmly believed and faithfully heeded Christ Himself saying: Whoever does the will of my Father is my brother, and sister, and mother. She became not the mother of Adam before confessing Christ the heavenly man before the judge, she preserved the earthly by groaning in the prison. There also was her response, when giving the cries of Eve in labor pains, they said to her, being so impatient in the necessity of bearing, what she would do under the beasts! "Here," she said, "what I suffer, I suffer; but there, He will suffer for me, for whose faith I am to suffer." Rightly it happened that she, so noble in cruelty, did not even feel the wild heifer's savagery she experienced, nor retained any memory of it. It was demonstrated to her what she had been in the burden of her womb, what had been granted to her in the passion of martyrdom.

Why are the names of the comrades of the martyrs not celebrated equally? In this illustrious band of glory there were also male martyrs, on the same day men also triumphed with the strongest passion; yet they did not commend the same day with their names. This did not happen because women were preferred to men in dignity, but because both the women's weakness conquered the fiercest enemy with greater miracle and masculine virtue contended for eternal happiness.

Sermons - Sermon 282

SERMO 282 On the Birthday of the Martyrs Perpetua and Felicity Of the names of the martyrs Perpetua and Felicity.

Today we celebrate the festive day of two holy martyrs, who not only stood out for their extraordinary virtues in suffering but also marked their reward and that of their fellow companions with their own names for such labor of piety. Perpetua and Felicitas are indeed the names of the two, but their reward is for all. For all the martyrs would not endure the struggle of suffering and confession firmly for a time unless they were to rejoice in perpetual happiness. Therefore, under divine providence governing, these women had to be not only martyrs but also closely united companions, as happened, to mark one day of their glory and propagate a shared celebration to posterity. For just as they encourage us by the example of their most glorious struggle to imitate them, so they testify by their names that we shall receive the inseparable gift. Let both hold onto each other, both bind each other. We hope for neither without the other. For perpetual is not beneficial if there is no felicity, and felicity deserts us if it is not perpetual. These few remarks about the names of the Martyrs, by whom the day is consecrated, must suffice for the moment.

Women victorious over the enemy.

However, concerning those whose names are these, as we have heard, when their passion was read, as we know it has been handed down to memory, these women of such great virtues and merits were not only females but also women. One of whom was also a mother, adding tenderness to the weakness of her sex, so that in all things, the enemy, testing them, believing that they would immediately succumb to him as bearing the harsh and cruel burdens of persecution, and would soon become his. But they, with the most cautious and strongest strength of the inner person, crushed all his plots and broke his attacks.

Why the names of the companions of martyrs are not equally celebrated. In this famous company of glory, there were also male martyrs; on that same day, even the bravest men triumphed through suffering. Nevertheless, they did not commend the same day with their names. This was not done because women were preeminent to men in dignity of character, but because both the weakness of the women overcame the ancient enemy with greater marvel, and the male virtue fought for eternal happiness.

Sermons - Sermon 283 augm

SERMON 283 enlarged.

Sermon of Saint Augustine on the birthday of the holy Maxulitan martyrs The courage of the holy martyrs in suffering is a gift of the grace of God.

Let us so admire the courage of the holy martyrs in their suffering, that we may proclaim the grace of God. For they do not wish to be praised for themselves, but in Him to whom it is said: "My soul shall boast in the Lord." Those who understand this are not proud. They ask with trembling, they receive with joy; they persevere, they do not lose. For because they are not proud, they are meek. And therefore, when he said: "My soul shall boast in the Lord," he added: "Let the meek hear and be glad." What is weak flesh, what is it but worms and decay? Or whatever there was, except that which we have sung is true: "My soul will be subject to God, for from Him is my patience." For indeed, so that the martyrs might endure everything for the faith, their strength is named patience. There are two things which either allure or drive men into sins: pleasure and pain. Pleasure allures, pain drives. Against pleasures, continence is necessary; against pain, patience. For it is thus suggested to the human mind to sin. Sometimes it is said: "Do this, and you will have that"; sometimes however: "Do this so that you do not suffer that." A promise precedes pleasure, a threat pain. Therefore, so that men may have pleasures, or not suffer pain, they sin. And therefore God, against these two things, one of which is in the enticing promise, the other in the terrible threat, has deigned both to promise and to threaten: to promise the kingdom of heaven, to threaten the punishments of hell. Sweet is pleasure, but sweeter is God. Bad is temporal pain, but worse is eternal fire. You have that which you may love in exchange for the loves of the world, rather for the unclean loves; you have that which you may fear instead of the terrors of the world.

"Because sin is prohibited, it is known." But it is little to be warned, unless you obtain help, which belongs to the warning. Against all pleasures the law cries out to you: You shall not covet. You have heard: it is a divine oracle, God has spoken. That he has commanded well and truly warned, none of the faithful have doubted. But see what the apostle says: The law came, and sin revived. For before it was said to you: You shall not covet, you thought you could sin lawfully, nor was it considered sin when it was not forbidden. Because sin is forbidden, it is known. Therefore, if you were seeking the help of the law, it should be avoided. You have heard. What more do you desire from the law? You shall not covet. The letter of the law clings to your mind, you have with whom to struggle, but you will be conquered if you do not have help. Whence help? From grace. For love is poured into our hearts, not by ourselves, but by the Holy Spirit who has been given to us. Take away that grace, remove this help: the letter kills. The world first had you as a sinner; with the letter coming without help, it will also have you as a transgressor. Therefore, the letter kills, but the Spirit gives life, because the love of God is poured into our hearts by the Holy Spirit who has been given to us. The law frightens to compel us to ask for help. The law, as the apostle himself says, is like a pedagogue. The pedagogue does not instruct, but leads to the teacher. Instructed and fortified by the teacher, he will no longer be under the pedagogue. For the letter will no longer frighten you, whom grace helps.

You shall not covet, is a general commandment.

We have said this because of what is written: You shall not covet. For it seems that this commandment is set forth against those sins that occur through the allure of pleasure, and the apostle has posed this command almost as if it were the sole voice of the law: You shall not covet. Does this commandment avail against the fears of pain? Perhaps it does. For what? He does not wish to be in pain: he covets health. He who fears to die, covets life. Against such perverse coveting of bodily health, where it is not needed, nor of bodily death, which will come whether you will or not, extend the commandment: You shall not covet, and say with the prophet: And I have not coveted the day of man: you know. This was the voice of the martyrs: they did not covet the day of man, so that they might not fail to reach the day of God. They did not covet a day with a short end, so that they might reach a day without end. What did they despise and what did they gain? For indeed temporal losses are in no way comparable to the gains with them. One hour of labor, and eternity is acquired. On the reward of the soldier of Christ.

Consider, brothers, the day of the martyr; it is good that we engage in the exhortation of his patience. Consider the labors of soldiers, those who carry weapons, what dangers they undergo, how hard and arduous they endure, in cold, in heat, hunger, thirst, wounds, deaths. Daily they are involved in dangers, not setting before their eyes the soldier's labor, but the veteran's leisure. "Behold," they say, "the labor ends, after a few years leisure will follow, it will be well with us, expenses will not be lacking, immunity will be present, we will not be called to any civic duties, no one will impose his burden on us after military service." With this reward proposed, labor is undertaken uncertainly. For he who says while serving: "The labor ends," how does he know he will not be finished before the labor is completed? Perhaps even after the labor is finished, having already obtained leisure, he dies immediately. And he who was to labor somewhat longer for the proposed leisure, is not allowed to enjoy the leisure he reached by labor for a long time. In these uncertainties, labor is performed, and a certain labor is undertaken for uncertain leisure. Wake up, Christian hearts; serve God with whom labor cannot be in vain, with whom danger cannot be fruitless. For the soldier of the world loses his reward in battle by death, the soldier of Christ finds his reward in death. Finally, after the labor of a short time, not a rest of long time is obtained, but of no time. For there we rest, not where there will be long time, but where there will be no time at all. For our age will be eternity, where neither growing nor aging occurs, nor will the day pass because the day will not withdraw. If therefore you were told: "Labor twenty years to rest forty," who would not want double rest for single labor? Yet scarcely any veteran encounters it, even if he grows old, to enjoy leisure as long as he has labored. But what is said of us? And our emperor is going to give us an eternal reward, not a daily stipend, how does he exhort us through the apostle? For the temporal light affliction of ours, he says, works for us an exceedingly excellent eternal weight of glory. Of the eternal glory prepared for the faithful.

What words, brothers! How he has minimized what we suffer, how he has commended what we hope for! "What is," he says, "the light and momentary affliction of our troubles, in an incredible way..." For an incredible way eye has not seen nor ear heard nor has it entered into the heart of man, what God has prepared for those who love him. Therefore, he says to the faithful: "In an incredible way an eternal weight of glory works for us;" he calls the affliction light and momentary for the faithful. "In an incredible way:" what is incredible is commanded to be believed. Faithful soldier, believe the incredible, because with God nothing is impossible. But he said "weight" so that you may be made heavy, lest you be light. "In the people," he says, "I will praise you with a heavy weight." He said "weight" to confirm you with the gravity of love, not to be carried away by the wind of temptation. Consider the threshing floor and love gravity, fear lightness. There is chaff, there is wheat: both are beaten by the winnowing-fan, but not both are carried away by the wind. One remains because of its weight, the other flies away because of its lightness.

True patience is far removed from hardness of heart.

Therefore, this will happen in us when for faith and justice we endure all adversities; not indeed for any rest whatsoever. Blessed, he said - as we have heard -, are those who have suffered persecution for the sake of justice. With this addition, he distinguished us from adulterers, robbers, murderers, parricides, sacrilegious, sorcerers, heretics. For they also suffer persecution, but not for justice. If you want to avoid temptation, see the distinction. Choose the cause, lest you fear the punishment. Choose the cause, lest you suffer the punishment in vain. And when you have chosen the cause, also commend it to God and say to Him: Judge me, O God, and distinguish my cause from an ungodly nation. Your cause is distinguished by Him, by whom your patience is. For He grants true patience. For enduring for an evil cause is hardness, not patience. Whatever hardens the body, losing feeling, is healed with more difficulty. For all praiseworthy virtues have neighboring vices by which the incautious are deceived; they also have contraries. It is easy for a man to notice, lest he rush into the contrary. But to avoid what is neighboring is difficult. For the vicinity of vices has a certain appearance and shadow of virtues. What I say, with certain examples proposed, I leave the rest to be understood through recollection.

How far harshness differs from patience is illustrated by examples.

Behold, we speak of patience itself: impatience is contrary to this virtue. Patience is the endurance of evils for the sake of justice, impatience is the intolerance of evils for any cause. This endurance is contrary to intolerance. Endurance in vice is hardness. For hardness imitates patience, but it is not patience. Therefore, see lest perhaps you be deceived by the proximity, lest perhaps you be hard and you seem patient to yourself. For just as he who is not driven to evil by evil is better than the rest, so he who is not recalled from evil by evil is worse than the rest. Evil is pain, evil is iniquity. A reward is promised that you might do iniquity, you do not consent: you have overcome the desire for rewards. You were being attacked from another side. Pains will be set forth, overcome also the bite of pains, you who have overcome the pleasure of rewards. He who promises you a reward to lead you to iniquity, lures you to evil as if by a good. He who threatens you with evil to compel you to iniquity, urges you to evil by evil, but by a small evil to a great evil. You will not, however, be great if you disdain the one promising; you will be greater if you disdain the one threatening, if you overcome the raging. Therefore I said: Just as he who is not compelled to evil by evil is better than the rest, so he who is not recalled from evils by evil is worse than the rest. You warned a man not to be an adulterer, he scorned your warnings, he is not recalled from evil by good. But if you begin to threaten pains, to inflict beatings, to impose certain discomforts, if he still does not restrain himself from evil, how much worse he is who could not be recalled from evil by evil. Behold to what calamity hardness, neighboring patience, is subjected. For hardness is in the hearts of the impious, that they may not be recalled from evil deeds, neither by the proposition nor by the infliction of punishments. Hence you boasted yourself, you are worse. "I endured," you will say, "I conquered, I did not succumb, I was not bent." I would praise this if I recognized patience. But now I detest hardness. Do not interrogate my voice, but my cause. Let the cause itself answer you. A thief: he endures punishments for his theft. He is tormented, and what he knows to be true in his conscience, he does not confess. What shall we say: "great patience"? Rather let us say: "detestable hardness." But if he does this for a crime, what do you for the faith? In him, it seems admirable not to confess, to you it is glorious to confess. For he suffers for a crime that must be denied, you for Christ who must be confessed. But sometimes hardness is so great that he both confesses the evil and suffers evils for the confession of his iniquity, lest he fall or depart from evils. He is ready to be tortured for Donatus, nor does he cover this by denying, but he confesses, nor is he ashamed: he boasts of his iniquity. Would that he concealed himself, while it is evident what appears. A wound which you do not wish to be healed, you dare also to expose. This is not health with sense, but hardness without sense.

"Let us love patience, let us hold onto patience."

Let us love patience, let us hold onto patience, and if we do not yet have it, let us ask for it. For patience is from Him, just as self-control is. From Him is our self-control against pleasures, and from Him is patience against pains. But the present psalm that we have sung has taught us that our patience, indeed against pains, is from Him. Hence, where do we find that our self-control, which is necessary against pleasures, is also from Him? We have the most evident testimony: "And when I knew," he said, "that no one can be self-controlled unless God grants it; and this itself was wisdom, to know whose gift it was." Therefore, if you have something from God and do not know from whom you have it, you will not be rewarded because you remain ungrateful. If you do not know from whom you have it, you do not give thanks; by not giving thanks, you will lose what you have. For whoever has, to him more will be given. What does it mean to have fully? To know from where you have. But whoever does not have, that is, does not know from where he has, even what he has will be taken from him. Finally, as he said: "This itself was wisdom, to know whose gift it was," so also the apostle Paul, when he commended to us the grace of God in the Holy Spirit, said: "We have not received the spirit of this world, but the Spirit who is from God." And as if it were asked of him, "From where do you discern this?" he followed by saying: "That we might know the things that have been freely given to us by God." Therefore, the Spirit of God is the Spirit of charity; the spirit of this world is the spirit of pride. Those who have the spirit of this world are proud, they are ungrateful to God. They have many of His gifts, but they do not honor Him from whom they have them: therefore they are unhappy. Sometimes one person has greater gifts, another has lesser: for example, understanding, memory. These are gifts of God. You will sometimes find a person with the sharpest wit, with memory to an incredible extent; but you will find another with little intellect, with a memory that is not retentive, but endowed with both little; however, that one proud, this one humble; this one giving thanks to God for small things, that one attributing greater things to himself. Incomparably better is the one who gives thanks to God for small things than the one who exalts himself for great things. For the one who gives thanks for small things sometimes is admitted to great things: but the one who does not give thanks for great things, even what he has will lose. For whoever -Our patience is from God.

(To him who has, it shall be given; but to him who does not have, even what he has shall be taken away. How does he not have, if he has? He who does not have possesses, who does not know from where he has. For his own thing is taken from him by God, and his iniquity remains with him. Therefore, no one is self-restraining unless God gives it. You have a gift against pleasures: For this very thing, he says, was of wisdom, to know whose gift it was: no one is self-restraining unless God gives it. You have a gift against pains: For from him, he says, is my patience. Therefore, hope in him, all the counsel of the people. Hope in him, do not trust in your own strengths. Confess your evils to him, hope for your goods from him. Without his help, you will be nothing, however proud you may be. Therefore, that you may be humble, pour out your hearts before him. And lest you remain poorly in yourselves, say what follows: God is our helper.) With God helping, the martyrs conquered.

(9. This helper, so that he might be victorious, the blessed martyr had, whom we marvel at, whose feast we celebrate today. Without him, he would not be victorious. And if he conquered the pains, he would not conquer the devil. For sometimes those conquered by the devil conquer pains: not having patience, but hardness. Therefore, that helper was present, to give him true faith, to make him a good cause, and for a good cause to grant patience. For patience exists only when a good cause precedes. Not even faith itself is given by anyone other than God. The apostle briefly commended both, the cause for which we suffer and the patience with which we bear evils, to be from God. For when exhorting the martyrs he says: Because it was granted to you for Christ. Behold a good cause, because for Christ! For sacrilege, against Christ; for heresy and schism, against Christ! For Christ said: He who does not gather with me scatters. Therefore: It was granted to you, he says, for Christ, not only to believe in him but also to suffer for him. This is true patience. Therefore, let us love this patience, let us hold on to this; and if we do not yet have it, let us ask for it. And rightly we sing: My soul will be subjected to God, for from him is my patience.

Sermons - Sermon 283

SERMO 283 ON THE BIRTHDAY OF THE MARTYRS OF MARSEILLES The grace of God must be proclaimed on the feasts of the martyrs. Pleasure and pain, two incitements to sin.

Let us so admire the fortitude of the holy martyrs in their suffering, as to proclaim the grace of the Lord. For they did not want to be praised in themselves, but in Him of whom it is said: "In the Lord my soul shall be praised." Those who understand this do not become proud: they ask with trembling, they receive with joy: they persevere, they no longer lose. Because they are not proud, they are meek. And therefore, after he said: "In the Lord my soul shall be praised," he added: "The meek shall hear and be glad." For what would weak flesh, what a worm and decay be, unless what we sang were true: "My soul shall be subject to God, for my patience is from Him"? Indeed, so that the martyrs could endure all evils for the sake of faith, their virtue is called patience. There are two things that either entice or drive people into sins; pleasure or pain: pleasure entices, pain drives. Against pleasures, continence is necessary; against pains, patience. For thus it is suggested to the human mind to sin: sometimes it is said, "Do this, and you will have this"; sometimes, "Do this, lest you suffer this." Promise precedes pleasure, threat precedes pain. Therefore, in order for people to have pleasure, or not suffer pain, they sin. That is why God, against these two things, one of which is in a pleasant promise, the other in a terrible threat, has both condescended to promise and to terrify; to promise the kingdom of heaven, to terrify with the punishments of hell.

Pleasure is sweet, but God is sweeter. Temporal pain is bad, but eternal fire is worse. You have something to love in place of worldly loves, indeed in place of impure loves. You have something to fear, in place of worldly terrors.

Patience and self-control are gifts of God. Knowledge of God's grace and gratitude.

"But it is little to be admonished unless you obtain help. Therefore, the present psalm which we have sung has taught us that our patience against sufferings is indeed from God. From where do we find that even our continence, which is necessary against pleasures, comes from Him? You have very clear testimony: 'And when I knew,' he said, 'that no one can be continent unless God gives it; and this itself was wisdom, to know whose gift this was.' Therefore, if you have something from God and do not know from whom you have it, you will not be rewarded, because you remain ungrateful. If you do not know from whom you have it, you do not give thanks: by not giving thanks, you lose even what you have. For to him who has, it will be given. What does it mean to have fully? To know from whom you have it. But to the one who does not have, that is, does not know from whom he has it, even what he has will be taken away from him. Finally, as he himself said: 'This itself was wisdom, to know whose gift this was.' Likewise, the apostle Paul says when commending to us the grace of God in the Holy Spirit." But we have not received the spirit of this world, but the Spirit which is from God. And as if it were said to him, "From where do you discern?" he added, "That we may know the things that are freely given to us by God." Therefore, the Spirit of God is a spirit of charity; the spirit of this world is a spirit of pride. Those who have the spirit of this world are proud, they are ungrateful to God. Many have his gifts, but do not honor him from whom they have them: therefore, they are unhappy. Sometimes one has greater gifts, another has lesser: for example, understanding, memory. They are gifts of God. You sometimes find a very sharp-minded man, with a memory beyond incredible admiration; another you find with small intellect, not possessing a tenacious memory, but endowed with both sparingly: however, one is proud, the other humble; the latter giving thanks to God for small things, the former attributing greater things to himself.

It is incomparably better to give thanks to God for a little than to boast about a lot. For the one who gives thanks for a little, God admits to the great; but the one who does not give thanks for great things, loses even what he has. For whoever has will be given more; but whoever does not have, even what he has will be taken from him. How does he not have, if he has? He who does not know from whom he has it, has it without truly having it. For his possession is taken from him by God, and his iniquity remains with him. Therefore no one is self-sufficient except by God's gift. You have a gift against pleasures: "For this itself," he says, "was wisdom, to know whose gift it was: no one is self-sufficient except by God's gift." You have a gift against pains: "For from him," he says, "is my patience." Therefore, hope in him, all the assembly of the people. Hope in him, do not trust in your own strength. Confess your misdeeds to him, expect your good from him. Without his help, you will be nothing, no matter how proud you are. Therefore, to be able to be humble, pour out your hearts before him. And so that you do not remain in evil within yourselves, say what follows: "God is our helper."

True and False Patience. Against the Donatists. This helper, so that he might overcome, the blessed Martyr had, whom we wonder at, whose solemnity we celebrate today. Without him, he would not conquer. And if he conquered the pains, he would not conquer the devil. For sometimes, those conquered by the devil overcome pains; not having patience, but hardness. Therefore, that helper was present, so that he might grant him true faith, make for him a good cause, and for the good cause grant patience. For then there is patience when a good cause precedes. For it is not another but God who grants even faith itself. Briefly, the Apostle commended both, the cause for which we suffer, and the patience by which we endure evils, are from God to us. For exhorting the martyrs he said: Because it has been granted to you for Christ’s sake. Behold the good cause, because it is for Christ: not for sacrilege against Christ, for heresy and schism against Christ. For Christ said: He who is not with me scatters. Therefore: He said, it has been granted to you for Christ, not only that you believe in him, but also that you suffer for him. This is true patience. Therefore, let us love this patience, let us hold on to this: and if we do not yet have it, let us seek it; and rightly we sing: My soul will be subjected to God, for from him is my patience.

Sermons - Sermon 284

SERMO 284 On the Feast Day of the Martyrs Marian and James The patience of the martyrs, a gift of God. On this day of repaying our debt, by the grace of God, the time has dawned. Therefore, since the devout are debtors, why do the creditors cause an uproar? If we all keep our minds calm, what we return can reach everyone. A sermon is owed on the passion and glory of the holy martyrs. Since they suffered most gloriously, they teach us patience. Therefore, they endured the raging crowds, while we should have acquiescent people, because we have seen believers. The constancy of the martyrs is to be praised, but what eloquence suffices to praise it? When can I accomplish by speaking what is already accomplished in your hearts by believing? But where does such a gift of patience come from? From where else if not from where every good gift comes? Where does the good and perfect gift come from if not from the source? For it is written: Patience has its perfect work. Every good gift and every perfect gift comes from the Father of lights, in whom there is no change or shadow of alteration. Patience, which makes even the human mind unchangeable, descends from the immutable source to our mutable minds. How can a person please God except from God? How can a person live a good life except from the source of life? How can a person receive enlightenment except from the eternal light? For with you is the fountain of life. With you, it says: I could say, From me; but if I say, From me, I move away from you. Therefore, with you is the fountain of life. In your light; not in ours: In your light we shall see the light. Therefore: Draw near to him and be enlightened. There is the fountain of life; draw near, drink, and live: it is the light; draw near, grasp it, and see. If he does not flow into you, you will be dry.

Martyrs were tempted by the allurements of carnal parents. Marian's mother Maria exults in the passion of her son.

Hence, our martyrs drank from here: being inebriated, they did not recognize their own. For how many holy martyrs do we think, with approaching suffering, were tempted by the persuasions of their relatives, trying to call them back to the temporary, vain, and fleeting sweetness of this life? But those who, thirsty, drank from the source that is with God, and were inebriated, confessed Christ; they did not heed, did not recognize their fleshly relatives, inebriated by the wine of error, who wrongly loved them and, by persuading, called them back from life. Mariani’s mother was not among these, not among those wrongly persuading, carnally flattering, loving and deceiving: Mariani’s mother was not among them. She bore not a worthless name, she was not called Maria in vain: though she was a woman, not a virgin, not untouched by the Holy Spirit, she bore a pledge from her husband, that led to the most glorious passion through her exhortations rather than calling from it through her wrong flatteries. O holy Mary, you too, though not equal in merit, but equal in desire! Blessed are you too! She bore the Prince of martyrs, you bore the martyr of the Prince: she bore the Judge of witnesses, you bore the witness of the Judge. Blessed birth, even more blessed affection. When you gave birth, you groaned, when you lost him, you rejoiced. What does this mean? When you gave birth, you groaned, you rejoiced when you lost him? Not in vain, because you did not lose him. Where there was no pain, there was faith. Spiritual faith had driven out carnal pain from the heart. You saw that you were not losing a son, but sending him ahead: all that you rejoiced, you wished to follow. The strength of the martyrs is not from themselves, but from God.

We marvel at these things, we praise these things, we love these things. O blessed martyrs, whence are these things for you? I know you have human hearts: whence are these divine things for you? I say, from God: who is it who says, from you? Who is it that envies you by falsely praising you? I do not know who says these things are from you? Answer him: My soul will praise the Lord. I do not know who says these things are from you? Answer him, if you are meek, answer: My soul will praise the Lord. Answer this also in the people of God: Let the meek hear and be glad. I do not know who says these things are from you? Answer him: A man cannot receive anything, unless it is given him from above. For to us and to you, the Lord Jesus said: Without me, you can do nothing. Without me, he said, you can do nothing: and this was said to you; recognize the words of the shepherd, beware of the flattery of the deceiver: that pride, impious, unjust, ungrateful, I know it displeases you. Holy martyrs, you suffered for Christ; but it benefited you that you suffered, not Christ. What would be lacking to you, unless it had been given to you? Repel from your ears the poisonous venom of the enemy. That is the tongue which said: You will be like gods. An ungrateful free will cast man down; let a liberated will now say to the Lord: Patience of Israel, Lord. Why, unfaithful one, do you boast? You praise the patience of the martyrs, as if they could be patient by themselves? Rather listen to the Apostle, the teacher of the Gentiles, not the deceiver of the unfaithful. Certainly, you praise patience in the martyrs for Christ and attribute it to them? Rather listen to the Apostle addressing the martyrs, and calming human hearts. Listen, I say, to him saying: For it has been granted to you on behalf of Christ. Hear the piety encouraging, not the flattery deceiving: He said, It has been granted to you. It has been granted, hear: It has been granted to you on behalf of Christ, not only to believe in him, but also to suffer for him. It has been granted to you: what can be added to this sentence? It has been granted to you: acknowledge it as granted, lest you lose what is usurped. He said, It has been granted to you on behalf of Christ: what on behalf of Christ, except to suffer for him? But do not suspect, listen to the following: not only to believe in him; because even this has been granted: but not only this has been granted; but also to suffer for him, this too has been granted. Let the martyr turn his back to the unfaithful and ungrateful flatterer: let him turn his face to the most kind giver, and attribute his suffering to God, not as if he had offered this to God of his own; but rather say: My soul will praise the Lord, let the meek hear and be glad. And when you say to him, What does it mean: My soul will praise the Lord? Is it praised in you then? He responds: Will not my soul be subject to God? For my patience is from him. Why then is it mine? I opened my bosom, and willingly accepted; from him is mine. And from him, and mine; and because it is from him, therefore it is more securely mine. It is mine, but it is not from me to me. To have my gift, I acknowledge the giver God. For if I do not acknowledge the giver God, God takes away his good, and my evil remains, through my will. From the multitude, the heart is turned to one by the grace of God. Martyrs, by the love of the delight of God alone, are victors over the allurements and bitterness of the world. The faithful Scripture says: God made man upright, and they have sought out many schemes. God, it says, made man upright, and they: from where they, except through free will? And they have sought out many schemes. He had said man was made upright, and yet he does not say: And they have sought out wicked schemes, because he had said upright; nor iniquitous schemes; but he said, many. From this multitude, the corruptible body burdens the soul, and the earthly dwelling depresses the mind that thinks on many things. May God free us from this multitude of human thoughts, and free us from one, so that we may be in Him one from the multitude. May He meld us with the fire of love, so that with one heart we follow the One, lest we fall into many from being one, and be scattered among many, having forsaken the One. For of this one the Apostle spoke, when he said: Brothers, I do not consider that I have grasped it: what? But one thing: what one? Forgetting the things that are behind and reaching forward to the things that are ahead, I follow on. I follow one thing; he says, one thing I follow: but I do not consider that I have grasped it; because the corruptible body burdens the mind that thinks on many things. Behold where the martyrs were going; when they were fervent, they did not care about much clamor, because they loved the One. Behold the desire of the martyrs: One thing, he says, have I asked of the Lord. One thing have I asked: farewell, he says, I leave the secular multitude. One thing have I asked: surely, one blessedness, one happiness, one true, not many false. One thing, he says, have I asked of the Lord, this will I seek. What is this one thing? That I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life. For what reason? That I may behold the delights of the Lord. When the holy martyrs thought on that delight, then all evil, harsh, and bitter things became vile to them. It was a delight against a delight: it was a delight against pain. That delight fought against both, and against a raging world, and against a flattering one. It responded to the world: Why do you flatter? What I love is sweeter than what you promise. I hear God, or rather the holy Scripture, saying to me: How great is the multitude of Your sweetness, O Lord, which You have hidden for those who fear You! Behold again a good multitude, because it is not dissenting, but united in one. The Church entrusts itself to the prayers of the martyrs. Full victory of the martyrs. The temptation of the Lord pertains to three enticements. Another kind of temptation is in torments.

Therefore, it is not surprising, my brothers: do you know where martyrs are mentioned? The Church does not pray for them. For justly the Church prays for other deceased who are sleeping: not for the martyrs, but rather it commends itself to their prayers. For they have fought against sin even to the shedding of blood. They have fulfilled what is written: "Strive for the truth unto death." They have scorned the promises of the world: but that is little; for it is little to scorn death, it is little to endure hardships: where the struggle to the shedding of blood exists, there is the most glorious and complete victory. For the first temptations of our Lord, the prince of martyrs, were tempting blandishments: "Command that these stones become bread." "I will give you all these kingdoms." "Let us see if the Angels will receive you; for it is written, 'Lest you dash your foot against a stone.'" These are the pleasant things of the world: in bread, the lust of the flesh; in the promise of kingdoms, the ambition of the age; in the curiosity of temptation, the lust of the eyes: all these things are of the world; but they entice, not torment. Consider the contests of the Leader of martyrs proposing examples, and mercifully helping the fighters. Why did He permit Himself to be tempted, unless to teach us to resist the tempter? The world promises carnal pleasure: respond to it, "God is more delightful." The world promises honors and worldly exaltations: respond to it, "The kingdom of God is higher than all." The world promises superfluous or damnable curiosities: respond to it, "Only the truth of God does not err." When the Lord had been tempted with this threefold temptation, because the allurements of this world are threefold, either pleasure, or curiosity, or pride; what does the Evangelist say? "After the devil had completed every temptation": every, but pertaining to allurements. Another temptation remained in harsh and hard, in savage, in atrocious and ruthless things; another temptation remained. The Evangelist, knowing what had been completed and what remained, said: "After the devil had completed every temptation, he departed from Him for a time." He departed from Him, that is, the insidious serpent: the roaring lion will come; but He will overcome him, who will tread on the lion and the dragon. He will return: he will enter into Judas, making him the betrayer of the Master. He will bring the Jews, no longer flattering, but raging: possessing his vessels, he will shout with the tongues of all: "Crucify, crucify!" Why do we marvel at the victorious Christ there? He was almighty God. An example of patience shown in the Lord and in our fellow servant martyrs.

Christ wanted to suffer for us. The apostle Peter says: He suffered for you, leaving you an example, so that you might follow in his footsteps. He taught you to suffer, and by suffering, he taught you. The word was not enough, unless an example was given. And how did he teach, brothers? He hung on the cross, the Jews raged: he hung on harsh nails, but he did not lose gentleness. They raged, they barked around, they insulted the one hanging; as if he were the only supreme physician in the midst, the frenzied ones raged all around. He hung there and healed. Father, he said, forgive them, for they do not know what they do. He asked, and yet he hung: he did not descend, because he was making medicine from his blood for the frenzied ones. Finally, because the words of the praying Lord, and of his mercy hearing, because he asked the Father, and with the Father heard; because those words could not be spoken in vain, after his resurrection he healed those whom he had endured as most insane while hanging. He ascended into heaven, sent the Holy Spirit; nor did he show himself to them after the resurrection, but to his faithful disciples alone, lest he should seem to have wished to insult those who killed him. For it was more to teach friends humility than to reproach enemies with the truth. He rose: he did more than they demanded, not believing, but insulting and saying: If he is the Son of God, let him come down from the cross. And he who did not want to come down from the tree, rose from the tomb. He ascended into heaven, sent the Holy Spirit from there: he filled the disciples, corrected the fearful, made them confident. Peter's trepidation was suddenly turned into the strength of a preacher. Whence this to the man? Seek Peter presuming, you find Peter denying: seek God helping, you find Peter preaching. For an hour, weakness trembled, so that presumption might be overcome, not that piety might be destroyed. He fills with his Spirit, and makes the strongest preacher, to whom presuming he had foretold: You will deny me three times. For he had presumed of his own strength, not of God's gift, but of free will. For he had said: I will be with you until death. He had said in his abundance: I will not be moved forever. But he who had given strength to his adornment in his will, turned away his face, and he was troubled. He turned away, he says: the Lord, his face: showed Peter to Peter; but afterwards he looked at him, and strengthened Peter on the rock. Let us therefore imitate, my brothers, as much as we can, in the Lord the example of suffering. We will be able to fulfill it, if we ask for help from him, not by presuming beforehand, as Peter did; but by following and praying, as Peter progressed. For when Peter denied three times, what does the evangelist say, pay attention: And the Lord looked at him, and Peter remembered. What does it mean, he looked at him? For the Lord did not look at him with a bodily face as if reminding him. It is not so: read the Gospel. The Lord was being judged inside the house, Peter was being tempted in the courtyard. Therefore the Lord looked at him, not bodily, but with majesty; not with the sight of the eyes of flesh, but with deep mercy. He because he had turned his face away, looked at him, and he was freed. Therefore the presumptive would have perished, unless the Redeemer had looked at him. And behold, washed with his tears, corrected and rescued, Peter preaches. He preaches who had denied: they believe who had erred. The medicine of the Lord's blood is effective in the frenzied ones. Believers drink what the raging ones had shed. But it is much for me, he says, to imitate the Lord. By the grace of the Lord, imitate your fellow servant, imitate Stephen, imitate Marian and Jacob. They were men, they were fellow servants; born as you are, but crowned by him who was not born so.

Sermons - Sermon 285

SERMO 285 ON THE BIRTHDAY OF THE MARTYRS CASTUS AND AEMILIUS The feasts of the martyrs are to be celebrated in such a way that it delights to imitate them. The virtue of the holy martyrs, which is not only great but also pious (for it is useful virtue itself, indeed it is the true and only virtue that ought to be called virtue, which does not serve pride, but God), admonishes us to speak to your Charity, and to admonish it, to celebrate the feasts of the martyrs in such a way that it delights to imitate them by following the footsteps of the martyrs. For they themselves did not possess the strength they showed of their own. That fountain did not flow only to them. He who gave to them is able to give also to us: for one price has been given for all of us. The punishment does not make the martyr, but the cause. The faith of the thief on the cross changed the cause of the sufferer. Three crosses. The cross of Christ, the tribunal of the judge.

Therefore, you must be especially warned, as you must always be warned and must always think, that it is not punishment but cause that makes one a martyr of God. For God delights in our righteousness, not in our torments; nor is it considered in the judgment of the Almighty and the true God what one suffers, but why one suffers. For as we mark ourselves with the sign of the Lord's cross, it was not the punishment of the Lord that did this, but the cause. For if punishment had done this, the similar punishment of the thieves would have also had value. There was one place for three who were crucified, the Lord in the middle, who was counted among the wicked. The two thieves were put on either side: but they did not have the same cause. They were joined at the sides of the one hanging, but were far apart. Their crimes crucified them, but ours crucified him. And yet it was readily apparent in one of them how much it was worth, not by the suffering of the one hanging, but by the piety of the one confessing. The thief acquired in pain what Peter had lost in fear: he committed a crime, ascended the cross; he changed his cause, and gained paradise. He certainly deserved to change his cause, who did not despise in Christ the likeness of punishment. The Jews despised him doing miracles, the thief believed in him hanging. He recognized the Lord as a companion of the cross, and through belief seized the kingdom of heaven. Then the thief believed in Christ when the apostolic faith trembled. Rightly he deserved to hear: Today you will be with me in paradise. Indeed, he did not promise this to himself: he commended himself to great mercy, but he also considered his merits. Lord, he said, remember me when you come into your kingdom. Until the Lord would come into his kingdom, he hoped to be in pain and at least begged to be treated with mercy at His coming. Therefore, considering his merits, the thief deferred; but the Lord offered to the thief what he had despaired of; as if saying, You ask me to remember you when I come into my kingdom: Truly, truly, I say to you, today you will be with me in paradise. Recognize to whom you commend yourself; He whom you believe is coming, before I come, I am everywhere. Therefore, although I am about to descend to the underworld, I have you today in paradise; not commended to another, but with me. For my humility descends to mortal men and even to the dead, but my divinity never departs from paradise. Thus, three crosses were made, three causes. One of the thieves insulted Christ, the other, having confessed his wrongs, commended himself to Christ's mercy. Christ's cross in the middle was not punishment, but a tribunal: indeed, from the cross he condemned the one insulting, he liberated the one believing. Fear the insulters, rejoice believers: he will do in glory what he did in humility. The gifts of grace are given from the profound judgment of God. The presumptuous Peter is deserted for a little while, so that it may be shown to him. God hates the presumptuous.

Divine gifts come from the profound judgment of God: we can marvel at them, but we cannot investigate them. For who has known the mind of the Lord? And: How unsearchable are his judgments and his ways past finding out! Peter, following the footsteps of Christ in all things, is disturbed and denies; he is looked at, and he weeps; the tears wipe away what fear had stained. That was not Peter's abandonment, but his instruction. Indeed, asked if he loved the Lord, he had presumed in his heart that he would even die for Him. He had attributed this to his own strength; unless he were deserted by the Ruler for a short time, it would not be shown to him. He dared to say: "I will lay down my life for you." The presumptuous one was boasting that he would lay down his life for Christ, for whom the Redeemer had not yet laid it down. Hence, disturbed with fear as the Lord had predicted, he denies Him three times, for whom he had promised to die. As it is written: The Lord looked at him. And he wept bitterly. Bitter was the remembrance of the denial, so that sweet might be the grace of redemption. Unless deserted, he would not have denied; unless looked at, he would not have wept. God hates those who presume on their own strength, and He, as a doctor, cuts away this swelling pride in those He loves. By cutting, indeed, He inflicts pain; but afterward, He establishes health. Therefore, when the Lord rises, He commends His sheep to Peter, the denier; but to the denier, because presumptuous; later, to the shepherd, because loving. For why does He ask the lover three times if not to pierce the threefold denier? Thus afterward Peter accomplished by the grace of God what he could not do at first by his own confidence. For after the Lord commended the sheep to him, not as Peter's but His own, so that he would feed them not for himself but for the Lord, He announced to him the future passion which he had earlier missed; because he had hastily rushed. When you shall become old, He said, another shall gird you, and lead you where you do not wish. This He said, signifying by what death he was to glorify God. It happened; Peter reached the passion for which he had washed away his denial with tears. What the Savior had promised him, the tempter could not take away.

Castus and Aemilius in torments, from which they were first overcome, from which they were later victors.

I think something similar occurred even in these holy martyrs Castus and Aemilius, whose day we celebrate today. Perhaps they too previously presumed upon their own strengths, and therefore they failed. He showed them who they themselves were, who He Himself was. He restrained those presuming, and called those believing: He helped those fighting, crowned those conquering. Hence, the enemy already rejoiced at their defeat in the first struggle, when they yielded to pains, counting them in his own ranks; he already exulted, already claimed them as his own: but as much as it was permitted to them, the Lord taking pity; other martyrs defeated the devil attacking, these even triumphing. Therefore, my brothers, let us remember whose celebration we are observing today: neither let us desire to imitate where they were defeated, but rather where they were victorious. Therefore, the falls of the great were not hidden, so that those who presumed upon themselves might fear. Humility of the good master everywhere is most diligently commended to us. Our salvation in Christ, indeed, is the humility of Christ. For there would be no salvation for us unless Christ, humbling Himself for us, had been willing to become humble. Let us remember we should not trust in ourselves. Let us entrust to God what we have: let us implore from Him what we lack. The martyrs are our advocates, and yet our one advocate is Christ. The perfect righteousness of the martyrs is because they were made perfect in their very suffering. Therefore, they are not prayed for in the Church. Prayers are offered for other faithful deceased, but not for the martyrs: for they departed so perfect that they are not merely our intercessors, but our advocates. Not in themselves, but in Him to whose body these perfect members are joined. For He is indeed the one true advocate, who intercedes for us, sitting at the right hand of the Father: but there is one advocate, just as there is one shepherd. For, He says, I must bring those other sheep, which are not of this fold. Is Christ the shepherd, and Peter not the shepherd? Rather, both Peter is a shepherd, and others like him without any doubt are shepherds. For if he were not a shepherd, how is it said to him: Feed my sheep? But nonetheless, the true shepherd, who feeds his own sheep. To Peter it was said, not, Feed your sheep, but, mine. Therefore, Peter is a shepherd not in his own right, but in the body of the shepherd. For if he fed his own sheep, they would immediately become the goats that he fed.

Outside the Church, not the sheep of Christ, but goats are fed by schismatics. The voice of the Donatists. For against this, which is said to Peter: Feed my sheep; it is said in the Song of Songs: Unless you know yourself, O beautiful among women. To whom it is said, we certainly recognize, and we also hear in her. The Church indeed hears this from Christ, the bride hears from the bridegroom: Unless you know yourself, O beautiful among women, go out. What an evil voice: Go out. They went out from us, he says, but they were not of us. To this sad voice, which is: Go out, the contrary is in the good that jubilant voice: Enter into the joy of your Lord. Therefore: Unless you know yourself, O beautiful among women, O Catholic beautiful among heresies: unless you know yourself, O beautiful among women, go out; for I do not cast you out, but go you out. For they went out from us, who separate themselves, sensual, having not the Spirit. For it is not said, They were cast out; but: They went out. Divine justice observed this even in the first sinners. As if already prone by their own weight, he let them go from paradise, he did not shut them out. Therefore, unless you know yourself, O beautiful among women, go out: I do not cast you out, go out. I want you to be healed in my body, you seek for your putridity to be cut off. This was told to them who were foreseen to go out, that they might be able to recognize themselves and beware who remain. For why did they go out, if not because they did not recognize themselves? For if they recognized, they would see there that it is not theirs, but God's that they give. I give: it is mine which I give; and therefore it is holy, because I give it. You did not recognize yourself, worthily you went out. For you did not want to hear the one saying: Unless you know yourself, O beautiful among women. For you were once beautiful, when you clung to the members of your bridegroom. Therefore you did not want to hear and consider what it means: Unless you know yourself: because surely he found you foul, because he made you beautiful from foul, because he made you white from black. For what do you have that you did not receive? Therefore you did not heed how it was said: Unless you know yourself, go out. And you thought you should feed your sheep, not as it was said to Peter: Feed my sheep. But see what he added to you, what foresaw this to you: Go out in the footsteps of the flocks; not of the flock, but of the flocks. For there the sheep of Christ are fed, where there is one flock and one shepherd. Therefore go out in the footsteps of the flocks, divisible, divided, torn apart; go out in the footsteps of the flocks: and feed your kids; not like Peter, my sheep, but your kids: in the tents of the shepherds, not in the tent of the shepherd. Peter enters by love, you go out by animosity: because Peter recognized himself, therefore he wept for presuming upon himself, and merited to find the one helping: therefore go out. He my sheep, you your kids. He in the tent of the shepherd, you in the tents of the shepherds. Why then do you boast of your bad punishment, you who do not have a good cause?

Martyrs are to be honored in the unity of the Church.

Therefore, let us honor the martyrs within the tabernacle of the shepherd, in the members of the shepherd, having grace, not audacity; piety, not rashness; constancy, not obstinacy; unity, not division. Therefore, if you wish to imitate true martyrs, choose a cause for yourselves, so that you may say to the Lord: "Judge me, O Lord, and distinguish my cause from an ungodly nation." Distinguish, not my punishment; for even the ungodly nation has this; but my cause, which only the godly nation has. Therefore choose a cause for yourselves, hold fast to a good and just cause, and with the Lord's help, fear no punishment. Turned to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 286

SERMO 286 On the Birthday of the Martyrs Protasius and Gervasius.

Martyrs in Greek, in Latin Witnesses. A witness of Christ unto death is not everyone who believes in Him. Three ranks of those who believe.

Martyrs, the name is Greek, but now custom uses this name instead of the Latin: in Latin they are called Witnesses. Therefore there are true martyrs, and there are false ones: because there are true witnesses, and there are false ones. But Scripture says: A false witness will not go unpunished. If a false witness will not be without penalty, neither will a true witness be without a crown. And indeed, it was easy to give testimony to the Lord Jesus Christ and the truth, because He is God; but to do so unto death, this was a great work. There were some, whom the Gospel notes, chiefs of the Jews, who believed in the Lord Jesus: but on account of the Jews, it says, they did not dare to confess publicly. And immediately a note was added to this statement; for the Evangelist follows by saying: For they loved the glory of men more than that of God. Therefore, there were those who were ashamed to confess Christ before men: but there were others, now better, who were not ashamed to confess Christ before men, but could not confess Him unto death. For these are gifts of God: and sometimes they are nourished in the soul gradually.

First, observe and compare these three witnesses among themselves - one who believes in Christ and barely whispers Christ timidly; another who believes in Christ and publicly confesses Christ; a third who believes in Christ and is prepared to die for Christ in his confession. The first one is so weak that shame overcomes him, not fear: the second already has a firm countenance, but not yet unto blood: the third, entirely, so that nothing more remains. For he fulfills what is written: Fight for the truth unto death.

Peter, before the death of the Lord, was weaker than some martyrs and girls. Peter dies by denying life.

What do we say about Peter? He preached Christ, he was sent, he evangelized even before the Lord's passion. For we know the Apostles were sent to preach the Gospel: he was sent and he preached. How much he surpassed those Jews who were afraid to confess publicly! But still, he was not yet like Protasius and Gervasius. He was already an Apostle, he was first, he was close to the Lord. It was said to him: You are Peter, but he was not yet Protasius or Gervasius, he was not yet Stephen, he was not yet the boy Nemesianus; Peter was not yet like that; he was not yet as certain women, as girls, as Crispina, as Agnes; Peter was not yet what these women's frailty was.

I praise Peter: but first I blush for Peter. How prompt a soul! but unknowing of its own measure. For indeed if he were not prompt, he would not have said to the Savior, "I will die for you." Even if I ought to die with you, I will not deny you. But the physician who knew how to inspect the vein of the heart foretold the danger of the attack. "You," he said, "lay down your life for me? Recognize the order. I lay down first. You lay down your life for me? Truly, I say to you, before the cock crows, you will deny me three times." The physician foretold what the patient did not know. Therefore, the patient found himself having falsely presumed when he was asked: "Are you one of them?" The maid who asked was the fever. Behold, the fever has come, behold, it clings: what shall I say? Behold, Peter is in peril, behold, Peter is dying. For what is dying but to deny life? He denied Christ, he denied life, he died. But He who raises the dead, the Lord looked at him, and he wept bitterly. By denying he perished, by weeping he rose again. And first the Lord died for him, as was fitting: and afterward, Peter died for the Lord, as the order itself required: and the martyrs followed. The road was first thorny, and crushed by the feet of the Apostles, made smoother for those who followed.

Martyrs assert Christ more in death than in life. Their death is precious. The earth is filled with the blood of martyrs as with seed, and from that seed rose the crop of the Church. The dead have asserted Christ more than the living. Today they assert, today they preach: the tongue is silent, the deeds resound. They were held, bound, enclosed, brought forth, tormented, burnt, stoned, struck, thrown to beasts. In all their deaths, they were mocked as worthless: but precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints. Then it was precious only in the sight of the Lord, now also in our sight. For when it was a disgrace to be a Christian, the death of the saints was despised in the sight of men: they were detested, held in execration; they were cast out as a curse, "Thus may you die, thus may you be crucified, thus may you be burned." Now who of the faithful does not long for these curses? The discovery of Protasius and Gervasius illuminated by miracles.

We therefore celebrate today, brothers, the memory of the holy martyrs Protasius and Gervasius placed in this location in Milan. Not the day on which they were placed here, but today we celebrate the day on which their precious death was discovered in the sight of the Lord through Ambrose, the bishop, a man of God: I was also a witness to the great glory of the martyrs at that time. I was there, I was in Milan, I knew the miracles that were done, with God attesting to the precious deaths of his saints: so that through those miracles, that death was now precious not only in the sight of the Lord but also in the sight of men. A very well-known blind man of the entire city was illuminated, he ran, had himself brought there, and returned without a guide. We have not yet heard that he died: perhaps he still lives. In that very basilica where their bodies are, he vowed to serve his whole life. We rejoiced to see him, left him serving.

Immortality is given not to all through the martyrs, but to their imitators. The sick person is not heard according to his will, but according to his health.

God does not cease to bear witness and knows how He ought to commend His own miracles. He knows how to make them magnificent; He knows how to ensure they do not become devalued. He does not grant health to everyone through martyrs, but He promises immortality to all who imitate the martyrs. Let him who does not receive what is not given to everyone not seek it, nor murmur against Him because He does not give it, so that He may give what He promised at the end. For even those who are healed now will eventually die after some time; but those who rise at the end will live with Christ. The head has gone ahead, it awaits the members to follow: the whole body will be completed, Christ and the Church. There he counts us among the written: and in this life, he grants what is expedient. For he knows what is expedient for his children. Therefore he says, "If you, being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children; how much more will your Father who is in heaven give good things to those who ask him?" What good things? Surely not temporal ones? He gives those too; but he also gives them to the faithless. He gives those as well; but he also gives them to the impious, and even to his blasphemers. Let us seek goods that are not common to us with the wicked. The Father knows how to give those good things to his children. Now a son asks him for bodily health: and he does not give it, he still chastises. But does the father, when he chastises, not provide? He brings forth the scourge, but consider what kind of inheritance he is preparing. He chastises, he says, every son whom he receives. For whom the Lord loves, he corrects. Therefore I say this, my brothers, so that you may not be saddened when you ask and do not receive, and think that God does not have you in his sight if he does not grant your will for a time. For a physician does not always listen to the will of the sick, even though he undoubtedly seeks and desires his health. He does not give what is asked: but what is not asked, he procures. He asks for a cold drink, he does not give it. Has he become cruel, who came to heal? It is of the art, not of cruelty. He does not give what delights at the moment: so that the healthy can have everything, some things are denied to the not yet healthy.

More has been granted to the martyrs and the Maccabees than to the three youths freed from the fire.

Consider the promises of God. Do you think that to these very martyrs He gave everything that they asked for? No. Many desired to be released, and to be released with some miracle, just as the three youths were released from the furnace. What was the voice of King Nebuchadnezzar like? Because, he said, they trusted in Him and changed the word of the king. What testimony does he give, who was trying to kill them? He wanted to burn those whom he later believed through. If they had died in the fire, they would have been crowned secretly, it would not have benefited him. Therefore, they were preserved for a time, so that the unbeliever might believe, and praise God, who had condemned them. He was the God of the three youths, who was the God of the Maccabees. He delivered those from the fire, he made these die in the fire. Was He changed? Did He love those more than these? A greater crown was given to the Maccabees. Surely those escaped the fires, but they were preserved for the dangers of this world: these in the fires ended all dangers. No more temptation remained, but only the crowning. Thus the Maccabees received more.

Shake off your faith, bring forth the eyes of your heart, do not rely on the human ones: for you have others inside, which the Lord has made for you, who has opened the eyes of your heart when He gave you faith. Question those eyes: who received more, the Maccabees or the three boys? I ask about faith. If I ask the lovers of this world: I wanted to be among the three boys, says the weak soul to me. Be ashamed before the mother of the Maccabees, who wanted her sons to die before her because she knew they would not die.

Books about the miracles of the martyrs read in the Church. Martyrdom in bed.

I sometimes recall the little books of the martyrs' miracles, which are read in your presence. A few days ago, a certain little book was read, wherein it was said of a certain sick woman who was being tormented by very sharp pains, that when she had said, "I cannot bear it," the martyr himself who had come to heal her said to her: "What if you had to endure martyrdom?" Many, therefore, undergo martyrdom in bed: certainly many. There is a certain persecution by Satan, more hidden and cunning than there was then. A faithful person lies in bed, is tormented by pains, prays, and is not heard: rather, they are heard, but are tested, but are exercised, but, in order to be received as a son, are scourged. Therefore, when they are tormented by pains, the temptation of the tongue comes, either a certain small woman or a man approaches the bed— if they can be called a man— and says to the sick person, "Make this binding, and you will be well: let that incantation be applied, and you will be well. This person and that person, ask, they were made well by it." They do not yield, do not obey, do not incline the heart; yet they struggle. They do not have strength, and they conquer the devil. They become a martyr in bed, crowned by Him who hung on the wood for them.

Sermons - Sermon 287

SERMO 287 On the Birth of St. John the Baptist, which is the eighth day before the Kalends of July The birthday of Christ is celebrated only, and of John, by the Church. The narration is lengthy, but the labor of the listener is compensated by the sweetness of the truth. We have heard the illustrious birth of the most blessed John, herald and forerunner of Christ, when the Holy Gospel was read. From here, let your Charity observe what a great man's birth has taken place. The Church celebrated the natal day of none of the Prophets, none of the Patriarchs, nor any of the Apostles: it celebrates only two birthdays, his and Christ's. The very times during which both were born prefigure a great mystery. John was a great man, but a man. However, he was such a great man that whatever was greater than him was God. "He who comes after me is greater than me." John said this: "He himself is greater than me." If he is greater than you, what is it that we heard you say, "Among those born of women, none has arisen greater than John the Baptist"? If none of men is greater than you, who is he who is greater than you? Who he is, do you wish to hear? "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God."

Christ here has a birthday as a man, not as God. And how did the Word of God, God, through whom all things were made, which was born without the beginning of time, through whom times were made, find a birthday in time? How, I ask, did the Word through whom times were made, find a birthday in time? Do you ask how? Listen to the Gospel itself: The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us. The birth of Christ is the birth of the flesh, not of the Word: but it is therefore the birth of the Word because the Word was made flesh. The Word was born, but it was born in the flesh, not in itself. In itself, however, it is from the Father, but it does not have a birthday in time.

Both births are marvelous, that of Christ and that of John, although there is such a great distance between them.

John was born, and Christ was born: John was announced by an angel, Christ was announced by an angel. Both are great miracles. A barren woman from an old man gives birth to a servant precursor, a virgin without a man gives birth to the Lord possessor. John is a great man: but Christ is more than a man; because he is both man and God. A great man; but the man had to be humbled, so that God might be exalted. Finally, because the man had to be humbled, hear the man himself: I am not worthy to untie the strap of his sandal. If he had said he was worthy, how much would he have humbled himself? He did not even call himself worthy of this. He completely humbled himself, and humbled himself under a rock. For he was a lamp, and he feared being extinguished by the wind of pride. The difference between Christ and John on the day of birth and on the passion, what it signified.

Finally, because every man had to be humbled before Christ, and thus also John; and because the God-man Christ had to be exalted, both their birthdays and the types of their sufferings demonstrated this. John was born today: from today the days shorten. Christ was born on December 25th: from that day the days lengthen. John was diminished in his passion by beheading, Christ was exalted on the cross. How well was it announced to the Virgin Mary, how truly, how holy: "How will this be, since I do not know a man?" She believed but sought the manner. And what did she hear? "The Holy Spirit will come upon you, and the power of the Most High will overshadow you. And therefore the holy one to be born of you will be called the Son of God." The power of the Most High will overshadow you. There will be a conception in you; it will not be from the lust of concupiscence. There will be no heat where the Holy Spirit casts a shadow. But because our bodies experience heat, let these words suffice for your charity: well-thought-out things will be more numerous.

Sermons - Sermon 288

SERMO 288 On the Birth of John the Baptist (On the Voice and the Word) The celebration of the birth of St. John. The festivity of today's day renews the memory with its annual return, that the forerunner of the Lord was born before the wondrous one wondrously; whose birth it is fitting for us to consider and praise especially today. For this day has been dedicated as an anniversary to this miracle, so that the benefits of God and the great deeds of the Most High might not be erased from our hearts by oblivion. Therefore, John was sent as the herald of the Lord before Him, but made through Him. For all things were made through Him, and without Him nothing was made. A man sent ahead of the man-God, recognizing his Lord, announcing his Creator; already discerning with his mind the one present on earth, pointing him out with his finger. For his words are of the one showing the Lord and bearing testimony: Behold the Lamb of God, behold him who takes away the sin of the world. Hence, rightly, the barren one bore the herald, the virgin the judge. In the mother of John, barrenness received fruitfulness: in the mother of Christ, fruitfulness did not ruin integrity. If your patience, and calm study, and attentive silence provide me the opportunity, with the Lord's help, to say what He grants for me to say; without a doubt, it will be the fruit of your attention, and the reward of our effort, that I may explain something that pertains to the great sacrament to your ears and hearts.

John, more than a prophet, commends Christ by abasing himself.

There were prophets before John, and many, and great, and holy, worthy of God, full of God, announcers of the Savior; witnesses of the truth. However, it could not be said of any of them what was said of John: Among those born of women, none has arisen greater than John the Baptist. So what does this greatness placed before greatness mean? For the testimony of great humility. For he was so great that Christ could have been thought. John could have exploited the error of men and not exerted himself to persuade that he was the Christ, because those who heard and saw him, already thought he was without him saying it. There was no need for him to sow error, but to confirm it. But that humble friend of the bridegroom, zealous for the bridegroom, not substituting himself as the adulterer for the bridegroom, bears testimony to his friend, and commends him who was truly the bridegroom to the bride: that he might be loved in him, he hates to be loved instead of him. “He who has the bride is the bridegroom,” he says. And as if you might say, “Who are you then?” He adds, “But the friend of the bridegroom stands and hears him, and rejoices greatly because of the bridegroom’s voice.” He stands and hears: the disciple hears the master; because he hears, he stands; for if he does not hear, he falls. Hence the greatness of John is especially commended; for when he could have been thought to be Christ, he preferred to bear testimony to Christ, to commend him; to humble himself rather than to be taken instead of him, and to deceive others. Rightly, he was called more than a prophet. For of the prophets, who were before the advent of the Lord, the Lord himself thus speaks: “Many prophets and righteous men desired to see the things you see, and did not see them.” For those who were filled with the Spirit of God, to announce the coming Christ, desired, if possible, to see in the flesh. Wherefore that Simeon was delayed from departing from this world, that he might see the birth, through whom the world was created. And he indeed saw the infant, the Word of God in flesh: but he did not yet teach, he did not yet profess the person of the master, who was already the master to the angels with the Father. Simeon, therefore, saw, but an infant: John, however, saw him preaching, choosing disciples. Where? At the river Jordan. For from there Christ's ministry began. There the future Baptism of Christ was commended: because the baptism was received, preceding and preparing the way, and saying: "Prepare the way of the Lord, make straight his paths." For the Lord wished to be baptized by a servant, that they might see what those who are baptized by the Lord receive. Therefore, it began from there, where prophecy rightly preceded: "He shall have dominion from sea to sea and from the river unto the ends of the earth." At that river, where Christ began to reign, John saw Christ, recognized him, and bore testimony. He humbled himself greatly, that he might be exalted by the great. And he called himself the friend of the bridegroom: and what kind of friend? Perhaps an equal? Far from it: far below. How far below? "I am not worthy," he said, "to loose the strap of his sandal." This prophet, indeed more than a prophet, deserved to be foretold by a prophet. Isaiah said of him, what we read today: "The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare the way of the Lord, make straight his paths. Every valley shall be filled, and every mountain and hill shall be made low; the crooked shall become straight, and the rough ways smooth; and all flesh shall see the salvation of God." Cry out: What shall I cry? "All flesh is grass, and all its beauty is like the flower of the field: the grass withers, the flower fades; but the word of our God will stand forever." Your Charity should pay attention. John was asked who he was, whether he was the Christ, Elijah, or a prophet: he said, "I am not the Christ, nor Elijah, nor the prophet." And they said, "Who are you then?" He said, "I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness." He called himself the voice. You have John as the voice. What do you have Christ as, if not the Word? The voice precedes, that the Word might be understood afterward. And what kind of Word? Hear it clearly pointing to you. "In the beginning," he says, "was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God: he was in the beginning with God. All things were made through him, and without him was not anything made." If all things, then John also. Why do we wonder that the Word made a voice for itself? Look, see both at the river, the voice and the Word. The voice is John, the Word is Christ.

What is the difference between sound and word?

Let us seek what is the difference between voice and word: let us seek attentively; it is not a small matter, and it requires significant attention. The Lord will grant that neither I may tire in explaining, nor you in listening. Behold, two things, voice and word. What is voice? What is word? What? Listen to what you yourselves approve within, and answer yourselves when questioned by yourselves. A word, if it does not have a significant reason, is not called a word. However, a voice, even if it just sounds and irrationally makes noise, like the sound of someone shouting, not speaking, can be called a voice but not a word. Someone groaned, it is a voice: someone wailed, it is a voice. There is an inarticulate sound carrying or bringing noise to the ears without any reason of understanding. However, a word, unless it signifies something, and unless it brings something different to the ears and something else to the mind, is not called a word. Therefore, as I was saying, if you shout, it is a voice; if you say, 'Man,' it is a word; if you say, 'Beast'; if you say, 'God'; if you say, 'World,' or anything else. I have mentioned all these significant words, not empty, not sounding and teaching nothing. So, if you have now distinguished between voice and word, listen to what you may marvel at in these two, John and Christ. The word is very powerful even without voice; the voice is empty without the word. Let us give a reason, and if possible, explain what we have proposed. Behold, you wanted to say something: this very thing you want to say is already conceived in the heart; it is held in memory, prepared by will, lives by understanding. And this very thing you want to say is not of any language. The thing itself, which you want to say, which is conceived in the heart, is not of any language, neither Greek nor Latin, nor Punic, nor Hebrew, nor of any nation. It is only a thing conceived in the heart, ready to proceed. Therefore, as I said, it is a certain thing, a certain thought, a reason conceived in the heart, ready to proceed to be conveyed to the listener. Thus, as it is known to the one whose heart it is in, it is a word, already known to the one about to speak, not yet to the one about to hear. Behold, therefore, the already formed word, already complete, remains in the heart: it seeks to proceed, to be spoken to the listener. The one who conceived the word that should be spoken pays attention, and has the word known to himself in his heart, paying attention to whom it will be spoken. I will speak in the name of Christ to ears taught in the Church, and I dare to insinuate something more subtle to those who are not unlearned. Therefore, let your Charity pay attention. See the word conceived in the heart, it seeks to proceed, to be spoken: it pays attention to whom it will be spoken. It finds a Greek? It seeks a Greek voice to proceed to the Greek. It finds a Latin? It seeks a Latin voice to proceed to the Latin. It finds a Punic? It seeks a Punic voice to proceed to the Punic. Remove the diversity of listeners, and that word which is conceived in the heart is neither Greek, nor Latin, nor Punic, nor of any language. It seeks such a voice to proceed as stands with the listener. Now, brothers, that something is proposed for you to understand, I conceived in my heart to say 'God.' What I conceived in my heart is something great. For 'God' is not merely two syllables; for this short voice 'God' is not. I want to say 'God,' I intend to whom I say it. It is a Latin? I say 'God.' It is a Greek? I say 'Θε■ν.' To a Latin I say 'God,' to a Greek I say 'Θε■ν.' The sound is different between 'God' and 'Θε■ν': the letters are different here and there: in my heart, however, in what I want to say, in what I think, there is no diversity of letters, no varied sound of syllables: it is what it is. To be expressed to a Latin, one voice is used; to a Greek, another. If I wanted to express it to a Punic, I would use another; if to a Hebrew, another; if to an Egyptian, another; if to an Indian, another. How many voices would the variation of persons make for the word of the heart, without any change or variety of itself? It proceeds to the Latin with a Latin voice, to the Greek with a Greek, to the Hebrew with a Hebrew. It reaches the listener, and does not depart from the speaker. For what I make in another by speaking, do I lose? That sound employed in between propagated something to you, it did not leave from me. I was already thinking of 'God': you had not yet heard my voice; having heard it, you also began to have what I was thinking: but I did not lose what I had. Therefore, in me, as if on the hinge of my heart, as if in the secret chamber of my mind, the word preceded my voice. The voice had not yet sounded in my mouth, and the word is already in my heart. But to go out to you what I conceived in the heart, it seeks the service of the voice. The service of the voice is necessary for the word to be insinuated into the mind of the listener.

If I can, with the aid of your intention and prayers, say what I want, I think that he who understands will rejoice: but he who does not understand, let him forgive the struggling man, and supplicate the compassionate God. For what I speak is from Him. From where I speak, there is in my heart what I will say: but the ministries of the voices labor towards your ears. What then, brothers? What then? Surely you have paid attention, surely now you understand, that the word was in my heart before it took up the voice with which it proceeded to your ears. I think that all people understand: because what happens to me happens to every speaker. Behold, now I know what I want to say, I hold it in my heart, I seek the ministry of the voice; before the voice sounds in my mouth, the word is already held in my heart. Therefore, the word preceded my voice, and in me the word is first, the voice is later: but for you, in order to understand, the voice comes first to your ear so that the word may be introduced into your mind. For you could not know what was in me before the voice, unless it were in you after the voice. Therefore if John is the voice, Christ is the word: Christ was before John, but with God; after John, Christ was with us. A great sacrament, brothers. Be attentive, again and again, grasp the grandeur of the matter. For your understanding delights me, and makes me bolder towards you, with the help of Him whom I proclaim, such a tiny one, such a significant one, any human being, the Word of God. Therefore, with His help, I become bolder towards you, and having prearranged this information of the distinction between the voice and the word, I will explain what follows. John bore the person of the voice in the sacrament: for he was not the only voice. For every man who announces the Word is the voice of the Word. For what the sound of our mouth is to the word we carry in our heart, so is every pious soul that preaches to that Word of which it is said: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God: the same was in the beginning with God. How many words, or rather how many voices, does the word conceived in the heart produce! How many preachers has the Word, remaining with the Father, made! He sent the Patriarchs, He sent the Prophets, He sent so many of His announcers. The Word remaining sent voices, and after many voices were sent ahead, the Word itself came as if in its vehicle, in its voice, in its flesh. Therefore gather together as one all the voices that preceded the Word, and place them all in the person of John. He bore the sacrament of all these, he was the sacred and mystical person of all these. Therefore he was properly called the voice, as the sign and mystery of all voices. The service of the voice is diminished as the progress of the mind towards the Word increases.

Therefore, pay attention now to what this pertains: He must increase, but I must decrease. Pay attention, if I am able to speak; if I do not say it, to insinuate it, but at least I will succeed in thinking it, in what manner, by what reasoning, with what intention, for what cause, according to the distinction I spoke of between the voice and the word, that the voice itself, John himself, said: He must increase, but I must decrease. O great and marvelous sacrament! Pay attention to the person of the voice, in which were the sacraments of all voices, speaking about the person of the Word: He must increase, but I must decrease. Why? Pay attention. The Apostle says: We know in part, and we prophesy in part; but when that which is perfect has come, that which is in part will be done away. What is perfect? In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. This is perfect. What is perfect? Let the Apostle Paul also say: Who being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God. We will see Him equal to God the Father, this Word of God with God, by whom all things were made, as He is, but in the end. For now, what the Evangelist John says: Beloved, we are the children of God, and it has not yet been revealed what we shall be. Beloved, we know that when He is revealed, we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is. This vision is promised to us, to this vision we are educated, to this vision we purify our hearts. For, He says, blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. He showed His flesh, He showed it to His servants, but the form of a servant; as if His own voice, among the many voices, which He sent before, He even showed His flesh. The Father was sought, as if He Himself were to be seen as He is: the Son equal to the Father, in the form of a servant, spoke to the servants. Lord, Philip said to Him, show us the Father, and it is sufficient for us. He was seeking the end of all his intention, that is, the end of his progress, to which when he had come, he would seek nothing more. Show us, he said, the Father, and it suffices for us. Well, Philip, well, you understand very well that the Father suffices for you. What is sufficient? You will seek nothing further: He will fill you, satisfy you, perfect you. But see whether perhaps even this one suffices for you whom you hear. Does He alone suffice, or with the Father? But how alone, when He never departs from the Father? So, let Him answer Philip wanting to see: Have I been with you so long, and yet you have not known me, Philip? He who has seen me has seen the Father. What is: He who has seen me has seen the Father; but You have not seen me, therefore you seek the Father? Philip, who has seen me, has seen the Father. But you see me, and do not see me. For you do not see me who made you; but you see what I became for you. He who has seen me has seen the Father. From where, unless because in the form of God He thought it not robbery to be equal with God? What then did Philip see? That He emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men, and being found in appearance as a man. Philip saw this, the form of a servant, intended to be free to the form of God. Therefore, John is the person of all voices, Christ the person of the Word. All voices must decrease, as we progress to see Christ. For the more you progress to see wisdom, the less you need the voice. The voice in the Prophets, the voice in the Apostles, the voice in the Psalms, the voice in the Gospel. Let this come: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. When we see Him as He is, will the Gospel still be recited there? Will we hear the prophecies? Will we read the letters of the Apostles? Why? Because the voices will cease as the Word increases: because He must increase, but I must decrease. And indeed the Word in itself neither grows nor diminishes. But it is said to increase in us, when by progressing, we grow in Him: just as light increases in the eyes, when by the strengthening of sight it is seen more, which by the weakening of sight was indeed seen less. And it was smaller to sick eyes, greater to healthy eyes: though it has neither diminished before nor grown afterward by itself. Therefore, the ministry of the voice is diminished, when the progress of the mind to the Word takes place. Thus Christ must increase, but John must decrease. Their passions indicate this. For John was decreased, being beheaded; Christ was exalted, He increased as if on the cross. Their birth days indicate this. For from the birth of John begins the decrease of days; but from the birth of Christ, the increase is renewed.

Sermons - Sermon 289

SERMO 289 On the Birth of John the Baptist John was not born so wonderfully and so great without cause. The reason for today's celebrated gathering of ours is the Nativity of John the Baptist, whose miraculous conception and birth we heard when the Gospel was read. A great mystery, my brothers: the mother of John was both barren and aged, the father old; in both, offspring were utterly despaired of. But because nothing is impossible for God, a son was promised to one who did not believe. The father's voice was taken away because he lacked faith: for it had already been written: I believed, therefore I spoke. He did not believe, and he did not speak. Meanwhile, also a virgin conceived, and this sublime miracle was far greater. The barren one conceives a herald, the virgin a judge. John from a man and woman, Christ from only a woman. Should John be compared to Christ? By no means. Nevertheless, not in vain did so great a one precede so great a one. For if, with power granted and bestowed by the very Lord our God attempting my effort, I am able to explain what I feel, neither will my meanness be deserted, nor will your expectation be disappointed. But if I am less able to explain what I feel, the Lord our God will supplement in your hearts what he has perhaps withheld from me because of my weakness. I stated this beforehand, because I know what I want to say, you do not; and I already sense the difficulty in explaining it. However, it was to be commended to you, so that in your intention you might be able to pray for us.

John, a man only, Christ, God and man.

Elizabeth conceived a man, Mary conceived a man: Elizabeth the mother of John, Mary the mother of Christ: but Elizabeth conceived only a man, Mary conceived both God and man. It is a wondrous thing, how a creature could conceive the Creator. What then is to be understood, my brothers, other than that He made for Himself flesh from a mother alone, He who made the first man without a father and mother? Our first fall happened when the woman through whom we died conceived in her heart the poison of the serpent. For the serpent persuaded sin, and the persuader was admitted. If our first fall happened when the woman conceived the poison of the serpent in her heart, it is no wonder that our salvation was accomplished when the woman conceived in her womb the flesh of the Almighty. Both sexes had fallen, both were to be restored. Through a woman we were sent into destruction, through a woman our salvation was restored to us.

John was such an excellent man, that he was thought to be Christ. John's testimony about himself and about Christ.

What does John signify, then? Why is he introduced? Why is he sent before? I will speak if I can. Our Lord Jesus Christ said of John: Among those born of women there has arisen no one greater than John the Baptist. If John is compared to men, he surpasses all other men; he only does not surpass the God-man. John was sent before the Lord. So great was his excellence, so great his grace, that he was even thought to be Christ. For the Jews expected Christ; because even in their Prophets, whom they themselves read, Christ was foretold. They awaited Him who was absent and killed Him who was present: when they thought it was not He, they themselves failed, and He remained. However, not all failed, and among the Jews, many believed. Therefore, because Christ was expected, see the glory of John: for when so great a grace was seen in him, when he baptized in repentance and prepared the way for the Lord as the one sent before, the Jews sent to him and asked: Who are you? Are you Elijah, or the prophet? or are you Christ? He said: I am not Christ, nor Elijah, nor the prophet. And they said, Who are you then? He replied: I am the voice of one crying out in the wilderness. John responded thus to the Jews who were asking who he was, and beginning to think that he himself was Christ: I am the voice of one crying out in the wilderness. You heard, if you were attentive, the prophetic reading which was read first. It was written: A voice of one crying out in the wilderness, Prepare the way of the Lord, make His paths straight. Every valley shall be filled, and every mountain and hill shall be made low, and the crooked shall become straight, and the rough places shall become smooth ways; and all flesh shall see the salvation of God. Then the Lord said through the Prophet: Cry out; and I said: What shall I cry? And the Lord then with the Prophet: All flesh is grass, and all its beauty is like the flower of the field: the grass withers, the flower fades; but the word of our God will stand forever. John said: I am the voice of one crying out in the wilderness, Prepare the way of the Lord: this means to say, It was foretold by the Prophet that I would be the one crying out in the wilderness. It belongs to John, then, to say: All flesh is grass, and all its beauty is like the flower of the field: the grass withers, the flower fades; but the word of our God will stand forever. The Word was conceived in the womb of the Virgin; the voice cries out in the wilderness the Word. A voice without a word is mere noise in the ears; indeed, it could not even be called that. Every word is a voice, not every voice is a word. If a man shouts with his mouth open as much as he can, it is a voice, but not a word. What then is the voice which is called a word? Where understanding is, a voice signifying a word is present. But behold, it does not yet sound; I want to say something, already the word is in my heart. The word is in the heart, and yet there is no voice in the mouth. Therefore, the word can be without a voice, and the voice can be without a word. Add voice to the word, the word proceeds into knowledge. What then is Christ to Mary? A hidden word. The voice is sent before to precede the Word. What is John? The voice of one crying out in the wilderness. What is Christ? In the beginning was the Word. What are you, a voice? What are you, a man? All flesh is grass, and all the glory of man is like the flower of the field: the grass withers, and the flower fades; but the word of our God will stand forever. Hold fast to the Word; for the Word took up the grass on your behalf. The Word made flesh is Christ. But all flesh is grass, and all the honor of flesh is like the flower of the field: let us despise the present things, hope for the future. Every valley shall be filled, every humility shall be exalted: and every mountain and hill shall be made low, all pride shall be cast down. Bring down the mountains, fill the valleys, and the plain will be made even. Give me the rich and honored people from the flower of the field; let them hear: God resists the proud but gives grace to the humble. Give me the poor, the desperate, those conscious of their weakness; let them not despair, let them believe in Him who came for all. Let the high be brought low, let the low be lifted up. When He comes, may He find a plain, not a stone to stumble upon. Therefore, John himself was saying: Prepare the way of the Lord; not for me, but for the Lord; by whom I am sent, not that I am He.

John avoids the presumptuous usurpation of the name of Christ. But the Jews say: Are you the Christ? If he were not a valley to be filled but a mountain to be humbled, he would have found the occasion to deceive. For they wanted to hear from him what they would believe. They were so amazed by his grace that they would undoubtedly believe whatever he said. Behold, he had found the occasion to deceive the human race: if he said, I am the Christ, they would believe him. If he boasted of himself under another's name, he would lose his own merit. If he boasted of himself as the Christ, would he not answer to himself, Why do you exalt yourself? All flesh is grass, and all its glory like the flower of the grass: the grass withers, the flower falls. Understand what remains forever: But the word of the Lord remains forever. He recognized himself: deservedly the Lord called him a lamp. The Lord said this about John: He was a burning and shining lamp, and you were willing to rejoice for a while in his light. But what does the evangelist John say about him? There was a man sent from God, whose name was John: he came as a witness to bear witness about the light; he was not the light. Who? John the Baptist. Who says this? John the Evangelist: He was not the light, but came to bear witness about the light. You say: He was not the light: of whom does he say the light itself: He was a burning and shining lamp. But I know, he says, what kind of light I say; I know by whose light's comparison the lamp is not light. Listen to what follows: He was the true light that enlightens every man coming into this world. John does not enlighten every man, Christ enlightens every man. And John recognized himself as a lamp, lest he be extinguished by the wind of pride. A lamp can both be lit and extinguished. The word of God cannot be extinguished, but a lamp always can.

John the greatest forerunner of man, so that Christ may be recognized as more than man.

He was sent then, the greatest man, to bear witness to Him who was more than a man. For when he, than whom no one greater has risen among those born of women, says: I am not the Christ, and humbles himself before Christ, something more than a man is to be understood. For if you seek the greatest man, John, Christ is more than a man; thus you understand the forerunner, that you may seek the judge; thus you listen to the herald, that you may fear the judge. He was sent, he predicted the coming one. And what kind of testimony does John bear to Christ? Hear what kind: Whose sandal strap I am not worthy to untie. Did you understand, man, what you should do? Everyone who humbles himself will be exalted. What then of Christ? We have all received from His fullness. What does it mean: We all? Therefore, the Patriarchs, and Prophets, and holy Apostles, either sent before the incarnation or sent by the incarnate one, all of us have received from His fullness. We are the vessels, He is the fountain. Therefore, if we understand the mystery, my brothers, John is a man, Christ is God: let man be humbled, and let God be exalted. In order for man to be humbled, John was born on the day when the days begin to decrease. In order for God to be exalted, Christ was born on the day when the days begin to increase. A great sacrament. Therefore we celebrate the Nativity of John as that of Christ, since that very birth is full of mystery. What mystery? Of our height. Let us be diminished in man, let us grow in God. Let us be humbled in ourselves, that we may be exalted in Him. The sacrament of this great affair has been fulfilled in the sufferings of both. For man to be diminished, John lost his head; for God to be exalted, Christ was suspended on wood. John was sent for this, that we might imitate him, and hold on to the Word. However much human pride may boast itself, from any excellence of sanctity, who will be what John is? Whoever you are who think yourself great, you will not be what John is. Not yet born, he was already announcing the Lord to be born, exulting in the womb. What is more excellent than this holiness? Imitate: hear what he says about Christ. We have received from His fullness. A lamp in the night shows you the fountain, and drinks from it as well: For we, he says, have all received from His fullness. We all: He is the fountain, we are the vessels: He is the day, we are the lamps. Great is the weakness of men: by the lamp, the day is sought. Not John alone, but also the Apostles are lamps. The lampstand is the lamp, the cross of Christ. But even the Apostles, my brothers, are lamps of the day. Do not think that John alone is a lamp, and the Apostles are not. The Lord said to them: You are the light of the world. And lest they think that they are such a light as he who was said to be the light, of whom it is said: He was the true light which enlightens every man coming into this world; immediately he taught them what the true light itself is. When he said: You are the light of the world; he added, and said: No one lights a lamp and puts it under a bushel. What I said to you about being light, I said you are a lamp: do not exult in your pride, lest the flame be extinguished. I do not place you under a bushel: but so that you may shine, you will be on a lampstand. What is the lampstand for the lamp? Listen to the lampstand: be lamps, and you will have a lampstand. The cross of Christ is the great lampstand. Whoever wants to shine, let him not be ashamed of the wooden lampstand. Hear, so that you may understand that the lampstand is the cross of Christ. No one lights a lamp and puts it under a bushel, but upon a lampstand, so that it may shine to all who are in the house. Let your light thus shine before men, that they may see your good works and glorify: not as you seek to be glorified, you seek to be extinguished: they glorify your Father who is in heaven. Through your good works, they glorify your Father. To be able to be lamps, you could not light yourselves, you could not place yourselves upon a lampstand: let Him be glorified, who granted this to you. So listen to Paul the Apostle, listen to the lamp exulting on the lampstand. But as for me, he says (those who know what follows shout): But as for me: what about you? God forbid that I should glory except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ. I glory in the lampstand: if the lampstand should withdraw, I fall. God forbid that I should glory except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom the world is crucified to me, and I to the world. You have praised, and you have favored. Let the world be crucified to you, and be crucified to the world. What does this mean? Do not seek happiness from the world: refrain from the happiness of the world. The world flatters, let the corrupter be avoided: the world threatens, let the assailant not be feared. If the good things of the world do not corrupt you, if the bad things of the world do not corrupt you, the world is crucified to you, and you to the world. Glory in the lampstand: as a lamp, always maintain humility on the lampstand, so that you may hold onto brightness: observe, lest you be extinguished by pride. Preserve what you have become, so that you may glorify the one who made you. What were you, man? Every man, consider what you were born as: even if you were born noble, you were born naked. What is nobility? The nakedness of the poor and the rich is equal at birth. Or perhaps because you were born noble, you live as long as you wish? When you did not know, you entered: when you do not wish, you leave. Finally, let the graves be examined, and the bones of the rich be recognized.

Sermons - Sermon 28A

SERMON 28/A IN THE SERMON ON PSALM 115

[The Fragment]

Only God is truthful, but every man is a liar, as it is written. Therefore, if God is truthful and the only truthful one, but every man is a liar, how will man be truthful unless he approaches the one who is not a liar? Finally, it is said to humans: You were once darkness; behold, every man is a liar. But to God it is said: With you is the fountain of life, in your light we shall see light. And because God alone is truthful, for God is light and in Him there is no darkness at all; humans are darkness, God is light; man is a liar, God is truthful. When will man be truthful? Approach Him and be illuminated. Therefore, Scripture wanted to show that every man, absolutely every man as far as he himself is concerned, is a liar. For he is not a liar except through what is his own, nor does he have anything of his own except to be a liar, not because he cannot be truthful, but because he will not be truthful on his own. Therefore, to be truthful: I believed, therefore I spoke. Take away that belief: every man is a liar. For when he departs from the truth of God, he will remain in his own lie, for he who speaks a lie, speaks from his own. Therefore, say: What shall I return to the Lord for all that He has returned to me? For in my fear I said, and I spoke the truth: every man is a liar. But He returned to me, not punishment for the lie, but good for evil, and by justifying the impious, made from the liar a truthful one.

Sermons - Sermon 29

SERMO 29 SERMON HELD IN CARTHAGE IN THE RESTORED BASILICA Day of Pentecost in the Vigil.

ABOUT THE VERSE OF PSALM 117:

"Give thanks to the Lord for He is good"

Above all, God is good.

We have been warned and instructed by the Spirit of God to confess to the Lord. And this is the reason given for confessing to the Lord, because He is good. It is briefly said what is deeply thought. Confess, he says, to the Lord. And as if we asked: "Why," the answer is: Because He is good. What more do you seek, or if you seek anything else, what do you seek but the good? Such is the strength of the good that even the wicked seek the good. But the things that are called good are good because they owe their goodness to some good. If we seek all good things from where they have their goodness, let us remember: And God made everything, and behold, it was very good. Therefore there would be nothing good unless it were made by the good. And by what kind of good? A good that nobody made. Therefore, there would be nothing good unless it were made by the good, which itself was not made. The heavens are good, but created good; the angels are good, but created good; the stars, sun and moon, the alternation of night and day, the changes of seasons, the ages of the world, the cycles of the years, the sprouts of trees and herbs, the nature of animals, and among all these, the praising creature, man. All are good, but created good. And they are good from God, not from themselves. He who made these things is above all and is good, because nobody made Him good, but He is good in Himself. Yet He is not good to Himself alone, but also to us. Therefore, confess to the Lord, for He is good. The confession is either of one praising or one repenting.

Confession is either of one praising or of one repenting. Indeed, there are those who are poorly educated, who when they have heard confession in the Scriptures, as if it could only be of sins, immediately beat their chests, as if they were already being admonished to confess sins. But that your Charity may know that confession does not pertain to sins alone, let us hear him of whom we cannot doubt that he had no sin at all, exclaiming and saying: I confess to you, Father, Lord of heaven and earth. Who said this? He who did no sin, nor was guile found in his mouth. He who alone could truly say: Behold, the prince of the world is coming, and he will find nothing in me. And yet he confesses. But this confessor is a praiser, not a sinner. Finally, hear what he confesses. Hear praises, and the praise itself is our salvation. For what does the Son without sin confess to God the Father? I confess to you, he says, Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because you have hidden these things from the wise and prudent, and revealed them to little ones. He commended this praise of the Father because He has hidden these things from the wise and prudent, that is, the proud and arrogant, and revealed them to little ones, that is, the weak and humble.

Sins are not to be excused but accused. But what is true is also the healthy confession of sins. Hence we heard in the psalm that was read first: Set a guard, O Lord, over my mouth; keep watch over the door of my lips, so that my heart may not incline to evil words, to make excuses for sins. He asks God to set a guard over his mouth and explains what kind of guard he means. For there are people who are very abundant, who, when they begin to be accused, rush to excuse themselves. To excuse is to seek causes and to weave fabrications so that the sin does not seem to pertain to you. One says: "The devil made me do it"; another says: "Fortune made me do it"; another: "I was compelled by fate," no one to himself. When you wish to be your own excuser, your accuser triumphs over you. Do you wish to do what will cause your accuser, that is, the devil, to grieve and lament? Do what you heard, do what you learned, and say to your God: I said, O Lord, have mercy on me; heal my soul, for I have sinned against you. I, he says, I have said, not the devil, not fortune, not fate. I said: I do not excuse myself, but I accuse myself. I said, have mercy on me, heal my soul. Why is it sick? Because I have sinned against you.

Confess therefore to the Lord, for He is good. If you wish to praise, what can you praise more safely than the good? If you wish to praise, if you wish to have the confession of praise, what can you praise more safely than the good? If you wish to confess your sins, to whom more safely than to the good? To a man, since he is evil, you confess and are condemned. To God, since He is good, you confess and are cleansed. If you attend to the confession of praise, whatever you are going to praise abundantly, your intention is focused on showing that what you praise is good. For good things are rightly praised, just as bad things are rightly blamed. The praise of your Lord has been briefly told to you: He is good. If you also are good, praise whence you are good; if you are evil, praise whence you are good. For if you are good, you are good from Him; if you are evil, you are evil from yourself. Flee from yourself and come to Him who made you, because by fleeing from yourself, you follow yourself, and by following yourself, you stick to Him who made you.

We desire nothing except good.

How many good things are you seeking, wicked man! Surely, you are wicked. Tell me what you wish for except good? You seek a horse, only a good one; you seek a farm, only a good one; you seek a house, only a good one; you seek a wife, only a good one; a tunic only good, a boot only good. Your soul alone is wicked! Are you not contrary to yourself, who seeks good things while you are wicked? If you seek good things, first be yourself what you seek. But if you, being wicked, have found many good things, what does it profit you since you have perished? Love your good souls: hate your wicked souls. But by loving Him from whom all good comes, you will be good. Hating your wickedness, choose good.

What does it mean to hate your own evils? By repenting, to confess your sins. For everyone who repents and confesses their sins by repenting, is angry at themselves, and in a certain way by repenting avenges in themselves what displeases them. For God hates sin. If you also hate in yourself what God hates, for a time you are joined to God by some will, while you hate in yourself what God also hates. Be harsh on yourself, so that God may intercede for you and not condemn you. For sin undoubtedly must be punished. This is owed to sin: punishment, damnation. Sin must be punished, either by you or by Him. If it is punished by you, then it will be punished without you; but if it is not punished by you, it will be punished with you. Therefore, confess to the Lord for He is good. Praise Him as much as you can, love Him as much as you can: Pour out your hearts before Him, God our helper, for He is good.

Sermons - Sermon 290

SERMO 290 ON THE BIRTHDAY OF JOHN THE BAPTIST Testimony of John about Christ, and of Christ about John.

Saint John, not the Evangelist, but the Baptist, was sent before the face of Christ to prepare His ways. Christ's testimony about John is: Among those born of women there has not arisen a greater one than John the Baptist. John's testimony about Christ is: He who comes after me is mightier than I, whose sandal strap I am not worthy to loosen. Let us consider both testimonies, what the Lord attested to the servant, and what the servant attested to the Lord. What is the testimony of the Lord about the servant? Among those born of women, there has not arisen a greater one than John the Baptist. What is the testimony of the servant about the Lord? He who comes after me is mightier than I. If therefore among those born of women there has not arisen a greater one than John the Baptist, who is greater than him, what is he? John is a great man, but a man: Christ is greater than John because He is both God and man. Both were born miraculously, the herald and the Judge, the lamp and the day, the voice and the Word, the servant and the Lord. From a barren woman, a servant; from a virgin, the Lord. The Lord Himself made the servant in a barren womb, from an aged father and an old mother: and the same Lord made Himself flesh in the womb of a virgin, without a human father, who made the first man without father and mother. No one of those born of women has arisen greater than John the Baptist. John appeared so great that some even thought he was the Christ. Yet in his humility, he did not follow the error of others, nor did he dare to say, I am what you think: but, what was good for him, he recognized himself, to be humbled at the feet of the Lord, and as a servant to the sandal strap, lest the lamp be extinguished by the wind of pride. The birth of Christ and John, why it is celebrated, not of others.

Finally, because John was born in a great sacrament, the Church celebrates the birthday of John alone as a just man. The Nativity of the Lord is also celebrated, but as of the Lord. Give me another servant besides John among the Patriarchs, among the Prophets, among the Apostles, whose birthday the Church of Christ celebrates. We celebrate the day of the passions for many servants: the day of birth for no one, except John. You have heard, when the Gospel was read, what the order was of the births of both, the precursor and the Master, and what I said a little earlier, the herald and the Judge, the voice and the Word. The angel Gabriel announces John, the same angel Gabriel announces the Lord Jesus Christ. He precedes, He follows: he precedes by serving, He follows by ruling. For He follows by being born, He precedes by ruling: because Christ created even John himself, after whom Christ was created, both creator and created; creator before the mother, creator of the mother, created in the mother. And what shall I say, creator before the mother? Before Abraham, I am, He Himself said: the Gospel speaks: hear, or read. But it is hardly sufficient, before Abraham creator: before Adam creator, creator before heaven and earth, before all Angels and the whole spiritual creation, Thrones, Dominions, Principalities, and Powers, before all things creator. Because in the beginning, the Word was not made, but was, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God: this was in the beginning with God. All things were made through Him. If all things, visible and invisible, heaven and earth, and virgin Mary:

because even the virgin Mary from the earth, and Christ the maker of the earth was made from the earth, because truth has sprung from the earth.

John is such a great man, that in humbling himself before Christ, he shows that He is more than a man.

Therefore, I briefly commend to your Charity a great sacrament. Since there would be many who would think that Christ was nothing but a man, nothing more than a man: therefore, the great man, greater than whom among men there was not, John gave testimony to Him, submissive, bowed, humiliated. To what extent would he have rendered himself humble, if he had said he was worthy to untie the strap of His sandal? Consider the strap of the sandal in the great sacrament. How humble would he have existed, even if John had said he was worthy? What did he achieve by saying he was unworthy? Therefore, the day of his nativity is noted and commended to the celebration of the Church. The words of Zechariah and Mary are almost the same, but the unbelief is not the same.

There is a great difference, not only in their mothers, because that one woman was a virgin, the other barren; that one bearing the Son of God our Lord by the Holy Spirit, the other bearing the forerunner of the Lord by her old husband. And consider this. Zacharias did not believe. How did he not believe? He asked the angel by what he could know what was promised, since he was old and his wife was advanced in her days. And the angel said to him: Behold, you will be silent and unable to speak until the day these things come to pass, because you did not believe my words, which will be fulfilled in their time. The same angel came to Mary, announcing that Christ would be born of her in the flesh, and Mary says something similar. For he had said: By what means shall I know this? For I am old, and my wife is advanced in her days. And it is said to him: Behold, you will be silent and unable to speak until the day these things are fulfilled, because you did not believe my words. And he subjected to the punishment of silence, deservedly for his lack of faith. What did the prophet say about John? The voice of one crying in the wilderness. Zacharias is silent while generating the voice. Because he did not believe, he was silent: deservedly he was rendered mute until the voice was born. For if it was rightly said, indeed because it was rightly said in the holy psalm: I believed, therefore have I spoken: because he did not believe, deservedly he did not speak. But I beg you, O Lord, together with those listening to me, we ask, open to us, explain to us what this question means. Zacharias seeks reasons from the angel by what means he could know what was announced to him, since he was old and his wife advanced in her days: it is said to him: Because you did not believe, you will be silent. Christ is announced to the virgin Mary, and she seeks a reason, and says to the angel: How shall this be, since I do not know a man? And he: By what means shall I know this? For I am old, and my wife is advanced in her days. And she: How shall this be, since I do not know a man? He is told, You will be silent, because you do not believe: to her, however, the reason is explained, silence is not imposed. How shall this be, since I do not know a man? And the angel: The Holy Spirit shall come upon you, and the power of the Most High shall overshadow you. Behold how what you ask will come to pass, behold how you do not know a man and will give birth, behold how: because the Holy Spirit shall come upon you, and the power of the Most High shall overshadow you. Do not fear the heat of lust, under such a great cover of holiness. Why is this? If we attend to the words, either both believed or both doubted, Zacharias and Mary. But we can hear the words: God can also examine the heart.

Zacharias questions in despair, Mary questions inquiringly. The grace of God is greatest in the incarnation of the Word.

We understand, beloved, that Zacharias when he said, "How shall I know this? For I am an old man, and my wife is advanced in years," spoke in despair, not in inquiry: But Mary, when she said in contrast, "How will this be, since I am a virgin?" spoke in inquiry, not in despair. While she asked, she did not doubt the promise. O truly full of grace! For thus she was greeted by the angel: "Hail, full of grace." Who can explain this grace? Who can suffice in giving thanks for this grace? Man is made, and by free will man perishes, and he who made man is made so that he might not lose what he made. In the beginning was the Word, God with God, through whom all things were made, and the Word was made flesh: The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us. Flesh becomes the Word, but flesh approaches the Word, the Word does not perish in flesh. O grace! What were we worthy of to have this? The rich, that is the proud, must be emptied; and the hungry, that is the humble, must be filled. The Pharisee, rich; the Publican, poor. But see what holy Mary herself says, full of faith, full of grace, the future mother, the virgin who will remain. What does she say among other things, of which it would be very much to speak individually? What does she say? He has filled the hungry with good things, and sent the rich away empty. Who are the hungry? The humble, the needy. Who are the rich? The proud and inflated. I do not send you far: I show you now in one temple a rich man among those who are sent away empty and a poor man among those who are filled with good things. Two men went up into the temple to pray; one a Pharisee, and the other a tax collector. The Pharisee said. What did he say? Pay attention to the rich man belching confusion, exhaling the drunkenness of arrogance, not righteousness: God, he said, I thank you that I am not like other men, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, like this tax collector. I fast twice a week, I give tithes of all that I possess. Did you come to pray, or to praise yourself? You said you have everything: you asked for nothing as if in need. How then did you come to pray? I thank you, Lord. He does not say: Lord, give me grace. Because I am not like other men, extortioners, unjust, adulterers. So, you alone are righteous? Because I am not like this tax collector. You insult, not exult. I fast twice a week, I give tithes of all that I possess. O rich man to be emptied! Come, come, poor man, hungry tax collector: rather, stay where you are. For the tax collector stood at a distance. But the Lord was approaching the humble. Nor was he daring to lift his eyes to heaven. Where he did not lift his eyes, there he had his heart. But he struck his breast, saying: Lord, be merciful to me a sinner. O hungry man to be filled with good things! The Lord's judgment about the Pharisee and the Publican. He reproves the Pelagians, who are more arrogant than the Pharisee himself.

You have heard, Lord, the controversy; pronounce the judgment. Hear the judgment pronounced between the parties. The defeated does not appeal, because there is no one to whom he might appeal. For he does not appeal from the Son to the Father. For God the Father judges no one; but He has given all judgment to the Son. Therefore, let Truth pronounce judgment between the parties. Amen, He says, I tell you, that this one went down to his house justified rather than the Pharisee. Why is this, I ask you? By what justice? Do you wish to hear? Because everyone who exalts himself will be humbled; and he who humbles himself will be exalted. By whom will this one be exalted, and he who exalts himself will be humbled. Because He has filled the hungry with good things, and sent the rich away empty. Go now, and blow away your riches: throw yourself, and say, I am rich. How rich? If I will, I am righteous; if I do not will, I am not righteous. I have the power to be righteous, and to not be righteous. Do you not hear in the Psalm: Those who trust in their own strength? Therefore God has given you flesh, God has given you sense, God has given you a soul, God has given you a mind, God has given you intelligence: do you give yourself righteousness? What is flesh, what are senses, what is a soul, what is a mind, what is intelligence without righteousness? Are not all these things, if they lack righteousness, grounds for punishment? Therefore are you so rich that, when God has given you lesser things, you give yourself greater things? Poorly rich, you who must be emptied out, if indeed you have what you said you have: What do you have that you have not received? Nor have you even learned from that proud and rich Pharisee to give thanks to the Lord for what you said you have.

Sermons - Sermon 291

SERMO 291 ON THE BIRTHDAY OF JOHN THE BAPTIST The birth of John is marvelous on account of Christ.

What day we celebrate today I do not need to tell you, because all of you, when the Gospel was read, heard it. Today we received Saint John, the forerunner of the Lord, announcing the son of a virgin from a barren woman, yet a servant announcing the Lord. For since God was about to come as man through a virgin, a wonderful man from a barren woman preceded him: so that when this wonderful man says he is unworthy to unloose the strap of his sandal, God as man may be recognized. Marvel at John as much as you can: it benefits Christ for you to marvel. It benefits, I say, Christ, not because you bestow anything upon Christ, but so that you may profit in Christ. Therefore, marvel at John as much as you can. You heard what to marvel at. It is announced by an angel to a priest father: the angel takes the voice from the unbelieving father; he remains mute, awaiting the tongue at the birth of his son. The barren one conceived, and the old woman conceived: a double sterility, barrenness, and age. The angel says what he will be like: it is fulfilled in him as it is said; and what is most to be marveled at, he is filled with the Holy Spirit even from his mother's womb. Then, as holy Mary comes, he leaps in the womb; and whom he could not greet with words, he salutes with movements. He is born, gives voice to his father; the father, speaking, gives a name to the son: all marvel at such grace. For what else is it but grace? For where did this John merit God? Where did he merit God, before he was the one who would merit? O grace given freely! From the greatness of John, the majesty of Christ is to be understood.

All marvel, they are astonished, and with movement of their hearts say, for it to be written to us what was read: What, do you think, will this boy be? For the hand of the Lord is with him. What, do you think, will this boy be? He exceeds the bounds of human nature. We know boys: but what, do you think, will this boy be? Why do you say: What, do you think, will this boy be? For the hand of the Lord is with him. Because the hand of the Lord is with him, we already know; but what he will be, we do not know. Surely he will be very great, who started so great. What will he be, who is so great while so little? What will he be: Human weakness grows dull, the hearts of all who consider tremble: What, do you think, will this boy be? He will be great: but what will he be who will be greater than him? This one will be very great: but what will he be who will be greater than this great one? If he who has now begun to be, will be so great, what will he be who existed before? But what did I say, who existed? He was before John and Zacharias, much more before John and Abraham and Isaac and Jacob they existed. Certainly before John the heaven and earth existed. What will he be who was in the beginning? For in the beginning, which is before John, and before every man, God made heaven and earth. But by what did he make, you ask? In the beginning God did not make the Word, but the Word was there: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was, not any kind of word, but the Word was God. All things were made through him. And in the last time he who was, was made, so that what he made would not perish. What, do you think, will this boy be? For the hand of the Lord is with him. If the boy will be so great, because the hand of the Lord is with him; what about that very hand of the Lord? For Christ is the hand of the Lord, the Son of God is the hand of God, the Word of God is the hand of God. For what is the hand of God, if not that through which all things were made? What, do you think, will this boy be? For the hand of the Lord is with him. O human weakness, what will you do in the judge, who thus hesitate in the herald? But even here, what did I say? I return to the consideration of human custom. And what did I say? I said herald, I said judge and herald: a man, and the judge a man. What appeared I said, what lay hidden who will say? The Word was made flesh: yet the Word was not turned into flesh. The Word was made flesh, by taking what it was not; not losing what it was. Behold, we have admired the birth of his herald, which we celebrate today, but let us see for whom it was made. The angel was sent to Zechariah and to Mary. How Zechariah's prayer was heard. The angel Gabriel came to Zacharias, not to Elizabeth his wife, the mother of John: the angel Gabriel came, I say, to Zacharias, not to Elizabeth. Why? Because John was to come through Zacharias in Elizabeth. Thus, the angel announcing the coming of John by birth did not come to the vessel of the womb but to the source of the seed. He announced the future son of both, but he announced it to the father. For John was to come from the union of a male and female. Behold, the same Gabriel came again to Mary, not to Joseph: from where that flesh was to begin, from where it was to have its origin, the angel came to her. But how did the angel announce the future son to Zacharias the priest? “Do not fear,” he said, “Zacharias, your prayer has been heard.” For what, my brothers, had that priest entered the Holy of Holies for, if not to pray to the Lord for children? God forbid. Someone may say: How do you prove this? For Zacharias did not indicate what he had prayed for. I say this briefly: If he had asked for a son, he would have believed the announcement. The angel said that a son would be born to him, and he did not believe? Wouldn't he have certainly prayed for this? Who prays without hope? Or who does not believe in hope? If you do not hope, why do you pray? If you hope, why do you not believe? What then? He says, “Your prayer has been heard: for behold, Elizabeth will conceive and bear you a son.” Why? Because your prayer has been heard. If Zacharias had said, "Why? Did I ask for this?" Surely the angel would neither be deceived nor deceive when he said, "Your prayer has been heard: for behold, your wife will bear a son.” But why was this said? Because he was sacrificing for the people: the priest was sacrificing for the people, the people were expecting Christ; John was announcing Christ.

Mary among women blessed. The same angel then said to the virgin Mary: Hail, full of grace, the Lord is with you: already with you is He who will be in you. Blessed are you among women. The property of the Hebrew language is that all females are usually called "women" as the Holy Scripture attests: lest perhaps they who are not accustomed to hear the Scriptures be amazed or scandalized. The Lord openly says in a certain place of the Scriptures: Separate the women who have not known a man. Finally, remember our very origin: when Eve was made from the side of the man, what does Scripture say? He took a rib from him and made it into a woman. Already she is called "woman," indeed taken from man, but not yet joined to man. Therefore, when you hear from the angel: Blessed are you among women; understand it as if it were said in our manner: Blessed are you among females. The questioning of Zechariah and Mary is similar, the intention different. The resolve of virginity. A son is promised to Zacharias, a son is also promised to holy Mary, and she says nearly the same words that Zacharias had said. For what had Zacharias said? "How shall this be to me? For I am an old man, and my wife is barren, and advanced in her days." What also did holy Mary say? "How shall this be?" Similar voice, different heart. Let us hear the similar voice with the ear, but discern the different heart by the pronouncement of the angel. David sinned, and when corrected by the prophet, he said: "I have sinned;" immediately it was said to him: "Your sin is forgiven." Saul sinned, and when corrected by the prophet, he said: "I have sinned;" but his sin was not forgiven, and the wrath of God remained upon him. What does this show, except that the voice was similar, but the heart different? For man is the listener of the voice, but God is the inspector of the heart. In the words of Zacharias, the angel saw not faith but doubt and despair, indicating this by taking away his voice and condemning faithlessness.

However, holy Mary: "How shall this be, since I know not a man?" Recognize the purpose of the virgin. When would she say, "I shall engage with a man: How shall this be?" If it were to happen as in the case of all other children, she would not have said, "How shall it be?" But she, mindful of her resolve and conscious of her holy vow, knowing what she had vowed; by saying, "How shall this be, since I know not a man?" as she had not known it to happen that children are born except to those married and engaging with their husbands, which she proposed to be ignorant of by saying, "How shall this be?" sought the manner, not doubting the omnipotence of God. "How shall this be?" What manner is there by which this will happen? You announce to me a son, you have my prepared mind, tell me the manner. For the holy virgin could have feared, or certainly been ignorant of God's plan, in what manner He wished her to have a son, as though He disapproved of the virgin's vow. What if it were said to her, "Marry, join with a man?" God did not say this, having accepted the vow of the virgin, for He indeed accepted that which He Himself gave. So say to me, messenger of God: "How shall this be?" See the angel knowing, she inquiring, not distrusting. Because he saw her inquiring, not mistrusting, he did not refuse to instruct her. Hear how: your virginity will remain, you just believe the truth, preserve your virginity, receive integrity. Since your faith is intact, your integrity will also remain untouched. Finally, hear how this will be: "The Holy Spirit will come upon you, and the power of the Most High will overshadow you." Such overshadowing knows not the heat of lust. Therefore, because "The Holy Spirit will come upon you, and the power of the Most High will overshadow you," because you will conceive by faith, because by believing, not by engaging, you will have in the womb: hence the Holy one to be born of you shall be called the Son of God.

Mary by grace mother of the Son of God.

What are you, who will later give birth? How did you deserve this? How did you receive this? How will He who made you come about within you? From where, I say, did you receive this great good? You are a virgin, you are holy, you have vowed a vow; but what you earned is great, indeed what you have received is great. For how did you deserve this? He who made you is made within you, He through whom you were made is made within you: indeed He through whom heaven and earth were made, through whom all things were made, the Word of God is made flesh in you, by taking flesh, not by losing divinity. And the Word is joined to the flesh, and the Word is coupled with the flesh; and the chamber of this great union is your womb; and of this, I say, this great union, that is the chamber of the Word and the flesh is your womb: from where the bridegroom himself proceeds from his chamber. He found you a virgin when conceived, He leaves you a virgin when born. He grants fertility, He does not take away integrity. From where did you receive this? Boldly I seem to question the virgin, and as if impertinently, I disturb her modest ears with my voice. But I see the modest virgin, yet responding, and reminding me: Do you ask me from where this came to me? I am ashamed to respond to you about my good, but listen to the angel’s greeting, and recognize your salvation in me. Believe in whom I believed. Do you ask from where this came to me? Let the angel respond. Tell me, angel, from where this came to Mary? I already said when I greeted: Hail, full of grace.

Sermons - Sermon 292

SERMO 292 On the Birth of John the Baptist [In which it is disputed against the Donatists] Why the birth of John is celebrated, not that of others. The solemnity of today's feast demands a sermon of such solemn expectation. Therefore, with the help of the Lord, we will minister to you what He has given, recalling and holding in mind our duty of servitude, that we speak, not as masters, but as ministers; not to disciples, but to fellow disciples; because we are not lords, but fellow servants. However, there is one Master for us, whose school is on earth, and throne in heaven: whose precursor, John, was born, whose day of birth is given today, and is celebrated today. This we have received from the tradition of the elders, this we pass on to posterity with devout imitation. Therefore today we celebrate the Nativity of John, not the Evangelist, but the Baptist. With this primary matter set forth, a question arises that cannot be overlooked: why do we celebrate the Nativity by which John was born from the womb rather than that of any apostle or martyr or prophet or patriarch? If we are asked, what will we answer? As it seems to me, as it occurs to the modesty of my abilities, this is the reason: The disciples of the Lord were born, and having been brought to more mature years by the progress of age, were brought into discipleship; their faith adhered to the Lord later, but the nativity of none of them served the Lord. Let us remember the Prophets and recall the Patriarchs: they were born as men, filled with the Holy Spirit in the progress of age, they prophesied Christ; they were born so that they might prophesy later. However, John's very nativity prophesied the Lord Christ, whom he greeted conceived in the womb.

Why is such a great man John, not among the disciples of the Lord, but having disciples with the Lord. The proud voices of the Donatists.

Having resolved the question to the best of our ability, let us tackle another, with the strength given by the Lord. For there arises another question somewhat, as it seems to me, more obscure and more laborious to investigate, in which your attention and my humble prayer to the Lord will aid me greatly. This John, excelling in such great grace that, as it is said, he would greet the Lord even from the womb, not by speaking, but by exulting; whose grace towards God was already manifest when his flesh was still enclosed in the flesh: this John is therefore not found among the disciples of the Lord, but rather he is found to have had disciples while the Lord was present. What is this? Who is this man? A man of such greatness, who is such a man? So great a man, how great a man? Nevertheless, he was not following the Lord among the disciples, although disciples followed him: far be it from me to say against the Lord; but yet as if outside the Lord. Christ had disciples, John had disciples: Christ taught, John taught. What more can I say? John baptized, Christ baptized. I speak more about baptism, Christ was baptized by John. Where now are those who are inflated with arrogance by their ministering of Baptism with swollen mentality? Where are the voices lacking humility, elevated in pride, “I baptize, I baptize?” What would you have said, if you had been worthy to baptize Christ? It has begun to appear and stand out greatly, as your Holiness perceives, that for a reason both Christ had to be sent by the Father, and John sent ahead by Christ. John was sent first, but as the judge is preceded by heralds. Christ was created as a man later, but it was God Christ who created John. Therefore John was indeed a perfect man, and one whose grace was so commended that the Lord himself said of him: “Among those born of women none has arisen greater than John the Baptist.” Therefore, this great man recognizes the great Lord in the small: a man recognizes him who had come as a man and God. For if among those born of women, that is, among men, none has arisen greater than John the Baptist; whoever is greater than John is not merely man, but also God. Therefore, this great one had to have his own disciples and recognize Christ as the master of all with his disciples. For what greater testimony to the truth than to humble himself to recognize him whom by emulating he could have envied? John could have been thought to be Christ, and did not wish it: he could have been believed to be Christ, and did not wish it. People said, when they were mistaken in him: “Could this possibly be the Christ?” He answered what he was not, so that he might remain what he was. And indeed Adam, having claimed what he was not, lost what he was. This great man remembered that, but as the least before the small Christ: he knew it, remembered it, and held to it; because he thought of recovering what he had lost. Therefore this great man, John, to whom the Lord bore such testimony, whom the truth thus recommended, saying: “Among those born of women none has arisen greater than John the Baptist”; he could have been believed to be Christ, indeed by those deceived by the greatness of his grace he was already believed to be Christ: and in that error they would have perished, unless corrected by his confession. He responded to those who thought this way and said: “I am not the Christ.” As if to say: Surely you are gravely mistaken to my honor; surely you add high praise to me by thinking so: but I must recognize myself, that he may pardon you who err. For if what he was not was falsely believed, he who was truly so would be cut off.

Christ was baptized and incarnated to teach the way of humility.

John was sent ahead, therefore, to baptize the humble Lord. For the Lord wanted to be baptized for the sake of humility, not because of iniquity. Why was the Lord Christ baptized? Why was the Lord Christ, the only begotten Son of God, baptized? Find why He was born, and there you will find why He was baptized. For there you will find the path of humility, which you do not walk with a proud step; which, unless you tread with a humble foot, you cannot reach the height to which it leads. He was baptized for your sake, who descended for your sake. See how great He, who was so small, became: Who, being in the form of God, did not consider it robbery to be equal with God. For it was not robbery, but equality by nature, that the Son was equal with the Father. If John wanted to be thought of as Christ, it would have been robbery to him. Therefore, He did not consider it robbery to be equal with God. For He was equal, and it was without robbery, being co-eternal, born from eternity. Yet, He emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant; that is, taking the form of a man. Who, being in the form of God, had not taken the form of God; therefore, being in the form of God, He emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant. Thus, He took on what He was not, without losing what He was. Remaining God, He assumed man. He took the form of a servant, and God became man, from whom God made man.

Consider, therefore, what majesty, what power, what loftiness, what equality with the Father came for our sake to the clothing of a servant's form: and understand that path of humility from so great a master; for it is greater that he wished to become man, than that he wished to be baptized by man.

He wished to be baptized by John.

Therefore, John baptizes Christ, the servant (baptizes) the Lord, the voice (baptizes) the Word. Remember: I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness: and remember that the Word became flesh, and dwelt among us. Therefore, John baptizes Christ, the servant (baptizes) the Lord, the voice (baptizes) the Word, the creature (baptizes) the Creator, the lamp (baptizes) the sun; but the sun who made this sun; the sun of whom it is said: The sun of righteousness has risen for me, and healing in his wings. Of whom the wicked, repenting too late, at last in the judgment of God will say: What has pride profited us? or what has the boasting of riches given us? All those things have passed away, like a shadow: and with the shadows, who followed shadows. Therefore, they say, we have wandered from the way of truth, and the light of righteousness has not shone on us, and the sun has not risen on us. To them, Christ has not risen, by whom Christ has not been recognized. That sun of righteousness, without cloud, without night; he does not rise for the wicked, does not rise for the impious, does not rise for the unfaithful. For this bodily sun from the sky he makes to rise daily over the good and the bad. Therefore, as I said, the creature (baptizes) the Creator, the lamp (baptizes) the sun: and the baptizer did not exalt himself, but humbled himself by baptizing. For to the one coming to him he said: Do you come to me to be baptized? I need to be baptized by you. A great confession, and a secure profession of humility by the lamp. If it were exalted against the sun, it would quickly be extinguished by the wind of pride. Therefore, this is what the Lord foresaw, what the Lord taught by his baptism. So great desired to be baptized by so little; to explain briefly, the savior (desired to be baptized) by the saved. For John perhaps remembered some ailment of his own, although he was so great. For hence: I need to be baptized by you? Surely the Baptism of the Lord is salvation: because salvation is of the Lord. For the salvation of men is vain. Therefore, hence: I need to be baptized by you, if he did not need to be cured? But wonderful is the healing in the humility of the Lord himself: he baptized, and he healed. For if Christ is the savior of all men, especially of the faithful: it is an apostolic and true statement, that Christ is the savior of all men: let no one say, I do not need a savior. Whoever says this does not humble himself to the healer, but perishes in his illness. If (he is) the savior of all men, therefore also of John: for neither was John not a man. A great man indeed, but nonetheless a man. That (one) is the savior of all men: therefore he recognizes his savior. For Christ was not not the savior of John. He himself does not say this, who humbly confesses, saying: I need to be baptized by you. And the Lord: Let it be so now, to fulfill all righteousness. What is all righteousness? He commended righteousness by humility: the heavenly teacher and true Lord commended righteousness to us especially by humility. For what was being baptized pertained to humility: and therefore, about to do what pertained to humility, he said: To fulfill all righteousness. The Donatists improperly transfer the place of the Gospel about the tree and its fruit to the minister of Baptism.

Foreseeing that many would become proud concerning the ministry of Baptism and would say, "I baptize," and "As I am who baptize, so I make him whom I baptize." From where do you prove this? "I prove it," he says. By which testimonies? "Evangelical," he says. Let us hear some unknown new evangelist against the ancient Baptist. By which, then, evangelical testimonies do you prove that just as you are, you make him whom you baptize? "Because," he says, "it is written: A good tree produces good fruits." I recite what is written, I bring forth the Gospel: "A good tree produces good fruits, a bad tree produces bad fruits." I acknowledge the Gospel; but you, as I consider, do not acknowledge yourself. And to bear with you somewhat patiently, explain what you are saying, do not suppose that I have not meanwhile understood. Tell me to what these testimonies pertain, how they help in solving such a question concerning Baptism. "The good tree," he says, "is a good baptizer." "The good tree," he says, as those say: "the good tree," he says, "is a good baptizer; his fruit is good, who is baptized by him; for then the fruit will be good, if he is a good tree." What do you say about Christ and John? Awake, arise, the brightness of evident truth blinds your eyes; see what was put forward before us; read the Gospel: John baptized Christ. Will you say, John the tree, Christ the fruit? Will you call the creature the tree, and the Creator the fruit? Therefore the Lord Christ wished to be baptized by John, not that through baptism He would be free from iniquity, but that He might close the mouth of iniquity. Behold, he who baptizes is lesser; he who is baptized, shall I say, is better? This, perhaps, is too much for me to understand. Return to men, see both as men. Ananias baptized Paul. Ananias was better than Paul. Never was the fruit better than the tree. For the tree produces fruit, it is not produced by the fruit. The Donatists are proven to boast themselves for Christ. Do you not see what you are taking upon yourself? The Lord himself said, "Many will come in my name saying, I am Christ." Many erring and deceiving ones have come in the name of Christ; we have heard none saying, I am Christ. Countless heretics have come all in the name of Christ, that is, they have come cloaked in the name of Christ, whitening a mudded wall with a splendid name, and we have heard none saying, I am Christ. What then? Did the Lord not know what He foretold? Or rather, did He awaken us from slumber to understand these secrets themselves, to search and knock, so that what is covered may be opened to us, and with the cover removed, we are submitted to the Lord, that just as that paralytic, we deserve to be healed by the Lord? We have indeed found these saying, I am Christ: not in these words, but what is worse, in deeds. Not with the audacity of those words. For who hears them? Who, so foolish as to admit deceived, admits such into his ears or heart? If he says to him who is to baptize him, I am Christ: he turns his face away from him, abandons the man’s apparent arrogance, seeks the grace of God. Therefore, not thus with those words, I am Christ. But in another way, I am Christ; see how. Christ heals, Christ cleanses, Christ justifies: man does not justify. What is to justify? To make just. Just as to mortify is to make dead; to vivify, to make alive: so to justify, to make just. Behold from the side a certain baptizer, not entering through the door, but descending through the wall; not a pastor and guard, but a thief and robber; from the side he says: I baptize. If as a minister, I dare: do not add; whatever more is from evil is. And yet he adds, he does not doubt. What does he add? I justify, I make someone just. This is truly, I am the good tree, from me let him be born who wishes to be a good fruit. Just a little, if you accept wisely, listen; they are few words, and if I am not mistaken, they are clear. So, do you justify, you make just? Therefore, he says, let him believe in you whom you justify. Say, dare to say, Believe in me; who do not doubt to say, You are justified by me. He is troubled, he wavers, he excuses. For what need is there, he says, to tell him, Believe in me? I say, Believe in Christ. You hesitated, you doubted: to some extent you have condescended to us. You have admitted something, from which you may be healed. You said something correct, from which your other wrongs may be corrected. Now listen not to me, but to yourself. For you certainly do not dare say, Believe in me. Far be it, he says. And yet you dare to say, I justify you. Listen, and learn, since you do not dare say, Believe in me; therefore, you ought not to dare say, I justify you. The Apostle speaks, to whom you yield, whether you will or not, you are subjected. For not to the Apostle as to a man, but to Him of whom the Apostle speaks: Do you wish to receive proof of Christ who speaks in me?

Therefore, listen not to the Apostle, but to Christ through the Apostle. What does the Apostle say? To him who believes in Him who justifies the ungodly, his faith is reckoned as righteousness. Attend, I beseech you; see how plain it is, how open it is: To him who believes in Him who justifies the ungodly, his faith is reckoned as righteousness. Whoever believes in Him who justifies the ungodly, who makes the ungodly pious: therefore, whoever believes in Him who justifies the ungodly, who makes just him who was ungodly, his faith is reckoned as righteousness. Now say, if you dare, I justify you. See how I have responded to you from the Apostle: If you justify me, I will believe in you; because to him who believes in Him who justifies the ungodly, his faith is reckoned as righteousness. You justify me? I will believe in you. For if you justify me, I will be one who believes in him who justifies me, that is, who justifies the ungodly: I believe securely, because my faith is reckoned as righteousness. Therefore, if you do not dare say, I justify you; rather, if you do not dare say, Believe in me: beware now lest you say, I justify you. Ruined, I have found you; lest you lose both me and yourself. The place in the Gospel about the tree and its fruit, how it is to be understood. For concerning what you proposed about the tree and the fruit, I propose to you something from examples, so that you may learn to understand what was said: A good tree produces good fruits, and an evil tree produces evil fruits. For I understand it thus, as the Lord Himself explains it. What is: A good tree produces good fruits? A good man out of the good treasure of his heart brings forth good things; and an evil man out of the evil treasure of his heart brings forth evil things. He placed men as trees and actions as treasures. Just as a man is, so are his actions. If a man is good, he has good actions; if a man is evil, he has evil actions: a good man cannot have evil actions, nor can an evil man have good actions. What could be clearer? What could be more evident? What could be more manifest? Yet now you make yourself a good tree who baptizes, and the one whom you baptize is the fruit; so that just as you are, so he may be. But it is far from that, and see how perversely you understand. Among you there was, or has been at some time, an adulterer or someone hidden. But what I do not know, he says, does not contaminate me. That’s not my point; it is another question: I want to say something about Baptism; for that is what we have taken up. He is a hidden adulterer: therefore, he is false; not a false adulterer, but a true adulterer, falsely chaste. Therefore, that adulterous man, false man, and more false because he hides; for if he were an open adulterer, he would no longer be false: therefore the Holy Spirit will surely flee from that adulterer. Indeed, the clear sentence is pronounced: For the Holy Spirit of discipline will flee deceit. Since he is a hidden adulterer, he surely baptizes. Here, I see a man baptized by a hidden adulterer: a fruit is born; where is the good tree? He is baptized, he is innocent, remission of sins has taken place in him; therefore the ungodly is justified, a good fruit is born; I inquire from what tree? Tell, answer me: that tree is a hidden adulterer, it is an evil tree; if this is the fruit of this tree, it is an evil fruit. It is said by the Lord: An evil tree produces evil fruits. You will respond that to commend this fruit as good, it is not born from that tree. For because you do not know that tree is evil, it is not therefore evil: it is worse as it is more unknown. For it is more unknown as it more cunningly hides its deed. For if he were an open adulterer, he might be healable by confession. A worst tree, and yet behold a good fruit. Where born from? Or perhaps not born? Born, you say. I inquire from where: what will you say? Whence is this born? There is nothing to say but, From God: I do not know if he would say anything other than, From God. If he said this about all, and did not make himself a good tree while being evil, pretending to be good, and made himself worse, he would say of all that they are born of God; he has the evident sentence of the Gospel: He gave them power to become children of God, who are born not of blood, nor of the will of man, nor of the will of flesh, but of God. Therefore return to this one: born of God? From God. Why this one from God? Because a good fruit could not be born from an evil tree. A chaste baptizer is a good tree, he is not false; truly the chaste one baptized, a good fruit is born from a good tree. Behold, also this good fruit, from what tree was it born? Say from an evil tree, if you dare. I do not dare, he says. Therefore, also from a good tree? From a good tree. From which good tree? From God. What about that one? From a chaste man. Pay a little attention: let us understand what we are saying. This one baptized by a chaste man, from a good tree, that is, from a good man, a good fruit is born. That one baptized by a hidden adulterer, from an evil tree, what fruit is born? A good one. It cannot be. If the fruit is good: then change the tree. You acknowledge this good fruit, that man is evil because he is a hidden adulterer: a tree for this fruit must be changed. I have changed, you say: therefore, I said: From God. Now compare these two born ones: that one was baptized by a manifest chaste man; this one by a hidden adulterer: that one born of a man, this one born of God. Therefore, this one was more happily born from a hidden adulterer, than that one from a manifest chaste man. From the words of John and the Apostle he refutes the Donatists.

It is better, therefore, to listen to John, O heretic; it is better to listen to the forerunner who came again; it is better to listen to the humble one, O proud one; it is better to listen to the burning lamp, O extinguished lamp. Hear John when they came to him: "I indeed baptize you in water." And you, if you recognize yourself, are a minister of water. "I," he says, "baptize you in water; but he who will come is greater than I." How much greater is he than you? "I am not worthy to loosen the strap of his sandal." How much would he humble himself if he said he was worthy? He did not even say he was worthy to loosen the strap of the sandal. He himself is the one who baptizes in the Holy Spirit. Why do you set yourself up for Christ? He himself baptizes in the Holy Spirit. Therefore, he himself justifies. What do you say? "I baptize in the Holy Spirit, I justify." Certainly, you do not say, "I am Christ"? Surely you are not among those of whom it was said: "Many will come in my name saying, ‘I am Christ’"? You are caught; and if only you may be found as caught, not perishing without being caught. It is good to be caught in the nets of truth for the great king's feast. Therefore, do not say again, "I justify, I sanctify," lest you be found to say, "I am Christ." Rather, say that you are a friend of the bridegroom, not wanting to boast as the bridegroom: "Neither the one who plants nor the one who waters is anything, but only God who gives the increase." Listen also to him, the friend of the bridegroom, about whom we are speaking. Certainly, he had disciples with Christ and was not a disciple of Christ: listen to him confessing himself a disciple of Christ. See him among Christ’s disciples, and the more certain as he is more humble; the more humble, the greater. See him fulfilling what is written: "The greater you are, humble yourself in all things, and you will find grace before God." He already said: "I am not worthy to loosen the strap of the sandal"; but he did not demonstrate himself as a disciple in this. "He who comes from heaven," he says, "is above all; we all have received from his fullness." Therefore, he was also among the disciples, who gathered disciples with Christ. Listen more openly to him confessing himself a disciple: "He who has the bride is the bridegroom; but the friend of the bridegroom, who stands and hears him, rejoices greatly." And he stands because he hears him. He stands and hears; for if he does not hear, he falls. Rightfully, he says: "You will give me the joy and gladness of hearing." What does "hearing him" mean? To hear him, not to want to be heard in his place. And so that we may know that in what he hears him, he commends humility: when he said: "You will give me the joy and gladness of hearing," he immediately added, "and the bones that have been humbled will exult." Therefore, he stands and hears him. The bones that have been humbled will exult because the haughty are broken. No slave can assume the power of the Lord for himself. Let him rejoice to be in the household, and if he is a overseer, let him give food to his fellow servants in due time; but from what he lives, not that they live from him. For what does it mean to give food in due time, but to offer Christ, praise Christ, commend Christ, preach Christ? This is to give food in due time. For to be Christ himself, the food of his animals, he was born and placed in a manger.

Sermons - Sermon 293

SERMO 293 On the Birthday of John the Baptist Comparison of John and Christ in their birth.

Saint John, whose nativity we marveled at while the Gospel was being read, we celebrate his feast today. How great is the glory of the judge, if the herald's is so great? What will the coming way be like, if such is the one who prepares the way? The Church observes the nativity of John in a certain sanctified way: no father is found, the nativity of whom we solemnly celebrate: we celebrate John's, we also celebrate Christ's: this cannot be for naught, and if by chance it is not fully explained by us due to the dignity of such a great event, it is, nonetheless, more fruitfully and deeply considered. John is born of an old barren woman, Christ is born of a young virgin. Sterility gives birth to John, integrity to Christ. At the birth of John, the age of his parents was not suitable, at the birth of Christ marital union did not exist. One is announced by an angel's proclamation, the other is conceived by an angel's announcement. John's birth is not believed, and his father becomes mute: Christ is believed in and conceived by faith. The coming of faith first occurs in the heart of the virgin, and fruitfulness follows in the womb of the mother. And yet nearly the same words are spoken by Zechariah when the angel announced John: "How shall I know this? For I am an old man, and my wife is advanced in years," and by the holy Mary when the angel announced her future birth, "How shall this be, since I do not know a man?" Nearly the same words. To the former it is said: "Behold, you will be silent and unable to speak until the day these things take place, because you did not believe my words, which will be fulfilled in their time." To the latter: "The Holy Spirit will come upon you, and the power of the Highest will overshadow you; therefore the Holy one who is to be born will be called the Son of God." He is reproved, she is instructed. To him it is said, "Because you did not believe;" to her it is said, "Receive what you asked." The words are almost the same: "How shall I know this?" and "How shall this be?" But He who heard the words and saw the heart was not deceived. In the words of both, the thought lay hidden; but it was hidden from men, not from the angel: indeed, not from Him who spoke through the angel. Finally, John is born when the light begins to decrease and the night begins to grow: Christ is born when the night begins to diminish and the day increases. And as if looking at this sign of the nativity of both, John himself says: "He must increase, but I must decrease." We have set forth what is to be inquired and discussed: but I have spoken this beforehand, and if we are not sufficient to search through all the depths of such a mystery, either through ability or time, He who speaks in you, even when we are absent, will better teach you, whom you piously think upon, whom you have received in your heart, of whom you have been made temples.

John is a certain boundary of the Old and New Testament. Therefore, he is born of old people, and he exults in the womb. The mouth of Zechariah is first closed, and afterward opened.

Therefore, it seems that John is a certain intermediate boundary between the two Testaments, the old and the new. For, as I said, the Lord Himself bears witness that he is in some way a boundary, saying: The Law and the Prophets were until John the Baptist. Hence, he holds the persona of antiquity and the herald of newness. Because of the persona of antiquity, he is born of old parents; because of the persona of newness, he is declared a prophet in the womb of his mother. For even before birth, he leaped in his mother’s womb at the arrival of holy Mary. He was already designated there, designated before he was born: shown to be the forerunner of Him whom he would precede, before he was seen by Him. These are divine matters and exceed the measure of human frailty. Finally, he is born, receives a name, and his father’s tongue is loosed. Relate what happened to the significant image of things: only that what happened may not be regarded as not having happened, because you might wonder what it signified. What happened, refer it to the significance of things, and see the great mystery. Zacharias is silent, and loses his voice, until John, the forerunner of the Lord, is born, and he opens his voice. What is Zacharias' silence, if not prophecy hidden, and before the preaching of Christ in some way concealed and closed? It is opened by His advent, made clear by His coming, who was prophesied. This is the opening of Zacharias' voice at John's birth, just as it is the tearing of the veil at Christ's crucifixion. If John were announcing himself, Zacharias’ mouth would not open. The tongue is loosed because the voice is born: for it was said to John already announcing the Lord: Who are you? And he answered: I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness. The voice John, the Word Christ. The voice thought to be the Word. The voice of John, however, the Lord was the Word in the beginning. John is a voice for a time, Christ is the eternal Word in the beginning. Take away the word, what is the voice? Where there is no understanding, the sound is empty. The voice without the word strikes the ear, but does not build up the heart. Nevertheless, in building up within our own heart, let us observe the order of things. If I think about what I am going to say, already the word is in my heart: but wishing to speak to you, I seek how it may also be in your heart, what is already in mine. Seeking how it may reach you, and reside in your heart the word that is already in my heart, I take up the voice, and with the assumed voice I speak to you: the sound of the voice leads to you the understanding of the word: and when the sound of the voice has led to you the understanding of the word, indeed the sound itself passes away; but the word which the sound has brought to you remains now in your heart, nor has it departed from mine. Therefore, the sound, after transferring the word to you, does it not seem to say itself: He must increase, but I must decrease? The sound of the voice has served its purpose, and has passed away, as if it were saying: This joy of mine is fulfilled. Let us hold on to the word, let us not lose the word deeply conceived. Do you wish to see the voice passing by, and the divinity of the Word remaining? Where now is the baptism of John? It served its purpose, and has passed away. The baptism of Christ is now frequently administered. We all believe in Christ, we hope for salvation in Christ: the voice has resounded this. For since it is difficult to distinguish the word from the voice, John himself was thought to be Christ. The voice was thought to be the word: but the voice recognized itself, lest it offend the word. I am not, he said: the Christ, nor Elijah, nor the prophet. He was asked: Who then are you? He said, I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare the way of the Lord. The voice of one crying in the wilderness, the voice breaking silence. Prepare the way of the Lord, as if he were saying, I sound for this reason, that I may bring him into the heart: but into what he deigns not to come, unless you prepare the way for him. What is it to prepare the way; if not, to pray fittingly? What is it to prepare the way; if not, to think humbly? Take from him the example of humility. He is thought to be Christ, he says he is not what he is thought to be, nor does he arrogantly take up the mistake for his own glory. If he had said: I am the Christ; how easily he would have been believed, who was already believed before he said it? He did not say it: he recognized himself, distinguished himself, humbled himself. He saw where he had salvation: he understood himself to be the lamp, and feared to be extinguished by the wind of pride.

Why was a man sent to bear witness to Christ of such great grace? For this disposition pleased God, that a man of such great grace should bear witness to Christ, who could be thought to be Christ. Indeed, among those born of women, as Christ himself said, no one has arisen greater than John the Baptist. If no man was greater than this man, he who is greater than him is more than a man. Great is the testimony of Christ about himself, but to inflamed and weak eyes, the day bears little witness of itself. Weak eyes shun the day, they bear a lamp. Therefore, the coming day preceded the lamp. But in the hearts of the faithful, a lamp was sent beforehand, to confound the hearts of the unfaithful. "I have prepared," he says, "a lamp for my Christ": God the Father speaking in prophecy: "I have prepared a lamp for my Christ": John, the herald for the Savior, the forerunner for the coming judge, the future friend of the bridegroom. "I have prepared," he says, "a lamp for my Christ." Why did you prepare it? "I will clothe his enemies with shame: but upon him, my sanctification shall blossom." How were his enemies clothed with shame through this lamp? Let us scrutinize the Gospel. The Jews, accusing the Lord, said: "By what power do you do these things? If you are the Christ, tell us plainly." They sought a cause, not faith; whence they might lay traps, not whence they might be freed. Indeed, he who saw their hearts, observe what he answered to confound them through the lamp. "I also will ask you one question," he says: "Tell me, the baptism of John, was it from heaven or from men?" They were immediately struck, and though the day shone faintly, they were compelled to grope, as they could not look upon that brightness, they fled to the darkness of their own hearts, and there began to be troubled among themselves, stumbling and falling. "If we say," they thought among themselves, "where they reasoned, but which he saw: "If we say, from heaven, he will say to us, 'Why then did you not believe him?' For he had borne testimony to Christ the Lord. But if we say, from men, the people will stone us, for John was held as a great prophet." And they said, "We do not know." You do not know; you are in darkness, you lose the light. For how much better if perhaps there is darkness in the human heart, to admit the light, not to lose it. When they said, "We do not know," the Lord said, "Neither do I tell you by what power I do these things. For I know with what heart you said, 'We do not know,' not wanting to be taught, but fearing to confess."

Christ, God hidden in flesh. This divine dispensation; as much as a man can investigate, better the better, inferior the inferior; this divine dispensation intimates to us a great sacrament. For Christ was about to come in the flesh, not just anyone, not an angel, not a messenger; but He Himself coming will save them. It was not just anyone who was to come: and yet how was He about to come? To be born in mortal flesh, to become a small infant, to be placed in a manger, to be wrapped in swaddling clothes, to be nourished with milk, to grow through ages, and finally even to be killed by death. These, therefore, are all signs of humility and the form of great humility. Whose humility is this? That of the Exalted One. How exalted? Do not seek on the earth, transcend even the stars. When you come to the celestial armies of the Angels, you will hear from them, "Pass even beyond us." When you come to Thrones, Dominions, Principalities, Powers, you will hear, "Pass even beyond us"; and we have been created: All things were made through Him. Transcend the entire creation; whatever is created, whatever is instituted, whatever is mutable, whether corporeal or incorporeal, transcend all. Seeing you cannot yet achieve, transcend by believing: reach the Creator through faith, which precedes you, leading you, reach the Creator. There see: In the beginning was the Word. For it was not made at any time: but in the beginning it was. Not like a creature, of which it is said: In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth. What was in the beginning, there was never a time when it was not. Therefore, what was in the beginning, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God: and all things were made through Him, and without Him nothing was made: and in Him was life, which was made, it came to us. To whom? To the worthy? By no means: but to the unworthy. For Christ died for the ungodly, and the undeserving, but worthy. For we are undeserving of His mercy; but He is worthy who would have mercy, to whom it would be said: For your mercy's sake, Lord, deliver us. Not because of our preceding merits, but for your mercy's sake, Lord, deliver us; and be merciful to our sins for your name's sake, not for our merit. For not because of the merit of sins, but for your name's sake. For the merit of sins, assuredly not a reward, but a punishment. Therefore, for your name's sake. Behold to whom He came, behold how great He came. How did He come to us? Truly, the Word became flesh, and dwelled among us. For if He had come in His divinity alone, who could bear Him? who could receive Him? who could accept Him? But He took what we were, that we might not remain what we were: but what we were by nature, not by guilt. For indeed, to men, He became man, but not to sinners, a sinner. Of these two, human nature and human guilt, He accepted one, He healed the other. For if He had taken our iniquity, He too would have sought a savior. Yet He took to bear and heal it, not to have it: and He appeared as a man among men, God hidden.

It was necessary for God hidden in the flesh to have the testimony of a man, than whom there was no greater. John, having disciples just like Christ, becomes a more credible witness of Christ.

Who, then, shall bear witness to this day hidden in a certain cloud of flesh? Give a lamp, let it bear witness to the day: but increase this lamp, so that whoever is greater than it may be the day. Among those born of women, there has not arisen anyone greater than John the Baptist. O ineffable dispensation! Brothers, when I think on these things, I am greatly amazed at what John says about Christ, bearing witness in the gospel: I am not worthy, he says, to loosen the strap of His sandal. What can be said more humble? What more exalted than Christ? What more lowly than one crucified? He who has the bride is the bridegroom; but the friend of the bridegroom stands and hears him, and rejoices greatly because of the bridegroom's voice, not because of his own. We, he says, have all received from His fullness. How great things he speaks about Christ, how sublime! How exalted! How worthy! If, however, anything worthy can be said about Him by anyone. And yet he does not walk among the disciples of the Lord, he did not follow Him like Peter, like Andrew, like John, like the others. But he also gathered disciples to himself, and while the Lord was present with His disciples, John also had his own disciples. They were called the disciples of John. It was said to the Lord Himself: Why do the disciples of John fast, but your disciples do not fast? This was undoubtedly necessary for a faithful forerunner, that Christ should be proclaimed by him who might be thought his rival. John had disciples, Christ had disciples: he taught as if from outside, but adhered as a witness. Therefore, among those born of women, no one has arisen greater than John the Baptist. There were prophets, they had disciples, but not in the presence of Christ. There were great apostles afterward, but because they were disciples of Christ, not because they could have disciples with Christ. He has disciples, he gathers them, he baptizes: what do we think? Outside, or inside? Rather, in reality inside, so that he might be liberated by God as a man; seemingly outside, so that he might be believed as a witness. Attend to this very point: Peter, Andrew, John, and others bore witness to the Lord, for instance, when it was said to them, You praise whom you follow, you proclaim whom you cling to. Let the lamp come to confound the enemies, gather the disciples. Christ has disciples, John has disciples. Christ baptizes, John baptizes; and they come to John and say to him: He to whom you bore witness, behold, He baptizes, and all are going to Him, so that possibly, out of envy, he might say something bad about Christ. But there the lamp burns more safely, there it shines more brightly, there it is invigorated, the more distinctly, the more securely. Now, he says, I told you, that I am not the Christ. He who has the bride is the bridegroom; He who comes from heaven is above all. Then, those believing Christ marveled, but the enemies were confounded, when in a certain way he who could be thought to envy was compelled to preach. For the servant is compelled to acknowledge the Lord, the creature is compelled to bear witness to the Creator: not compelled, but does it willingly. For he is a friend, not an envious rival: not jealous for himself, but for the bridegroom. In the wedding of Christ, John is the groomsman. Christ is the mediator insofar as He is human. The friends of the bridegroom do this; and there is a certain solemnity in human weddings, that besides other friends, an inner friend, the paranymph, is summoned, aware of the secret of the chamber. But here it matters, and indeed it matters a lot. In human weddings, a man is the paranymph for a man; this is what John is to Christ, and the same God Christ is the bridegroom, the mediator of God and men; but in so far as He is a man. For in so far as He is God, He is not a mediator, but equal to the Father, the same as the Father, one God with the Father. When would this sublime mediation exist, from which we were lying far apart? That He might be a mediator, He assumed something that He was not: but that we might reach, He remained what He was. Behold, God above us, behold, we below Him, and many spaces lie between, especially the gap of sin which separates and casts us far away. In such a great distance, when we had to come to God, by what means would we come? God Himself remains God; man approaches God, and they become one person, so that it is not a semi-god, God in part, and man in part; but wholly God and wholly man: God the liberator, man the mediator; so that through Him to Him, not through another, nor not to Him; but through what we are in Him, to Him through whom we were made. Therefore the Apostle, although he knew Christ as God: for he himself said of Him, when speaking of the preceding merits of the Jews: whose are the fathers, and from whom Christ according to the flesh, who is over all, God blessed forever: when therefore he knew Him as God, and God over all; and thus certainly over all, because all things were made through Him; it comes about that he would commend the mediator, and did not say God; for He is not a mediator in that He is God; but a mediator because He became man. This is our liberation. For there is one God. For when you hear, O Catholics, you hear instructed, you hear vigilantly: one God: is it only the Father? Is it only the Son? Is it only the Holy Spirit? But certainly the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are one God. Therefore: one God, and one mediator of God and men, the man Christ Jesus. If he had said, one God, and one mediator of God and men, Jesus Christ; He would be understood as a lesser God. For indeed He would be separated from that deity of the Trinity, if one God, one and mediator of God and men, Jesus Christ, would be said, as if not He who is called one God. But because in the unity of God, there are the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit: divinity holds the unity, humanity assumes the mediation. The grace of the mediator is necessary for all, so that they may be reconciled to God. By this mediation, the whole mass of humanity, which was alienated from God through Adam, is reconciled to God. For through Adam, sin entered the world, and through sin, death; and so death passed upon all men, in whom all sinned. Who would be rescued from this? Who would be distinguished from this mass of wrath to mercy? For who distinguishes you? What do you have that you did not receive? Hence, our merits do not distinguish us, but grace does. For if it were by merits, it would be a debt: if it were a debt, it would not be free: if it were not free, it would not be grace. This the Apostle himself said: But if it is by grace, it is no longer by works; otherwise grace is no longer grace. Through one we are saved, the great and the small, the old and the young, the little ones and the infants; through one we are saved. For there is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus. Through one man came death, and through one came the resurrection of the dead. As in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive.

All in Adam and all in Christ.

Here someone comes up and says to me: How all? Those who are to be sent into Gehenna, who will be condemned with the devil, who will be tormented with eternal fires? How all and all? Because no one comes to death except through Adam, no one comes to life except through Christ. If there were another through whom we come to death, not all would die in Adam. If there were another through whom we come to life, not all would be made alive in Christ.

Even infants themselves need a liberator.

What then, someone says, does an infant also need a savior? Clearly he does: the proof is the mother faithfully running with the little one to be baptized in the church. The proof is the Church itself receiving the infant to be washed, and either to be released already liberated or to be nurtured with piety. Who would dare to speak a testimony against such a great mother? Finally, even in the infant itself, the testimony of its misery is its crying. As much as it can, the weak nature testifies, understanding little; it does not begin with laughter, it begins with weeping. Recognize the miserable one, extend help. Let all be clothed in the bowels of mercy. The less they can do for themselves, the more mercifully let us speak for the little ones. The Church is accustomed to provide help to orphans for the protection of their affairs: let us all speak for the little ones, let help be provided to them by everyone, lest they lose the heavenly inheritance. And for their sake, the Lord himself became a little one. How did those who first deserved to be killed for him not pertain to his liberation?

Christ is also for little children Jesus, that is, Savior.

Finally, regarding the Lord Savior Himself, when His birth was near to being foretold, it was said: "They will call His name Jesus, for He will save His people from their sins." We hold onto Jesus, we have the interpretation of this name. Why Jesus, which in Latin is called "Savior," why Jesus? For He will save His people. But Moses saved his people with a mighty hand and with the assistance of the Most High from the persecution and domination of the Egyptians; Joshua, the son of Nun, saved his people from persecutors' wars with the nations; the judges saved the people, delivering them from the Philistines; and the kings saved them from the rule of surrounding nations that barked against them. Jesus does not save in this manner, but from their sins. They will call His name Jesus. Why? For He will save His people. From what? From their sins. Now I inquire of the little one, brought to the church to become a Christian, to be baptized, I think it is so that he might be in the people of Jesus. Which Jesus? Who saves His people from their sins. If he has nothing in him to be saved, he should be removed from here. Why do we not say to the mothers, Remove these little ones from here? For Jesus is indeed a savior: if these have nothing in them to be saved, remove them from here. The physician is not needed for the healthy, but for those who are sick. Would anyone dare to say to me in this little one's peril, To me is Jesus, to this one is not Jesus? Therefore, is there Jesus for you, and is there no Jesus for this one? Has he not come to Jesus? Is he not answered for so that he may believe in Jesus? Are we instituting another baptism for little ones, in which there is no remission of sins? Certainly, if this little one could speak for himself, he would refute the voice of the objector and cry out: Give me the life of Christ; in Adam, I died; give me the life of Christ, in whose sight there is no world, nor is the life of one day on the earth present. Grace would not be denied to these, nor would the giver of his own. Let mercy be extended to the wretched. Why is their innocence excessively praised? Let him find the Savior before they even feel the flatterer. Clearly, in such great danger to the infants, we must not even dispute, lest we seem to delay their salvation by disputing. Let him be brought, washed, freed, enlivened. As in Adam all die, so also in Christ all will be made alive. He did not find a way to come into the life of this age except through Adam; he will not find a way to escape the punishment of the future age except through Christ. Why do you close the only door? For there is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus. Hear, He cries out to you: The physician is not needed for the healthy, but for those who are sick. Why do you call this one healthy unless you are contradicting the physician?

John, born with sin, needed a savior.

"So, he said, did John, about whom you spoke, be born with sin? Clearly, you found one born without sin, whom you find born without Adam. You cannot tear this understanding from the hands of the faithful: 'Through one man came death, and through one comes the resurrection of the dead. As in Adam all die, so also in Christ all shall be made alive. Through one man sin entered into the world, and through sin death, and so it passed to all men. If these were my words, could this understanding be said more expressively by me? Could it be more evidently? Could it be more fully? Thus it passed to all men, in whom all have sinned. Now you exclude John: if you separate him from men, if you separate him from that path of human propagation, if you separate him from the union of male and female, you will also separate him from this understanding. For he who wished to be separated from it, chose to come through a virgin. Why do you compel me to dispute John’s merits? He saluted the Lord in the womb: but I suppose that he saluted Him from whom he sought salvation. He does not seek your most pernicious defense. When the Lord came to his baptism, conscious of common frailty he said: 'I ought to be baptized by you.' For the Lord came indeed to commend humility even in baptism, to consecrate the sacrament itself. For he took baptism as a young man, just as he took circumcision as an infant. He took the remedies to be commended, not the wounds. But why would he say: 'I ought to be baptized by you,' utterly free from all guilt, if there were not in him what needed to be healed, if there were not in him what needed to be purified? He calls himself a debtor, and you absolve him, lest his debts be forgiven. 'I ought,' he says, 'to be baptized by you: I need it, it is necessary for me.' And this was granted to him there. For when the Lord was in the water, he was not exempt from the water. What more can be said? Let the contrary disputant cease henceforth, if it be possible, for the Savior himself liberated even his own herald."

Sermons - Sermon 293A augm

Sermon 293/A augmented Sermon of Saint Augustine on the day of the birth of Saint John the Baptist both of voice and word Augustine speaks the sermon by obeying the will of God.

Since the Lord has willed on this day to return to your charity our voice and presence - and He has done this not according to our disposition, but according to His will -, we give thanks to Him with you and render to you the service of a sermon, which is our ministry, in which it is both necessary and fitting for us to serve you. However, it is yours, dearest ones, to receive with charity the dispensation of whatever servants of God and to give thanks with us to Him, who has granted us this day to act together with you. The gifts of God bestowed upon John the Baptist are recounted. So where then shall we speak today, if not of him whose birthday is today? John the holy one, born of a sterile woman, precursor of the Lord born of a virgin, became the herald of his Lord from the womb, the announcer after the womb. The sterile woman who could not bear a child, the virgin from whom childbirth was not possible: the sterile woman gave birth to the herald, the virgin to the judge. But the Lord Jesus Christ himself, coming from the womb of a virgin, sent many heralds before him to men. All the prophets were sent by him, but he spoke in them, who came after them; yet he was before them. When therefore the Lord sent many heralds before himself, what did this one deserve so much, what superior excellence did he have, whose birthday is commended to us today? For neither is this without a sign of some greatness, that his birthday is not hidden, just as the birthday of his Lord is not hidden. We do not know when other prophets were born; it was not permissible to not know about John. Indeed this is also great for him, because other prophets foretold the Lord and desired to see him and did not see, and if they saw in the spirit, they saw him as future; but they were not here present to see him. However, the Lord himself said of them to his disciples, because many prophets and righteous men desired to see what you see, and did not see it, and to hear what you hear, and did not hear it. Did he not send them? But in all there was a desire, if it were possible, to see Christ here in the flesh. But since they preceded him by dying, as they preceded by being born, Christ did not find them here, yet Christ redeemed them for eternal life. And to know what kind of desire was here to see Christ, remember that old man Simeon, to whom the Spirit of God announced it as no small good, that he would not leave this world before he had seen Christ. Christ was born: he recognized the infant in the hands of the mother, received him, held him in his hands, by whose divinity he himself was carried; and holding the infant Word in his hands, he blessed God saying: Now you dismiss your servant, Lord, in peace, for my eyes have seen your salvation. So other prophets did not see him here: Simeon saw the infant; John recognized and greeted him as conceived, announced and saw him as a young man. Therefore, this one is more excellent than all the others.

Christ is greater than John.

Hear also from him about the Lord's testimony: he preferred him above all others. He was very great, to whom no one was preferred except Christ. Therefore, the Lord himself says thus: Among those born of women there has not risen a greater than John the Baptist. And to prefer himself above him: But he who is least in the kingdom of heaven, he says, is greater than he. He said he was both lesser and greater: lesser in being born, greater in ruling. For the Lord was born after him, but in the flesh, but from a virgin; however, before him, in the beginning was the Word. A great thing: John after Christ. For all things were made by him, and without him was not anything made. Why then did John come? To show the way of humility, so that the presumption of man might be diminished, the glory of God increased. Therefore, John came great, commending the great; John came, the measure of man. What is the measure of man? No man could be more than John; whatever was more than John was already more than man. For if the measure of human greatness had been ended in John, you would no longer find a greater man, and yet you found a greater one: confess God, whom you were able to find greater than a perfect man. John was a man and Christ was a man, but John was only a man, Christ was God and man. According to his nature as God, he made John; according to his nature as man, he was born after John. On the humility of the forerunner.

Yet behold how that forerunner of his Lord, God and man, humbles himself. He, than whom no one born of women has arisen greater, is asked whether he is the Christ. So great was he that men could be deceived. There was doubt concerning him, whether he was the Christ; and so there was doubt that he was questioned. Now, if he had been the son of pride, not the teacher of humility, he would not have opposed the erring men and would not have acted so that they might think it, but he would have accepted what they thought. Perhaps it was too much for him to want to persuade men that he was the Christ? If he tried to persuade and was not believed, he would have remained cast down and dejected, and scorned among men and condemned before God. But he did not need to persuade men, he already saw that they thought this: he could have accepted their error and increased his own honor. But far be it from the faithful friend of the bridegroom to wish that he be loved by the bride instead of him. He confessed that he was not what he was not, so that he would not lose what he was. For John was not the bridegroom. For when he was questioned, he said this: He who has the bride is the bridegroom; but the friend of the bridegroom, who stands and hears him, rejoices greatly because of the bridegroom’s voice. I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance: but he who comes after me is mightier than I. How much mightier? Whose shoe’s latchet I am not worthy to unloose. See how much less he was if he was worthy; how humble he would be if he said this: "He is mightier than I, whose shoe’s latchet I am worthy to unloose"; for he would have said that he was worthy to bow at his feet. But now how high he commended it, when he said he was unworthy even of his feet, indeed even of his shoes! He came therefore to teach the proud humility, to announce the way of repentance.

Christ, the Word of God. A voice comes before the word. How is a voice before the word? What is said about Christ? In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God, and the word was God; this was in the beginning with God. But so that the Word might come to us, the Word was made flesh, so that it might dwell among us. Therefore, because we have heard Christ the Word; because John is the voice, let us listen. While it was said to him: Who are you? he replied: I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness. Therefore, beloved, let us briefly, briefly, as the Lord gives, discuss the voice and the word. Christ is the Word, the word that does not sound and pass away; for a sound that passes away is the voice, not the word. Therefore, the Word of God, through which all things were made, is our Lord Jesus Christ; John's voice is crying in the wilderness. Which is first? The voice or the word? Let us see what the word is and what the voice is, and there we will see which is first. On the word of man and on the Word of God.

What do you think the word is, brothers? Let us leave aside the Word of God; let us talk for a moment about our words, if we can take some steps from lower things to higher ones by way of comparison. The Word of God, by which all things were made, who comprehends it? Who is worthy even to think about it, let alone speak of it? Therefore, let us set aside a little of that majesty, that ineffable eternity, and co-eternity with the Father; let us believe what we do not see, so that by believing we may deserve to see. Behold, let us discuss this word, as though of a matter which is daily engaged either in our hearts, or in our ears, or in our mouths. What is a word? Do we now think that this is the word which sounds into your ears? The word is that which you intend to say. You have conceived something in your heart to say: this conception is already a word made in your heart, but this word, that is, what you intend to say, the conception made in your heart, that which you have undertaken to express, you already know it, and it has been said within you. Let that Word which is the Son of God be present, so that I may declare to your ears what He has deigned to bestow upon our hearts to conceive, as is fitting. But if perchance I, unequal and infirm according to the magnitude of the subject, should fail and not express it as it is worthy, you have someone else to turn to from me: the Son of God Himself, the Word of God, may He reside in your hearts and fulfill within by speaking with you there, what I, as a man, could not fulfill in your ears. Nevertheless, assist my effort with your earnestness and prayer for me, so that I may be able to speak, and for you, that you may deserve to hear.

One word is expressed with many voices. The word, therefore, is, as we have said, that which you have conceived in your heart to say, the thing itself which you wish to say, conceived in the heart to be spoken, is called a word. Therefore, when you have conceived the thing which you wish to say, and the word itself, the very thought, has been made in your heart, you consider to whom you speak and to whom you wish to say it; and if you see a Greek person, you seek a Greek word in which to evoke the word; if you see a Latin person, you seek a Latin word in which to speak the word; if you see a Hebrew person, a Hebrew word; if you see a Punic person, a Punic word, if you know these languages. But if you do not know, when you see someone standing before you who knows only the language you do not know, you do not fail in the word, you fail in the voice. Therefore, the word which you conceived in your heart preceded all voices and was before all voices, before Greek, before Latin, before Hebrew, before Punic, and whatever languages and whatever voices there are throughout the world, that conception preceded them, and was carried by the soul bearing it, the fetus of the soul, and how it would be expressed was sought, since it could not be expressed to another what was already held in the heart, except through some voice. However, that voice, unless it were distinct, how could it be recognized? The voice had to be distinguished by the diversity of languages, so that you speak Greek to a Greek, Hebrew to a Hebrew, Punic to a Punic. However, that word which you conceived before all voices was neither Latin nor Greek nor Punic nor anything like that. Consider, therefore, the great mystery. Indeed, if you were completely silent, would that mean the word in your heart would not live, and if there were no one to whom you could speak, would what you conceived in your heart lie open to you? It would indeed lie open without any difference in language in a simple knowledge.

God transcends human words.

Let us speak something by way of example, so that it may become clearer. God is a certain reality above all that He made, if indeed it is to be called a reality; therefore, God is something transcending all that He made, from whom and in whom and through whom all things exist. Is it so that all this which I have said, which is God, are two syllables, and all that great power is confined to these two syllables? But God was there even before I conceived this in my heart. How could I say this very thing as "God"? What in Latin is called "Deus," in Greek is called "theos," in Punic is called "ylim"—I have mentioned three languages—what I conceived in my heart was none of those languages; but when I wanted to express what I had conceived in my heart about God, if I found Punic, I said "ilim"; if I found Latin, I said "Deus"; if I found Greek, I said "theos"; before I found any of these, what was in my heart was neither Greek nor Punic nor Latin. Therefore that which I conceived to be expressed was the word, that which I used to express it was the voice. The word in the speaker precedes the voice, in the listener it follows.

We have discussed voice and word: the word before all languages, the voice in some language. What then is first? The word or the voice? For me, the word is first. For unless I conceived the word in my heart, I would not use the voice to express the word. Thus, the word is conceived before the voice and uses the voice as a sort of vehicle by which it comes to you, not in which it is in me. For I know what I am about to say, even if I do not say it. Behold, before I speak, I have not used the voice, and the word is with me. But to convey it to you, I use the voice so that when you hear the voice, the word is also in you. Therefore, with me, to teach, the word precedes, and the voice follows. With you, to learn, the voice precedes, and the word follows. Pay careful attention and understand, with the Lord's help. For I know that I speak of hidden matters placed in the secret of mysteries, but I speak in whatever manner to faithful Christians who precede with faith what I am about to say. Therefore, with me, the word preceded, and the voice was applied to the preceding word. With you, my voice preceded, and then you understood the word that was in my heart.

Christ the Word of God, John the voice.

Therefore, if Christ is the Word, John is the voice, the Word preceded with God; but with us, the voice came first, so that the Word might come to us. Therefore the Word was with God, and the voice John was not yet. For was the Word not with God before the voice John existed? It was there, but for the Word to be spoken to us, John was taken as a voice. And to come to us, the Word was preceded by the voice. Thus, too, Christ was before John in eternity; and yet, John had to be born first, so that the voice might precede the Word to us. Blessed is the Lord our God, because I said what I could, and you understood what you could. May He increase and multiply your understanding, and may the Word that preceded the voice become clear to you. The baptism of John was transitory. But see, my brothers: the voice sounds and passes, the word remains. See what I say. Behold, I said "God"; first, I conceived in my heart what I would say, then those two syllables sounded and passed. Does what I conceived in my heart pass with those syllables? Again, when I said "God," it happened in your heart to think of God; in my heart, it preceded that I would say it, and in your heart, the thought of God was made when you heard those two syllables. Those two syllables fulfilled their service and passed; yet what I had conceived in my heart did not pass: it was in me, and after those two syllables were spoken, it remained in me; and what was made a thought in your heart, when those two syllables touched your ear, remained in your heart even after they passed. Therefore, brothers, the ministry of the man John was like a voice passing.

He rightly received baptism, but the baptism of John was transitory and was called the baptism of John. The baptism of Christ and the baptism of John, but the baptism of John was like a passing voice, the baptism of Christ remaining and remaining forever, just as the word remains.

He must increase, but I must decrease. And as much as we progress in God, so much more are voices diminished, the Word grows within us. But why do we have voices, if not to understand something? If the fullness of understanding were in us, voices would not be needed. If we could see our thoughts, would a tongue be necessary for us to converse with each other? Therefore, there will be a time when we will see the Word, as it is seen by angels, and your voices will not be needed. For it will not be necessary to preach the Word when we see it itself. All temporal things will pass away, because voice is from flesh, from grass; but the glory of flesh is like the flower of grass: the grass withers, the flower falls, but the word of the Lord endures forever. Therefore, as much as we progress in understanding, so much the less will there be need for voices through which we are led to understanding; hence John himself said: He must increase, but I must decrease. As the Word increases, the voice diminishes. What is it for the Word to increase? It is not that the Word itself increases, but we grow in it, we progress in it, we are magnified in it, so that we no longer need voices. This appeared also through the very births of the Word and the voice. The Word was born on the eighth day before the Kalends of January, from which the day begins to grow longer; the voice was born before the Word of God, when the day begins to decrease. He must increase, but I must decrease. And their very sufferings showed this: John diminished, struck in the head, Christ increased, elevated on the cross.

About the disciples baptized in the baptism of John (Acts 19:1-7).

Thus, let us celebrate the birth of the voice in honor of the Word, and neither focus on nor be deceived by the sophistries of vain men, who do not understand what they speak. For John had a baptism, and it is found in the Acts of the Apostles that those who only had John's baptism were baptized - for certain disciples were found having John's baptism and were ordered by the Apostle Paul to be baptized because they only had a temporary baptism, since they had the baptism of the voice, not yet of the Word; for now you seek John's baptism and do not find it: for the voice sounded and passed by, but the baptism of Christ remains today. Therefore, because of the mystery itself, the Apostle Paul ordered those who had John's baptism to be baptized, hence the heretics wanted to draw an argument for rebaptism, whose error we lament and whose liberation we rejoice in. Let us, therefore, briefly reply to this. Of the baptism of John and of unworthy ministers baptizing.

Therefore, you think that a man who has received the baptism of Christ ought to be rebaptized because the Apostle Paul commanded that men who had the baptism of John should be baptized, and so you argue: "If after John the Baptist, about whom the Lord said: Among those born of women there has not arisen anyone greater than John the Baptist, if after him the apostles baptized, how much more ought one to be baptized after heretics!" I respond: You think an injury is being done to John the Baptist because people were baptized after him, if they are not baptized after heretics. And I too lament this injury, but I reply to you thus: If people were baptized after John, should they not have been baptized after Optatus? What are you saying to me here? Who was John? "Among those born of women, no one has arisen greater than John the Baptist." Do you have any presbyter or drunkard with you - I do not want to say "usurer", I do not want to say

"adulterer" - but in the meantime, what abounds and what is publicly done, you have a drunken presbyter with you. "Okay." Why do you not rebaptize after him? If you baptize after John who did not drink wine, should you not baptize after a drunkard? Here surely he is confused and has nothing to say. So what? Listen to me. The baptism of heretics is not to be repeated. And Paul commands those who had the baptism of John and did not have Christ's to be baptized. But why do you not baptize after a drunk? Because the baptism is given by Christ alone. For it is Christ's baptism: let the sober give it, let the drunk give it, it is Christ's, it belongs neither to the sober nor to the drunk. This baptism was given by Peter: it is Christ's; it was given by Judas: it is Christ's. For it is not called Peter's baptism because Peter gave it. Why? Just as it was said to be the baptism of John, it was not said so for those baptized by Peter, by Paul, by John the Evangelist, or by Judas, it was not called the baptism of Peter, the baptism of Paul, the baptism of Judas; but for those baptized by Peter, by Paul, by John, by Judas, it is Christ's baptism. However, the disciples of John whom he baptized were of John, because John received this dispensation and pre-ministry: the voice before the word. Therefore, you do not want to baptize after a drunk, nor do I after a heretic. On the baptism of Christ administered by unworthy ministers. And if perchance you think that a heretic does not enter the kingdom of heaven, the drunkard enters, the apostle Paul made it clear saying: Now the works of the flesh are evident; which are fornications, impurity, lust, idolatry, sorcery, enmities, strife, jealousy, bursts of rage, dissentions, heresies, envies, drunkenness, carousings, and things like these; of which I warn you, as I warned you before, that those who do such things will not inherit the kingdom of God. There he listed heresies, where the drunkards, and concluded: Those who do such things will not inherit the kingdom of God. Set before me a heretic and a drunkard: if he persists in heresy, he does not enter the kingdom of heaven; so too a drunkard, if he persists in drunkenness, does not enter the kingdom of heaven. Teach me. Both give baptism according to which? Both are outside the kingdom of heaven, but they give the thing of the kingdom of heaven. A herald pronounces the sentence, but does not liberate innocence. The judge liberates, who commanded the herald what to say. Sometimes the herald is guilty, and the innocent is freed through him. The guilty herald says: "I have ordered to release," and through the guilty, the innocent is freed. Why? Because the voice of the herald is the sentence of the judge. The drunkard baptizes: it is ministry; the heretic baptized: it is ministry. The gift of baptism is the gift of Almighty God. Certainly, if he baptized in the name of Donatus, it must be that he be baptized again. However, if I recognize there the baptism of Christ, if I recognize the words of the Gospel, if I recognize the form and character of my king, although you were a deserter and could be convicted and put to death through the character, come to the camp with the character of the Lord: you can earn pardon, the character for you cannot be changed.

Sermons - Sermon 293A

SERMON 293/A On the Birthday of Saint John The speech was delivered spontaneously and on the journey.

Since the Lord wished on this day to restore to your Charity our voice and presence, and He did this not according to our arrangement, but according to His will, we give Him thanks with you, and we render to you the service of speech, which is our ministry, in which it is both fitting and proper for us to serve you. It is yours, dearest ones, to accept with charity whatever dispensation of the servants of God, and to give thanks to Him with us, who granted us this day to be with you together.

John surpasses the other Prophets in many excellences. So then, about whom shall we speak today, but about the one whose birth is today? Therefore John the holy, born of a barren woman, the precursor of the Lord born of a Virgin, was made the saluter of his Lord from the womb, the announcer after the womb. The barren woman who could not give birth, the Virgin who had no means to give birth; the barren woman begot the herald, the Virgin the judge. But the Lord Jesus Christ himself, coming to men from the womb of the Virgin, had sent many heralds ahead. All the Prophets were sent ahead by him, but he himself spoke in them, who came after them. When therefore the Lord had sent many heralds before himself, what so great merit did this one have, what did he possess more of such great excellence, whose birth is commended to us today? For neither is this without the sign of some greatness, that the day of his birth should not be hidden, just as the day of his Lord's birth is not hidden. We are ignorant of the days when other Prophets were born; it was not permitted not to know of John's. This too showed his great merit, because the others foretold the Lord, and desired to see him but did not see; and if they saw in the spirit, they saw him as future, but they were not here to see him as present. The Lord himself says this about them to his disciples, because many prophets and righteous men desired to see what you see, and did not see, and to hear what you hear, and did not hear. Was it not he who sent them? But in all there was a desire, if it could be, to see Christ here in the flesh. But since they preceded him in dying, just as they preceded him in being born, Christ did not find them here, but nonetheless redeemed them into eternal life. And to know what kind of desire there was to see Christ here, remember that old man Simeon, to whom the Spirit of God had announced no small good news, that he would not depart from this world until he had seen Christ. Christ was born: he recognized him as an infant in the hands of his mother, took him, held him in his hands, whose divinity bore him up; and holding in his hands the infant Word, he blessed God, saying: Now you dismiss your servant, O Lord, in peace, for my eyes have seen your salvation.

John, who was preferred before, was not greater than Christ. Christ, younger in age than John, was greater in majesty. So then, other prophets did not see; Simeon saw the infant: John recognized and greeted him in the womb, proclaimed and saw him as a youth. Therefore, he is more excellent than all the others. Hear the testimony of the Lord about him: he preferred him to himself, no one else. He was very great, for there was no one greater than he except Christ.

Therefore, the Lord himself says: among those born of women, no one has arisen greater than John the Baptist. And to place himself before him, he who is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he. He referred to himself as lesser and greater: lesser in being born, greater in dominion; lesser in age, greater in majesty. For the Lord was born after him, but in the flesh, but from a Virgin; however, in the beginning, the Word was before him. It is a great matter: after John, Christ, and yet, John through Christ. For all things were made by him, and without him, nothing was made. Why then did John come? To show the way of humility, so that the presumption of man might be diminished, the glory of God might be increased. Therefore, John came, great, commending one greater; John came as the measure of a man. What is the measure of a man? No man could be more than John: whatever was more than John was already more than man. For if the measure of human greatness had been terminated in John, you would not have found a greater man; and yet, you found a greater one. Confess God, whom indeed you could discover greater than man. John was a man, and Christ was a man: but John was only a man, Christ God and man. According to what he is God, he made John; according to what he is man, he was born after John.

John, the teacher of humility. But still, see how greatly that forerunner of his Lord, both God and man, humbles himself. Although no one greater has arisen among those born of women, he is asked whether he himself is the Christ. He was so great that people could be deceived. There was doubt about him, whether he himself was the Christ; and it was doubted to the extent that he was questioned. Now, if he were a son of pride, not a teacher of humility, he would present himself to the erring people, and not only act so that they would think it, but he would already accept what they thought. Would it have been too much for him, to wish to persuade people that he was the Christ? If he tried to persuade and was not believed, he would have remained abject and dejected, and held in contempt among people, and condemned before God. But he did not need to persuade people; he already saw they thought this: he would accept their error and increase his own honor. But let this be far from the faithful friend of the Bridegroom, that he should wish to be loved by the bride instead of Him. He confessed that he was not what he was not, lest he lose what he was. John was not the bridegroom; for, when questioned, he said this: He who has the bride is the bridegroom; but the friend of the bridegroom, who stands and hears him, rejoices greatly because of the bridegroom’s voice. Indeed, I baptize you with water for repentance: but he who comes after me is mightier than I. How much mightier? Whose shoe’s latchet I am not worthy to unloose. See how much lesser he would be, if he were deserving; how greatly he humbles himself if he says this: He is mightier than I, whose shoe’s latchet I am worthy to unloose; for he had said that he was worthy to bend at his feet. But now how high he commends Him, when he says he is unworthy even of His feet, or rather of His shoes! He comes therefore to teach the proud humility, to announce the way of repentance. The voice before the Word. A voice came before the Word. How does a voice come before the Word? What is said about Christ? In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God; the same was in the beginning with God. But to come to us, the Word was made flesh, to dwell among us. Therefore, since we have heard the Word of Christ, let us hear the voice of John. When it was said to him: Who are you? he replied: I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness. So if Christ is the Word, John is the voice, so that the Word might be spoken to us, John was taken as the voice; and before the Word came to us, the voice preceded it. And so Christ was before John in eternity; and yet he should not be born before, unless John and the voice preceded the Word to us. There will be a time, therefore, when we shall see the Word as it is seen by the angels; now, however, let us advance in the Word, so that we may abide with him forever.

He must increase, but I must decrease. This was shown even through the births themselves of the Word and the voice. The Word was born on the eighth day before the kalends of January, from which the day begins to increase; the voice was born before the Word of God, when the day begins to decrease. He, he says, must increase, but I must decrease. And their very sufferings showed this: John was diminished, struck in the head; Christ increased, was raised up on the cross. Therefore, brethren, let us celebrate the birth of the voice in honor of the Word: not in drunkenness and carousing, as the Apostle says, but whatever you do, do all in the name of God, and the God of peace will be with you.

Sermons - Sermon 293B

Sermon 293/B On the Nativity of Saint John the Baptist The morning discourse had preceded about the Word and the voice.

Today we celebrate the birth of a great man: and do you want to know how great? No one, says Scripture, has arisen greater among those born of women. The one born of a virgin said this about him; this testimony he gave to his witness; this sentence the judge pronounced about his proclaimer; thus the Word wanted to honor his voice, as you know and have heard today even in the morning sermon. The voice does not beget the word, but makes it appear. As the word grows in the heart, the voice fails in the ear. The Word is Christ, the voice is John, since it is written about Christ: In the beginning was the Word. But when John spoke about himself, he said: I am the voice of one crying out in the desert. The Word pertains to the heart, the voice to the ear. When the voice strikes the ear, and the word does not reach the mind, it has an empty sound, but does not bear useful fruit. However, for a word to be born in my heart, it does not need a voice; but for what is already born in my heart to be carried to your heart, the ministry of the voice is required. Therefore, the word can precede the voice, but it cannot proceed without the voice. The voice is created not to produce a word that did not exist, but so that what existed and was hidden may appear. Therefore, let us see what we have said about the word and the voice in Christ and John. Seek Christ. In the beginning was the Word. Where was it? And the Word was with God. In the beginning, with God. How much before us! How much above us! And the Word was made flesh, to dwell among us. And how would we know this if we did not hear the voice? For Christ was walking among people, clothed in mortal flesh; and yet people came to John, and said to him: Are you Christ? But he, to prove that he was the voice, pointed out the Word which preceded; he repelled undue honor, pointing to Christ with his finger. For when they said, are you Christ, John replied: Behold the Lamb of God, behold Him who takes away the sin of the world. Hear Him, recognize Him; I precede Him, I announce Him. Remember what he said: I am the voice of one crying out in the desert, prepare the way of the Lord; not for me, but for the Lord. For when I cry out, I announce Him, for the voice of the herald is announcing the advent of the Judge. But when He comes, whom I announce, and rests in your heart, He must increase, but I must decrease. For you know, beloved, that when the word, taken by the help of the voice, flows through the paths of the ears into the region of the heart, that word increases in the heart, while the voice fades in the ear. For the sound that strikes the ear does not remain, as the infinite word remains because it descends into the mind. Why is this? Because He must increase, but I must decrease.

Christ grew, but John was diminished.

John baptizes, and Christ baptizes too. It was said to John: Upon whom you see the Spirit descending as a dove and remaining upon him, he it is who baptizes with the Holy Spirit and fire. You know this, brothers; it happened when Christ was baptized: and behold, now throughout the whole world he is the one who baptizes. The baptism of Christ has grown everywhere; but the baptism of John, though it has a mystery in remembrance of the past, does not have a ministry in present celebration. The baptism of John has ceased; the baptism of Christ has grown. This is why he says: He must increase, but I must decrease. We find this saying in the births of both and in their passions. Although John the Evangelist says of John the Baptist: There was a man sent from God, whose name was John: he came as a witness, to bear witness about the light; although they came to bear witness to the light, today he was born, brothers, when the night grows, and the day begins to diminish; but Christ was born at the winter solstice, as you know, when the losses of night begin to transfer into the gains of light; because we were once darkness, but now are light in the Lord. Why were they born this way? Because he must increase, but this one must decrease. Even in their passions, John is beheaded by the sword, Christ is exalted on the wood; one is raised, the other is laid low; one is diminished by decapitation, the other extends to grow. He must increase, but this one must decrease. Not without reason, I think, are the ages chosen in their parents; for John is born of an elderly woman, Christ of a young virgin; one from despised barrenness, the other from untouched virginity; finally, one from a growing youth, the other from declining old age.

Each was announced by an angel.

What is his worth, my brothers, the dignity of this man, that an angel announced his birth to his parents just as he did for the Lord Christ? Why did he merit this? Because no one born of women has risen greater. As you know, the angel Gabriel was sent to the priest Zechariah, Gabriel was sent to the Virgin Mary; he promised a son to each, and received a response from each. Zechariah responded to the angel who promised a son: "How shall I know this? For I am an old man, and my wife is barren, and advanced in years." And Mary responded: "How will this be, since I do not know a man?" Both despair of the law of nature: still, I believe, they did not know, with the gift of God's grace, the law of nature would cease. Therefore both respond with doubt; yet he is punished, she is blessed. To him it is said: "Behold, you will be mute"; to Mary it is said: "Blessed are you among women." Zechariah loses his voice; Mary conceives the Word. After this, the Word becomes flesh in the Virgin, and the voice is born from silence; John, born, returns his father's voice; the speaking father names his son. Everyone marvels, everyone is amazed, and whispering among themselves, they say to one another: "What do you think this child will be?" Now let us speak of the Gospel. For the hand of the Lord was with him. What do you think he will be, who began in this way? He is yet so small, and already so great. And if this one, who now begins, will be great, what will he be who always was? He, whom John recognized while still enclosed in the secret of the maternal womb, and because he could not yet with voices, greeted with movements; what then will he be? Do you want to know what he will be? I will say briefly, listen to the Prophet: "He himself, he says, will be called the Lord of all the earth."

Against the remnants of the old superstition persisting on this day.

Therefore, celebrating with festive gatherings the birthday of the blessed John the Baptist, a great man, let us request the aid of his prayers. For since he is the friend of the bridegroom, he can also grant us the favor of belonging to the bridegroom, so that we may merit finding his grace. But if we wish to find his grace, let us not offend on his birthday. Let the remnants of irreverences cease, let the pursuits and places of vanities cease; let those things not be done which are wont to be done, not indeed now in honor of demons, but yet still according to the manner of demons. Yesterday, after evening, the whole city was ablaze with unclean flames; smoke had covered the entire air. If you give little heed to religion, at least consider the shared offense. We know, brothers, that these things are done by boys; but elders should have forbidden them. For one says: He who does not prevent sin, when he can, commands it. Indeed, brothers, in the name of the Lord the Church progresses year by year; these things are diminishing, and surely every lessening tends to nothing; but they are not yet so consumed that we can securely remain silent. Nor shall we be able to remain silent, unless antiquity and novelty come to their proper ends; that the old superstition be ended, and the new religion be perfected. Through our Lord Jesus Christ, to whom is honor and glory with God the Father Almighty, and with the Holy Spirit for ever and ever. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 293C

Sermon 293/C On the Nativity of Saint John the Baptist John before Christ, the voice before the Word.

Throughout the Church of Christ, spread far and wide, today is celebrated the birth of John the Baptist, the friend of the bridegroom and the forerunner of the Lord: I owe a sermon to this solemnity, you owe attention, and we all owe devotion. For among those born of women, no one has risen greater than John the Baptist; he alone was surpassed by the one through whom he was created. A marvelous thing indeed happened, that he should precede Him by being born, without whose aid he could not have been born at all. Deservedly, this one is the voice, that one the word: for this one said, "I am the voice of one crying out in the wilderness"; about that one it was said, "In the beginning was the Word." A similar thing happens in our teachings, which are far diverse: a word is born in the mind, by which the voice of the speaker is formed; a voice is uttered from the mouth, by which the word becomes known to those who hear it. Thus Christ remained in the Father, through whom John, like all things, was created; John came forth from the mother, through whom Christ was to be known by all. The one was the Word in the beginning before the world; the other was the voice at the end before the Word. The Word is uttered after understanding, the voice after silence: so Mary believed by bearing Christ, Zacharias, destined to father John, was struck dumb. Accordingly, one was born from a youthful virgin, the other from an aged woman in decline; the word is multiplied in the heart of the thinker, the voice is consumed in the ear of the listener. Perhaps this also pertains to "He must increase, but I must decrease"; for every legal and prophetic announcement, emitted before Christ, like a voice before the word, extended up to John, in whom the final figures ceased; then, evangelical grace and the clear proclamation of the kingdom of heaven, whose end will not be, flourish and grow throughout the whole world. As Christ grew, John diminished. Man without God can do nothing but sin. The births of John and Christ, their sufferings indicated this. Indeed, John was born as the days began to decrease; Christ, as the days began to increase. The decrease of the former signified the beheading; the increase of the latter, the exaltation of the cross. There is, moreover, another somewhat more abstruse understanding, which the Lord reveals to those who knock, what should be understood by that which John said about Christ: "He must increase, but I must decrease." Whatever is human righteousness, as far as a man can advance, had been consummated in John; indeed, the truth said about him: "Among those born of women there has not arisen anyone greater than John the Baptist." Therefore, no man could be greater than this man; but he was only a man, whereas Christ was God-man.

However, because in Christian grace this is particularly commended, this is learned, that no one should glory in man, but "he who glories, let him glory in the Lord," man in God, servant in the Lord, "He must increase, but I must decrease." Indeed, God in Himself is neither diminished nor increased: but in men, the more we advance in true piety, divine grace increases, human power decreases; until the temple of God, which is in all the members of Christ, is brought to that perfection, where, with every principality and power and virtue being nullified, God may be all in all.

That John the Evangelist says: "He was the true light which lights everyone coming into this world"; this John the Baptist says: "We have all received from His fullness." Therefore, since the light, which is always complete in itself, is yet increased in the one who is illuminated, that one assuredly is diminished in himself, as that which was without God is abolished. For man without God can do nothing but sin: here, human power is diminished, as the divine grace that destroys sins prevails. The weakness of the creature yields to the strength of the Creator, and the pride of private love fails into public charity, with John proclaiming in our misery about the mercy of Christ: "He must increase, but I must decrease."

Sermons - Sermon 293D

Sermon 293/D On the Birth of Saint John the Baptist Testimony of the Lord concerning John, John’s concerning the Lord. First reading recited from Acts 13:25.

About John the Baptist, not the Evangelist, whose birthday we celebrate today, a great day, there is a great testimony from the Lord himself. For our Savior says about him, his Lord and ours, what else does he say about him but the truth? Among those born of women, there has not arisen anyone greater than John the Baptist. Behold whose solemnity is celebrated today: than whom no one greater has arisen among those born of women. But the Lord himself added, and said: Yet the one who is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he. What is meant by: lesser than he? Lesser in age, greater in power. John, a supreme human, but nevertheless a man; however, it is very insufficient to say about the Lord Christ, supreme human, because he is God and man. We mentioned the Lord's testimony about John: let us mention John's testimony about the Lord. Recall in memory, retain the Lord's testimony, which I have commemorated, about John, since among those born of women no one has arisen greater than John the Baptist. Behold what Jesus said about John: what did John say about Jesus? First, see how the Lord's testimony about John was fulfilled. He was thought to be the Christ: and you heard, when the first reading was recited from the Acts of the Apostles; what was narrated and commemorated, that John said: What do you suppose me to be? I am not the Christ. The error of men suspected more, but humility confessed what he was. And see how easy it was to abuse the error of men, and to boast himself as Christ. He did not do so, deservedly great, more powerful by confessing than by proudly neighing. Would he have persuaded them that he was Christ? They already thought this: he could confirm what they thought: deceiving them about what he was, by saying he was what he was not. And if he had done this, where would he be? You sent to John, says the Lord Jesus to the Jews: he was a burning and shining lamp, and you wanted to rejoice for a time in his light: but I have a testimony greater than John. A good lamp: deservedly it flees under the feet of the rock, lest it be extinguished by the wind of pride.

John is not counted among Christ's disciples, but rather gathers disciples in the time of Christ. To whom the highest man bears witness, he is more than a man.

Therefore, see, beloved ones, how great John was, and how it was fulfilled what the Lord said about him: Among those born of women, there has not arisen a greater than John the Baptist. Surely Christ was Lord, indeed Christ is Lord, who was before John, who was before Abraham, who was before Adam, who was before heaven and earth, because all things were made through him; surely, he was Lord, and God walked on the earth, and the Word was made flesh; and yet John is not numbered among his disciples. Recall the names of the disciples from first to last. There is John, but the Evangelist, not the Baptist: thus, as far as human appearance is concerned, he was not a disciple of Christ, indeed even during Christ's time he himself gathered his own disciples. Finally, the Jews taunted Christ’s disciples about John's disciples and complained, saying: "Why do John's disciples fast, and your disciples do not fast?" Christ had disciples, and John had disciples: John baptized, and Christ baptized. Among those born of women, there has not arisen a greater than John the Baptist; but still he appeared to be gathering disciples rivaling Christ, yet for Christ. Because he was so great that Christ could be mistaken for him, he himself had to bear witness to Christ. To whom a great man bears witness, he is more than a man. "I am not what you think." Surely, I am great that you think this: I am not what you think. And who are you? He was asked. "I am the voice of one crying out in the wilderness; prepare the way for the Lord." See the precursor, welcome the forerunner, fear the judge. Prepare the way for the Lord; make straight his paths; every mountain and hill shall be made low, and every valley shall be exalted; and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places smooth, and all flesh shall see the salvation of God. Not me, but the salvation of God. All flesh shall see the salvation of God. The lamp bears witness to the day, because Christ is the day. What is John? A lamp. But what was the need for the lamp? Because the day was hidden: it was hidden until He suffered: for He would not suffer unless concealed. For if they had known, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory.

He who is least among the angels is greater than all men. As much greater as John confessed Jesus to be. John the disciple and friend of Jesus, where men do not see. John is the voice, Christ is both the word and the voice. And yet, lest they resist the day too much, the Jews are confounded by the lamp: they are sent to John. He said: I am not; who is in your midst, he is greater than I. How much greater? Surely the Lord Christ had said: Among those born of women, no one has risen greater than John the Baptist; but he who is least - speaking of himself, in that he is lower in the flesh - in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he. He called himself lesser: he did not say how much greater. Truly, lest I seem to convey something wrongly, because this sense is useful and not erring from the truth, I will also explain it. In the words where the Lord says: Among those born of women, no one has risen greater than John the Baptist; but he who is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he, there is also another sense in another distinction of words, if you distinguish as follows: among those born of women, no one has risen greater than John the Baptist; but he who is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he, so that you may understand that in the kingdom of heaven there are holy angels, and it was said: he who is least among the holy angels is greater than all men. Whether this sense or that, it does not depart from faith; because it is also true that Christ is lesser in age, greater in majesty; and that is true, that however great a man may be, he is less than the least angel. Yet let us hear from John, how much he confessed the Lord Jesus to be greater. Because he said: He who comes after me is greater than I, you hear "greater than I," you ask how much greater. If he were silent, we might suspect, but let us plainly believe: for John is a servant, Christ is the Lord. Let John say how much: whose sandal strap I am not worthy to untie, he says. How much would he have humbled himself if he had said he was worthy of this! If he stands, or he sits, and you untie the sandal strap, I recognize: He is the Lord, you are the servant. John says: It is not enough; I am not even worthy of this. Answer us, then, if possible, why you are not among his disciples, why you gathered outside his disciples. I, says John, I am not his disciple; I am, but where you do not see. He who has the bride is the bridegroom. The voice of John about the Lord Christ: He who has the bride is the bridegroom; but the friend of the bridegroom stands and hears him. Surely he is not his disciple: surely a servant while he stands, a friend by His gift. For He also said to his disciples: I will no longer call you servants, but friends. Nevertheless, see the disciple within, in secret, and in the hidden sanctuary. The friend of the bridegroom stands and hears him. Let him stand and hear him:

for if he had not heard, he would have fallen, and been like him of whom the Lord says: He was a murderer from the beginning, and did not stand in the truth. The devil did not stand in the truth and fell, he who falls and causes others to fall. But John stood and heard him. And what follows? He greatly rejoices because of the bridegroom’s voice. He is the Word, I am the voice. John says. He is the voice, and he greatly rejoices because of the bridegroom’s voice. For you are the voice, He is the Word; but He is both the Word and the voice. Why is the Lord both the Word and the voice? Because the Word was made flesh. Just as the word that our heart conceives is inwardly in our heart, and hidden to those who are outside us: just as now what I am going to say is hidden from you, but not from me; the word is already in my heart: but to proceed to you, a voice is assumed, and what was hidden in me reaches you, and when it reaches you, it does not depart from me. If this is my word, what about the Word of God? He who was with the Father was hidden with the Father: to proceed to us, flesh was assumed as a voice; and He proceeded to us, and did not depart from the Father. And the Jews heard this saying, even what John said: We all received from his fullness. What does it mean: We all? He was a patriarch, he was a prophet, he was a righteous man, whoever he was, any preacher, even John himself, than whom no one has risen greater among those born of women; all drank from that source, therefore they uttered such things. The confusion of the Jews about the lamp John, foretold in the Psalm, fulfilled in the Gospel.

Therefore, the Jews, the enemies of the hidden day, are confounded by the lamp. And indeed they were confounded. See how they questioned the Lord Himself one day, and said: How long will you keep us in suspense? If you are the Christ, tell us plainly. They were preparing to calumniate, not to seek the truth. How long, they said, will you keep us in suspense? How long will you keep us hanging? If you are the Christ, tell us plainly. And he said to them: I ask you one word: tell me, John's baptism, was it from heaven or from men? Wisdom shone, imprudence was repressed; they returned to themselves, who had gone forth to him. Those who had approached to calumniate, returned hesitating; and they said among themselves, or within themselves: If we say: from heaven, he will answer us: why did you not believe him, when he testified to me? If you believed him, why do you question me? If we say: from heaven, he will answer us this: Why did you not believe him? If we say: From men, we fear the crowds, lest they stone us. For all the crowd of the Jews held John as a prophet. Therefore, seeing the lamp before the day, they understood that whatever they answered would be against them, and they replied: We do not know. What they knew, they answered: We do not know. And the Lord: Neither do I tell you by what authority I do these things. What were they going to say? What could they answer? Without a doubt, they were confounded, and the prophecy saying in the Psalm was fulfilled: I have prepared a lamp for my Christ. See when it was said, when it was fulfilled. When it was said, read the Psalm; when it was fulfilled, read the Gospel. I have prepared a lamp for my Christ. For what purpose? To clothe his enemies with confusion. O harsh confusion! They are daily confounded, and they do not convert.

Whatever good we are, it must be attributed to God; whatever evil, must be imputed to us. God increases in us when we understand Him. But we, beloved, who have been grafted into the place of the cut-off branches - as the Apostle says - let us listen to him and not be wise in our own conceits; whatever good we are, let us attribute to the good God; whatever evil we are, let us impute to ourselves. He has a righteous heart who in his good deeds praises only God, in his evil deeds does not blaspheme against God. For whatever God does with us, He does knowingly; no one is better, no one wiser, no one more powerful than Him. He called us, and remember from where. He freed us from idols, freed us from the servitude of demons and from such sacrileges. Whence is this to us? Whence, he says, is this to me, that the mother of my Lord should come to me? Just as men humble themselves, and only in the Lord boast, that He may be exalted; we may be diminished, that we may grow in Him. See the greatest man, among those born of women none has risen greater, what does he say of Christ? He must increase, but I must decrease. Let God increase, let man diminish. And how does the perfect grow? For what does God lack that He should grow? God grows in you when you understand Him. Consider therefore the humility of man, and the height of God. He must increase, he says, but I must decrease. Their birthdays indicated this. It is done under the light, the sun itself bears witness: from this day, the days are shortened, from the Lord's birthday, the days lengthen. He must increase, but I must decrease. For the Lord Jesus Christ, the governor and author of creation, the ruler of the world, the maker of the stars, the orderer of times, since He was born when He willed, chose the day to be born, to be well signified; and to his forerunner, He himself gave the day. In him, He willed for man to be understood, in Himself God. Let man be diminished, let God grow, this is indicated by their sufferings: John was beheaded, Christ was exalted on the cross. Therefore, brethren, I will briefly conclude this. For there are many things which can be said about Saint John the Baptist; but we do not suffice to speak, nor you to hear. Therefore, I will briefly conclude now: let man be humbled, let God be exalted. Let him who glories, glory in the Lord.

Sermons - Sermon 293E

Sermon 293/E OF TWO MEN: CHRIST AND JOHN Christ is greater than John the man, though Christ is a man. In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. Was it not given, each one of them might be said about him, all things were made through him? He held divinity within himself, he granted grace to us. Let us recognize man for our sake, let us recognize God above us: the very man, the very God. But you see two men, both John and Christ; but, the man you see, is greater than John... and yet he is not worthy to loosen the strap of his sandal. Therefore, understand him to be the greater: and so much greater, that John is lesser to him, although he is greater than all the righteous. However, he is greater than earth and heaven: greater than angels, greater than all powers, greater than all authorities and dominions. Whence is he greater? because all things were made through him, and without him nothing was made. By this he is equal to the Father, by man he is less than the Father: for he himself said: I and the Father are one, he who said: The Father is greater than I. Both statements seemingly contrary, and both true: your heart should not quarrel, and the words of the Lord do not quarrel. I and the Father are one, he showed equality; The Father is greater than I, he showed inequality. In God it is not said: Was, or: Will be, but: Is. Where I and the Father are one, hear the Apostle interpreting the senses of both in one place: Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God, because this was his birth. Robbery is usurpation: just as Adam, these things were made robbery for him; and therefore, because he wanted to seize what he was not, he lost what he had. How did he want robbery? The serpent said to him, from where he himself had also fallen: I will set my throne in the north, and I will be like the Most High. This thought cast down the devil: this suggestion made man a participant in the devil's pride. For he envied the one standing, who had already fallen; he cast him down from where he himself fell. Behold to whom robbery was. But it was not to him, because he was born equal, and remaining from eternity to eternity, he was never not equal, never will not be; nor should it be said: He was, Is, and Will be, but Is; for what is said: He was, is no longer; but what is said: He will be, is not yet. Therefore he himself, when he commanded his servant Moses, when Moses said to him, What are you called? and said: What shall I say to the children of Israel? He replied: I am who am. Thus you shall say to the children of Israel: Who is has sent me to you. Where it is said: Is, it is genuine, it is sincere; it can never and nowhere be changed. This is God, this is the Son of God, this is the Holy Spirit. Therefore, brothers, this is above all things, and therefore the Son is equal to the Father; hence the Apostle: He thought it not robbery to be equal with God.

Christ, a man God; John, a good man because of God.

Whence comes: The Father is greater than I? But he emptied himself - see, distinguish the words - taking the form of a servant. Impress this on your ears, and discern how, when he said the form of a servant, he said taking; but concerning the form of God, he did not say taking, but said: who, though he was in the form of God, took the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men, and being found in human form, he humbled himself, becoming obedient even unto death, the death of the cross, therefore God also exalted him and gave him a name which is above every name. According to how he was made, he was exalted; according to this exaltation, according to how he was humble; for according to how he is equal to the Father, he is not exalted, because he was never humble. According to how he died, he rose again, and gave him a name which is above every name. Behold, Christ coming, and yet he was already there; he rose again, and ascended into heaven, and yet he had not departed from there. Do you think he is a man? Do not think so. Behold the man: of whom no one born of women is greater. Hear him concerning this man: I am not worthy to untie his sandal strap. Therefore understand two men: but one man is God, the other man is good for God's sake; one man is the truth, the other man is truthful because of the truth.

Sermons - Sermon 294

SERMO 294 Habitus in the basilica of the elders, on the birthday of the martyr Guddenis.

5th day before the Kalends of July [On the Baptism of Little Ones, against the Pelagians] The opportunity of speech. On the birthday of Saint John, among other things that seemed appropriate to discuss, our discourse was led to the baptism of infants: and because it had already become lengthy, and thoughts turned to concluding it, not as much was said about this great question as should have been said by those concerned by such a great danger. It is not, however, the very judgment already long established in the Catholic Church with supreme authority that makes us anxious, but the disputes of certain individuals, which now endeavor to proliferate and overturn the minds of many. Therefore today, with the Lord's help, we have decided to speak on this matter. Indeed, we celebrate the solemn day of the Martyr: but the cause of all the faithful is greater than that of the martyrs only. For not all the faithful are also martyrs, but they are martyrs because they are faithful. Let us see then what they propose, what agitates them; since we ought to think not so much about refuting them as about healing them. The Pelagians concede to baptize infants, not for eternal life, but for the kingdom of heaven.

They concede that infants ought to be baptized. Therefore, there is no question between us and them whether infants should be baptized; but the reason is sought, why they should be baptized. Therefore, let us hold without any doubt with them what they concede. No one doubts that infants must be baptized. Let no one doubt, since even those who in some way contradict do not doubt this. But we say that they will not have salvation and eternal life otherwise, unless they are baptized in Christ: however, they say it is not for salvation, not for eternal life, but for the kingdom of heaven. What this is, while we explain it as best as we can, pay attention for a moment. They say that a little child, even if he is not baptized, due to the merit of innocence, because he has no sin at all, neither personal nor original, neither from himself nor traced from Adam, must have salvation and eternal life, even if he is not baptized; but he must be baptized in order to enter also into the kingdom of God, that is, into the kingdom of heaven. If this is to be discussed, it should indeed be discussed for their sake, not for ours. For they are our brothers, they are moved by the profundity of the question; but they ought to be ruled by the guidance of authority. For when they say that they should not be baptized for the sake of obtaining salvation and eternal life, but solely for the kingdom of heaven and the kingdom of God; they indeed admit they should be baptized, but not for eternal life, but for the kingdom of heaven. What about eternal life? They say, they will have it. Why will they have it? Because they have no sin, and cannot be associated with damnation. So, is there eternal life outside the kingdom of heaven?

Eternal life is not apart from the kingdom of heaven. Among the right side pertaining to the kingdom of God, and the left of the condemned, there is no intermediate place. This first error must be avoided by the ears and eradicated from the minds. This notion is new in the Church, previously unheard of, that there is eternal life apart from the kingdom of heaven, that there is eternal salvation apart from the kingdom of God. First, see, brother, lest you perhaps need to agree with us here, that whoever does not belong to the kingdom of God, without a doubt belongs to damnation. The Lord is coming and will judge the living and the dead, as the Gospel says, dividing them into two groups, the right and the left. To those on the left, He will say: "Depart into the eternal fire, prepared for the devil and his angels"; to those on the right, He will say: "Come, blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." He names the kingdom here, and damnation with the devil there. No middle place is left where you could place infants. He will judge the living and the dead: some will be on the right, others on the left; I know of no other thing. You who introduce a middle ground, step away from the middle: do not be offended by the one who seeks the right. And I also warn you yourself: step away from the middle, but do not go to the left. Therefore, if there will be the right and the left, and we know no middle place in the Gospel: behold, on the right is the kingdom of heaven: "Inherit," He says, "the kingdom." Whoever is not there, is on the left. What will be on the left? "Depart into the eternal fire." On the right to the kingdom, indeed eternal; on the left to the eternal fire. Whoever is not on the right is undoubtedly on the left: therefore, whoever is not in the kingdom is undoubtedly in the eternal fire. Can he surely have eternal life who is not baptized? He will not be on the right, that is, he will not be in the kingdom. Do you reckon eternal life to be eternal fire? And about that very eternal life, listen more explicitly, because the kingdom is nothing other than eternal life. First, He named the kingdom, but to the right; eternal fire to the left. But the final judgment, to show what the kingdom is, and what eternal fire is: "Then," He says, "these will go into eternal punishment, but the righteous into eternal life."

Behold, he has explained to you what the kingdom is and what the eternal fire is; so that when you admit that the little one will not be in the kingdom, you acknowledge that he will be in the eternal fire. For the kingdom of heaven is eternal life. The exclusion from the kingdom of God is linked with the punishment of eternal fire. Nor did the apostle Paul, when he frightened men, frighten little ones, nor the baptized, but the wicked, the criminals, the contaminated, the lost; he did not frighten them by saying that they would be in eternal fire, where they will undoubtedly go if they are not corrected: but he only frightened them because they would not be in the kingdom; so that when they saw that they were losing the hope of the kingdom, they saw that nothing was consequent except the punishment of eternal fire. He says, “Do not be deceived: neither the fornicators, nor the idolaters, nor the adulterers, nor the effeminate, nor those who lie with men, nor the thieves, nor the greedy, nor the drunkards, nor the revilers, nor the rapacious will inherit the kingdom of God.” He did not say: Those and those, such and such will be tormented by eternal fire; but, “will not inherit the kingdom of God.” With the right hand removed, nothing remained but the left. From where, however, do they escape from eternal fire? For no other reason, except that they will be in the kingdom. It follows: “And such were some of you.” And how are they now no longer? “But you were washed, but you were sanctified, but you were justified in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ and by the Spirit of our God.” In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. For there is no other name under heaven in which we must be saved, all of us, the little ones with the great ones. But if we must be saved in this name, without this name, beyond a doubt there will not be salvation, which is promised without Christ to the little ones. With all due respect to those who promise salvation to anyone without Christ, I do not know whether he himself can have salvation in Christ. The Pelagian distinction between eternal life and the kingdom of God is plainly arbitrary.

Then we ask them: What if someone says that infants, by virtue of their innocence, as it is said, and their immunity from all fault, would not only have salvation and eternal life, but also the kingdom of God? Whence it is defined and certain among you that without Baptism the infants will not have the kingdom of God. In order for you to distribute to them according to your will, not as helpers of the infants, but as oppressors of the miserable; in order for you to distribute to them according to your will, and give them salvation and eternal life apart from the kingdom of heaven? Another one, more benevolent and merciful to you, and as you think more just, will give them all, both eternal life and the kingdom of heaven. How will you surpass this one? Since sometimes you are delighted with human reasoning against the clearest authority, bring forth the very rule of your reason, and assert, with as much strength as you can muster, from where this one might be conquered, who wishes to give to infants, on account of their merits of innocence, on account of no fault, as you say, which is original sin, not only eternal life but also the kingdom of heaven: conquer this one. I, without prejudice, for a moment take the part of this one and will say what I do not feel myself: but I warn you, so that you may see a keener adversary.

Having once denied original sin, the Pelagians cannot overcome him who does not wish little ones to be excluded from the kingdom of God.

Behold, someone appears and says: A little child, having no sin at all, neither that which he has contracted by his own life nor that which he has derived from the life of the first parent, will have both eternal life and the kingdom of heaven.

Respond, conquer the man resisting you, who divides differently. For you say: This unbaptized one will indeed have eternal life, but will not have the kingdom of heaven. He, on the other hand: Indeed both life and the kingdom of heaven. Why do you take away the inheritance of the kingdom of heaven from the innocent? From whom the kingdom of heaven is not acquired, he is undoubtedly deprived of a great good. What is this justice? Say, why? What did the unbaptized infant offend, having no guilt, neither his own, nor inherited from his parent? What did he offend, tell me, that he may not enter into the kingdom of heaven, that he is separated from the lot of the saints, that he is an exile from the company of Angels? You seem to yourself merciful because you do not take away his life: yet you condemn, whom you separate from the kingdom of heaven. You condemn: you do not strike him, but you send him into exile. For even those who are exiled live, if they are healthy: they are not in bodily pains, they are not tormented, they are not afflicted by the darkness of a prison: this is their only punishment, not being in their country. If the country is loved, it is a great punishment: but if the country is not loved, the punishment of the heart is worse. Is it a small evil in the heart of man, who does not seek the company of saints, who does not desire the kingdom of heaven? If he does not desire it, the punishment is from perversity: but if he desires it, the punishment is from defrauded charity. But if, as you wish, the punishment be small; it is still great, if there is no fault. Here defend the justice of God. Why even a small punishment is inflicted on the innocent, in which no sin whatsoever is found? Speak against this adversary, who wishes to give to unbaptized infants, with greater mercy and justice than you, not only eternal life but also the kingdom of heaven: respond if you can, but bring forth reason; for you delight to glory in this. On the question of unbaptized infants, one must turn to divine authority.

I feel the depth of this question, and I do not recognize my own strength as adequate to plumb its depths. Here too, I am inclined to exclaim with Paul: O the depth of the riches! An unbaptized infant goes to damnation: for these are the words of the Apostle: From one came condemnation: I do not find an adequate reason, not because there is none, but because I do not find it. Where then I do not find the deep in the deep, I ought to consider human frailty, not to condemn divine authority. I utterly exclaim, and I am not ashamed: O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and how inscrutable his ways! Who has known the mind of the Lord? Or who has been his counselor? Or who has given him anything, and shall be repaid? For from him, and through him, and in him are all things: to him be glory forever and ever. I strengthen my weakness with these words, and surrounded by this precaution, I stand fortified against the arrows of your reasoning. But you, warrior, that is, strong reasoner, answer this, who says to you: An entirely innocent little one, and free from all sin, both personal and original, will not only have eternal life but also the kingdom of heaven. This is just. Why should one who has no evil not have some good? But you say, I know. How do you know? Because the Lord has said. At last, you have come to this. Therefore, it is not because you reason, but because the Lord has said. I plainly praise this, it is sound: just as a man you have not found the reason, you flee to authority. I approve, absolutely approve. You do well; you do not find what to answer, flee to authority: I do not pursue you there, nor expel you from there; rather I receive and embrace you as you flee. The Lord's statement excluding the unbaptized from the kingdom of God, as acknowledged by the Pelagians.

Therefore, bring forth the authority, let us stand in it together against the common enemy. For you say and I say that a little one not baptized does not enter the kingdom of heaven. Therefore, let us both resist that common adversary, who says a little one not baptized will enter the kingdom of heaven, and let us bring forth the shield of faith against his most insidious darts.

Let human reasoning step aside for a moment, let divine arms be taken up. "Take up," says the Apostle, "the whole armor of God." Behold, let us say together to this man: Are you a Christian? I am a Christian, he says. Hear the Gospel, you who want to send unbaptized infants into the kingdom of heaven; hear the Gospel: "Unless one is born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God." This is the Lord's ruling: no one resists this except a non-Christian. That one is refuted, the contest remains with you and me: and perhaps where you conquered him with his good, there you might be conquered with your own good. For if the one you conquered is not obstinate, you have taught him. Therefore, do not be obstinate yourself: let us hold together for the time being to this ruling: "Unless one is born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God." Therefore, you say, I cannot promise the kingdom of God to an unbaptized infant against the Lord's clear ruling. Behold why I say: They will not have the kingdom of God. Behold why I say: Therefore they must be baptized, so that they may have the kingdom of God. Is this why you say it? This why, he says. However, consider, because of what we have said above, whether you might not find eternal life apart from the kingdom of God. For the statements about those two parts, right and left, are very clear, where no place for life without a kingdom was given in the middle. Does this correct you only a little? Warn you only a little? Pay a little attention with me to the very passage from which you drew this ruling. From the same reading of the Gospel for overcoming the Pelagians. One person in two natures of Christ, who at the same time says He is on earth and in heaven. For you said that you do not wish to promise the kingdom of heaven to unbaptized infants because the Lord's decree is clear: Unless one is born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of heaven. There you did not notice, when Nicodemus asked how these things could happen, that is, how a man could be reborn, how he could be born again; since indeed he cannot enter into his mother's womb again and be born again; what did he hear from the Lord, what did he hear from the good teacher, what did he hear error from the truth?

Among other things, showing how it is done, he also provided a comparison. But first he said: No one has ascended into heaven except he who descended from heaven, the Son of Man who is in heaven. He was on earth and said that he was in heaven; and what is greater, in heaven was the Son of Man: to show one person in both natures, and in that he was the Son of God equal to the Father, the Word of God in the beginning God with God, and in that he was the son of man, taking on a human soul and human flesh, and clothed as a man, coming out to humans: because in these two there are not two Christs, nor two sons of God but one person, one Christ the Son of God, and the same one Christ, not another, the son of man; but the Son of God according to divinity, the son of man according to the flesh. But which of us, who are little observant, or with little wisdom, would not prefer to distinguish that way, the Son of God in heaven, and the Son of Man on earth? But lest we divide that way, and thus by dividing introduce two persons: No one ascends into heaven, he says, except he who descended from heaven the Son of Man. Therefore the Son of Man descended from heaven. Was not the son of man made on earth? was not the son of man made through Mary? But, oh man, he says, do not separate whom I wish to unite. It is little that the Son of Man descended (for Christ descended, and the same son of man who is the Son of God); he walks on earth who sits in heaven. He was in heaven, because Christ is everywhere, and the same Christ is both the Son of God and the son of man. Because of the unity of the person, on earth the Son of God, because of the same unity of the person we have proved in heaven the son of man, from these words of the Lord: the Son of Man, he says, who is in heaven. Because of the unity of person, is it not on earth and seen that Peter says: You are the Christ, the Son of the living God?

Only Christ ascended into heaven. The members of Christ with the head are one Christ.

Therefore, let Nicodemus learn how that happens, which seemed incredible and almost impossible to him, who understands less: No one ascends into heaven except the one who descended from heaven.

All those who are reborn, indeed, ascend into heaven: none of the others at all. And all who are reborn, through the grace of God ascend into heaven: and no one ascends into heaven, except he who descended from heaven, the Son of Man who is in heaven. Whence this? Because all who are reborn become members of him; and Christ alone born of Mary is the one Christ, and with his body the head is one Christ. Therefore, he wished to say this: No one ascends, except he who descended. Therefore, no one ascends, except Christ. If you wish to ascend, be in the body of Christ: if you wish to ascend, be a member of Christ. For as in one body we have many members, and all the members of the body, though they are many, are one body; so also is Christ: because the head and body are Christ. And how this happens, let us still seek. The question lies hidden, that depth is exalted.

How we become members of Christ. Faith in Christ is necessary for salvation.

Christ does not have sin, neither did He derive original sin, nor did He add His own: He came without the pleasure of carnal lust, there was no marital embrace: from the body of the Virgin, He did not assume a wound, but a remedy; He did not assume what He would heal, but from where He would heal: as far as sin is concerned, I say. Therefore, He alone is without sin: how will His members be, none of whom are without sin? How? Hear the likeness that follows: And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so must the Son of Man be lifted up, that all who believe in Him may not perish but have eternal life. Whence it did not seem to you that sinful men could become members of Christ, that is, of Him who would have no sin at all? You were moved by the serpent's bite: therefore, Christ is crucified, therefore Christ sheds His blood for the remission of sins; because of sin, that is, the serpent's venom: As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, from which those who were bitten by serpents in that desert might be healed, and they were commanded to look upon that lifted up one, and whosoever would look upon it, would be healed; so must the Son of Man be lifted up, that all who believe in Him, that is, who look upon Him lifted up, who are not ashamed of the crucified, who glory in the cross of Christ, may not perish but have eternal life. May not perish, from what? By believing in Him. From what will they not perish? By looking upon the lifted up one: otherwise, they would have perished. For this is the meaning: Whoever believes in Him, may not perish but have eternal life.

Help is given by another's faith to little ones wounded by the deeds of others.

You offer me a little child, and you order that it look up, whom you deny has the poison of the serpent. Actually, if you favor him, if his innocence in his own life moves you, do not deny some trace of guilt from the first life, not his own, but of his first parent. Do not deny; confess the poison, so that you may seek the remedy: otherwise, he is not healed. Or why do you tell him to believe? For this is what the one carrying the little child responds. He is healed by the words of another, because he is wounded by the deed of another. Is he asked, does he believe in Jesus Christ? The question is posed: it is answered, he believes. For the one who is not speaking, for the silent one, for the crying one, and crying in a way praying to be helped, it is responded, and it avails. Or does that serpent even try to persuade because it does not avail? May it be far from the hearts of any Christians. Therefore, it is responded, and it avails. The spirit communicates by a certain conspiracy; he believes in another, because he sinned in another. Or indeed, does he find the life of this present age, whom weakness gave birth to; and does he not find the life of the future age, whom charity gave birth to? The bronze serpent lifted up is a figure of Christ crucified in the likeness of sinful flesh.

Therefore, just as Moses lifted up the serpent in the desert, so that everyone bitten by the serpent would look at it lifted up and be healed: so must the Son of Man be lifted up, so that everyone poisoned by the serpent looks at Him lifted up and is healed. The first Adam received the serpent's bite with venom. Therefore, born in the flesh of sin, he is saved in Christ through the likeness of the flesh of sin. For God sent His Son, not in the flesh of sin; but, as he who wrote followed up, in the likeness of the flesh of sin; because it was not from marital union, but from a virginal womb. He sent Him in the likeness of the flesh of sin: why so? So that sin might be condemned in the flesh by sin: sin from sin, serpent from serpent. For who doubts that sin is called by the name serpent? Therefore, sin from sin, serpent from serpent: but from likeness, because there is no sin in Christ, only the likeness of the flesh of sin. Therefore, the serpent was lifted up, but made of bronze; the likeness of the flesh of sin was lifted up, so that the origin of sin might be healed. Because God sent His Son in the likeness of the flesh of sin. Not in the likeness of flesh; for it is true flesh, but in the likeness of the flesh of sin; because it is mortal flesh without any sin at all. So that by sin, on account of the likeness, He might condemn sin in the flesh, on account of true iniquity. There was no true iniquity in Christ: but there was mortality in Him. He did not take on sin, but He took on the punishment of sin. By taking on the punishment without guilt, He healed both the punishment and the guilt. Behold how these things are done. Which Nicodemus, amazed, had said: How can these things be? For thus we are healed, not because we deserve it. Behold how these things are done. Now where do you place little ones for me? Do you now say: They were struck by no poison. Take them away from the sight of the lifted serpent. But if you do not take them away, you say they need healing, you confess they are poisoned.

Whoever does not believe in Christ is condemned. Judgment for condemnation. Infants called faithful. Sin of origin.

Then the Lord himself in the same discourse to Nicodemus—did you not hear what he said when the same reading was read today? He who believes in him is not judged; but he who does not believe has already been judged. And here you seek a middle ground, man of mediation, and you dispute, and you listen attentively, yet you do not pay attention: He who believes in him is not judged; but he who does not believe has already been judged. What does it mean: Has already been judged? He is condemned. For you know that judgment is often used to mean condemnation: the scriptures testify to this, especially in that one most clear testimony, which no one contradicts. When the Lord spoke of the resurrection: Those who have done good, he says, to the resurrection of life; those who have done evil, to the resurrection of judgment: certainly, he used judgment to mean condemnation. And do you dare to discuss or believe otherwise? He who does not believe has already been judged. In another place: He who believes in the Son has eternal life: which you promised to infants who were not baptized. He who believes in the Son has eternal life. But he says, even the non-believing infant, although he does not have the kingdom of God, has it. But see what follows: But he who is disobedient to the Son will not see life; but the wrath of God remains on him. Where do you place the baptized infants? Surely among the number of the faithful. For this reason, by the ancient, canonical, and well-founded custom of the Church, baptized infants are called faithful. And thus we inquire about them: Is this infant a Christian? The answer is: Christian. Catechumen or faithful? Faithful; surely from faith, and faith from believing. Therefore, you will reckon baptized infants among the believers: nor will you dare to judge otherwise in any way if you do not wish to be a manifest heretic. Therefore, they have eternal life because he who believes in the Son has eternal life. Do not promise eternal life to them without this faith, and without the sacrament of this faith. However, he who does not believe in the Son, and he who does not believe in the Son, does not have life, but the wrath of God remains upon him. He did not say: It will come upon him; but, it remains upon him. He looked to the origin when he said: The wrath of God remains upon him. The Apostle, looking to this, said: We were by nature children of wrath at one time. We do not accuse nature. The author of nature is God. Nature was established good by God; but by evil will from the serpent, it was corrupted. Therefore, what was in Adam of guilt, not of nature, has become nature to us, his descendants. From this vice of nature, with which man is born, none can liberate except him who was born without vice. From this flesh of sin, none can liberate except him who was born without sin in the likeness of the flesh of sin. From this poison of the serpent, none can liberate except the exaltation of the serpent. What do you say to these things? Is this enough? The evasion of the Pelagians when pressed by the words of the Apostle about original sin. Not the first example of sinning, but the sin of origin is signified there.

Pay close attention to a certain very sharp argument that they bring forward. When they begin to be pressed by the words of the Apostle who says: Through one man sin entered into the world, and through sin death; and thus death passed upon all men, in whom all have sinned. I do not know who does not understand these words; in which words I do not know whether anyone requires an expositor: they try to reply and say it was said by the Apostle because Adam sinned first, and those who sinned afterward sinned by imitating him. What is this other than trying to cast darkness over the open light? Sin entered through one man and through sin death; and thus it passed upon all men, in whom all have sinned. You say it is because of imitation, because Adam sinned first.

I respond absolutely: Adam did not sin first. If you seek the first sinner, look at the devil. But the Apostle, wishing to show the human race contaminated from the origin, hence laid down from where we were born, not whom we had imitated. Your father is indeed also called, whom you would imitate: My children, he says, whom I travail with again. He likewise says: Be imitators of me. And on account of that very imitation it is said to the impious: You are from your father, the devil. For it is clear in the catholic faith that the devil neither begot our nature nor created it: there is only in him the seduction of the former, imitation of the latter. Finally, as it is said of Adam: In whom all have sinned; let it be read to me somewhere, All have sinned in the devil. It is one thing to sin with him preceding and seducing, another to sin in him. Because according to the propagation of the flesh we were all in him before we were born, just as in a parent, just as in a root we were there: thus this tree is poisoned, where we were. For since origin does not pertain to the devil, that is, the prince of sin, and truly the first sinner, but imitation; when Scripture spoke of him: By the envy of the devil, death entered the world: however, those who are from his side imitate him. By imitating him, they become from his side. Has it ever been said, They sinned in him? But when it was said of Adam, because of the origin, because of the posterity, because of the propagation of the entrails: In whom all have sinned, he says. For if Adam was therefore established first because he sinned first, as if he were an example, not in origin; why after such a long time, after such extended ages, is Christ sought against Adam? If all sinners pertain to Adam because he was the first sinner, all just ones ought to have pertained to Abel because he was the first just one. Why is Christ sought? Wake up, brother. Why is Christ sought, if not because in Adam the generation is condemned, in Christ regeneration is sought? The objection of the Pelagians against original sin, Why is a person not born just after being baptized.

Therefore, let no one deceive us: Scripture is clear, authority is well-established, faith is most catholic. Everyone who is born is condemned: no one is liberated unless they are reborn. Hence also you, now instructed, respond to their other cunning arguments, dear ones, when they say, and disturb infants, "If sinners are born of sinners, why are the just not born from the baptized who are already faithful, to whom all sins have been forgiven?" Quickly respond: For this reason the just are not born from the baptized, because he does not generate from what he was regenerated, but from what he was generated. It was said of Christ: "Put to death in the flesh, made alive by the Spirit": thus it can be said of man, "Decomposed in flesh, justified in spirit." That which is born of the flesh is flesh. You ask that the just be born from the just, when you see that being just is impossible without being reborn. Nor do you consider the Lord's declaration, which you yourself have on your lips: "Unless one is born of water and the Spirit." I think this did not happen in intercourse. You wonder why a sinner is born from the seed of a just man: does it not delight you to wonder why an olive tree sprout comes from the seed of an olive tree? Receive another analogy. Place a baptized just man as a purified grain: do you not see that from the purified grain, wheat with chaff is born, without which it is sown. Moreover, since the generation of those who are born is carnal, and the generation of those who are reborn is spiritual, do you want the baptized to be born from the baptized, when you see that the circumcised are not born from the circumcised? This generation is certainly carnal, and circumcision is carnal, and yet the circumcised are not born from the circumcised: thus, therefore, the baptized cannot be born from the baptized; because no one is reborn before they are born.

Another mockery of the same is exploded. Christ benefits nothing to those who do not believe. Christ benefits baptized infants. Baptized infants are truly believing through the faith of others. Infants believe by the faith of their parents.

Another of their arguments seems very sharp: but what sharpness is not blunted by the shield of truth? Another thing they say, see what kind. If Adam, they say, harms those who have not sinned; therefore, Christ ought to benefit even those who have not believed. You certainly see how sharp this is against the truth: hear how much it helps the truth. For he who says this says nothing else except that Christ benefits nothing to unbelievers. This is true. Who would not accept it? Who would not agree that Christ is of no benefit to unbelievers, but is beneficial to believers? But tell me, I beg you, does Christ benefit baptized infants in any way, or not at all? It is necessary to say that He benefits them: they are pressed by the weight of Mother Church. Indeed, they would perhaps want to say this; for their arguments seem to compel them to it: but they are restrained by the authority of the Church, lest I should say they are overwhelmed not just by the spit of men, but carried off as if by a stream by the tears of the infants themselves. For if they say that Christ benefits baptized infants nothing at all; they say nothing other than, Infants are baptized in vain. However, that they are not baptized in vain, since they do not dare to say this, they confess that Christ benefits baptized infants.

If it benefits the baptized, I ask whom it benefits, believers or unbelievers? Let them choose what they wish. If they say, Unbelievers: where then is what you were slandering, because Christ cannot benefit unbelievers? Behold, you confess that it benefits infants, who are not yet believers. It benefits for any purpose: do you not believe for eternal life, do you not believe for eternal salvation: to receive the kingdom of heaven itself, Christ certainly benefits baptized infants. Does it therefore benefit unbelievers? But far be it, that I should say infants are unbelievers. I have already discussed above, one believes through another, who has sinned through another: it is said, He believes; and it is valid, and he is counted among the faithful baptized. This has the authority of Mother Church, this canon founded on truth prevails: against this strength, against this impregnable wall, whoever strikes, he himself is broken. Therefore Christ benefits the baptized infants in something; and just as I say, and just as the whole Church with me says, it benefits believers, it benefits the faithful: choose what you wish. Indeed, I want you to choose what is truer; so that you may say with us that it benefits believers. But if you say, It benefits unbelievers; you have spoken against yourself. If you say, It benefits believers; you have spoken with me. Choose, whether you will speak falsely against yourself, or speak truly with me. For a little while ago, you were saying that Christ benefits nothing to unbelievers, wishing to make it so because just as Adam harmed nothing to those who did not sin, just as Christ benefits nothing to unbelievers. Behold, you now confess that Christ benefits baptized infants who are not yet believers. But if you say it benefits believers, you speak well, you speak with me, infants also believe. From where do they believe? How do they believe? By the faith of the parents. If they are cleansed by the faith of the parents, they were defiled by the sin of the parents. The body of death in the first parents begot them as sinners: the spirit of life in the later parents regenerated them as faithful. You give faith to him who does not answer, and I give sin to him who does nothing.

Against original sin the Apostle is improperly cited. There are many ways of sanctification. The saints, he says, ought to be born from saints: because the Apostle said: Otherwise your children would be unclean; but now they are holy. And how do you understand this? How do you interpret a child born of believers as being so holy that he should not be baptized? Interpret this holiness however you wish. For there are many types of holiness, and many types of sanctification. Indeed, not everything that is sanctified is destined for the kingdom of heaven. The Apostle said concerning our food: It is sanctified by the word of God and prayer. Does this mean that because our food is sanctified, we do not know where it will go? Therefore, understand that there is a certain kind of sanctification, almost like a shadow, which is not sufficient for the attainment of salvation. There is a distinction, and what that distinction is, only God knows. However, when the child of believers is rushed to Baptism; parents should not err in believing that he was already born as a believer. For they can say he is born, but not reborn. For you must understand how the children of believers are sanctified, and I will not seek now, because it would take too long, the nature of this sanctification; where you also have an unbelieving husband, there you also have a believing wife. He said the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the wife, and the unbelieving wife by her believing husband. Does this mean that just because there is perhaps a certain kind of sanctification, so that the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the believing wife, he should therefore receive assurance that he is going to enter the kingdom of heaven, and does not need to be baptized, regenerated, or redeemed by the blood of Christ? Just as the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the wife and yet perishes unless he is baptized—so too the children of believers, though sanctified to a certain extent, still perish if they are not baptized. The authority of Cyprian concerning original sin.

I ask you to listen a little. I only read. It is Saint Cyprian, whose work I have taken in hand, an ancient bishop of this See: receive in a little what he thought concerning the Baptism of infants, indeed what shows that the Church has always thought. For it is of little concern that these people argue and dispute impious novelties, and strive to accuse us of saying something new. Therefore, I read Saint Cyprian, so that you may see how the canonical understanding and the catholic sense are in these words which I considered a little before. He was asked whether an infant ought to be baptized before the eighth day, because by the old Law it was not permitted to circumcise an infant except on the eighth day. The question arose from this, concerning the day of baptism: for concerning the origin of sin there was no question; and therefore from that matter, about which there was no question, the arisen question was resolved. Among other things which I mentioned above, Saint Cyprian said: For this reason, we think no one should be prevented from attaining grace by a law that is now established, nor should spiritual circumcision be hindered by carnal circumcision, but everyone should altogether be admitted to the grace of Christ: when even Peter speaks in the Acts of the Apostles and says: "God has shown me not to call any person common or unclean." Otherwise, if humans could impede anything to attain grace, then more adults, those advanced in age, and elders might be impeded by more serious sins. Nevertheless, if even to the gravest delinquents who sinned much before against the Lord, when later they have believed, forgiveness of sins is granted, and no one is prohibited from Baptism and grace: how much more should an infant not be prohibited, who, recently born, has committed no sin, except that having been carnally born according to Adam, contracted the contagion of ancient death through the first birth; who more easily approaches to receive the remission of sins precisely because their sins are pardoned, not personal ones, but those of another? See how, without doubting about this matter, he solves that from which doubt arose. He took this from the foundation of the Church, to confirm the wavering stone.

Enemies of the truth are to be endured to some extent patiently. So let us ask our brothers, if we may, not to call us heretics, for we could perhaps call them so for disputing such things, if we wished, yet we do not do so. Let the mother bear them with loving affection to be healed, carry them to be taught, so that she does not mourn the dead. They go too far; it is too much, barely bearable, still borne with great patience. Let them not abuse this patience of the Church, let them be corrected, it is good. As friends, we exhort, not as enemies do we quarrel. They slander us, we endure: let them not slander the canon, let them not slander the truth; let them not contradict the holy Church laboring daily for the remission of original sin of infants. This matter is established. The disputant erring in other questions not diligently digested, not yet full of the authority of the Church, must be borne; there error must be tolerated: it should not go so far as to attempt to shake the very foundation of the Church. It is not expedient, perhaps our patience is not yet to be condemned: but we should fear lest negligence too be blamed. Let it suffice your Charity, treat them whom you know, treat with them amicably, fraternally, peacefully, lovingly, sorrowfully: let piety do whatever it can; because afterwards impiety will not be worthy of love. Turning to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 295

SERMO 295 On the Natal Day of the Apostles Peter and Paul The rock upon which the Church was built is Christ himself. This day has been consecrated for us by the passion of the most blessed apostles Peter and Paul. We do not speak of some obscure martyrs. Their sound has gone out into all the earth, and their words to the ends of the world. These martyrs saw what they preached, following righteousness, confessing the truth, and dying for the truth. Blessed Peter, the first of the Apostles, a fervent lover of Christ, who deserved to hear: And I say to you, that you are Peter. For he had said: You are the Christ, the Son of the living God. Christ to him: And I say to you, that you are Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church. Upon this rock I will build the faith which you confess. Upon this which you said: You are the Christ, the Son of the living God, I will build my Church. For you are Peter. From the rock Peter, not from Peter the rock. Thus from the rock Peter, just as from Christ Christian. Do you want to know from what rock Peter is called? Hear Paul: For I do not want you to be ignorant, brothers; the Apostle of Christ says: I do not want you to be ignorant, brothers, that our fathers were all under the cloud, and all passed through the sea, and all were baptized into Moses in the cloud and in the sea, and all ate the same spiritual food, and all drank the same spiritual drink. For they drank from the spiritual rock that followed them: and the rock was Christ. Behold whence Peter. The keys of the kingdom of heaven were given to Peter bearing the person of the Church. They were given to one because of the unity of the Church. Christ first resurrects, then the Church looses. The Lord Jesus chose His disciples before His passion, as you know, whom He called Apostles. Among these, almost everywhere, Peter alone deserved to bear the person of the whole Church. On account of this person, which he alone bore of the whole Church, he deserved to hear: "I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven." For these keys were received not by one man, but by the unity of the Church. Hence, therefore, Peter’s excellence is proclaimed, because he bore the figure of the united Church and its totality when it was said to him: "I give to you what has been given to all." For, that you may know that the Church received the keys of the kingdom of heaven, listen to what the Lord says to all His Apostles in another place. "Receive the Holy Spirit." And immediately: "If you forgive anyone’s sins, they are forgiven; if you retain anyone’s sins, they are retained." This pertains to the keys about which it was said: "Whatever you bind on earth will be bound in heaven, and whatever you loose on earth will be loosed in heaven." But this He said to Peter. That you may know that Peter was then carrying the person of the entire Church, hear what was said to him and what is said to all the faithful saints: "If your brother sins against you, go and tell him his fault between you and him alone. If he listens to you, you have gained your brother. But if he does not listen, take one or two others along with you, for it is written, 'In the testimony of two or three witnesses, every word shall stand.' If he refuses to listen to them, tell it to the Church. If he refuses to listen even to the Church, let him be to you as a Gentile and a tax collector. Truly I tell you, whatever you bind on earth will be bound in heaven, and whatever you loose on earth will be loosed in heaven." The dove binds, the dove looses; the building upon the rock binds and looses.

Let those who are bound fear, let those who are free fear. Those who are free, fear lest they be bound; those who are bound, pray that they may be freed. Each one is constrained by the chains of their own sins: and outside this Church, nothing is loosened. To the one who has been dead for four days, it is said: Lazarus, come forth! And he came forth from the tomb, bound hand and foot with grave clothes. The Lord awakens, so that the dead may come forth from the tomb; if He touches the heart, so that the confession of sin may come forth. But it is still tied a little. Therefore the Lord, after Lazarus came forth from the tomb, said to His disciples, to whom He had said: Whatever you bind on earth will be bound in heaven, and whatever you loose on earth will be loosed in heaven: Loose him, and let him go. He awakens by Himself, He loosens by His disciples. The strength and weakness of the Church were figured in Peter.

Therefore, the strength of the Church is especially commended in Peter; because he followed the Lord going to His passion: and a certain weakness was noted; because when questioned by a maidservant, he denied the Lord. Behold, that lover suddenly became a denier. He found himself, who had presumed of himself. For he had said, as you know: Lord, I will be with you unto death: and if it is necessary that I die, I will lay down my life for you. And the Lord to the presumptuous one: Will you lay down your life for me? Truly I say to you, before the cock crows, you will deny me three times. What the physician predicted happened: it could not happen what the sick man presumed. But what? Immediately the Lord looked at him. Thus it is written, thus the Gospel speaks: The Lord looked at him, and he went outside, and wept bitterly. He went outside: this means, to confess. He wept bitterly, who knew how to love. Sweetness followed in love, whose bitterness had preceded in sorrow. The sheep are entrusted by Christ to Peter, signifying the unity of the Church. Why Peter is asked three times about his love.

Rightly also after the resurrection, the Lord entrusted his sheep to Peter to be fed. For it was not only among the disciples that he deserved to feed the Lord's sheep: but when Christ speaks to one, unity is commended; and to Peter first, because Peter is first among the Apostles. "Simon, son of John," said the Lord, "do you love me?" He answered, "I love you." And asked again, he again answered. And asked a third time, and as if he were not believed, he was saddened. But how could he not be believed by the one who sees his heart? Finally, after that sadness, he answered thus: "Lord, you know everything, you know that I love you. For you who know all things do not know this one thing.” Do not be sad, Apostle; answer once, answer again, answer a third time. Let confession triumph three times in love, because presumption was conquered three times in fear. What you bound three times must be loosed three times. Loose through love what you had bound through fear. And yet the Lord entrusted his sheep to Peter once, and again, and a third time.

Against the Donatists, dividers of the Lord's flock.

Listen, my brothers: "Feed," He said, "my lambs, feed my sheep. Feed my sheep:" did He say: Yours? "Feed, good servant, the Lord's sheep, having the Lord's mark. For has Paul been crucified for you? or have you been baptized in the name of Peter and Paul? Therefore feed His sheep, washed by His Baptism, marked by His name, redeemed by His blood: "Feed," He said, "my sheep." For heretical wicked and runaway servants, dividing among themselves what they did not purchase, and making from stolen goods their own wealth, seem to themselves to be feeding their own sheep. For what else is it, I ask you, except: If I baptize you, you will be unclean? If you do not have my Baptism, you will not be cleansed? Have you not heard: Cursed is everyone who puts his hope in man? Therefore, beloved, those whom Peter baptized are Christ's sheep, and those whom Judas baptized are Christ's sheep. For see what the bridegroom says to his beloved in the Song of Songs, when the bride said to him: "Tell me, whom my soul loves, where you pasture, where you lie down at noon; lest I become like one who is veiled, over the flocks of your companions." Tell me, he said, where you pasture, where you lie down at noon, in the brightness of truth, in the fervor of charity. Why are you afraid, O beloved? What are you afraid of? "Lest I become," he said, "like one who is veiled," that is, like one who is obscure, like one who is not the Church; because the Church is not veiled: For the city set on a hill cannot be hidden. And wandering I may fall, not among your flock, but among the flocks of your companions. Even heretics are called companions. They went out from us: they approached the one table with us, before they went out. Therefore, what is answered to her? Unless you know yourself: the bridegroom says, answering her who asks: Unless you know yourself, O beautiful among women. O true among the heresies, unless you know yourself: because so much has been predicted about you: In your seed all nations will be blessed: God of gods, the Lord has spoken, and called the earth, from the rising of the sun to its setting: Ask of me, and I will give you the nations for your inheritance, and the ends of the earth for your possession: their voice went out into all the earth, and their words to the ends of the world: these testimonies have been predicted about you. Unless therefore you know yourself, go out. For I do not cast you out, that those who remain may say of you: They went out from us. Go out in the tracks of the flocks: not of the flock, of which it was said: There will be one flock and one shepherd. Go out in the tracks of the flocks, and feed your kids: not as Peter, my sheep. For these sheep entrusted to him, Peter deserved to be crowned with martyrdom, which by today's solemnity he deserved to be celebrated throughout the world.

Paul, from persecutor to preacher of Christ.

Let Paul come from Saul, the lamb from the wolf; first an enemy, later an apostle; first a persecutor, later a preacher. Let him come, let him receive letters from the chiefs of the priests, so that wherever he finds Christians, he may bring them bound to punishment. Let him receive, receive, proceed, go, pant for slaughter, thirst for blood: He who dwells in the heavens will laugh at him. For he was going, as it is written: Breathing out slaughter, and was approaching Damascus. Then the Lord from heaven: Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me? I am here, I am there: here the head, there the body. Therefore let us not wonder, brothers, we belong to the body of Christ. Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me? It is hard for you to kick against the goads. You harm yourself: for my Church grows through persecutions. But he, trembling and astonished, said: Lord, who are you? And he: I am Jesus the Nazarene whom you persecute. Immediately transformed, he awaits the command: he sets aside envy, prepares for obedience. He is told what to do. And before Paul is baptized, the Lord speaks to Ananias: Go to that street, to that man named Saul, baptize him; for he is a chosen vessel for me. A vessel must carry something, a vessel must not be empty. The vessel is to be filled: with what, if not grace? But Ananias answered our Lord Jesus Christ: Lord, I have heard that this man has done much evil to your saints. And now he carries letters from the chief priests, so that wherever he finds men of this way, he may bring them bound. And the Lord to him: I will show him what he must suffer for my name's sake. Ananias trembled, at the name of Saul heard; a weak sheep trembling at the fame of the wolf, even under the shepherd's hand.

Paul and Peter suffered for Christ.

Behold, the Lord showed him what he must suffer for His name. Afterwards, He trained him in labor. He was in chains, he was in beatings, he was in prisons, he was in shipwrecks. He procured suffering for him: He led him to this day. One day of passion for the two Apostles. But even those two were one: although they suffered on different days, they were one. Peter preceded, Paul followed. First Saul, later Paul: because first proud, later humble. Saul from Saul the persecutor of holy David. The persecutor was cast down, the preacher was raised up. He changed his name from pride to humility. For Paul means small. Look at your love's words: don't we say every day, "After a little while I will see you," or "In a little while I will do this or that?" Therefore, what is Paul? Ask him himself. "I am," he says, "the least of the Apostles." The days of the martyrs are celebrated for this reason, that it may delight to imitate them.

We celebrate a feast day, consecrated for us by the blood of the Apostles. Let us love their faith, life, labors, sufferings, confessions, preachings. For we make progress by loving; not by celebrating these things for carnal joy. For what do the martyrs seek from us? They have less if they still seek the praises of men. If they still seek the praises of men, they have not yet conquered. But if they have conquered, they seek nothing from us for their own sake; but they seek for our own sake. Therefore, let our path be directed in the sight of the Lord. It was narrow, thorny, hard: but by such many and so many passing through, it has become smooth. The Lord Himself passed first, the fearless Apostles passed, afterward the martyrs, children, women, maidens. But who in them? He who said: Without me you can do nothing.

Sermons - Sermon 296

SERMO 296 On the Birthday of the Holy Apostles Peter and Paul (From the Gospel where he says: Simon, son of John, do you love me?) Peter, weak, promises more than he can. The present gospel reading, fitting for today's solemnity, which has just sounded in our ears, if it descends from the ears into our heart and finds there a place of rest - for the word of God indeed rests in us when we accede to the word of God - has admonished all of us, who minister the word and sacrament of the Lord to you, to feed His sheep. Blessed Peter, the first of the Apostles, both a lover and a denier of the Lord Jesus Christ, as the Gospel indicates, followed the Lord who was to suffer; but at that time he could not follow as one who was to suffer. He followed with his feet, not yet fit to follow in deeds. He promised that he would die for Him, but he could not even stand by Him; for he had dared more than his capacity sustained. He had promised more than he could fulfill because it was not yet suitable for him to do what he had promised. "I will lay down my life for you," he said. This the Lord was about to do for His servant, not the servant for his Lord. Therefore, since he had dared too much, there he loved improperly; hence, he was afraid and denied. But later, after the Lord had risen, He taught Peter to love. Loving inordinately, he faltered under the weight of passion; but to him who now loves orderly, He promises suffering. The weakness of Peter fearing to die for the Lord.

We remember the weakness of Peter who grieved that the Lord was about to die: I recall this. Behold, I recall it: those who remember, say it with me in their hearts; those who had forgotten, let them recollect at my reminder. The Lord Jesus Christ foretold His imminent passion to His disciples. Then Peter, loving Him, but still carnally, fearing the death of the slayer of death: "God forbid it, Lord," he said, "God forbid it, be merciful to You." He would not say: "Be merciful to You," unless he recognized God. Therefore, Peter, if God is acknowledged by you, why do you fear that God may die? You are a man, He is God; and for man, God became man, assuming what He was not, not losing what He was. Therefore, in that nature was the Lord to die, in which He was also to rise again. Peter, thus, feared human death and did not want it to happen to the Lord; not knowing he wanted to close the purse, from which our price was to flow. Then he heard from the Lord: "Get behind me, Satan, for you do not have in mind the concerns of God, but merely human concerns;" to whom He had just said - when he said: "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God" - "Blessed are you, Simon Bar-Jonah, for flesh and blood did not reveal this to you, but My Father who is in heaven." Shortly before, blessed; afterwards, Satan. But why blessed? Not from his own doing: "Flesh and blood did not reveal it to you, but My Father." And why Satan? From man, and in man: "For you do not have in mind the concerns of God, but merely human concerns." Thus, Peter, loving the Lord and wanting to die for the Lord, followed; and it happened as the doctor had predicted, not as the patient had presumed. Questioned by a maidservant, he denied once, twice, thrice. He is looked upon by the Lord, he weeps bitterly, and wipes the stains of denial with the tears of piety.

Christ entrusts the sheep to Peter already loving. The Lord rises, He appears to the disciples; Peter now sees the living one, whom he had feared when dying; he does not see the Lord slain, but death slain in the Lord. Thus, confirmed by the example of the Lord's flesh, he learns to love, showing that death is not to be feared to such an extent; now it is necessary to love, seeing the Lord alive after death, now to love, now to love securely; securely, because he is to follow. Therefore the Lord says: Peter, do you love me? And he: I love, Lord. And the Lord: Not because you love me, do I want you to die for me, for this I have already done for you. But what: Do you love me? What will you give me back because you love me? Do you love me? I love. Feed my sheep. And again this, and a third time this, so that love may be confessed thrice, because fear had denied thrice. See, perceive, learn. Nothing else than do you love? is asked; nothing else than I love is answered. To the one responding it is said: feed my sheep. And with the sheep entrusted to Peter, and Peter entrusted to himself with his sheep, He now foretells his suffering and says: When you were younger, you dressed yourself and went where you wanted; but when you are old, another will dress you and carry you where you do not want. This he said, says the Evangelist, signifying by what death he was to glorify God. You see this pertains to feeding the Lord’s sheep, that death for the Lord's sheep is not to be refused. The suitable shepherd is the one who is able to lay down his life for the sheep.

Feed my sheep. Does He entrust the sheep to a suitable person, or to an unsuitable one? First, which sheep does He entrust? Not those bought with a price, not with gold, not with silver, but with blood. If a master were to entrust his sheep to his servant, he would undoubtedly consider whether the servant's wealth was sufficient to cover the value of his sheep, and he would say: If he loses them, if he scatters them, if he consumes them, he has the means to repay. Therefore, he would entrust his sheep to a suitable servant, and would look for the servant's assets to match the value of the sheep bought with money. But now, since the Lord Christ entrusts sheep to a servant whom He bought with His blood, He looks for the servant's suitability in the passion of the blood, as if saying: Feed my sheep, I entrust my sheep to you. Which sheep? The ones I bought with my blood. I died for them. Do you love me? Die for them. Indeed, that human servant of a man would repay money for the lost sheep: Peter repaid blood for the sheep that were saved. The same mandate to other shepherds of the Church as to Peter. The spirit of martyrdom makes the martyr.

Behold, brothers, I wish to say something timely. What was entrusted to Peter, what was commanded to Peter, was not heard by Peter alone: other Apostles also heard, held, and kept it, especially the apostle Paul, companion in suffering and in the apostolic day; they heard these things and transmitted them to us to be heard. We feed you, we are fed with you, may the Lord give us the strength to love you so much that we can even die for you, either in effect or in affection. For even if the apostle John did not suffer, it could not be said that he was unprepared for suffering. He did not suffer, but he could have suffered; God knew his preparation. Just as the three boys were thrown into the furnace, not to survive; would we deny them martyrdom because the flame could not burn them? Ask the flames, they did not suffer; ask their will, they were crowned. They said, God is able to deliver us from your hands: but even if not - there are certain hearts, there is steadfast faith, there is unshaken virtue, there is secure victory - but even if not, know, O king, that we will not worship the statue you have set up. God willed otherwise, they did not burn, but they extinguished the fire of idolatry in the king's soul.

Temporal tribulations must be endured for future glory. The devastation of Rome during Christian times.

You see, therefore, beloved, what is set forth in this time for the servants of God, for the future glory that will be revealed in us; against that glory no temporal affliction, however great, can be balanced. The sufferings of this time are unworthy, says the Apostle, compared to the future glory that will be revealed in us. If this is so, let no one now think carnally, it is not the time; the world is shaken, the old man is shaken off, the flesh is pressed, let the spirit melt. The body of Peter lies in Rome, men say, the body of Paul lies in Rome, the body of Lawrence lies in Rome, and the bodies of other holy martyrs lie in Rome; and Rome is miserable, and Rome is devastated; it is afflicted, crushed, burned; so many slaughters of death happen, through famine, plague, and sword. Where are the Memories of the Apostles? What do you say? Behold, I have said this: Rome suffers so many evils; where are the Memories of the Apostles? They are there, they are there but not in you. Would that they were in you, whoever you are who speak these things, whoever you are who are foolish in these things, whoever after being called in spirit you still think in the flesh, whoever you are of such kind: would that the Memories of the Apostles were in you, would that you yourself thought of the Apostles! You would see whether earthly happiness was promised to them, or eternal. To what purpose is the memory of the Apostles? The servant is arrogant who says to the commanding Lord: Why?

Hear the Apostle, if his memory lives in you: For our light and momentary troubles are achieving for us an eternal glory that far outweighs them all, as we look not to the things that are seen but to the things that are unseen; for the things that are seen are transient, but the things that are unseen are eternal. In Peter himself, flesh was temporal, and you do not wish the stone of Rome to be temporal? The Apostle Peter reigns with the Lord, the body of the Apostle Peter lies in a certain place: memory excites love towards eternal things, not so that you cling to the earth, but so that you think of heaven with the Apostle. Tell me, if you are faithful, recall the Memories of the Apostles, the memory also of your Lord God, surely now sitting in heaven. Listen where the Apostle sends you: If you have been raised with Christ, seek the things that are above, where Christ is seated at the right hand of God; set your mind on things that are above, not on things that are on earth. For you have died, and your life is hidden with Christ in God. When Christ, your life, appears, then you also will appear with him in glory. You hear this in a single word: Lift up your heart. Therefore, do you grieve and weep because wood and stones have fallen, and because those who are to die have died? We offer some who are dead yet always living; you grieve because wood and stones have fallen, and because those who are to die have died? If you lift up your heart, where do you have your heart? What is dead there? What has fallen there? If you have your heart lifted up, where your treasure is, there your heart will be also. Down below is your flesh: and if your flesh trembles, let not your heart be moved. But still, you say, I didn't want this. What did you not want? I did not want so great a suffering for Rome. We forgive you for not wanting; do not be angry with God because he did want it; you are a man, he is God. You say: I do not want, where he says: I want? He does not condemn you for your ‘not wanting,’ and you blaspheme his ‘wanting’? But why did God want this? Why did God want this? Meanwhile, serve the will of your Lord God, having become a friend, knowing the counsel of your Lord God. Who is so proud a servant that, when his Lord has commanded something to be done, he says: Why? The Lord has his counsel; let obedience pay attention if he accomplishes it well, if he has acted well, if having been a servant he has become a friend, as the Lord himself said: I no longer call you servants but friends. Perhaps even the counsel of his Lord he will learn: meanwhile, before he knows the counsel, he should bear the decision willingly.

Bear what God wills and He will give you what you want.

I am still teaching you patience, not yet wisdom: be patient, the Lord wills it. You ask why He wills it? Delay the desire for knowledge, delay zeal, prepare to obey. He wills you to bear what He wills: bear what He wills, and He will give you what you will. And yet, my brothers, I dare to say, you will gladly listen if you already hold the first part of obedience, if gentle and meek patience of bearing the Lord's will dwells in you, not only gentle: for we do not bear what is gentle, but we love it; we tolerate the harsh, we rejoice in the gentle. See your Lord, see your head, see the example of your life: consider your redeemer, your shepherd. Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me. How did he show human will, and immediately turn reluctance to obedience? Indeed, not as I will, but as you will, Father. Behold, he also said this to Peter: When you are old, another will gird you and carry you where you do not wish. He also showed in him human will concerning the fear of death. Was it that, dying unwillingly, he was crowned unwillingly? Likewise, you did not wish what? perhaps to lose your wealth, which you were going to leave here? Take care not to remain behind with the leaving. You did not wish your son to die before you, perhaps, you did not wish your wife to die before you. For what? if Rome had not been taken, would not some one of you die first? You did not wish your wife to die before you; your wife did not wish her husband to die before her: would God be obedient to both? Let the order be with Him, who knows how to order what He has created: you obey His will.

What should be answered to those accusing the Christian times.

Now I still see what you say in your heart: Behold, during Christian times Rome is afflicted, or has been afflicted, and has been burned; why during Christian times? Who says this? A Christian. Therefore, answer yourself, if you are a Christian: Because God willed it. But what do I say to the pagan? He taunts me. What does he say to you? From where does he taunt you? Behold, when we used to make sacrifices to our gods, Rome stood firm; now because the sacrifice to your God has prevailed and abounded, and the sacrifices to our gods have been inhibited and prohibited, behold what Rome suffers. Briefly answer for now, so that you may avoid him. Otherwise, have another consideration; for you were not called to embrace the earth, but to seek heaven; you were not called to earthly happiness, but to heavenly; not to temporal successes and fleeting and transient prosperity, but to eternal life with angels. Nevertheless, to this lover of carnal happiness and murmur against the living God, wishing to serve demons and woods and stones, quickly respond. As their history has it, this is the third burning of the city of Rome; as their history has it, as their writings have it, the burning of the city of Rome, which happened now, is the third. Which has now burned once among the sacrifices of Christians, had already burned twice among the sacrifices of pagans. Once it was so burned by the Gauls that only the Capitoline hill remained; the second time by Nero, I do not know whether to say raging or running rampant, Rome burned a second time. Nero, the emperor of Rome itself, a servant of idols, the killer of apostles, ordered it, and Rome was burned. Why, do you think, for what reason? A haughty, proud, and capricious man delighted in the burning of Rome. I want to see, he said, how Troy burned. Therefore, it burned once, twice, and now a third time: what pleasure do you derive from snarling against God for that which usually burns? In the destruction of Rome, the pagan has something to lament, the Christian has something to ponder. But in it, they say, so many Christians have suffered such great evils. Did you forget, it is Christian’s part to endure temporal evils and to hope for eternal goods? You, whoever you are a pagan, have reason to weep; because you have lost the temporal and have not yet found the eternal. The Christian has something to consider: “Count it all joy, my brothers, when you fall into various temptations.” When such things are read to you in the temple: “The gods, guardians of Rome, now did not preserve it, because they are not;” you would say: “They would preserve it when they were.” We show our God to be true; he foretold all these things, you have read, you have heard; but I do not know whether you remember, who are disturbed by such words. Did you not hear the prophets, did you not hear the Apostles, did you not hear the Lord Jesus Christ himself proclaiming future evils? When the age comes upon the world, when the end approaches - you have heard, brothers, together we have heard - there will be wars, there will be tumults, there will be distresses, there will be famines. Why are we contrary to ourselves, so that, when they are read we believe, but when they are fulfilled we murmur? The guilt of the world is greater if the Gospel is preached and disregarded. But more, they say, more now the human race is devastated. Meanwhile, considering past history, without questioning, I do not know whether it is more; but behold it is more, I believe because it is more. The Lord himself resolves the question. Now the world is more devastated, more devastated, he says: why is it more devastated now, when the Gospel is preached everywhere? You observe with what great celebration the Gospel is preached, and you do not observe with what great impiety it is scorned. Now, brothers, let us put pagans outside for a little while, let us turn our eyes to ourselves. The Gospel is preached, the whole world is full. Before the Gospel was preached, the will of God was hidden; in the preaching of the Gospel, the will of God was revealed. It has been told to us in the preaching of the Gospel what we ought to love, what to scorn, what to do, what to avoid, what to hope for; we have heard everything; the will of God is not hidden throughout the whole world. Consider the servant world, and observe the Gospel. Hear the voice of the Lord; this world is the servant: The servant not knowing the will of his lord, and not doing what is worthy, shall be beaten with few stripes. Servant, world; servant, because the world was made through him, and the world did not know him. The servant not knowing the will of his lord; behold what the world was before. The servant not knowing the will of his lord, and not doing what is worthy, shall be beaten with few stripes. But the servant knowing the will of his lord. Behold what the world is now: now say to yourselves what follows, rather let us say to ourselves: The servant knowing the will of his lord, and not doing what is worthy, shall be beaten with many stripes. And may he be beaten with many stripes, and not be condemned once. Why do you refuse to be beaten with many stripes, O servant knowing the will of your Lord, and doing what is worthy of stripes? It is said to you (behold one will of your Lord): Store up for yourselves treasure in heaven, where neither moth nor rust nor corruption destroys, and where thieves do not dig through, nor steal. You on earth, he in heaven, saying to you: Give to me, have treasure there, where I am the guardian, send it before you: why do you keep it? What Christ guards, does the Goth take? You, on the other hand, presumably more prudent and wiser than your Lord, only wish to store up on earth. But you have known the will of your Lord, he wished you to store it up above; therefore, storing it on earth, be prepared to be beaten with many stripes. Behold you know the will of your Lord wishing to keep you in heaven: you keep it on earth, you do what is worthy of stripes; and when you are beaten, you blaspheme, murmur, and say that what your Lord does to you should not happen. What you do, you bad servant, should that not happen?

Therefore, Peter died, so that a stone does not fall from the theater? It is better to be scourged than to be damned. At least hold that place: do not murmur, do not blaspheme; rather praise your God, because he chastises you; praise him, because he corrects you, so that he may console you.

For whom the Lord loves, he chastises, and he scourges every son whom he receives. You, a delicate son of the Lord, want to be accepted but do not want to be scourged; that you may abound and he may lie. Therefore, the memory of the Apostles, by which heaven is prepared for you, should always preserve for you the theaters of madmen on earth? Did Peter die and was buried so that a stone should not fall from the theater? God removes delights from the hands of undisciplined children. Brothers, let us diminish sins and murmurings: let us be enemies of our iniquities and our murmuring; let us be angry with ourselves, not with God. Be angry, indeed be angry, but to what purpose? And do not sin. Be angry for this purpose: so that you do not sin. Indeed, every man who repents is angry at himself: the penitent exercises anger against himself. Do you want God to spare you? Do not spare yourself: for if you spare yourself, he will not spare you; because if he spares you, you perish. You do not know what you wish for, miserable one, you perish. As it is written: He scourges every son whom he receives, so also fear this: The sinner has provoked the Lord. From where do you know, as if it were said, from where do you know that the sinner has provoked the Lord? I saw a happy sinner, I saw someone doing evil daily, and suffering no evil, and blaspheming in the Holy Spirit: I shuddered, I grieved. The sinner has provoked the Lord; this sinner, who did so much evil and suffers no evil, has provoked the Lord, has provoked the Lord: Because of the greatness of His wrath, He does not inquire. It follows: the sinner has provoked the Lord, because of the greatness of His wrath, He does not inquire. That is why He does not inquire, because He is very angry; he who takes away chastisement prepares damnation. He does not inquire: for if He inquired, He would scourge; if He scourged, He would correct. But now He is very angry, He is very angry with the prosperous wicked; do not envy them, do not want to be like them. It is better to be scourged than to be damned.

Then we are shown to love God, when we love the gains of God in our neighbor.

Thus, the Lord has entrusted His sheep to us, because He entrusted them to Peter; if indeed we are in any way worthy to tread the dust of Peter's footsteps, if indeed we are able, the Lord has entrusted His sheep to us. You are His sheep; with you, we are sheep, because we are Christians. I have already said, we are fed and we feed others. Love God, so that God may love you; and you cannot show how much you love God, except as much as you appear to love the gains of God. What do you have to offer to God, thoughtful man? What can you offer to God? What Peter also offered, all of this: Feed my sheep. What do you offer to God? That He may be greater? That He may be better? That He may be richer? That He may be more honored? Whatever you will be, He will be what He was. Therefore, consider beside you, lest perhaps you need to bestow on your neighbor what may reach God. When you have done it to one of the least of these, you have done it to Me. Therefore, if you are commanded to break bread for the hungry, should you close the church to one who knocks?

Grief of Augustine about a certain Donatist repulsed by the church. What do you wish to judge concerning the heart, man?

Why did I say this? We were saddened by what we heard, since we were not present, that certain individuals coming from the Donatists to the Church, confessing the sin of rebaptism, when they were being exhorted to repentance by the bishop, it was protested against by certain brothers, and they were driven away. I say to your Charity, our hearts were tormented by this; we confess to you, we did not approve of such diligence. I know they did it with zeal for God; I know, I do not doubt they did it with zeal for God; but they should also heed the apostle Paul, how he laments those who have zeal for God, but not according to knowledge. Behold, he was not admitted today, he will die tomorrow: from whose hands will it be demanded? You will say: But he is pretending. I respond: But he is seeking. I show that he is seeking; you show that he is pretending. Christian, now I want you to teach even me: how do you know he is pretending? Because he fears for his possessions. We know many who feared for their possessions, and therefore became Catholics; when they received freedom, some returned to them, while others remained. As long as they had not entered, they feared for their possessions; and when they entered, by learning they remained. How do you know therefore whether this one who fears for his possessions will be among those found to be pretenders, especially with such great light of truth approaching and such conviction of falsehood? Why do you wish to judge the heart, man? Therefore we have toiled, therefore we have labored, therefore the truth has been demonstrated invincible, so that it may be hostile to those who seek? We have labored so that the truth may be shown, falsehood convicted. The Lord assisted, it was done. Perhaps for whom it was done, he was changed by a certain consideration. Why do you wish to judge the heart? I see one seeking, and you accuse him of pretending? Christian, admit what you see, leave what you do not see to God. Briefly, I say to your Charity, we have heard from the Lord himself to feed the Lord's sheep; and we know what he says about the sheep through Ezekiel: that one sheep should not butt another, that one sheep should not push another, that the strong should not oppress the weak. Pay attention to what the Apostle says: Admonish the idle, comfort the fainthearted, support the weak. Admonish the idle: let this be done. Comfort the fainthearted: let this be done. Support the weak: let this be done. Be patient towards all: let this be done. See that no one repays anyone evil for evil: let this be done. He says so much: we only pay attention to: Admonish the idle. Pay attention: Admonish the idle. Count: Comfort the fainthearted, support the weak, be patient towards all, see that no one repays anyone evil for evil. You pay attention only to: Admonish the idle; be careful that you are not idle, and, what is worse, that you wish to be idle and not want to be admonished. We plead with you through Christ, we beseech you not to lay waste to our labor. Or do you think, that we are to be pleased because we have conquered falsehood? Victory always belongs to the truth. What are we? Falsehood is conquered, long since conquered; but thanks to God, because it is openly conquered and manifest to men. Worship abounded: why is fruitfulness hindered?

"Even those returning from heresy after a relapse are to be received kindly." For the rest, brothers, let these things not happen: let no one love the Church in such a way that they envy the gains of the Church. Three days ago, or four days ago, this that I speak happened; and it did not lightly resound to everyone, because the Donatists are not admitted when they come to the church. Do you think that no harm was done because this resounded to everyone? I ask you, and therefore this voice resounded today, so that the matter which resounded badly may be overshadowed by that which resounded well. Pay attention; this is what we have said, this is what we preach. Let them come, let them be admitted as usual, who have never yet been Catholics. But those who have already been Catholics, and were found to be slippery, found to be inconstant and weak, found to be treacherous—do I spare them? absolutely treacherous—perhaps those who were treacherous will be faithful; let them also come to be admitted to penance. Nor should they flatter themselves, because returning to the part of Donatus they did penance there. That penance was about a good thing: let it be true about a bad thing. When they did penance in the part of Donatus, they repented for what they had done well; now let them act so that they repent what they did badly. Do you fear, because they were found treacherous, lest they trample on the holy? Behold, even to this your fear is addressed: they are dismissed in penance; they will be in penance, when they wish to be reconciled now with no one compelling, no one frightening. Because a penitent Catholic no longer suffers threats of laws; he started to want to be reconciled while no one was frightening: then at least believe the willingness. Suppose he was forced to be Catholic: he will be penitent. Who compels him to seek the place of reconciliation, except his own will? Therefore let us now admit the weakness, so that later we may test the willingness.

Sermons - Sermon 297

SERMO 297 ON THE BIRTHDAY OF THE APOSTLES PETER AND PAUL The presumption of Peter. Fear from human weakness, love from divine grace.

Today the blood of the Apostles has made for us a festive day. This they repaid, what was expended for them by the blood of the Lord. Blessed Peter, as we have just heard, is commanded to follow: and yet he was contemplating to lead, when he said to the Lord: I will lay down my life for you. Presumption carried him, he did not know his own fear. He wished to go ahead, whom he should follow. He desired good, but did not keep the order. How bitter death was, he realized with bitter fear, and he washed the sin of bitter fear with bitter tears. Fear was questioned by a servant girl, love by the Lord. And what did fear respond, except human trembling? What did love respond, except divine profession? For to love God is the gift of God. When the Lord was asking Peter about love, he was demanding what he had given.

Peter is foretold to suffer what he will not want.

What, however, did the Lord foretell to Peter, about which this festive day is? When you were younger, he said, you girded yourself, and walked where you wished; but when you shall be old, another will gird you, and will carry you where you do not wish. Where is: I will be with you unto death? Where is: I will lay down my life for you? Behold, you will fear, behold, you will deny, behold, you will weep; and for whom you feared to die, he will rise again, and you will be strengthened. For what wonder is it that Peter feared, before Christ rose again? Behold, now Christ has risen, now the truth of the soul and the flesh appears, now what is promised is confirmed by example. The Lord is seen alive after the cross, after death, after the tomb. It is little that He is seen: He is touched, handled, proven. He did spend forty days with the disciples, coming in and going out, eating and drinking, not from necessity, but from power; not from need, but from charity: eating and drinking, not from hunger, nor from thirst, but teaching and demonstrating. Having been proven true and truthful, He ascended into heaven, sent the Holy Spirit, filled the believers and those praying, sent out the preachers. And yet after all these things, another girds Peter, and carries him where he does not wish. That which you wanted when the Lord predicted, then you wished when you had to follow. The bitterness of death endured by the martyrs. Hence, the crown of the martyrs is more illustrious. Thorns trampled by stony feet.

Another will gird you and carry you where you do not wish to go. The Lord consoles concerning this by transforming our weakness into himself and saying: My soul is sorrowful unto death. Hence great martyrs, because they tread upon the sweetness of this world: hence great martyrs, because they endured the most bitter harshness of a bitter death. For if it is easy to bear death, what great thing did the martyrs endure for the death of the Lord? From where are they great, from where are they exalted, from where are they crowned much more splendidly than other men? From where, as the faithful know, are martyrs recited in their own place distinguished from the deceased; nor is prayer said for them, but the Church is commended to their prayers? Why is this, except that the death which they chose to receive for the confession of the Lord rather than deny Christ is indeed bitter? Indeed nature recoils from death. Look at the whole race of animals, you will find none that does not wish to live, that does not fear to perish. The human race has this sense. Death is harsh: but not, I say, because death is harsh, therefore life must be denied. Even Peter when an old man did not want to die. He did not indeed want to die, but he preferred to follow Christ. He preferred to follow Christ rather than not die. If there had been a broad way by which he could follow Christ without dying, who doubts that he would seize it and choose it? But there was no way to follow Christ to where he wanted to go but by a way which he did not want to suffer. Accordingly, the sheep followed the rams through that harshness of death. The holy Apostles are the rams of the sheep. The way of death is harsh, full of thorns: but these thorns crushed under the stony feet of Peter and when Peter passed. The love of whose life is praised?

We do not blame, we do not accuse, even if this life is loved. But let this life be loved in such a way that in its love, sin is not committed. Let life be loved, but let life be chosen. I ask the lovers of life, and I say: Who is the man who wants life? Even in silence, you all respond: Who is the man who does not want life? I add what the Psalm added: Who is the man who wants life, and loves to see good days? It is answered: For who is the man who does not want life, and who does not love to see good days? If, therefore, you wish to come to life and see good days, because that is the reward, attend to the work of this reward: Keep your tongue from evil. This follows in the Psalm. Who is the man who wants life, and loves to see good days? It is added: Keep your tongue from evil, and your lips from speaking deceit: turn away from evil, and do good. Now say, I want. I was asking, Do you want life? You were responding, I want. I was asking, Do you want to see good days? You were responding, I want. Hold your tongue from evil. Now say, I want. Turn away from evil, and do good. Say, I want. If indeed you want this; seek the work, and you run to the reward. The crown is given to Paul as his due because grace, which was not owed, had preceded.

Pay attention to the Apostle Paul, for today is also his feast day. Both led a harmonious life, both shed their blood together, both received the heavenly crown, both consecrated today. Pay attention, therefore, to the Apostle Paul; recall the words we heard a little while ago when his Epistle was being read. "For I am already being poured out as a libation, and the time of my departure has come. I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith. From now on there is reserved for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, will give me on that day." He will not deny the debt owed, He who granted what was not due. The righteous judge will give the crown; He will give it: for He has one to whom He can give it. "I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith:" He will give the crown deserved by such merits; He will not deny the debt, as I said, He who granted what was not due. What is that which He granted that was not due? "I was formerly a blasphemer, a persecutor, and a man of violence." What then did He grant that was not due? Let us hear the one confessing, and praising the giver of grace by his own confession. "Formerly," he said, "I was a blasphemer, a persecutor, and a man of violence." Was it owed to you, therefore, that you should be an apostle? What was owed to a blasphemer and a persecutor and a man of violence? What, if not eternal damnation? And in exchange for eternal damnation, what did he receive? "But I received mercy, because I acted ignorantly in unbelief." This is the mercy that God granted not due. Hear him again saying elsewhere: "I am not fit to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the church of God." Therefore, I see, Apostle, that you were not fit. How is it then, that it was given to you, to be fit? Why then are you what you were not fit to be? Hear: "But by the grace of God I am what I am."

I was what I was by my punishment: I am what I am by the grace of God. "By the grace of God," he said, "I am what I am: and His grace toward me was not in vain; but I worked harder than any of them." So did you repay the grace of God? Did you receive and repay? Pay attention to what you said. "I pay attention," he said. "Not I, but the grace of God which is with me." Therefore, will the just God deny the deserved crown to this laborious Apostle, who fought the good fight, finished the race, and kept the faith, to whom He granted the grace which was not due? Our merits are gifts from God. We conquer through Him who loved us. To whom, then, will He render the deserved crown, O little Paul, great one, to whom will He render it? Surely according to your merits. You have fought the good fight, finished the course, kept the faith: He will render the deserved crown to these your merits. But that the crown may be rendered to you, your merits are the gifts of God. Behold you have fought the good fight, finished the course. For you saw another law in your members, warring against the law of your mind, and bringing you into captivity to the law of sin which is in your members: whence for you to conquer, unless from what follows? Wretched man that I am, who will deliver me from the body of this death? The grace of God, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Behold whence you fought, behold whence you labored, behold whence you did not faint, behold whence you conquered. See him fighting: Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Tribulation? or distress? or famine? or persecution? or nakedness? or peril? or sword? As it is written, For your sake we are put to death all the day long, we are accounted as sheep for the slaughter. Behold weakness, labor, misery, dangers, temptations. Whence is the victory of those who contend? Hear what follows: But in all these things we are more than conquerors through him who loved us. You have finished the course: by whom being led, by whom being guided, by whom being helped? What do you say here? I have finished the course, he says; but it is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy. You have kept the faith, it is true. Firstly, which faith? What did you give yourself? It is false what you said: As God has allotted to each a measure of faith. Do you not address certain of your fellow contenders, laboring and running with you in this race of life, to whom you say: For to you it has been granted in behalf of Christ? What has been granted? Not only to believe in him, but also to suffer for him. Behold both have been granted, both to believe, and to suffer for Christ.

It is God's to guard His gifts in us. But perhaps someone says: "Indeed, I received faith, but I kept it." You perhaps say this, whoever you are who hears these foolish things, "I received faith, but I kept it." Our Paul does not say this: "I kept it." For he looks back: "Unless the Lord guards the city, the watchman labors in vain who keeps it." Work, guard: but it is good that you are guarded. For you are not sufficient to guard yourself. If you are forsaken, you will doze and sleep. However, he who guards Israel does not slumber or sleep.

Life should be loved, but the good life. All men want good things except for their own soul.

Therefore, we love life, and we in no way doubt that we love life: nor can we entirely deny that we love life. Therefore, let us choose life if we love life. What do we choose? Life. First good here; after this, eternal. First good here, but not yet blessed. Let a good life be led now, for afterward a blessed one is preserved. A good life is the task; a blessed life is the reward. Lead a good life, and you will receive a blessed one. What is more just, what is more orderly? Where are you, lover of life? Choose the good. If you wanted a wife, you would want only a good one: you love life, and choose an evil one? Tell me what evil thing you would want. Whatever you might want, whatever you might love, you want a good thing. You certainly do not want a bad horse, not a bad servant, not bad clothing, not a bad estate, not a bad house, not a bad wife, not bad children. You seek all good things: be good yourself, who seeks them. Why do you wrong yourself, that among all the good things you want, you alone want to be bad? Your estate is dear to you, your wife, your clothing, and, to come to the end, your shoe; and has your soul become worthless to you? Certainly, this life is full of labors, hardships, temptations, miseries, pains, fears: certainly, it is manifest that it is full of all these evils. And yet, even as it is full of all these evils, if anyone were to give it to us eternally just as it is, how much thanks would we give, so as to be always miserable? Not such a life does the true God promise, but the true truth. The true truth promises life, not only eternal but also blessed; where there is no trouble, no labor, no fear, no pain. There, full and entire certain security. Life under God, life with God, life of God, life itself is God. Such an eternal life is promised to us: and is this temporary one, this miserable and burdensome one, preferred? Is it preferred, I say, or not? It is preferred when you want to commit homicide, lest you die. For you fear lest a servant kill you, and you kill the servant. You fear lest your wife kill you, whom perhaps you suspect wrongly; and dismissing your wife, you desire adulterous marriages with another. Behold, by loving life, you have lost life: you have preferred temporal life to eternal, miserable to blessed. And what have you found? Perhaps when you preserve life, unwilling you expire. When you depart from here, you do not know. With what face do you approach Christ? With what face do you refuse punishment? I do not say, With what face do you ask for a reward? You will be condemned to eternal death, who choose temporal life, by the choice of which you despise the eternal. A blessed life is not to be sought here. We make the days bad. For man, evil comes only from man. A person freed from his own evil cannot be harmed by anyone. But you do not heed advice. You seek life, you seek good days. It is good that you seek, but it is not here. This precious stone has its own region, it is not born here. No matter how much you labor in digging, you will not find here what is not here. But do what is commanded, and what you love will be given. For behold, however long this life may be, will you find good days here? See what he added: Life and good days: lest life be, and be miserable because of bad days. Here, bad days abound: but bad days are not made by the sun, which runs coming from east to west, and proceeds the next day: but bad days, brothers, we make. If we all lived well, we would have good days even here. Indeed, from where comes evil for man, if not from man? Count how many things people suffer from externally. What does not seem to be done by human beings is very few. Evils abound for man from man. Theft by man, he suffered adultery in his wife by man, his servant was seduced by man, he was deceived by man, proscribed by man, attacked by man, led captive by man. Deliver me, O Lord, from the evil man. Now you, whoever you are listening, think only of the enemy, whom you endure as a nearby evil, powerful, companion, citizen. Perhaps you think of the thief when you hear: Deliver me, O Lord, from the evil man; and thus you pray, when you pray, that God may deliver you from an evil man, whether this or that enemy of yours. Do not be evil to yourself. Hear me: may God deliver you from yourself. For when God by His grace and mercy makes you good from evil; from what does He make you good, from what does He deliver you, if not from yourself, the evil man? Absolutely, my brothers, this is true, this is certain, this is fixed: if God has delivered you from yourself, the evil man, no other evil man will be able to harm you.

Paul liberated himself from evil.

I will propose an example which is discussed, concerning the Apostle Paul himself, whose day of suffering we celebrate. He was a persecutor, blasphemer, and insolent. He was a bad man; he himself was his own punishment. Furthermore, while he breathed out threats and thirsted for the blood of Christians, about to shed his own, having letters from the chief priests, that in Damascus he might find any followers of the Christian way, to bring them bound for punishment, treading the path of cruelty, knowing nothing of piety, he heard a voice from above, our Lord Jesus Christ himself from heaven saying: Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me? It is hard for you to kick against the goad. Struck by that voice, the persecutor was prostrated and the preacher raised up: he was blinded in the flesh, so that he might see in the heart; illuminated in the flesh, so that he might preach from the heart. What is seen, brothers? Saul was freed from the bad man; from whom, if not from himself Saul? Because he was freed from the bad man himself, what could another bad man do to him? These are the words of the Apostle Peter: And who will harm you, if you be lovers of good? A bad man persecuted, a bad man stoned, a bad man beat with rods: finally, a bad man seized, bound, dragged, and killed him. As many evils as he added, as much good did God prepare. Whatever he suffered was not a torment of punishment, but an occasion for a crown. See what it means to be freed from a bad man, that is, from oneself. Who, he says, will harm you, if you be lovers of good?

Evil things do not harm a man liberated from the evil within himself. How the feasts of the saints are to be celebrated. But behold, evil men harm. So much they have done to you, O Paul. Paul responds to you: It was necessary for me to be freed from an evil man, that is, from myself. Otherwise, what do these evil men do to me? The sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed in us. For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, works for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, while we look not at the things which are seen. For the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal. Truly you are freed from the evil man, that is from yourself, so that other evil men would not harm you, but rather profit you. Therefore, beloved, let us celebrate the feast day of the saints, who have fought against sin even to bloodshed, and with the Lord granting and helping, overcame, in such a way that we may love; so let us love, that we may imitate; by imitating, we may deserve to reach their rewards.

Sermons - Sermon 298

SERMO 298 TREATISE ON THE FEAST OF THE HOLY APOSTLES PETER AND PAUL The birthdays of Peter and Paul are to be celebrated with greater frequency.

We indeed ought to celebrate the day of such great martyrs, that is, the holy Apostles Peter and Paul, with greater attendance. For if we very often celebrate the birthdays of lambs, how much more should we celebrate those of rams? For about the faithful, whom the Apostles gained through their preaching, it is written: Bring to the Lord the sons of rams. Through the straits of sufferings, through the way full of thorns, through the tribulations of persecutions, so that the faithful may pass after them, they had the Apostles as leaders. Blessed Peter, the first of the Apostles, and blessed Paul, the last of the Apostles, who duly worshipped Him who said: I am the first, and I am the last, met on one day of passion: the first and the last. Peter was the ordainer of Saint Stephen. When Stephen the martyr was ordained as a deacon, among other Apostles, the Apostle Peter ordained him. Peter, his ordainer; Paul, his persecutor. But let us not seek the former things of Paul; let us rejoice in the latter things of the last one. For if we seek the former things, even those of Peter himself will not please us enough. We have said that Paul was the persecutor of Stephen. Let us look at Peter, the denier of the Lord. Peter washed his denial of the Lord with tears; Paul expiated the persecution of Stephen with blindness. Peter wept before the lash; Paul also endured the lash. Both good, both holy, both most devoted: their letters are read daily to the peoples. And to which peoples? and to how many peoples? Consider the Psalm: Their voice has gone out into all the earth, and their words to the ends of the world. And we give proof: for those words have come to us too, and have awakened us from sleep, and turned us from the madness of unbelief to the health of faith.

First and foremost, Peter and Paul, the wound of love.

I say these things, beloved, rejoicing indeed on this day because of such a great feast, but somewhat saddened, because I do not see as great a crowd gathered as ought to have been gathered on the birthday of the Apostles' passion. If it were hidden from us, it would not be attributed to us; but since it is not hidden from anyone, what is this great laziness? Do you not love Peter and Paul? I speak to those in you who are not here. For I give thanks to you, for at least you have come. And is it possible for the spirit of any Christian not to love Peter and Paul? If he is still cold, let him read and love; if he still does not love, let him take the arrow of the word into his heart. For it is said about the apostles themselves: "Your arrows are sharp, powerful." By these arrows, what follows happened: "The peoples will fall under you." Such wounds are good. The wound of love is healing. The bride of Christ sings in the Song of Songs: "I am wounded by love." When is this wound healed? When our desire is satisfied with good things. It is called a wound as long as we desire and have not yet attained. For thus is love, thus there is also pain. When we have arrived, when we have attained, then the pain passes, the love does not diminish.

Paul's joy with his suffering approaching. Through distress one passes to a place of broadness.

You have heard the words in the letter of Paul, which he wrote to his disciple the blessed Timothy: For I am already being poured out like a drink offering. He saw the imminent suffering: he saw it, but did not fear it. Why did he not fear? Because he had already said: I desire to depart and be with Christ. For I, he says, am already being poured out like a drink offering. No one says with such exultation that he is about to dine, and have a great feast, with as much exultation as he says he is about to suffer. For I am already being poured out like a drink offering. What does it mean to be poured out like a drink offering? I will be a sacrifice. A sacrifice for whom? For God: because precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints. I, he says, am being poured out like a drink offering. I am secure: I have a priest above who will offer me to God. I have the same priest, who was previously a victim for me. I am already being poured out like a drink offering, and the time of my departure is at hand. He called it departure from the body.

There is indeed a certain sweet bond of the body, and man is bound and does not wish to be freed. Yet he who said, "Desiring to be dissolved, and to be with Christ," rejoiced that these bonds would someday be loosed; the bonds of carnal members would be loosed, and the garments and ornaments of eternal virtues would be taken up. Securely he lay down the flesh, to receive a crown. Happy exchange, holy migration, how blessed the abode! Faith sees it, not yet the eye; for "eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor has it entered into the heart of man, what God has prepared for those who love Him." Where are these saints, we suppose? There where it is good. Why seek more? You do not know the place, but consider the merit. Wherever they are, they are with God. The souls of the just are in the hand of God, and torment does not touch them, but they passed through torments to a place without torment: they reached a place of breadth through narrow ways. Therefore, let him who desires such a homeland not fear the laborious path. "The time," he says, "of my dissolution is at hand. I have fought the good fight, I have finished the course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of justice." Rightly do you hasten, rightly do you rejoice to be made a sacrifice: for there truly remains a crown of justice for you. The bitterness of suffering is still imminent, but thought of the suffering passes over it, and considers what lies beyond; not the way by which one goes, but the goal to which one goes. And since with great love the goal is considered to which one goes, with great strength is trodden the path by which one goes. The crown would not be given as due, unless grace had first been given as undeserved. But when he had said: "There is laid up for me a crown of righteousness," he added: "Which the Lord, the righteous judge, will give me on that day." A righteous judge will give, he has not yet given. For if, O Paul, formerly Saul, when you persecuted the saints of Christ, when you kept the garments of those who stoned Stephen, the Lord had exercised righteous judgment upon you, where would you be? What place for your great crime would be found in the depths of hell? But then He did not give to you, so that now He may give. For we read your words about your former deeds in your epistle, and by you we know. You said: "For I am the least of the apostles, who am not worthy to be called an apostle." You are not worthy, and He made you one. Therefore He did not give you what you deserved, because He granted honor to you who deserved punishment. "I am not," he says, "worthy to be called an apostle." Why? "Because I persecuted the Church of God." If you persecuted the Church of God, then how are you an Apostle? "But by the grace of God I am what I am." Before, grace; now, a debt; before, grace was given, now, a debt is repaid. "By the grace of God I am what I am." I am nothing. Whatever I am, I am by the grace of God. Whatever I am, but now an Apostle; for what I was, I was: "By the grace of God I am what I am, and His grace to me was not in vain, but I labored more abundantly than all of them." What is this, Apostle Paul? It seems you have lifted yourself up, as if something from pride is said: "I labored more abundantly than all of them." Recognize this. I recognize it, he says: "Yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me." He had not forgotten, but as the last to rejoice in the end, the last to be saved: "Yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me."

Victory is given to the one who struggles through Christ. The merits of men are gifts of God.

Then it was not rewarded, now what? I have finished the race, I have kept the faith: for the rest, there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, will award to me on that day. You fought the good fight. But who made you win? I read to you yourself, and you say: I give thanks to God, who gives us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. What good would it have been to fight, if you could not win? Therefore, although you fought indeed, Christ gave victory. Follow another: I have finished the race. And who did this in you? Didn't you say: It is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy? Say what follows: I have kept the faith. And how did you get this? Hear your words: I obtained mercy to be faithful. Therefore, you kept the faith through the mercy of God, not through your own strength. For the rest, therefore, the crown of righteousness is laid up for you, which the Lord, the righteous judge, will award to you on that day. He will reward according to merits, therefore he is a righteous judge. But even here, let not your neck be raised, for your merits are his gifts. What I said to him, I learned from him, and you all surely learned with me in this same school. We preside above in position because of the announcement, but in one school we have a common Master in heaven.

Sermons - Sermon 299

SERMO 299 ON THE BIRTHDAY OF THE APOSTLES PETER AND PAUL (In which it is disputed against the heresy of the Pelagians) Peter, first of the Apostles; Paul, the last. To preaching to preachers, and such great preachers, of whom we have heard and sung, that their sound has gone out into all the earth, and their words to the ends of the world, without a doubt, no words of ours suffice. We owe devotion, we do not fulfill your expectation. For you expect of us today to preach the apostles Peter and Paul, whose solemn day this is. I acknowledge what you expect; and where I acknowledge, I succumb. For I see what is expected, and from whom. But because their God deigns to be praised by all of us, let not his servants disdain to be preached in some measure by those who serve you. The same argument is discussed. As you know, all who know the holy Scriptures, the apostle Peter was chosen first among the disciples, whom the Lord, present in the flesh, elected: but Paul was not among them, not with them; but long afterward, not inferior to them. Therefore Peter, the first of the Apostles, Paul, the last: but God, whose servants they are, whose heralds they are, whose preachers they are, is the first and the last. Peter is the first among the Apostles, Paul is the last among the Apostles: God is both the first and the last, before whom nothing exists and after whom nothing exists. Therefore God, who commended Himself as the first and the last in eternity, Himself joined the first and the last Apostles by their passion. The passion of both is united in solemnity, the life of both resonates in love. Their sound has gone out to all the earth, and their words to the ends of the world. Where they were chosen, where they preached, where they also suffered, we all know. But how do we know them, except because their sound has gone out to all the earth? The words of the apostles about their imminent passion. By God's grace, we are made debtors and redeemers. The strength of the martyrs comes from God. Paul confirmed by revelation about his future passion and victory.

We heard Paul predicting his own imminent and approaching passion, when his Epistle was read: "For I am already being poured out as a libation, and the time of my departure has come. I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith. From now on there is reserved for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, will give me on that day; and not only to me but also to all who have longed for his appearing." From here, let us say something: the words of those who have gone out to the ends of the earth help us. First, see the holy devotion. He said he is being sacrificed, not dying: not because he does not die who is sacrificed; but not everyone who dies is sacrificed. Therefore, to be sacrificed is to die for God. For the word is derived from the sacrifice. Everything that is sacrificed is killed for God. For the Apostle understood to whom his blood in passion was owed: for he became a debtor for his blood, for which the blood of his Lord was shed. That one shed his blood, and he pledged all. As many as receive that faith, owe what they receive: and this because he deigned to make both debtors and payers. For who among us, in such poverty and weakness of infirmity, is capable of repaying such a creditor? But as it is written: "The Lord gave the word to those who proclaim it with great power": the word, by which they are made known; the power, by which they suffer. Therefore, he made himself victims, he consecrated sacrifices for himself, he filled the martyrs with the Spirit, he equipped the confessors with power. For he said to them: "For it is not you who speak." Therefore, although he was going to suffer, although he was about to shed his blood for the faith of Christ; yet he rightly says: "What shall I return to the Lord for all his bounty to me?" And what comes to mind? "I will take the cup of salvation and call on the name of the Lord." You were thinking of repayment, you were inquiring what you would return; and it occurred to you as if to the one who would repay: "I will take the cup of salvation, and call on the name of the Lord." Surely you were about to repay? Behold, you receive. Therefore, what you receive, because you received what you should, you accept from whom to repay; a debtor when you have received, a debtor when you repay. For what shall I repay, he says? "I will take the cup of salvation." Therefore, you also receive this, the cup of passion, the cup about which the Lord said: "Are you able to drink the cup that I am about to drink?" But behold, now the cup is in your hand, now the passion is imminent: what do you do so as not to tremble? what do you do so as not to waver? what do you do so that you may be able to drink what you now carry? What shall I do, he says? And there I will accept: I will be a debtor; because I will call on the name of the Lord. "For I," he says, "am already being poured out." It was confirmed to him by revelation: for human weakness would not dare to promise this to itself. His confidence was not from himself, but from him who gave everything, whom he understood when he said above: "For what do you have that you did not receive?" Therefore, he says, "I am already being poured out, and the time of my departure has come. I have fought the good fight." Ask his conscience: it does not hesitate, because it glories in the Lord. "I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith." With merit you finished the race, because you kept the faith. Furthermore, he says, a crown of righteousness is laid up for me, which the Lord, the righteous judge, will give me on that day. The crown of righteousness is promised not only to martyrs, but to all who keep the faith. The desire for the coming of Christ the future judge. And lest he himself should appear to boast beyond measure, and claim the Lord for himself alone: "Not only," he says, "to me, but to all those who love His appearing." He could not have better or more briefly indicated what men ought to do to deserve that crown of righteousness. For we all do not have to expect the shedding of blood; few are martyrs, but many are faithful. Can you not be martyred like Paul? You can keep the faith: by keeping the faith you love His appearing. For if you fear the coming of the Lord, you do not love His appearing. The Lord Christ is now hidden; He will be manifested in His own time, as the just judge, who was unjustly accused under a judge. He will come: and how will He come? He will come to judge. For He will not be judged again, but He will indeed judge, as we know, as we believe, the living and the dead. I ask anyone paying attention to me to hear me; I ask; let them answer not to me, but to themselves: Do you want this judge to come? "I do," he says. See what you are saying: if you truthfully say, if you want Him to come, see in what condition He finds you. For the judge will come: humility has already been bestowed upon you; power will come. For He will not come in such a manner that He will be clothed in a body, born of a mother, suck milk, be swaddled in clothes, laid in a manger; finally, now grown, He will not be mocked by men, be held, be scourged, be hung, be silent when judged. Do not by any chance expect Him to come because you think He will come humbly again. He was silent when He was to be judged; He will not be silent when judging. He was hidden here so that He would not be recognized: "For if they had known, they would never have crucified the Lord of glory." Therefore, when He was already here, hidden in His power, silent under another's; what we expect to come will be the opposite of this concealment and this silence. For God will come manifest. He who first came hidden, will come manifest. Behold, you have the opposite of that concealment: see the opposite of that silence. "Our God will come and will not keep silence." He kept silence when hidden; "for as a sheep to be led to the slaughter." He kept silent when hidden; "for as a lamb before his shearer is dumb, so he opened not his mouth." He kept silent when hidden; for in His humility His judgment was taken away. He kept silent when hidden; for He was thought to be merely a man: but God will come manifest, our God and He will not keep silence. What then, you who were saying, "I want Him to come": do you not yet fear? "A fire shall go before Him." If you do not fear the judge, do you not fear the fire? The crown is owed to those serving faithfully. But if you keep the faith, you truly love its manifestation, you should confidently expect the crown of righteousness: for it is not given to such as a gift, but owed. For even the apostle Paul demands it as a debt: He says, "The Lord, the just judge, will grant it to me on that day." He will grant it, because He is just: He made Himself a debtor to me by promise. He commanded, I heard: He preached, I believed. I fought the good fight, I finished the course.

He owes for his gifts ..... moral, which is good .....

You save, away you have. Qu..... Did you receive? But these, I say..... his. Before such things giv..... beret?

Savior Christ Jesus. Paul the foremost sinner, because he was superior in cruelty to the other persecutors. For his deserved punishment, salvation was granted to him. Christ the healer proved the power of his skill in Paul's healing.

Behold the Apostle himself..... and deserving of all acceptance... into the world sinners Of whom I am the first. Christ, he says: Jesus, that is, Christ the Savior. For this is the Latin for Jesus. And let grammarians not inquire how Latin it is, but Christians how true. For Salvation is a Latin name. To save and savior were not Latin before the Savior came: when He came to the Latins, He made these words Latin. Therefore, Christ Jesus, Christ the Savior, came into the world. And as if we were to ask, Why? He says: To save sinners. Therefore Jesus came. For we read the name itself also translated and explained in some way in the Gospel: They shall call His name Jesus; for He shall save His people from their sins. Therefore, the saying is worthy of all acceptance, worthy of belief: that is, because Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am the first. Not because he sinned earlier, but because he sinned more than others. Just as we say in the arts that a physician is first, though younger in age but superior in skill; a craftsman first, an architect first: we are accustomed to speak thus. So the Apostle called himself the first sinner. For no one persecuted the Church more severely. Therefore, if you inquire what was due to sinners, to whom Jesus came, you will not find anything due to sinners except punishment. If you seek what was due, it is punishment: if you seek what was given, it is salvation: instead of punishment, salvation. Punishment was due, salvation was given: punishment was owed, a crown was given. Nothing was owed to Paul, formerly Saul, the first sinner, surpassing others in cruelty, nothing was owed to him except punishment, and great punishment; and he is called from heaven: Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me? He is restrained, that he may spare, so that he may be spared. The wolf is turned into a sheep: it is not enough to say into a sheep, rather into a shepherd. By a heavenly voice, he is killed and made alive, struck and healed. The persecutor is cast down, the preacher is raised up. What grace is this, but grace? For what good merit preceded? It is called grace because it is given freely. He says: Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am the first. But I obtained mercy for this reason. Could he then say: The Lord will render to me on that day a just judge? If the Lord were to render to the first sinner on that day a just judge, what would He render except what is due to the first sinner, great punishment, eternal punishment? This was previously due, but it was not given. Therefore, he says, I obtained mercy. I did not receive what was due: but I obtained mercy as the first sinner, so that in me Christ Jesus might display all longsuffering, for the instruction of those who are going to believe in Him for eternal life. What does it mean, for instruction? That any criminal, any person involved in crimes, should not despair of pardon, which Saul received. The great Physician, that is Jesus, the great Physician, coming to the region of the sick, where His medicine would be famous, chose such a one to cure, about whom there was much despair. Such then, now, who was once such, says: I am now about to be sacrificed, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith. Were you the one who rushed headlong, who dragged Christians to death, who, when Stephen was being stoned, served as the custodian of the garments so that all might stone him with their hands? Were you that one? I was, he says, but I am not now. Why were you, and are not now? Because I obtained mercy. So, Paul, you received what was not due to you. Now confidently say what is due to you, say now. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of justice, which the Lord, the righteous judge, will give to me on that day. How confidently he demands the debt, to whom it was given not to owe the penalty. Say now to your Lord, say confidently, say assuredly, say with full confidence: I was formerly in my wickedness, I enjoyed your undeserved mercy; your gifts crown the debt. Let this suffice. Let us come to Peter; and let us render not worthy ability, but solemn devotion: from the last to the first; for we also strive from the last to the first.

Peter, now well, is foretold his suffering, to whom, when he was weak, had been foretold his denial. To the holy Peter, the first apostle, the Lord Jesus himself in the Gospel, which we just heard being read, foretold his own passion saying: "When you were younger, you used to dress yourself and walk wherever you wanted; but when you grow old, you will stretch out your hands, and someone else will dress you and lead you where you do not want to go." And the Evangelist subsequently explained to us what had been said: "This he said," he said, "signifying by what death he would glorify God." The Lord Christ himself foretold his passion and his cross to him, but now to one who loves, not denies. The physician preserved both times in him: he denied when he was sick, he loved when he was healthy. The Lord showed Peter to himself, showing Peter to Peter, when he had rashly promised with a certain confidence that he would die for Christ, when Christ had come to die for Peter. "Will you lay down your life for me?" he said. "Amen, I say to you; before the rooster crows, you will deny me three times." I will heal you: but first you must recognize that you are sick. Therefore, in that foretold denial, the Lord showed Peter to Peter: but in that love, the Lord showed Christ to Peter. "Do you love me?" he said. "I do love you." "Feed my sheep." This was said once, twice, thrice. Three times love was confessed, three times fear was condemned. And because he loved, his passion was indicated to him. For to love up to the point of passion through the love of Christ was indeed to love.

Peter unwillingly to suffer. Death, the punishment for sin. But what is that, brothers, which does not move you? Another, he said, will gird you and carry you where you do not wish to go. Therefore, did Peter not willingly come to such grace of passion? Behold Paul: For I am already being poured out like a drink offering, and the time of my departure is at hand; it appears in these words that he is almost rejoicing as if he is hurrying to the passion: but to this one: Another will gird you and carry you where you do not wish to go. Willing Paul and unwilling Peter? Rather if we understand, willing Paul and willing Peter, and unwilling Paul and unwilling Peter. While I explain this as best I can, I need your attention. Death cannot be loved, it can be endured. For if it is loved, those who accepted it for the sake of faith did nothing great. Would we say they were great men, strong men if we saw them rejoicing at feasts? If we saw them overflowing with pleasures, would we praise fortitude or patience in them? Why? Because they would be doing something opposite to sufferings, opposite to troubles, they would be in joys, in pleasures, in delights; thus would they be praised as great, as strong, as very patient? But we do not praise martyrs in this way. Great men, strong men, patient men. Do you want to know that it must be endured, not loved? Ask the name: it is called passion. By nature, therefore, not only humans, but all living beings whatsoever, avoid and dread death. Therefore, great martyrs, because they bravely accepted what is very hard for the kingdom of heaven, and bearing in mind the promises, they endured troubles. See the Lord saying: Greater love has no one than this, that one lay down one’s life for one’s friends. If this is not hard, what great thing does love do, because it loves delights for my sake? No. But because it endures death. For the words of your lips; it is the voice of martyrs; For the words of your lips, that is, for your admonitions and promises, I have kept hard ways. Therefore, as far as the condition of nature and the force of habit refuse death: but while what will be after death is loved, what we do not want is accepted, so that we may reach where we want to go. Behold where it comes from: Another will carry you where you do not wish to go. He expressed nature, not devotion. This nature of our weakness the Lord himself transformed in himself, when about to suffer, he said to the Father: Father, if it is possible, let this cup pass from me. For I am already being poured out—it is the speech of one suffering, not of one delighting. Thus our death is from punishment, offered to us. We received this from the root, the spreading branches of the human race. Adam first earned this by sinning. From the woman came the beginning of sin, as Scripture speaks, and through her we all die. And: Through one man sin entered into the world, and through sin, death; and so death spread to all men because all sinned. Thus in our nature both guilt and punishment. God made nature without guilt, and if it persisted without guilt, certainly punishment would not follow. From there we come, from there we derive both, and from here we contract many things. Therefore, in our nature both guilt and punishment: in Jesus's flesh, punishment without guilt, so that both guilt might be healed and punishment. Another, he said, will gird you and carry you where you do not wish to go. This is punishment: but through punishment one reaches the crown. Paul despised punishment: therefore, looking to the crown, he despised punishment, and he said, I am already being poured out, the crown of righteousness is due to me. The way to pass through is hard, but great is the destination. And Peter knew where he was heading: therefore he also accepted the passion with full devotion; but he endured the passion, did not love it. He endured the passion, loved what followed, and because he loved where he was going, he endured the way.

Paul also is shown to have been unwilling to die.

We have said that both were unwilling and both were willing; both, if it could be, were unwilling for punishment, yet both equally desired the crown. But let us demonstrate that Paul also was unwilling for punishment. For the Lord Himself was a witness to Peter: because He too transformed you into Himself when He said: Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me.

Therefore, the Lord testified to Peter: but Paul himself testifies to himself. For he says in one place concerning this mortal body: We groan, being burdened. According to another Scripture: The corruptible body weighs down the soul, and the earthly habitation depresses the mind that muses upon many things. Therefore, he says, we groan, being burdened: clearly under the weight of this corruptible body. We groan, being burdened. If you groan, willingly lay down that burden. He surely stated that he groaned under this load, was burdened under the weight of this corruptible body: see whether he wants to be stripped of this burden under which he groans, under which he is burdened. This does not follow: but what does he say? In which we do not wish to be unclothed. O voice of nature, confession of pain! The body is heavy, the body is burdensome, the body is corruptible: it is groaned under it, and it is not willingly abandoned, and not willingly cast aside. We do not wish, he says, to be unclothed. Will you remain groaning thus? And if you groan, having been burdened, why do you not want to be stripped? No, he says. Consider what follows: We do not wish to be unclothed, but to be clothed over. I groan under this earthly tunic, I hasten to the heavenly garment: I want to receive that, I do not want to lay this aside. In which we do not wish to be unclothed, but to be clothed over. Therefore, Paul, shall I understand you, what do you say? Will injustice be done to that heavenly garment, so that it comes to you over these rags of mortality and corruption, that this may be underneath, that above; this inside, that outside? By no means, he says: I do not say so. I do not wish to be unclothed, but to be clothed over. But not in a way that corruption might lie hidden under incorruption, but that mortal may be swallowed up by life. You have exclaimed well, who knows the Scriptures. But lest anyone ignorant of the Scriptures thinks my words follow, these are Paul's words, all these are apostolic words: We groan, being burdened, in which we do not wish to be unclothed, but to be clothed over, so that mortal may be swallowed up by life. You hold well what you say elsewhere speaking of the resurrection of the body: This corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. Now when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, then shall come to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory. Which in that place he says: so that mortal may be swallowed up by life; this in this place: Death is swallowed up in victory. Nowhere is death: not below, not above; not inside, not outside. For death is swallowed up in victory. Where, O death, is your contention? it will be said to death in the future resurrection of the body, and such a change, that death is swallowed up in victory. When this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, it will be said to death: Where, O death, is your contention? That contention makes it so you are borne where you do not wish to be. Where, O death, is your contention? Where, O death, is your sting? The sting of death is sin.

It is proven against the Pelagians that death is from sin.

Surely death is not from sin? For what other death was he speaking of, when he was talking about the resurrection of the body? This corruptible must put on incorruption: death will be swallowed up in victory. This is the resurrection of the body. There it will be said: Where is your struggle, death? To whom, except the death of the body? Because the discourse is about the resurrection of the body. Where is your struggle, death? Where is your sting, death? But the sting of death is sin. The sting of death is sin, by which sting death has been caused, not which sting death has made: just as the poison is the cup of death, because it causes death, not because it is made from death. Therefore, the Lord in resurrection ends this punishment: but even to the faithful and the saints he leaves death for struggle. Death is left to you for contest. For God could have taken away death from you having been justified, but he left it for the struggle, so that there might be something to despise for the sake of faith. For of those whom He wished, He acted. Enoch was translated, and Elijah was translated, and they live. Did their justice merit this? Or was it the grace of God and the benefit of God and a special privilege? So that the Creator might show His power in all things, He has entrusted us with what He can do. The example of Enoch and Elijah does not support the error of the Pelagians, that death is of nature, not of sin.

Therefore, it is in vain for those who say that we do not die because of sin, as pertains to the death of the body, but that it is natural for us to die, and that Adam would have died even if he had not sinned, to oppose us with Enoch and Elijah. They speak very inconsiderately; and if they attend to it, they speak against themselves. For what do they say? If death is due to sin, why did Enoch and Elijah not die? Do you not see, you who say this, that you claim death is natural, denying that it is because of sin? You say it is natural; I say it is because of sin: it is indeed natural, but of a nature already corrupted, already condemned to this punishment. Accordingly, you say it is natural; I say it is because of sin that the body dies. And you ask me: If it is because of sin, why did Enoch and Elijah not die? And I reply: Rather, if it is natural, why did Enoch and Elijah not die? Enoch and Elijah live; they were translated, wherever they may be, they live. And if a certain conjecture of faith from the Scripture of God is not mistaken, they are to die. For the Apocalypse mentions certain two miraculous prophets, and the same are to die, and to rise again in the sight of men, and to ascend to the Lord: and they are understood to be Enoch and Elijah, although their names are not mentioned there. And if perhaps you, who are of such a mind, have not accepted this Scripture; or if you accept it, you scorn it and say, They are not mentioned by name: let them live, as you think, never to die. Still, tell me: If death is because of sin, why did they not die? I retort to you: If death is natural, why did they not die? I say, that they live because the sin was finished: you say, if you can, that nature is finished.

He orders that the increasing Pelagians be guarded against.

We spoke of one thing after another and by chance: but in a way that pertains to the stability of our faith, against some disputers who are wickedly growing numerous. But let them not overcome our patience: nor let them overthrow our faith. Let us be cautious and vigilant against new disputations, human indeed, not divine. Today we celebrate the solemnity of the Apostles, let us listen to the Apostle calling out: "Avoid profane novelties of words; for they greatly contribute to impiety." But we want you to be wise indeed in goodness, but innocent in evil. Adam has died, but that serpent has not yet died. He whispers, and does not cease to hiss. His ultimate punishment is reserved: but he seeks companions for his damnation. Let us listen to the friend of the bridegroom, zealous for the groom not for himself: "For I am jealous for you with the jealousy of God; I have betrothed you to one husband, to present a chaste virgin to Christ. And I fear," he says, "lest as the serpent deceived Eve by his cunning, so your minds may be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ." We have all heard the apostolic words, let us all observe them, let us all beware of the serpent's venom. For we cannot say, "We have not heard, we did not know," when we have just sung: "Their voice has gone out into all the earth, and their words to the ends of the world." The words running to the ends of the earth have come to us: we have received them, written them down, instructed readers. The reader is not silent, the disputant is in labor: why does the deceiver not cease?

Sermons - Sermon 299A augm

SERMON 299/A augmented.

Sermon of Saint Augustine delivered to the people on the birthday of the holy apostles Peter and Paul Let us celebrate the solemnity of the Apostles, let us imitate their sanctity. The feast day of the holy day that gathers us today, very well known to your ears, minds, and actions, we joyfully commemorate as participants with you in the same celebration. The birth of the apostles Peter and Paul has dawned, a birth not which entangled them in the world, but which liberated them from the world. For through human frailty, a man is born to trouble, but through Christian charity, martyrs are born to a crown. And this day, on account of their merit, is offered to us as a festal day to celebrate with solemnity and to imitate their sanctity, so that, remembering the glory of the martyrs, we may love in them what those who killed them hated, and loving virtue, we may honor their passion. In virtue, merit is gained, in suffering, the reward is restored [in coronation]. One day for two martyrs and two apostles: as we have received by Church tradition, not on one day both suffered, and on one day both suffered. Today, Peter suffered first, today Paul suffered afterwards: merit equaled the suffering, love rushed to the day. This was accomplished in them by Him who was in them, who suffered in them, who suffered with them, who helped those contending, who crowned those who conquered. But because we have mentioned that the day was set before us for a solemnity, not vainly nor for celebrating carnal joy, but for imitating spiritual crowns – and all wish to be crowned, few wish to contend – according to the order of sufferings, not according to the order of readings, let us hear from the Gospel the merit of Peter, let us hear from the apostolic letter the merit of Paul.

"The merit of Peter who fed the sheep of God."

Just now the Gospel was read, just now we heard: The Lord said to Peter: "Simon Peter, do you love me?" He replied: "I love", and the Lord: "Feed my sheep." And again the Lord: "Simon Peter, do you love me?" And he: "I love, Lord", and again the Lord: "Feed my sheep." He asks a third time no different than what he asked twice. It was appropriate for Him to ask a third time, it was already weary for Peter to respond a third time. For Peter was grieved, says the Gospel, because the Lord asked him a third time, and said: "Lord, you know everything, you know that I love you." And the Lord: "Feed my sheep." He who asks what he knows, wishes to teach something. What therefore did the Lord, asking a third time what he knew, wish to teach Peter? What do we think, brothers, if not so that love would remove weakness, and that Peter would know it is necessary to confess love three times, who had denied three times out of fear? The merit of Peter, because he fed the sheep of God, would never have been crowned with true martyrdom, if he had fed his own sheep. Not without reason did the Lord add 'my sheep' three times, unless there would be those who would want to glory in martyrdom when they were feeding their own sheep. The apostolic soul, the Catholic soul, simple, humble, submissive to God, not seeking its own glory, but that of Him, so that he who glories, may glory in the Lord, feeds as a shepherd and in the shepherd is a shepherd. Heretics feed their own sheep, but to their own sheep, not for the sake of truth, but for the sake of defending the character, they impose the Lord's mark. For there are many - which we know, for examples abound everywhere -, who fearing to lose their possessions attach to some powerful ones, so that through this act another may possess, another may threaten. Because therefore they do not see their own name glorified through the world, they imposed the name of Christ on their own sheep, and would that they had acquired them and not plundered them! One buys, others have stolen. He buys, who redeems from the devil, who gave his blood as the price: a worthy price indeed, by which the world would be bought. Perhaps more was given than we were worth, but the buyer was a lover. Therefore they possess the sheep, no longer do I say their own, but those whom they want to be their own, lost slaves; to their theft they imposed the Lord's mark. But the true Lord does not rest; in other servants he emits true voices to the sheep, so that they may know the voice of the shepherd and return. Let them return to the flock, let them securely return: we receive the sheep, but do not corrupt the mark. A faithful shepherd does not fear the fury of wolves.

Perhaps some of the brothers were wondering why, although we have a great zeal for winning and rescuing our brothers from the destruction of error, we have said nothing about the heretics in the previous sermons we gave; and it has been reported to us that those miserable and pitiable men said that the terror of the Circumcellions imposed silence upon us. Indeed, it is true that they do not cease trying to terrify us with the preaching of the word of peace, but if wolves might terrify us, what will we say to Him who says: "Feed my sheep"? They bare their teeth for tearing apart, we expose our tongue for healing. We certainly do speak, and we do not remain silent, and we say the same things, often the same things: let them hear what they do not want to hear, let them do what they ought to do. We are troublesome to those unwilling, but if we are therefore loved among the willing so that we may be endangered among the unwilling, we will have confidence in the name of Christ, persevering to preach the word of God, with your prayers helping us. Indeed, we believe that when you hear about our dangers, how we are living among the madness of brigands, you pray for us: mutual love tells us this. For we have not entered into your hearts, but the one who is in you, because he is also in us, indicates this to us. I certainly remind you that when you pray for us, you should pray that God especially guards our salvation, which according to Him is eternal salvation. As for this temporal salvation, may He do what He knows is best for us and for His Church. For we have heard from the same Master, Shepherd, and Prince, and Head of Shepherds: Do not fear those who kill the body but cannot kill the soul; we also heard a very salutary prayer from the voice of the psalm: Do not hand me over, O Lord, according to my own desire to sinners. For anyone handed over to a sinner according to his own desire is badly handed over; the martyrs were not handed over to sinners, nor were the apostles whose natal day we celebrate today, but the Lord of martyrs and apostles was handed over to sinners first: all these were handed over to sinners, but not according to their own desire. Who then are those who are handed over to sinners by their own desire, except those who agree with their persecutors for the sake of some worldly desire? For instance, to not go astray from the example in which we dwell, if, when they threaten and rage with clubs, swords, and fires, we remain silent out of desire for this life, we will be handed over to sinners by our own desire, and we live as dead, having the safety of the flesh, losing the soul of charity. But so that we may live well, let us love both you, so that you are not deceived, and them, so that we may gain them. They threaten: let us reprove; they rage: let us pray; they drive away: let us teach.

"Let us take as examples the merits of the Apostles." For we have also heard of the merit of Paul, so that now I may speak about his merits in the order I promised; he was telling his disciple, announcing to him his future passion and removing from him fear by his own example: "I testify before God and Christ Jesus, who will judge the living and the dead, and by his manifestation and kingdom." He bound him by testimony and added: "Preach the word, be ready in season and out of season." Hearing this, we also, according to our measure, are timely to you, untimely to them. The word of God, the proclamation of peace, we do not cease to bring forth and frequent in the name of Christ, in season and out of season. Timely is he who hands bread to the hungry; untimely is he who urges food upon the sick: to one food is offered, to the other it is forced; to one it is a welcome, to the other a bitter refreshment, but love does not desert either. Let us take, therefore, the merits of the apostles as examples; let us not only not fear passions but also, if necessary, undertake them. Hear what the same apostle says: "For I am already being poured out, or sacrificed" - some manuscripts have "poured out," some have "sacrificed: being poured out and sacrificed pertain to offering" -: he knew his passion to be a sacrifice to God. Not those who killed him, but he offered such a sacrifice to the Father, the priest who had said: "Do not fear those who kill the body." "The time," he says, "of my departure is at hand." What then, O Paul, do you hope for in that departure? O laborer, for what rest? "The time," he says, "of my departure is at hand." What have you done? What do you hope for? "I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith." How did he keep the faith, if not because he was not terrified by persecutors from preaching the word of God in season and out of season? How then is it so wicked for us, that, when we fear, we do not keep the faith, especially to him who teaches us both to love better things and to fear greater things?

Christ our physician.

Whatever sweetness this life can have, it is not paradise, it is not heaven, it is not the kingdom of God, it is not the company of angels, it is not the fellowship of those citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem. Let the heart be lifted upwards, let the flesh be trampled on the earth. The Lord taught us to despise transient things, to love eternal things; He taught us, healed us, and heals us, because He condescends: for He did not find us healthy, but the physician came to the sick. The cup of suffering is bitter, but it completely cures all diseases; the cup of suffering is bitter, but the physician drank it first, so that the sick would not hesitate to drink. Let it be drunk, if He wills: for His will towards us is better than our own; He is more prudent than we, knowing more what is beneficial for us than we ourselves, and knowing more what happens within us than we do. Just as a patient and a physician: the patient suffers and does not know what he has, the physician examines another's suffering and pronounces the truth. A man asks another what is happening within him and desires testimony of his inner self from the outside. And if human medical art can do this, how much more the power of the Lord! For on this very day I am reminded to propose an example of this matter. Before the Lord's suffering and with the passion of the Lord imminent, Peter himself, whose day we celebrate today, was sick and did not know what was happening within himself: he did not know at all the inner parts of his own weakness. He presumed he would die with the Lord: he dared more than he could. The sick man presumed upon future suffering, the physician pronounced future denial. Therefore, what wonder if in that weakness the physician's judgment was found to be truer than the patient's? It came as if to the accession of a greater fever, and he could not follow the suffering. Therefore, let this cup be drunk, if He gives it, who knows what He gives, to whom He gives it. But if He does not want it to be drunk, let Him heal in another way, provided He heals. Nevertheless, let us securely submit ourselves to the hands of the physician, altogether certain that He will apply nothing to us that is not expedient.

God, giving Paul the crown of righteousness, was crowning His own gifts. The debt, which Paul demanded, he claimed as if from his merit. And what merit? "I have finished the race, I have fought the good fight, I have kept the faith." You did these: what do you hope for? "Henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day." The righteous judge will give it. But to whom was it given, made by the merciful Father? For what was Saul, who later became Paul, what was he like when Christ found him? Was he not languishing and at risk, frenzied in a certain madness against the Jews? Was he not the Saul who was present when Stephen was stoned, who guarded the garments for those stoning him, that he might stone with all hands? Was he not the one who, having received letters from the chief priests, went wherever he could to bind Christians and bring them to punishments? Was he not, as we read, going and breathing threats and murder, called, thrown to the ground by a heavenly voice, converted by the word to the Word? So that the Lord thus called him, what merits had preceded? I do not say what had preceded to be crowned, but what not to be condemned. He made the persecutor of the Church a preacher of peace; he forgave all his sins; he placed him in such a position that through him others' sins would be forgiven. These were gifts of mercy, not due to merits. Listen to Paul himself, certainly not ungrateful for God's grace, listen to him recalling and proclaiming: "Who was formerly a blasphemer, a persecutor, and injurious, but I obtained mercy." Does he say there: "it was rendered to me"? If indeed he said: "Who formerly was a blasphemer, a persecutor, and injurious, but it was rendered to me," what was to be rendered for these deeds, except condemnation? But he says: "I obtained mercy. Punishment was not rendered to me, so that afterward a crown might be rendered." Behold, brothers, to whom punishment was due, a crown is due. "I was formerly," he says, "a blasphemer, a persecutor, and injurious." You see the merit: punishment was due. Therefore, punishment is not rendered, he obtains mercy instead of punishment. Mercy having been received, not ungrateful, he fights the good fight, finishes the race, keeps the faith. The forgiver of sins made himself a debtor. "To me remains," he says, "the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, will render to me at that day." He does not say: "will give," but "will render"; if he will render, he owed. I dare to say entirely: if he will render, he owed. And had he borrowed, that he should owe? He owes the crown, he renders the crown, not made a debtor by our loan, but by his promise. For when he crowns his merits, he does not crown but his own gifts.

"God is a debtor because He is a promisor."

Therefore, most beloved brothers, because of this God is a debtor, because He is a promisor. So then if someone promises us something, when we meet him, to give it, we use this word: "Return what you promised me." We demand the debtor when we say: "Return," but we acknowledge kindness when we say: "Return what you promised," not "what you received." Thus He promised both to us all and to the whole world, He promised certain things, and these certain things are great. To not say much, He promised Christ, the passion of Christ, the blood of Christ for us, He promised through His prophets, He promised through His books, He promised the Church spread throughout the whole world, He promised victories to the martyrs, He promised the breaking of idols to the Church, He promised the final judgment and eternal life. To not recall many things—for it is difficult to enumerate all His promises—let us consider these in the meantime which I have said. He promised Christ: Behold a virgin shall conceive and bear a son, and you shall call his name Emmanuel, which being interpreted is God with us, and other things which you know and it is long to recount. He promised about His passion, His resurrection, His glorification: these things have been done. He promised martyrs would be strong in sufferings for His name, victorious in persistence. The world rages, it was promised to rage, not so that the seed would be trampled, but so that the crop would be sown; the blood of the martyrs has been shed everywhere; the harvest of the Church has filled the world: these things have happened. The Church itself was promised to reign in the Scriptures, not yet exhibited in reality. The apostles preached it, they sowed everywhere; what was said had not yet come: And all the kings of the earth shall worship him, all the kings shall serve him, it had not yet come, but it was held in promise. Thus God wanted human weakness to be secure from His promise, so that He would not only say but also write. He spoke to believers, guarded against doubters; and all things were held in a certain handwriting, in the holy Scripture, not yet in the experience of fulfillment. Even kings believed; for it was in the handwriting of God: All the kings of the earth shall worship him, all nations shall serve him. Now that all nations also may serve, the Church has been expanded. You have that in the handwriting: And there will be regard in the idols of the nations; you have in the handwriting: O Lord God, my refuge, unto You shall the Gentiles come from the ends of the earth and say: Truly our fathers worshipped lies, idols which profited them nothing. Indeed, not the idols, but because of the idols the demons and men raged, killed the martyrs, made them triumph over themselves: it is returned to Babylon what it did. Of Babylon and Jerusalem. For a certain impious city is described throughout all lands as the consensus of human impiety, and this Babylon is mystically named in the Scriptures. Again, a certain pilgrim city in this land is described throughout all nations in the consensus of piety, and this is named Jerusalem. Now both cities are intermixed, in the end they will be separated. And divine Scripture addresses both in many places, and in one place it says to Jerusalem: “Render to her as she has done, render to her double,” that Jerusalem might render double to Babylon. What is this double? How do we understand double to be rendered to the city of Babylon? It killed Christians for its idols, but it could not kill Christ, our God. It ravaged the flesh of Christians, but it did not harm the spirit, it did not touch our God. Double is rendered to her, in men and in her gods. For they killed men, but they could not kill our God. Now indeed, in Jerusalem men, having slain treachery, are received; idols are broken. They seek their people and do not find them: for Christians are made from pagans. He who is no longer what he was has been slain. For example, Paul, who was first Saul, though he lives as a preacher, the persecutor has been slain. Once Christians sought where they might hide from raging pagans, now pagans seek where to hide their gods. And when these are broken, their defenders still do not wish to be silent, but yet they murmur in part, as if indeed, should they dare at some time, they can do anything other than what He who holds us has promised, or indeed, when they have done something, did they do it by their own power? Behold, Christians were seized, they confessed Christ, and they were killed. Let someone confess Mercury, swear by Mercury; when he will have seen a single or double watch-post, "I did not do it, I was not involved, I did not sacrifice; where did you see me?" But those holy servants of God: “Were you in the congregation of Christians?” “I was.” We read the confessions of martyrs, we exult in the joy of the examples. These things have been done, rendered by the Lord because they were promised. Previously they were held in Scripture, now they are also exhibited. And those things which I said about idols have been exhibited and are being exhibited. And the Church, spread throughout the whole world, has now almost held all nations, and those it does not hold, it will hold; it grows daily, the Christian people everywhere increase in the name of Christ. On the final judgment of God.

Few among Christians live well, many among Christians live badly. But these few, in comparison to their chaff, are few; in comparison, I say, to their chaff they are few. This threshing floor will be winnowed, there will be an immense heap of chaff, but also the shining mass of the saints will appear. The chaff will go into the fire, the wheat into the barn, yet for now both are everywhere. Whence this? Those who sowed, brothers, whose memory we celebrate today, through them God exhibited to him what He promised them, and through them what He promised us. What did He promise them? Henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, will award to me on that day. What did He promise us? In your seed all nations will be blessed. How was this accomplished through them? Their voice has gone out into all the earth, and their words to the ends of the world. What will the heretics recite against these things? I think that they too today celebrate the birth of the apostles; indeed, they strive to celebrate this day, but they do not dare to sing this psalm.

Sermons - Sermon 299A

SERMON 299/A TREATISE ON THE NATAL DAY OF THE APOSTLES PETER AND PAUL A genuine birth that differs from the birth of martyrs. Peter and Paul suffered on the same day, not in the same year. Why Peter was questioned three times by Christ. The birth of the most blessed apostles Peter and Paul has enlightened us today; not a birth that entangled them in the world, but one that delivered them from the world. Indeed, a man is born into travail through human weakness; martyrs are born to a crown through Christian love. And this day has been set before us as a celebration of their merit and an imitation of their sanctity; so that remembering the glory of the martyrs, we may love in them what those who killed them hated, and loving virtue, we may honor suffering. In virtue, merit was obtained, in suffering, the reward was restored. One day of two martyrs and two apostles: as we have received by the tradition of the Church, they did not suffer on one day, and yet they did suffer on one day. Today Peter suffered first, today Paul suffered later: passion equaled the merit, love anticipated the day; this was caused in them by Him who was in them, who suffered in them, who suffered with them, who helped those struggling, who crowned the victors. Let us therefore hear from the Gospel the merit of Peter; let us hear from the apostolic letter the merit of Paul. The Gospel has just been recited, we have just heard: The Lord said to Peter: Simon Peter, do you love me? And he said: I love you, Lord; and again the Lord: Feed my sheep. He asked the third time for the same reason he had asked twice. It pertained to Him to ask a third time, Peter was already weary of responding a third time. Peter, it is said in the Gospel, was saddened because the Lord asked him the third time, and he said: Lord, you know all things, you know that I love you. And the Lord: Feed my sheep. He who asks what he knows wishes to teach something. What therefore did the Lord wish to teach by asking Peter three times what he already knew? What do we think, brothers, if not that love should take away weakness, and that Peter should know he must confess love three times, who had denied three times through fear? The merit of Peter, which is that he fed the sheep of God; let us hear again the merit of Paul: He said to his disciple, foretelling his future suffering and removing his fear by his own example: I charge you before God and Christ Jesus, who is to judge the living and the dead, and by his manifestation and his kingdom. He bound him by this charge and added: preach the word, be urgent in season and out of season. The suffering of Paul, a sacrifice to God. Whatever sweet thing this life has, it is not paradise. God is a debtor, not from our mutual agreement, but from His promise.

Hearing this, we too, according to our capacity, are considerate to those who are willing, and inconsiderate to those who are unwilling. He who offers bread to the hungry is considerate; he who forces food upon the sick is inconsiderate; to one, food is offered, to the other, it is forced; to one, the meal is pleasant, to the other, it is bitter, but love does not abandon either. Let us therefore take the merits of the Apostles as examples; let us not only not fear sufferings, but also, if necessary, endure them. Hear what the same Apostle says: For I am already being offered. Offering pertains to sacrifice; he knew his suffering to be a sacrifice to God. It was not those who killed him, but he himself offered such a sacrifice to the Father as a priest, who said, do not fear those who kill the body. The time, he says, of my departure is at hand. So, Paul, what do you hope for in that departure, you who labored for rest? The time, he says, of my departure is at hand. What have you done? What do you hope for? I have fought the good fight, I have finished the course, I have kept the faith. Whence did he keep the faith, except that he was not terrified by the persecutors? Preach the word, be ready in season and out of season. How wicked it is for us, then, if we, though we fear, do not keep the faith, especially to him who teaches us both to love better things, and to fear greater things! Whatever sweetness this life may have, it is not paradise, it is not heaven, it is not the kingdom of God, it is not the society of Angels, it is not the fellowship of the citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem. Let the heart be carried upward, let the flesh be trampled on the ground. The Lord taught us to disdain transient things and to love eternal things; he taught us, healed us, and continues to heal, because he deigns; for he did not find us healthy, but as a physician came to the sick. The cup of suffering is bitter, but it completely cures all diseases; the cup of suffering is bitter, but the physician drank it first so that the patient would not hesitate to drink it. Therefore, let this cup be drunk if he gives it who knows what to give and to whom; but if he does not wish it to be drunk, let him heal otherwise, as long as he heals. Nevertheless, let us be secure in the hands of such a great physician, entirely confident that he will apply nothing which is not beneficial to us. For the debt which Paul demanded, he claimed as if from merit. And what merit? I have finished the course, I have fought the good fight, I have kept the faith. This you have done; what do you hope for? Henceforth, there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall award me on that day. He did not say, gives, but awards: if he awards, he owes. And had he borrowed so that he owed? He owes the crown, he awards the crown, not having become a debtor by our loan, but by his promise; for even when he crowned their merits, he crowned his own gifts.

Sermons - Sermon 299B

Sermon 299/B A Treatise on the Birth of the Holy Apostles Peter and Paul

Peter, the first of the Apostles, Paul, the last. The Gospel was read from John 21:15 and following. Peter denied, but he followed Christ to the danger of suffering. The passion of the blessed apostles has consecrated this day for us;They earned that glory throughout the whole world by despising the world. Peter, the first of the Apostles: Paul, the last of the Apostles. The first and the last were brought to the same day of suffering by the first and the last, Christ. To recall what I have said, consider A and Ω. The Lord Himself openly says in the Apocalypse: I am Alpha and Omega; the first, before whom no one: the last, after whom no one; preceding all, defining all. Do you want to see the first? All things were made through him. Are you looking for the last? Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to everyone who believes. So that you might live at some time, you had him as the creator; so that you may live forever, you have him as the redeemer. Let us consider, beloved, the most blessed Peter himself, the first of the Apostles, saying in his letter: Christ suffered for us, leaving us an example, that we should follow in his steps. Finally, you heard when the Gospel was read: follow me. Christ, that is, asked him, Peter, the teacher to the disciple, the Lord to the servant, the doctor to the healed, and said to him: Peter, do you love me? And as you know, he did not only say, do you love me? but added, more than these. Do you love me more than these, more than these others? He did not respond: I love you more than these; for it was not a man's place to judge the hearts of others; but responding he said: Lord, you know that I love you. Why do you ask me that which you have made in me? You know what you have given: why do you ask me about the love that I do not have except from you? You know that I love you. And the Lord asked this again, and Peter responded the same again. For the third time the Lord asked: and Peter was grieved because he said to him the third time, do you love me? The Lord was questioning Peter's love; let us question Peter's grief. Why do we think Peter was grieved because he said to him the third time, do you love me? As often as the Lord would want to ask, why would the servant be grieved? But at the Lord’s third questioning, he recalled his own third denial. Blessed Peter, do you understand, do you understand your failing, recalling you are grieved: but rejoice after the grief. Let the love confess which fear denied. Finally, see him, who denied before, now a lover; or rather first a lover, but still weak. We say that Peter denied Christ, and we do not say that he followed Christ to the danger of suffering. The doctor reserved the order of healing: first, he showed Peter to Peter, and then showed himself in Peter. As if he were saying to him: You thought you would die for me, but not out of me, because you presumed of yourself. Questioned by the maidservant, you found yourself: you wept, and you returned to me.

Peter first in all things. So then, just as the Lord was now entrusting His sheep to him, He foretold to him the suffering which we celebrate today. When you were younger, He said, you girded yourself and walked where you would; but when you grow old, another will gird you and carry you where you do not wish to go. This He said signifying by what death he would glorify God. It happened, Peter denied, Peter wept, Peter washed away his denial with tears. Christ rose again, Peter was asked about his love: he received the sheep entrusted to him, not his own, but Christ’s.

For He did not say to him: Feed your sheep, but: Feed My sheep; feed those whom I bought, because I also redeemed you. Then the Lord Christ conversed with His disciples for forty days; a cloud received Him in their sight, and He ascended into heaven. They led Him ascending with their eyes: afterwards they sat in the city, on the fiftieth day they received the Holy Spirit, and were filled; at that moment they learned the languages of all nations, and began to speak them, to the amazement and astonishment of those who had killed Christ. Then that denier, now this lover, first among all, because he was first in all things, rushed to the Jews, and began to proclaim Christ to the murderers of Christ; he sowed the faith of Christ among them, and persuaded many of them to die for Christ, by whom he had been afraid to be killed.

Psalm 18 had been sung. Where is it said, where is it foretold, that the Apostles of Christ would speak with the tongues of all nations? The heavens declare the glory of God: understand the heavens as those who bear God; and the firmament proclaims the work of his hands, that is, the glory of God. These are the heavens. Day unto day pours forth speech, and night unto night declares knowledge. Let Christ not be silent by day or by night. Still, consider that the day passes speech to the day: Christ to the disciples, light to the lights. And night unto night declared knowledge: where Christ was, Judas declared to the Jews. Christ was arrested, Christ was killed, death was killed in Christ; because Christ rose, and ascended into heaven, and sent the Holy Spirit which he had promised, and they were filled with it as with new wine, new wineskins. For the Lord had said: No one puts new wine into old wineskins. And you should know this was fulfilled. The Jews, astonished and some almost mocking, said, not knowing what they said: These men are full of new wine. Therefore, with the granting, dictating, and teaching of the Holy Spirit, they spoke in tongues which they had not learned. In their own country, they had learned one, perhaps two; however, they spoke, shall we say, in three tongues, four, five, six? Why do you seek a number? There is no speech nor language where their voices are not heard; just now you heard the psalm being sung. And they were killed, but their words were written. What did they do, who killed them? Their sound went out into all the earth. We in Africa were set, far from there: where there were no speech nor languages, where their voices were not heard. We were far from there, we lay far off, we slept far off; but that we might be awakened from sleep, their sound went out into all the earth, and their words to the ends of the world. Arise, you who sleep, and rise from the dead, and Christ will give you light who said to Peter: Do you love me? Who is sufficient to say worthy things about Peter? Who is sufficient to speak about Peter? Without insult, blessed Peter, allow me to be silent about you for a little while, whose sound awakened me. My speech cannot rest solely on you: you did not suffer alone today: you are indeed the first of the Apostles, but the last one deserved to be your companion.

Name, crime. From Saul named Saulus.

Let the blessed Paul come forth to us, and let us say something briefly about Paul; indeed, he wished to be called Paul for this reason, for he was previously called Saul. First Saul, then Paul; because he was proud before, and humble afterward. Recall his first name, and in it you recognize the crime of the persecutor. Saul was named after Saul. Saul, from whom Saul was named, persecuted holy David, in whom the holy David was a figure of Christ to come from the seed of David through the Virgin Mary. Saul fulfilled the role of Saul when he persecuted Christians. He was an extremely fierce persecutor: when the blessed Stephen was stoned, he kept the garments of those who stoned him, so as to stone in the hands of all. After the passion of the most blessed Stephen, the brothers who were in Jerusalem were scattered; and because they were lights, they burned with the Spirit of God; wherever they went, they ignited. Then Saul, seeing the Gospel of Christ grow, was filled with the most bitter zeal: he received letters from the leaders and went to bring back bound for punishment those whom he found confessing the name of Christ; and he went breathing out slaughter, thirsting for blood. Thus, as he went, thirsting for blood, seeking to bring back and kill whomever he might find, just as he was a persecutor, he heard a voice from heaven. My brothers, what had he deserved of good? What had he not deserved of evil? And yet with one voice from heaven, the persecutor was struck down, the preacher was raised up. The Latin word: I will see you shortly. It is not an injustice to Paul, where the grace of Christ is commended. It had been read from 2 Timothy 4:9 and following. The merits of Paul, the gifts of God.

Behold Paul after Saul: behold now he preaches, behold now he indicates to us what he was and what he is. "I," he says, "am the least of the Apostles." If the least, rightly called Paul. Recall the Latin word: "paulum" means small. Thus certainly we speak: After a little while I shall see you. Therefore Paul confesses himself to be the least, just as the hem of the Lord's garment, which the feeble woman touched. Certainly, she who suffered the issue of blood represented the Church of the Gentiles; to which Gentiles Paul was sent, both the least and the latest: because a hem is both the smallest part of the garment and the latest. Paul confessed both about himself: and said he was the least, and the latest. "I am the least of the Apostles," he said: "I am the last of the Apostles," he said. We do not do him an injury, he said it. And what else did he say? Let him say it, lest we seem to do him an injury; although in no way is there any injury to Paul, where the grace of Christ is commended. Nonetheless, brothers, let us hear him. "I am," he says, "the least of the Apostles, who am not worthy to be called an Apostle." Behold what he was: "who am not worthy to be called an Apostle." Why? "Because I persecuted the Church of God." And how are you an Apostle? "But by the grace of God I am what I am, and His grace in me was not in vain, but I labored more than all of them." I ask you, Saint Paul, not understanding people think Saul is still speaking: "I labored more than all of them," it seems to be said almost arrogantly. However, it is truly said: but what follows? When he saw that he said something that might elevate him to a certain height, he says, "I labored more than all of them: yet not I, but the grace of God with me." Humility acknowledged itself, weakness trembled, perfect charity confessed the gift of God. So speak now as full of grace, as a vessel of election, as made what you were not worthy, speak, write to Timothy, and announce this day. "For I," he says, "am already being poured out." It was just read from the epistle of Paul, here what I am now saying was read: "For I," he says, "am already being poured out. The time of my departure is at hand. I have fought the good fight, I have finished the course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, will award to me on that day." He will reward merits, who grants merits. He became an Apostle, who was not worthy: and will he not be crowned worthy? For then, when he received grace, not due but gratuitous: "I am," he says, "not worthy to be called an Apostle, but by the grace of God, I am what I am." But now he demands what is due: "I have fought the good fight, I have finished the course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, the crown of righteousness is due to me." And to know that it is due: "Which the Lord will award to me." He did not say, gives to me, or, grants to me, but, will award to me the righteous judge on that day. The merciful God granted me, the righteous God will award to me. I see, blessed Paul, to whom the crown is due, your merits; but looking at what you were, I recognize, the very merits are God's gifts. You said: "I have fought the good fight;" but you yourself said: "Thanks be to God, who gives us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." Therefore, you fought the good fight, but by Christ's gift, you conquered. You said: "I have finished the course;" but you yourself said, "It is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy." You said: "I have kept the faith;" but you yourself said: "I obtained mercy, that I might be faithful." We see, therefore, that your merits are God's gifts, and thus we rejoice in your crown. And if I have been unequal to the praises of the blessed Apostles, whose solemnity we celebrate, yet I have not failed the expectation of your charity, as much as their crowner has deigned.

Sermons - Sermon 299C

SERMON 299/C TREATISE ON THE BIRTHDAY OF THE HOLY APOSTLES PETER AND PAUL Peter was the first of the apostles, Paul the last. Peter alone followed the Lord out of love even to danger. The blessed apostles Peter and Paul were called at different times, and crowned on the same day. The Lord called Peter before everyone else, Paul after everyone else. Peter was first among the apostles, Paul was last: He brought them to one day, the first and the last. The most beautiful integrity is preserved when the last harmonize with the first. The apostle Peter wavered on the sea: Peter alone wavered, but he alone walked on the sea. He alone denied the Lord out of fear, but he alone followed the Lord out of love unto danger. The blessed John was there too, but he relied upon the friendship of the high priest; for John was a friend of the high priest, to whose house the Lord was taken. Peter followed out of love: weakness quivered, but love wept, and the weakness received pardon. Paul, however, first Saul, was even an enemy of Christ; he persecuted Christians very vehemently. When the first martyr Stephen the saint suffered, he was there; when he was being stoned, he guarded the garments of all those stoning him. It seemed too little to him if he were to stone with his own hands only; he was in the hands of all whose garments he kept. After this, when the most blessed Stephen was killed and first crowned – for his name in Greek indicates a crown – this very vehement enemy received letters from the chief priests to lead anyone he found following this path in chains to punishment. Therefore, he went to Damascus, raging, gasping for slaughter, thirsting for blood. He who dwelled in the heavens, according to the psalm, laughed at him, and the Lord mocked him. Why do you rage violently, about to soon endure suffering yourself? How little to the Lord Christ was it to save an enemy, to cast down a persecutor with a single voice from above, to raise up a preacher! Saul, he said, Saul, still Saul, why do you persecute me? The song was Psalm 18.

How great the dignity, my brothers! Let us recognize the voice of the Lord. Who could still persecute Christ, sitting at the right hand of the Father in heaven? But there the head reigns, here the members still labor. The blessed apostle Paul, the teacher of the Gentiles, taught us what we are to Christ: “You, however,” he says, “are the body of Christ and members of it.” So then, the whole Christ is the head and members. Look at our body, take the likeness. If perhaps you are afflicted in a crowd, and someone treads on your foot, the head cries out on behalf of the foot. And what is it that it cries out? “You are treading on me.” “Saul, Saul, why are you persecuting me?” For when Saul was persecuting the evangelists, through whom the Lord was being carried to the whole world, the feet of Christ were being trodden upon by him; for in them Christ was going to the Gentiles, in them Christ was running everywhere. The future foot was treading on the feet of Christ: He who was to carry the Gospel of the Lord to the world was treading on what he was to become. How beautiful are the feet, says the Prophet, and the teacher himself recalls, of those who proclaim peace, who bring good news! This we also sang in the psalm: Their sound has gone out into all the earth. Do you want to see where Christ has reached through these feet? And their words to the ends of the earth.

Ananias is interpreted as a sheep. What it means: to divide food. Paul suffered more than he did, but with Christ providing strength.

Finally, the Lord speaking to Ananias, when He sends him to baptize Saul, heard from Ananias himself: Lord, I have heard about this man, how everywhere he persecutes your servants. As if he were saying: Why do you send the sheep to the wolf? For Ananias is a Hebrew word, which in Latin is interpreted as sheep. But concerning Saul, who was to become Paul, from persecutor to future preacher, the Prophet had foretold: Benjamin, a ravenous wolf. Where from Benjamin? Hear Paul himself: For I also am an Israelite, from the seed of Abraham, from the tribe of Benjamin. A ravenous wolf: In the morning consuming, in the evening dividing spoils; first consuming, then feeding. For already that preacher divided spoils, he knew what to give to whom: what nourishment to provide to the sick and weak, with what food to feed the strong. For dividing spoils, dividing, not casting indiscriminately, he was dividing the spoils and said: And I, brethren, could not speak to you as to spiritual, but as to carnal; as to babes in Christ, I gave you milk to drink, not meat; for you were not yet able, nor can you now. I divide, I do not cast indiscriminately. Therefore, Ananias had heard the name of this wolf, and he trembled in the hands of the Shepherd; but he was terrified by the wolf, yet consoled, strengthened, and preserved by the Shepherd. He heard incredible things about this wolf, but true and faithful from the Truth speaking. For what did the Lord reply to the trembling Ananias about the fame of Paul, what did He reply? Let it be now, this man is a chosen vessel to me, to bear my name before the Gentiles and kings. I will show him how much he must suffer for my name. I will show him: it is the voice of one threatening, but preparing the crown. Hence, from persecutor to preacher, what did he endure? Perils in the sea, perils in rivers, perils in the city, perils in the wilderness, perils among false brethren; in labor and hardship, in many vigils, in hunger and thirst, in cold and nakedness, in deaths often, besides those things which come upon me daily, the care of all the churches. Who is weak, and I am not weak? Who is offended, and I do not burn? Behold the persecutor. Endure, suffer: you suffer more than you did; but do not be angry, you have received interest. But what did he regard when he endured such things? Hear elsewhere: For indeed, he says, our light affliction. Now all this is light, why? It works for us an exceedingly eternal weight of glory, not looking at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen. For the things that are seen are temporary; but the things that are not seen are eternal. Therefore he burned with love for eternal things, when bravely enduring evils, although bitter and terrible, yet temporary. Every punishment with an end is light, where an endless reward is promised. The most solemn day of Paul's suffering. God found in Paul something to punish, He made something to crown. Saul from Saul. Paul, little one. And yet when he was enduring, was it he who endured in himself and with himself, who did not fail? Indeed, I dare to say, he was not enduring by himself. And he did endure, because he wanted faithfully; he did not endure by himself, because the power of Christ dwelled in him. Christ was reigning, Christ was supplying strength, Christ was not deserting, Christ was running in the runner, Christ was leading to the prize. Therefore, I do no injustice when I say, he did not endure by himself. I say indeed, I say with confidence, and I confirm my words with the testimony of himself; I do not allow the holy Apostle to be offended at me when I recite his own words to him. Say, Paul, say, saint, say, Apostle; let my brothers hear you, because I have done you no wrong. What then does he say, comparing himself in labors to his fellow apostles? He did not fear to say: "I have labored more abundantly than they all." Here already I am answered: Certainly not by himself. Therefore, say what follows, lest this delay of mine be an inflation. "I have labored more abundantly than they all." Now you began to be angry with me: but he intercedes for me and in a certain way speaks to you. Do not be angry: "Yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me," so then also speaking of his impending passion, of which today's day is the most solemn, what did he say? "For I am already being poured out as a libation, and the time of my departure has come. I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, will award to me on that Day." He will award it: for there is one to whom he should award it. "I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith." What is awarded is due: but it would not be due if it were not given what was not due. Certainly, you hear now of the debt of God presuming, you hear now of Christ returning: hear through Paul himself giving what was not due. "I am not worthy," he says, "to be called an Apostle, because I persecuted the Church of God." Now consider what was due to him, whom you see now being prepared for a crown; first consider him, and see if you find him worthy of punishment for his deeds. "I persecuted the Church of God; which cross is he not worthy of? Which torments would be enough to punish him? "I am not worthy," he says, "to be called an Apostle. I know what was due to me: apostleship to me, who persecuted the Church of God!" From where then, Apostle? "But by the grace of God, I am what I am." O grace given freely! It found what to punish, but made what to crown. See what follows. "By the grace," he says, "of God, I am what I am." For I am not indeed worthy to be an Apostle, because I persecuted the Church of God; I expected punishments, I find rewards. From where is this to me? "Because by the grace of God, I am what I am, and his grace toward me was not in vain, but I labored more abundantly than they all." Again, did you begin to lift yourself up? "Not I, but the grace of God which was with me." Well said, excellent, not Saul anymore, but Paul, not proud anymore, but little. Saul was the name for pride, because that tall king, and so much more enviable the higher he was, was called Saul, who persecuted holy David. From there this one had taken his name from Saul, Saul, a fitting name for a persecutor. What afterwards? Paul. What is Paul? Small, very small. Recall the word, you who know letters; recall also the habit, you who are not called liberals of books. Paul is small. After a little while I will see you, shortly I will see you: shortly, after a little while.

There was a hem in the garment of the Lord. He shares a day of suffering with Peter. The merits of Paul are gifts of God.

Therefore, behold Paul, once Saul, thirsty for blood and breathing out murders, but now Paul. I am the least of the Apostles; utterly the least, but most beneficial. Perhaps in the Lord's garment, this least one was the hem: this the woman touched, and she was freed from the flow of blood, in which there was a figure of the Church of the nations. For Paul, though small, was sent to the nations with salvation. Finally, know this, the woman herself, who touched the hem of the Lord, was unknown to the Lord, but the Lord's unknowing was a figure. What did He not know? And yet, because that woman signified the Church of the nations, where the Lord was not present in bodily presence, but was there through the disciples, where His hem might be touched, He said: Who touched me? And the Apostles: The crowds press upon you, and you say, who touched me? And He: someone touched me. The crowds press, faith touches. Brethren, be of those who touch, not of those who press. Who touched me? And someone touched me. Christ, similar to one unknowing, signifying: not lying, but signifying, what signifying? The people whom I have not known have served me. Therefore, say, Apostle, with impending passion, spender of effort, now claimant of the crown, say: For I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight. What would the fight avail without a following victory? You say you have fought, say whence you have won. Ask elsewhere. Thanks be to God, who gives us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. I have finished my course. Have you finished your course? Recognize this: It is not of him that wills, nor of him that runs, but of God that shows mercy. Say another, I have kept the faith. You have kept and preserved it; but: Unless the Lord keeps the city, those who guard it watch in vain. Thus, to keep faith, He aided, He kept it in you, who said to your fellow apostle, with whom you share the same day of suffering, which you read in the Gospel: I have prayed for you, Peter, that your faith may not fail. Therefore, make the claim, the reward is prepared. Say: I have fought the good fight, it is true; I have finished the course, it is true; I have kept the faith, it is true. Henceforth, there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, will give me on that day. Claim what is due: your crown is ready, utterly ready: but remember that your merits are God's gifts.

Sermons - Sermon 299D

It is necessary for the faithful to know that there are various kinds of baptism. For, besides the sacrament of the font, which is now given to them, there is also the baptism of tribulation, which is when someone, confessing Christ before persecutors, is baptized in his own blood. There is also the baptism of fire, when, inflamed by the Spirit, he is purified internally. On the Birth Day of the Holy Martyrs of Scillium

Neither for the sake of superfluous things, nor for the sake of necessary things, should Christ be denied. Two things are necessary: salvation and a friend.

Holy martyrs, witnesses of God, chose rather to live by dying than to die by living; lest by fearing death they would deny life, by loving life they despised life. That Christ be denied, the enemy promised life, but not the kind Christ offered. Believing, therefore, in what the Savior promised, they laughed at what the persecutor threatened. Brothers, when we celebrate the solemnities of the martyrs, let us acknowledge the examples set before us, which we should follow. For by holding this assembly, we do not increase the glory of the martyrs. Their crown is already known among the people and the angels. We could hear what they suffered when it was read. But what they received: Neither eye has seen, nor ear heard. The goods of this world are either superfluous or necessary. Let us briefly speak of this, and pay attention, and distinguish, if we can, what are the superfluous and necessary goods of this world; so that you may see that Christ should not be denied neither for the superfluous nor for the necessary. Who can enumerate the superfluous of this world? If we wanted to list them, it would take us a long time. So let us speak of the necessary things; whatever other things there are, these will be superfluous. In this world, these two are necessary: health and a friend; these are the things to value greatly, which we ought not to despise. Health and a friend are natural goods. God made man to be and to live: that is health; but, so that he would not be alone, friendship was sought. Therefore, friendship begins with a spouse and children, and proceeds even to strangers. But if we consider that we had one father and one mother, who will be a stranger? Every man is a neighbor to every man. Ask nature. Is he a stranger? He is a man. Is he an enemy? He is a man. Is he a foe? He is a man. Is he a friend? Let him remain a friend. Is he an enemy? Let him become a friend. How wisdom has made our neighbor.

Every man is neighbor to every man. To these two necessities in this world, salvation and a friend, comes foreign wisdom. It found all foolish, erring, worshipping the unnecessary, delighting in the temporal, ignorant of the eternal. This wisdom was not a friend to fools. Since it was not a friend to fools and was far from fools, it took on our neighbor, and became our neighbor. This is the mystery of Christ. What is so far as foolishness from wisdom? What is so near as a man to another man? What is so distant, I say, as wisdom from foolishness? Therefore wisdom took on man and became near to man through that which was near. And behold, since wisdom itself said to man: Behold, piety is wisdom; and it pertains to the wisdom of man to worship God, for this is piety, two commandments were given to us: You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind. The other: You shall love your neighbor as yourself. And he who heard this said: And who is my neighbor? He thought the Lord would say: Your father and mother, your wife, your children, your brothers, your sisters. He did not reply this, but wishing to commend every man as a neighbor to every man, he established a story. A certain man, he said. Who? A certain one, nevertheless a man. A certain man. Who then is a man? A certain one, but nevertheless a man. He was descending from Jerusalem to Jericho, and fell among robbers. They are called robbers, who also pursue us. Wounded, stripped, left half-dead on the road, he was scorned by passersby, by a priest, by a Levite; but observed by a passing Samaritan. He approached him: after seeing to his care, he was raised onto a beast, led to an inn; care was ordered for him, expense was incurred. He who had questioned was asked who was a neighbor to this half-dead man. Because two had scorned him, and scorned neighbors, a stranger approached. For this Jerusalemite man had neighbors, priests, and Levites, Samaritans were aliens. His neighbors passed by, and a stranger became a neighbor. Who then was a neighbor to this man? You say, who had questioned saying: Who is my neighbor? Now answer what is true. Arrogance had questioned: let nature speak. What then does he say? I believe, the one who showed him mercy. And the Lord to him: Go, and you do likewise.

Greetings to you, and health to your friend.

Let us return to the cause. Now we see three things: health, a friend, wisdom. But health and a friend are also from this world; wisdom from another source. Because of health, food and clothing, and if bad health strikes, medicine. The Apostle, speaking in safety, says: But godliness with contentment is great gain. We brought nothing into this world, and we can take nothing out of it. Having food and clothing, let us be content with these. These are necessary for health: but for the superfluous things? For those who want to become rich - to be sure for the superfluous things - fall into temptation and a snare and many foolish and harmful desires, which plunge men into ruin and destruction. Where therefore is health? Therefore, for health, having food and clothing, let us be content with these. For a friend, what? What more could be said to you than love your neighbor as yourself? Therefore, let health be for you, let it also be for your friend. For the clothing of a friend: Whoever has two tunics should share with him who has none. For the food of a friend: and whoever has food, should do likewise. You are fed, you feed; you are clothed, you clothe. These are from this world; but from another source, which is wisdom: you learn, and you teach.

How the martyrs despised superfluous things.

Set before your eyes now the contest of the martyrs. The enemy comes, compels one to deny Christ. But let us imagine him still coaxing, not yet raging. He promises riches and honors. These are superfluous: those who are tempted with such gifts to deny Christ have not yet reached the contest, have not yet found the struggle, have not yet provoked the most ancient enemy with a true fight. However, the faithful man, to whom such things were promised, despised them and said: Should I deny Christ for the sake of riches? Should I deny riches for the sake of riches? Should I deny the treasure for the sake of gold? For he is the one: who, though he was rich, became poor for our sakes, that through his poverty we might be enriched. For he is the one, about whom the Apostle also said: in whom are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. You consider what you promise, because you cannot see what you are trying to take away. I see by faith what you wish to take from me: you by the eyes of the flesh, what you want to give; better are those things which the eye of the heart beholds, than those which the eye of the flesh sees. For the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal. Therefore I despise your gifts, says the faithful soul, because they are temporal, superfluous, fleeting, volatile, full of dangers, full of temptations. No one has these when he wishes, he loses them even when he does not want to. The promiser is despised, another comes, that is, the persecutor, the flatterer is despised, he begins to rage; the serpent is despised, he has turned into a lion. Do you not want, he says, to receive greater riches from me? If you do not deny Christ, I will take away what you have. You still rage against my superfluities. Like a sharp razor, you have wrought deceit. You shave the hair, you do not cut the skin: take even these things from me. Indeed, because you saw that I gave these things to the poor, received strangers, did what Paul advised: Command, he says, the rich of this world, command not to be high-minded, nor to trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God, who gives us everything richly to enjoy. Let them do good, let them be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate, laying up in store for themselves a good foundation for the future, that they may lay hold on eternal life. Taking these things from me, I will not perform those works: will I be less before God because I am willing, but not able? Or am I so deaf to the voice of the Angels: Peace on earth to men of goodwill? Take therefore my superfluities. We brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out. And having food and raiment, let us be therewith content.

Indeed, even necessary. But the persecutor says: I take away your food, I take away your clothing. The struggle is approached, the enemy raged more fiercely; the superfluous things have been left behind, we have come to the necessary. Do not depart from me, for tribulation is near. Nothing is so close to one's soul as one's flesh; hunger and thirst and heat you feel in the flesh. There I want to see you, good martyr, witness of God! See, He says, see! Who will separate us from the love of Christ? What is it that you threaten? I take away your food, I take away your clothing. Tribulation? Or distress? Or hunger? Or nakedness? He threatens from another side. I take away your friend, I kill your dearest ones before your eyes, I will slaughter your spouse and children. You kill, you kill? They do not deny, and you do not kill. What is it? Because you do not terrify me about me, you terrify me about my own? If they do not deny, you do not kill my own; if they deny, you kill strangers. Let the persecutor still add, and rage, and say: If you do not care about your own, I will take you yourself from this light. From this light: can it be from the eternal light? From which light will you take me? Which I share in common with you. It is not a great light, which you also see. I will not deny the light for this light. There was true light. I know, to whom I should say: For with you is the fountain of life, and in your light we shall see light. Take life, take the light; I will have life, I will have the light. I will have life, where I will not suffer you the killer; I will have the light, which neither you, nor any night can take from me. The martyr has conquered. Is there anything else where we should see a greater struggle? No. He threatens death, he rages in safety, he carves with claws, he tortures with torments, he burns with flames, he brings in beasts: and here he is conquered. Why is he conquered? Because in all these things we overwhelmingly conquer through Him who loved us.

None is more necessary for Christ. Sometimes he is denied by a believer, when he is not defended out of shame.

Therefore, my brothers, let not Christ be denied on account of superfluities, nor be denied on account of necessities: nothing is more necessary than Him. I was speaking of necessities like safety and friendship. You sin for safety, and deny Christ; by loving safety, you will not have safety. You sin for your friend, and, to avoid offending him, you deny Christ. Alas, wretched me! Sometimes He is denied out of shame. The persecutor does not rage, the plunderer does not despoil, the torturer does not press; you deny your Lord merely to avoid displeasing your friend. I see what your friend has taken from you: show what he will give. What will he give? The very friendships through which you sin, through which you are entwined, through which you become an enemy of God. This person would not be your friend if you were your own friend; but, because you are an enemy to yourself, you think a person who is an enemy to you is a friend. And how are you an enemy to yourself? Because you love iniquity: But he who loves iniquity hates his own soul. But Christ is not to be denied to please a wicked and perverse friend; He is not to be denied but is reproached by the wicked, accused by the wicked, and, to avoid shame, not defended by the faithful; He is deserted, silenced, not proclaimed. The tongue of the blasphemer rages, and there is none praising. How many evils are committed as if for necessities, for sustenance, for covering, for safety, for a friend; and all those things that are sought after perish all the more. If, however, you despise present things, God will give you eternal things. Despise safety, you will have immortality; despise death, you will have life; despise honor, you will have a crown; despise a human friend, you will have God as a friend. But there, where you will have God as a friend, you will not be without a neighborly friend; there will be friends with you, whose deeds and confessions were just read a little earlier. The Passion of the Scillitan Martyrs, men and women, had been read. The city of Christ will be friendly to those confessing Christ.

We have heard of men acting bravely, confessing manfully, and we have also heard of women, not behaving like women, but holding fast to Christ, forgetting their sex. There will be friendship with these people where there will be no lust of the flesh, and there will only be wisdom to enjoy with friends. Behold what we lose if we love them here and deny Christ! There, our neighbor will not terrify us if he dies; there will be no mourning where there will be eternal life; nor will it be necessary to say: Having food and clothing, we will be content with these. Our clothing will be immortality, our food will be charity, life will be eternal; nor will we perform good works there, which are called such by those here; we will not attain to them there if we have not done them here. It will not be said to you: Break your bread for the hungry, where there will be no hunger; it will not be said to you: Take in the stranger, where you will find no stranger; it will not be said to you: Free the oppressed, where there will be no enemy; it will not be said to you: Reconcile the litigants, where there will be eternal peace. See, my brothers, how it is endured here by seeking; there we will have it, where we cannot perish. Do you seek salvation? Despise, and you will have it. Do you deny Christ, fearing to offend human friendships: confess Christ, and the city of Angels will be your friend, the city of Patriarchs, the city of Prophets, the city of Apostles, the city of all Martyrs, the city of all good Faithful. Christ Himself founded it forever.

Sermons - Sermon 299E

Sermon 299/E Treatise on the Birthday of the Saints of Scillium In the Basilica of the New. The strength of both sexes is Christ. The years recede, they do not advance. The day, God. The fortitude of the martyrs of Christ, both men and women, is Christ. For if only men were strong in suffering, virtue would be ascribed to the stronger sex. Therefore, the weaker sex could also suffer bravely because God could do all things in everyone. So whether it is a man or a woman, in their tribulation they should say: The Lord is my strength; and: I will love you, Lord, my strength. Love itself is a virtue: for whoever knows how to love can endure all things for the sake of what they love. And if illicit love persuaded lovers to endure many hardships bravely for their trifles and sins, and they place no danger before their eyes as they lie in wait for another's modesty, how much stronger should they be in the love of God who love Him, from whom they cannot be separated, whether living or dying? The impudent lover indeed loses what he loves if he is killed for the sake of his beloved; but the strong and just lover of God not only does not lose what he loved by dying, but finds what he loved by dying. Finally, the lover of sin fears to confess, the lover of God fears to deny. Let us, therefore, choose the love, brothers, in which we can live innocently and die safely; for with this love chosen, when it possesses our hearts, for us to live will be Christ, and to die will be gain. By dying, we avoid what we hate; by dying, we reach what we love. Therefore, whoever loves this life, let him do so, if after loving it he cannot make it last. Whether you love it or not, what you love is fleeing; it flees, and you do not hold onto what you love. Years advance, age declines, what remains is shortened; therefore, the years added do not prolong your life but, if you consider what remains, they have receded. For if they had advanced, they would have made your life longer; now, for example, thirty years remain for you; you live so that they diminish. Your many birthdays have added years, which by living longer you have made fewer. Consider the fingers of the counting hand, not to recount the ones that have passed, but those that remain; and you see that they come to the point where they will not be. For if you are at the third hour, you do not recall the first; nor do you make tomorrow out of yesterday's flight; after a while, tomorrow will also be yesterday. What profit is there in not disregarding these things which by loving you cannot hold onto? The beloved day flees from you, the desired God approaches. Love this, by loving which you will reach. He is faithful, He stands at your side: come to Him. And if you were lazy in this: He came to you, was born for you, died for you. Do not fear the bitter cup of death: the physician drank it first for you. The death of martyrs is hard, but in the sight of men. Whatever Christ did, it is our teaching. The noble response of the martyr Donata.

Therefore, do not fear the bitter cup of death: for death is bitter, but through this bitterness one passes into great sweetness. This bitterness heals the soul's very being; not if you die, but if you die for the truth. This bitterness is medicinal, not lethal: it heals your innermost parts, drink without fear. Because the physician did not hesitate to drink, why does the sick man hesitate to drink? He, who did not have what would heal himself through the bitterness of that cup, drank it for your sake, lest you think poison was given to you. He drank it for your sake, so that you might learn to say: "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints." Those confessing Christ suffered diversely: some were struck by the sword, some were burned with fire, some were thrown to wild beasts, some were not allowed to be buried. All harsh, all cruel, all horrible: but in the sight of men. Therefore, when Scripture commended the deaths of martyrs: it says, “Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints”; in the sight of Him who knows how to judge and cannot err. For the foolish and faithless, seeing present happiness disregarded by the wise and faithful, judged those who died for the name of Christ as wretched; for they did not have the eyes of faith, therefore they could not look forward to the promised things. The promiser and giver came: by exhortation He strengthened, by giving the spirit He perfectly healed. For He says: "Do not fear those who kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do." See foolish people raging, if they hear this, they have no more that they can do. For they do many things with the bodies: they tear, they burn, they scatter, they do not allow burial; and they say as if boasting: "Where is what Christ said, that when one man kills another, he has no more he can do? Behold, I did so many things to the dead body." He is like one in heart who feels not in flesh. Harsh and foolish, what have you done? If he feels, you have done something; if he feels not, you have raged in vain. I show you, He says, whom you should fear: who, when He kills, has power to cast into hell. Which the human attacker and killer does not have, who strikes up to the flesh, but does not follow as the spirit departs, for he does not see it. Who is to be feared? See by whom you are killed, see how you die. He has you in power after death, who had you in power before death; for not even a man could do anything to you unless He permits it. Are you surprised that He permits it? Hear the prince of martyrs, who while being judged by a man, the hidden God, the manifest man, in whom He was despised; thus, while judged by man, the man became inflated. "Do you not answer me?" he says, "Do you not know that I have power to kill you and to release you?" And He who is mild, Lord of all, servant of all, serving the sick not by condition but by love, healed even that inflated and swollen man. Christ seemed to be judged by him, but he was healed by Christ; the swollen one terrified, but the physician cut deep. Where he inflated himself as he wished, he received the answer; not to be told: "You have no power over me," but rather "I have power over you." Which if the Lord said, He would say the truth, but would not provide us an example. He taught even while suffering, just as He taught while being tempted. As He taught you what to answer the tempter when tempted, so He taught you what to answer the persecutor when judged. That voice was ours, the head spoke for the body. So what did He say? "You would have no power over me if it were not given to you from above." He did not say: "You have not," but: "You would not have, unless you had received it." He taught the martyr to be subject, not to man, but to God; He taught the martyr, when suffering anything from man, not to fear man, but Him who permits man to act, who gives power to man. That mightiest woman taught by such teaching said: "Give honor to Caesar as Caesar; but fear to God." She rendered what was due to each by justly distributing; she answered, neither proud nor weak. She heeded the Apostle saying: "Be subject to every human institution for God's sake." She said: "Give honor to Caesar as Caesar." Though he may rage, let him be honored; let the order of humility be rendered to him, even if he lacks the principality of power. For he holds the highest power in whose hand we are, both ourselves and our words. Therefore, the Lord says, "Fear Him who has the power which, when He kills, He is not limited to this point, cannot do nothing further, but even when He kills, has the power to cast into the hell of fire." The death of Lazarus and the rich man is common, but their fate is different. Riches are neither blamed in the rich man, nor is poverty praised in the poor man. What was punished in the rich man?

O faithless one, you consider the present, you are terrified by present things: sometimes think of the future. Tomorrow and tomorrow, sometimes the last will be tomorrow, day presses upon day, nor does it take away the one who made the day. For with Him, there is a day without yesterday and tomorrow: for with Him, there is a day without sunrise and sunset: with Him is eternal light, where is the fountain of life, and in whose light we shall see light. Let your heart be there, as long as it is necessary for your flesh to be here, let your heart be there: all will be there if the heart is there. The rich man in purple and fine linen finished his delights; the poor man full of sores finished his miseries. The last day was feared by one, and desired by the other. It came to both, but it did not find both equal; and because it did not find both equal, it did not come equally to both. To die and to die was similar: to end this life and to end this life is a common condition. You have heard of communion: pay attention to separation. For it happened that the poor man died and was carried by the angels to Abraham's bosom; and the rich man also died and was buried. For perhaps he [the poor man] was not even buried. You know the rest: the rich man was tormented in hell, the poor man was comforted in Abraham's bosom. Those delights and those miseries have passed; both have ended and changed: the rich man from delights to punishment, the poor man from miseries to delights. Indeed, those delights and those miseries were brief; but those punishments and those delights succeeded without end. Surely wealth was not accused in the rich man, nor was poverty praised in the poor man; but impiety was condemned in the rich man, and piety was praised in the poor man. For sometimes men hear these things in the Gospel; and those who have nothing rejoice at these words, the beggar exults. I will be, he says, in Abraham's bosom, not that rich man. Let us answer the poor man: You have fewer sores; add to your merits, and wish for the tongues of dogs. You boast that you are poor, I seek whether you are faithful: for faithless poverty is a torment here, and a damnation there. Let us also speak to the rich man: When you heard the Gospel about the one who was clothed in purple and fine linen and feasted splendidly every day, you were afraid; I do not disapprove of your fear, but fear more what is disapproved there. He despised the poor man silently at his door, the poor man longed for the crumbs falling from his table; no covering, no shelter, no humanity was offered to him. This was punished in the rich man, cruelty, impiety, pride, arrogance, faithlessness: these were punished in the rich man. How do you prove this? someone says, surely riches were punished. If I do not prove it from the very chapter of the Gospel, let no one hear me. When the rich man was in torments in hell, he desired a drop of water on his tongue from the finger of that poor man who had desired the crumbs from his table; and perhaps the poor man more easily reached the crumbs than the rich man reached the drop: for the drop was denied to him. Abraham, in whose bosom was the poor man, answered him: Remember, son, you received your good things in your lifetime. This is what I proposed to show, that impiety and faithlessness were condemned in him, not riches and abundance of present things. You received, he says, your good things in your lifetime. What does it mean: your good things? You thought other things were not good. What does it mean: in your lifetime? You did not believe in another life. Therefore, your good things, not God's; in your life, not Christ's. You received your good things in your lifetime: what you believed is finished, therefore you did not receive the better good things; because when you were in lower things, you did not want to believe in them. Of the eternal punishments and rewards, the murmuring of unbelievers. Wicked brethren of the rich man, the Jews.

Perhaps we accuse that rich man, and interpret the sense of father Abraham according to our understanding. So that something might be said more plainly, which is hidden may be unfolded, what is closed may be seen, what is locked may be opened to those who knock. When assistance or even slight mercy was denied to him, to fulfill what is written: Judgment without mercy for him who showed no mercy, he asked that Lazarus be sent to his brothers and tell them what happens after this life. It was said to be impossible, but if they did not want to go to the same places of torment, they should listen to Moses and the Prophets. They have, he says, Moses and the Prophets: let them listen to them. And he who knew himself and his brothers - for unfaithful brothers used to mutter such things among themselves, mocking the divine words, when they heard something said in the law or the Prophets, concerning the avoidance of eternal punishments and the desire for eternal rewards, muttering among themselves: Who has risen from there? Who has come back from there? Who could tell us what happens there? Since I buried my father, I have not heard his voice. Knowing this, he was accustomed to talk with an unfaithful heart and mouth with his brothers, he requested that it might be done what they said had not been done, and therefore they despised the divine words. And he said: Let someone go from here and tell them. And father Abraham: They have Moses and the Prophets; let them listen to them. And he, mindful of his conversations: No, father Abraham. As if he were saying: I know what we used to talk about. No, father Abraham: I know what I am saying, I know what I am asking. The despiser of the poor, belatedly merciful, wanted mercy to be shown to his brothers, which he did not show to himself. He said, No, no, father Abraham: they do not believe Moses and the Prophets. I know, I was like that: But if someone goes to them from the dead, they will believe. And father Abraham: if they do not believe Moses and the Prophets - for they were Jews, he would not say, father Abraham, unless he were a Jew. Therefore, father Abraham replied: If they do not listen to Moses and the Prophets, neither will they be persuaded if someone rises from the dead. It has happened, it has been fulfilled: they did not listen to Moses and the Prophets, they despised the Lord who rose. For just as they were despisers of Moses and the Prophets, so they did not want to listen to the Lord rising from the dead, against whom they bought false witnesses. We give you money, they say - to those guards of the tomb - and say that while we were sleeping, his disciples came and stole him. Sleeping witnesses, bought, corrupted, denying their own lives, imagining the thefts of others! If you were awake, why did you not catch the thieves? If you were sleeping, how did you see what happened? The bosom of rich Abraham received the poor Lazarus. How Abraham possessed riches is evident from the sacrifice of Isaac. Truly rich are those who are rich within.

We have shown, as I think, that it was not the riches that were accused in the rich man, but his impiety, infidelity, pride, and cruelty. Hear a greater proof that it is not riches that are accused. Where was the rich man plunged? Into the hell of torments. Where was the poor man lifted up? Into Abraham's bosom. See the poor man in Abraham's bosom: Abraham received him, he was received by him. This Abraham, who was the faithful patriarch. Add also what I would say; read in the book of Genesis the riches of Abraham, gold, silver, cattle, household: Abraham abounded. Why do you accuse the rich man? A rich man received the poor man. Therefore let us by no means accuse riches, yet neither do we thus build up avarice. Let not the rich man say, because I have spoken for him; let not the rich man say, because I wished to be his comforter. For he was afraid at the mention of the Gospel: when he heard that the rich man was cast into hell’s punishments, he was afraid. I gave him security. Let him not fear riches, but vices; not abundance, but avarice; not resources, but desires. Let him have as Abraham had, and have with faith; let him have, possess, not be possessed. Someone will say to me: And how did Abraham have? Do you want to know how Abraham had? What was with him? Piety: what? Faith: what? Obedience:

what? Inner riches. Do you want to know? Do you want to learn by the reading mentioned? Every man whatever he thinks to reasonably gather, he keeps for his children. Therefore, since all men keep their riches for their children, and those who do not have children suffer hardship, because they do not have anyone to whom they might leave what they have gathered; since, therefore, it is manifest, that all men love their children more than their riches, more to whom they keep than what they keep, do you want to know how Abraham had that inheritance? Read how by God's command he disregarded the heir. Put before your eyes the rich father: there he who keeps, there what he keeps, there for whom he keeps. Weigh both, distribute merits, arrange love. Surely he valued him more for whom he kept than those things which he kept. If the Lord Jesus Christ were to say to him: If you would be perfect, go, sell all that you have, and give to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven, and come, follow me, I believe, like the rich man in the Gospel, even Abraham would leave sorrowful. "Give up riches," he would hear sorrowfully, who heard joyfully, "Sacrifice to me the heir?" Sacrifice to me your only one, your beloved son; whom I gave, give to me. He did not doubt, he did not hesitate, sorrow did not cloud his devotion, neither in intending to sacrifice, nor in being to be sacrificed; for neither did the boy himself tremble under his father’s sword. He was led joyfully by the joyful, he was bound, he was laid on the altar, there was no delay; the father's armed right hand was raised, nowhere trembling, nowhere weak, nor lowered before Him who commanded it was raised. Behold how you may have, and have whatever you can; not to nourish desires, but to perfect pieties, and securely await the last day; truly rich, rich within; outwardly as you can, inwardly as you have been commanded. Do you have? The Lord gave. Have you lost? The Lord took away. Rejoice, for He who took away did not withdraw Himself. Does He who made you not suffice you? As it pleased the Lord, so it was done. Say, what do you fear? Since you are evil, and He is good, does it please you to be good and to Him evil? It cannot be. Believe it to be good, that it pleased the good. As it pleased the Lord, so it was done; let the name of the Lord be blessed. We know that all things work together for good to those who love God.

Sermons - Sermon 299F

SERMON 299/F On the Feast of the Holy Martyrs of Scillium Martyrs, it is a Greek name.

About the martyrs of Christ, that is, about the witnesses of Christ who were not ashamed to confess His name before men, this day of solemnity exhorts. He who said to them: "Do not worry about what you will say, for the Holy Spirit will teach you what you should say, grants us that we may speak to you what is expedient for you." "Martyrs" is a Greek name, in Latin they are called "witnesses." Therefore, the holy martyrs, witnesses not false but true, bore testimony with their blood that another life is to be preferred to this life, because they bravely despised this passing one. You heard the confessions of the martyrs, whose solemnity is celebrated today, when they were recited. What constancy burned in them, what desire for the kingdom of heaven appeared in the fire of their words where they were when they were heard, to which they clung from where perhaps they drew what they were saying, since we cannot recall everything, let us at least remember something. To deny Christ is false testimony.

Remember, beloved, how, when the judge who was hearing the case called their confession "the persuasion of vanity," one of them replied: "The persuasion of vanity is to commit murder, to bear false witness." What is to be understood by the persuasion of vanity in these two cases? Evil indeed. Were not the things that vanity persuaded evil? Thus, it was not in vain that he, who was foretold not to worry about what he would speak because he would receive it from the Holy Spirit at that hour, said these two things not without reason. For that was the issue at hand. The very cause was being debated. He said, "The persuasion of vanity is to commit murder, to bear false witness." This is to say: You want to commit murder, and you force me to bear false witness. To deny Christ is false testimony. "Say that Christ is not God, and that the gods whom we worship are gods." Both are false: He is God, and they are not gods. "Deny what you believe." What you do not want me to have on my lips, take away from my heart; but how can you forbid me to speak what you cannot take away from my heart? What is inside is what the true witness brings forth outwardly. For I heard from the Apostle; rather, from Christ through the Apostle: "With the heart one believes unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation." But the mocker of truth, the lover of vanity, says: "How is confession made with the mouth unto salvation? They speak and die. How do they speak unto salvation, when, by speaking, they are killed? If they did not speak, they would not be killed." How is this? Confession unto salvation is made, which was seen by those who bore witness, but was not seen by those who threatened with death. For the adversary threatened to take away their salvation, but they saw another salvation which they were to receive and never lose. Gazing at this, they were strong and, inflamed by its beauty, they despised transitory salvation, common with animals. One salvation is shared with Angels, another with beasts. Man is in the middle. He has something similar to Angels. What does he have? Mind, reason, intelligence, wisdom. What does he have similar to beasts? Flesh, weakness, need, mortality. Let him focus on the former, dissimulate the latter. Love the former, despise the latter. The former remain, the latter pass away. The salvation will come that the Savior Himself promised, who taught us to despise this salvation by His death, and taught us what should be loved by those who despise it through His resurrection. All this was shown to me in my Lord. All this was shown to me in the Word that became flesh and dwelled among us. For He deigned to have flesh for us, so that in that flesh which He took from us, He would show us what to love and what to despise. For there was no blood in the Word to be shed for us, nor was there death in life. For He was the life and light of men. From where then comes blood, from where death, from where suffering for us, except that the Word became flesh and dwelled among us? He took from us that which He could die with, giving us great things from His own. We knew how to die. We had nothing from which to live. For we remained poor on this earth. It is usual to say of those extremely poor: He is extremely poor, he has nothing from which he can live. This is what we all were, both the poor and the rich were thus. For even the rich, who do not know eternal life, have nothing from which to live. Look at us, the sons of men, from below. The Word of God, the Son from above. Neither did we have anything from which we could live, nor did He have anything from which He could die. The Word, the only-begotten Son of God, equal and co-eternal with the Father, He from above, we from below. Sons of men, mortal, weak, needy, puffed up, covetous, truly sad, vainly joyful, we had nothing from which we could live, nor did He have anything from which He could die. What did He take from us, what did He give to us? He took from us that from which He could die. He gave to us that from which we could live. For the Word became flesh and dwelled among us. Being the Son of God, He became the Son of Man. He hungered to feed, thirsted to give drink, slept to awaken, was weary on His journey to offer Himself as provision to the weary, and finally, He was dishonored to honor us, died to give us life.

Blessed saints spoke the truth and were killed. This true witness held, his future gifts perceived in the mind. Therefore, they despised all passing things: The salvation of man is vain. Therefore, he was not terrified when he heard: "If you confess Christ, you will be punished," because he considered that a false witness will not go unpunished. Blessed saints told the truth and were killed. What then? If no one had killed them, would they still be alive? How much better did the testimony of truth which fever would soon make. Life is spared so that the true life may perish. The transient is spared so that the eternal is not received. Buy the rich, buy the poor. Let no one say: I have nothing wherewith. Let him not seek the price in his chest. Let no one say: I have nothing wherewith, I am poor. He who is to be bought gives wherewith he may be bought. He speaks to you: "I will dwell in you, so that you may have wherewith to buy me; you confess me and possess me."

We have one source: God.

Let the holy martyrs pray for us so that not only we celebrate their feasts but also imitate their ways. Let us love their confessions, praise their crowns, and not despair. For we too are men like them, and we are created by Him just as they are. We have one source, one granary from where we are fed, where we drink, and from where we live. Let no one say: He could do it, I cannot. How could he do it? What could he by himself, unless He provided it who said to His own: Without me, you can do nothing? Therefore, the Apostle says: Who, he says, shall separate us from the love of God? Tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword, as it is written: For thy sake we are killed all day long? O good cause: For thy sake we are killed all day long. Therefore fruitfully, therefore happily because for thy sake. Because the cause is good, therefore the crown. For thy sake, we are killed all day long, we are counted as sheep for the slaughter. Those who were killed everywhere and sacrificed by the ignorant were publicly spread out and secretly crowned. For your sake, we are put to death all day long. For your sake, we are put to death all day long. What is the value of love itself speaks, for you it comes from the Spirit of God. The desire of the world is from the world, not from God, and yet it is strong in its own way. How much do men endure for money, how many dangers! They commit themselves to waves and storms. They want to die rather than live poor. And yet while loving life, when they begin to be in danger, they make a loss. Whatever they carry on the sea, they throw overboard, and to live they discard what they live by. There life is sweet and preferred over money, but when the sailor escapes naked he reproaches God: "See where you have led me, why did you not drown me in the sea?" Fool, when you were in danger you did not ask for this. See how lovers of money endure many things for their beloved! Some are exhausted by labors and faint from working, some are slaughtered by robbers, some drown in waves, others perish by various deaths. They can also say to money what martyrs say to wisdom: For your sake, we are put to death all day long, they can absolutely in the same words: For your sake, we are put to death all day long, but they say it to one who does not hear. And if it did hear and did feel and did respond, perhaps it would correct you and say to you: "Fool, wisdom says to the martyrs: When you have died for me you will have me. But I tell you: When you have died for me, you lose both yourself and me."

Sermons - Sermon 29A

SERMON 29/A:

"Let us open our hearts to divine teachings, and may the words of the Holy Scripture awaken in us the light of wisdom, driving away the darkness of ignorance. For just as the dawn banishes night, so does the knowledge of God dispel the shadows of falsehood."

ON THE VERSE OF PSALM 117:

"Give thanks to the Lord for He is good." On the confession of sins and on the confession of praise.

Give thanks to the Lord for He is good, for His mercy endures forever. This is what the Holy Spirit has exhorted us through the voice of the psalm, to which we respond with one voice and one heart saying Alleluia, which in Latin is interpreted as praise the Lord. This same Holy Spirit exhorts you through our voice: Give thanks to the Lord for He is good, for His mercy endures forever. Whether you sing praising His gifts, or you pour out your sins in sighing, give thanks to the Lord for He is good, for His mercy endures forever. For indeed, not only the remembrance of our sins but also the praise of our Lord is called confession, because, if we do one, we do not do it without the other. For we accuse our iniquity with hope in His mercy, and praise His mercy with remembrance of our iniquity. Let us therefore give thanks to the Lord for He is good, for His mercy endures forever. Some believe that certain creatures are evil because they offend the feelings of the unlearned. But this is false. For God made all things very good, for He is good. Some believe that God is unjust because often His faithful suffer many hard and harsh things in this temporal life. But those to whom this seems so are mistaken. For He chastises every son, not whom He rejects, but whom He receives, for His mercy endures forever.

Good and merciful Lord.

Let us therefore confess to the Lord for He is good, for His mercy endures forever. Let us say to the Lord our God: Wonderful are Your works, You have made all things in wisdom. Your judgments are just, You have chastised man for iniquity. Before I was humbled, I sinned. Let us say this in confession, for if certain adversities of our mortality are punishments, He nevertheless does good, for He is good. And if we are corrected by temporal pains and labors, He will not be angry to the end, nor will He be indignant forever, for His mercy endures forever. What is as good as our God? Men blaspheme, not only do they not humble themselves, but they even boast in their crimes. And He makes His sun rise over the good and the bad, and rains upon the just and the unjust. What is as merciful as our God? Men persist in their offenses and crimes, and He ceases not to call them to conversion. What is as good as our God, from whom we perceive such comforts even in distress? What is as merciful as our God, whose future judgment we alter by changing ourselves? Let us confess to the Lord for He is good, for His mercy endures forever. Not all things are praised in confessions, but the praises of the Lord our God. For it has truly been said: How good is God to Israel to the upright in heart, surely He seems evil to those perverse in heart. But who among men, unless made upright after being perverse, begins to praise what they previously blamed, and to marvel at what they previously despised, confessing to the Lord, because now that they are upright themselves, He is good, who seemed evil to the perverse? And since he was perverse by his own malice, but corrected by His grace, it is fitting to confess at the same time that His mercy endures forever. We are evil; He is good; we are good from Him, evil from ourselves; He is good to us when we are good, He is good to us when we are evil. We rage against ourselves, He is merciful towards us. He calls us to convert; He waits until we convert; He forgives if we convert; He crowns if we do not turn away. To whom and with what benefit it is owed by us to confess.

Let us praise the Lord for He is good, for His mercy endures forever. Confession of sins has always seemed fearful to men, but in the presence of a human judge. For very often, with whips and various beatings, with claws, and also with fires, it is compelled, so that confession may be elicited by the mouth. And sometimes the limbs succumb to torture first, so that the framework of the body is loosened, before the spirit surrenders to the pains, revealing the secret crime. Executioners press on, all kinds of tortures increase. But in vain are the entrails laid open by laceration while the conscience is closed in denial. Why then does a man fear to confess under such tortures, except because those who have confessed are accustomed to be punished? He who confesses to a man is punished; he who confesses to God is freed. And no wonder. A man asks of a man what the asker does not know. But God, who urges us to confess, knows what we were unwilling to confess, nor does He learn at the moment we confess. Therefore, how much more does He free those who confess from eternal death, He who, knowing our iniquities even before we confessed, spared us from temporal death.

You may perhaps say: "What does God seek from me, that I confess what He already knows? For when a man seeks this from another man, he is ignorant." What do you think, except that God wants, from you, that your sin be punished by recognizing it, and forgiven by Him by absolving it? For how do you wish Him to forgive what you do not want to acknowledge? Listen to the psalm, and if you are awake, notice your voice there: "I have acknowledged my sin, and I have not concealed my crime. I said, I will confess my transgression to the Lord, and you forgave the iniquity of my heart." Listen in another psalm: "For I acknowledge my iniquity, and my sin is ever before me." Therefore, he did not shamelessly say to God: "Turn your face away from my sins." For then God deigns to turn His face away from man's sin, when man himself takes care to turn his own face to his sin, so that in the ears of God he may say: "And my sin is ever before me." God is not said to turn His face because He does not know, but because He forgives. If, therefore, you fear to confess to a human judge because he is wicked, or because he is compelled to fulfill the severity of the law, safely confess to the Lord, for He is good, for His mercy endures forever.

Sermons - Sermon 29B

Sermon 29/B Sermon of the blessed bishop Augustine on the eve of Pentecost on the verse of the psalm:

Give thanks to the Lord, for He is good, etc..

Confession can be made in two ways. The divine word exhorts us and says: Give thanks to the Lord, for He is good. Give thanks, it says, to the Lord. And as if you were asking for a reason, it adds: For He is good. Let not the guilty fear the severity of the judge: there is security in confession, goodness in the listener. You linger before a human examiner if you confess; you linger before a divine pre-examiner if you do not confess. When a man hears you, he waits to learn from your confession what kind of case you have. But God judges even when you think about it. Therefore confess, so that you may have God propitious. For you cannot hide if you deny. When God admonishes you to confess, He does not expect your contempt, but your humility. Confession, however, in the holy Scriptures, is usually said and understood in two ways: one is of your punishment, the other of the praise of God. By your punishment, I mean when you repent. For everyone who repents punishes himself, lest he be punished by the Lord. Therefore, since confession is understood in two ways - that is: it is not only the confession of sins but also the praise of God - let us first prove this, and afterwards we will discuss each kind of confession as the Lord will grant.

Concerning confession in praise of God. The confession of sins is usual and known, nor is there a need to prove it, but to remind. We should rather seek confession in praise of God, as we might prove. For indeed men are so accustomed to calling confession their own sins, that almost always, when the reader's voice is heard: "Confess," immediately chests are struck, and murmuring conscience is admonished. This almost always happens; yet confession of sins is not always said; sometimes indeed it is of praise, as Scripture says in a certain place: Confess to the Lord, and say this in confession: all the works of the Lord are very good. When you hear: Say this in confession: all the works of the Lord are very good, it is evident that this confession is of God's praise, not of your iniquity. For you confess all the works of the Lord good, not your evil. You have something else, similarly without doubt. The Lord Jesus surely had no sin, and yet says in the Gospel: I confess to you, Father, Lord of heaven and earth. Then follows praise: For you have hidden these things from the wise and prudent, and revealed them to babes. Even so, Father, for it seemed good in your sight. This is the confession of one praising God, not accusing himself. Since therefore one who confesses either accuses himself or praises God, consider for a moment what usefulness each confession has. By accusing sin, we earn pardon.

Anyone who accuses himself of being evil displeases himself. To the extent that he dislikes himself for being evil, he already begins to be good, because being evil displeases him. This is the beginning of the union of our heart with the law of God, so that what He punishes, you also punish, what displeases Him, also displeases you; you already begin to hate sin with God and you begin to hate yourself with Him, so that He begins to love you. For sin cannot go unpunished. You do not want Him to punish it: punish it yourself. For sin cannot be left unpunished. Either you punish it and He frees you, or you let it pass and He punishes it. For why is the publican justified more than the Pharisee, why did he deserve to be spared, if not because he did not spare himself? He cast his eyes to the ground and his heart was raised on high, he struck his breast and cared for his conscience. What more can be said? He descended justified, more than the Pharisee. If you seek the reason, it is because whoever exalts himself will be humbled, and whoever humbles himself will be exalted.

"Precede judgment and you will find a liberator."

Coming before the judge, be a judge to yourself. Anticipate the judge and you will find the one who frees. What does it mean to "anticipate"? Before he punishes, you punish yourself. Surely you have read: Let us go before His face with confession. Two words seem contrary to each other: acknowledge and forgive. You wish Him to forgive: acknowledge yourself. See what a penitent accuser says in the psalm: Turn away Your face. But from what? He does not say: "From me." For in another place he says: Do not turn Your face away from me. So from what, then, does he say? Turn away Your face from my sins. By what merit does he desire that God turn away His face not from him, but from his sins, so that in not seeing them He may see him? By what merit? Pay attention and imitate. For he says in the same psalm: Because I acknowledge my iniquity. Therefore, you forgive. And my sin, he says, is always before me. He touched upon those who put the sins of others before themselves, and their own sins behind them, the sins of others which they reproach by condemning, their own sins which they defend by bearing.

Let your iniquity displease you.

Therefore, the Lord, because those who put their sins behind them and do not wish to see them, and dissemble to avoid acknowledging them, threatens the sinner, saying: "You did these things, and I was silent." What does "I was silent" mean? I did not avenge, I did not punish, I did not send you to hell. You did and you lived, and did again, because you mocked My leniency. You suspected iniquity, thinking I would be like you, that is, you thought I was like you, as if iniquity pleased Me as it does you. See then how much it benefits you if your iniquity displeases you. Hence you begin to be like God, lest you perversely desire God to be like you. Consider how you are perverted: God made you in His likeness, and you want to bring God to your likeness. Therefore, you did, and I was silent, this means I did not avenge. You suspected iniquity, thinking I would be like you. All the wicked, unjust, lost, blasphemous, and criminal say this: "Indeed, if the things we do displeased God, we would not live." What is: "if these things displeased God, we would not live"? Do you say this? Therefore, these things please God. You suspected iniquity: these things do not please God, God will not be like you. Rather correct yourself, and you will be like God. But you refuse, you put yourself behind yourself; you do not do what is written: "My sin is always before me," but you put yourself behind yourself. Listen to what follows: "I will reprove you and set you before your face." What you do not want, He says, I will do: I put you before you, I punish you from yourself. Therefore, do it, so that He does not; put yourself before you and say securely: "For I acknowledge my iniquity, and my sin is always against me; it is not before You, because it is before me; turn Your face away, from what I do not turn away; forgive what I acknowledge." Therefore, do not fear that you will die, confess so that you will not die. On the confession of praise.

Behold now the confession of praise: because in the confession of sin you displeased yourself, in the confession of praise you will please God. Let what you did in yourself displease you, let the one who made you please you. For sin is your work, you are God's work. God hates your work in His work. Therefore, turn to Him, confess to Him, and by accusing yourself and praising Him, then you will be righteous. For perverse men do the opposite: they praise themselves and accuse God. See and, if you recognize it in yourself, amend it, because, even if you are not now what I am going to say, you have been at some time. This is the habit of perverse men. Blasphemous, when they do something good, they want to praise themselves; when they do something bad, they want to accuse God. "Ungrateful," says the puffed-up and arrogant spirit, "ungrateful, I granted you this and that, and I conferred these and those things upon you." There, with cheeks almost bursting, it resounds: "I, I!" On the contrary, if a sin is discovered, if theft, if adultery, if anything of this kind, when you begin to be rebuked in the presence of the leader, you say: "My bad fate," or if you do not name fate: "If God did not want it, would I have done it?" Whether you accuse God directly, or indirectly through fate—for in fate you blame the stars: but the stars are God's works—in any way, you want to blame God, defend yourself. Correct it, and what you raised up, let it be down; what you made down, lift up. You sinned: accuse yourself. You did well: praise God.

"You will be corrected by confessing your sins and praising God." In your sin, speak the words of the Psalm: "I said: Lord, have mercy on me; heal my soul, for I have sinned against You." Here say: "I." Where you say: "I have sinned against You," there say: "I." Why do you remove yourself from there, where God will find no one but you? Pay attention and learn. "I," he says, "said: Lord, I have sinned against You. I said.” Remember that it was I who said, not fate, not fortune, not you, not even the devil himself, because had I not willed it, I would not have consented. For it is not good to accuse the devil and excuse oneself. For God has commanded forgiveness for those who confess. You did not do it: you are not forgiven because you did nothing. You ask for forgiveness: confess your guilt, so that you do not find punishment. The devil himself, however, wants you to be angry with him; when he is accused, he rejoices entirely, provided that he removes your confession. So when you sin, say: "I"; but when you do good, say what the Apostle says: "It is not I who live, but the grace of God with me." You will be corrected by confessing your sins and praising God: your bad works, His good works. And you will confess to the Lord because He is good; and to confess to Him is not, as in this transitory life, to be pitied temporarily, for His mercy is everlasting. Turned to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 3

SERMO 3 ON HAGAR AND ISHMAEL

[FRAGMENT] Heretics and schismatics pertain to Hagar and Ishmael. The Old Testament pertains properly to the Jews. For indeed, carnal benefits were promised because spiritual ones were not understood. That earthly kingdom and earthly life were completely cast down, given over to the subjugation of enemies. They hoped entirely carnally from the Lord, and for these reasons they served. Let Christians be questioned whether there are now any such people. Such people pertain to the Old Testament. For I am not asking about the name, but the life. From such people come also heresy and schism. She fled from the face of Sarah, and Sarah afflicted her. What is surprising? She afflicted her physically. If the part of Donatus has suffered any affliction, it is because of its own arrogance that Hagar, the servant, suffered from Sarah. Let Hagar hear the voice of the Angel: Return to your mistress. But just as then he who was born according to the flesh persecuted him who was born according to the spirit, so it is now. We do not find Isaac physically persecuted by Ishmael: but only because the Apostle called it persecution. Note there where he said: But just as then he who was born according to the flesh persecuted him who was born according to the spirit, so it is now. But what does the Scripture say? Cast out the servant and her son: for the son of the servant will not be an heir with the son of the free woman. Therefore, where the Scripture says that, we should inquire there. What does it say in Genesis? And it happened, when Ishmael and Isaac were playing, Sarah saw them playing. Who persecuted? Whom did he persecute? Sarah saw them playing and said: Cast out the servant and her son. Why? Because she saw them playing. But Paul calls that play persecution: because that play was mockery. If it is mockery, it is misleading and deception. Every play of children is an image of greater business: and when an older one plays with a younger one, as if to deceive, knowing he has other concerns in mind, he feigns certain things to the child, that is, the weak one, playing with him. Ishmael was older and strengthened in evil: but playing with the boy Isaac, he was misleading Isaac, and performing certain deceptions in playing with the weak one. The mother noticed that play as persecution. Thus understanding the mother Sarah said: Cast out the servant and her son: for the son of the servant will not be an heir with my son Isaac. And the Church says: "Cast out heresies and their children": for heretics will not be heirs with the Catholics. But why will they not be heirs? Are they not born from the seed of Abraham? And how do they have the baptism of the Church? They have baptism: the seed of Abraham would make an heir, if pride did not exclude from the inheritance. You are born by the same word, by the same sacrament; but you will not arrive at the same inheritance of eternal life, unless you have returned to the Catholic Church. You are born of the seed of Abraham, but outside, the son of the servant, because of pride.

Sermons - Sermon 30

SERMO 30 SERMON GIVEN IN THE BASILICA OF TRICILA ON SUNDAY, On the Verse of Psalm CXVIII and on the Words of the Apostle:

"For we know that the law is spiritual"

"I, however, am carnal" and the rest The law threatens in vain when injustice dominates.

Without a doubt, brothers, he sought to avoid a heavy burden and a grave yoke of iniquity, who said to God: "Direct my steps according to your word, and let no iniquity have dominion over me." Let us see then when iniquity has dominion over a man, so that we understand what we have heard praying and what we too have prayed by responding. For we all responded to the holy psalm, as I judge, with a devout and truthful heart, praying and saying to our Lord God: "Direct my steps according to your word, and let no iniquity have dominion over me." We have been redeemed from the dominion of this most wicked mistress by precious blood. And what was the benefit of having received a law that commands and threatens but does not help, so that we were guilty under it before the grace of God? The law threatens in vain when iniquity dominates. For the law is not corporeal, not carnal. But since God is spirit who gave the law, without a doubt the law is spiritual. But what does the Apostle say? "For we know that the law is spiritual, but I am carnal, sold under sin." Do not marvel, therefore, O one sold under sin, if that dominates you to whom you are sold. Hear the Apostle John: "Sin is iniquity." Against such a mistress, therefore, we invoke the Lord when we say: "Let no iniquity have dominion over me." The one who is sold cries out, let the redeemer hear him. Man himself sold himself through free will under dominant iniquity, and took as a price a small pleasure from the forbidden tree. Therefore, he cries out: Direct my paths, which I have distorted; direct my steps, which I have perverted by my own will. Direct according to your word. What does it mean: Direct according to your word? So that my steps are straight, because your word is upright. "I," he says, "am distorted under the weight of iniquity, but your word is the rule of truth. Therefore, correct me who am distorted as by a rule, that is, by the upright word. Therefore, direct my steps according to your word, and let no iniquity have dominion over me. I sold myself, redeem me. I sold myself by my own will, redeem me by your blood." In the seller, let pride be ashamed; in the redeemer, let grace be glorified. For God resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble. By willing evil, man lost the ability to do good. For the law is spiritual, but I am carnal, sold under sin. For I do not understand my own actions; for I do not do what I want. Carnal says: I do not do what I want. He does not accuse the law, but himself. For the spiritual law has no fault. The carnal man sold incurs blame. He does not do what he wants. When he wants, he cannot, because when he could, he did not want. By wanting evil, he lost the power to do good. And the captive now speaks, and the captive says: I do not do what I want. For I do not do what I want, the good, but the evil I hate is what I do. I do not do what I want. And the man contradicts: "You surely want to." I do not do what I want. "Indeed, you do what you want." I do not do what I want. Believe, my brother, I do not do what I want. "Oh, if you wanted, you would do it; because you do not want, you do not do good." I do not do what I want. Believe, my brother, I know what happens within me: I do not do what I want. Opponent of grace, you are not a judge of conscience. I know myself not doing what I want, and you say: "You do what you want"? No one knows what is done in a man, except the spirit of the man which is in him.

I see another law in my members. And you are a man. If you do not want to believe me, pay attention to yourself. Do you live in this corruptible body in such a way that it burdens the soul, so that the flesh does not desire against your spirit and the spirit against the flesh? Is this quarrel not in you? Is there no desire of the flesh in you that resists the law of the mind? If nothing in you resists another, see where the whole is. If your spirit does not disagree with the flesh that desires against it, be careful lest perhaps your mind entirely consents to the flesh, be careful lest perhaps the reason there is no war is because there is a perverse peace. Perhaps you consent entirely to the flesh, and there is no quarrel. What hope do you have that you might ever overcome, you who have not yet begun to fight? But if you delight in the law of God according to the inner man, yet you see another law in your members warring against the law of your mind—if you delight in this and are bound by this, free in mind but a slave in flesh—if it has come to this, sympathize more with the man who says, "For what I will to do, that I do not practice." For do you not want that desire which resists your mind to be completely absent in you? You are accustomed to grim desiring if you do not want to be free from such adversary. I admit to you: whatever rebels in me against my mind and argues with me with contrary delight, whatever is of this kind in me—I desire to completely kill it. And if, by the Lord's help, I do not consent to it, I do not wish to have something with which to argue. It is much more preferable to me to have no enemy than to conquer. For that which the flesh desires against the spirit is not of me, or am I composed of a contrary nature? Both that it is mine and that I do not consent to it is mine. The free part somewhat resists the remnants of slavery. I want the whole to be healthy because I am whole. I do not want my flesh to be separated from me forever as if it were foreign, but rather to be healed completely with me. If you do not want this, I do not know what you think of the flesh. I suppose you think it comes from no known source, as if from a contrary race. It is false, heretical, blasphemous: the mind and flesh have one creator. When he created man, he made both, and joined both. He subjected the flesh to the soul, and the soul to himself. If they both remained always subservient to their Lord, the other would always obey its mistress. Do not wonder, therefore, if that which abandoned its superior suffers punishment by the inferior. For the flesh desires against the spirit and the spirit against the flesh. "For these," he says, "are contrary to one another, so that you do not do the things that you desire." Hence, this one also said, "For the good that I will to do, I do not do." For the flesh desires against the spirit, and I do not want it to desire. I consider it a great burden if I do not consent but still wish that I were free from it. Therefore, "For the good that I will to do, I do not do." For I will that the flesh not desire against the spirit, and I cannot. This is what I said: "For the good that I will to do, I do not do."

He who created you when you were falling heals and lifts you.

Why do you accuse me? I say: I do not do what I want, and you say: "You do what you want." Why do you accuse me? Ingrate to the physician, why do you accuse the sick? Allow me to seek the physician. Redeem me from the accusations of men, and I will keep your commandments. I will keep them through your redemption, not by my own power. Therefore, I do not arrogate to myself the health which I do not yet have, because I seek the physician. But you, defender of nature—if only you were truly so, you would not apply false defense as if to a healthy nature, but would seek the physician for the not yet healthy—now indeed you, defender of nature or rather its attacker, while you praise the Creator as if for a healthy nature, exclude the Savior from the ailing one. The one who created heals, he lifts up by himself what falls by itself. That is faith, that is truth, this is the foundation of the Christian faith. One and one. One man through whom the fall, another man through whom the restoration. Through that one the fall, through this one the restoration. He who did not remain fell, he who did not fall lifts up. That one fell because he abandoned the one who remained, this one who remained descended to the fallen.

Let not sin reign in our mortal body.

If, therefore, the flesh desires against the spirit, so that in this very thing you do not do what you wish, because you wish that it does not desire and you cannot, at least hold on to the will in the grace of the Lord, and persevere in His assistance. Say to Him what you sing: Direct my steps according to Your word, and let no iniquity have dominion over me. What does it mean: Let no iniquity have dominion over me? Listen to the Apostle: Let not sin reign in your mortal body. What does it mean to reign? To obey its desires. He did not say: "Do not have evil desires." For how in this mortal flesh, where the flesh desires against the spirit and the spirit against the flesh, will I not have evil desires? Therefore do this: Let not sin reign in your mortal body so that you obey its desires. And if there are desires, do not obey them, so that iniquity does not dominate. Nor present your members as instruments of unrighteousness to sin. Let not your members become instruments of unrighteousness, and all iniquity will not dominate you. But even this, that your members do not become instruments of unrighteousness, can you achieve this by your own strength? This very thing, I say, this very thing that your members do not become instruments of unrighteousness, can you achieve this by your own strength? For when your members do not become instruments of unrighteousness, indeed there is iniquity in your members, in illicit desires, but it does not reign. How does one reign who has no arms? Your part, your flesh, the lust of your flesh, is feeble, rebelling against you. This feebleness is a tyrant. If you wish to be the victor over the tyrant, invoke Christ the emperor. For I know what you were about to say to me, or what you are now saying to yourself. Whoever you are here and are listening to me, I know what wickedness speaks to you inwardly. For you are still under the yoke of wickedness when you do not recognize the price of the Redeemer. I know what you say to yourself: "Behold, my flesh desires against my spirit. It desires adultery, but I do not consent, I do not agree, I do not decide. Not only do I not do it, but I do not even consent to do it. Not only do I not commit it physically, but I do not follow it in my mind where it rebels. Do I agree with the one who resists, do I yield to the one who struggles? I do not. Behold, no wickedness dominates me. Is it so? Is it true? Give thanks, if it is so, to Him who granted you to be so. Do not claim this for yourself, lest you lose what you received and begin to ask in vain. Do you not fear: God resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble?"

Christ, our healer, calls us to Himself.

Therefore, do you ensure that iniquity does not rule over you? If your presumption is true, our prayer where we said to God, "Let no sin rule over me," is in vain. Did you sing these words today, or not? Were you here when we all said: "Direct my steps according to your word, and let no sin rule over me?" You were here, you sang these words, I believe you will not deny it. Therefore, you sang in the congregation of God and you prayed to God, saying: "Direct my steps according to your word, and let no sin rule over me." If you could ensure this for yourself, why did you pray with me? I hold you praying, I hold you invoking, I convict you laboring. Therefore, let us together hear Him saying: "Come to me all you who labor." Let us hear and come. What does it mean: Let us come? By believing, let us progress; by giving thanks, let us approach; by persevering, let us reach. Let us come to Him who says: "Come to me all you who labor." And you labor, and I labor. Let us hear Him, let us come to Him. Why do we dispute among ourselves? Let us both listen, because we both labor. Why do we dispute among ourselves? Is it that we may not hear the calling doctor? O miserable sickness! The doctor calls to himself, and the patient is occupied with disputes. See what he says by calling: "Come to me all you who labor." Where do you labor, if not under the burdens of sins, if not under the yoke of the evil mistress iniquity? Therefore, come to me all you who labor and are burdened, and I will refresh you. I who made you, will refresh you. I, He says, will refresh you because without me you can do nothing.

God became man for your sake.

How shall I refresh you? Take my yoke upon you, and learn from me. What do we learn from you? We know you, Lord, in the beginning, the Word, the Word of God, the Word with God: we know that all things were made through you, what we see and what we do not see. What do we learn from you? For your disciples are not going to create another world, as the disciples of a craftsman and maker. You created one world, you made heaven and earth, you adorned both with their creatures and ornaments. What do we learn from you? Learn, he says, from me. When I was in the beginning God with God, I created you. I do not want you to learn this from me. But I became what I made, lest what I made should perish. How did I become what I made? He emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men, and being found in human form, he humbled himself. Learn this from me. For he humbled himself, he says. Learn from me, for I am gentle and humble in heart. For I do not, he says, teach you this, as if you had ever been in the form of God, not considering it robbery to be equal with God. It was proper to him alone, it was not robbery to him, whose nature it was. He was born equal to the Father from the Father. Yet what did he do for you? He emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men, and being found in human form. Behold, for your sake God was made man, and do you not want to recognize yourself as a man? Behold, for your sake he was made man without sin, and do you not want to recognize yourself with sin? That you may come to him who said: Come to me all you who labor and are burdened, and I will refresh you, take my yoke upon you.

Love the Lord's burden, for it is sweet. Did you bear this yoke? Did you bear it? Did you feel that you had a rider? Did you bear this yoke? You say: "I bore it." Do you feel that you have a rider? Do you feel that you have a guide? "I feel," you say. Then say to Him: Direct my steps according to your word. He leads you under His yoke and under His burden. So that His burden may be light for you and His yoke gentle, He inspired love in you. To the lover it is gentle; to the non-lover it is hard. To the lover it is gentle: the Lord gave gentleness. Or is it perhaps because you came hearing: Come to me, you intend to boast in this very thing, that you came? "Behold," you say, "I came to Him by my own decision, by my will. Since I came, He refreshes me. Since I came, He imposes His gentle yoke on me. Since He gives love, He imposes His light burden on me who loves and cherishes. He did all these things in me, but because I came to Him." Do you therefore think that because you came, you have bestowed this upon yourself? For what do you have that you did not receive? How did you come? By believing you came, but you have not yet arrived. We are still on the way. We have come, but we have not yet arrived. Serve the Lord with fear, and rejoice with trembling, lest the Lord becomes angry, and you perish from the righteous way. Fear lest, as you boast that the righteous way was found by you, in that very arrogance, you perish from the righteous way. "I," he says, "came, by my own decision I came, by my will I came." Why do you swell? Why do you puff up? Do you want to know that even this was bestowed upon you? Listen to Him who calls: No one comes to me unless the Father who sent me draws him. Turned to the Lord.

Sermons - Sermon 300

SERMO 300 On the Solemnity of the Martyrs Maccabees Some Christians existed before Christ. This day has been made solemn for us by the glory of the Maccabees: whose wondrous sufferings, when they were read aloud, we not only heard, but also saw and beheld. These things happened long ago, before the incarnation, before the passion of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. They existed in that first people, in which the Prophets existed, who foretold these present events. Nor should anyone think that before there was a Christian people, there was no people of God. On the contrary, so to speak, as the truth holds itself, not by the custom of names, but even then that people was Christian. For Christ did not begin to have a people after His passion: but His people were those descended from Abraham, to whom the Lord Himself, giving testimony, said: Abraham desired to see my day; he saw it and was glad. Therefore that people, born from Abraham, served in Egypt, and was liberated by the powerful hand of God's servant Moses from the house of bondage, led through the Red Sea as the waves descended, tested in the wilderness, subjected to the law, was placed in the kingdom. From there, as I said, the Prophets existed, and from there these martyrs flourished. Christ had not yet died, but it was the dying Christ who made them martyrs.

Maccabean martyrs, not by name, but in reality, Christians.

This, therefore, must be first commended to your charity, that when you admire those martyrs, you should not think that they were not Christians. They were Christians: but the name of Christians was later made known, though their deeds preceded the term. But indeed, as it was not necessary for them to confess Christ, they were not forced by the impious and persecuting king to deny Christ, which later martyrs, when compelled, achieved similar glory by refusing to do so. For the later persecutors of the Christian people compelled those whom they persecuted to deny the name of Christ: those who stood most steadfastly in the name of Christ suffered such things as when we read they endured. To these more recent martyrs, by whose thousands the earth was stained red, it was commanded and said by the persecutors, Deny Christ. Since they did not do this, they suffered such things as these endured. But to those it was said, Deny the law of Moses. They did not do it: they suffered for the law of Moses. These for the name of Christ, those for the law of Moses. The passion of the Maccabees is deservedly celebrated in the Church. The mystery of Christ was veiled in the Old Testament. The key to the Old Testament, the cross.

There exists some Jew, and says to us: How do you count our martyrs as yours? With what imprudence do you celebrate their memory? Read their confessions: see if they confessed Christ. To whom we respond: Truly, because you are one of those who did not believe in Christ, broken from the olive tree, with the wild olive tree succeeding, remaining dry outside; what are you, one of the unfaithful, going to say? They did not openly confess Christ, because the mystery of Christ was still veiled. For the old testament is a veiling of the new testament, and the new testament is a revelation of the old testament. Therefore, see from your faithless Jewish fathers, but brothers to you in evil, see what the apostle Paul says about such people. Until now, as long as Moses is read, a veil is placed over their hearts. The same veil remains in the reading of the old testament, which is not revealed, because it is removed in Christ. When you pass over to, he says, Christ, the veil will be taken away. The veil, he says, remains in the reading of the old testament, which is not revealed, because it is removed in Christ: not the reading of the old testament, but the veil placed there. The reading of the old testament is not removed, but fulfilled by him who said: I have not come to dissolve the law, but to fulfill. Therefore, the veil is removed, so that what was obscure might be understood. This certainly was closed, because the key of the cross had not yet approached. The prophecies fulfilled by the Passion of Christ and all things of the cross revealed in mystery.

Finally, behold the passion of the Lord, set before your eyes the One hanging on the wood, and like a lion, lying down when He wanted, and dying not by necessity, but by power, to kill death. Observe this very thing: see how He said on the cross: "I thirst." And when the Jews, unaware of what was being done through them, ignorant of what was being fulfilled by their hands, tied a sponge with vinegar to a reed and gave it to Him to drink; He, after receiving the vinegar, said: "It is finished." And bowing His head, He gave up His spirit. Who departs in such a manner as He did when He died? With what truth, with what power, did He who said: "I have the power to lay down my life, and I have the power to take it up again. No one takes it from me; but I lay it down of my own accord, and I take it up again." Recognizes the kingdom of the living, who has worthily thought about the power of the dying. This He also said through the prophet to the Jews themselves: "I slept." As if He were saying: Why do you boast about my death? Why do you glory in vain as if you had conquered me? "I slept." I slept because I wanted to; not because you raged. I fulfilled what I wanted: you remained in wickedness. Therefore, having taken and tasted the vinegar, He said: "It is finished." What is finished? What was written about me. What was written about Him? "They gave me gall for my food, and for my thirst, they gave me vinegar to drink." Therefore, surveying all that had been done in His passion; they had already shaken their heads before the cross, they had already given gall, they had already counted the bones of the one hanging and stretched out, they had already divided the garments, they had already cast lots over the seamless tunic: surveying and as it were counting up all the things which the prophets had foretold about His passion, there remained something, I do not know what, which was lacking: "And in my thirst, they gave me vinegar to drink." So that this small thing that remained might be added, He said: "I thirst." After receiving what was lacking, He responded: "It is finished." Having said this, He bowed His head and gave up His spirit. Then the foundations of the earth were shaken, then the rocks were split open, the secrets of the underworld were revealed, then the tombs returned the dead; and to say what we have spoken about, because it was already time for all that was veiled in the Old Testament to be revealed in the mystery of the cross, the veil of the temple was torn.

Other martyrs in the Gospel revealed Christ, the Maccabees confessed Him veiled in the law.

Thus Christ began to be preached very openly after the resurrection. What had been foretold by prophecy began to be manifestly fulfilled in him; the martyrs began to confess him very steadfastly. The martyrs confessed him openly, whom the Maccabees then confessed secretly: these died for Christ in the revealed Gospel; those died for the name of Christ in the veiled law. Christ has both, Christ aided both as they fought, Christ crowned both. Christ has both in his ministry, just as a most powerful one advancing with a company of attendants, some preceding, others following.

Therefore, consider him presiding in the vehicle of the flesh: and those who precede, they follow; and those who follow, they are devoted. For that you may know, and openly know that those dying for the law of Moses, died for Christ; hear Christ himself, O Jew, hear; and let your heart at last be opened, let the veil be lifted from your eyes. If you believed Moses, you would believe me. Hear this, accept this, if you can. If the veil has been taken from me, see. If you believed, he says: Moses, you would believe me: for he wrote about me. If Moses wrote about Christ; he who truly died for the law of Moses, laid down his life for Christ. He says, he wrote about me. The tongues of the confessing served him, the pen of those writing truly served him. How can you understand the pen of Moses, you who fastened vinegar on the pen? Would that you someday drink his wine, to whom you still serve vinegar by blaspheming. The celebration established for the Maccabees is deserved. A basilica in their memory was erected in Antioch. Let mothers learn to love their children from the mother of the Maccabees. The Maccabees, therefore, are martyrs of Christ. For this reason, it is neither incongruous nor inappropriate, but indeed most fitting, that their day and their festival are celebrated by Christians. What such thing do the Jews know to celebrate? It is proclaimed that there is a basilica of the holy Maccabees in Antioch: in that very city which is named after the king, the persecutor himself. For they endured King Antiochus, the impious persecutor, and the memory of their martyrdom is celebrated in Antioch; so that the name of the persecutor and the memory of the crowned may resound together. This basilica is held by Christians, built by Christians. Therefore, we have to celebrate their memory, we hold it: among us, the sufferings of the Maccabees have been imitated by thousands of holy martyrs around the world. Therefore, let no one doubt, my brethren, to imitate the Maccabees; lest when one imitates the Maccabees, he thinks he is not imitating Christians. Let the affection of imitation truly burn in our hearts. Let men learn to die for the truth. Let women learn from the great patience and ineffable virtue of that mother, who knew how to keep her sons. She knew how to have them, whom she was not afraid to lose. Each of these suffered individually in himself, she suffered by seeing all of them. Made a mother of seven martyrs, she was seven times a martyr: not separated from her sons by witnessing, and added to her sons by dying. She saw them all, she loved them all. She bore in her eyes what she bore in her flesh all of them; and not only was she not terrified, but she also exhorted them.

He encourages the remaining son to martyrdom.

Antiochus the persecutor counted her as the mother above all other mothers. "Persuade your son," he said, "so that he might not perish." And she replied, "Indeed, I will persuade my son for life by encouraging him towards death; you want to persuade him to death by sparing him." Yet what kind of conversation, how pious, how maternal, so suspended between spiritual and carnal! "Son, have mercy on me. Son," she said, "have mercy on me, who carried you in my womb for nine months, to whom I gave milk for three years, and brought you up to this age; have mercy on me." Everyone awaited her next words: "Agree with Antiochus, do not abandon your mother." But she said, "Agree with God, do not abandon your brothers. If you seem to abandon me, then you do not abandon me. There I will have you where I no longer fear losing you again. There Christ will keep you for me, where Antiochus cannot take you." He feared God, he heard his mother, he answered the king, he clung to his brothers, he drew his mother along.

Sermons - Sermon 301

SERMO 301 On the Solemnity of the Holy Maccabees The mother of the Maccabees in the suffering of her sons, how strong she was. A great spectacle is set before the eyes of our faith. With our ears we have heard, with our hearts we have seen a mother wishing to end her life before her sons: far contrary to human custom and desires. For all people wish for their children to precede them in departing from this life, not to follow: but she wished to die later. For she was not losing her sons, but sending them ahead: nor did she see what life they were ending, but what life they were beginning. For they ceased to live, where someday they would have died; and they began to live, destined to live without end. It is little to have been a spectator, we rather admired her as an encourager. More fruitful in virtues than in offspring: seeing those contending, in whom she herself contended in all; and in all who won, she herself was victorious. One woman, one mother, how did she set before our eyes one holy mother the Church, everywhere encouraging her sons to die for the name of Him, from whom she conceived and gave birth? Thus filled with the blood of martyrs, the world with the scattered seeds blossomed into the harvest of the Church. Whence to man is this, except because the salvation of the righteous is from the Lord, and He is their protector in time of tribulation?

God was present not only with the three boys but also with the Maccabees. Why are the three boys liberated from the fires, the Maccabees consumed?

We have seen and we know that the Lord was a protector in the time of tribulation of those three men, who walked unscathed among the fires, and praised the Lord without any harm. Where man was raging, the flame was sparing.

We have seen, we know how the salvation of those righteous ones was from the Lord, so that they might be thrown into the fire, and convert that harsh king, whom they had provoked by speaking, by living. For he believed in their God, and issued an edict, that whoever blasphemed the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego should perish, and his house be laid waste. How different the second command is from the first! What was the first command? Let him perish who does not worship the golden statue. What is the second? Let him perish who blasphemes the true God. The faithful men did not change, but they changed the unfaithful man. They did not allow him to persist in his unbelief, because they stood firm in their faith. Therefore, their salvation was clearly from the Lord. When they did not burn and praised, the Lord was present. When these men burned, they confessed, yet were dying, where was the Lord? Perhaps those were righteous, and these were sinners? For we have just heard these confess their sins, and say that all those things happened to them because the Lord was angry, but also by their father's merit, they suffered. What about the others? Read and you will see that they also confessed their own sins, and said they suffered justly. Equally righteous, equally confessors of sins; and therefore righteous, because they equally confessed their sins. Therefore they were beyond reproach, because they were not liars. For if we say, says John, that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. But if we confess our sins, he is faithful and just, to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness. Therefore confession of sins pertains to the righteous: defense of merits pertains to the proud. Equally then, the righteous confessing sins, equally giving glory to God, equally prepared to die for His laws.

Why are they freed from the flames, while these are consumed by the flames? Thus did God aid those and abandon these? By no means: rather, He was present to both; to those openly, to these secretly. He visibly delivered those: He invisibly crowned these. Those indeed were freed from death; but remained in the temptation of this life: freed from fire, reserved for future dangers; having defeated one tyrant, still to contend with the devil. My brothers, understand as Christians. The Maccabees were freed better and more safely. By those three men, the single temptation was overcome, the rest remaining: by these, this life ended, which is entirely temptation. Then by divine judgment, hidden no doubt, but yet just, Nebuchadnezzar deserved to be converted, Antiochus deserved to be hardened. The former found mercy, the latter magnified pride.

Against those who believe happiness exists in this life, and doubt about the other life. But to what extent and how far did he increase his pride? I saw the wicked exalted over the cedars of Lebanon. How far? For how long? I passed by, and behold, he was not: and I sought him, and his place was not found. Well: you sought, and did not find; because you passed by. Do you want to see the wicked is not? Do you want to seek him and not find his place? Pass by. What do I say, Pass by? Do not be alarmed: I did not say: Die. For you thought I said, Pass from this life: and therefore you were alarmed, because you did not pass by. What is it, you did not pass by? You did not pass by the erection of the heart, the allurements of temporal felicity; you did not pass by the enticements of the flesh, you did not pass by the suggestions of the world, tickling the heart and casting in the fear of human miseries. Therefore in this world you think there is happiness, in this world you do not think there is calamity. The happiness of the kingdom of heaven has not touched your heart, nor has the breeze of refreshment from there sprinkled upon your heats. When it is said to you, The happiness of the world is false; even if you do not dare to say so, I still see in your heart, perhaps you twist your mouth, mock, sneer, and say to yourself: Oh, if only I could be well here! What will happen afterwards I do not know. And it is not little that you even say: I do not know: perhaps you also say this: The time of our life is brief and full of labor, and there is no return at the end of man, and there is no one who has returned from the dead and been recognized. At least say, I do not know. Confession of ignorance is a step towards knowledge. Thus I address you, as if you say to me, I do not know what will happen after death: I am completely ignorant whether the just will be blessed and the sinners miserable; or whether neither will exist at all. However, even though you do not know this, you will not dare to say that sinners will be blessed and the just miserable after death. You cannot say, even if you suspect they will not equally exist, that the wicked will be in a better state, and the just in a worse state after death. Nor can your ignorance suggest this to you. Therefore, you can say: Whether it will be well for the just after death, and ill for the wicked after death, or whether neither will exist with sense, I do not know. Oh, if only I could be well here, while I live, while I feel! You see, you have not yet passed by. Those, I say, those earthly, dusty, smoky, vaporous, carnal, mortal thoughts, you have not yet passed by. Therefore it seems to you that the wicked is exalted above the cedars of Lebanon: therefore you seek his place, and find it, because you have not passed by. The wicked placed here in their own place for good uses.

You seek his place, and you find it; but here. He has his place in this world. For he would not be created by an all-knowing God in vain, nor nurtured in vain, nor would the sun rise over him in vain, and rain fall on him in vain, nor would God’s great patience spare him in vain, though he is wicked and lives wickedly. This is not in vain: he has his place here. And if we cannot find everything: but all things are known to God, who knows how to arrange everything. Behold, to be silent about others, what kind of place did this wretched Antiochus have here? Through him, the people of God were scourged and tested: through him, these holy youths were crowned. Therefore, he had his place here. He was evil; but the one who cannot be evil used him well. For just as evil men use good things badly, so the good Creator uses evil men well. He knows what to do with it, who created the entire human race. The goldsmith carries, the goldsmith weighs, the goldsmith balances. The painter knows where to place the black color, so that the picture is beautiful; and does God not know where to place the sinner, so that the creation is orderly?

If God did not preserve sinners through previous ages with His patience, from where would so many faithful be born today? Some evil ones are preserved, so that good ones may be born from them. The good are by the grace of God: for the whole mass of sin is condemned. What could be more wicked than the devil? And from his wickedness how much good has God made? The blood of the Redeemer would not have been shed for our salvation if not through the wickedness of the betrayer. Read the Gospel and see what is written there: The devil put it into the heart of Judas to betray Christ. The devil was evil, Judas was evil: as is the craftsman, so is the instrument. The devil used his vessel badly: the Lord used them both well. They attempted our ruin: God deigned to turn this to our salvation. The betrayal of Christ is both by Judas and by God.

Judas handed over Christ, and he is condemned. Judas handed over, and he is condemned; the Father handed over the Son, and He is glorified. I say, Judas handed over the master, and he is condemned; the Son handed over Himself, and He is praised. How Judas handed over Christ, we all know; perhaps you are waiting to hear how the Father handed over the Son. And this you know; but I will remind you, so that you may remember. Hear the Apostle speaking of God the Father: "He who did not spare His own Son, but handed Him over for us all." Hear also about the Son: "Who loved me, he says, and gave Himself up for me." Now see two betrayers: the Father as the betrayer of the Son, the Son as the betrayer of Himself, but both as saviors, because both are creators. So what did Judas do? What good did he do? Good came from him, but he himself did not do good. For Judas did not say: I will hand over Christ, so that the human race may be liberated. In Judas, avarice handed over; in God, mercy. Nothing was returned to Judas except what he did, not what God did through him. This desolate place is among the righteous, not in the other life.

Why have we said these things? Because in this impious world there is a place: the Lord truly knows who are His; and He knows what He does for them, concerning those who are not His. But if you pass, if you tread on earthly things, if you do not in vain answer that you have your heart above; by passing you will seek the place of the impious, and you will not find it. For in that future life, what place is there for the impious? Do we still need to be exercised by evils? Does gold still need to be purified through chaff? For the whole world is a goldsmith's furnace. There the just as gold: there the impious as chaff. There tribulation like fire: there God like a goldsmith. The pious praises God, the gold gleams: the impious blasphemes God, the chaff smokes. At one tribulation, as at one fire, he is purified, he is devastated: but God the goldsmith is praised in both.

Let the pious not be disturbed by the worldly happiness of the impious.

I shall speak, beloved, exhorting you and myself. Let us transcend carnal thoughts with the help of the Lord, let us lift our hearts on high, let us think of the future life: where your heart has been, you have passed over. Where is the impious man? He will not be there. Here he was necessary: there you will seek him, and you will not find his place. Therefore, when you see, brothers, who live by faith, whose hearts are upright, who hope for the future and the same true and eternal happiness; when you see men rejoicing and being glad in this false and deceiving happiness, if you are pious, grieve; if you are sane, weep. For thus, he whose feet were moved, reproached himself, because he had begun to accuse God, and he was already there; but he was almost there, he was slightly less than there. He did not deny knowledge to God: but, as if his feet were moved, he wavered. What does it mean to waver? To doubt. But when he reproached himself, that he did not have it corrected, what did he say? Why have my feet been moved? Because, he says, I was envious of sinners, seeing the peace of sinners. Because I saw the wicked rich, I was envious; and I said that I lost justice, and in vain I justified my heart, and washed my hands among the innocent. And as I doubt, thus I begin to understand. Thus I begin, he says, to understand: this is labor before me. Great labor, to solve this question. Truly it is labor. It is well with him, and he is evil; it is ill with him, and he is good: and above both, God is the judge. Therefore, the just judge gives good things to the evil, and evil things to the good. This is labor before me. But how long is it labor? Until I enter into the sanctuary of God, and I understand in the end. Therefore, if you understand in the end, there will be rest from seeking, labor of questioning will disappear.

Heavenly happiness is prepared for the pious. Worldly happiness for the pious is not an honor, but a burden.

Understand in the end times, where no wicked person will be happy, no good person unhappy. For what does he say? What do I have in heaven? Later, I understood what I have in heaven, when I entered the sanctuary of God and understood in the end times. For what do I have in heaven? Incorruption, eternity, immortality, no pain, no fear, no end to blessedness. So what do I have in heaven? What is kept for me in heaven? And what did I desire from you on earth? For what do I have in heaven? What? Should I say what? When will I explain what? Therefore, marveling at this, he said it without explaining: For what do I have? he said. Why don't you say what? How do I say what eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor has entered into the heart of man? Trample downward what; because it is nothing: hope upward for what; because it cannot be explained. And having this faith, do not be envious of sinners when you see them as if they are happy, falsely happy, truly unhappy. And you, rejoice in the Lord. And if you happen to have riches, honors, powers according to the times, do not think yourselves happy because of these. To know how to rejoice in the Lord, and to understand the end things, the happiness of the world is not an honor, but a burden. A happy man according to the age is endangered, lest by that very happiness he is corrupted, not in the body, but in the soul. For that happiness is false. Such men, even if they seem to be something in this age, do not rejoice; they delight in the commandments of the Lord. Then what God commands is preferred to the world, both flattering and threatening: all visible things are trampled upon, they are passed over; they are passed over by thinking, not by walking. I did not say, all visible things; for it is easy to pass over what you trample upon: but I said, all changeable things are passed over. For whatever is visible is changeable: but not everything changeable is visible; for the mind is also changeable, and yet invisible. Pass over everything that is seen; pass over also that which is not seen, and yet is changed: so that you may come to Him who is neither seen nor changed. When you come to Him, you will come to God.

Brief is the time of life. But now walk by faith, compose your morals. He is far on high: nourish your wings. Believe what you cannot yet see, so that you may deserve to see what you believe. Let us live as strangers, let us think that we are passing through; and we will sin less. Rather, let us give thanks to the Lord our God, because He willed that the last day of this life be both brief and uncertain. From early infancy to decrepit old age is a short span. What would it have profited someone who lived so long if Adam had died today? What is long where there is an end? No one recalls yesterday: today is urged on by tomorrow, so that it may pass. Let us live well in this short span, and let us go to that place where we shall not pass away. And now while we are speaking, we are indeed passing. Words run, they fly from the mouth: thus our deeds, thus our honors, thus our misery, thus our happiness. All things pass: but let us not be afraid; the Word of the Lord remains forever.

Sermons - Sermon 301A

SERMON 301/A

On the Solemnity of the Holy Maccabees [INHABITED IN THE ROYAL BULL] The Gospel, like a mirror, flatters no one. It is better that Christ speaks in the Gospel while absent than if he were present and silent. The Gospel and the living word of God, penetrating the marrow of the soul and searching the core of the heart, is beneficially offered to all of us and spares no one unless a man spares himself. Behold, it is set before us like a mirror, in which we all observe ourselves, and if perhaps something on our face appears blemished in our view, we should diligently cleanse it, lest we blush again when the mirror is inspected. For the crowd was following the Lord, as we heard when the Gospel was read, and He turned and spoke to those who were following Him. For if the things He said were spoken only to those twelve Apostles, each one of us could say: He spoke to them, not to us. It seems that one thing pertains to shepherds, another to flocks. He spoke to the crowds who followed: therefore He spoke to all of us and to all of you. We should not think that it was not said to us simply because we were not yet there; for we also believe in Him whom they saw; we hold Him by faith whom they beheld with their eyes. For indeed, it was no great thing to see Christ with the carnal eyes; if that had been great, the Jewish people would have been the first to find salvation. Certainly, they also saw Him, and yet they despised, and yet saw Him and despised Him and even killed Him; we indeed have not seen Him, and yet we believe, and yet we have received with our hearts the one whom we have not seen with our eyes. Hence He said to one of His own, who was then among the twelve: "Because you have seen, you have believed: blessed are those who do not see, and yet believe." For if our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ were present in the flesh now and stood silently, what good would it do us? But if benefit comes from His speaking, He speaks even now, when the Gospel is recited. Nevertheless, His presence affords many things, as God. But where is there not God, or when is God absent? Do not be absent from God, and God is with you; especially since He Himself promised, and we hold His promise as a kind of written guaranty: "Behold, I am with you until the end of the world." But He foresaw us, He promised for us.

All Christians are disciples of Christ. Christian simplicity. Great is he who has abandoned all, who has conquered all desires.

Let us return, therefore, and hear what he said, and as I have said, let us examine ourselves, and whatever we find lacking in us, let us cultivate with all diligence to the form of beauty that pleases his eyes. And, because we are not sufficient, let us invoke him for aid. Let him who formed us reform us, let him who created us recreate us, so that he who founded us may perfect us. He said this, therefore: Who is the man who wants to build a tower and does not first sit down to compute the cost, if he has the means to finish it? Lest perhaps, after he has begun building, and does not complete it, all who pass by will begin to mock him, saying: This man began to build and was not able to finish. Or what king, going to war against another king, does not first sit down and consult whether he is able, with ten thousand, to meet him who comes against him with twenty thousand?

Otherwise, while the other is still a great way off, he sends an embassy and asks for terms of peace. And to these two examples, he concluded thus: So likewise, whosoever does not forsake all that he has cannot be my disciple. If only those disciples were called, it would not have been said to us; for truly, as the Scripture testifies, all Christians are disciples of Christ - For one is your Master, even Christ - let him alone deny that he is a disciple of Christ, who denies Christ as his Master. For even though we speak to you from this higher place, we are not therefore your masters: he is the Master of all, whose throne is above all the heavens; under him, we gather in one school, both you and us, and we are fellow disciples; but we admonish you, as elders of the school are wont. The tower and the cost, faith and patience; the tower is faith, the cost is patience. If anyone is impatient to endure the evils of this world, he lacks the cost. The bad king with twenty thousand is the devil; the king with ten thousand is the Christian. The simple against the double, the truth against falsehood, because simplicity is against duplicity. Be of a simple heart: do not be a hypocrite, showing one thing and hiding another; and you will overcome the double one, who transforms himself as an angel of light. Whence those costs? Where is that perfect simplicity, fully stable, and persevering most unwaveringly? In that, which follows, which seems hard. This is what I said, that the word of God does not flatter anyone. So, he says, whosoever does not forsake all that he has cannot be my disciple. Many have done this, and have examined themselves before the time of persecution urged them, and have forsaken all the things of the world, and followed Christ. Hence there were the Apostles, who said: Behold, we have left all, and followed you. Nor did they leave anything valuable, for they were all poor; but they are judged to have left behind great riches, who have conquered all desires. Not all good things make people good.

Finally, the disciples then said this to the Lord, when that rich man departed sorrowful, having heard from the most truthful Master the counsel of eternal life, as he had asked. For indeed a certain rich young man came to the Lord, and said to Him: "Good Master, what good thing shall I do that I may have eternal life?" I believe that amidst the most abundant delicacies of his riches, he was pained by the sting of impending death and was wasting away; and because he knew that he could carry none of his possessions with him to the underworld, and amidst great abundance of flesh, his soul was grieving in poverty. He might have been saying to himself, surrounded by the affluence of his riches: "They are good, beautiful, delightful, sweet; but that one final hour when it comes, all must be left behind. None of these can be taken away from here. What remains is life and only conscience; what remains after the body is the life of the soul and only conscience. If it will not be life then, but rather another death, it must be called worse: for there is nothing worse than that death, where death does not die." Because he thought this amid his delights, having such great goods he came to the Lord. For he said to himself: "After these great goods, if I also have eternal life, what could be happier for me?" Therefore, being anxious, he asked, and said: "Good Master, what shall I do that I may have eternal life?" The Lord first responded to him: "Why do you ask me about what is good? No one is good except God alone." This means to say: "Nothing makes you blessed except God alone. The things that the rich possess are good indeed, but those good things do not make people good. For if those good things made people good, then someone would be better the more abundantly he had them. But when we see that many are worse the more they have, without a doubt other goods are to be sought, which make people good. For they are the ones which cannot be possessed by the wicked: justice, piety, temperance, religion, charity, worship of God, and finally God Himself. We ought to run to that good; that one, we will not attain unless these things are despised."

He who left the whole world behind, left nothing behind for himself. Many have done this, even senators and very distinguished women.

I should flatter you when the Gospel does not flatter you nor us? Therefore I exhort your charity, brethren, as the Apostle says: The time is short. It remains, he says, that those who have wives be as though they had none, and those who weep as though they wept not, and those who rejoice as though they rejoiced not, and those who buy as though they possessed not, and those who use this world as though they used it not. Therefore the Apostles then left those things which they had, and hence Peter said: Behold, we have left all. What did you leave, Peter? One small boat, and one net? He would reply to me: I left the whole world, who had nothing I left. The poverty of all, that is, the poor man of all has small resources, but great desires. God does not regard what one has, but what one wishes; the will is judged, which He who is not seen searches invisibly. Therefore they left all things, and truly left the whole world, since they cut off whatever they hoped for in this world, and followed Him by whom the world was made, they believed his promises; and many did this afterwards. And it is a wonder, my brethren, who did this? Those themselves did this, who killed the Lord. There in Jerusalem, when the Lord had ascended into heaven, and after ten days having sent the Holy Spirit, He fulfilled the promise, filled with the Holy Spirit, the disciples spoke in the tongues of all nations. Then many Jews who were in Jerusalem, hearing and being astonished at the gift of the grace of the Savior, while they marveled and stood in wonder among themselves as to whence it was, received the answer from the Apostles, that He performed this by His Spirit, whom they themselves killed, and they sought a plan of salvation. For they despaired, and did not think that such a crime could be pardoned them, who killed the Lord of the whole creation; and they received consolation from the Apostles. Promised pardon, promised impunity, they believed; and selling all they had, they placed the prices of their goods at the feet of the Apostles, the more terrified, the better they became. Greater fear extorted delight. Those who killed the Lord did this; many did this afterwards, and many do this. We recognize, we see examples, we are consoled by many, we are delighted by many, because the word of God does not fail in those who listen faithfully. But some did not, and were tested when persecution came, because they were using the world as though not using it. Not only the commoners, not just any workmen, not the poor, not the needy, not the mediocre, but many also great wealthy men, senators, even most noble women renounced all their possessions when the persecution came, so that they could complete the tower, and with the simplicity of strength and piety they might conquer the deceitful and double-faced devil. To be held is evil, not to hold. He denies Christ, who acts against the truth. He is his own worse enemy, who loses his heart.

Therefore, when exhorting all to martyrdom, the Lord Christ said: Thus, whoever does not renounce all that he has cannot be my disciple. I ask you, therefore, O Christian soul. If I tell you what was said to the rich man: Go, sell all you have, and you will have treasure in heaven, and come, follow Christ, perhaps you too will leave sorrowful? For the young man also left sorrowful: yet these words can only be heard by a Christian. Can you, when the Gospel was read, close your ears against your own salvation? You heard: Whoever does not renounce all that he has cannot be my disciple. Think to yourself: you have become a believer, you have been baptized, you have believed, but you did not relinquish your possessions. But I ask your faith: how did you believe? Behold, the peril of faith comes; it is said to you: If you persist, I will take what you have. I ask your mind. If you say in your mind: Let him take what I have, I do not let go of my faith; you both hold on and have renounced. Because you hold on, you are not held. For it is not evil to hold on: being held is evil. But persecution is absent, and there is no way to test what you promised the Lord. Daily affairs test men. What if sometimes someone calls you to false testimony, and he is powerful and might be feared for a time, and if he threatens, he can harm for a time, and he persuades you to give false testimony? He does not say to you: Deny Christ; for this you were prepared. That deceitful one sneaks in another way, to what you were not meditating, what you were not proposing to yourself. He says, give false testimony: If you do not say it, I will do this and that. He threatens proscription, he threatens death. There you must test yourself, there you must attend to yourself. Do you give false testimony? You left Christ, for he said: I am the truth. You gave false testimony, you acted against the truth: therefore, you left Christ. And what was he going to do to you by threatening proscription, making you poor? What would be lacking to you when God was with you? But he was threatening more. What is more? He was threatening to kill your body. But not your soul? Do you consider what he threatens: do you not consider what you do? He threatens to kill your body: But the lying mouth kills the soul. You are two, the enemy and you; yet both remain human, both being corruptible in the flesh, both immortal in soul, both passing for a time, and as guests and pilgrims on this earth. He threatens death, not knowing whether he will die before he fulfills what he threatens; but let us suppose that he indeed fulfills what he threatens; I scrutinize you both, let us see who is worse, him or you. He brings forth a sword to kill your body; you bring out a lying tongue to slay your soul. Who struck more grievously? Who killed worse? Who penetrated more deeply? He as far as the bones, he as far as the entrails; you as far as the heart. You left nothing intact when you lost your heart: the lying mouth slays, he said, not the body, but the soul.

God prepares not His promises, but Himself for us.

Such are the daily trials of men. When it comes to iniquity, whether you commit iniquity or suffer what God wishes you to suffer for a time, there, indeed, notice that double aspect, there, indeed, observe the cost of that tower. But while contemplating, you falter: call upon Him who commanded. He will assist His commands in you and will fulfill His promises in you. For what does God promise us? My brothers, what shall I say, so that we desire it? What shall I say? Is it gold? Is it silver? Is it estates? Is it honors? Is it what we know on earth? It is worthless. What eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor has it entered into the heart of man, what God has prepared for those who love Him. In brief, I say, not His promises, but Himself. He is greater than all who made all; more beautiful than all who formed all: more powerful than all who gave power to all. Therefore whatever we love on earth, in comparison to God, is nothing. It is trivial: It is nothing that we love; and we ourselves are nothing. The lover himself, in comparison to the thing which is to be loved, ought to see that he is despicable to himself. This is the love that is commanded from the whole heart, the whole soul, and the whole mind. But He added and said: You shall love your neighbor as yourself. On these two commandments hang all the Law and the Prophets; so that, when you have loved the Lord, you know that you love yourself if you love the Lord. But if you do not love God, you also do not love yourself. Therefore, when you have learned to love yourself by loving God, enrapture your neighbor to God, so that you may delight together in the good, and in such a great good, which is God. The battle of the Maccabees is set against the delights of the theaters. The bubble of the mime and the harlots are held, at Hippo they have almost perished. The bishop, the steward of the word and sacrament. Christians must not enter theaters.

We have just witnessed the great contest of the seven brothers and their mother. What a contest, my brothers, if our minds know how to behold it! Compare the pleasures and delights of the theaters to this holy spectacle. There, the eyes are defiled, here the hearts are cleansed; here, the spectator is praiseworthy if he is an imitator; but there, both the spectator and the imitator are infamous. Finally, I love the martyrs, I behold the martyrs: when the passions of the martyrs are read, I behold them. Tell me: Be like this, and you have praised. Look at a mime, look at a pantomime; I will tell you: Be like this, and do not be angry. However, if I tell you: Be like this, and you become angry, it is not my words but your anger that condemns you. By becoming angry, you judge yourself: behold what you love, what you fear to become. It seemed fitting to remind your Charity of the spectacle of the holy Maccabees, whose victories we celebrate today, and of the theatrical spectacles. O brothers of Bulla, almost in all the neighboring cities around you, the defilement of impiety has ceased. Are you not ashamed that only venal filth remains among you? Or does it please you to buy and sell filth among grain, wine, oil, animals, cattle, and whatever is sold in Roman markets? And perhaps strangers come here for such commerce, and it is said: What are you looking for? Mimes, prostitutes? You have them at Bulla. Do you consider it glory? I do not know if there is a greater disgrace. Indeed, my brothers, I say this out of pain, the proximity of other cities condemns you in the sight of men and in the judgment of God. Whoever wishes to imitate evil refers to you. To our Hippo, where such persons have almost disappeared, these foul individuals are brought from your city. But perhaps you say: We are like Carthage. Just as there are holy and religious people in Carthage, so there is such a crowd in the great city that everyone excuses themselves with others. Pagans do it, Jews do it, it can be said in Carthage; here, whoever does it, Christians do it. We say this to you with great sorrow: May the wound of our heart be healed by your correction! We say to your Charity: We know in the name of God your city and your neighbors, how great a multitude, how great a population there is; can you not all be known by him who is appointed your steward of word and sacrament? Who excuses themselves from this disgrace? Behold, there are games: let Christians not attend, and let us see if there will not be such solitude that the disgrace itself will be ashamed. Let us see if the foul persons themselves will not either convert to the Lord and be freed, or if they remain in their own filth, they will leave this city. Do this for yourself, Christians: do not enter the theaters.

Catechumens distinct from the faithful. But I see few of you. Behold, the day of Christ's passion will come, behold, Pascha will come, and these spaces will not contain your multitude. Therefore, will those who have now filled the theaters fill these places? Or will you prepare the places, and strike your chests? You might perhaps say: You abstain well from these things, who are clerics, who are bishops, but not us laypeople. Does this indeed seem to you a just voice? For what are we, more than you? One thing is what we are for ourselves; another thing is what we are for you. We are Christians for ourselves, clerics and bishops only for you. The Apostle was not speaking to clerics, not to bishops and presbyters, when he said: But you are the members of Christ. He was speaking to the laity, speaking to the faithful, speaking to Christians: But you are the members of Christ. Be attentive to which body you are members, be attentive under which head you live in the unity of one body; see the one Spirit which you have received from Him. I echo the words of the Apostle: Taking away the members of Christ, shall I make them members of a harlot? And do our Christians not only love but even educate harlots? They not only love those who were harlots, but educate those who were not; as if they too do not have souls, as if for them too the blood of Christ was not shed, as if it had not been said: Harlots and publicans precede you into the kingdom of heaven. When we ought to win them over, instead we choose to perish with them. And this is done by Christians; I do not wish to say: and by the faithful. Perhaps a catechumen despises himself. "I am a catechumen," he says. Are you a catechumen? A catechumen. One forehead of yours received the sign of Christ, and do you take another to the theater? Do you want to go? Change your forehead, and go. Therefore, the forehead which you cannot change, do not lose. The name of God is invoked over you, Christ is invoked over you, God is invoked over you, the sign of Christ's cross is depicted and fixed on your forehead. I exhort all, I address all; you will see how much more honorable you will be in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. An example to be imitated by the neighboring city of Cologne of Simittu. The praises of the listeners burden Augustine, they do not honor him.

I dare to say: Imitate your neighboring city, imitate the neighboring city of Simittu. I say nothing else to you. I speak more openly to you in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ; no one enters the theater there, no one of debauchery remains there. A magistrate wanted to conduct such debaucheries there; no principal, no commoner entered, no Jew entered. Are they not honorable themselves? Is that not a city? Is that colony not much more honorable by being emptier of these things? We would not be saying these things to you if we heard good things about you; but if we remain silent, I fear we will be judged equally. Therefore God willed, my brothers, that I would pass by here. My brother held me, commanded, requested, compelled me to speak a word to you. From where else could I speak, if not from where I fear more? From where else could I speak, if not from where I grieve more? Do you not know that I and all of us must give a very grave account to God of your praises? Do you think that these praises honor us? They burden, they do not honor. A very heavy account must be given from those praises; I greatly fear that Christ will say to us in his judgment: Wicked servants, you gladly received the praises of my people, and you kept silent about their death. However, the Lord our God will grant that from now on we hear good things about you, and in His mercy, we will be consoled by your correction: for as great as the sorrow is now, so much the greater will the joy be.

Sermons - Sermon 302

SERMO 302 On the Birth of Saint Lawrence Temporal benefits are bestowed by God through the prayers of the martyrs.

Today is the solemn day of the blessed martyr Lawrence. For this solemnity, appropriate holy readings have resounded. We have heard and sung, and have received the gospel reading with great attention. Therefore, let us follow in the footsteps of the martyrs by imitation, so that we do not celebrate their solemnities in vain. But who is ignorant of the merit of the mentioned martyr? Who has prayed there and not obtained? How many sick people have his merits even granted temporal benefits, which he himself despised. These are granted not so that the sickness of the supplicants remains, but that from the earthly granted, love may be made to desire better things. For sometimes a father grants small and trivial things to his little children, which they cry for if they do not receive. With benign and paternal indulgence, he bestows these, gives these, which he does not wish to remain in his children when they are grown, now progressing. Therefore, he gives nuts to the children, while preserving the inheritance. Paternal affection yields to those playing and amusing themselves with some trifles, lest the weakness of age fails. This is an indulgence of affection, not of edification. What the martyrs have built, what they could grasp, what they seized with a great heart, for which they shed their blood, you have heard in the Gospel: Your reward is great in heaven.

Two lives. The present life is so full of hardship, and yet greatly loved. Eternal life should be loved as much as this temporal one.

However, beloved, since there are two lives, one before death, the other after death; both of these lives have had and have their lovers. What is the need to describe how brief this life is? We have experienced how full of troubles, how full of complaints; surrounded by temptations, full of fears; burning with desires, subjected to accidents; suffering in adversities, swelling in prosperity; rejoicing in gains, tormented by losses. And in these very proceeds, it trembles with rejoicing, lest what it has acquired, it loses; lest on account of this it is sought, who was not sought before it was had. True unhappiness, mendacious happiness. The lowly desire to rise, the elevated fear to fall. He who does not have envies the one who has; he who has despises the one who does not have. And who can explain in words such great and so conspicuous foulness of this life? And yet this foulness has its lovers such that we wish to find very few, who love eternal life, which cannot be ended, as much as this life is loved, which both ends quickly, and if extended, is daily feared lest it be ended every single hour. What shall we do? What shall we undertake? What shall we say? What threats of warning, what fires of exhortation shall we apply to hard and sluggish hearts, and to those frozen by the ice of earthly stupor, that they may shake off the sluggishness of the world and burn for the eternal? What, I say, shall we do? What shall we say? It is at hand for me, and it presently comes to mind, because daily things admonish us and suggest what we should say. From the love of this temporal life, come, if it can be done, to love the eternal life, which the martyrs loved, who despised these temporal things. I ask, I beseech, I exhort, not only you, but with you also us, let us love the eternal life. I do not wish any longer, since it is greater, that we love it as the temporal is loved by its lovers, not as the temporal life was loved by the holy martyrs. For they either did not love it at all, or loved it minimally, and easily preferred the eternal to it. Therefore, I did not mean martyrs when I said: Let us love the eternal as the temporal is loved, but as the temporal is loved by its lovers, so let us love the eternal, the love for which the Christian professes.

We are Christians, not for temporal life, but for eternal life. What the cross of Christ on the forehead reminds us. For indeed, we became Christians not for this temporal life. For how many immature Christians are taken away, and sacrilegious men persist in this life up to decrepit old age? But again, among them many die immature. Many losses of Christians and gains of the impious: and again many losses of the impious and gains of Christians. And many honors of the impious and renunciations of Christians: and again many honors of Christians and renunciations of the impious. Since, therefore, these good and bad things are common to both, brothers, did we become Christians to avoid these bad things or to obtain these good things, did we give our name to Christ, and subject our foreheads to such a great sign? You are a Christian; you bear the cross of Christ on your forehead. Your character teaches what you profess. When he hung on the cross - which cross you bear on your forehead; it is not the sign of the wood that delights you, but the sign of the one hanging - therefore, when he was hanging on the cross, he looked upon those raging, endured those insulting, prayed for his enemies. Even as the doctor was being killed, he healed the sick with his own blood. For he said: Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing. Nor was that voice empty or in vain. And from them, later, thousands believed in him whom they had killed, to learn to suffer for him, who suffered for them and by them. Hence, therefore, it is understood, brothers, from this sign, from this character which the Christian takes on even when he becomes a catechumen, hence it is understood why we are Christians, because not for temporal and transient things, either good or bad, but to avoid evils that will not pass, and to obtain goods that will have no end.

Temporal life is greatly cherished, not so eternal life.

Nevertheless, as I began to say, brothers, what I had advised, what I had proposed, I beseech you, let us pay attention to how this temporal life is loved by its lovers. In how great a fear are men, lest they die, though they are destined to die! You see a man trembling, fleeing, seeking hiding places, pursuing defenses, begging, prostrating himself; if it can be done, he gives whatever he has for the gift of life, to live one more day, to extend always an uncertain age a little longer. Humans do so much: who does anything similar for eternal life? Let us address the lover of present life: What are you doing, what are you hastening, what are you trembling, what are you fleeing, what hiding places are you seeking? To live, he says. Surely to live? To live always destined to live? No. Therefore you are not striving to remove death, but to delay it. You who act so much that you may die a little later, do something so that you may never die.

Man gives what is necessary, so that he may live longer or miserably here; he does not give what is superfluous, so that he may reign forever with Christ.

How many do we find who say: Let the treasury take my possessions, so that I may die later; how rarely do we find someone who says: Let Christ take my possessions, so that I may never die. And yet, O lover of temporal life, if the treasury takes them, it strips you in this age; if Christ takes them, he keeps them for you in heaven. Because of this life, men wish to have the means to live, and for this reason, they wish to give up the means by which they live. What you keep for yourself to live on, you give so that you may live, perhaps about to perish from hunger. And yet, you say: Let it be taken, what is it to me? I want to beg. You give up the means by which you live, ready to beg so that you may live. You are prepared to beg in this world, even giving up necessities; and are you not prepared to reign with Christ, giving up superfluities? I ask, weigh it. If any scale of fairness is found in the chest of your heart, bring it out, and place these two things on it, and weigh: begging in this world, and reigning with Christ. There is nothing to weigh. For in comparison to that thing, this has no weight at all. If I were to say: reigning in this world, and reigning with Christ; there would be nothing to weigh. I regret having said: Weigh; there is absolutely nothing to weigh. What does it profit a man, if he gains the whole world, but suffers the loss of his soul? But whoever does not suffer the loss of his soul, he himself reigns with Christ. Who then reigns securely in this world? Assume someone reigns securely: does he reign eternally?

It is undeserved to love this life so much.

Notice what I was proposing, what kind of lovers the present life has, the temporal life, the brief life, the vile life, what kind of lovers it has. Often a man becomes naked, a beggar, because of this life. You ask him why? He responds thus: so that I might live. What did you love, and what do you love? Where did you arrive? What will you say, badly enamored, perversely enamored? What will you say to this one you have loved? Speak, address, flatter, if you can. What will you say? To this nakedness your beauty has led me. It cries to you: I am vile, and you love? It cries: I am harsh, and you embrace? It cries: I am fleeting, and you try to follow? Behold, your beloved answers you: I will not stay with you; and if I am with you for a while, I will not remain with you; I could make you naked, I could not make you blessed.

Eternal life is God; present life, a vapor.

Therefore, because we are Christians, with the Lord our God invoked for assistance against the enticements of poorly loved things, let us love the beauty of that life which neither eye has seen, nor ear heard, nor has it entered into the heart of man. For indeed, God has prepared this for those who love Him; and this life itself is God. You have exclaimed, sighed. Let us love this strongly. May the Lord grant that we love. Let us pour forth tears for this, not only to attain it, but even to love it. What are we to counsel, what are we to demonstrate? Shall we recite books, to show how uncertain these things are, how fleeting, how almost nothing, how true is what is written: "What is indeed your life? It is a vapor appearing for a little time, then will vanish away." It was alive yesterday, today it is not; a little while ago it was seen, now there is no one who sees it. A man is led to the grave: the mourners return, soon forgetting. It is said: "How nothing is man," and man himself says this; and man does not correct himself, so that man may not be nothing, but something. Therefore lovers of this were martyrs, and acquirers of this life are martyrs. They have what they loved, they will have it more abundantly in the resurrection of the dead. Therefore, they paved this way for us with their great sufferings.

Laurentius presents to the persecutor seeking the wealth of the Church what kind they are.

Saint Lawrence was an archdeacon. The wealth of the Church was sought from him by the persecutor, as it is told; hence he suffered so much that it horrifies to hear. Placed on a gridiron, he was burned on all his limbs, tortured by the cruelest pains of the flames; yet conquering all the pains of the body with great strength of charity, aided by Him who had made him so. For we are His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus for good works, which God prepared beforehand that we should walk in them. But in order to inflame the persecutor in anger, he did this not wanting him to be angry, but desiring to commend his faith to future generations, and to show how securely he died: "Let the vehicles go with me," he said, "in which I may bring the wealth of the church." The vehicles were sent, he loaded them with the poor, and ordered them to return, saying: "These are the wealth of the church." And it is true, brothers, that the needs of the poor are great wealth for Christians, if we understand where we ought to store what we have. The needy are before us; if we store there, we shall not lose. We do not fear that anyone may take it away: for He who gave it keeps it, nor can we find a better guardian, nor a more faithful promiser.

Martyrs to be imitated.

Therefore, considering this, let us energetically imitate the martyrs if we wish the solemnities we celebrate to benefit us. We have always reminded you of this, brothers, we have never ceased, we have never been silent. Eternal life must be loved, the present life must be despised. One must live well, one must hope for good. He who is bad must be changed; he who is changed must be instructed; he who is instructed must persevere. For he who perseveres to the end will be saved.

It is not permitted to rage against the wicked. But they say: Many evil people, many evils. And what do you want? Good things from the evil ones? Do not seek grapes among thorns: you are forbidden. From the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks. If you are able, if you are no longer evil yourself, pray that the evil one may become good. Why do you rage against the evil ones? Because they are evil, you say. You join them by raging against them. I give you advice: does the evil one displease you? Do not let there be two. You reprimand, and you are joined to them: you increase the number of those you condemn. Do you wish to conquer evil with evil? To overcome malice with malice? There will be two malices, both to be conquered. Do you not hear the advice of your Lord through the Apostle: Be not overcome by evil, but overcome evil with good? Perhaps he is worse: when you are also evil, there are still two evils. I would that even one were good. Finally, you rage up to death. What about after death, where the punishment no longer reaches that evil one, and only the malice of another evil is exercised? This is madness, not vengeance.

Each person ought to prohibit their subjects from harming the wicked.

What shall I say to you, my brothers, what shall I say to you? Such people should not please you. Shall I indeed think this about you, that such people please you? Far be it from us, that we should think this about you. But it is little that such people do not please you, it is little; there is something more that is required of you. Let no one say: And God knows that I did not do it, God knows that I did not do it, and God knows that I did not want it to be done. Behold, you have said two things: that you did not do it, and that you did not want it to be done. That is still little. It is indeed little if you did not want it, if you did not also prevent it. The wicked have their judges, they have their authorities, of whom the Apostle says: For he does not bear the sword in vain. For he is a revenger to execute wrath upon him that does evil. A revenger to execute wrath upon him that does evil. But if you do evil, he says, be afraid. For he does not bear the sword in vain. Do you not wish to be afraid of the power? Do good, and you will have praise from it.

He who does good, in what way does he deserve praise from authority.

What then, someone says, had Saint Lawrence done wrong that he should be killed by the authorities? How was it fulfilled in him: Do good, and you will have praise from it, when by doing good he deserved such torments from it? Saint Lawrence the martyr, if he did not have praise from it, he would not be honored today, he would not be proclaimed by us, he would not be praised with such great commendation. Therefore, he has praise from it, even if it does not wish so. For the Apostle does not say: Do good, and the authority itself will praise you. For all the Apostles and martyrs did good; and the authorities did not praise them, rather they killed them. Therefore, if he had said: Do good, and it will praise you, he would deceive you. But now he has tempered his words, considered, weighed, moderated, and trimmed them. Examine what you heard: Do good, and you will have praise from it. For if the authority is just, you will have praise from it, even with it praising you. But if it is unjust, having died for faith, for justice, for truth, you will have praise from it, even if it rages. Thus you will have praise from it, not by it praising you, but by it providing the occasion for your praise. Therefore, do good, and you will have, and you will be secure.

It is not permitted for anyone to kill the wicked. But that wicked man did so much, oppressed so many, led so many to begging and destitution. He has his judges, he has his authorities. The republic is ordered. For those which are, are ordered by God. Why do you rage? What power have you received, except because these are not public punishments, but open brigandage? Consider in the very ranks of the authorities, the one destined for punishment and condemned, on whom the sword hangs, may not be struck, except by him who serves for this purpose. The executioner interrogator serves: the condemned is struck by him. If the attendant strikes the condemned, already destined for punishment, does he not also kill the condemned? And he is condemned as a murderer. Surely the one he killed was already condemned, already destined for punishment; but to strike disorderly is murder. If it is murder to strike the condemned disorderly; tell me, what is it to want to strike the unheard, to want to strike the unjudged, to want to strike a bad man without any received power? For we do not defend the wicked, or say that the wicked are not evil. Those who judge will give an account of it. Why do you want to give a difficult account for another's death, you who do not bear the burden of authority? God has freed you, so that you are not a judge: why do you usurp another's role? Give an account of yourself. The judgment of the Lord upon merciless men.

O Lord, how you pierced the hearts of the raging ones; when you said: "He who is without sin among you, let him be the first to cast a stone at her." Struck to the heart by this serious and sharp word, they recognized their own consciences, and were ashamed before present justice; and one by one, they departed, leaving behind the wretched woman alone. But she was not alone in her guilt: for with her was the judge, who was not yet judging, but granting mercy. For as the raging ones departed, both the wretched woman and mercy remained. And the Lord said to her: "Has no one condemned you?" She replied: "No one, Lord." He said: "Neither do I condemn you; go and sin no more."

Soldiers, not by military service but by malice, are prevented from being good. What is commanded to tax collectors, what to everyone. But this soldier has done so much for me. I would like to know if you, being in the military, would not do similar things. Neither do we want such things to be done by soldiers to afflict the poor; we do not want this. We want them to hear the Gospel too. For it does not prohibit doing good from the military, but from malice. When soldiers came to John's baptism, they said: And what shall we do? John said to them: Do not extort anyone, do not accuse anyone falsely; be content with your wages. And truly, brothers, if soldiers were like this, the republic itself would be happy, but if not only the soldier was like this, but also the tax collector was like the one described there. For the publicans, that is, tax collectors, said to him: And what shall we do? The answer was: Do not collect more than what is prescribed for you. The soldier was corrected, the tax collector was corrected: let the provincial be corrected too. You have direct correction for all. What shall we all do? He who has two tunics, let him share with the one who has none; and he who has food, let him do likewise. We want soldiers to hear what Christ commanded: let us also hear. For Christ is not theirs alone, and not ours: nor is God theirs alone, and not ours. Let us all hear and live in peace harmoniously. A negotiator liable to fraud and perjury. The wicked do not act cruelly except against the wicked.

It weighed on me when I was a merchant. Did you conduct the business well yourself? Did you not commit fraud in that very business? Did you not swear falsely in that very business? Did you not say? By him who crossed me, the very sea, because I paid so much, which you did not pay. Brothers, I tell you more explicitly, and as much as the Lord grants, freely: The wicked do not rage against the wicked, unless they are wicked. There is another necessity of power. For a judge is often compelled to unsheath the sword and strike, though he would be unwilling. For as far as it concerns him, he wished to preserve the bloodless sentence: but he did not wish, perhaps, to let public discipline perish. It belonged to his profession, to his power, to his necessity. What does it pertain to you, except to pray to God: Deliver us from evil? Oh, who said: Deliver us from evil, may God deliver you from yourself. The pious bishop is compelled to deal with secular authorities. In summary, brothers, why do we hold back for so long? We are all Christians: we also bear a greater burden of danger. Often it is said about us: Why does he go to that authority? and what does the bishop seek with that authority? And yet you all know that your needs compel us to go where we do not want: to watch, to stand before the door, to await the worthy and the unworthy as they enter, to be announced, to be admitted only with difficulty, to endure humiliations, to ask, sometimes to obtain, sometimes to leave sorrowful. Who would want to suffer these things unless we were compelled? Let us be dismissed, let us not suffer those things, let no one compel us: behold, let it be granted to us, give us a break from this matter. We ask you, we beseech you, let no one compel us; we do not want to have dealings with the authorities; He knows, because we are compelled. And we hold those authorities as we ought to hold Christians, if we find Christians in that authority; and pagans, just as we ought to hold pagans; wishing well to all. But you say, let the authorities be advised to do good. Are we to advise them in your presence? Do you know if we have advised? You do not know whether we have done so or not. This I know, that you do not know, and you judge rashly. Nevertheless, my brothers, I beseech you, concerning the authorities it may be said to me: He should advise him and he would do good. And I reply: I advised him, but he did not listen to me; and I advised him where you did not hear. Who advises the people in part? Or could we advise one man in part, and say: Do this, or do that, where no other would be present. Who leads the people aside and advises them without anyone knowing? The wicked man dead, twice lamented. This necessity compels us to speak such things to you, lest we give a bad account to God about you; lest He would say to us: You should have warned, you should have given, I would demand it. Therefore, turn away from these bloody deeds, turn away entirely. Let it not concern you, when you see and hear such things, except to pity. But an evil man has died! He is doubly to be mourned, because he is doubly dead: both temporally and eternally. For if a good man had died, we would grieve with human affection, because he has left us, because we wanted him to live with us. Even worse are those who should be mourned, because they are received by eternal punishments after this life. Therefore, it is for you to grieve, my brothers, it is for you to grieve, not to rage.

Everyone ought to prevent civil disturbances to the best of their abilities. But it is not enough, as I said, it is not enough that you do not commit, it is not enough that you grieve, unless you also, to the best of your ability, prevent those things which do not pertain to the power of the people. I do not say, brothers, that any of you can go out and forbid the people: even we cannot do that; but each one in his own household, his son, his servant, his friend, his neighbor, his client, his subordinate, deal with them, so that they do not do these things. Persuade those whom you can; and apply severity to others, over whom you have authority. I know one thing, which all know with me, that in this city many houses are found in which there is not even one pagan; not a single house is found where there are no Christians. And if it is carefully examined, no house is found where there are not more Christians than pagans. It is true, you agree. You see then that evils would not happen if Christians were unwilling. There is no response to be made. Hidden evils can happen, public ones cannot, if Christians forbid and are unwilling; for each would control his servant, each would control his son: the harshness of a father, the harshness of an uncle, the harshness of a teacher, the harshness of a good neighbor, the harshness of the correction of a superior, and of the body itself would tame the youth. If these things were thus handled, evils would not greatly sadden us. The wrath of God from the sins of the people. My brothers, I fear the wrath of God: God does not fear the crowds. How quickly it is said: What the people did, they did: who is it that will punish the people? Indeed, who is it? Is it not God? For did God fear the whole world, when He made the flood? Did He fear the many cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, when He destroyed them with heavenly fire? I do not wish to now speak of the present evils, how great and where they have been done, and what followed I do not wish to recall, lest I seem to mock. Did God in His wrath separate those who did from those who did not? But He joined those who did with those who did not prevent.

Let the people not take upon themselves what pertains to the authorities, nor rage disorderly against the wicked.

Let us then explain the discourse at some point. My brethren, we urge you, we beseech you by the Lord and His gentleness, to live gently, to live peacefully; allow the authorities to do what pertains to them, for which they will render an account to God and their superiors, peacefully; whenever you need to ask for something, ask honorably and peacefully; do not mingle with those who do evil and violently and disorderly rage; do not desire to be involved in or watch such deeds; but as far as you can, each one in his own house and in his neighborhood, with whom he has some bond of necessity and charity, admonish, persuade, teach, correct; also restrain from such great evils by any threats: so that someday God may have mercy and put an end to human evils, and not deal with us according to our sins, nor repay us according to our iniquities, but as far as the East is from the West, so far remove our sins from us; and for the sake of the honor of His name, may He deliver us, and be merciful to our sins, lest perhaps the nations say: Where is their God?

After the treatise The laws of the emperors for fortifying the Church. This is the common refuge of all.

Brethren, for the sake of those who seek refuge in the stronghold of Mother Church, for the common refuge of all, do not be lazy and sluggish in attending to your mother and do not depart from the Church; for she is concerned that the undisciplined multitude may not dare anything. Furthermore, as far as those powers are concerned, since there are laws promulgated in the name of God by Christian Emperors which sufficiently and abundantly fortify the Church, and they themselves seem to not dare act against their mother, lest they be blamed among men and have judgment from God, may this be far from them; nor do we believe it of them, nor do we see it so. But lest the undisciplined multitude dare anything, you ought to frequent your mother, because, as I said, this is not a cause of merely one or two men but a common refuge. And whoever has no cause, let him fear lest he have one. I say to your Charity: Even the wicked flee to the Church from the face of those living justly, and the just flee from the face of the wicked, and sometimes the wicked flee from the face of the wicked. There are three types of those who flee. The good do not flee from the good, only the just do not flee from the just; but either the unjust flee from the just, or the just flee from the unjust, or the unjust from the unjust. But if we wish to discern and remove from the Church those who do evil, there will be no place for those who do good to hide; if we wish to permit that the guilty be removed from here, there will be no refuge for the innocent. Therefore it is better that even the guilty be fortified in the Church than the innocent be snatched away from the Church. Keep this in mind: so that, as I said, your presence, not cruelty, may be feared.

Sermons - Sermon 303

SERMO 303 On the Birthday of the Martyr Lawrence Laurence the archdeacon was ordered to bring forth the riches of the Church. The illustrious martyrdom of Blessed Lawrence is well-known, but it occurred in Rome, not here: for I see your small number is so great. Just as Rome cannot be hidden, so Lawrence's crown cannot be hidden. But why this city should still be obscure, I do not know. Therefore, few, listen to a few words: because we too, in this weariness of body and amidst the heat, cannot speak much.

He was a deacon, following the Apostles: he lived in the time after the Apostles. When the persecution, which you just heard foretold for Christians in the Gospel, was raging violently in Rome, as in other places, and as the properties of the Church were demanded from the archdeacon; it is said that he replied: "Let vehicles be sent with me, in which I may bring the riches of the Church."

Covetousness opened its jaws: but wisdom knew what it was doing. Immediately it was ordered: as many vehicles as he asked for, so many went. And he asked for many: and the more the vehicles were, the greater was the hope of the conceived plunder. He filled the vehicles with the poor and returned with them: and it was said to him, "What is this?" He replied: "These are the riches of the Church." The persecutor, mocked, demanded flames; but he was not cold so as to fear the flames: he burned nearly with rage, but more with love in his soul. What more can be said? A gridiron was brought, and he was roasted. And when he had burned on one side, it is said that he endured those torments with such tranquility that what we just heard in the Gospel was fulfilled in him: "In your patience, you will possess your souls." Finally, scorched by the flame, but tranquil in patience: "Now," he said, "it is cooked; turn me over and eat." Such was his martyrdom: he was crowned with this glory. His benefits in Rome are so clear that they cannot be counted at all. This is he of whom Christ said: "Whoever loses his life for my sake shall save it." He saved it by faith, saved it by contempt of the world, saved it by martyrdom. How great is his glory with God, when his praise is so great among men? The reward of the martyrs, prepared for those who follow Christ.

Let us follow His footsteps in faith, and let us follow Him also in contempt of the world. Not only are heavenly rewards promised to martyrs, but also to those following Christ with complete faith and perfect love. For among the martyrs, he is honored, as the truth itself promises, saying: No one leaves house, or field, or parents, or brothers, or wife, or children, and does not receive seven times as much in this time, and in the future age will have eternal life. What is more glorious for a man than to sell everything, and buy Christ, to offer to God the most acceptable gift, the incorrupt virtue of the mind, the whole praise of devotion; to accompany Christ, when He begins to come to receive vengeance from His enemies; to stand beside Him when He sits to judge; to become a co-heir of Christ, to be made equal with Angels, to rejoice in the possession of the heavenly kingdom with the Patriarchs, with the Apostles, with the Prophets? What persecution can overcome these thoughts, what torments can surpass them? A mind grounded in hard, strong, and stable religious meditations, and a spirit that stands immovable against all the terrors of the devil and the threats of the world, is strengthened by firm and solid faith of the future. Eyes are closed in persecutions; but heaven is open. Antichrist threatens; but Christ protects. Death is inflicted; but immortality follows. The world is taken away from the slain; but paradise is restored to them. Temporal life is extinguished; but eternal life is renewed. What great dignity and what great security to leave here joyfully, to leave gloriously amid pressures and distresses; to close in a moment the eyes with which men and the world were seen; to open them immediately, so that God may be seen, even in a happy departure! What great speed! Suddenly you are withdrawn from the earth, so that you are placed in the heavenly kingdoms. These things ought to be embraced by mind and thought, meditated on day and night. If persecution finds such a soldier of God, a virtue prompt to battle cannot be conquered. Or if the call comes beforehand; the reward for the faith that was prepared for martyrdom is returned without loss of time, with God as judge. In persecution, military service is crowned; in peace, constancy is crowned.

Sermons - Sermon 304

SERMO 304 On the Solemnity of Lawrence the Martyr The duty of deacons is to administer the blood of Christ. The mystery of the Lord's Supper, that we may lay down our lives for him whose blood we take. The Roman Church today commemorates the triumphal day of the blessed Lawrence, on which he trampled down the raging world, spurned its flattery, and in both ways conquered the persecuting devil. How glorious and adorned with so great a multitude of virtues, like a variety of flowers, is the crown of the martyr Lawrence, the whole of Rome bears witness. For in that Church, as you are accustomed to hear, he performed the office of deacon. There he ministered the sacred blood of Christ; there for the name of Christ he shed his own blood. He prudently approached the table of the Powerful One. To that table, of which the proverbs of Solomon spoke to us just now, where it is written: "If you sit down to eat at the table of the powerful, consider well what is set before you, and so extend your hand, knowing that similar things you must prepare for yourself." This mystery of the supper the blessed apostle John clearly explained, saying: "As Christ laid down his life for us, so we ought to lay down our lives for the brothers." Saint Lawrence understood this, brothers; he understood and he did it: and indeed, just as he received from that table, he prepared such things. He loved Christ in his life, he imitated Him in his death.

We all must follow Christ. And so, brothers, if we truly love, let us imitate. For we will not be able to render a better fruit of love than the example of imitation; for Christ suffered for us, leaving us an example that we should follow in His footsteps. In this sentence, the Apostle Peter seems to have seen that Christ suffered only for those who follow His footsteps, and that the passion of Christ benefits nothing except those who follow His footsteps. The holy martyrs followed Him, to the point of shedding their blood, to the point of the likeness of His passion: the martyrs followed, but not alone. For after they passed, the bridge was not cut; nor was the fountain itself dried up after they drank. For what is the hope of the faithful who lead the yoke of marriage chastely and harmoniously under the marital covenant, or who tame the enticements of the flesh under widowhood, or who, even more boldly raising the pinnacle of holiness and flowering in new virginity, follow the Lamb wherever He goes? What hope, I say, is there for them, and for all of us, if only those who shed their blood for Him follow Christ? Will the Mother Church then lose her children, whom she has conceived more fruitfully, and more securely, in times of peace? Should persecution be prayed for, should temptation be prayed for, so that she does not lose them? Far be it, brothers. For how can one pray for persecution, who cries out daily: “Lead us not into temptation?” The Lord's garden has, brothers, not only the roses of martyrs but also the lilies of virgins, and the ivy of married people, and the violets of widows. Indeed, beloved, let no type of human being despair of his calling: Christ suffered for all. Truly it is written of him: He who wants all men to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth. In which it is permitted to follow Christ, except in martyrdom. His humility must be followed. Vengeance, by Christ's example, must not be sought. Present things must be despised.

Let us understand, therefore, beyond the shedding of blood, beyond the danger of suffering, how a Christian ought to follow Christ. The Apostle says, speaking of the Lord Christ: "Who, being in the form of God, did not consider it robbery to be equal with God." What majesty! But He emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men, and being found in appearance as a man. What humility! Christ humbled Himself: you, Christian, have something to hold onto. Christ became obedient: why are you proud? How far did Christ become obedient? As far as the incarnation of the Word, as far as participation in human mortality, as far as the threefold temptation by the devil, as far as the mocking by the Jewish people, as far as the spitting and the bonds, as far as the slaps and the scourges; if that is little, even to death; and if some kind of death must still be added, even the death of the cross. We have such an example of humility, a remedy for pride.

Why then do you swell with pride, O man? O decaying flesh, why do you stretch yourself? O foul discharge, why do you inflate yourself? You pant, you grieve, you burn with anger because someone has wronged you. From this you demand vengeance, with a dry throat you seek retribution; nor do you cease from this intent until you have avenged yourself on the one who has hurt you? If you are a Christian, wait for your king: let Christ first avenge himself. For he has not yet been avenged, who suffered so greatly for you. And surely that majesty could either suffer nothing or be avenged immediately. But since there was such power in him, therefore there was also such patience: because it was for us that he suffered, leaving us an example so that we might follow in his footsteps. You do see, beloved, that besides the shedding of blood, besides chains and prisons, besides scourges and hooks, there are many ways in which we can follow Christ. Then, having passed through this humility and conquered death, Christ ascended into heaven: let us follow him. Let us hear the Apostle saying: "If you have been raised with Christ, seek the things that are above, where Christ is, seated at the right hand of God; set your minds on things that are above, not on things that are on earth." Whatever enjoyable things the world offers from temporal matters, let it be spurned; whatever harsh and terrible things it rages, let it be despised. And whoever acts in this way, let him not doubt that he clings to the footsteps of Christ, so that he may rightfully dare to say with the Apostle Paul: "Our conversation is in heaven."

True and unconquered virtue is charity. But then there can be invincible virtue in these, if there is no feigned charity. Therefore, he who spreads charity in our hearts gives us true virtue. For how would blessed Lawrence not fear the external fires placed upon him, unless the flame of charity burned within him? Therefore, my brothers, the glorious martyr did not fear the fierce flames of the torments on his body, because he burned with the most ardent desire for heavenly joys in his mind. Compared to the fervor with which his heart burned, the external flame of the persecutors was cold. For how would he bear so many stings of pains, unless he loved the joys of eternal rewards? Finally, why would he despise this life unless by loving a better life? And who can harm you, says the Apostle Peter; who, he says, can harm you if you will be lovers of good? Even if a persecutor does harm to you, do not fail in loving good. For if you truly love what is good with all your heart, you will endure all evil patiently and equanimously. For what harm did those torments inflicted by the persecutors do to blessed Lawrence, except that they made him clearer through the very punishments, and made this day most festive for us from his precious death?

Sermons - Sermon 305

SERMO 305 ON THE SOLEMNITY OF THE MARTYR LAURENCE [The Guide to the Table of St. Cyprian] A grain multiplied by death. Your faith recognizes the grain that fell into the earth and, having died, was multiplied. Your faith, I say, recognizes this grain, for it dwells in your mind. For no Christian doubts what Christ said about Himself. But indeed, with that grain having died and having been multiplied, many grains have been scattered on the earth: among which is the blessed Lawrence, whose sowing we celebrate today. From those grains scattered throughout the whole world, we see how great the harvest has sprung up, we rejoice, we exist: if, however, we also, through His grace, belong to the granary. For not everything that is in the harvest belongs to the granary. The same beneficial and nourishing rain feeds both the wheat and the chaff. Far be it that both are stored together in the granary; even though both are nurtured together in the field and both are threshed together on the threshing floor. Now is the time of choosing. Before the winnowing comes, let there be a separation of behaviors: just as on the threshing floor, the grain is still distinguished in cleansing, but is not yet finally separated by the winnowing fan. The soul here is not to be loved. Christ is troubled as death approaches because He transforms us into Himself.

Hear me, holy grains, who I do not doubt are here; for if I doubt, I will not be a grain myself: listen, I say, to me; rather listen to the first grain through me. Love not your souls in this world: do not love, if you do love; so that by not loving, you may save them: because by not loving, you love more. Whoever loves his soul in this world, will lose it. A grain speaks, a grain that fell to the earth and was mortified to be multiplied, it speaks: let it be heard, because it does not lie. What it admonished, it did itself: it instructed with a precept, preceded by example. Christ did not love his soul in this world; hence he came to lose it here, to lay it down for us, and to take it up when he wished. But because he was such a man, as to be also God: for Christ is Word, soul, and flesh, true God and true man; but a man without sin, who would take away the sin of the world: of greater power indeed, as to be able to say truthfully: I have power to lay down my soul, and I have power to take it up again: no one takes it from me; but I lay it down of myself, and take it up again. Therefore, since he had such power, why did he say: Now my soul is troubled? The human God with such power, why is he troubled, except because in him is the image of our weakness? I have power to lay down my soul, and I have power to take it up again. When you hear this from Christ, he is in himself; when you hear this, I say, from Christ, he is in himself: when his soul is troubled with death approaching, he is in you. For indeed his body would not be the Church, unless he were also in us.

Christ died by power, he rose again by power.

Therefore, attend to Christ: "I have the power to lay down my life, and I have the power to take it up again; no one takes it from me." I slept: for he says in the Psalm: "I slept." As if he were saying: Why do they rage? Why do they rejoice? Why are the Jews elated, as if they have done something? I slept. I, he says, I who have the power to lay down my life, by laying it down, I slept, and I took rest. And since he had the power to take it up again, he added: And I arose. But giving glory to the Father: Because, he says, the Lord has sustained me. These words where he says: Because the Lord has sustained me, do not enter into your minds as if his body was not raised up by Christ himself. The Father raised him, and he also raised himself. From where will we show that he also raised himself? Recall what he said to the Jews: "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up." Therefore, understand Christ as having been born from the virgin by power, not by condition, but by power: dead by power, dead in this way by power. He was using the unknowing evils for his good and converting the raging mad people for the use of his power for our blessedness, and in those by whom he was dying, he saw those who would live with him; and seeing them still mad in the insane populace, he said: "Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing." I, he says, I, the doctor, touch the vein, I look at the sick from the wood; I hang, and I touch; I die, and I vivify; I pour out blood, and from it, I make a healing medicine for my enemies. They rage and spill it; they will believe and drink. When death threatens, let us not be disheartened.

Therefore, Christ Himself, our Lord and Savior, head of the Church, born of the Father without a mother; He, I say, our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, as far as He Himself is concerned, laid down His life with authority, and took it up again with authority. Properly speaking, this authority does not pertain to: My soul is troubled. He transformed us into Himself; He saw us, He inspected us, He received and cherished us when we were weary; lest perhaps, when the last day should come for any of His members, on which this life would be ended, they might be troubled through weakness, and despair of salvation, and say they do not belong to Christ, since they were not so prepared for death that no perturbation would arise in them, no sadness would darken their most devout mind. Therefore, because His members would be endangered by despair, when, death approaching, someone would be troubled, unwilling to end this miserable life, hesitant to begin the never-ending one: lest they be broken by despair, He considered His weak ones, He collected His not very strong limbs to His bosom, He covered His not very strong ones like a hen covers her chicks; and as if He speaks to them: Now my soul is troubled. Recognize yourselves in me, so that when perhaps you are troubled, you do not despair, but recall your gaze to your head, and say to yourselves, When the Lord said: My soul is troubled, we were in Him, we were signified. We are troubled, but we do not perish. Why are you cast down, O my soul? And why do you trouble me? Do you not wish to end this miserable life? It is all the more miserable because it is loved in wretchedness, and you do not want it to end: it would be less wretched if it were not loved. What kind of blessed life is it, when such a miserable life is loved, only because it is called life? Why then are you cast down, O my soul? And why do you trouble me? You have something to do. Are you exhausted within yourself? Hope in the Lord. Are you troubled within yourself? Hope in the Lord, who chose you before the foundation of the world, who predestined you, who called you, who justified you as a sinner, who promised you eternal glorification, who endured an undeserved death for you, who shed His blood for you, who transformed you into Himself when He said: My soul is troubled. You belong to Him, and you fear? And is anything in the world going to harm you, for whom He died, through whom the world was made? You belong to Him, and you fear? If God is for us, who is against us? He who did not spare His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all; how will He not also freely give us all things with Him? Resist perturbations, lest you consent to the love of the world. It titillates, flatters, ensnares: do not believe it, hold fast to Christ.

Sermons - Sermon 305A

Sermon 305/A On the Birth of Saint Lawrence Held at Carthage in the Restored Basilica, on the third Ides of August Laurence's day in Rome is very solemn. Continuous solemnities would bring weariness.

Due to the audience’s fastidiousness, the discourse had to be withdrawn, but because of the martyr’s devotion, it had to be presented; thus, with the help of the Lord, it will be moderated so that it is neither burdensome nor unduly diminished, sufficient as much as is needed. A most solemn day has dawned in Rome, which is celebrated by a great multitude of people; although we are absent in body, we join our brothers in one body, under one head, present in spirit. For it is not only where his body’s tomb is located that his merit’s memory resides; devotion is due everywhere; the body is placed in one location, but the spirit triumphs with Him who is everywhere. Blessed Lawrence was young in body, as we have learned, a man of heavy spirit, whose younger age greatly commended him, and whose unfading crown was more distinguished. He was, moreover, a deacon, inferior in office to a bishop, yet equal in crown to an Apostle. This solemnity of all glorious martyrs has been established in the Church so that those who have not seen the sufferers may be led to imitation by faith, commemorated through solemnity. For what the annual order does not repeat might well fade from the hearts of men. And not all martyrs can have fervent solemnities everywhere, for they would not be absent daily; indeed, there cannot be found even one day in the course of the year in which martyrs were not crowned in various places. But if fervent solemnities were continuous, they would bring tedium; intervals, however, renew the affection. We should only listen to what is commanded, and attend to what is promised; in the celebration of any martyr, we should prepare our heart in such a way for his festivity that we are not separated from his imitation. The book of Cyprian to Fortunatus was read. The glory of the martyrs, the glory of Christ. For he was a man, and we are men; by whom he was made, by him also we; by what price he was bought, he also and we. Therefore a Christian man ought not to say: Why me? Rather, he ought not to say: Not I; but: Why not I too? You have heard blessed Cyprian, both example and trumpet of the martyrs: "In persecution," he says, "militia is crowned, in peace conscience is crowned." Therefore let no one think that the time is absent for him; the time of suffering is not always present, but the time of devotion always is. Nor should anyone consider himself weak, where God works strength; lest, while fearing for himself, he despairs of the very worker. For this reason, God willed that in the examples of the martyrs, all ages and both sexes should be present: old men were crowned, young men were crowned, youths were crowned, boys were crowned, men were crowned, women were crowned. And in women, all ages were crowned; nor did a woman say: I am unequal in sex to overcoming the devil. She looked more at the enemy to be cast down, by whom she was cast down, and to be fought by faith, to whom she had yielded by seduction. Did women also presume upon their own strength? For it was said to every human being: "For what do you have that you did not receive?" Therefore the glory of the martyrs is the glory of Christ preceding the martyrs, fulfilling the martyrs, crowning the martyrs. Nevertheless, although peace is at one time, persecution at another, is any time lacking in trials? Never is it lacking: that lion, the dragon, neither rages always nor always lies in wait, but always persecutes. When savagery is open, traps are not hidden; when traps are hidden, savagery is not open; that is, when as a lion he roars, he does not creep like a dragon; when he creeps like a dragon, he does not roar like a lion; yet, whether he is a lion or a dragon, he always persecutes. When the roaring stops, beware of traps; when traps are revealed, avoid the roaring lion. Both the lion and the dragon can be avoided, if the heart is always kept in Christ. Whatever is to be feared in this life will pass away; but in the other life, both what is to be loved does not pass away, and what is to be feared does not pass away. The Gospel reading from Matthew 23, 29-39.

Surely, just now in the Gospel, the Lord was addressing the Jews and said to them: Woe to you, scribes and Pharisees, because you build the tombs of the Prophets, and say: If we had been in the days of our fathers, we would not have participated with them in the killing of the Prophets. Certainly, you testify against yourselves, that you are the sons of those who killed the Prophets. And you will fill up the measure of your fathers. For when they said: If we had been in the days of our fathers, we would not have participated with them in the killing of the Prophets, they confirmed that they are the sons of those men. But we, if we follow the right path, do not call those our fathers who killed the prophets, but call those our fathers who were killed by their fathers. For as one degenerates by conduct, so he becomes a son by conduct. For indeed, brothers, we are called the sons of Abraham, although we have never known the face of Abraham, nor are we born of his lineage of flesh. How then are we his sons? Not by flesh, but by faith. For Abraham believed God, and it was counted to him as righteousness. Therefore, if Abraham was righteous because he believed, all who imitate the faith of Abraham after him are made the sons of Abraham. The Jews, born of the flesh, have degenerated; we, born of strangers, by imitating have attained what they lost by degenerating. May it never be then that Abraham is their father, although they descended from the flesh of Abraham. Their fathers were those whom they admitted themselves. They say: If we had been in the days of our fathers, we would not have participated with them in the killing of the Prophets. How can you say you would not have agreed with those whom you call your fathers? If they were your fathers, you are a son; if you are a son, you would have agreed with them. But if you would not have agreed, you are not a son; if you are not a son, they are not your fathers. Therefore, the Lord convinces them from this that they will do what those did because they called them their fathers. Surely, he said, you testify against yourselves, that you are the sons of those who killed the Prophets, because you called them your fathers. And you will fill up the measure of your fathers.

Dances recently prohibited by St. Cyprian. And now let us consider who are the children of the slain, and who are the children of the slayers. And you see many running to the memorials of the martyrs, blessing their chalices from the memorials of the martyrs, returning filled from the memorials of the martyrs; and yet examine them, and you will find them among the persecutors of the martyrs. For through them come tumults, seditions, dances, all luxuries, which God hates; and now, because they cannot stone those already crowned, they persecute them with chalices. Who were they, and whose children were they, whose dances were recently and almost in yesterday's memory prohibited from the place of the holy martyr Cyprian? Certainly they danced there, and rejoiced there; and they awaited that very festivity with great vows, as if they were rejoicing, and always desired to come to that day. Among whom are they to be numbered? Among the persecutors of the martyrs, or among the children of the martyrs? They appeared, when, having been prohibited, they swelled into sedition. The children praise, the persecutors dance; the children sing hymns, those extend feasts. Therefore, it does not matter how they seem to honor; for such they are, when they honor, as those were who said: If we had been in those times, we would not have consented to our fathers in the killing of the martyrs, or in the killing of the Prophets. Consent now to the faith of the martyrs, and we believe that you would not have consented to the killers of the martyrs. From what were the martyrs crowned? I believe, by walking in the way of God, by enduring, by even loving their enemies, by praying for them. This is the crown of the martyrs, this is the merit of the martyrs. Do you love, imitate, praise? You are a child of the martyr. Do you lead a contrary life? You will bring forth a contrary hand then.

Persecution is never lacking for Christians.

Therefore, most beloved, since persecution, as I said, is never absent, and the devil either lies in wait or rages, we must always be prepared, with a heart fixed in the Lord, and, as much as we can, in these troubles, tribulations, and temptations, pray for strength from the Lord, since by ourselves we are small and insignificant. What can we say about ourselves? You heard about the apostle Paul when he was read: “As the sufferings of Christ abound in us, so our consolation also abounds through Christ.” As it says in the Psalm: “According to the multitude of my sorrows in my heart, your consolations, Lord, delight my soul.” Just as it is said in the Psalm: “According to the multitude of my sorrows in my heart, so your consolations, Lord, delight my soul,” so it is said by the Apostle: “As the sufferings of Christ abound in us, so our consolation also abounds through Christ.” We would falter when the persecutor is present if the comforter were absent. And because the strength to endure or some relief from life’s burdens for necessary ministry did not come from themselves, see what he said: “I make known to you, brothers, the affliction that came upon us in Asia, that we were burdened exceedingly, beyond our strength.” That affliction surpassed human strength: did it also surpass divine help? He said, “We were burdened beyond measure, beyond our strength.” How much beyond strength? See that he speaks of the strength of the soul: “So that we despaired even of life.” How burdened was the Apostle by the multitude of oppressions that he, whom love urged to live, was wearied of life! How love impelled him to live, that love of which he says elsewhere: “But to remain in the flesh is necessary for your sakes.” Behold, such a great persecution had increased, and such a tribulation, that he despaired even of life. Behold, fear and trembling came upon him, and darkness covered him, as you heard when it was said in the Psalm. For it is the voice of the body of Christ, the voice of the members of Christ. Do you wish to recognize your own voice there? Be a member of Christ. “Fear,” he says, “and trembling fell upon me, and darkness covered me. And I said: Who will give me wings like a dove? And I will fly and be at rest.” Does it not seem that the Apostle said this when he said: “So that we despaired even of life”? He somehow suffered weariness from the snare of the flesh; he wished to fly to Christ; the abundance of tribulations beset his path but did not block it. He was weary of life, but not in that eternal life, of which he says: “For to me, to live is Christ, and to die is gain.” But since he was held here by love, what follows? “But if to live in the flesh means fruitful labor for me, then I do not know which I prefer. I am hard-pressed between the two: having a desire to depart and be with Christ.” Who will give me wings like a dove? “But to remain in the flesh is necessary for your sakes.” He yielded to his whispering fledglings; he covered them with outspread wings, he nursed the fledglings, as he himself said: “I became small in your midst, like a nurse caring for her children.” The condition of the hen when she nourishes the chicks. And see, brothers, it was just read in the Gospel: How often I wanted to gather your children, as a hen gathers her chicks, and you were not willing! Observe the hen, observe also other birds that nest before our eyes; they nurture the eggs, they feed the chicks: you will see none weaken with their offspring. Look at the appearance of the hen, when she feeds her chicks, how her voice changes, and breaks into a certain hoarseness. The feathers themselves are not gathered and lively, but disheveled and languid; so that, if you see another bird, whose nest you are unaware of, you cannot tell if she has eggs or chicks; but when you see a hen, even if you do not see her eggs or her chicks, from her voice and bodily appearance, you can understand she is a mother. What then did our mother Wisdom do? She was weakened in the flesh to gather the chicks, to beget, to nurture. But God's weakness is stronger than men; under these wings of the weakness of His flesh, yet under the hidden power of His divinity, He wanted to gather the children of Jerusalem. He had taught this to His Apostle, for He Himself was doing this in him; for the Apostle himself says: Do you want proof of the one speaking in me, Christ? And he says the sufferings of Christ were abundant in him: not his own sufferings, but the sufferings of Christ. For he was in the body of Christ, and was a member of Christ; and whatever was done in the Apostle, and in his member, by nurturing the chicks, was done by the head. Therefore this Apostle, considering the weakness of his chicks, desired to fly like a dove, but remained like a hen out of love for his children. We had within ourselves, he says, the answer of death, so that we would not trust in ourselves, but in God who raises the dead, who delivered us from such a great death, and delivers us; in whom we trust that He will yet deliver us again. He delivers and will deliver, what does he say? He preserves our life for you. For He delivered us from many deaths, so that he would not be overwhelmed by persecutors, so that he would not be crowned sooner than was necessary for the chicks, according to what he said: But to remain in the flesh is necessary for you. But this I am confident of, that I will remain, and will stay with all of you for your progress and joy in the faith. Desire dragged him toward something else, necessity kept him elsewhere. To depart, he says, and to be with Christ, is far better. He did not say: necessary, but better. For what is better is desirable for its own sake; what is necessary is taken on for need: hence it is called necessary. The works of necessity are like a ship to the homeland. The necessity of a necessary thing gives it its name; hence, the food we use now is necessary for us to sustain temporal life; but the best food is the food of virtue and wisdom, the living bread, always refreshing, never failing. That one is the best, this one is necessary. Therefore, when the necessity of hunger and sustaining the mortal body passes, this food will no longer be necessary. For what does the Apostle say? "Food is for the stomach, and the stomach for food; but God will destroy both it and them." And when will he destroy them? When this animal body, rising again, becomes spiritual; for there will be no want there, and no works of necessity will be there. For all these things, brothers, both the good works that are said to be done here, and even those very works which we are admonished to perform daily, are works of necessity. What is so good, what so splendid, what so praiseworthy for a Christian, as to break bread for the hungry, to bring the needy without shelter into the house, to see the naked and clothe them, to see the dead and bury them, to see one in quarrel and reconcile, to see the sick and visit or care for him? All these works are praiseworthy. Observe and see because necessity begets them. For you break bread because you see the hungry; if no one were hungry, for whom would you break bread? Remove the necessity of another's misery, and there will be no need for your mercy. But still, through these works, born of necessity, we attain to that life where there will be no necessity, just as through a ship to the homeland. In the homeland, always to remain, never to journey, a ship will not be needed; but that ship, which will not be needed there, indeed brings us there. When we arrive, these things will not exist; but if they are not fulfilled here, it is impossible to reach there. Therefore, be zealous in good works of necessity, so that you may be blessed in the enjoyment of that eternity where necessity will die away, for the mother of all necessities, death itself, will die. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. When it will be said to death: "Where is your victory, O death? Where is your sting, O death?" To the consumed and conquered death it will be said, for the last enemy to be destroyed is death.

Whatever is taken here as aid is in some way the beginning of death. We can say what will not be in heaven; who can say what will be there? But now all works of necessity are fought with death: for every deficiency draws towards death, and every sustenance calls back from death; and thus the body is mutable, so that in a way, some deaths drive out other deaths. Whatever is taken up, where it cannot endure for a long time, is in a way the beginning of death. Now look at this life: if whatever is taken up, where it cannot endure for a longer time, and if you remain there longer, you die, it is the beginning of death; and yet, unless it is taken up, another death is not driven out. For example, one does not eat: if he eats and digests, he is refreshed. When he does not eat, he takes up fasting, so that he may repel from himself the death that gluttony would cause; unless he takes up abstinence and fasting, he will not repel it from himself. Again, in this fasting which he took up to repel the death of gluttony, if he wishes to persevere in it, he will fear the other death of hunger. Therefore, just as he took up fasting to avoid the death of gluttony, so he will take up food to avoid the death of fasting. For whatever of these things you take up, if you persevere in it, you will fail. You were exhausted from walking: if you keep on walking, you will fail from the very exhaustion and die. Therefore, so that you do not fail from walking, you rest by sitting; endure in sitting, and from that, you will die. Heavy sleep had oppressed you; you must wake up to avoid dying. By watching, you will die, unless you sleep again. Give me what you take up as an aid, to drive away the evil that was pressing upon you, where you are so secure that you want to persevere in it; whatever you take up, it itself will be feared. Therefore, in every mobility and mutability of failures and aids, there is a fight with death. But when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, it shall be said to death: Where is your victory, O death? Where is your sting, O death? We will see, we will praise, we will endure. There will be no lack, no aid will be required. You will not find a beggar to break bread for, or an outsider to take into your house. You will not find someone thirsty to whom you may offer a cup; nor someone naked to clothe; nor someone sick to visit; nor someone disputing to reconcile; nor someone dead to bury. All are satisfied with the food of righteousness and the drink of wisdom, all are clothed with immortality, all live in their eternal homeland; the very health of all is eternity, eternal health, eternal harmony. No one disputes, no one seeks a judge, no one seeks an arbitration of composition, no one a sentence of vengeance; no sickness, no death. Not yet knowing what God is, we do not know what we will be either.

These things we could say, which will not be there; but what will be there, who can tell? What no eye has seen, nor ear heard, nor has it entered into the heart of man. Therefore rightly did the Apostle say: The sufferings of this present time are not worth comparing with the glory that is to be revealed in us. Whatever you may have suffered, O Christian, know that it is nothing compared to what you will receive. Surely we hold this by faith: let this not depart from your heart. It is not possible to conceive and see what you will be; therefore, what will it be, if it cannot be grasped by him who will grasp it? Surely we will be what we will be, and we cannot grasp what we will be. It surpasses all our frailty, it surpasses all our thought, it surpasses all our understanding: and yet we will be that. Beloved, says John, we are children of God; indeed already by adoption, faith, pledge. We have received the pledge, brothers, the Holy Spirit. Does He who gave such a pledge deceive? Children of God, he says, we are, and it has not yet appeared what we will be. We know, he says, that when he appears, we will be like him, because we will see him as he is. He said: It has not yet appeared, and he did not say what has not yet appeared. It has not yet appeared what we will be. He would say: We will be that, and such we will be. Whatever he would say, to whom would he say it? I do not dare to say: Who would say it? but surely: To whom would he say it? And indeed there was perhaps one who would say it, because it is he who leaned on the breast of Christ, and from his breast in that banquet drank wisdom; with this wisdom filled, he uttered: In the beginning was the Word. Therefore he said: We know that when it appears what we will be, we will be like him, because we will see him as he is. Like whom? Surely like him, whose children we are. Beloved, he says, we are children of God, and it has not yet appeared what we will be. We know that when it appears, we will be like him, whose children we are, because we will see him as he is. So now, if you wish to be like whom you will be, if you wish to know like whom you will be, behold him, if you can. You cannot yet. Therefore, you do not know like whom you will be; therefore, you do not know how much like him you will be. Therefore, not yet knowing what he is, you do not know what you will be either. The prayers of pastors and the faithful are necessary for one another.

Therefore, meditating on this, beloved, let us always await our eternal joy and always pray for strength in our labors and in temporal temptations, whether we for you, or you for us. For do not think, brothers, that our prayers are necessary for you, and your prayers are not necessary for us; prayers for one another are mutually necessary for us, because these prayers for one another are kindled by charity, and this sacrifice fragrantly and most sweetly ascends to the Lord as from an altar of piety. For if the Apostles said that prayers should be made for them, how much more so for us, who are far inferior but somehow desirous of following their footsteps, and neither able to know nor daring to speak how much we attain? Therefore, such men wanted to be prayed for by the Church, and they said: Because we are your glory, just as you are ours, in the day of our Lord Jesus Christ. They prayed for each other before the day of our Lord Jesus Christ, glory in the day, weakness before the day. Let us pray in weakness, so that we may rejoice in glory. And indeed, at different times, however, we will all arrive there at one time; the times of departure from here are different, but there is one time for receiving there. For once and all together we will be gathered, to receive that which we have believed and desired at different times; just as those workers in the vineyard, some were hired at the first hour, others at the third hour, others at the sixth, others at the ninth, and others at the tenth. They were called at different times, but the wage is paid to all at one time. Turned to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 306

SERMO 306 On the Birthday of the Martyrs of the White-Robed Company The glory of the martyrs is hidden to the foolish. Malice is a punishment. As we have heard and sung in response: "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints," but in His sight, not in the sight of the foolish. For in the eyes of the foolish they seem to die, and their departure is considered a misfortune. Misfortune in the Latin language does not typically have the same meaning as it does in the language in which Scripture is spoken. For in Latin, misfortune is usually said of what evil men suffer: however, in that language, misfortune is also called the evil that people endure. Misfortune in this context is understood as punishment. Thus he said: "In the eyes of the foolish they seem to die, and their departure is considered a punishment: but they are at peace. And even though in the sight of men they have suffered torments," this is misfortune: "their hope, he says, is full of immortality; and though they have been punished a little, they will be well blessed in many ways." For the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed in us. But until it is revealed, it is hidden. And because it is hidden, therefore they seem to the foolish to die. But is it hidden from God as well, for whom it is precious? Therefore, precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints. To this hidden mystery, then, we owe the eyes of faith, so that we may believe what we do not see, and bravely endure the evils unjustly suffered.

Punishment does not harm if the cause is good. Pure Mass.

Let us have a chosen cause, lest punishment harm us. For an evil cause has no reward, but just torment. It is not, therefore, in man's power by what outcome he may end this life: but it is in man's power how he may live, so that he may end life securely. Nor would this be in his power, unless the Lord had given the power to become children of God. But to whom? To those believing in his name. This is the primary cause of the Martyrs, this is the Bright Mass of the Martyrs. If the cause is bright, the Mass is bright. For Mass is said from the multitude of the number; Bright, from the splendor of the cause. So many companions feared no robbers. But even if they were to walk alone, they would be fortified against robbery; because the road itself was the fortification. They placed snares for me by the path, he says. Therefore, whoever does not turn from the path, does not fall into the snare. However, we have both the utmost and faithful promise of our Lord Jesus Christ, saying: I am the way, and the truth, and the life.

Everyone, although in different ways of life, equally desires a blessed life.

Every man, whatever kind he may be, wants to be blessed. There is no one who does not wish for this, and wishes for it in such a way that he wishes it above all else; indeed, whoever desires other things, desires them for this one thing.

Men are driven by various desires, and one desires this, another that: there are different ways of living in the human race; and among the multitude of ways of living, each chooses and pursues something different: yet there is no one, whatever life he chooses, who does not desire a happy life. Therefore, the happy life is a common possession of all: but the way to reach it, the path to follow, and the method to attain it, is the subject of controversy. And so, if we seek a happy life on earth, I do not know whether we can find it: not because what we seek is bad, but because we do not seek it in its proper place. One says: Blessed are those who serve as soldiers. Another denies this and says: Blessed are those who cultivate the field. And this another denies, and says: Blessed are those who involve themselves in public affairs, defend cases, and control the life and death of men by their speech. Another denies this and says: Blessed are those who judge, who have the power to hear and discern. Another denies this and says: Blessed are those who sail, learn about many countries, and gather many profits. You see, beloved, in all this multitude of ways of living, not one pleases everyone: yet the happy life pleases everyone. What is this, that while no one life pleases everyone, the happy life pleases everyone?

What a blessed life is. All want to live, and to be healthy.

Therefore, let us define, if we can, the happy life, about which everyone responds, "This I want." Because therefore there is no one who, when asked whether they want a happy life, says, "I do not want it," and we are searching for what that happy life itself is; we must define something to which every sense agrees, and which no one says, "I do not want." What then, my brothers, what is the happy life that everyone wants, and not everyone has? Therefore, let us seek. If it were said to someone, "Do you want to live?" does he not hear it as if it were said, "Do you want to serve in the military?" For in that question, which is, "Do you want to serve in the military?" some would say to me, "I want to," and perhaps more would say, "I do not want to." But if I say, "Do you want to live?" I think there is no one who would say, "I do not want to." For all by nature are ingrained with the desire to live and the aversion to die. Likewise, if I say, "Do you want to be healthy?" I think there is no one who would say, "I do not want to," for no one wants to suffer pain. Health is valuable even to the wealthy, certainly in the poor it is the only possession. But what advantage is the wealth of a rich man if there is no health, which is a patrimony for the poor? The rich man would indeed very much want to trade his silver bed for the poor man's sackcloth, if sickness could migrate with the bed. Behold, the sense of everyone has agreed with me on these two things, life and health. Has the sense of everyone agreed to military service? Has it agreed to farming? Has it agreed to navigation? The sense of everyone has agreed to life and health.

When, therefore, a man is alive and healthy, does he seek nothing more? If he is wise, perhaps he ought to seek nothing more. For where life is perfect and health is perfect, if more is sought, what will it be but a flawed desire?

Life in sorrows is not truly life. Life should not be considered, unless it is happy. The wicked will have life in torments. For the hour will come, as the Gospel says, when all who are in the graves will hear his voice: and those who have done good will come out to the resurrection of life; those who have done evil, to the resurrection of judgment. Thus, some to reward, some to torment; and both live, and none of them can die. Those who live in reward enjoy the sweetest life: but those who live in torment wish, if it were possible, to end such a life; and no one gives them destruction, so no one takes away torment. But observe Scripture speaking and distinguishing: it did not deem such a life worthy to be called life. In torments, in agony, in eternal fires, it did not wish to call it life: so that the very name of life might be one of praise, not sorrow; so that wherever you hear life, you do not think of torments. For to be always in torments is eternal death, not any kind of life. The Scriptures call this very thing the second death, after this first one, which we all owe to human condition. And the second death is called death, and no one there dies. More fittingly and rightly, I would say, no one there lives. For to live in pain is not to live. And how do we prove that Scripture spoke thus? Behold how; from this testimony that I just mentioned: For they will hear his voice, it says, and those who have done good will come out to the resurrection of life. It did not say: of blessed life, but, to the resurrection of life.

Only the name of life draws happiness. For if the name of life did not have consequent happiness, it would not be said to God: Because with you is the fountain of life. Nor was it said there, Because with you is the fountain of blessed life. It did not add "blessed"; it merely said "life," so that you may understand "blessed." Why? Because if it were miserable, it would no longer be life. The same is shown from another place in Scripture. Blessed life is not unless it is eternal.

Behold another testimony. Now we have said two. For it is said: Those who have done good, to the resurrection of life; likewise it is said: With you is the fountain of life. Nowhere is "blessed" added, but only life which is understood to be blessed; and which is not blessed, is not life. Receive another again from the Gospel. That rich man who did not want to let go of what he had, and was indignant at the loss of his possessions, which he was forced to let go of by dying: I believe with that very abundant supply of great, but still earthly things, though rejoicing, he was deterred by the fear of death, and as if his heart was saying to him, Behold, you rejoice in goods, and you do not know when a single fever will come. You collect, acquire, compare, and save, and rejoice: your soul is demanded back from you; these things you have prepared, whose will they be? With this thought, as much as is understood, as if often pricked by certain goads of fear, he approached the Lord, and said to him: Good Master, what shall I do to obtain eternal life? He was afraid to die, and was forced to die. There was no way for him to go, lest he perish. Constrained by the necessity of dying, and the longing to live, he approached the Lord and said: Good Master, what shall I do to obtain eternal life?

Among other things, he heard, so to speak, what pertains to the present matter: "If you wish to enter into life, keep the commandments." This is what I had said I would prove. Nor did the one who asked say, "What should I do to attain a blessed life?" but simply said "eternal life." Not wanting to die, he sought the life which has no end. And is it not, as I have said, even in the torments of the wicked, life has no end? But he did not call this life. He knew that a life in pain and torment is not life: rather, it should be called death. Therefore, he sought eternal life: so that where life is heard, blessedness is not doubted. And the Lord did not say to him, "If you wish to enter into a blessed life, keep the commandments," but He also only mentioned life and said, "If you wish to enter into life, keep the commandments." Therefore, that life in torment is not life; and that life alone is blessed: nor can it be blessed unless it is eternal. For this reason, the rich man, knowing he is daily interrupted by the fear of death, sought eternal life. For the blessed life, as it seemed to him, he already had. For he was rich and healthy, and I believe he said to himself: "I want nothing more, if it could be perpetual." For he had pleasures like those who are loved, because he sated foolish desires. Therefore, the Lord corrected him with one name of life, if he understood. He did not say, "If you wish to enter into eternal life," which the rich man sought, as though he already had obtained a blessed life: nor did He say, "If you wish to enter into a blessed life," knowing that if it is miserable, it is not even to be called life: but He said, "If you wish to enter into life; there it is eternal, there it is blessed; If you wish to enter into life, keep the commandments." Therefore life, which is eternal and blessed: because if it is not eternal, it is not blessed; if however it is eternal in punishments, it is not life.

True life is that which is eternal and blessed. For a blessed life, the certainty of eternity is necessary.

What is this, brothers? When I asked if you wished to live, you all responded that you did; when I asked if you wished to be healthy, you all responded that you did. But if health and life are feared to end, they are no longer life. For it is not always to live, but always to fear. If always to fear, always to torment. If eternal torment, where is eternal life? We certainly hold that life is not blessed unless it is eternal; indeed, it is not blessed unless it is life: because if it is not eternal, and if not with perpetual satisfaction, it is undoubtedly neither blessed nor life. We find this, all agree. We clearly find it in thought, not yet in possession. This is the possession that all seek: there is no one who does not seek it. Whether one is evil or good, he seeks it: but the good man seeks it confidently, the evil man shamelessly. Why do you seek good, evil one? Doesn't your own request show you how wicked you are, when you seek good while being evil? Don't you seek another's property? Therefore, if you seek the highest good, which is life; be good, so that you may reach the good. If you wish to come to life, keep the commandments. But when we have come to life, why should I add eternal? why add blessed? simply life, because it is life itself, which is both eternal and blessed: when we have come to life, it will be certain for us that we will always be in it. For if we are there, and if we are uncertain whether we will always be there; even there, there will be fear. And if there is fear, there will be torment, not of the flesh, but, what is worse, of the heart. But where there is torment, what happiness is there? Therefore, it will be certain for us that in that life we will always be, and we will not be able to end it: because we will be in the kingdom of which it is said: And his kingdom shall have no end. And the glory of the saints of God, whose death is precious in His sight, when Wisdom was showing, said, as you heard at the end of the reading: And their Lord shall reign forever. Therefore, we shall be in a great and everlasting kingdom; and for that reason great and everlasting, because it is just. From the happiness of the kingdom of God, far be false suspicions, which here are the origin of evils. No one deceives there, no one is deceived: there is no cause there to suspect your brother wrongly. For most of the evils of the human race arise from nothing else but false suspicions. You believe that a man who perhaps loves you, hates you; and through wicked suspicion, you become the most hostile enemy to one most friendly. What can he do, whom you do not believe, and cannot show you his heart? He speaks to you saying, I love you. But because he could say this to you even while lying (for these are the words of a liar, which are the same as a truth-teller's), not believing, you still hate. Therefore He wished to assure you against that sin, who said to you: Love your enemies. Christian, love even your enemies, lest by mistake you hate even your friends. Therefore, we cannot see our hearts in this life until the Lord comes, and illuminates the hidden things of darkness, and reveals the thoughts of the heart; and then praise shall be given to each one by God. For life to be blessed, there must be truth and the knowledge of friends without fear of deception.

Therefore, if someone told us now, in whom we would undoubtedly believe, if a Prophet said, if God said in whatever way He desired, and through whomever He desired: "Live securely, everything will abound for you, none of you will die, none will fall ill, none will suffer; I have abolished death from the human race, I do not want anyone to die," if He said this; we would rejoice as if made secure, and we would seek nothing further. It seems entirely this way to us. If we heard this, we would immediately want this added for us, that we might see each other's hearts, and not be envious; that we might see not with human suspicion, but with divine truth: that I might not be anxious about my friend, about my neighbor, whether he hated me or wished me harm, and by that very anxiety, I might do harm first before suffering it. We would undoubtedly seek this, we would seek certain life, and mutual knowledge of our hearts. For now, you understand what life I mean; so that by recommending it too often, I would not rather weary you than instruct you. Therefore, we would wish truth to be added to life, so that we might know our hearts mutually and not be deceived by our suspicions: so that we might be certain that we would not fall from that very eternal life. Add truth to life, and you will find a blessed life. For no one wants to be deceived, just as no one wants to die. Give me a man who wants to be deceived. Many are found who want to deceive: no one wants to be deceived. Compose yourself. You do not want to be deceived, do not deceive: what you do not wish to suffer, do not do. You want to come to a life where you are not deceived, now live a life where you do not deceive. You want to come to a life where you are not deceived? Who would not want this? The reward is delightful; do not disdain the task, whose reward it is. Now live a life where you do not deceive; and you will come to a life where you are not deceived. Truth will be the reward for the truthful, and eternity will be the reward for those who live well temporarily. The way to life and truth is Christ. The martyrs followed a hard path after Christ, and they have paved it for us.

Therefore we all desire this, brothers, life and truth. But by what way do we come, by what way do we go? For although we do not yet possess it, we already believe and see by thought and reason where we are going to arrive: we are aiming for life and truth. Christ himself is this. By what way do you seek to go? "I am," he says, "the way." Where are you seeking to go? "I am the truth and the life."

Behold what the martyrs loved, for this reason they despised the present and transient. Do not marvel at their strength; love conquered pain. Therefore, let us celebrate the solemnity of the White Mass with a white conscience; and following the footprints of the martyrs and looking at the head of the martyrs and ours, if we long to come to such a great good, let us not fear the difficult journey. He who promised is truthful, he who promised is faithful, he who promised cannot deceive. Let us therefore say to him with a white conscience: For the words of your lips I have kept hard ways. Why do you fear the hard ways of sufferings and tribulations? He passed through them himself. You may answer: But he himself. The Apostles passed through them. You still answer: But the Apostles. I accept. Answer: then many men afterward passed through them too. Be ashamed: even women passed through them. If you have come to suffering in old age, do not fear death, for you are near death. Are you young? Even young men have passed through them, who still hoped for life for themselves: and boys have passed through, and girls have passed through as well. How is the way still rough, which many have smoothed by walking? Therefore, this is our constant and solemn reminder to you, brothers, that we celebrate the solemnities of the martyrs, not with a vain solemnity; but let us not fear to imitate with similar faith those whom we love in their solemnities.

Sermons - Sermon 306A

SERMO 306/A On the eve of our Lord's birth, we ought to be absorbed in contemplation and jubilation. For what could be more marvelous than the divine logos becoming flesh, and dwelling among us in order to redeem humanity? This mystery surpasses all wonders of the world: the Creator of man, born as man; the Eternal, entering time; the Lord of Heaven, placed in a lowly manger. Rejoice, brothers, because it is most fitting that human mouths do their best to exult when angels are giving glory. Of the Birth of the White Mass

It is not the punishment, but the cause that makes a martyr. What it means to endure for the Lord. What life, what salvation is to be desired. Nevertheless, it is proper for us to be grateful even for temporal salvation.

We celebrate the solemn day of the blessed martyrs and of many others, that is, of Massae Candida. They are blessed because they are poor in spirit; blessed because they are meek; blessed because they mourn; blessed because they hunger and thirst for righteousness; blessed because they are merciful; blessed because they are pure in heart; blessed because they have suffered persecution, not vainly, not having an evil cause, but for righteousness' sake. For it is the cause, not the punishment, that makes a martyr of Christ. He endures the punishment securely who wisely chooses the cause, so that what he suffers is for righteousness' sake; lest he suffer here and be led from tribulations to more grievous tribulations. Their souls were patient with the Lord, they waited for the Lord; they did not hasten to receive the reward. For this is to wait for the Lord, that you may receive when He wishes to give. He will indeed give: for truth does not deceive, nor does the almighty lack what He has promised to give, nor does the eternal fear any successor. Therefore He will give: only let our soul wait for the Lord. Thus the soul of the martyrs waited—the one soul of many—not outwardly whitened, but inwardly pure. Therefore their souls waited for the Lord: and the Lord was their helper and protector. They hoped and endured in their sufferings: hoping for eternal things, they bore the transient. And when they come, what will they receive? They will be intoxicated with the abundance of your house, and you will give them drink from the river of your pleasures. Let no one here think of bodily pleasure: there is another invisible pleasure, from an invisible source. Indeed, attend to what follows. As if you were seeking from where this future pleasure would come, he added and said: For with you is the fountain of life. Behold the life that does not die, behold the health that does not fall ill. For the salvation of man is vain. Certainly, there is nothing in human affairs more precious than this salvation: and yet it is vain. How then should we regard other things here? What are the riches of man, what are the pleasures of man, what are the powers of man, if the salvation of man is vain? Therefore, brethren, let us desire that salvation, let us seek it with all our prayers, let us strive to come to it with our habits; let us seek it by believing, hoping, loving. If He gives this salvation, let us give thanks. For assuredly it pertained to this salvation that the ten lepers were healed; to this salvation pertained that the ten lepers were cleansed by the Lord Christ; and yet the grateful are praised, the ungrateful are blamed. Therefore, receiving even this salvation from Him, let us give thanks, and if need be for His sake, let us even despise what He has given, that we may come to greater things. May He be with you, may He dwell in your hearts, may He work in your thoughts, may whatever truth you hear flourish in your good morals.

Sermons - Sermon 306B

Sermon 306/B SERMON GIVEN ON THE TWELFTH DAY BEFORE THE CALENDS OF SEPTEMBER, ON THE BIRTHDAY OF THE MARTYR QUADRATUS Three kinds of people walking on the way. The Lord our God has granted, to whom we give thanks together, that we might see you and be seen by you. And if this is why our mouth is filled with joy and our tongue with exultation because we have seen each other in mortal flesh, what will our joy be like when we see each other where we fear nothing of each other? The Apostle says: Rejoicing in hope. Therefore, our joy, which is now in hope, is not yet in reality. But hope that is seen is not hope, he says: for what a man sees, why does he hope? But if we hope for what we do not see, we wait for it with patience. If, however, companions rejoicing together while journeying, what joy will they have in the homeland? On this road, the martyrs have struggled, and in struggling, they have walked, not stumbling in walking. For those who love walk; for we run to God not with steps, but with affections. Therefore, our road seeks walkers. There are three kinds of people it hates: those who remain, those who turn back, those who go astray. May our steps, with the Lord's help, be avenged and defended from these three evil kinds. Now, when we are walking, one walks more slowly, another more quickly; yet both walk. So those who remain must be stirred up, those who turn back must be recalled, those who go astray must be led to the path, the slow must be encouraged, the swift must be imitated. Whoever does not advance remains on the way; whoever deviates from a better purpose to what they previously abandoned for the worse, has turned back; whoever deserts the faith has gone astray from the way. We must have care with the slow, but from the swifter, while still walking together. The example of the Apostle must be followed. Nothing is in us except sin. Who is it that does not make progress? The one who thinks himself to be wise; the one who says: It suffices for me what I am; the one who does not pay attention to him who said: Forgetting what lies behind and straining forward to what lies ahead, I press on toward the goal for the prize of the upward call of God in Christ Jesus. He said he was running, he said he was following; he did not stay, he did not look back; far be it from him to have gone astray, who taught the very way, who both held it and showed it. To imitate his speed, he says: Be imitators of me, as I am of Christ. Therefore we believe, dearest brothers, that we are walking with you on the way. If we are slow, go ahead of us; we do not envy, we seek those to follow. But if you think we are proceeding quickly, run with us. There is one thing toward which we all hasten, both those who walk more slowly and those who walk more quickly. This is what the Apostle himself says: But one thing I do: Forgetting what lies behind and straining forward to what lies ahead, I press on toward the goal for the prize of the upward call of God in Christ Jesus. The order of the words is: But one thing I follow. But before saying this, what did he say? Brothers, I do not consider that I have made it my own. Behold, he who does not remain, he who does not consider that he has apprehended; behold, he who does not wish to wander, behold, he who does not linger on the way, behold, he who will rejoice in the homeland. He says: I. Who: I? The one who labored more than all of them. And yet, where he says: I labored more than all of them, he did not say: I do not consider that I have made it my own. It is well said “I” where there is a place for humility, not for pride. He says: As far as I am concerned, I do not consider that I have made it my own. This is himself. But where he says: I labored more than all of them, he follows with: Not I, but the grace of God that is with me. Could the grace of God not apprehend? Rightly there “I”; for not apprehending is of our weakness; apprehending is by the help of divine grace, not human weakness. Who then is it that shows us, who is it that teaches us, who is it that worthily insinuates to us, how it is true – which, however, is undoubtedly true – that our own there is nothing but sin? Let piety know this, let weakness accuse itself of this, let love desire to be healed of this. Not that I have already obtained this or am already perfect. And then he adds: Brothers, I do not consider that I have made it my own. And when he exhorted to run, and to stretch out for what lies ahead, he said: Let those of us who are mature think this way. Earlier he said: Not that I have already obtained this or am already perfect; and later he says: Let those of us who are mature think this way. You yourself had said that even such a great Apostle was imperfect; now you find many perfect ones, and you say: Let those of us who are mature think this way. Therefore, there is perfection and perfection. The perfection of the traveler, what it may be. The name Quadratus, a sign of future things. The glory of the martyrs, first in the Church.

He is a perfect traveler, who is not yet a perfect arriver. A perfect traveler approaches well, walks well, holds the way; but still a traveler, he has not yet apprehended. For certainly, if he walks, and walks on the way, he walks to some place, and tries to reach something. Therefore, what the Apostle was trying to reach, he had not yet apprehended. And he urges the perfect to know they are not yet perfect, to know their own imperfection. The perfection of the traveler is to know he has not yet arrived at what he aims for; for he knows how much he has crossed, how much remains for him. Therefore, let us know we are not perfect, as many of us are perfect, lest we remain imperfect. What shall we say, brothers? Is not martyr Quadratus perfect? What is more perfect than Quadratus? His sides are equal, his form is equitable in all respects; whichever way he turns, there is a stance, not a ruin. O beautiful name, representing form, and indicating a future reality! Quadratus was already called by this name before, and was not yet crowned; he had not yet appeared in temptation, through which he would become quadratus; and yet, when he was called, he was predestined before the foundation of the world, and, to be called by this name, this is what he endures in him, so that it may be fulfilled; and yet he walked, and was still on the way; and, as long as he was in this body, he was wholly feared, lest he should remain, or turn back, or go astray. But now he has run, finished the way, stood on solid ground; he has been built by the artificer of the Lord's ark, which was commanded to be built of squared timbers in figure. Now he fears no temptation: he has heard the caller, and he also has heard the one calling, followed the savior, carried the inhabitant. He despised the flattering world, conquered the frightening one, escaped the raging one. Great is, brothers, the glory of the martyrs, the first in the Church, whatever other followings there may be. It is not said for nothing to some: You have not yet resisted to the point of blood in your struggle against sin. When he tolerates, when he endures the raging world, who cannot despise the flattering one? The words of the Apostle should be taken as a mirror. Justice is worthy of being loved in the same way as impurity was loved. The Apostle also says: I speak in human terms because of the weakness of your flesh; just as you presented your members as slaves to impurity and to iniquity, so now present your members as slaves to righteousness for sanctification. It is a very great thing that he seems to exhort. Let each one measure himself in these words of the Apostle: do not flatter yourself with adulation; weigh yourself and speak the truth to yourself. What does he expect to hear from me? Let him tell himself. I prepared to set forth a mirror, in which each may look upon himself. I am not the brightness of the mirror that announces to the face looking at it. For I speak of those faces now, which we have within; those I can address through the ear, but I cannot see. Certainly, I set forth a mirror: let each one look upon himself and announce to himself. Receive the very words of the Apostle, which I have mentioned, in place of a mirror. I speak in human terms because of the weakness of your flesh: just as you presented your members as slaves to impurity and to iniquity, so now present your members as slaves to righteousness for sanctification. What is it: so? Just as that, so also this. When you presented your members as instruments of iniquity to sin for impurity, did it please you? I ask: pay attention, respond. Did it please you? I hear the respondent, even if silent; for you would not have done it unless it pleased you. Just as, therefore, you presented your members to serve impurity for iniquity, and you did this with delight, let righteousness also please you. I do not want you to do it out of fear, says God to you; did you do that out of fear? "So" he says, "so." Just as you presented your members as slaves to impurity for iniquity, so now present your members as slaves to righteousness for sanctification. You are compelled to righteousness by fear: you ran to impurity by love. What is more beautiful than righteousness, I ask you? It deserves to be loved, at least as impurity was loved. When you ran to impurity, you were forbidden, and you went; you offended your father, and you ran; you were ready to be disinherited, and not to separate from that depravity. What will you say? Righteousness requires from you what impurity had from you. You heard the Gospel: I came not to bring peace, but a sword. He said he would separate children from parents. Therefore, pay attention to that sword. Perhaps you wish to serve God, and your father forbids it? When you loved impurity, you ran even with your father forbidding it; now justice, your lover, forbids you; you have here also a father forbidding. Exercise your freedom, who then exercised your desire. You were prepared then to be disinherited, and not to separate from that impurity's depravity; be prepared now to be disinherited, and not to separate from the beauty of righteousness. It is great, but it is just. Who dares to say: But impurity ought to have been loved more than righteousness? Meanwhile, righteousness makes a step for you. Certainly, he says, I am different; certainly, there is a great distance between the darkness of that impurity and my light, between that depravity and my beauty, between that honor and my honor; certainly, there is a great distance. Meanwhile, I set a step. I wish so: for I owe more, I owe entirely more; as much as I differ, I owe that much. But I speak humanly, I defer the divine. Why do I defer the divine? I speak in human terms because of the weakness of your flesh. Therefore, so, because I still spare the weakness. Therefore, just as you presented your members as slaves to impurity for iniquity, so now, indeed, you owe more, but at least thus walk, reach this. But also pass beyond this. Meanwhile, I speak in human terms: but, just as that, so also this.

Quadratus loved her more worthily. The lover of pleasure fears to lose the body, the lover of invisible beauty does not fear. Did Quadratus do so? Not plainly so, but more, and more worthily. For observe those impurities, and see what more piety and charity, and the beauty of justice, and the sweetness of sanctification demand from you: see what more they demand from you. A lover of uncleanness does not wish his evil deeds to be known: he fears that he may be condemned because of it; he fears prison, he fears the judge, he fears the executioner. He desires another man's wife's chastity, deceives the husband; he seeks darkness, shuns a witness, fears the judge; he fears to be known, because he fears to be punished because of it.

Now indeed, that which the beauty of justice requires more from him, which the Apostle temporarily deferred, when he said: I speak in human terms because of the weakness of your flesh, hear this from the Lord: What I say to you in darkness, that is, in secret, speak in the light, and what you hear in the ear, preach on the rooftops. Does the adulterer proclaim his crime on the rooftop? But why does he not only not proclaim it on the rooftop, but seeks to be concealed by the roof? Why does he do this? Because love of uncleanness has thus far prevailed: he fears to be exposed, he fears to be punished. But those lovers of that invisible beauty, lovers of that charm, where that most beautiful of sight among the sons of men is; therefore lovers of that beauty, why do they not fear to preach on the rooftops what they heard in the ear? Ask why he fears: lest he be known and punished. Ask why this one does not fear: the Lord himself followed and added. When he said: What I tell you in darkness, speak in the light, and what you hear in the ear, preach on the rooftops. Do not fear, he says, those who kill the body, that you may speak what you hear in darkness in the light, that you may preach what you hear in the ear on the rooftops, do not fear those who kill the body.

Let the adulterer fear those who kill the body: for when that adulterer loses the body, he loses the workshop of pleasures. Let him fear to lose the body, who lives from the body; for all that he desires, he accomplishes through the body; therefore in him pleasure is not enough; he burns with desire, until he reaches the most unclean pleasure of the body. But you, man of God, if you have the eyes of the heart, with which to see the beauty of charity, with which to see the beauty of piety, if you have the eyes of the heart, see whence you enjoy your love, so that you may enjoy it, you do not seek the body's members. Let the lover of filthy pleasure fear the body's destruction, but peace on earth to men of good will.

Doing good must be done with delight. He cannot tolerate a persecutor, who shudders at an insulter.

How far you are from this love, O Christian! Would that you might reach that human level, and do good with delight, just as before you sinned with delight. For if you do good with delight, if you believe in Christ with delight, if you enjoy His wisdom according to your capacity with delight, if you listen to and do the commandment with delight, that human aspect because of your weakness has begun to be in you. Already you have started to have the good gift, but you have not yet fulfilled the Square. But, as I said, if you have reached it, proceed, there is still a way ahead, do not remain. There is still something to do; do not be afraid, and do not hide your good deeds out of fear. What do the critics, the agitators, say to you? "Great Apostle you are! Your feet hang from heaven: where do you come from?" And you are afraid to say: "From the Church," lest you be told: "Are you not ashamed, bearded man, to go where widows and little old women go?" For fear of hearing this, you are afraid to say: "I was in the Church." How would you bear a persecutor, when you shudder at an insulter? And indeed, it is a time of peace. They should have been ashamed: so many are ashamed who have joined, and so few who have remained are not ashamed. And these have joined: to what? But those have remained: where? These have joined in the light of peace; those have remained in the darkness of confusion. Are you not ashamed to be ashamed of what should be gloried? They are not ashamed of shameful things: and you are ashamed of things worth glorying? And what of that which you heard: "Draw near to Him and be enlightened, and your faces shall not be ashamed"? The free assertion of faith must be opposed to the treachery of the pagans.

These things I have said, my brothers, because I know, and grieve greatly, that the tongues of a few pagans, not violent but merely insulting, are feared, and that the minds of those willing to believe are held back, when they do not heed the exhortations of the Christians. And what more? Or what shall I say? You see some pagan being harassed so that he does not become a Christian, and you, a Christian, remain silent; you consider it a great thing that he spares you, that is, that he does not insult you. When he is deterred, you say in your heart: Thanks be to God? He said nothing to me. You flee, not in body, but in mind. You stand there, and you flee; you fear that the slanderous tongue may turn against you, and you do not help the one whom you should gain for Christ. You do not help, you remain silent; as I said, you flee not in body but in mind, you are a hireling, you see the wolf coming, and you flee. And what more shall I say? We all heard now. The Lord must make afraid: He who is to be loved, He Himself must be feared. He who, He says, will have been ashamed of me before men (and consider when He said these things: when the world did not believe but raged). He who will have been ashamed of me before men, I will be ashamed of him before my Father who is in heaven; but whoever will have confessed me before men, I will also confess him before my Father who is in heaven. Do you want to be denied by Christ, or do you want to be confessed by Christ? You will have the insulter far away, when you have made Christ your denier. What He has promised will come: He who has shown so much, will He be found deceitful concerning the day of judgment alone? Far be it. Let them keep their faithlessness, or rather let them themselves lack their faithlessness; but propose yourselves to them as examples to be imitated in confession, not to be surpassed in silence. For if they find Christians who are strong defenders of the weak by the assertion of faith, freedom of confession, wisdom of teaching, and love of instructing, they will be silent, believe; for indeed they have nothing to say. It is an empty voice, a resounding cymbal; what ceased in their temples, remains in their mouths.

Sermons - Sermon 306C

Sermon 306/C The Sermon of Saint Augustine, Bishop, at the Table of Cyprian ON SAINT QUADRATUS The bishop was Quadratus; his flock, the Bright Mass. The evangelical trumpet encouraging the martyrs to the contest, by which they would conquer the world, how it reproached we have heard: Whoever wants to save his soul will lose it; for whoever loses it for my sake will find it. By saving he will lose, by losing he will find. What is this, except that there is a certain salvation of the soul according to this age, and there is another salvation of the soul according to God? Therefore, at the point of temptation, by which the martyrs were tested, so that one or the other was proposed to them, either the denial of Christ, or the temptation of death, without a doubt those who wanted to save their souls according to the age denied Christ and lost them; but those who according to the age lost their souls confessed Christ and found them. For to whom is the soul more safely entrusted than to its Creator? Who can preserve what was, except he who could make what was not? Learning and teaching this was that Quadratus - for he was a bishop - whose solemnity we celebrate today, with his whole people, clerics and laity, confessed Christ. He sent ahead the flock he was feeding: Quadratus followed after four days. For the Massa Candida, whose solemnity was celebrated four days ago, was a people of God, entrusted to this governance. What a great marked wall this Quadratus was ruling over! And those so many souls, and from so many souls, not yet did they see the Church, which we see; not yet did they see, and from themselves they were building it, and by dying they were rushing as living stones into its structure. And behold we see the Church spread throughout the whole world, then great in few, now wide and spread in many; and we discern the fulfillment of the prophecies, which foretold all the things that we see. But, for this to happen, when there was fewness, there was great strength. By passing through the narrow way, they broadened it, and by trampling down harsh paths, they went before us. Those who endured various tribulations for the name of Christ in those times followed them. O blessed, losing their souls! O happy losses! Thus they cast, thus they lose, who sow. For who can doubt, in all sowing, that those things which are sown are cast and buried? But how great is the hope of the harvest, which precedes the sower! And when it is sown, no one sees the harvest; everything is entrusted to God, committed to the earth. The earth preserves, the earth makes fruitful, the earth multiplies; but with Him acting, by whom heaven and earth were made.

"By the name of Quadratus, what is signified." The name of this martyr reminds us to say something about the holy quadrature. Saint Noah was ordered to build the ark from squared timbers. What was chosen in quadrature, what was foreshadowed, except that no one can overthrow a standing square? For however you turn, it will stand. Shatter it by turning, labor to overthrow it; and in overthrowing it thus, you will find what you overthrew, just as it stood before it was overthrown. Everywhere a standing position is appointed for it. Losses were proposed, the possessions of those confessing Christ were taken away: the square stood. Exiles were proposed, and the loss of the earthly homeland; thinking of the spiritual homeland, the square stood. Torments and savage tortures were inflicted: considering the great pains of hell, the square stood. Immense worldly rewards were promised, so that Christ would be denied: thinking of the heavenly crown, the square stood. That the righteous falls seven times, is not to be taken concerning sin, but concerning tribulation.

Such a one ought a Christian to be: but, in order to be such, Christ must be invoked. He himself should make straight, he himself should guide, he himself should not permit the falling one to fall. For it is not said in vain: The righteous falls seven times, and rises again. We ought not refer what is said to the fall of some grave sin. For he falls gravely, who was innocent and becomes a murderer; he falls, who was chaste and becomes an adulterer. It is not concerning such falls that it is said: The righteous falls seven times, and rises again; but this is said of the falls of tribulations. For to fall is indeed to be humbled. However much the righteous may be humbled, he rises again. He is squared, who turns and stands. And what he says: Seven times, he puts for the entirety, indicating by a perfect number, however many times he might fall. Seven times, however many times; as it is, seven times a day I will praise thee. His praise is always in my mouth. And so that you may know this sense in these words, The righteous falls seven times and rises again, let us see the context, what the Holy Scripture said above, and what it added after these words: there the evident sense will appear. What therefore does the Scripture say, where this sentence is placed? Do not apply the wicked to the pastures of the righteous, nor be seduced by the fullness of the belly. And it continues: For the righteous falls seven times and rises again; but the wicked shall be weakened in evils. From the subsequent words after this sentence, this sense begins to shine forth: The righteous falls seven times and rises again, but the wicked shall be weakened in evils. Therefore, the one who falls seven times and rises again, is not weakened in evils; and this is itself to fall and to rise again, to be humbled and not be weakened. The soul of the unjust is nourished by the word of God equally as that of the just; but in one way this one, in another way that one.

What, then, is it that was said above: Do not bring the impious to the pastures of the righteous, nor be deceived by the fullness of your belly? As the Lord grants me, I will say what I can; let him who knocks harder find better. Behold, beloved, we proclaim to you the word of God; all of you hear, all of you delight, all of you rejoice: not all of you do. These are the pastures where the soul of the righteous is fed; but the soul of the impious is also fed there. The righteous and the impious hear together; they hear together, together they say at the end of the sermon: We are filled. But you distinguish him who is fed more healthily from him who is also fed and has the fullness of the belly but does not have the firmness of mind. Therefore distinguish, and do not bring the impious to the pastures of the righteous, that is, do not compare him who is feeding righteously. Do not bring, that is, do not compare. For one is fed one way, the other another. Do not think both are alike: do not bring the righteous to him. But you hear and see him holding the Scriptures: do not be deceived by the fullness of the belly. Do not bring the impious to the pastures of the righteous, for he also feeds and rejoices in them; nor be deceived by the fullness of the belly, because he holds everything. How someone is fed, let temptation inquire, let temptation prove. Behold, I show the pastures of the righteous: he will fall seven times and rise again. Behold, I show the pastures of the impious: but the impious weakens in evil things. The righteous is fed: like a square stone, whichever way you turn it, it will stand. The impious is fed: like a round stone, it will stand nowhere.

How many false charges are brought against martyrs. A snare is also set for us, sometimes with desire, sometimes with fear.

Therefore we ought to be such: but God is to be invoked, that we may be able to be such. I will hope in Him, for He will deliver me from the snare of the hunters, and from the harsh word. The snare of the hunters is the ambush of the persecutors; the harsh word is bitter reproach. How many such things did those hear, who, losing their souls, found them! What snares were set in temptations! And one soul said on behalf of all: My eyes are ever toward the Lord, for He shall pluck my feet out of the snare. I will hope in Him, for He will deliver me from the snare of the hunters. How many crimes did they hear! and they knew them to be false. Does not pain burn when a false accusation is heard? But there was true patience in them, for a clear conscience shone brightly. And whence was this to them, unless because He delivers them from the snare of the hunters and from the harsh word, who had said to them: Blessed are you when men shall say all manner of evil against you? This is the harsh word. They did not say: Why should I suffer this reproach? Why am I a Christian, to always hear these false accusations? They did not say, since they stood firm as squares; and they were freed, looking to Him who said: Blessed are you, for your reward is great in heaven. Were those temptations only then, and could they alone strive? The evils of the world abound, let us also strive. The snare of covetousness is set, that you may betray someone. Be square: despise what is promised, scorn what is offered, regard what is deferred. What is deferred is more certain than what is offered. What is offered either forsakes you while living or is forsaken by you dying; what is deferred, when it comes, never ends. It will not forsake you, nor be forsaken by you. You will be there, you will not depart. For blessed, he says, are they who dwell in Your house; they will praise You forever and ever. They will praise You, for they will love You. And how will they love, when they see You, if they thus loved, when not seeing they believed in You? The snare of fear is set, that when you are afraid, you may commit some evil, and do to yourself what the one terrorizing could not do. For the one who terrorized could kill your body; by doing evil you kill your own soul. These have never been absent in human affairs: the struggles of temptations have never been lacking. Let our eyes be ever toward the Lord.

We do not know what would be beneficial for us here. In this world, my brothers, we do not know what is advantageous for us. Many have benefited from wealth, who have used it well; although it was not the wealth itself that benefited them, but the spirit of the one using it; who, even if he did not have wealth, would hold to divine judgment, peace on earth to people of good will. Yet, how many have been harmed by wealth, who can count them? How many have been destroyed by wealth, when they are computed? They are seen daily, and those who see them are not corrected. Wealth has therefore benefited some individuals, let us grant that: yet it has harmed many more. Secular powers have benefited some, let us accept that: yet how many have they harmed! Nevertheless, we should not be blind. Can it be said that the kingdom of heaven has harmed anyone? Can it be said that living forever with Christ has harmed anyone? But these goods are not here, because they are not from here: they are not of the world. Therefore, do not love the world, nor the things in the world. Whoever loves the world, the love of the Father is not in him: because all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not from the Father, but is from the world. And the world passes away, and its lust; but whoever does the will of God remains forever.

It is not a great thing to be heard by God, unless it is in that which is beneficial for us. The angel of Satan to Paul was a very severe headache.

Behold the structure of the saints, behold the building of the square stones. Therefore, those things which we do not know whether they benefit us or harm us, let us leave to God, who sometimes does not hear favorably and hears in anger, and again hears favorably and does not hear in anger. To Him, I say, let us commit such things, who sometimes does not hear favorably and hears in anger, and again hears favorably and does not hear in anger. Therefore, when we ask through ignorance for what is not expedient for us, may He be favorable and not hear us. Therefore, the one who has been heard and whose desire has been fulfilled should not boast. The desire of the Israelites who spurned manna and craved meat was fulfilled. And read what is written: While the food was still in their mouths. What should I say about men? The devil was heard when it was believed he should tempt the servant of God. The demons were heard so that they could go into the pigs. What great thing is it, therefore, to be heard? It matters greatly in what matter one is heard. If you ask for this which is expedient for you and are heard, God is favorable. Or perhaps we know what to ask for, and did the Apostle Paul not know? Behold, I showed you the people heard ungratefully, but to their evil; the devil heard, the demons heard. Hear the Apostle not heard by the favorable God. Surely you say in your hearts: If the devil was heard, how much more should the Apostle be heard? And yet, what does that same Apostle say? In the greatness of my revelations so that I might not be exalted. After he was not heard, then he found the reason why he was not heard. Therefore, he did not keep it silent but proposed it first. For indeed the such a great man was about to say a marvelous thing against expectation, the chosen vessel so holy, who labored more than all of them; but not he, but the grace of God with him. When he read the promise of God: Before you were speaking I will say, I am here, he says once, and he is not heard: he asks again, nor is he heard: he asks a third time, he is absolutely not heard. In the greatness of my revelations so that I might not be exalted, there was given to me a thorn in my flesh, an angel of Satan to buffet me. Many suspect many things in this place: but it is better believed what is said by better men, that the Apostle Paul suffered a very sharp pain in his head; therefore, he said he was buffeted because he suffered in his head, so that he might not be exalted. There he was struck, which should not be raised in pride. And what did he say, what did he add? Therefore, I three times besought the Lord that it might depart from me; and He said to me, My grace is sufficient for thee, strength is made perfect in weakness. O not to hear! this is rather to aid. The remedy was sharp but healthful, so great a physician applied to the sick. The sick man under the bite of the remedy besought that the physician might remove what he had applied; the physician did not hear to his will and therefore heard more to his health. The physician knows how to deal with you, and does God not know? What is to be prudently requested according to the teaching of the Apostle. Do we not see this daily in human affairs as a kind of harsh and inexorable mercy? How many contrary things do the sick request from doctors, and how much mercy do doctors exhibit by refusing! They refuse, and they spare; they are cruel if they grant. The doctor knows this; and God does not know? He knows how to deal with you, who was created with you; and does He not know how to deal with you both, who created both of you? Indeed, dearest, in all tribulations, in all fears, in all joys, ask God that He may grant what He Himself knows is expedient in temporal matters. As for eternal things, such as "hallowed be Your name, Your kingdom come, Your will be done on earth as it is in heaven," and other such things, ask confidently, they cannot harm. Choose, love, gather; for He opens His hand and fills every soul with blessing. And when you have given, He says, they will gather. No one should doubt the supreme goods: and if they are delayed, they will be given; the reward is not denied, but desire is exercised. Let us desire long:

because it is great what we are going to receive. Let us thirst long: because we will drink from the fountain of life. Still, dearest, what we ask for without impudence, because the Apostle taught, let us ask, that we may lead a quiet and tranquil life, with all piety and charity.

Sermons - Sermon 306D

Sermon 306/D SERMON ON THE BIRTHDAY OF SAINT QUADRATUS By believing and speaking, the martyrs found death. The blessed Apostle provided testimony from the Scriptures in which he commended to us the glory of the martyrs. For this reason it is written, he says: "I believed, therefore I spoke," and we also believe, therefore we also speak. For if they had only believed and not spoken, they would not have suffered. Thus, by believing they attained life and by speaking they found death, but a death in which the corruptible body would be sown and incorruption would be reaped. This sense, that is, what we believe we also speak, the same Apostle explained in another place as follows: "With the heart one believes unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation." The salvation of man is vain.

Here, someone might perhaps ask: "How does confession lead to salvation, when martyrs, upon confessing, were then killed? Thus, surely confession does not lead to salvation." Have you forgotten: Give us help from trouble, and vain is the salvation of man? Clearly, they confessed with their mouths for salvation, for the salvation of the faithful, of Christians, not for the common salvation of men and beasts. For even this common salvation of men and beasts, from whom, if not from the Creator of all? For from whom were we made to exist, from Him we received the ability to be saved. It is well known to the faithful that God is the creator not only of man but also of beasts. Hence: You, Lord, will save both man and beast, according to the abundance of Your mercy, O God. Since You, God, are the Creator of men, the abundance of Your mercy extends even to the salvation of beasts. What then is more for men except what follows: The children of men will hope in the shadow of Your wings? What will they hope for if not another salvation, not of this time, but eternal? For one kind of salvation is held, another is hoped for, and therefore the martyrs were very strong in faith, because they despised what they held to receive what they hoped for. They knew of one kind of salvation and believed in another; they saw one and did not see the other. What faith, beloved, what faith! Despise what you see, and faith will prevail. Who do men say that the Son of Man is? From where, a certain distinction among men and the Son of Man dawns upon us. Yet all sons of men are men. Thus, why are not all men sons of men? Because Adam and Eve were men, not sons of men. Which of these two did the Lord Christ prefer to be? Because it was fitting that He who had made man, would become man for the sake of man, and become that which He had made, so that what He had made would not perish. He could indeed form His flesh as He wished, as a true man with true flesh. For when He formed the first man, He did not seek a father or a mother. He did not seek the seed of man to become the first man. It also came to pass that He who had made man, became man. He did not merely want to be man, which He could if He willed, but preferred to be the Son of Man. And how strongly, how constantly He commends this, because He is the Son of Man! Take note and assent when the holy Gospels are recited, how incomparably more abundantly He calls Himself the Son of Man than the Son of God! For indeed, divine majesty deserving of God was to be briefly commended, but the humility of the Most High was to be more frequently inculcated. Among other things, therefore, where the Lord Jesus continually testifies that He is the Son of Man, let us particularly remember where He says to His disciples: Who do men say that the Son of Man is? Who do they say you are but the Son of Man? But many are sons of men, the same in kind, differing in virtues or conditions. Therefore, He says: Who do men say that I am? It was answered that some said He was Elijah, others Jeremiah, others John the Baptist or one of the Prophets, as if the Son of Man were one of the great men. But this concerns men to whom the same salvation as to beasts is common. But you, He said, who do you say that I am? As if they were not men. He said: This and that is what men say to whom belong to men. But you, surely sons of men belonging to the Son of Man, who do you say that I am? Then Peter answered for all, unity in all, and said: You are the Christ, the Son of the living God. Christ commends His humility. Peter confesses Christ's majesty. Thus it was fitting, thus it was necessary. Listen, Peter, to what Christ says for you, and you, say who for you is the Son of Man. Who do men say that I am the Son of Man? Who is this who for you became the Son of Man? You are the Christ, the Son of the living God. I, He says, commend my humility, you recognize my divinity. I say what I have become for you, you say from whence I have made you.

What has always been unknown when, will come at some time.

Therefore, this temporal safety, common to men and cattle, was despised by the martyrs, that which they had with Adam the man, not with the Son of Man. But the sons of men belonging to the Son of Man, in order to despise the common safety with men and cattle, will hope under the cover of Your wings. What then, beloved, so that martyrs might despise this safety, is this safety not any good? If it were not a good, who would boast because he despises what is no good? One despises good to come to better. We speak of this safety which no one seeking should be blamed. We see men doing nothing else, as far as sustenance of the present life is concerned, but that this safety may either be restored if it falters, or obtained if it is lacking. But as long as – whether you want it or not – as long as you can hold onto this safety, after all, you cannot recall the last day? There is fixed for each one some limit of the last day. To this limit all run, neither willing to run but being driven. We are closer today to this limit than yesterday, closer tomorrow than today, and what has always been unknown when, will eventually come. Therefore, let us live diligently because we do not know when we shall die. We do not know when, and we do not know how near it is that we said: “sometime.” And by this, the most blessed martyrs, when they came to the crisis of temptation, so that either their temporal life was to be retained indefinitely by yielding, or that which is to be seized without end – Why do you wonder, my brothers? – because they had faith, they weighed and chose, they won because they chose better, they chose because they loved, and to love from where, unless because they were loved, did they have? O blessed! O glorious! O strong! O great! O fortunate! O dedication to God! O in every way balanced! Good, but temporal, is what you despised. Eternal and incorruptible good is what you chose. Deservedly you stood firm in confession: wherever the persecutor wanted to turn you, you did not fall. The martyrs have made their robes white in the blood of the Lamb. This is to be truly blessed: he washed you with wonderful blood. The divine word says in the Apocalypse. These are the ones who came out of the great and many tribulations and washed their robes and made them white. Where did they make them white? In the blood, not just any blood but the Lamb's. All blood stains, the Lamb's blood whitens. How does it whiten? Behold the Lamb of God, behold Him who takes away the sins of the world. For it is not surprising that they washed their robes in blood. For something can indeed be washed in blood, as someone said: "They wash their necks and shoulders with ample blood." They wash, but do they whiten? Therefore, the divine word was vigilant, and when it said, "They washed their robes," it added what you would marvel at: "and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." For how could anything not be whitened by that blood about which it was said: "This is my blood, which will be shed for many for the forgiveness of sins"?

Sermons - Sermon 306E

Sermon 306 Sermon of Saint Augustine, Bishop on the birthday of Saint Quadratus the martyr We commend ourselves to the prayers of the martyrs. The day foretold for your Love, Quadratus' festival day, has dawned upon us today: let us celebrate it with gathering and discourse. Therefore, we speak as often of the glory of the martyrs before God and men as we celebrate their solemnities. Frequent celebration should be a frequent exhortation, so that it may become exultation. We have sung a psalm suitable for the festival of the martyrs: "I was pushed down like a heap of sand, and the Lord took me up." For this indeed the whole chorus of martyrs says, this the body of Christ in the world, living like Lot among the Sodomites, seeing many things they do not want, but consenting in no way to the deeds of the wicked. For the human soul is impelled to sin in various ways, either by the allure of pleasure or by the sting of tribulation, and whoever, so as not to sin through allure, has conquered pleasure, has made great progress, though not yet perfected. For the love of righteousness must be so great that pleasure yields to it and that it does not yield to pain. Whoever has come this far has been perfected. Therefore, perfect martyrs are believed to have departed from this world, because they have overcome not only the pleasures of the world but also tribulations through struggle. Finally, as the faithful know, we do not pray for the martyrs among the Christian sacraments. Moreover, not only do we not pray for them, but we commend ourselves to their prayers. With God's help, the struggler does not falter. This perfection is demanded by rebuke and required by the Epistle of Paul to the Hebrews, where it is said: "For you have not yet resisted unto blood, striving against sin." This perfection is demanded; to whom it is said, "You have not yet done," he is admonished to do so. For you have not yet resisted unto blood, striving against sin. But the martyrs have striven unto blood. However, they did not strive against a persecuting man, but against a lurking devil, and—if you rightly recognize—against their own weakness. Indeed, in the very man himself, a great contest is conducted, where the theater of conscience is: the highest spectator, however, is the inspector of conscience. But if he were merely an inspector of conscience and not a helper, every contender would falter. Accordingly, even in the very words we have sung, you have what I say: "I was pushed so hard that I was falling, but the Lord helped me." This he said, as if confessing his weakness. "As far as I am concerned," he says, "I would have fallen, but the Lord helped me." Therefore, be in the Lord, remain in the Lord, and when temptation pushes you, you will not fall because you do not give way. If by resisting you do not yield, by not consenting you do not fall.

Christ is the cornerstone in the house of God.

Take a likeness from the very name of the one whose feast we are celebrating: he is called Quadratus. When you push a square stone, it gives way but does not fall. It gives way without resisting, but it does not fall because it remains upright on all sides. For a square is upright on all sides: if you push it from one side, it is received by another, and it can never fall. Rightfully, the Lord God commanded the ancient righteous Noah to build the ark with square timbers. He wanted to use timbers for the construction that were both incorruptible and square. Incorruptible because of eternity, square to avoid temptation. Let us also be square, or rather let the whole body of Christ be a mass of squares. For it has a cornerstone, as it is sung: "The stone," he says, "which the builders rejected, has become the head of the corner." How then did it become the head of the corner, which the builders rejected? It means the Pharisees and scribes and doctors of the law. They rejected him as if he was not the one; they said, "He is not the one. Indeed, we are expecting the Christ, but we do not recognize him." By confessing that they awaited the Christ, they seemed like builders; but by saying that they did not recognize the true one, they rejected the cornerstone, because they themselves were not on the rock but on the sand. Therefore, those builders, boasting rather than building, rejected the cornerstone. But so that you would not wonder how the stone rejected by the builders became the head of the corner, Scripture added: "This was done by the Lord." Rejected by those builders, but made the head of the corner by the Lord. Walls from different directions came together at this corner: circumcision and uncircumcision. If you consider where they come from, what could be more different? If you consider where they are united, what could be more one? For walls coming from different directions form a corner, but they join together in one place in the bond of peace. It happened: they came from circumcision, they came from uncircumcision, they were joined together in the cornerstone. It was fulfilled what the apostle said: "He is our peace, who made both one."

"He who made you does not need you."

Therefore, beloved, come as squared stones striving for the cornerstone, so that the builder does not reject you. Yet hope for everything from God, He who assembles also squares. You, says the apostle Peter, like living stones, are being built into a holy temple of God. Thus, we must think of the temple of God to know repeatedly that God does not need a temple, but the temple needs God, lest we think we are doing a favor to God by giving Him a place to dwell. That God dwells in you benefits you. By dwelling in you, He makes you blessed; He is not made blessed by the dwelling. For thus is the true Lord who does not need a servant, yet has a servant whom He does not need but to whom He gives advice. For human weakness requires a servant to do some work that the master cannot, and in doing what he can, helps the master who cannot. For God is almighty and does not need you, who He made. You do not earn any merit by bearing the Lord, as you were merited to be made by the Lord. Do not think you are doing a favor to God because you believe in God. For if you do not believe, it is not harmful to Him, but to you. This voice is expressed in the psalm where it is said: I said to the Lord: You are my God, for you do not need my goods. Therefore, my true Lord is God the Lord, who does not need my goods, but I need yours. No one is suitable for healing himself, although he is suitable for wounding himself. No one should consider themselves capable of correcting themselves just as they were capable of corrupting themselves, because no one should consider themselves capable of healing themselves, even if they were capable of wounding themselves. Darkness is within the power of the eyes, for it is closed and it is within them. When you have closed it, you are in darkness. Therefore, it was within your power to be in darkness by closing your eyes, but is it within your power to see when you open your eyes, unless there is light in which you can see? The closing of your eyes did not need help to not see, but the opening of your eyes needs help to see. For unless there is light either from the sun, or a lamp, or the moon, or any other kind of light, unless it is present at the opening, your eyes see nothing even when open. Therefore, it is ours to receive, it is ours to have. But what do you have that you did not receive?

"God... has many martyrs in secret."

Therefore, a pious voice is like a heap of sand, not a heap of sand, but like a heap of sand; for the body of Christ, when it was made solid and squared, was thought by the blind to be a heap of sand, and because it was thought to be a heap of sand, therefore it did not fall. Yet it did not give this even by its own strength, because it added: The Lord took hold of me. Therefore, in all these temptations of the world—for Sodom has not burned yet, another great Sodom indeed, for that one burned as an example, another is reserved for judgment—in these temptations of the world, let us meditate daily to contend against sin unto bloodshed, which in another saying is called: Contend for the truth unto death. What is said there against sin is said here for the truth. And what is said there unto bloodshed is said here unto death. The soul itself must be of the martyr, for God is not delighted by the shedding of blood: He has many martyrs in the hidden place. Peace on earth to men of good will. The world ceases not to tempt us. Nor is that persecution to be desired which our ancestors suffered from earthly powers, in order to become martyrs. The world does not cease, nor does the abundance of temptations. Sometimes fever, and certain ones. To set aside the various threats of adversaries, the various temptations of each individual, which I began to say, fever, and certain ones. You are in bed, and you are an athlete. You are weak, and you fight, and you conquer. What if, indeed, to him fevered and placed in the danger of death, comes someone who promises to drive away your fever with certain incantations, and those incantations are illicit, diabolical, detestable, and to be anathematized, then many examples are proposed to you by him who urges this, and of those who were healed in this manner, and it is said to you: “That person, when he had this, did this for him, incanted for him, purified him, assisted him, and he was made healthy. Ask him, question him, listen to him.” And those people also say: “Truly it happened, we were almost dead, and we were thus liberated, and let it be your belief that if you allow that incantation, you will immediately be delivered from that plague.” If you do not consent, will you not be a martyr, who chose rather to die, and did not consent to the sacrilege? For what the unjust judge said to the martyr placed in chains or on the scaffold: “Consent to the sacrifice, and I release you from this tribulation,” this the devil privately says to the fevered one: “Consent to this sacrilege, and I release you from this fever.”

Many faithful are crowned without shedding blood.

Therefore, if you do not consent, if you conquer not man but the devil, not just any sinner equal to you, but the very prince of sinners - because your struggle is not against flesh and blood, that is, against humans from whom you suffer annoyances either of persuasion or tribulation, but against principalities and powers and rulers of the world, not of heaven and earth, but of this darkness, that is, of the impure and the unjust, as the apostle says to those liberated: "You were once darkness" -, if therefore you do not consent, do not think yourself not a martyr. Indeed, your solemnity is not celebrated, but your crown is prepared. For it is customary to celebrate the solemnity of those who have contended publicly. How many martyrs have risen from their bed, and from that infirmity have passed on as victors to the heavens. Therefore, know that you are being tested, if you suffer such a thing, if such a thing is suggested to you; there it is necessary that you have the spirit of a martyr, for He who made you watches over you, and He who called you helps you. There it is that you should say that of the saints. ■inveni The voice said: "God is able to free me from this deadly fever, but even if not." Let the contest be yours, enchanter, because he to whom you speak is not a transgressor. Thus, after these words, whatever pleases your Lord about you will happen. Either you will be returned alive, or you will be joined to the angels. He will do what he chooses about you: you be prepared for either, if you wish to be steadfast.

Martyrs also existed before the birth of Christ. Do you think those words of the psalm you just heard: "Chastising, the Lord has chastised me, and has not delivered me to death," are solely the voice of Daniel, who closed the mouths of lions? Do you think this voice is solely of the three youths, who tested the flames with faith and walked amidst them? Do you think it is solely their voice: "Chastising, the Lord has chastised me, and has not delivered me to death," because the lions did not devour him, nor did the flames consume them? By no means! Do not believe this, this voice is not solely theirs: it is also the voice of the Maccabees. For there is not one God for these and another for those, nor was He present for these and absent for those, nor did He assist these while being angry with those. He is the same God, able to save in both manners, to show that He has all power. By closing the mouths of the lions, He chastised Daniel in humiliation, but did not deliver him to death. By cooling the flames, He chastised the three youths in humiliation, but did not deliver them to death. By making the Maccabees conquerors in the fire, who did not yield to torments but fought against sin unto blood, He chastised them and did not deliver them to death. For they all live. To what death, then, did He not deliver them, I say? The devil wished to deliver them to the second death, the eternal death, not the transient one. Therefore, He openly saved them, secretly crowned them, and delivered neither these nor those to death.

"Great martyr John the Baptist."

Therefore, we must always be prepared for either outcome, I said. For God is able to deliver us from every tribulation. But we must especially pray that He delivers us from tribulation, that we be victors over tribulation, that we do not give in to sin because of tribulation. Do not think only of being a martyr if someone says to you, "Deny Christ," and you do not deny Him. Whenever you consider doing something against justice, it is nothing else but saying to you, "Deny Christ." Certainly, the great martyr John the Baptist was beheaded, and yet it was not said to him, "Deny Christ." He spoke the truth to a wicked king: the angry king ordered him to be imprisoned, and out of delight he ordered him to be killed. It was danced so that he might be killed: she danced, he fell. For he fell more by killing the righteous. The one who ordered the righteous to be killed fell, not the one who was killed. Yet it was not said to him, "Deny Christ," but because he died for the truth, he died for Christ, who said: "I am the way, the truth, and the life."

"Let there be no lack of a wrestler, because there will be no lack of a crown-giver." And he who says to you: "Give false testimony for me," says nothing else to you than: "Deny Christ." For if you confess Christ with your tongue and give false testimony, what happens in you is what Paul says: For they profess to know God, but by their deeds they deny Him. You have confessed by word, you have denied by deed. God judges the denier by deed more than the confessor by word. Deeds are greater than words. It is good to do and to say, but not to say and not to do. Therefore, you think yourself a martyr if you strive. "Give false testimony for me." "I will not say it." "Accept only and say it." "I do not accept." You have conquered greed. If you conquer fear as well, you have striven against sin unto blood. He who has not enticed you with rewards will try to break you with threats, proposing that he will exercise enmities, harm you more grievously, and when he has the power, kill you—and perhaps he already has the power—what do you do? He does not say: "Deny Christ," but he says: "Act against Christ," that is, against Him who said: You shall not bear false witness. How many such daily temptations, not upon all, as if pushed upon the entire Church, as if the heap of sand were attacked, which is thought to be a heap of sand, but often the enemy fights against individual grains, sometimes they are tempted one by one. What does it matter whether he tempts individually or coerces universally? The tempter is not lacking, but neither should the fighter be lacking, because the crown-giver will not be lacking. Turned to the Lord...

Sermons - Sermon 307

SERMO 307 On the Beheading of Blessed John the Baptist The killing of John the Baptist, on what occasion it happened. When the holy Gospel was being read, a cruel spectacle was set before our eyes: the head of Saint John on a platter, a harbinger sent by cruelty because of hatred for the truth. The girl dances, and the mother rages: and amid the pleasures and lust of the feasters, an oath is rashly sworn, and impiously what is sworn is fulfilled. What John had foretold happened. For he had said of the Lord Jesus Christ: "He must increase, but I must decrease." He was diminished in head, He increased on the cross. Truth bore hatred. It could not be endured with an even mind that the holy man of God admonished: who surely sought the salvation of those whom he so admonished. They repaid him evil for good. For what could he say except what he was full of? And what could they respond except what they were full of? He sowed wheat, but found thorns. He said to the king: "It is not lawful for you to have your brother's wife." For lust overpowered the king: he kept with him the prohibited wife of his brother. But he still enjoyed him, so as not to rage. He honored him from whom he heard the truth. But the detestable woman conceived hatred, which she would bring forth given time. When she was laboring, she bore a daughter, a dancing daughter. And that king who had the holy man John, who feared him for the Lord's sake, even if he did not obey him, when the head of John was requested on a platter, he was saddened. But because of the oath and because of those reclining with him, he sent a soldier and fulfilled what he had sworn.

Every oath is forbidden because of the danger of false swearing. This passage, beloved, admonishes us to discuss with you something about oaths concerning your life and manners. False swearing is not a light sin: indeed, it is such a great sin to swear falsely that, because of the guilt of false swearing, the Lord has prohibited all swearing. For He says: It was said, You shall not swear falsely, but you shall perform your oaths to the Lord; but I say to you, do not swear at all, neither by heaven, because it is the throne of God; nor by the earth, because it is His footstool; nor by any other oath; nor shall you swear by your head, because you cannot make one hair white or black. But let your word be, Yes, yes; No, no. Anything more than this comes from evil. An oath employed by God.

We find in the holy Scriptures that the Lord swore, when Abraham obeyed Him even to the sacrifice of his beloved son. The angel spoke to him from heaven, saying: By myself I swear, says the Lord, because you have obeyed my voice and have not spared your beloved son for my sake, blessing I will bless you, and I will multiply your seed like the stars of heaven and like the sand of the sea; and in your seed all the nations shall be blessed. This you see being fulfilled by the whole world filled with Christians, the truthful oath of God is shown. Likewise, it was prophesied in the Psalms concerning the Lord Jesus Christ: The Lord has sworn and will not repent: You are a priest forever according to the order of Melchizedek. Those who know the Scriptures know what Melchizedek, the priest of the most high God, brought forth when he blessed Abraham. It is not necessary for us to recall this on account of the catechumens. The faithful, however, recognize how it was prophesied beforehand, which we now see being fulfilled. And how is this? Because the Lord has sworn. And the Lord has sworn and He will not repent: not as Herod repented because he had sworn.

"However, it was justly forbidden to us."

Therefore, when the Lord has sworn, why did the Lord Christ prohibit His own from swearing? I will say why. It is not a sin to swear truthfully. But since it is a great sin to swear falsely, someone who never swears at all is far from the sin of false swearing: someone who even swears truthfully is closer to false swearing. Therefore, the Lord, who prohibited swearing, did not want you to walk on the edge, lest your foot slip in the narrow path and you fall. But the Lord swore, you say. He swears securely who does not know how to lie. Do not be moved because the Lord swore; for perhaps only God should swear. For when you swear, what do you do? You call upon God as a witness. You call upon Him, He calls upon Himself. But you, a man, since you are mistaken in many things, often call upon the truth as a witness to your falsehood. Sometimes, even unwillingly, a man perjures himself, thinking that what he swears is true. It is not as great a sin indeed as that of someone who knows it is false and still swears. How much better, and far from this severe sin, is the one who listens to the Lord Christ and does not swear? The custom of swearing overcome by Augustine.

I know it is difficult for your custom; but it was also difficult for our custom. By fearing God, we have taken the oath from our mouth. Behold, we live with you: who has ever heard us swearing? Did I not use to swear every day? But when I read, and feared, I struggled against my custom, in that very struggle I invoked the Lord as a helper. The Lord provided me with the help of not swearing. Nothing is easier for me than not to swear. I have admonished your Charity for this reason, so that you do not say, Who can? Oh, if God is feared! Oh, if the perjured tremble! the tongue is restrained, the truth is held, the oath is removed.

Sermons - Sermon 308

SERMO 308 ON THE SAME SOLEMNITY Herod in the difficulty of either committing perjury or a bloody crime.

Because of this passage, which we heard today when the Gospel was recited, I say to your Charity: you see the wretched Herod, who loved John, a holy man and a man of God. But because he rashly swore, drunken with joy and delight at the dancing, he promised to give whatever the girl who had pleased him by dancing had asked. But when she demanded a cruel and nefarious thing, he was indeed saddened; for he saw such a great crime being committed: but placed between his oath and the request of the girl, when he saw the bloody deed, he again feared the guilt of perjury; lest he offend God by perjuring, he offends God by raging. Someone says to me: What then should Herod have done? If I say, He should not have sworn: who does not see that he should not have done this? But I am not consulted about whether a man should swear; but what the man who has sworn should do. This is the great deliberation. He rashly swore: who does not know this? Nevertheless, he slipped, he swore. Behold, the girl demanded the head of holy John: what should Herod have done? Let us give him counsel. If we say, Spare John, do not commit the crime; we advise perjury. If we say, Do not perjure; we urge him to fulfill the crime. A bad situation.

Before you come therefore to this two-headed snare, take from your mouth rash oaths: before you come to this bad custom, I advise my brothers, I advise my sons: what is the need for you to come to this point, where we cannot find counsel?

Reckless oath not to be fulfilled by committing murder. The perjury of David is a great sin, though less than murder.

However, after carefully examining the Scriptures, one example came to my attention, where I see a pious and holy man fell into a rash oath, and preferred not to do what he had sworn, rather than fulfill his oath by shedding human blood. I remind your Charity. When Saul was persecuting the holy David ungratefully, David, with his men, went wherever he could, so that he might not be found by Saul and be killed. And one day, from a wealthy man, who was called Nabal, and was shearing his sheep, he asked for sustenance for himself and those who were with him. The merciless man refused to give, and what is worse, he responded insultingly. The holy David swore that he would kill him. For he was armed. And what was easy, and seemed just to do, persuaded by anger, he rashly made an oath; and he began to go to do what he had sworn. Abigail, Nabal’s wife, met him and brought him the necessities he had requested. She earnestly begged him, persuaded him, and turned him away from her husband's blood. He swore rashly, but did not fulfill the oath with greater piety.

Therefore, dearest ones, I return again to warn you. Behold, holy David, although not in anger, shed human blood; but who can deny that he swore falsely? He chose the lesser of two sins: but that was lesser in comparison to the greater. For, by itself, false swearing is a great evil. Therefore, you ought first to strive and to wrestle against your bad, bad, bad, and very bad habit; and remove swearing from your mouths.

One who swears when provoked by another does not sin in the same way as the other.

However, if someone challenges you to take an oath, believing that by swearing about the matter which he thinks you have committed or done, he can be satisfied, and perhaps you have not done it; to dispel his evil suspicion, if you swear, you do not sin as he who provoked you: because the Lord Jesus said: "Let your speech be, Yes, yes; No, no. Anything more than this comes from evil." He was speaking about oaths, where He wanted us to understand that the very oath is from evil. If you were provoked by another, it will be from his evil that you swear, not yours. And this is almost from the common evil of the human race, since we cannot see our hearts. For if we could see our hearts, to whom would we swear? When would an oath be demanded from us, when the very thought could be seen by the eyes of another?

Compelling someone to swear an oath when you believe they will swear falsely is worse than being a murderer.

Write in your hearts what I say: But he who provokes a man to take an oath, and knows that he will swear falsely, surpasses a murderer. Because a murderer will kill the body, but that one the soul; indeed, two souls, both of him whom he provoked to swear, and his own. Do you know that what you say is true, and that what he says is false, and compel him to swear? Behold, he swears, behold, he perjures himself, behold, he perishes: what have you gained? Indeed, you too have perished, who desired to satisfy yourself with his death.

Tutuslymen was scourged by divine chastisement for this sin.

I will say something that I have never said to your Charity, in this congregation, which happened in this church. There was here a certain man, simple, innocent, very faithful, well known by many of you, that is, by the citizens of Hippo, in fact, by all, called Tutuslymeni. Who among you, who are citizens, does not know Tutuslymeni? From him, I heard what I say. I don't know who denied him, either what had been entrusted to him, or what was owed to him; and he committed himself to the man's trust. Provoked, he challenged him to an oath. The man swore, and this one (Tutuslymeni) lost: but in this loss, the other man utterly perished. This grave and faithful man, Tutuslymeni, was then saying that on that very night he was brought before a judge, and with great force and terror, he came to a certain high and admirable man presiding, whom the officers of similarly high rank obeyed. He was ordered to be violently pulled back and questioned with these words: Why did you provoke the man to an oath, whom you knew to be falsely swearing? He replied: He denied me my thing. It was answered to him: And was it not better that you lost the thing you demanded than to destroy this man's soul with a false oath? Prostrate, he was ordered to be beaten. He was beaten so severely that the marks of the lashes appeared on the back of the waking man. But it was said to him, after he was corrected: Your innocence is spared, henceforth beware not to do such a thing. Indeed, he committed a grave sin and was corrected: but a much graver sin will be committed by him who, after this my sermon and this my admonition and exhortation, does anything of the sort. Beware of false oath, beware of rash oath. You will most securely avoid these two evils if you abstain from the habit of swearing.

Sermons - Sermon 308A

SERMON 308/A

Seek not the things you see, but the things promised. The visible things are temporal, the invisible are eternal. In the way that gold shines, and straw is dark, thus are the meanings of the Scriptures to be distinguished.

LIVING IN CARTHAGE IN THE MAPPALIA, THAT IS, IN THE BASILICA OF THE BLESSED OF MARTYR CYPRIAN, THROUGH HIS BIRTHDAY VIGIL The sun of justice does not need the testimony of a lamp for the eye of a pure heart.

We speak to your charity in the house of God about what the present Psalm has reminded us. Who is it that says: I have prepared a lamp for my Christ. His enemies I will clothe with shame; but upon him my sanctification shall flourish; and what is that lamp which he has prepared for his Christ; and who are the enemies of his Christ, whom he clothes with shame through that lamp; and what is his sanctification, who prepared a lamp for his Christ, which will flourish upon his Christ. In all these words, it seems clear and open that he says here: For my Christ; for nothing else is to be understood than Christ the Lord and our Savior. Therefore, when exploring, as God grants, the depth of this meaning, we find that God the Father says this. Therefore, God the Father, that is, the person of God the Father speaks through the Prophet: I have prepared a lamp for my Christ. However, it is not necessary to explain to Christians that the Son of God is also the Christ of God. Having found the person speaking, let us see what the lamp prepared by God the Father for Christ the Son is. The Lord himself speaks about John the Baptist: He was a burning and shining lamp, and you were willing to rejoice for a while in his light. Therefore, he called John a lamp, kindled from the source of light. To bear witness to the truth. For men lay in this blindness and in this infirmity of the inner eye, so that the sun of righteousness would be sought through the lamp. For if anyone had a clear eye of the heart, he would first gaze upon it, nor would he seek a lamp for its testimony. For when he had said about that lamp: You were willing to rejoice for a while in his light; but I, he says, have greater testimony than John. Therefore, a lamp was kindled for the weak in the night. And how did he kindle it? The Father says to his Christ the Son about John: Behold, I send my angel before you, who will prepare your way before you. He has prepared a lamp for his Christ.

Hence the friend of the bridegroom, John, because the servant is the follower of the Lord.

How does He clothe His enemies with confusion through the very lamp? But first see what we have said, that the lamp is kindled from the source of light. John himself testifies: We have received from His fullness. And John was so preeminent in excellence that he was thought to be the Christ Himself, not before Him. However, if he were an extinguished lamp, and smoky with the smell of pride, when he was sent by the Jews and was asked: Who are you? Are you the Christ, Elijah, or the Prophet? He would say: I am. For he would have found an occasion for his boastfulness, with undue honor being willingly given by the error of men. Was he striving to persuade this, what those who questioned him were saying? But he was sent humble to prepare the way for the exalted; hence the friend of the bridegroom, because a servant knowledgeable of the Lord. And he said: I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness; make straight the way of the Lord. I am not the Christ, nor Elijah, nor the Prophet. And they said to him: Who then are you? And what did he say? I am the voice of one crying in the desert: Prepare the way for the Lord. For this was already predicted by Isaiah; and concerning whom he predicted, it is understood there. You have read this, he said, in Isaiah, and perhaps you have read it and did not know from whom it was said: I am he of whom it is said. But consider how much he abases himself, who was so exalted that he was thought to be Christ. He humbles himself as follows: Indeed, he said, I baptize you in water; but He who comes after me is greater than I. And He could be said to be somewhat greater than me. He declares Him to be much greater. Say, how much greater? Whose sandal strap I am not worthy to untie.

Testimony of John, about Christ. Christ about John. He who is greater than John is more than a man.

Now understand from here the dispensation, why John was sent before Christ. You see how much lesser he is and how much he admits Him to be greater, saying that he is not worthy to untie the strap of His sandal. How great is he who says himself unworthy to untie this Man's sandal strap? How great is he? Where do we seek? If we ask John himself how great John is, we do not find it; for he humbles himself and speaks nothing boastfully of himself, even truthfully. How great then is John, who is not worthy to untie the sandal strap of Him who was thought to be a man, from whom we are about to hear? Let us ask the Lord Himself and say to Him: Lord, John has borne great testimony about You, and although his great excellence appeared among men, so that he was thought to be the Christ and was asked who he was, he said he was not the Christ, but that a greater one than he should come, so much greater that he is not worthy to untie His sandal strap. Like a faithful lamp, he spoke of Your excellent light. This is what John said about You. Let us see who it is who spoke these things about You, how great is he who so humbled himself to You and confessed You to be much greater than himself. Who is he? He said these things about You: Tell us something about him. Hear the voice of the Lord concerning John: Among those born of women, none has arisen greater than John the Baptist. But what does He say? Yet he who is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he. He speaks of Himself: for God is not boastful when He commends His own greatness. What does it mean, 'He who is least'? He who is later in age is greater in majesty. For the Lord Christ was born later in age than John, but in that which was made for us, not in that through which we were made. He who was born after John hears from the Father: not before John, not before David, not before Abraham, but: I have begotten You before the morning star. If then, something was accommodated to our infirmity, so that the day was preceded by a lamp, and was believed about the day from the lamp, how much more should it be believed about the lamp from the day, because: Among those born of women, none has risen greater than John the Baptist? Therefore, a man than whom no greater was born, when he says that he is not worthy to untie the sandal strap of a certain one, what is He whose sandal strap's untying he is not worthy of, than whom no man was greater? If already John is such a great man, that no man could be greater, whatever is greater than him is more than a man. If already John is such a great man and no man could be greater than him, he who is greater than he is, is more than a man. And who is more than a man, yet became man for man's sake, rightly the sanctification of the Father flourishes over him. The three Persons of the Trinity are co-eternal. For the Holy Spirit descended upon him in the form of a dove: the flower of holiness was then shown more fully in the form of a dove, in a simple and innocent manner, to John himself, so that it might be fulfilled: "And upon him my sanctification will flourish." He said, "I did not know him; but he who sent me to baptize with water said to me, 'Upon whom you see the Spirit descending like a dove and remaining on him, he it is who baptizes with the Holy Spirit.' And I," he said, "bear witness that I have seen this, and he is the chosen one of God." What testimony does he bear? Upon whom he saw the sanctification of the Father flourishing. Whence did he see the Holy Spirit descending? For the Spirit never departed from the Son, nor the Son from the Spirit, nor the Son from the Father, nor the Father from the Son, nor the Spirit from the Son and the Father; but these things are understood differently by a purified mind and differently shown to the eyes. The Father never precedes the Son in time, the Son never follows the Father in time; for there is no time there. The Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, the creator of times, one God. Therefore, there is no saying: The Father is prior, the Son posterior; from whom the Father, from him the Son. Ask: From whom is the Father? You surpass with thought the earth, heaven, angels, visible and invisible, the whole of creation, and you ask: From whom did the Father begin? Eternal things are not thus inquired; do not ask from whom, unless it has a beginning. Do not ask from whom, from whom does anything begin that begins, and what begins from no one, because it does not begin. Just as the Father does not begin, the Son does not begin, but the Son is the radiance of the Father. So is the radiance of the fire, from which is the fire; and the radiance of the Father, from whom is the Father. From whom is the Father? From eternity to eternity. Therefore, also the radiance of the Father is from eternity to eternity; and yet, because it is his radiance, his Son, and so he does not begin in time, as being begotten by the Father. Who can see this? Purify your heart, shake off the dust, wash away the stain; whatever disturbs the inner sight must be cured and healed, and what is said and believed will appear, before it is seen. The Trinity in the baptism of Christ how it appeared. Canticle.

Now, however, we believe, brothers. What do we believe? That the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit do not precede one another in time. Therefore, since the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit do not precede one another in time, I still could not name the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit without those names involving time and being held by their respective times. The Father is not earlier and the Son is not later, yet I could not say it without mentioning one first and another later, and all syllables kept their own times, and the second syllable could not sound in my words unless the first had passed. Time was completed in my syllables when I spoke those things that do not have time. So, my brothers, when that Trinity was sensibly shown to this flesh, the whole Trinity appeared in the river where the Lord was baptized by John. For He was baptized, ascended from baptism, the dove descended, and a voice sounded from heaven: "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." The Son in the man, the Spirit in the dove, the Father in the voice. The undivided reality was shown distinctly; if it can be called a reality, but rather the cause of all things, if it can be called a cause. What do we say when we speak of God? And yet we speak, and He allows Himself to be spoken of, who is not as He is thought, nor can He be spoken of as He is thought. But as far as humans are concerned, brothers, behold, He appeared through the dove, and it is fulfilled: "My sanctification will flourish upon him." For it is said "will flourish," it will appear clearly; nothing in a tree is clearer than the flower, nothing more lucid. Come now, we have come to the last words of the psalm, "My sanctification will flourish upon him." I remember that I passed over who are the enemies who were confounded through the lamp.

Enemies of Christ, some openly, others secretly. Eucharist. We pray that the kingdom of Christ may come, and we fear lest we be heard.

I prepared a lamp for my Christ. The Father speaks of His Son. What lamp? John. Ask the Son Himself. He was the burning and shining lamp. I will clothe His enemies with confusion. Who are His open enemies, if not the Jews? For Christ has hidden enemies as well. All who live unrighteously and impiously are enemies of Christ, even if they are marked with His name and called Christians. To whom He will say: "I never knew you"; and they say: "Lord, in Your name we ate and drank, in Your name we performed many miracles." What, we ate and drank in Your name? They did not boast of their own foods, and from there they claimed to belong to Christ. There is a certain food that is eaten and drunk, and it is Christ; and by His enemies Christ is eaten and drunk. The faithful know the spotless Lamb which they consume; and may they consume so as not to be debtors to punishment! For as the Apostle says: "Whoever eats and drinks unworthily eats and drinks judgment upon themselves." Therefore, the enemies of Christ are those who choose to live unrighteously rather than obey Him, and when it is said He will come to judge the living and the dead, they fear His coming. If it were up to them, they would prevent Him from coming. Because they could not stop Him from coming, they would try to stop Him from returning. The Jews already tried this, to prevent His return. For the son was sent to those wicked tenants, to the bad caretakers who would not give the reward and who stoned the servants sent to them. Then the master of the house, the lord of the vineyard, said: "I will send my son, perhaps they will respect him." But they thought among themselves, saying: "This is the heir, come let us kill him, and the inheritance will be ours." They could not prevent Him from coming from the Father, and they tried to prevent Him from returning to the Father. But to what end? They saw and despised Him as mortal, but in Him they could only kill death. In the death of Christ, death died. He, rising again, ascended to the Father and will come again. Why do you fear? Love, and you will be secure. Do we not pray: "Thy kingdom come"? Therefore, brothers, do we pray and fear lest we be heard? The open enemies of Christ are the Jews; how they were confounded by the testimony of the lamp. Many simple people have one heart, one deceitful person has two hearts. But these, as I began to say, are hidden enemies. Let us speak of those open ones, who openly envied, raged, held, scourged, mocked, crucified, killed, and guarded the buried one. Let us see how they were clothed in confusion by that lantern. When they saw miracles in the Lord, the same enemies said: Tell us, by what power do you do these things? They asked with an inimical mind, so that if he confessed his power, they might hold him as a blaspheme. But how did he act with the coin, when they wanted to accuse him, if he said: Pay tribute to Caesar, as if he had spoken against the Jewish people, making them subject and tributary; if he said: Do not pay, they could denounce him to Caesar's friends and ministers for prohibiting the payment; but he said: Show me the coin: Whose image and inscription does it have? They answered: Caesar's. Therefore, give to Caesar what is Caesar's, and to God what is God's. This is to say: If Caesar seeks his image on the coin, does not God seek His image in man? Thus these inimical slanderers spoke with a double heart and mouth. For it is said once in the heart, unless those who spoke such things had a double heart, and from where it was said a little before, a joined heart, not a simple one. See how significant this is. It was said of many servants of God that they had one heart: It was, he says, one soul and one heart towards God for them. Many simple ones have one heart, one deceitful one has two hearts. Therefore, because they spoke with a double heart and mouth: Tell us by what power you do these things? that is, if you say we honor, if you say we revere, if you say we worship. This seems to sound from another heart. From another indeed, for there was a double heart there, if you say we accuse, if you say we will find a reason to hold you, if you say we will find a reason to accuse you. Such enemies: but let them be confounded by the lantern; now you will see them confused. And well, the time is fitting. We perform the lamp lighting, let the enemies of Christ be confounded by the lantern that the Father prepared for His Christ. He indeed was the burning lantern, the Lord himself said. What then did he respond to those saying: Tell us by what power you do these things? I will also ask one word of you. Tell me, from where is the baptism of John? From heaven or from men? They were troubled among themselves: If we say from heaven, he will say to us, why did you not believe him? that is to say: Why do you ask me by what power I do these things, when he bore witness about me, whom you questioned? Therefore, if we say: From heaven; he will say to us: Why did you not believe him? If we say: From men, we fear the people. For all held John as a prophet. Fearing the people on one side, and fearing the truth on the other; timid here, envious there; blind everywhere, they answered: We do not know. The lantern was brought out, the darkness fled; for although they were present in body, they fled in heart, saying they did not know what they knew. The evidence of flight is the fear in the heart; they feared being stoned by the people if they said John's baptism was from men; they feared being convicted by Christ if they said John's baptism was from heaven. They fled, confused. At the mention of John, they feared, troubled into silence. And he said: Neither will I tell you by what power I do these things. A lamp was therefore prepared for Christ our Lord, John the Baptist; his enemies, slanderous questioners, retreated confused when the light of the lamp was brought forth; it was fulfilled: I will clothe his enemies with shame. But we, brothers, recognizing through John the Baptist the precursor the Lord, and even more through the testimony of the Lord himself, of whom he said: I have a greater testimony than John, believing in Christ, let us be made the body of his head, so that Christ may be one head and body; and in all of us having been made one it will be fulfilled: And upon him shall my sanctification flourish. Turned to the Lord.

Sermons - Sermon 309

SERMO 309 On the birthday of Cyprian the Martyr The suffering of Cyprian is remembered. The sermon owed by us to your ears and hearts is demanded by so pleasing and religious a solemnity, in which we celebrate the passion of the blessed Martyr. The Church was undoubtedly sad then, not from the loss of the falling one, but from the longing for the departing one; always desiring to see present such a good leader and teacher. But those whom the anxiety of the battle had afflicted, the victor's crown consoled. And now, not only without any sadness, but even with immense joy, we recall by reading and cherishing all that was done at that time; and on this day, it is now allowed to rejoice, not to fear. For we do not dread him coming fearfully, but await him cheerfully returning. Therefore, it pleases us to remember with exultation the entire passion of that most faithful and most courageous and most glorious Martyr in the past, which the brothers then endured with anxiety in the future. His exile. Return from exile.

First, therefore, the fact that he was sent into exile in Curubis for the faith of the confession of Christ, it did not harm Saint Cyprian in any way, but rather it greatly benefited that city. For wherever he himself would be sent, would not Christ also be there, for whose testimony he was being sent? Thus Christ who said: "Behold, I am with you all days, even unto the consummation of the age," received his member in every place, wherever the rage of the enemy drove him. O foolish unbelief of the persecutor! If you seek a place of exile to which a Christian is to be sent; first, if you can, find a place from which Christ can be forced to go out. You think that you are excluding the man of God from his homeland into a foreign land, in Christ never an exile, in the flesh everywhere a pilgrim. But now it is pleasing to consider and recall after that, which Cyprian did not feel, but the enemy thought was exile, what followed in the order of his suffering. For when Cyprian, a holy martyr chosen by God, had returned from the city of Curubis, into which he had been sent into exile by the decree of Aspasius Paternus the proconsul, he was staying in his gardens: and from there he daily hoped to be visited, as it had been shown to him. The arrest by two officers.

What now would the force of the persecutor’s attack rage against a heart always prepared, further strengthened by the revelation of the Lord? For when would He abandon the one who suffers, whom He did not allow to be surprised in ignorance? So now, as it happened that two were sent to present him to the suffering, who even lifted him into the chariot and placed him in the middle; and this was a sign of divine admonition, so that he would joyfully recall that he belongs to His body, who was reckoned among the wicked. For Christ, hung on the wood between two thieves, was provided as an example of patience. But Cyprian, carried to his passion in the chariot between two attendants, was following the footsteps of Christ. The pastoral concern of Cyprian.

What is it, when he had been delayed another day with his guards, and a crowd of brothers and sisters gathered and spent the night at the doors, he ordered the girls to be guarded—how greatly must this be considered? How greatly must it be praised? How greatly must it be lauded? At the point of bodily death, the pastoral vigilance of the shepherd did not die in his mind; and the care of protecting the Lord's flock was maintained with sober mind up to the last day of this life: nor did the hand already near the bloody executioner drive from his mind the duty of the most faithful steward. As he contemplated being a martyr, he did not forget being a bishop: he cared more about how he would give an account to the chief shepherd for the sheep entrusted to him than what he would reply to the unfaithful proconsul about his own faith. For he loved Him who had said to Peter: Do you love me? Feed my sheep. And he was feeding His sheep, for whom he prepared to shed his blood in imitation. He ordered the girls to be guarded, knowing that he had not only a simple Lord, but also a wily adversary. Thus, he armed a manly heart against the lion openly roaring in confession, while also fortifying the female sex against the wolf lurking for the flock.

How one should take counsel for oneself. Every day should be counted as if it were the last. The words of the proconsul to Cyprian, and his response.

He truly takes care of himself who thinks of God as judge, before whom each one is going to present the case of this life conducted and the charge entrusted to him by Him: where every man receives, as the Apostle testifies, the things done through the body, whether good or evil. Thus, he takes care of himself who, living by faith and striving not to be taken unawares by the final day, reckons every day as his last, and so conducts his behavior pleasing to God until the final day. Thus, the blessed and merciful bishop and most faithful martyr Cyprian took care of himself, not as the deceitful tongue of the devil seemed to advise him through the mouth of a judge possessed by that impious one, saying: “Take care of yourself.” When indeed he saw his resolute mind, when he said to him: “The leaders have ordered you to perform the ceremonies”; and he responded: “I do not comply”: he added and said: “Take care of yourself.” That is the deceitful tongue of the devil: even if not of him who did not know what he was saying, yet of the one who was speaking through him. For the proconsul spoke, not so much according to human leaders whose orders he claimed to have imposed upon himself, but according to the prince of the power of the air of whom the Apostle says: Who works in the children of disobedience: who Cyprian knew was working through the tongue of this one, though he himself did not know it. Cyprian, I say, knew, when he heard from the proconsul: “Take care of yourself” that flesh and blood was speaking foolishly, this the devil was speaking deceitfully: and thus he saw in one action two actors; one with his eyes, the other with faith. This one did not want him to die, that one did not want him to be crowned: accordingly, he was calm towards this one, cautious towards that one; he openly replied to this one, secretly he overcame that one. The words of Cyprian. A sentence concerning Cyprian.

"Do, he said, what you have been commanded: in such a just matter, there is no need for consultation". He had indeed said: "Consult yourself". To this it was responded: "In such a just matter, there is no need for consultation." For he who consults either gives counsel or seeks it. But the proconsul did not want to receive counsel from Cyprian, but rather admonished him to receive it from himself. But he said: "In such a just matter, there is no need for consultation." I do not still deliberate, because I no longer doubt: for justice itself has removed doubt from me. However, the just man, that he may securely die in the flesh, lives certain in faith. Many martyrs had preceded Cyprian, whom he with his most fervent exhortations had inspired to defeat the devil; and it was certainly just that he, whom as a truthful speaker he had sent forth, should follow them as an intrepid sufferer: therefore "in such a just matter, there is no need for consultation". What shall we say to these things? How shall we rejoice over these things? Our heart and our mouth shall burst forth with so much conception of joys, except into the very last voice of the venerable Martyr himself? For when Galerius Maximus had recited the decree from the document: "It pleases to punish Tascius Cyprian with the sword". He responded: "Thanks be to God". Therefore, holding in memory such a great matter, the festivity of this most solemn day, the proposal of this most salutary example, let us all with the marrow of our being also say, thanks be to God.

Sermons - Sermon 31

SERMO 31 FROM THE RESPONSE OF PSALM 125:

"Those who sow in tears will reap in joy." The psalm that is sung to the Lord seems fitting for the holy martyrs, but if we are members of Christ, as we ought to be, let us understand that it pertains to all of us: Those who sow in tears will reap in joy. They went forth and wept, casting their seeds. But coming, they shall come in exultation, bearing their sheaves. Where are they going forth from and where are they coming to? What are they sowing in tears? What are the seeds? What are the sheaves? They go forth to death, they come from death. They go forth by being born, they come by rising again. Sowing good deeds, they reap an eternal reward. Therefore, the seeds are ours, whatever good we have done; our sheaves are what we will receive at the end. If, therefore, the seeds are good, good deeds, why with tears, when God loves a cheerful giver? The martyrs gave themselves up by confessing Christ.

First, see here, beloved, how these words most pertain to the blessed martyrs. For none have expended themselves as much as those who have given themselves, as the Apostle Paul says: "And I will most gladly spend and be spent for your souls." For they have given themselves, confessing Christ, and fulfilling with His help what is said: "When you sit at a great table, know that such things are necessary for you to prepare." What is the great table if not where we receive the body and blood of Christ? What does it mean: "Know that such things are necessary for you to prepare," if not what the blessed John explains: "As Christ laid down His life for us, so we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren"? See how greatly they expended themselves. But did they perish when they received security from the Lord even regarding a hair? Does a hand perish, where a hair does not perish? Does a head perish, where a hair does not perish? Where an eyelash does not perish, does an eye perish? Therefore, with this great received security, they gave themselves. Therefore, let us sow good works while it is time, as the Apostle says: "He who sows sparingly will also reap sparingly." Tirelessly, he says, let us do good to all as we have the opportunity, especially to those who are of the household of faith. And again: "Let us not grow weary in doing good; for at the proper time we will reap a harvest if we do not give up." He who fails in sowing will not rejoice at the harvest. Our head sympathizes with the weaker members.

Why then in tears, when all our good works ought to be in cheerfulness? Indeed, it can be said about the martyrs because they have sown with tears. For they fought bravely and were in great tribulations. For in order that Christ might console their tears, He translated them and transfigured them into Himself and said: "My soul is sorrowful unto death." Nevertheless, my brothers, it seems to me that our head has compassion on its weaker members, lest perhaps the weak members despair of themselves, as human frailty, perturbed by the approach of death, would say they do not belong to God, for if they did belong, they would be joyful. Therefore Christ first said: "My soul is sorrowful unto death. Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me." Who says this? What power, what weakness? Hear who says it: "I have the power to lay down my life and the power to take it up again. No one takes it from me, but I lay it down of my own accord and take it up again."

This power was sorrowful when it was doing what it would not do unless it willed. He did it with power, not out of necessity, because He willed, not because the Jew could. Therefore, He transfigured the weak members of His body into Himself. And perhaps it was said of them: "Those who sow in tears will reap in joy," that is, of the weaker ones. For that great herald of Christ did not sow in tears when he said: "For I am already being poured out and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith. Henceforth, there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, the crown of the harvest." He says, "Henceforth, there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, will award to me on that day." It is as if he had said: "The Lord will give me the harvest, for which I sow myself." These words, as far as we understand, brothers, are of someone exulting, not weeping. Was he in tears when he said these things? Was he not similar to a cheerful giver, whom God loves? Let us therefore refer these words to the infirm, so that they do not despair, who have sown in tears, for even if they have sown in tears, sorrow and sighing will pass away. Sorrow ends with time, and endless joy comes. In this life, we all weep for evils.

Nevertheless, dearest ones, see how it seems to me that what was said pertains to all: Those who sow in tears will reap with joy. They go forth weeping, bearing their seeds. But coming, they will come with exultation, carrying their sheaves. Listen, if, with the Lord’s help, I am able to explain how it pertains to all: They go forth weeping. From the time we are born, we proceed. For who stands still? Who is not compelled to walk from the moment they enter life? The infant is born, and by growing, it progresses. Death is the end. In the end, indeed, we shall come, but with exultation. For who does not weep here on this troublesome path, when even the infant begins from there? Indeed, when the infant is born, it is cast out from the narrowness of the womb into the breadth of this world, proceeding from the darkness into the light. And yet, coming from darkness to light, it can cry but not laugh. For this life is such that when joy is felt here, beware lest it deceive. When there is weeping here, pray to escape. And tribulation passes, and tribulation comes. And men laugh, and men weep. And what men laugh at should be wept about. But one weeps for his loss, another weeps for his suffering because he is in prison, another weeps because he lost one of his dearest. This one from here, that one from there. Where from the just one? First from all these things. For the just one truly weeps for those who weep in vain. He weeps for those weeping, he weeps for those laughing, because those who weep over vain things weep in vain, and those who laugh at vain things laugh to their own harm. He weeps everywhere, therefore he weeps more abundantly.

He who does not shed tears does not grieve that he is a stranger. But they shall come with exultation, carrying their sheaves. Therefore, you see that a righteous man, when he performs a good work, is cheerful. Thus he indeed becomes cheerful. For God loves a cheerful giver. So when does he weep? When he commends his good works through prayer. The Psalm wanted to commend the prayers: the prayers of the saints, the prayers of travelers, the prayers of those laboring on this path, the prayers of lovers, the prayers of those groaning, the prayers of those longing for the eternal homeland until those who are now in sorrow are satisfied by seeing it. Indeed, my Brothers, as long as we are in the body, we are away from the Lord. No pilgrimage desires the homeland without tears. If you desire what you do not have, shed tears. For how else will you say to God: You have put my tears in your sight? How else will you say to God: My tears have been my bread day and night? They have become my bread: they have consoled the one who groans, fed the one who is hungry. My tears have become my bread day and night. How? While it is said to me daily: Where is your God? Which righteous person has not had these tears? Whoever has not had them has not felt the pain of being away. With what face does one come to the homeland who has not sighed in absence? Is it not said to us daily: Where is your God? Learn, my Brothers, learn to be among the few. Live well, walk the path of God, and see that you hear: Where is your God? You will be happy when you hear this, unhappy if you say it. For when we defend the Christian faith and it is answered to us: "Behold, the name of Christ is preached everywhere; why do evils abound?", what else is being said but: Where is your God? He who hears it groans, because he who says it perishes. On the tears of the good and the wicked.

There are tears of the pious, there are tears of the saints, which their prayers indicate. He does good, and he is cheerful. And he weeps to do good, he weeps because he has done good. By weeping, he demands a good work, by weeping, he commends the good work he has done. Therefore, the tears of the righteous are frequent, but in this way. Will tears be in the homeland? Why not in the homeland? Because they will come in exultation, carrying their sheaves. Happiness comes, will tears return? Moreover, those who weep in vain here, laugh in vain, dissipated by their desires, when they are defrauded, they groan, when they defraud, they exult. They also weep in this way, they also weep, but not in exultation. But coming, they will come in exultation, carrying their sheaves. What do they gather who have sown nothing? Rather they gather, but what they have sown. Because they have sown thorns, they gather fire, and they go not from weeping to laughter like the saints: Going, they went and wept, sending their seeds, but coming, they will come in exultation, from weeping to weeping, from weeping with laughter to weeping without laughter. What will happen to them? Where will they go when they are resurrected? What if not what the Lord said: Bind their hands and feet, and cast them into outer darkness? Come, what then? Will there be darkness and no pain? Perhaps they will grope, but not feel pain? They will not see, but they will not be tormented? Far from it. There will not only be darkness, not only will their appearance, which they enjoyed, be taken away, but what makes them groan forever is also given. Do not underestimate the darkness, O whoever you are, wicked person, who, because of your evil deeds and lascivious adulteries, not only do not shun the darkness but seek it, who used to rejoice more when the candle goes out, you will not have such darkness where you rejoice, where you are glad, where you delight in the pleasures of the flesh; such the darkness will not be. But how will it be? There will be weeping and gnashing of teeth. A torturer without ceasing, a tortured without ceasing. Neither is the torturer weary, nor does the tortured die. Therefore there will be eternal tears for those who lived so. There will be eternal joys of the saints, when coming, they will come in exultation, carrying their sheaves. For they will say to their Lord at harvest time: "Lord, with your help we did what you commanded, give what you promised."

Sermons - Sermon 310

SERMO 310 On the Birthday of Cyprian the Martyr The birthday of Cyprian the martyr is very celebrated throughout all of Africa. May the Holy Spirit teach us in this hour what ought to be said: for we are about to say something in praise of the most glorious martyr Cyprian, whose Natal day, as you know, we celebrate today. The Church so frequently uses this name, that is, 'Natal days', to call the precious deaths of the martyrs by the name of Natal days. Thus, I say, the Church so frequently uses this name that even those who are not in it say this with it. For who today, I do not say in this our city, but clearly throughout all of Africa and the overseas regions, not only a Christian, but a Pagan, or a Jew, or even a heretic could be found, who does not say with us the Natal day of the martyr Cyprian? What is this, brothers? When he was born, we do not know; and because he suffered today, we celebrate his Natal day today. But we would not celebrate that day, even if we knew. For on that day he drew original sin: but on this day he overcame all sin. On that day he proceeded from the troublesome womb of his mother into this light, which entices the eyes of the flesh: but on this day he departed from the most hidden depths of nature to that light, which happily and blessedly illuminates the sight of the mind. The Church of Carthage made famous by the bishopric and martyrdom of Cyprian. The table of Cyprian at Carthage.

He governed the Church of Carthage while living, and honored it in dying. There he held the episcopate, there he consummated martyrdom. Indeed, in that very place where he laid down the remains of his flesh, a savage multitude had then gathered, who, due to hatred of Christ, would shed the blood of Cyprian: today, a venerating multitude hastens there, which, for the feast of Cyprian, drinks the blood of Christ. And the more sweetly in that place for the feast of Cyprian is the blood of Christ drunk, as more devoutly there, in the name of Christ, was the blood of Cyprian shed. Finally, as you know, whoever knows Carthage, in that same place, an altar is constructed to God; and yet it is called the table of Cyprian, not because Cyprian ever feasted there, but because he was sacrificed there, and by that very sacrifice he prepared this table, not on which he feasts or is feasted, but on which the sacrifice to God, to whom he himself was offered, is offered. But the reason that that altar, which is of God, is also called of Cyprian, is because as it is now surrounded by worshippers, so there Cyprian was surrounded by persecutors: where now it is honored by friends praying, there Cyprian was trampled by enemies raging: finally, where it is erected, there he was laid low. Sing to God, sing a psalm to His name: who ascends over the sunset, He did these things over the slain. The death of Cyprian is precious. But since Carthage has had his chair, let Carthage hold his memory; wherefore would we celebrate his birth, if the death of his saints were not precious in the sight of the Lord? His sound has gone out into all the earth, and his words to the ends of the world. He faithfully taught what he was to do, he bravely did what he had taught. He arrived at a precious death by living justly, but to a glorious life by dying unjustly; and he obtained the triumphant name of martyr, because he brought the struggle for truth even to bloodshed.

Cyprian is renowned throughout the world for both his martyrdom and his writings. But because he not only spoke what was to be heard, but also wrote what was to be read, and reached other places through foreign languages, and indeed to other places through his own letters, and became known to many regions, partly through the fame of his most strong passion, partly through the sweetness of his most delightful reading: let us cheerfully celebrate this day, and let us all unanimously pray that we may be deemed worthy to hear and see the common father in the greater Church; we shall have both joy from his sermon and progress from the glory of his passion, through our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 311

SERMO 311 On the Birthday of Cyprian the Martyr The solemnities of the martyrs are to be celebrated by the imitation of their virtues. The errors of the flattering world and the terrors of the raging world are overcome by wisdom and patience. This day of festivity has been made for us by the passion of the most blessed martyr Cyprian: the celebration of his victory has gathered us in this place most devoutly. But the celebration of the solemnity of martyrs should be an imitation of their virtues. It is easy to honor the martyr: it is great to imitate the faith and patience of the martyr. Let us act in such a way that we desire this: let us celebrate in such a way that we love that instead. What do we praise in the faith of the martyr? Because he fought for the truth until death and therefore he conquered. He despised the flattering world, he did not yield to its savagery: therefore, he approached God as a victor. Errors and terrors abound in this world: the most blessed Martyr overcame errors with wisdom, terrors with patience. It is great what he did: following the lamb, he conquered the lion. When the persecutor raged, the lion roared: but because the lamb was looked up to, the lion was trampled down: he who destroyed death by death, hung on the wood, shed his blood, redeemed the world. The apostles, confessing what they themselves had seen of the Lord, died. The first blessed Apostles, leaders of the holy flock, saw the Lord Jesus himself hanging, grieved when he was dying, were astonished when he rose again, loved him when he was powerful, and they themselves shed their blood for what they saw. Consider, brothers, what it was like for men to be sent throughout the world, to preach that a man who died rose again and ascended into heaven; and for this preaching to endure everything that an enraged world could inflict—losses, exiles, chains, torments, flames, beasts, crosses, deaths. This for something unknown? For my brothers, was Peter dying for his own glory, or was he preaching himself? One man died, so that another might be honored; one was killed, so that another might be worshiped. Would he have done this, if not for the burning love of charity, from the conscience of truth? They saw what they said: for would they die for a matter they had not seen? They ought to deny what they had seen. They did not deny it: they preached a dead man, whom they knew to be alive. They knew for which life they despised their own life: they knew for which happiness they endured transient unhappiness, for which rewards they scorned these losses. Their faith could not be weighed with the whole world. They had heard: What does it profit a man, if he gains the whole world, but suffers the loss of his soul? The allure of the age did not delay those hastening, those passing away to another life, no matter how brightly shining a happiness must be left behind, not to be transferred to another life, but sometimes even here abandoned by the living.

Martyrs teach by example the contempt of the world.

Therefore, despise the world, Christians; despise the world, despise it. The martyrs despised it, the Apostles despised it, blessed Cyprian despised it, whose memory we celebrate today. You wish to be rich, you wish to be honored, you wish to be healthy: he despised all of this, in whose memory you have gathered. Why, I ask, do you so greatly love what he despised, whom you honor so greatly? If indeed he had not despised these things, you certainly would not honor him so. Why then do I find you a lover of these things, whose despiser you revere? Certainly, if he loved these things, you would not venerate him. And do not you love them: for he did not enter and shut the door against you. Despise them as well; and enter after him. The way to enter is open: Christ is the door. The door remains open for you, since his side was pierced by a lance. Recall what flowed from there; and choose through which you may enter. From the side of the Lord hanging and dying on the wood, after it was pierced by a lance, water and blood flowed forth. In one is your cleansing, in the other is your redemption. The love of earthly things is the snare of the soul.

Love, and do not love: love for one thing, and do not love for another. For there is something to be loved for progress, and there is something to be loved for hindrance. Do not love hindrance, if you do not want to find torment. What you love on earth is a hindrance: it is the birdlime of spiritual wings, that is, of virtues, by which one flies to God. Do you not want to be caught, and yet you love the birdlime? Do you think you are not caught because you are sweetly caught? The more it delights, the more it strangles strongly. I say these things: and you praise, and shout, and love. It is not I who answer you, but wisdom: I want morals, not voices. Praise wisdom by living; not by sounding, but by resonating.

Profane songs and dances were banished from the church, where Cyprian is buried. The Lord says in the Gospel: We sang to you, and you did not dance. When would I say this, if I had not read it? Vanity mocks me, but authority helps me. If I had not specified who said this, who among you could bear me saying: We sang to you, and you did not dance? Is it in this place, even if a Psalm should be sung, that someone should dance? At some time not very many years ago, even this place was invaded by the impudence of dancers. This most holy place, where the body of such a holy Martyr lies, as many who are of age remember; this most holy place, I say, was invaded by the pestilence and impudence of dancers. Throughout the night, wicked things used to be sung here, and people danced to the singing. When the Lord willed, through our holy brother, your bishop, since holy vigils began to be celebrated here, that plague resisted somewhat, but later yielded to diligence, blushed at wisdom. Our song must harmonize with our conduct, as if with a dance.

Therefore, since these things do not happen here now, thanks to God’s mercy, because we do not perform plays for demons, where these things used to happen for the pleasure of those who are worshipped, and in their impurity they used to corrupt their worshipers, but here sacredness and the solemnity of martyrs are celebrated; there is no dancing here, and where there is no dancing, yet it is read from the Gospel: "We played the flute for you, and you did not dance." Those who did not dance are reproved, chastised, accused. Let that wantonness be far from returning; rather hear what wisdom wishes to be understood. He who instructs sings; he who acts dances. What is it to dance but to move the limbs in harmony with the song? What is our song? I will not propose it as my own; let it not be mine. I am better a minister than a performer. I declare our song: "Do not love the world, nor the things that are in the world. If anyone loves the world, the love of the Father is not in him, because all that is in the world—the desire of the flesh, the desire of the eyes, and the pride of life—is not from the Father, but is from the world. And the world is passing away, and its desire, but the one who does the will of God remains forever, just as God remains forever."

Dancers harmonious to the spiritual song with the change of life.

What kind of song, my brothers? You have heard the one singing, let us listen to those dancing: make your conduct consistent with the dancers' movements of limbs. Do this inwardly: let your actions be in harmony. Let desire be uprooted, let love be planted. From that tree, whatever comes forth is good. Desire can generate nothing good: love nothing evil. It is spoken and it is praised; and no one is changed. Far be it, it is not true what I said. The fishermen were changed, afterward even many senators were changed: Cyprian was changed, whose memory we celebrate today. He himself writes, he himself testifies, how once his life was, how nefarious, how impious, how to be condemned, and detested. He heard the one singing: he showed himself, not by body, but by mind dancing. He adapted himself to a good song, he adapted himself to a new song: he adapted, he loved, he persevered, he fought, he overcame.

Bad times do not make men bad, only bad people do. And you say: The times are troublesome, the times are grievous, the times are miserable. Live well, and you will change the times by living well: you change the times, and you will have no reason to murmur. What indeed are the times, my brothers? Spaces and stretches of centuries. The sun rises, and after twelve hours it sets on the other part of the world; it rises again in the morning of another day and sets again; count how many times: these are the times. Whom did the rising of the sun harm? Whom did the setting of the sun harm? Therefore, the time harmed no one. Those who are harmed are people; by whom are they harmed? By people. O great pain! People are harmed, people are robbed, people are oppressed. By whom? Not by lions, not by serpents, not by scorpions; but by people. Those who are harmed grieve. If they could, would they not do what they reproach? We then find a person who murmured, when he could do what he murmured about. I praise, I praise, if he did not do what he accused. From gold, a good man brings forth many good things, a bad man many bad things. But those, dearest ones, who seem powerful in the world, how are they praised when they do less than they can? Scripture praised this one: He who could transgress and did not transgress; who did not go after gold. Gold ought to follow after you, not you after gold. For gold is good. For God did not create anything evil. Do not be evil; and gold is good. Behold, I place gold between a good man and a bad man. The bad one takes it; the needy are oppressed; judges are corrupted, laws are perverted, human affairs are disturbed. Why this? Because the bad man took the gold. The good one takes it; the poor are fed, the naked are clothed, the oppressed are freed, captives are redeemed. How many good things come from the gold that the good man has? how many bad things from the gold that the bad man has? Why then do you sometimes say angrily: Oh, if only there were no such thing as gold? Do not love gold. If you are bad, you go after gold: if you are good, it goes after you. What does it mean, it goes after you? You lead, you are not led: because you possess it, you are not possessed by it. The good among the wicked are not lacking in the Church. The White Mass. Cyprian the chosen grain.

Therefore, let us return to the words of the Holy Scripture. "Who did not go after gold. Who had the power to transgress, and did not transgress." Who is this, and we shall praise him? Who is this, or who is this? How many hear: and who is this? And yet it must not be that I despair there being someone here, indeed not just anyone, but some. It must not be that I despair of the threshing floor of so great a householder. He who sees the floor from afar thinks it is only chaff: he who knows how to inspect finds the grains. Where chaff offends you, there a mass of grains lies hidden. Where what is crushed by threshing offends you, there is what is purified by the threshing floor: it is there, be certain; it is there. Finally, he who sowed, who harvested, who gathered to the floor is certain: he knows there is that from which the granary will be filled, when it has been winnowed. There was a slight, any kind of winnowing at the time of persecution: what grains proceeded from there? Hence flourished the Massa Candida of Utica: hence this most blessed Cyprian, so great and chosen a grain. How many rich then despised what they had? How many poor then fell in temptation? Behold, in that temptation, as if in winnowing, it did not harm the rich to have gold; what did it profit the poor not to have gold? They overcame, they failed. The things of which there is a good and bad use. Some good things are proper to the good, others are common to both good and bad.

Good morals are made only by good loves. Let gold be removed from human affairs: rather, let gold be present, to test human affairs. Let the human tongue be cut off because of blasphemers of God: and whence will there be praisers of God? What harm has the tongue done to you? Let there be one who sings well, and the instrument is good. Give a good mind to the tongue: good things are said, discord is harmonized, mourners are comforted, the wanton are reprimanded, the irate are restrained; God is praised, Christ is commended, the mind is inflamed with love; but divine, not human; spiritual, not carnal. The tongue does these good things. Why? Because the mind that uses the tongue is good. Give an evil person to the tongue: there will be blasphemers, litigators, slanderers, informers. All evils come from the tongue, because the one who uses the tongue is evil.

Let not things be removed from human affairs.

Let not things be taken away from human affairs: let there be things, and let the use of good things be present. For some goods are those which are only found in good people, and others are goods which are common to both good and evil people. The goods which are only found in good people are piety, faith, justice, chastity, prudence, modesty, charity, and others of this kind. The goods which are common to both the good and evil are money, honor, power of this age, administration, and bodily health itself. And these are goods, but they seek good people.

Why are temporal goods given by God to the wicked?

Now, here is that murmurer who always seeks something to criticize; and this in God; who, if only he would return to himself, see himself, criticize himself, correct himself: therefore that critic and arguer will soon object to me in God, "And why does God, who governs everything, give these good things to the wicked? He would not give them unless to the good." Do you expect to hear from me the counsel of God? Who, from whom, and what? Nevertheless, according to my understanding, as much as I can grasp, as much as He deigns to grant, I tell you what perhaps might not suffice for you, but there is someone here to whom it suffices. Therefore, let me sing: for indeed in this great multitude I cannot fail to find someone who will dance. Behold, listen, wise one, but from the contrary: listen. That God gives these good things even to the wicked, if you wish to understand, is for your instruction, not the perversity of God. I still know you have not understood what I have said: therefore listen to what I was saying, that one to whom I was speaking, who criticizes God and accuses God, because He gives these earthly and temporal goods even to wicked men, which according to your sense you think He ought to have given only to the good. Hence it is from this that some have fallen into deadly impiety to entirely believe that God does not look upon human affairs. For they say and argue: “Would that one have riches, that one have honors, that one have power if God attended to human affairs? God does not care for human affairs: for if He cared, He would give these things only to the good."

Therefore even to the wicked they are given, so that they may be despised by the good, and better things may be sought. What kind of good are riches?

Return to your heart, and from there to God. For you will return to God from your neighbor, if you will return to your heart. For when these things offend you, you have left yourself: you have become an exile from your own breast. You are moved by the things that are outside yourself, and you lose yourself. You are inside, these things lie outside; they are good, but they are outside. Gold, silver, all money, clothing, clientele, families, livestock, honors, are outside. If these lower goods, terrestrial goods, temporary goods, transient goods, were not given also to evildoers, they would be greatly esteemed by good men. Therefore, God who gives these goods to evil people teaches you to desire better things. Behold, I say, with this moderation of human matters, in a certain way your Father God speaks to you: and as if teaching a foolish child, He speaks these words, which, as I can, I utter to you, the more confidently, as He deigns to dwell in me. Imagine saying to God, who has renewed and adopted you: O son, what is it that you rise daily, and pray, and kneel, and strike your forehead to the ground, and sometimes even weep, and say to me: My Father, my God, give me riches? If I give them to you, do you think you have attained something good and great?

Because you asked, you received: behold, do well with it. Before you had it, you were humble: you began to have riches, and you despised the poor. What kind of good is it, from which you have become worse? You have become worse, because you were bad: and you did not know what could make you worse; therefore you were asking these things from me. I gave, and tested: you found, and you were found. You were hiding when you did not have it. Correct yourself: vomit out greed, drink love. What is great that you ask from me, your God says to you? Do you not see to whom I have given these things? Do you not see to what kind of people I have given these things? If it were a great good that you ask from me, would a thief have it? would a traitor have it? would my blasphemer have it? would a notorious mime have it? would an impudent prostitute have it? Would all these people have gold, if gold were a great good? But you say to me: Is gold not good, then? Indeed, gold is good. But the wicked make evil out of good gold; the good make good out of good gold. Therefore, because you see to whom I have given these; ask for better things from me, ask for greater things from me; ask for spiritual things from me, ask for me myself from me. The world, having become bitter, does not cease to be bitter; what if it were sweet.

But, you say, there are evils in the world: harsh, filthy, hateful things. The covenant is foul, it should not be loved. Behold, it is such as this, and thus it is loved. The house is in ruins, and it is hard to move. Mothers or nurses, when they see that children have grown and should no longer be nourished by milk, if they still cling to the breast, smear their nipples with some bitterness, so that the child, offended, does not seek milk further. So why then is it still sucked so delightfully, if the world has become bitter to you? God filled the world with bitterness; and you gape after it, lean upon it, suck it; you take pleasure only from this and that. How long? What if it were sweet? How would it be loved? Do these things offend you? Choose another life. Love God, despise these things. Despise human affairs, whenever you are to depart from here: for you will not always be here. And yet, as bad as the world is, as bitter as it is, as full of calamities as it is, if it had been told to you by God that you would be here forever, wouldn't you be delighted, exult, give thanks? Why?

Because you would not end the misery. That is the greatest misfortune, which compels itself to be loved. It would be lesser if it were not loved: the greater the evil, the more it is loved.

There is another life, my brothers: there is another life after this life, believe it. Prepare yourselves for it: despise all present things. If you have, do good with it: if you do not have, do not burn with desire. Emigrate, transfer before you: let what you have here go to where you will follow. Hear the counsel of your Lord: Do not store up treasure for yourselves on earth, where moth and rust destroy, and where thieves break in and steal; but store up for yourselves treasure in heaven, where neither thief approaches nor moth destroys. For where your treasure is, there also is your heart. You hear daily, faithful man, Lift up your heart: and as if you hear the contrary, you sink your heart into the earth. Emigrate. Do you have means? Do well. Do you not have means? Do not murmur against God. Hear me, oh poor ones: What do you lack, if you have God? Hear me, oh rich ones: What do you have, if you do not have God?

Sermons - Sermon 312

SERMO 312 On the Birthday of Cyprian the Martyr The martyr is to be praised not in himself, but in the Lord. The solemnity of such a grateful and joyous day, and the so happy and joyful feast of such a great Martyr's crown, demands a speech due from me. But his prayers bear such a burden with me; that if I were to repay anything less than what is due, let him not despise me speaking to you, but let him refresh all by praying for you. Indeed, I will do what I know to be most pleasing to him, that I may praise him in the Lord, while I praise the Lord concerning him. For he was gentle, even when he endured the dangers of this turbulent and stormy life in various temptations, and that man knew well how to sing to God with a truthful heart: "The meek shall hear and be glad." And now, having left the land of the dying, the blessed one possesses the land of the living. For he was one of those of whom it is said: "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." But what land, if not that of which it is said to God: "You are my hope, my portion in the land of the living?" Or if the land of the living is not, unless it is the body of those rising again, taken from the earth and transformed into heavenly glory; he is not yet groaning in the frailty of this mortality, to whom remaining in the flesh was not the best, but necessary for our sake; but released and freed from the bond and debt of this connection, he quietly awaits the redemption of his body. For he who was not overcome by the temptation of his living flesh, is secure about the restoration of it buried.

Cyprian: what he was like before his conversion to the faith.

Therefore, let his soul praise in the Lord, so that the meek may hear and rejoice. Let a good soul praise in the Lord, by whom she is made good, by whose inspiration she flourishes, by whose illumination she shines, by whose formation she is beautiful, by whose filling she is fruitful. For having been deserted by Him, she was once dead, dark, deformed, sterile, and floating aimlessly before she believed in Christ. For what did eloquence profit the pagan, by which he both drank and offered deadly errors as if from a precious cup? But when the kindness and humanity of our Savior God shone upon him, he cleansed him, believing in Him, from worldly desires and made him a vessel of honor, useful to His house, prepared for every good work. And he did not keep silent about this as an ingrate. For far be it from him, knowing God, not to glorify Him as God: but he gave thanks, not impiously reswallowing what he had vomited, but piously recalling what he had changed. For he wrote to his friend, so that he too might become light in the Lord from the darkness, which was in himself: "When I, he said, lay in darkness and blind night, and was tossed to and fro on the fluctuating sea of the world, swaying and uncertain with wandering steps, unaware of my life, alien to truth and light." And shortly after: "For I myself," he said, "was held bound by the many errors of my former life, from which I did not believe I could free myself; thus, I was obeying the adhering vices, and in despair of better things, I was favoring my own evils as if they were already my own and native to me." By the grace of God, Cyprian was truly converted.

Behold what manner of man Christ found in Cyprian: behold into what kind of soul that eradicator and planter approached to wound and to heal. For not in vain does He say: "I will kill, and I will make to live; I will strike, and I will heal"; nor in vain was it said to Jeremiah as a figure of future things: "Behold, I have set thee this day over the nations and over the kingdoms, to root out, and to pull down, and to destroy, and to build, and to plant." Thus He approached that soul as an eradicator and planter; and He overturned the old Cyprian, and laying there as a foundation Himself, He built a new Cyprian in Himself, and made a true Cyprian from Himself. For the Church says to Christ: "The cluster of Cyprus, my little brother." When therefore he was made a Christian by Christ, then truly was he also made Cyprian from the cypress. For he was made a good fragrance of Christ in every place, as the Apostle Paul says: who also himself was destroyed as a persecutor and built as a preacher. "We are," says he, "a sweet savor of Christ unto God, in every place, both in them that are saved, and in them that perish: to the one indeed the aroma of life unto life, but to the others the aroma of death unto death. And who is sufficient for these things?" For some lived by imitating Cyprian: others perished by envying Cyprian.

Having been made from a courtroom orator to a preacher of Christ. To Him be praise, to Him be glory, who justified the soul of His servant by faith, rescuing him from the impious, and made His sword, that is, the double-edged sword; so that through it the folly of the Gentiles, once concealed and veiled, appearing beautiful to the prudent, might be exposed and struck; and so that the noble instrument of eloquence, by which unworthy ornaments were made for the doctrines of demons, might be converted to the edification of the Church, by whose growth they might fall; and so that the trumpet of such a great voice, which used to sharpen the contests of forensic lies, might inspire devoted martyrs to fight for Christ and to glory in Him, thereby overthrowing the devil with the precious deaths of the saints. Among these was Cyprian himself, whose pious and holy eloquence, no longer dispelling fabulous fumes, but shining with the radiance of the Lord, lived by dying, judged the judge, overcame the adversary by being struck, and killed death by being killed. For he who had taught both his own tongue and those of others to speak lies in the school of human perversion, so that what was alleged by the adversary might be deceitfully denied, had now learned in another school to defeat the adversary by confessing. For where the enemy converts the name of Christ into a crime, there Christ converts the punishment into praise. The victory of the martyrs over the demons is now evident. And if anyone still seeks to know who has overcome, to pass over the heavenly kingdom of the saints, which the unbelievers refuse to believe in because they cannot see it; now on this earth, in this life, in homes, in fields, in cities around the world, behold, there are fervent praises of the martyrs: where are the furious accusations of the impious? Behold how the memories of those slain are honored; now let them show the idols of demons. What will they do in judgment against those who, by dying, have overthrown their temples? How will they condemn the proud deceits of those rising soldiers with the splendor of their own, who have extinguished their smoking altars with the blood of the dying?

Cyprian excelling among martyrs by teaching and example. The place of his burial. The benefits of grace in Cyprian. How much Cyprian loved the unity of the Church.

Among the legions of Christ, the most blessed Cyprian, teacher of glorious battles and himself a glorious warrior, taught what he was about to do, and did what he taught; so that in the words of the teacher the spirit of a martyr was prefigured, and in the spirit of the sufferer the words of the teacher were recognized. For he was not like those of whom the Lord said: "Do and observe whatever they tell you, but not the works they do: for they preach, but do not practice." He believed, therefore he spoke; he spoke, therefore he suffered. Thus, he taught in life what he did; and he did in death what he taught. To Him be praise, to Him be glory, the Lord our God, the King of ages, Creator and Recreator of men, who enriched the Church of this city with such a prelate and consecrated the greatness of this place with so holy a body. To Him be praise, to Him be glory, who deigned to predestine this man among His saints before time, to create him among men at an opportune time, to call him when erring, to cleanse him when defiled, to form him when believing, to teach him when obeying, to guide him when teaching, to aid him when fighting, to crown him when victorious. To Him be praise, to Him be glory, who made him such that he might show forth to His Church how many evils should be opposed and how many goods should be preferred to charity, and that there could be no charity in a Christian who did not maintain the unity of Christ. He loved this unity so much that he would not spare the wicked for the sake of charity, and would tolerate the wicked for the sake of peace; he was free in speaking what he thought, and pacific in hearing what he knew his brothers thought. Rightly did he merit the exaltation of such great honor in the Catholic Church, whose bond of concord he preserved with such humility. Therefore, beloved, having duly rendered our speech to this joyful festivity as we were able, I exhort your love and devotion that we conduct this day honorably and soberly, and dedicate to this day, on which the most blessed Cyprian suffered, what he loved that he might suffer.

Sermons - Sermon 313

SERMO 313 On the Birthday of Cyprian the Martyr No tongue is equal to the praises of Cyprian. The most holy and solemn day, and likewise more familiar and illustrious to this Church as an ornament, has dawned today to bring us joy, which Cyprian the most blessed has illuminated for us with the glory of his passion. No tongue would suffice for the praises of this revered bishop and venerable martyr, not even if he himself were to praise him. Therefore, in this our sermon, which we duly render to your ears about him, approve more the affection of the will than demand the effect of the capability. For thus also concerning the praises of God, of which not only is no speech but not even any thought sufficient, when the holy praiser recognized himself as less adequate, he said: Make the voluntary offerings of my mouth acceptable, Lord. This I also would say: even let this be my devotion, that if I am not equal to explaining what I wish, it is accepted because I wish. The praises of the martyrs return to God. For what are the praises of a great Martyr but the praises of God? Or whose honor is it that Cyprian turned to God with all his heart, except his to whom it was said, "O God of hosts, restore us"? Whose work is it that Cyprian is a teacher, except his to whom it was said, "Teach me your decrees"? Whose work is it that Cyprian is a shepherd, except his who said, "I will give you shepherds after my own heart, and they will lead you with knowledge and understanding"? Whose work is it that Cyprian is a confessor, except his who said, "I will give you a mouth and wisdom, which none of your adversaries will be able to resist"? Whose work is it that Cyprian endured such a great persecution for the truth, except his to whom it was said, "O Israel's patience, O Lord"; and of whom it was said, "For from him comes my patience"? Lastly, whose work is it that Cyprian is victorious in all things, except his of whom it was said, "In all these things we are more than conquerors through him who loved us"? Therefore, we do not depart from the praises of God when we praise the works of God and the battles of God in the soldier of God.

Martyrs are armed by God, and they are helped by the same armed one. For thus the Apostle exhorts: Stand, gird your loins with truth, and put on the breastplate of righteousness, and shod your feet with the preparation of the Gospel of peace: above all, taking the shield of faith, with which you can quench all the fiery darts of the wicked one; and take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God. What does it mean to be clothed in the breastplate of righteousness, and to take the shield of faith, and the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God, except to be armed with the gifts of the Lord? Nor would it suffice for this soldier to be armed, unless he had obtained to be aided by the very armorer, by whom he had been armed. For the most righteous Martyr did not refrain from praying in that conflict of suffering, saying: Judge, O Lord, those who harm me, fight against those who fight against me. Take hold of armor and shield, and rise up for my help. Draw out the spear, and stop those who pursue me: say to my soul, I am your Salvation. How could he be defeated, whom the Lord thus led forth armed, whom He thus helped being armed? The armed God, how he is to be understood. The Sword of God, the Church. The Sword of God, the soul of the just. But far be it from us to believe with a childish heart that God is armed with certain bodily instruments. For what kind of arms are those with which God's soldiers are accustomed to be aided by an armed God?

Those who are aided confess themselves when they exclaim and give thanks saying: Lord, with the shield of good will, you have crowned us. The sword of God, that is, the sword of God, which the body of Christ, which is the Church, prays to be poured out and directed against those who persecute them; indeed, it can be understood where the Savior himself says to His body: I have not come to bring peace to the earth, but a sword. With this spiritual sword, He has separated from His martyrs the earthly affections that badly charm them from the heavenly joys they desire, which would recall them from heaven to earth, were it not for the sword of Christ to cut them off. But there is also another very evident sword of God, the soul of the just in the hand of God; of which it is said to Him in the Psalm: Rescue my soul from the impious, your sword from the enemies of your hand. That which he said, my soul; this he repeated, your sword; that which he said, from the impious; this he repeated, from the enemies of your hand. The great spear of God, the soul of Cyprian. An altar erected over the body of Cyprian.

He sent forth this sword by spreading everywhere his martyrs: and he restrained against those who persecuted the Church; so that because they were not moved by the voices of those who preached, they might be broken by the virtues of those who died. For God indeed made for himself strong weapons against enemies, even those whom he made friends. Therefore, the most blessed Cyprian’s soul, the great sword of God, splendid with love, sharp with truth, moved and wielded with the strength of fighting God, what battles did it complete? What crowds of contradicters did it overcome by reproving? How many hostile ones did it strike? How many adversaries did it overthrow? In how many hearts of enemies did it kill those very enmities by which he was being attacked, and made them friends by whom God might fight even more abundantly against others? But when the time came, as if he were to be seized by overwhelming enemies, he did not yield to their hands, oppressed and defeated by the impious; rather, he was present through that one by whom he might remain unconquered: he received the victory, once no further struggle remained, except that which he would bring back from this world and from the prince of this world. He was indeed at hand for his most faithful witness fighting for the truth even unto death, did what had been asked of him, drew out his soul from the impious, his sword from the enemies' hands. We adorn with the grandeur of this divine altar the holy flesh of whose victorious soul, as if it were the scabbard of that sword, to be restored to the same soul with the triumphal resurrection and never to be laid down again by any further death.

Sermons - Sermon 313A

Sermon 313 Held at Carthage at the table of the blessed martyr Cyprian On His Birth, the 18th day before the Kalends of October Two things make the way of Christians narrow. The holy solemnity of the most blessed martyr, which has gathered us in the name of the Lord, demands something to be said about the merits and glory of such a martyr: but nothing can be said worthily; for human language could perhaps suffice to speak of his virtues and glory, if he himself had wished to praise himself. Nevertheless, let us praise him more with devotion than with ability, or rather let us praise the Lord in him; the Lord in him, and him in the Lord. For what would he be without the Lord, as the voice of the martyrs from the Psalm was heard when it was read just now: Our help is in the name of the Lord. If the help of all of us is in the name of the Lord, how much more of the martyrs! Where the fight is greater, greater help is necessary. For there are two things that make the way of Christians narrow: the rejection of pleasure, and the endurance of suffering. You conquer, whoever battles. If you overcome what pleases and frightens. I say, you conquer, Christian, whoever battles, if you overcome what pleases and frightens. One thing that pleases, another that frightens. It concerns the glory of the martyrs. It is easy to celebrate the solemnities of the martyrs; it is difficult to imitate the sufferings of the martyrs. The gates of desire and fear. The dual meaning of the name of the world. Good and bad habits are made only by good or bad loves. How great are the evils of triple concupiscence.

Narrow and difficult, as I began to say, is the way of Christians for two reasons: contempt for pleasure and endurance of suffering. Therefore, whoever contends, let him know that he contends with the whole world; and contending with the whole world, let him conquer these two, and he conquers the world. Let him conquer whatever entices, let him conquer whatever threatens; for pleasure is false, punishment fleeting. If you wish to enter through the narrow gate, close the gates of desire and fear; for by these the tempter attempts to overthrow the soul. By the door of desire, he tempts with promises; by the door of fear, he tempts with threats. There is something to desire so that you do not desire these things; there is something to fear so that you do not fear these things. Let desire not be taken away but changed; let fear not be extinguished, but transferred to another. What did you desire when you yielded to the flattering world? What did you desire? The pleasure of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, the ambition of the age. I do not know what kind of three-headed dog this is from hell. But listen to the apostle John, who was leaning on the Lord's chest and in the Gospel belched what he drank at the feast of Christ; hear him saying: Do not love the world, nor the things in the world. If anyone loves the world, the love of the Father is not in him; for all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life. Therefore, heaven and earth are called the world. He does not blame the world itself who says: Do not love the world; for he who blames this world blames the maker of the world. Hear the world named twice in the same place under different meanings. It was said of the Lord Christ: He was in the world, and the world was made through him, and the world did not know him. The world was made through him: Our help is in the name of the Lord, who made heaven and earth. The world was made through him: I lift my eyes to the mountains, from where help will come to me. My help is from the Lord, who made heaven and earth. This world was made by God, and the world did not know him. Which world did not know him? The lover of the world, the admirer of the work, the despiser of the maker. Let your love migrate: break the bonds from the creature, tie it to the Creator. Change your love, change your fear; for nothing makes habits good or bad except good or bad loves. A great man, someone might say, is good and great. How, I ask? He knows many things. I ask what he loves, not what he knows. Therefore, do not love the world, nor the things in the world. If anyone loves the world, the love of the Father is not in him: For all that is in the world - certainly in the lovers of the world - what are in the lovers of the world, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life. In the lust of the flesh is pleasure; in the lust of the eyes is curiosity; in the pride of life is arrogance. Whoever conquers these three, nothing at all remains to be conquered in desire. Many branches, but a triple root. How many evils the desire for carnal pleasure has, how many evils it causes! From there come adulteries, fornications; from there come luxuries, drunkenness; from there comes whatever illicitly titillates the senses and penetrates the mind with poisonous pleasure, enslaves the mind to the flesh, drives out the ruler from the stronghold, and subjects the commander to the servant. And what right thing can a man do when perverse within himself?

Against theatrical spectacles.

What evils are brought about by base curiosity, the vain desire of the eyes, the greed for frivolous spectacles, the madness of stadiums, with no reward for the conflicts of contests! Charioteers compete for some prize; for what prize do the people quarrel over the charioteers? But it delights to see the charioteer, the hunter, the actor. Does shameful pleasure so please the honorable? Change also the desire for spectacles; the Church offers your mind more honorable and revered spectacles. Just now, the passion of blessed Cyprian was being read; we were hearing with our ear, seeing with our mind, watching him compete, fearing somewhat for his danger, but hoping for God's assistance. Finally, do you wish to know quickly what the difference is between our spectacles and those of the theater? We, as far as sound mind prevails in us, desire to imitate the martyrs whom we watch; we, I say, desire to imitate the holy martyrs whom we watch competing. Honestly, spectator, when you watch in the theaters, you would be insane if you dared to imitate whom you love. Behold, I watch Cyprian, I love Cyprian. If you get angry, curse me, and say: “May you be such.” I watch, I am delighted, as much as I can embrace with the arms of my mind: I see the competitor, I rejoice in the victor. Get angry, as I said, and say to me: “May you be such!” See if I do not embrace, see if I do not desire, see if I do not wish, see if I cannot say I am unworthy, yet I cannot refuse to flee and turn away. You watch, you delight, you love. Do not get angry if I say: “May you be such!” But I refrain, I do not say; acknowledge a friend, change spectacles with me. Let us love those whom we are not ashamed of; let us love those whom we wish to imitate, as far as we can. But is the one who is watched infamous; the one who watches honest? Let the desire of the buyer cease, and there will be no shame for sale. By watching infamy, you confirm it. Why provoke what you accuse? I wonder if the infamy of your loved ones does not stain you. But let it not stain you, let your honesty remain unblemished, if it can, spectator of lusts, buyer of shameful pleasures. Do I dare to prohibit spectacles? I dare to prohibit, I certainly dare; this place gives me confidence, and He who placed me in this place. The holy martyr was able to endure raging pagans; should I not dare to instruct Christian listeners? Should I fear silent offenses when he despised open rages? I will certainly speak: I will surely be convicted in the hearts of the listeners if I speak falsely. The ancient Roman discipline did very well, very well indeed, which assigned every kind of actor to an infamous place. No honor for them in the court, not even in the plebeian tribe; removed from the respectable on all sides, set up for sale to the respectable. What have you removed from the court for dignity, and placed for yourself in the theater for pleasure? Let your pleasure be in harmony with your dignity. And the poor souls themselves are enslaved to the voices of the spectators, the desires of the spectators, the insane pleasures of the spectators. Remove all these things, they are freed; he who does not wish to watch shows mercy to them. The opinion of C. Sallustius is praised.

These things are said about the lust of the eyes. How much evil the ambition of the world holds! There is all pride: and what is worse than pride? Hear the sentence of the Lord: God resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble. Therefore, the ambition of the world is also wicked. Someone might say: Without it, the powers of the world cannot function. They certainly can. Some author of theirs said: Each blames the authors for their affairs. They certainly can. A ruler is placed in power; let him rule himself, and he has ruled. But does the human mind proceed to arrogance? Let arrogance be restrained: let him recognize that he is a human, who judges another human. The dignity is different, but the fragility itself is common. Whoever thinks this piously and sanctly, and has power, does not proceed to arrogance. Cyprian overcame all these things. For what did he not overcome, who disdained life itself, overflowing with all temptations? The judge threatened him with death; he confessed Christ, ready to die for Christ. When death comes, no ambition remains, no curiosity of the eyes, no craving for dirty and carnal pleasures; one despised life, and all things are overcome.

Indeed, Cyprian was made an altar to God.

Therefore let the blessed one be praised in the Lord. When could this happen, if the Lord had not helped? When could he conquer, if the spectator, who was preparing the crown for the victor, had not supplied strength to the struggler? He indeed rejoices and he rejoices for us, not for himself, when he is praised in the Lord. For he is very gentle, and it is written: My soul shall rejoice in the Lord; let the gentle hear and be glad. He was gentle: he wishes his soul to be praised in the Lord. Let his soul be praised in the Lord. Let his body also be honored, because precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints. Let it be celebrated reverently, as by Christians it should be celebrated. For we do not set up an altar, as to a god, to Cyprian, but we made Cyprian an altar to the true God.

Sermons - Sermon 313B

SERMON 313/B Held in the same place and on the day of the martyr.

Birthday of the aforementioned A multitude of praising people succeeded the throngs of the frenzied ones.

We have sung a psalm: Blessed be the Lord, who has not given us as prey to their teeth. Due gratitude for the gifts of God. Blessed be the Lord, who has not given us as prey to their teeth. It is certainly a voice of gratitude, and worthy gratitude. And when are human thanks sufficient for such divine gifts? When in this place the most blessed martyr shed sacred blood, I do not know whether such a crowd of raging people was here, as there is now a multitude of praising people. I say again—for it delights me indeed, to see people gathered in the house of the Lord with the utmost piety in this place, and to compare times with times—hence I say again and repeat, and commend to your senses, with as much devotion as I can; when in this place the most blessed martyr shed sacred blood, I do not know whether such a crowd of raging people was here, as there is now a multitude of praising people. But even if there was, blessed be the Lord, who has not given us as prey to their teeth. When they were killing, they believed they had won; they were being conquered by those dying, and they rejoiced. If they were conquered, surely they raged. Therefore, the crowd of raging people has departed, and the multitude of praising people has succeeded. Let the multitude of praising people say, say: Blessed be the Lord, who has not given us as prey to their teeth. To whose teeth? To the teeth of enemies, to the teeth of the impious, to the teeth of the persecutors of Jerusalem, to the teeth of Babylon, to the teeth of the hostile city, to the teeth of the crowd raging in crimes, to the teeth of the crowd persecuting the Lord, abandoning the Creator, turning to the creature, worshipping what is made by hand, despising the One by whom it was made. Blessed be the Lord, who has not given us as prey to their teeth.

How the martyrs avoided the hunters' nets. What kind of prey Cyprian would have been for Babylon. The fertility of the earth from the blood of the martyrs. The voice of the martyrs is: surely it is the voice of those who preferred to be killed for the name of Christ, rather than live by denying Christ. Therefore, if they wanted to kill, these were killed; they did what they wanted, these suffered; how: Blessed be the Lord, who did not give us as prey to their teeth? What kind of gratitude is: Blessed be the Lord, who did not give us as prey to their teeth? Because the persecutors did not wish to kill, but to devour, that is, to transfer into their own body. They were pagans, they were impious, they were worshippers of demons and idols; they wanted to do this to us when they desired to devour us. Consider what we do with food when we eat. What indeed do we do, but transfer it into our body? It was the body of the impious: they devoured those who consented to their impiety; without a doubt, they passed into their body. Therefore, the martyrs, being pressed to deny Christ and adore the idol, stood firm, scorned the idol, confessed Christ, and did not consent to transfer into their body. Let them say, let them say gloriously, let them say happily, let them say truly: Blessed be the Lord, who did not give us as prey to their teeth. The net is treachery, the net is impiety, the net is the denial of Christ. The nets were stretched. You hear the hunters. If you wish to beware of the hunters, despise those who terrify. You know what hunters do. They stretch the nets from one side, and from the other side they frighten the beasts, which they drive into the nets. Do you fear the evil with which you are terrified? Worse is that which you flee. Therefore, the holy martyrs, seeing where the hunters stretched the nets - for the persecutor threatened death, so that the Savior would be denied - suffered, but by suffering were not captured. With what fatness of prey, with what richness of hunting would impious Babylon be fed, if Bishop Cyprian denied the Lord! With what richness, with what hunting, what excellent prey would impious Babylon be fed, if by Bishop Cyprian, the teacher of the nations, the frustrator of idols, the betrayer of demons, the converter of pagans, the confirmer of Christians, the inflamer of martyrs; if by such a great man the Lord were denied, with what hunting would impious Babylon rejoice! Blessed be the Lord, who did not give us as prey to their teeth. They raged, they persecuted, they tortured, they imprisoned, they bound, they struck, they burned, they set beasts upon; Christ was not denied, the confessor of the Lord was crowned. They lost their savagery, the martyrs found glory. Blessed be the Lord, says the Christian people, let them wholly say, it is fitting that they say: Blessed be the Lord, who did not give us as prey to their teeth. Let this place now say: it is filled with a people of confessors, filled with a people worshiping the one true God; let this place say: for this harvest was sown when that place was watered with the blood of the martyr. Do not wonder, earth, at your fertility, if you are irrigated, so that you may sprout this. The Church of Christ also has teeth, with which it converts the very powers of the world onto itself.

Therefore blessed is the Lord, who did not give us as prey to their teeth. With what strength were we snatched from the teeth of the wicked? We claim nothing for ourselves, we do not attribute this to our power. Blessed is the Lord, who did not give us as prey to their teeth. What were we when we, weak ones, were terrified by the strong, humble by the lofty, needy by the rich, lacking by the abundant? What were we, unless our help was in the name of the Lord, he who made heaven and earth? Rejoice, rejoice, Jerusalem: rejoice also you, not given into the teeth of hunters; rejoice also you: you too have teeth. Your teeth are like a flock of shorn sheep. You also have teeth, O holy Jerusalem, city of God, Church of Christ, you too have teeth. It is said to you in the Song of Songs: "Your teeth are like a flock of shorn sheep coming up from the washing, all of them bearing twins, and not one among them is barren." Well, well, that you did not fear the teeth of Babylon. The teeth of Babylon were the powers of the world; the teeth of Babylon were the teachers of illicit rites. To these teeth you were not given. Recognize your teeth: do what they wanted to do. Turn yourself: you too have teeth. Your teeth are like a flock of shorn sheep. What does "shorn" mean? Laying down worldly burdens. What does "shorn" mean? Putting off fleeces, as burdens of worldly load. Those were your teeth, about which it is written in the Acts of the Apostles, that they sold all their possessions, and laid the prices of their goods at the Apostles' feet, so that distribution was made to each as needed. You obtained the fleeces of your shorn ones. That flock ascended from the washing of holy baptism. All bore twins, because they fulfilled two commandments. You remember, you recalled, you cried out as instructed, when I mentioned the two commandments; and what they were, I did not say, yet I received a witness from the voice of your heart. You recognized. Yet I say it for those who seldom come to the church. The Lord says, the most truthful teacher says, the prince of martyrs says: "You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind; and you shall love your neighbor as yourself." On these two commandments hang all the Law and the Prophets. Therefore, your teeth triumphed because they bore such twins. It is said to you who have such teeth, it is said to you, O Church, in the figure of the most blessed Peter: "Rise, kill and eat." It was said to Peter - when the vessel was let down from heaven in the figure of all animals carrying all peoples - to hungry Peter, that is, to the eager Church: "Rise, why do you hunger? Rise, food is prepared for you. You have teeth: Kill and eat." Kill what they are, make them what you are; kill what they are, turn them into what you are. You heard well, having such teeth, you killed well, you ate well. Those very judges, whom you did not fear, you attracted to yourself; those very powers of the world, whom you did not fear, you converted into yourself; you despised the raging ones, you made them honoring ones. It was fulfilled, which was promised to your Lord: "And all the kings of the earth will worship Him, all nations will serve Him."

Many of Cyprian's persecutors later believed.

These persecutors did not believe when they were raging. How many of those persecutors, who saw the most blessed Cyprian shedding blood, bending his knees, offering his neck to the striker, saw this, watched this, exulted in such a spectacle, insulted the dying here! How many of them, which I do not doubt, later believed! There is no doubt, it must be believed without doubt. The Jews, killers of Christ, who shook their heads insulting him as he hung, and spoke whatever words they wanted against him, later believed in that very Lord whom they crucified. For surely the voice of the Healer hanging on the cross, making a remedy of health for the frantic from his blood, could not be in vain. And indeed, that voice could not be in vain or empty: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. Clearly, it was not in vain. There was a multitude of those for whom that voice rang out from the mouth of Truth. For later, at the miracle, when the Holy Spirit came from heaven, and the Apostles spoke in all the tongues of nations, struck by the sudden miracle, pricked to the heart, they turned to him whom they had killed, and believing, drank the blood which they had shed in rage. It surely cannot be doubted that also many of those who impiously watched the blessed Cyprian, a holy martyr of Christ, being killed, believed in his Lord, and perhaps even shed their blood for the name of Christ by imitating him. Finally, it may be uncertain regarding those; regarding those who were present at that place then, who saw the holy Cyprian struck in this place, it is uncertain whether they believed. Surely all these, or almost all, whose exulting voices I hear, are the sons of those who insulted.

Sermons - Sermon 313C

SERMON 313/C Treatise on the Birth of Saint Cyprian A Sermon Held in Carthage. The Common Counsel of the Holy Martyrs. The illustrious martyr of Christ, through whom He most notably ruled, increased, adorned, and illuminated the Church, is remembered by today's anniversary celebration of his passion. This celebration does not recall something that has passed but more joyfully and gratefully commends it to our memory as fixed and enduring. Therefore, it is fitting for us to praise his soul in the Lord with a solemn discourse, so that the meek may hear and be glad. Indeed, while that soul dwelled in these mortal members, it despised the death that would eventually come, to acquire an everlasting life; by faithful and prudent counsel, losing what would perish even if retained, to find what could not perish. For if temporal life is retained by denying Christ, it ends, and eternal life is not found. How much wiser, then, to neglect the one and gain the other, rather than to lose both by poorly loving the one? This is the common counsel of the holy martyrs, the common trade: to scorn what is fleeting, so that what is permanent may be won; to live by dying, lest they die by living: and to eternally live after dying once, rather than to die twice and not merit to live thereafter, by postponing the death that is to come, and when it finally comes, not coming to the everlasting life. This, I say, is the common counsel, the common trade of the holy martyrs. They learned this from their teacher, redeemer, and Lord, who said to all: "He who loves his life will lose it, and he who loses it for my sake will find it in eternal life." Consequently, a soul perishes if it is loved, and is found if it is lost; let it perish if it loves, lest it perish when it is loved. The statement can be understood in two ways: "He who loves his life will lose it." He who loves his life in this world will lose it in the age to come; and: he who loves his life in the age to come will lose it in this world. According to the former sense, he who loves his life by fearing to die for Christ will lose it so as not to live in Christ; and he who loves his life so as to live in Christ will lose it by dying for Christ. For it follows: "And he who loses it for my sake will find it in eternal life." He who said "for my sake" is the true God and eternal life.

Cyprian taught about Christ, lived in Christ, died for Christ. He takes his name from Cyprus. Everywhere in the world his writings are read, his feast is celebrated. A list of his books is woven.

Therefore, since this is the duty of all the saints, our martyr today has not only a reward for himself but also for many others. For he spread the good fragrance of Christ far and wide by teaching, living, and dying; teaching about Christ, living in Christ, dying for Christ. Therefore, beloved, since in this case, none other than Christ can be understood, where the Church, the bride, says: "My beloved is a cluster of henna," signifying the most fragrant of graces by an aromatic tree; clearly, just as he was made a Christian by Christ in his true faith, so he became Cyprian in the good fragrance of henna. For the apostle Paul also says: "We are the good fragrance of Christ in every place." Thus, the good fragrance of Christ in our Cyprian came from this seat; not because it was sufficient only for this city, nor only for Africa, of which this is the head; but it spread so far and wide that from the rising to the setting of the sun, the name of the Lord is praised in him, in whom his soul will be praised, so that the meek may hear and be glad. For what region on earth can be found where his eloquence is not read, his teaching praised, his charity loved, his life proclaimed, his death venerated, and the feast of his passion celebrated? How many warriors against the devil did the trumpet of his words incite by the example of his passion! How many thereafter not only reading his words but also admiring his fame, learned to love, and by loving, followed him! By teaching, he preempted some to be imitated; by suffering, he led some to follow. He confounded the mouths of those barking against the doctrine of Christ; returned virgins to Christ, not beautiful in body and color, but in behavior; broke the stings of jealousy and envy, and restrained their poisons; disputed healthily about the Lord's Prayer so that we understand what we ask for; and he made a booklet for the fallen, pastoring with advice and compassionate clemency, brought down the contemptuous to the humility of sorrow, and lifted the sorrowful from the depths of despair; praised, persuaded, and exhibited patience; shattered the presumptuousness of heretics through the demonstration and preaching of unity; while discussing mortality, and recommending the joys of immortal life, he erased all fear of dying and sorrow of mourning from the souls of the faithful; convicted the vainest and most pernicious worship of idols even by the testimony of secular letters; inflamed Christian hearts to the greatest usefulness and reward of almsgiving, refuting earthly greed. And what more can I say? Many everywhere keep his large body of writings. But let us give greater thanks to the Lord because we have merited to have a holy body of his members; where we pour out our prayers to the Lord, to whom it has pleased, and by whose grace he was such, with more ardent affection, and praise Him in the Lord, through whom we rejoice that He has been praised so.

Sermons - Sermon 313D

Sermon 313/D TREATISE ON THE BIRTHDAY OF CYPRIAN The Gospel of Mark 8:34 and following, together with John 12:25, had been read. For the festival of the martyr, a crowd of brothers and sisters had gathered.

Today we celebrate the holy solemnity of his martyr, who sent many martyrs before him by his word, and led many after him by his example. What then can we offer worthy of such a great matter to such a great one, except that he does not expect to be praised by us, but does not cease to pray for us? For we are indeed, if not in that merit in which he was, at least in the life in which he himself labored. For he lived a mortal life and now, having lived it, he has merited to obtain everlasting life. This mode of living a mortal life and reaching immortality was not prescribed by himself, but by the leader, king, emperor, precursor, helper, savior, liberator, the crown-giver of all martyrs, namely our Lord God and Savior Jesus Christ, the only Son of God that we might be created, and the son of man that we might be recreated; by Him who cannot lie, who neither deceives nor is deceived, the rule was prescribed in which is established the mode of living a mortal life and arriving at eternal life. Blessed Cyprian knew and taught this: he not only taught, but also did; demonstrating that he did not deceive those he taught, because he lived by teaching, and taught by living. What then did the Lord establish? What mode did he constitute for living a mortal life, and meriting to obtain everlasting life? We have just heard when the holy Gospel was read: He who wishes to follow me, He says, let him deny himself. As if it would seem obscure, the heavenly master added and says: He who loves his life will lose it; and he who loses it for my sake will find it. This is the mode of living a mortal life to obtain everlasting life; concerning this mode, with the favor of him whose solemnity we celebrate, and praying for us, may your Charity hear something from us. [For a great reward is proposed, beloved brothers]. Surely we celebrate the solemnity of the most blessed martyr: to this feast a multitude of all brothers and sisters convenes, and they rejoice in celebrating the birth of the martyr. If it is a birth, he was born; so that he might be born, he was conceived. Where was he conceived? In this life in which he was born. We all know this life is full of tribulations: that in which the blessed Cyprian was reborn, we know well; yet we celebrate his birth. And who among us would dare to compare his own birthday, celebrated in his house, even in part to these birthdays of the blessed martyrs? Whoever would do this would judge himself sacrilegious. The proconsular acts concerning Cyprian are recited. How we lose what we love. So let us see what "deny oneself" means; for a great reward is promised, dearest brothers. We heard the confession of the most blessed martyr Cyprian: "I worship one God, who made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that is in them." God is silent, but the works of God speak: behold, to whom God, behold, what kind of God, rather not what kind and such, but God, behold, to whom Cyprian believed. So what does "deny oneself" mean? Deny yourself. What does "deny yourself" mean? Are you forced to deny God? Deny yourself, and do not deny God. Do not love this temporal life of yours and strive against eternal life; rather, yield to eternal life, that you may become eternal: deny yourself, that you may confess God; deny yourself, man, that you may become an angel; deny yourself, mortal man, that confessing God you may deserve to live forever. Behold, you love temporal life: you do not want to deny it, and you want to deny God. God departs from you, whom you have denied, whom you did not want to confess; and you will have temporal life, which you did not want to deny. So let us see how long you will have that life. Behold, tomorrow, and after tomorrow another tomorrow, and after many tomorrow comes the end. And where will you go? Where will you exit? Indeed to God, whom you have denied. O miserable, unhappy one! and you have denied God and lost temporal life willingly or unwillingly. For this life, dearest brothers, whether we will or not, passes, runs; so let us deny ourselves in this temporal life, that we may deserve to live forever. Deny yourself, confess God. Do you love your soul? Lose it. But you say to me: How do I lose what I love? You do this in your house. You love grain, and you scatter the grain, which you had stored in the barn with such diligence, which you had cleaned with such labor of harvesting and threshing; already stored, already cleaned, when the time of sowing comes you will bring it out, scatter it, bury it, that you do not see what you scatter. Behold, by loving the grain, you scatter the grain; by loving life, shed life; by loving your soul, lose it; because when you have lost it for God in this time, you will find it in the future in eternal life. So by loving life, shed life.

Psalm 125 was sung.

It is hard, it is troublesome, it is a certain sadness; I sympathize with you, because our Lord God sympathized with us. For he showed himself in you, and you in him, when he said: My soul is sorrowful unto death. He suffered for us, let us suffer for him; he died for us, let us die for him, so that we may live with him eternally. But perhaps you hesitate to die, O mortal man, destined to die sometime, because you were born mortal. Do you want not to fear death? Die for God. But perhaps you fear to die because death is a sad thing. Consider the harvest: the time of sowing has cold; but if the farmer refuses to be distressed by the cold in winter, he will not rejoice in summer. Look if you are reluctant to sow because there is sadness of cold in the sowing. Pay attention to the Psalm: Those who sow in tears, shall reap in joy. Going forth they went and wept, casting their seeds. This way we sang. What we sang, let us do: let us sow our souls in this time, like grain in winter, that we may reap them in eternal time, like grain in summer time. Thus did the holy martyrs, thus did all the righteous, laboring on earth, weeping, they sent forth their seeds: for this life abounds in weeping. And what follows? But coming, they shall come with exultation, carrying their sheaves. Your seed, the shedding of blood; your sheaf, the crown received.

Again from the suffering of Cyprian. He suffered not because of the emperor, but because of the command of his God.

Cyprian. Thanks be to God, from Cyprian. This our martyr believed, this he taught before he acted, this he did because he had already taught it. To whom the blessed Cyprian spoke, he taught them with his words alone; we hold his doctrine in twofold manner; we hold the word in scripture, the example in memory. Therefore, he exhorts us, and prays for us; may he obtain for us such a will from the Lord, concerning which he spoke in his passion, saying: “Good will, which knows God, cannot be changed.” And when the judge, threatening him, said: “Consider yourself,” that judge seemed to hate, not love, the man, when he said to the mortal man: “Consider yourself;” that is, consider yourself, so that you may live a few more days now, and die forever. But Saint Cyprian did not pay attention to the human judge, who had power on earth; but he paid attention to the judge God, who made heaven and earth. Therefore, the blessed Cyprian, unless he denied himself, unless, loving his soul, he lost it, so that by losing it he might find it, would have said to him: “I indeed consider, and give thanks, because you give a place for consideration, or delay for thinking; or certainly: Now accept my devotion, I accept the ceremonies of princes.” He would say this, not denying himself; and perversely loving his soul, he would not lose it: that is, he would not sow what he would reap. But now, despising the cold of winter, thinking of the joy of summer, he replied to the man, as to an adversary whom he saw, convicting him whom he did not see. For what the devil was doing through that judge, the judge himself did not know, but Saint Cyprian knew. He responded to him, saying: “Do what you are commanded.” The holy martyr understood this command more deeply, remembering his Lord God, who standing before Pontius Pilate, when he said inflamed: “Do you not know that I have power to release you, and have power to crucify you?” he answered him truthfully and truthfully: “You would have no power over me if it were not given to you from above.” Truly, brothers, for it was not because the emperor commanded this, that Saint Cyprian suffered, and not because he commanded it, who awarded us such a martyr. Therefore, remembering his Lord God, he replied to the judge: “Do what you are commanded; in so just a matter there is no consultation. Doubtful matters are usually consulted: if I still consult, I still doubt. In so just a matter there is no consultation.” What is this just matter? It is just that I follow the martyrs, whom by speaking I made to precede me in martyrdom; it is not just that I abandon those who preceded me. For if I do not do what I taught, others will grow cold upon seeing them crowned. Therefore, it is just that I fulfill what I taught, and by fulfilling teach what I fulfilled. The blessed Cyprian did this. In so just a matter there is no consultation; he received the sentence, deserved the crown. The judge saw whom he afflicted, did not see where he sent him; because, to see it, he was not worthy. What then do we do about such great gifts of God, dearest brothers, except what the martyr himself said? For in the end, when the judge said: “It pleases that Tascius Cyprian be executed by the sword,” Cyprian said: “Thanks be to God.” And we therefore, placed in this celebration, seeing these things with the eyes of faith, and hoping, where he hastened, that we will also come, let us all say: Thanks be to God. Turned to the Lord.

Sermons - Sermon 313E

Sermon 313/E Treatise on the Birth of Saint Cyprian The Word was made flesh not by a conversion into flesh, but by the assumption of flesh. The bishopric of Cyprian defended unity, martyrdom taught confession. The Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, in whom our hope for eternal salvation lies, became man for this purpose, even though He was God, so that man, being made distant from God, would not think himself abandoned and deserted in his remoteness. Therefore, that Mediator so fulfilled the time of remoteness during which we were separated from God, that through Him we not only would not remain far off but also could come close. For nothing is so united as the Word and God; likewise, nothing is so united as flesh and man. Therefore, when the Word and God were far from the flesh and man, the Word was made flesh and united man to God. Hence, our Lord and Savior, the Son of God, the Word of God made flesh, not by conversion into flesh but by the assumption of flesh, taught those who believe in Him to live and to die; to live without greed, to die without fear. He taught us to live so that we might not die eternally; He taught us to die so that we might live eternally. Among those whom He taught this, the blessed Cyprian stood out; living in such a way as knowing he would die, and dying as if certain of his resurrection, he was commended to God by double grace, that grace which he received from Him who was pleased. It pleased Him by His gift; for as far as it pertained to himself, he had cause to displease, not to please; but as it is written: Where sin abounded, grace abounded all the more. The truthful and true martyr, servant of God, true by the gift of God, confesses in his writings what he had been before; he does not forget what he was, lest he be ungrateful to Him by whom he ceased to be so. Therefore, he is commended to God by double grace, by his bishopric and his martyrdom. His bishopric defended and held unity; his martyrdom taught and fulfilled confession.

How great is the faith in Cyprian.

Oh, how great, how marvelous is faith! Faith is something great, and where is it? For we see each other's faces, our form, our clothes, lastly we perceive our words and voices with our ears; where is the faith of which I now speak? Let it be shown to our eyes. Behold, faith is not seen: and yet this entire multitude, which is seen here in the house of God, has been attracted by that faith which is not seen. Therefore, great is faith, as the Lord also says in the Gospel: "According to your faith be it unto you." Likewise, the Lord our God, praising the faith of some, said: "I have not found so great faith in Israel." It is not strange, therefore, if by the faith which is not seen the life which is seen is despised, so that the life which is not seen may be acquired. With this faith Saint Cyprian was filled: with this faith true Christians, not false ones, are filled, who believe in God with all their heart and unshaken faith. However, heretics and Donatists, who falsely claim to belong to Cyprian, if they would consider his episcopate, they would not separate themselves; if they would consider his martyrdom, they would not cast themselves down. The one who is a heretic, separated in heresy, or a Donatist cast down in death, is by no means a disciple of Christ, nor a companion of Cyprian. The Lord commanded that Judah be tolerated until the end, to avoid separation.

Let us consider, dearest brothers, Christ teaching, Cyprian following; and those who claim sideways to be Christians, to pertain to Cyprian. Hear what Christ teaches: My peace I give to you, my peace I leave with you. A Donatist or heretic is not a disciple of Christ; a disciple of Christ is not an enemy of peace. See whether the Lord our God Himself said and did this, who said: My peace I give to you, my peace I leave with you. He tolerated Judas the devil among His disciples, He did not separate him; he was admitted to the Lord's Supper, even when he had already received the price of the Lord. For he wanted to sell Christ, he did not want to be redeemed by Christ. Thus, our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ taught that separation is to be avoided, and division to be cut off, peace and unity to be loved. This peace He left to His disciples, our Apostles, as if by a last testament. For, about to go to the Father, He said: My peace I give to you, my peace I leave with you; and He did not separate Judas from Himself, who could not have erred if He had wished to separate him; for He did not separate the innocent for the guilty, nor in separating the guilty would He abandon the innocent. He knew what He would do, and He did not do it; He did not make separation, who commanded peace to be loved. He knew what He would do, and He did not do it; He did not make separation who knew, lest he who did not know dared to do it. Judas separated himself from the Lord. He was tolerated until the end: he gave the kiss of peace, who did not have peace; and yet he received the kiss of peace. By that kiss he was not united, but condemned; thus, the Lord gave him the kiss, as if saying: Behold what I have, behold what you do not have. For Christ was the head of the singing body and saying: When I was with those who hate peace, I was peaceful. Therefore, in tolerating him to the end, the Lord Jesus Christ strongly recommended that separation is not to be made, but unity is to be loved, and peace is to be preserved. The Donatists falsely call themselves Catholics. The madness of the Donatists who choose the precipice, they abhor the snare. He would spare his seller, who prayed for the buyers.

We have said this about preserving peace because of heretics, who have separated themselves from the Catholic Church, and daily separate themselves, and falsely call themselves Catholics. Therefore, we mentioned this command of the Lord about peace because of the heretics. Let us see what the Lord says about martyrdom; we must also mention this because of the Donatists, who precipitate themselves; the teaching of the Lord must be commended. For the devil said to the Lord when he tempted Him - the Lord was tempted so that we might learn to resist the tempter - the devil said to Him: "If you are the Son of God, throw yourself down.” For he had taken Him atop the pinnacle of the temple; he did not recognize his Lord, and was teaching Him as though He were a mere man to throw Himself down. The devil, in his ignorance, tempted the true Christ, preparing to persuade false Christians. For the Donatists are not false Christians, but not Christians at all, for they listen to what the devil suggests, but do not hear what Christ answers. What did our Lord and Master, our Savior, reply to the devil suggesting such things? "Get behind me, Satan, for it is written: you shall not tempt the Lord your God." The devil suggested from Scripture, and the Lord replied from Scripture. For the devil had said to the Lord: "For it is written: He will command His angels concerning you; in their hands, they will bear you up, lest you dash your foot against a stone." "Throw yourself down," he says, "and if you are the Son of God, the angels will catch you: what are you afraid of?" The Lord could have thrown down His flesh and not allowed Himself to die; but what the devil suggested to the present Christ, Christ did not teach future Christians to do. For this the devil suggests to the Donatists, saying: “Throw yourselves down, the angels will catch you; by such death, you do not go to pain but to a crown.” They would be Christians if they were to lend their ear to Christ and not believe the devil, who first separated them from the peace of the Church and afterward led them to ruin. We ask them and say: If voluntary death delights you, and you think it noble to die willingly without any enemy pressing upon you, without any adversary killing you, why do you rush to a precipice, and never to a noose? There is another easy death, and the suspension by a noose preserves the dying person’s limbs more intact than the fall you choose; why then do you not hang yourselves in a noose when you wish to die? They respond: “May it never be, let the noose be anathema; for Judas the traitor hanged himself with a noose.” O wretched and unhappy ones, what madness is this, not willing to do what the traitor did, but doing what the master of the traitor, the devil, taught them? Judas, to betray Christ, as it is written: "Satan entered into his heart"; he who persuaded him to betray Christ, persuaded him to hang himself with a noose. For he repented because he had betrayed innocent blood, but his repentance had no hope; he repented, but despaired, not believing he would receive forgiveness. He did not come to Him whom he had betrayed and ask for pardon; he did not ask for pardon, implore release, or commit himself to the redeeming blood of Him. For the Lord would not be cruel to Judas if He was merciful to the Jews. Judas sold Christ to be killed, the Jews bought Christ to be killed. Would you know that He would have spared the seller? He prayed for the buyers; hanging on the cross He said: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." But they who crucified Christ, who wished to remain in that sin, perished, because they would not repent; they despaired of forgiveness, they did not deserve pardon. But if any of them ran to the forgiveness of the same Christ to be freed, whom, incited by the devil, they hastened to shed His blood, they repented, and they deserved forgiveness. They were baptized: they shed the blood of Christ in their rage, they drank it in faith. The Donatists honor the graves of those who have been cast down. By the example of Christ, Cyprian did not voluntarily present himself to the persecutors.

Therefore, the devil, who persuaded the heretics to separation, and the Donatists to precipitation, is the same one who persuaded Judas both to betrayal and to despair and the noose. You, therefore, Donatist, who wants to kill yourself, who avoids the noose of the traitor, why do you not avoid the precipice of the devil? The devil persuaded Judas to hang himself; he is the same who suggested to the Lord to leap off the precipice. Therefore, avoid the devil in both cases: just as you avoid the devil in the noose, so you should not consent to the devil in the precipice. For what did the devil, who suggested the precipice, hear from the Lord? "Get behind me, Satan!" O Donatist, say this to the devil when he suggests the precipice to you; who also has filled you, that being precipitated you are worshipped. Indeed, brothers, both they precipitate themselves, and they are precipitated by their perverse people. They are greater murderers who collect with honor the bodies of the precipitated, who gather the blood of the precipitated, who honor their graves, who get drunk at their tombs. For seeing such honor given to the precipitated, others are inflamed to the precipice; they get drunk on wine over them, and they get drunk with fury and the worst error. Against these, blessed Cyprian, commending the peace of Christ, teaching suffering. Observe both in him: he maintained peace in unity, he held on to martyrdom in confession. For our Lord Jesus Christ himself certainly came to suffer, had predicted he would suffer, and we would not be redeemed unless he had suffered; he also said: "I have the power to lay down my life and to take it again. No one takes it from me; I lay it down of my own accord." And it was said about the Father: "He who did not spare his own Son, but delivered him up for us all." And about our Lord Jesus Christ himself: "He loved me and gave himself for me." Therefore, since he came for the Father to deliver him to the wicked to redeem us, and he delivered himself to the wicked to redeem us, yet after supper given he withdrew to the mountain, fled the eyes of his persecutors; he wished them to come to him, not to offer himself voluntarily. Look at Cyprian imitating him. You heard, when his passion was read, that he said to the proconsul: "For the discipline forbids that anyone should offer himself." See how he knew the discipline of suffering; he certainly was urging towards suffering; yet he did not precipitate, did not impel them to offer themselves voluntarily. And to blessed Cyprian himself, they were sent and brought to him, yet he did not offer himself voluntarily. But the Donatists voluntarily throw themselves from the precipice, and come to men, and say: "Kill us." They say: "We do not kill you." O insane, o perverse ones! You come to this point: you say you are a martyr to make either a murderer or a homicidal; so that they come to men and arm them against themselves, and by terror force them to kill. If they had a sound mind, they would both dread the precipice and not commit murder; but they do what their father the devil taught them, and what their teacher Donatus instructed. Against whom blessed Cyprian strongly defended both unity and peace. The pruned branch, Cyprian; the cut branches, Donatists. "Thanks be to God" of Cyprian, "Praises be to God" of the Donatists.

He is therefore sent to him: he is brought before the proconsul, standing before the tribunal of a human judge. For he had withdrawn to his gardens due to the persecution, just as the Lord did after dinner on the Mount of Olives. The Lord on the Mount of Olives watered and nurtured the oil of peace; Cyprian in the gardens nurtured the mustard seed. He was brought from there to stand bodily before the proconsul, but in heart before the Savior; he honored human authority, but did not deny divine glory. From there he was first sent into exile. Having confessed Christ, he went into exile; from there he was led to martyrdom, brought forth like a branch to the pruning hook, not for removal, but for cleansing. For the Lord said: I am the vine, you are the branches, my Father is the gardener. Every branch in me that bears fruit, my Father prunes, so that it may bear more fruit; every branch in me that does not bear fruit, he cuts off, and it withers, and it is thrown into the fire. Therefore, consider the cleansed branch, the martyr Cyprian; consider the cut-off branches, the heretics and Donatists. What do you say pertains to him, bearing fruit of peace and unity, cleansed by the pruning hook of martyrdom to receive the crown of eternal salvation? What do you compare to this, heretics and Donatists, cut off by separation, tainted by downfall? Blessed Cyprian stands, he confesses Christ, does not consent to what he is compelled; he receives the temporal judicial sentence, he becomes a judge with Christ in eternity. He receives the sentence and rightly gives thanks to God, because he rightly confessed. O insane Donatists! O rabid ones! Thanks be to God. They say they celebrate the nativity of Cyprian; all Christian men fear their praises. The Donatists are gathered for all their crimes; that they throw themselves down: thanks be to God! they shout; in word: thanks be to God! in deeds: hateful to God. Therefore, any Catholic Christian standing at a distance who hears: thanks be to God! now trembles, now seeks where to flee, lest he sees their downfall. Behold how the Donatists have embittered the praises of God. From the book of Cyprian "That Idols Are Not Gods". Aug. ready to die for the faith. Always evils are given in return for good to the servants of God. But we, attending to the teaching of Christ, place the example of Cyprian in our hearts, beseeching the Lord God, with the help of the prayers of the saints, that we may not fear such men and not be silent to them about the faith and hope that is in us. Therefore, let us confess Christ and not fear men, nor, by fearing, be silent. For even blessed Cyprian, living among persecutors and pagans, while being among idol worshippers, did not fear the power of temporal authority, nor was he silent that idols were not gods. Not only did he not keep silent in churches, but he also demonstrated it in writings. Did he say: "I will consider the times; those who rule worship idols; I will spare confusing them, though they are temporal, yet they are emperors?" Did he keep silent? Did the good shepherd seeing the wolf flee? For what is the benefit if the shepherd is present in body but flees in heart? For he who remains silent out of fear flees in heart. For God would say to him: "I have made you a watchman; you would say, you would not be silent: but you remained silent so that you might not be killed. Did I not say: ‘Do not fear those who kill the body, but cannot kill the soul?’ Behold, while you fear the death of your flesh, you have caused many deaths of your soul." Therefore, blessed Cyprian neither remained silent among heretics, nor Donatists, nor even to the emperors themselves. He spoke, and he spoke securely, and he spoke with certainty in the Lord his God, that demons were not gods. We also say, that heretics are not martyrs and that the Circumcellions are not martyrs. Blessed Cyprian did not fear the worshipers of demons; we should not fear the gatherings of heretics nor the assemblies of those who hurl themselves down. Let us only pray to the Lord in spirit, that no one may have the counsel of silence. And if they kill us for our faith, let us say: "Thanks be to God;" and if they do not kill us, how long shall we live here? And if we reach old age, how long is it? Are we not going to die? Should the ministry of our heart and tongue cease for a few days of this life? Far from it. But if this life of ours is necessary for your charity because of this ministry, obtain it from the Lord; we cannot be silent. You can pray to God so that if we are still necessary for you, He preserves us for you, and you for us; He is able to preserve all of us from threats, from wickedness, from the snares of all enemies, from the perversities of all heretics; whom, since we wish them well and want them to be converted, He knows who is the inspector and ruler of our heart. But perhaps they will return evil for good to us. Has it only now begun that evil is returned for good to the servants of God? It is an ancient thing, examples are present; and this will neither cease nor stop until the end; and now we are in the very end of the age.

Augustine trusts in the prayers of the Saints for him.

Therefore, my brothers, I beseech your Charity to have a firm and prepared heart in God. And let us all pray to God, that as the Lord wills, He may guide us and keep our ways, both bodily and spiritual; for nothing will happen to us nor to you, which He does not will. And do not think that the prayers of the saints for all of us before God can be in vain; by whose prayers even our prayers and yours will not be in vain before God. I will give you an example from Holy Scripture. Tabitha, a widow who dressed other widows, it happened that she died, and she was sent to Peter the apostle, who came. The tunics she made for the poor were shown to him. The Lord was moved with mercy: He heard Peter, and restored the good worker widow to the light. Therefore, just as she was restored by the prayers of the widows, so also by the prayers of blessed Cyprian and all the saints, the Lord is able to deliver us from all evil.

Sermons - Sermon 313F

Sermon 313/F Held in the Basilica of the Blessed Martyr Cyprian in Mappalia His birthday In the morning, Augustine had discoursed about restless charity.

First, I will respond to my brother and colleague. I said in the morning that love must be restless, not idle; but since he wished it, let us obey, both him and God through him, and to you, and let him give obedience within you. We have sung: I have hoped in the mercy of God. Of our hope, let us say a little. And the words of our sermon indeed will have an end suitable to the time; but the hope itself, of which we speak, must endure, and not cease with our sermon. We speak, and we desist; but it always cries out to God. But even this hope—it may be hard what I am saying, but it will not offend if I show why I am saying it, and I believe it will not offend—but even this hope will not be eternal. For when the thing itself comes, hope will not be; indeed, it is called hope only as long as the thing is not yet held, as the Apostle says: Hope, however, which is seen is not hope. For what one sees, why does he hope for? But if we hope for what we do not see, we wait for it with patience. Therefore, if hope which is seen is not hope, because what one sees, why does he hope for? And thus it is called hope, because we hope for what we do not see; when what we see will come, hope will not be, because it will be the thing itself. Nor then will it be a curse to be without hope; but now, for anyone, to be without hope is a curse and a disgrace. And woe to him who is now without hope! For it is bad to be without hope, because it is not yet with the thing; then hope ceases to be, when the thing itself is held. No man's life is without hope. How many are deceived by this hope. But what is the very thing that will be held? What is it that will succeed hope? For we see men now hoping for many earthly things, and according to the world itself, no man's life is without hope; and, until he dies, no one is without hope; hope in children, that they may grow, that they may be educated, that they may know something; hope in young men, that they may marry, that they may beget children; hope in the parents of children, that they may nourish, educate, and see them grow up, whom they fondled when they were little; so that I may call this life of human hope the most important, which is, as it were, more natural, more excusable, and more common. For there are many vulgar hopes, very reprehensible; but let us hold on to this one, which is civil and natural. For anyone is born for this, to grow, to marry, to procreate children, to educate them, even to be called the father of children. What more does he seek? And the hope is not yet finished: he wishes to marry his sons to wives, and still he hopes. And when he has also attained this, he wishes for grandsons; and when he has them, behold, now there is a third succession, and the old man is reluctant to give way to children: he still seeks what he may wish for himself, seeks what he may hope for, and he seems benevolent. If only, he says, that boy would call me grandfather, and I would hear this from his mouth, and I would die! The boy grows, calls him grandfather, and he still does not recognize himself as a grandfather; for indeed, if he is a grandfather. If he is an old man, why does he not acknowledge that he must now depart, so that those who have been born may succeed? And when he has heard from the voice of a child the name of honor, he wants to educate him himself. Is anything lacking that he may hope for a great-grandson? So he dies, and he hopes; and he hopes for one thing after another, having received what he hoped for. But receiving what he hoped for, he is not satisfied, he yearns for other things. Why did what you hoped for come? Surely already to end, where are you going: the end is not extended. And how many are deceived by this hope, common hope! First it does not satisfy when it has come, and how many does it not come to! How many have hoped for wives and could not marry! How many have hoped for those with whom they would be well and have married those by whom they are tormented! How many have wished for children and could not receive them! How many have groaned over the evils of those they received! So everything. Someone hoped for riches: either he was tormented by desire for what he did not obtain, or having obtained, tortured by fear. And no one ceases to hope, no one is satisfied, so many are deceived, and they do not rest from the hope of the world.

God is now your hope, he himself will later be your reality.

Let our hope be sometimes not deceiving, but satisfying, and something so good that it cannot be better. What then is the thing we hope for, which, when it comes, hope will cease because the thing will succeed? What is that? Is it the earth? No. Something that is born on the earth, like gold, silver, a tree, a crop, water? None of these. Something that flies in the air? The soul abhors it. Could it be heaven, so beautiful and adorned with lights? For what is more delightful, what is more beautiful in these visible things? It is not this either. And what is it? These things delight, they are beautiful, they are good; seek the maker of these, he is your hope. He is your hope now, he will be your reality later; hope is for the believer, reality will be for the beholder. Say to him: "You are my hope." For now you rightly say: "You are my hope"; for you believe, but do not yet see; it is promised to you, you do not yet hold it. As long as you are in the body, you are a stranger from the Lord; you are on the way, not yet in the homeland. He, the ruler and creator of the homeland, became the way to lead you; therefore say to him now: "You are my hope." What later? "My portion in the land of the living." What is now your hope will later be your portion. Let your hope be in the land of the dying, and your portion will be in the land of the living. Turned to the Lord.

Sermons - Sermon 313G

(Erfurt 6Sermon 313/G Sermon of Saint Augustine on the birthday of the martyr Cyprian God made Cyprian both a man and a faithful one and a martyr.

I give thanks to the Lord our God because He has deigned to grant both me and you this day to be together. We celebrate the solemnity in the devoted assembly of the most illustrious martyr. The adornment of confession, the ruler and teacher of the church of the Africans, the truest and most sincere martyr and teacher and ruler, teaching what he was to do, doing what he had taught, sending many before him by precept, he drew many after him by example. But who in him is this, except He who made him? For God made both man and faithful and martyr: man when He created him, faithful when He called him, martyr when He crowned him. Such martyrs we venerate without scruple; for their passions, which they endured for the Lord, are illustrious and clear to all. And this blessed Cyprian was sent as a sheep among wolves; with word he chastised the wolves and as a shepherd he responded for the sheep and for the sheep he shed his blood. He held the simplicity of the dove and the cunning of the serpent; with the simplicity of the dove he harmed no one, with the cunning of the serpent he protected his own head. When serpents are struck, they put forth all the circles of their members in defense of the head and with great effort they preserve the place where they live. How did Saint Cyprian preserve the head? The head of the man is Christ; therefore, he preserved the head, when, with his body opposed to the persecutors, he did not deny Christ.

Let us joyfully celebrate the sincerity of devotion. let us celebrate the sincerity of devotion with keen and joyful hearts, brothers! Let it be sufficient for us! Do not pursue the martyrs with chalices, whom the pagans pursued with stones! I see this place filled with alacrity by your gathering, thanks be to God. Are we not eating now? Do not question your stomachs, but your minds! Are we not drinking now? Our food and drink should be for the inner man. For the external weighs down the internal, thus the Lord said: Let not your hearts be weighed down with carousing and drunkenness, for drunkenness fills the bodies and weighs down the hearts. How much must we avoid this when we celebrate the birthdays of the martyrs! For indeed, that they might attain those crowns, they despised such things, and now those very things are to be desired and celebrated when they choose to celebrate their solemnities. For if we love the martyrs, let us follow the footsteps of the martyrs! Imitate whom you love: this is the fruit of love, the trace of imitation.

Sermons - Sermon 313H

Sermon 313 ON THE DAY OF SAINT EULALIA

Christ made from captives the redeemed, from the redeemed servants, from the servants brothers, from the brothers members.

During the solemnities of the martyrs, appropriate holy readings are recited, which commend to us that their victories were foretold beforehand and completed through the aid of Him who promised these things. "If the world hates you," says the Lord, "know that it hated me before you. If you were of the world, the world would love its own." The Lord Christ never was of this world, because he was not a sinner. However, his disciples were of the world; but, so that they would not be of the world, he chose them out of the world, he who never was of the world. For he openly said this to them in another place: "I chose you out of the world." I chose what I made, not what I found. For what did he find but evil merits when he came? But those whom he found wicked, he made good. He made from captives redeemed ones, from the redeemed servants, from the servants brothers, from the brothers members.

Whatever is left of the world hates us.

Because therefore they had become his members, what would they suffer other than what he himself suffered? By his example, he showed what they ought to do. Do we think it was said only to the disciples, "the world hates you," or to all Christians? But now all Christians are the world itself, that is, the whole world. What therefore remains of the world that would hate us? Nevertheless, whatever remains, hates us. Whoever are pagans, without a doubt, hate Christians. We do not hate them, but seek them. Whoever are reprobate Jews, like the chaff of that threshing floor that was blown away by the cross, they also hate us. Whatever heretics exist in the human race, who have gone out from the Church, all of them hate us. And however many they are, if the remnants are counted against us, they hate likewise. How rages the whole world! Behold, those who suffered as martyrs suffered throughout the whole world. Who could endure the roaring lion, except Christ helped? Wherever they went, wherever they passed, they were cursed, apprehended, stoned, beaten, burned by fires, thrown to beasts, struck by the sword. Behold, those against whom the rage was directed were crowned; where are those who raged?

Eulalia, Crispina, Cyprian, martyrs Eight, Twenty. But when the Lord says: “The hour will come when whoever kills you will think they are offering a service to God,” it does not pertain to those martyrs, whose solemnity we celebrate. For this holy Eulalia, from the province of Spain, a holy and strong woman, who overcame her gender through her zeal, like saint Crispina, like blessed Cyprian, like many other holy martyrs, like the Eight, like the Twenty, and all their companions, believed from among the multitude of nations, and were killed by pagans. How then can it be said that what the Lord said was fulfilled in them: “The hour will come when whoever kills you will think they are offering a service to God”? They are not those of whom it was spoken, because those who killed them did not think they were offering a service to God, but to idols. Therefore, they are killed, so they do not perish; they are humbled, so they may be exalted; they die, so they may live. Thus it has been done. Therefore, after the fragrance of the ointments, others followed: the Twenty, the Eight, some this way, some that way: Cyprian, Crispina, Eulalia. And who can enumerate them all? A few grains were sown, and they have produced such a harvest, and they have filled the granaries of Christ.

Sermons - Sermon 314

SERMO 314 On the Birthday of Stephen the Martyr Stephen must be imitated, especially in the love of enemies.

Yesterday we celebrated the Nativity of the Lord; today we celebrate the Nativity of the servant: but we celebrated the Nativity of the Lord, on which He deigned to be born; we celebrate the Nativity of the servant, on which he was crowned. We celebrated the Nativity of the Lord, on which He received the garment of our flesh; we celebrate the Nativity of the servant, on which he cast off the garment of his flesh. We celebrated the Nativity of the Lord, on which He was made like us; we celebrate the Nativity of the servant, on which he was made close to Christ. For just as Christ by being born became united with Stephen, so Stephen by dying was joined to Christ. Yet the Church frequents with the service of dual devotion the day of the birth and the day of the passion of our Lord Jesus Christ, because both are a remedy. For He was born that we might be reborn; he died that we might live forever. However, martyrs came to be born into evil struggles, carrying original sin: but by dying they passed over to certain good, ending all sin. For if the rewards of future bliss did not console those established under persecution, when would they endure those torments from diverse passions? If blessed Stephen, positioned under a shower of stones, had not considered future rewards, how would he have borne that hail? But he bore in his mind the command of Him whose presence he saw in heaven; and drawn up in the most fervent love to Him, he wished swiftly to leave the flesh and fly to Him: nor did he already fear death, because he saw Christ, whom he knew to have been killed for himself, living; and thus he hastened himself also to die for Him, that he might live with Him. For what truly would the most blessed Martyr see established in that contest, do you undoubtedly recall his words which you are accustomed to hear from the book of Acts of the Apostles. "Behold," he says, "I see the heavens opened, and Christ standing at the right hand of God." Jesus standing he saw: therefore he stood, and did not fall; because while standing above and looking down, He watched his soldier fighting below, suggesting unbeatable strength to him that he might not fall. "Behold," he says, "I see the heavens opened." Blessed man to whom the heavens were open. But who opened the heavens? He of whom it is said in the Apocalypse: "He who opens and no one can shut; who shuts and no one can open." When Adam was cast out of paradise, after that first and heinous sin, heaven was closed against the human race; after the passion of Christ, the thief was the first to enter, and thereafter Stephen saw it opened. Why do we marvel? That what he saw faithfully, he faithfully indicated and violently invaded? The same argument is discussed.

Behold, brothers, let us follow him; for if we follow Stephen, we will be crowned. Above all, he is to be followed and imitated by us in the love of our enemies. For you know that surrounded by the frequent assembly of enemies, when struck with frequent blows of stones from here and there, calm and undaunted, gentle and mild among the stones by which he was being killed, looking towards Him for whom he was being killed, he did not say: Lord, judge my death; but, receive my spirit. He did not say: Lord Jesus, avenge your servant, whom you see bound to this punishment of death; but, do not hold this sin against them. Persisting therefore the most blessed Martyr in the testimony of truth, and burning with the spirit of love, as you know, he reached the most glorious end; and he who was called persevered to the end, attained what he was called at the end, Stephen by the glory of his name was brought to the crown. Therefore, when the blessed Stephen first shed his blood for Christ, it was as if a crown proceeded from heaven; so that those following might take it for a reward, who would imitate the virtue of the one preceding in battle. Afterwards, frequent martyrdoms filled the land. Whoever subsequently shed blood for the confession of Christ placed that crown upon their head, and preserved it intact for those to follow. And now, brothers, it hangs from heaven: whoever desires it will swiftly fly to it. And to exhort Your Holiness briefly and clearly, many words are not necessary: let anyone who desires the crown follow Stephen. Turned to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 315

SERMO 315 ON THE SOLEMNITY OF STEPHEN THE MARTYR The deeds of Stephen are contained in the canonical book. The book of the Acts of the Apostles is accustomed to be read from on the Lord's Day of Pascha. The most blessed Stephen was appointed as a deacon along with six others, making him the seventh, and how he attained the heavenly crown, you heard when the very passage was read aloud. This first merit of the first Martyr has been commended to your Charity, because while we rarely find the Acts of other martyrs, which we can recite on their feast days, his passion is in the canonical book. The Acts of the Apostles is a book within the Canon of Scriptures. The very book begins to be read on Easter Sunday, according to the custom of the Church. Therefore, in this book, titled "The Acts of the Apostles," you heard how seven deacons, including Saint Stephen, were chosen and ordained by the Apostles. The Apostles are first, the deacons follow. And the first martyr is among the deacons rather than among the Apostles: the first victim is from the lambs rather than from the rams. The passion of Stephen is similar to the passion of Christ. False witnesses against both. Great power of truth. But how much similarity of suffering did he have with his Lord and Savior! False witnesses against him, just as against Him: and concerning the same matter. For you know and recall what the false witnesses said against the Lord Christ: We heard him say, I will destroy this temple, and in three days I will build another new one. But the Lord had not said this: yet the falsehood was intended to be close to the truth. How were they false witnesses? They heard him say: Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up. But the Evangelist says: He was speaking of the temple of his body. The false witnesses, instead of saying "Destroy", said "I will destroy". They changed just slightly in the syllables: but the false witnesses were that much worse, the closer they wanted to approach the truth through their calumny. And what was alleged against him? We heard him say that Jesus of Nazareth will destroy this temple, and will change the customs of the Law. They spoke a false testimony, and prophesied truly. Just as Caiaphas, their master, the high priest, giving counsel to the Jews that Christ should be killed, said this: It is better for one to die, than for the whole nation to perish. But the evangelist says: He did not say this of his own accord, but being high priest that year, he prophesied that it was necessary for Christ to die for the people. What is this, brothers? Great is the power of truth. Men hate the truth, and unknowingly prophesy the truth. They do not act, but are acted upon. Thus these false witnesses were like the false witnesses, but for whom Christ was killed.

Stephen, brought to the council, why does he not keep silent following the example of Christ? To preach upon the rooftop.

They brought him to the council to have a greater judgment. However, the friend of Christ, after stating his case, proclaimed the truth of his Lord. He was about to die: why should a pious tongue be silent before the impious? Why should he not die for the truth? In this alone he was unequal to his Lord, with a certain reason, as it pertains to the likeness of suffering. For He is God in the excellence of majesty. When the Lord was led to His passion, He preferred to remain silent when questioned: this one did not remain silent. Why did He prefer to be silent? Because it was foretold of Him: Like a sheep led to slaughter, and like a lamb before its shearer, He did not open His mouth. But why did this one refuse to be silent? Because it was said by the Lord Himself: What I tell you in the dark, speak in the light; and what you hear in the ear, preach on the housetops. How did Saint Stephen preach on the housetops? Because he trampled the clay house of the flesh. For he who does not fear death tramples the flesh. He first explained to them from the beginning the law of God, from Abraham to Moses, to the giving of the law, to the entrance into the promised land; to recommend that the testimony they were bringing against him was false. Then he gave them a great resemblance of Moses to Christ. Moses was rejected by them, and he himself delivered them: rejected, he delivered. He did not return evil for evil: indeed he returned good for evil. So also the Lord Christ, rejected by the Jews, is He who will later deliver them. The Jewish people were in some respects liberated through Christ. But now he who dies is dead. The Jews whom you see will have the time of their liberation, through the very one whom they rejected; but they do not know. Now those who blaspheme perish: then there will be others, not these. When we say these things, we promise salvation not to others, but to ourselves. The nation will be liberated, not these. Listen carefully and understand the analogy. Does not God now liberate the Gentiles? All the Gentiles believe in Christ, and from sons of the devil they become sons of God. Yet those our ancestors, from whom we were born, who worshiped idols, perished with the idols.

Stephen, harsh in language towards the Jews, gentle in heart.

You have heard and seen the spectacles of the heart. There was sound in the ears, vision in the minds. You watched the great struggle of Saint Stephen, who was being stoned in his struggle. Who? He who long ago taught the law. What law did he teach? The one they received on stone tablets. Deservedly, having become like stone, they stoned the friend of Christ. With stiff neck (after he taught, he began to rebuke) and uncircumcised in heart and ears. Which of the prophets did your fathers not kill? He seemed to rage: a fierce tongue, a gentle heart. He cried out, and he loved. He raged, and he wanted them to be saved. Who would not believe he was angry, who would not believe he was inflamed with the torches of hatred, when he said: Stiff-necked and uncircumcised in heart and ears? Meanwhile the Lord looked down from heaven and saw. Heaven was opened: he saw Jesus as though encouraging his athlete. And he did not keep silent about what he saw: Behold, I see, he said, heaven opened, and the Son of Man standing at the right hand of majesty. Upon hearing this, as if it were blasphemy, they stopped their ears, and ran to the stones. It was said in the Psalm: Like a deaf adder, stopping its ears. They indeed exhibited what was predicted about them. He began to be stoned. Now consider him raging, recall his harsh words: Stiff-necked and uncircumcised in heart and ears. He seemed to be an enemy: as though, if it were possible, he wanted to kill them all. Let him say this, who does not see the heart. His heart was hidden: but his last words were heard, and his secrets were revealed when he was being stoned. Lord Jesus, he said, receive my spirit. To you I have spoken: for you I die. Lord Jesus, receive my spirit. Because you have helped, he has conquered whom you receive. Receive my spirit, from the hands of those who hate yours. This saintly Stephen said standing. And after this, he knelt down and said: Lord, do not hold this sin against them. Where is it: Stiff-necked? Is this all that you shouted? Is this all that you raged? Outwardly you shouted, and inwardly you prayed.

Stephen stands praying for himself because he demands his due. A man is evil from himself, but good by the gift of God.

Lord Jesus, receive my spirit: thus standing. For he was demanding what was due when he said: Lord Jesus, receive my spirit. He was demanding what was due, which was promised to martyrs: the due about which the Apostle says: For I am already being poured out, and the time of my departure has come. I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, will award to me on that day. He will award, He will award what is due. He who was formerly a debtor to punishments, afterwards began to hold God as the giver of rewards. How was the Apostle Paul a debtor to punishments? Because he was an enemy of the Church, because he was a persecutor. Hear him: I am not worthy to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the Church of God. I am not worthy, he says worthy. Why are you not worthy? To suffer punishments, to enter hell, to be tormented for my merits, this I was worthy of: to be an apostle, I was not worthy. From where then is this to you, of which you were not worthy? He followed: But by the grace of God I am what I am. By my misfortune I was what I was: by the gift of God I am what I am. Therefore, in order to demand the due later, he first received the undue. What due afterwards? There remains for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, will award to me on that day. He will award to me, it is due to me: the undue first. What? I am not worthy to be called an apostle: but by the grace of God I am what I am. So too Saint Stephen: Lord Jesus, standing in confidence because he had fought well, had battled well, had not yielded to the enemy, had trampled on fear, had despised the flesh, had overcome the world and the devil: thus he stood when he said: Lord Jesus, receive my spirit.

Saul, fiercer as a persecutor at the murder of Stephen. Saul, called Paul from Saul, modest, little. Stephen prays on bended knee for his enemies, because he seeks the undeserved. When this man demanded his debt, the Apostle Paul was accumulating debt for himself. That man sought a good debt: the other added to an evil debt. For what do you think, brothers? When Stephen was being stoned, you heard, but perhaps did not notice, the false witnesses who were about to stone Stephen laid down their garments at the feet of a certain young man named Saul. This is Saul, and afterwards Paul: Saul the persecutor, Paul the preacher. For Saul is named after Saül. Saül was the persecutor of King David. As Saül was towards David, so was Saul towards Stephen. But afterwards, when he was called from heaven; called, struck down, changed, when he began to preach the word of God as an apostle; he changed his name and called himself Paul. And why did he choose this? Because Paul means small, Paul means little. We usually speak like this: I will see you after a little while, that is after a short time. Where therefore Paul? I am the least of the apostles. Great, divine spectacles! He who was a persecutor in the death of Stephen, later became a preacher of the kingdom of heaven. How much he raged in that killing, would you like to hear? He kept the clothes of those who were stoning, so that by all their hands he would stone. Therefore, after the saintly Stephen standing demanded his due, saying: Lord Jesus, receive my spirit; attending to his enemies, who by stoning him were doing him evil as due, and added to that treasury, of which the apostle Paul says: But according to your hardness and impenitent heart, you are treasuring up for yourself wrath in the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God: he regarded them, and had mercy on them, and knelt for them. For himself he stood, for them he knelt. He separated the just from the sinners: he stood asking for the just, because he was demanding his reward; for the sinners he knelt, because he knew how difficult it would be to be heard on behalf of such wicked ones. Although just, although placed under the very crown, he did not presume, but knelt: not attending to what he himself was worthy of receiving by asking, but to what they were worthy of, from whom he wanted to remove horrendous punishments. Lord, he said, do not hold this sin against them.

Christ teaching the rule of piety from the chair of the cross. He has Stephen as a disciple and imitator.

What Stephen humble, Christ sublime: what he inclined to the earth, this Christ suspended on the wood. For recall that He Himself said: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. He sat on the chair of the cross, and taught Stephen the rule of piety. O good Master, you pronounced well, you taught well. Behold your disciple prays for his enemies, he prays for his stoners. He showed how a humble one ought to imitate you sublime, creature the creator, victim the mediator, human God and human man: God, but yet man on the cross; Christ God, but man on the cross, when he said in a clear voice: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.

He says to himself: He prayed for his enemies, because He is Christ, because He is God, because He is the Only One; who am I, that I should do this? If your Lord is too much for you, do you not know that Stephen is your fellow servant? God taught through Stephen not diminished. If you see these things having preceded in the Gospel, my brothers, let no one say in his heart, Who does that? Behold, Stephen did it: did he do it of himself? Did he do it of his own? But if he did it by the gift of God; did he enter, and close against you? Did he cross the bridge and cut it down? Is it too much for you? Ask and you too. The fountain flows, it has not dried up.

Gentleness towards enemies. Anger is a scorpion. Anger is an enemy, more harmful than other enemies. And truly, I say to your Charity, my brothers: exercise yourselves, as much as you can, to exhibit gentleness, even towards your enemies. Restrain the anger that spurs you to vengeance. For anger is a scorpion. If it has stirred you with its internal flames, you think it a great thing if you have avenged yourself on your enemy. If you wish to avenge yourself on your enemy, turn to your anger itself: for it is your enemy, which kills your soul. O good man: for I do not want to say "bad man"; I say this better, what I want you to be, rather than what you are: good man, what is your enemy going to do to you? What is he going to do, as much as he can; that God allows him to do everything he desires? He desires to shed your blood. It is indeed difficult, and there are few enemies who are so fierce as to go to the extent of death. Even enemies, when they see those whom they persecute afflicted, are accustomed to convert their anger into mercy. You will rarely find an enemy so fierce as to go to the extent of death. But suppose he does, to the extent of death. Imagine an enemy so fierce towards you to the extent of death. What is he going to do? What the Jews did to Stephen: punishment for themselves, a crown for him. Will your enemy kill you as if you were not going to die, as if you were going to live forever? This is what your enemy is going to do to you, which a fever was once going to do: if he kills you, he will be like your fever. Therefore, by killing you, will he harm you? No: on the contrary, if you die well and love him, something will be added to your heavenly reward. Do you not know how much those stone throwers provided for holy Stephen? Did they know that for kindness a crown was to be given, and for malice punishment to be given? How much did the devil provide? He made all the martyrs for us. But will he go hence? But from his benefits, what he did not want, it will be imputed to him what he desired, not what God was doing with him. Therefore, your enemy, whoever he may be, even to the point of death, will do nothing to harm you.

Anger, our enemy, how much it harms. Anger cannot be destroyed, but it can be restrained.

See what harm anger causes. Recognize your enemy: recognize with whom you fight in the theater of your heart. A narrow theater; but God watches: there subdue your enemy. Do you want to see how truly she is your enemy? I will show you now. You are about to pray to God: the hour is coming when you will say: Our Father, who art in heaven. You will come to that verse: Forgive us our debts. What follows? As we also forgive our debtors. There that enemy stands against you. She blocks the way of your prayer: she erects a wall, and there is no way to pass through. You have said everything well: Our Father. It ran quickly: Forgive us our debts. And what afterwards? As we also forgive our debtors. Behold, the adversary herself contradicts; not before the veil, but within: in the very sanctuary of your heart, there she shouts at you, she contradicts. What kind of enemy is it, brothers, that contradicts? As we also forgive. You are not allowed to rage against your enemy: rage against this one. It is better to conquer anger than to capture a city, says the Scripture. What I said now is written: It is better to conquer anger than to capture a city. Does not a warrior or commander, when he comes upon enemies and finds a fortified city, armed and well-prepared, opposing him, if he captures it, if he conquers it, if he destroys it, seek triumphs? But, as Scripture recounts: It is better to conquer anger than to capture a city. It is in your hand. You cannot kill her, but you can restrain her. If you are strong, conquer anger: and spare the city. I see you are attentive, I know how well you have received it. May God be present in your struggles, so that what you have gleaned from watching the conflict of such a great Martyr may benefit you; just as you saw him victorious and supported the victor, so also may you in your hearts conquer.

Sermons - Sermon 316

SERMO 316 On the Solemnity of Stephen the Martyr Stephen first among the deacons. Miracles were done by Stephen, but through the name of Christ. The most blessed and gloriously martyred in Christ, Stephen, has already nourished us with his speech: but after that nourishment, I present to you from the discourse of my ministry as if a second table. And what do I find sweeter to place on it than Christ and the Martyr himself? He, indeed, the Lord, this one a servant: but Stephen from a servant a friend. We, however, are undoubtedly servants: may he grant that we also be friends. Yet what kind of servants? Such that we can sing with a clear conscience: "But to me, your friends are greatly honored, O God." Before the holy Stephen was killed openly and crowned secretly, you heard of his election by the Apostles. He is named first among the deacons, just as Peter among the Apostles. Therefore, when he was ordained by the Apostles, he soon preceded his ordainers in passion: he was ordained by them, but first crowned. What did you hear then, when his passion was read? “But Stephen, full of grace and the Holy Spirit, performed great wonders and signs among the people, by the name of the Lord Jesus Christ.” Understand who, by whose name. Those of you who love Stephen, love him in Christ. This is what he wants, this pleases him: from this he rejoices, this he welcomes. For he did not wish to glorify his own name before his stoners. Consider whom he confessed when he was stoned; whom he confessed on earth, whom he saw in heaven; for whom he surrendered his flesh, to whom he commended his soul. Do we read anywhere, or can we read in sound doctrine, that Jesus performed or performs wonders by Stephen's name? Stephen did, but by Christ's name. He does so even now: whatever you see happening by Stephen's memory, it happens in Christ's name; so that Christ may be commended, Christ may be adored, Christ awaited as judge of the living and the dead, and those who love him may stand at the right hand. For when he comes, they will stand on the right, they will stand on the left: blessed are those on the right; wretched those on the left. The Jews were harsh towards Stephen.

Let the most blessed Stephen, however, imitate his Lord. In a wondrous manner he suffered among hard stones, those casting them, what were they doing but showing what they were? That you may know he was suffering against hard ones; this he said to them: "You stiff-necked people, uncircumcised in heart and ears, you always resist the Holy Spirit." You wish to die, you hasten to be stoned, you burn to be crowned. "You always resist the Holy Spirit." While he was saying such things, they raged and gnashed their teeth at him. Add, Stephen, add what they cannot bear, add what they cannot endure: add what may cause them to stone you, so that we might find what to celebrate. The heavens were opened: the Martyr saw the head of the martyrs; he saw Jesus standing at the right hand of the Father: he saw what he would not keep silent. They did not see, but they envied; and therefore they did not see, because they envied. He did not keep silent about what he saw, that he might come to him whom he saw. "Behold," he said, "I see the heavens opened, and the Son of Man standing at the right hand of majesty." They stopped up their ears, as if against blasphemy. You recognize them in the Psalm: "Like the deaf asp, stopping its ears, so that it does not hear the voice of the charmer, and the spell skillfully woven by the wise." For it is said that asps, when enchanted, press one ear to the ground and stop the other with their tail, and yet the charmer draws them out: thus these still raged in their dens, burning within their hearts. They had not yet burst forth: they stopped their ears. Now let them burst forth, let them show who they are: let them run to the stones. They ran, they stoned. The dying Lord Stephen imitates, commending his spirit and praying for his killers.

What about Stephen? What? Pay attention first to him whom the good friend was imitating. The Lord Jesus Christ, when he was hanging on the cross, said: "Father, into your hands I commend my spirit." He said this as a man, as one crucified, as one born of a woman, as one clothed in flesh; as one about to die for us, as one to be laid in a tomb, as one to rise on the third day, as one to ascend into heaven. All these things happened in a man. Therefore, the man said: "Father, into your hands I commend my spirit." He said "Father"; Stephen said "Lord Jesus." What about himself? "Receive my spirit." You said it to the Father, I say it to you. I recognize the Mediator. You have come to lift the fallen: you did not fall with me. He said, "Receive my spirit." He prayed this for himself; another thought came to his mind, from which he imitated his Lord. Recall the words of the one hanging on the wood, and pay attention to the words of him who was being stoned confessing. What did he say? "Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing." Perhaps Stephen was among them, who did not know what they were doing. For many believed afterward. And it is uncertain to us where the most blessed Stephen was from, whether he was from those who first believed in Christ, like Nicodemus who came to him by night, who deserved to be buried where this one also was, because through him this one was found as well: whether he was therefore among those, or perhaps among those who, after the ascension of the Lord, when the Holy Spirit came, when the disciples were filled and spoke in all the languages of the nations, were pricked in their hearts and said to the Apostles: "Men and brothers, what shall we do?" Tell us. For they despaired of salvation, because they had killed the Savior. And Peter said to them: "Repent, and let each one of you be baptized in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ; and you will receive the Holy Spirit, and your sins will be forgiven." Do you think all? What of their sins remained, when that sin was also forgiven, by which the forgiver of sins was killed? What is worse than killing Christ? This was erased. What then? Perhaps Stephen was among those. If he was among those, his prayer was efficacious: "Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing." However, Saul was also among those. When Stephen the lamb was being stoned, he was still a wolf, still thirsting for blood; he still considered his own hands insufficient for stoning, he guarded the clothes of those stoning. Therefore, recalling what was said for him, if he was also among those about whom the Lord said, "Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing," imitating therefore even in this his Lord, to be his friend, he also said: "Lord, do not hold this sin against them." But how did he say it? Kneeling on the ground. He commended himself standing; when he prayed for his enemies, he knelt. Why did he commend himself standing? Because he was commending a righteous man. Why did he kneel for them? Because he was praying for the guilty. "Lord, do not hold this sin against them."

Saul, a wolf, was changed into a sheep because of Stephen's speech. Do you think Saul heard these words? He heard them, but he mocked: and yet it related to the prayer of Stephen. He was still raging, and already Stephen was being heard for him. You know already, as to say something about Saul, and afterward about Paul; surely you know: it is written in the same book how Paul believed. After Stephen was killed, the Church in Jerusalem suffered very severe persecution. The brothers who were there were scattered: only the Apostles remained; the others were driven away. But like burning torches, wherever they went, they kindled. Foolish Jews, when they drove them from Jerusalem, they were casting coals of fire into the forest. Still, Saul, for whom the death of Stephen was not enough, what do we recall gladly, because we now honor him, what did he do? He received letters from the priests and scribes, so that wherever he found men of this way, that is, Christians, he would bring them bound to take punishments, like those Stephen had taken. And Saul went in anger, he went as a wolf to the sheepfolds, to the flocks of the Lord: like a rabid wolf he thirsted for blood, he panted for slaughter, he went along the way. And he from above: "Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me? Wolf, wolf, why do you persecute the lamb? When I was killed, I killed the lion. Why do you persecute me? Strip off the wolf: be a sheep from a wolf, a shepherd from a sheep." A painting depicting the stoning of Stephen and the conversion of Saul. This picture is most sweet, where you see Saint Stephen being stoned, you see Saul keeping the garments of the stoners. This is Paul, Apostle of Christ Jesus, this is Paul, servant of Christ Jesus. You have well heard the voice: Why do you persecute me? You were cast down, you were raised up: cast down as a persecutor, raised up as a preacher. Speak, let us hear: Paul, the servant of Christ Jesus, by the will of God. Was it by your own will, O Saul? By your own will we know, we have seen your fruits: Stephen was killed by your will. By the will of God, we see your fruits: you are read everywhere, recited everywhere, everywhere you convert hearts opposed to Christ, everywhere as a good shepherd you gather large flocks. With him whom you stoned, with Christ you reign. Both of you see us there; both of you now hear our speech; both of you pray for us. Both of you will be heard, who crowned you, one first, the other afterward: one who suffered persecution, the other who persecuted. He then was a lamb, but he was a wolf: but now both are lambs. May the lambs recognize us, and in the flock of Christ may they see us: may they commend us with their prayers, that they may grant the Church of their Lord a quiet and peaceful life.

Sermons - Sermon 317

SERMO 317 On Stephen the Martyr The relics of Stephen were transferred to Africa and were everywhere made famous due to God's blessings. The commandment of loving one's enemies has a great reward. An example is given from the Heavenly Father.

Martyr Stephen, blessed and the first after the Apostles, ordained as a deacon by the Apostles, crowned before the Apostles; he enlightened those lands with his suffering, visited these lands in his death. But he would not visit in death unless he also lived in death. A small amount of dust gathered so many people: the ashes lie hidden, but the benefits are evident. Consider, beloved, what God reserves for us in the land of the living, who grants such great things from the dust of the dead. The flesh of Saint Stephen is spread far and wide: but the merit of his faith is praised. Thus, let us expect to attain temporal benefits, so that by imitating him we may be worthy to receive the eternal ones. What the blessed Martyr set before us to be imitated in his passion, that we should heed, believe, and fulfill, is truly to celebrate the solemnity of the Martyr. Our Lord, among the great and salutary, divine and highest precepts which he gave to his disciples, this seems grievous to men, that he commanded them to love their enemies. A grievous precept, but a great reward. Finally, when he admonished this, see what he said: Love your enemies, do good to those who hate you, and pray for those who persecute you. You have heard the work, await the reward; and see what he adds: So that you may be, he says, children of your Father who is in heaven, who makes his sun rise on the good and on the bad, and rains upon the just and the unjust. This we see, this we cannot deny. Is it said to the clouds: Rain on the fields of my worshipers, and turn away from the fields of my blasphemers? Is it said to the sun: Let those who worship me see you, and not those who curse me? Benefits from heaven, benefits from earth: springs gush forth, fields grow fertile, trees are laden with fruits. The good have these, and the bad have them; the grateful have them, and the ungrateful have them. He who grants so much to the good and the bad, do we think he reserves nothing for the good? He gives this to the good and the bad, what he also gave to the stoners of Stephen: but he reserves for the good what he gave to Stephen.

Another example in Christ.

Therefore, brothers, let us learn to love our enemies by the example of this Martyr. An example is set forth by God the Father, who makes His sun rise over the good and the evil. The Son of God also said this after taking on His flesh, through the mouth of His flesh, which He took on by loving His enemies. For He who came into the world as a lover of His enemies found absolutely all of them as His enemies; He found no one as a friend. For His enemies He shed His blood; but with His blood, He converted His enemies. He wiped away the sins of His enemies with His own blood: by wiping away sins, He made friends out of enemies. Among these friends was also Stephen: indeed, he is and will be. However, the Lord Himself first showed on the cross what He advised. For from all sides the Jews were raging, angry, mocking, insulting, crucifying, He said: Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing. For blindness crucified me. Blindness was crucifying; and crucified, He was making ointment for them from His own blood. An example is also in Stephen. The gospel is both a tool and a testament. But men lazy in following commands, eager for rewards, who do not love their enemies but desire to avenge themselves on them, do not heed the Lord, who, if He wished to avenge Himself on His enemies, there would be no one left to praise Him; when they hear this passage of the Gospel, where the Lord on the cross said: Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing; they say to themselves, He could do this, as the Son of God, as the only one of the Father. For the flesh was hanging, but God was hidden within. But what are we, that we should do such things? Did He deceive who commanded? By no means: He did not deceive. If you think it very much to imitate your Lord, look to Stephen your fellow servant. The Lord Christ, the only Son of God: was this Stephen? The Lord Christ, born of an incorruptible virgin: was this Stephen? The Lord Christ came, not in the flesh of sin, but in the likeness of the flesh of sin: was this Stephen? He was born just as you; he was born from where you were; he was reborn from the same one from whom you were; he was redeemed by the same price by which you were; he is worth as much as you are worth. One instrument was made for us. The Gospel is the instrument, where we were all bought: where you are, there he is. Because we are servants, it is an instrument; because we are sons, it is a testament. Look at him, look at your fellow servant. A lamp kindled for feeble eyes in the examples of the saints. The love of enemies is a gift of God. Is it too much for you, because you have weak eyes, to look at the sun? Look at the lamp. For the Lord said to his disciples: No one lights a lamp and puts it under a bushel, but on a lampstand, so that it may give light to all who are in the house. The house is the world: the lampstand is the cross of Christ: the lamp shining on the lampstand is Christ hanging on the cross. On the same lampstand shone also he who first kept the garments of those who were stoning, from Saul to Paul, from wolf to lamb, both small and great; a snatcher of lambs, and a shepherd of lambs: he shone on the same lampstand when he said: But far be it from me to glory, except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom the world is crucified to me, and I to the world. So let your light shine, he says, before men. Behold, the light of Stephen shines, this lamp shines: let us heed it. Let no one say, It is too much for me: he was a man, you are a man. But he did not receive it from himself. Did he receive it and close it off to you? The fountain is common: drink from where he drank. By the grace of God he received: the giver abounds; and you ask, and receive. The rebuke of a lover is sometimes harsh. Stephen’s love toward his killers. The Lord loves and harshly rebukes the Jews, but out of love: Woe to you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites. When He was saying these things, who would not have said that He hated them? He went to the cross and said: Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing. Likewise, Stephen in his speech first rebukes: Stiff-necked and uncircumcised in heart and ears. These are the words of holy Stephen when he was addressing the Jews: Stiff-necked and uncircumcised in heart and ears; you always resist the Holy Spirit, just as your fathers did. Which of the prophets did your fathers not persecute? By saying this, it seems as if he hates them, as if he rages. The tongue cries out, the heart loves. We heard the tongue crying out, let us test the loving disposition. For when they rushed to the stones, hard against the hard, they threw their equals at him. He was stoned with stones, the one who was dying for the Rock; with the Apostle saying: And the Rock was Christ. And with such firmness in teaching, see what patience he had in death. For they were shaking his body with the blows of the stones, and he prayed for his enemies: the outward man was being struck, and the inward man was supplicating. But the Lord who had girded him, who had tested him, who had placed a mark not in his hand but on his forehead, was watching his soldier from above, intending to aid him in his struggle, to crown him triumphant. Finally, He showed Himself to him. Behold, he said, I see the heavens opened and the Son of Man standing at the right hand of God. He alone saw because He appeared to him alone. And what did he say for himself? Lord Jesus, receive my spirit. Praying for himself, he stood; for them, he knelt: erect for himself, bowed for them; exalted for himself, humble for them: he knelt and said: Lord, do not hold this sin against them. And having said this, he fell asleep. O sleep of peace! He who slept among the stones of his enemies, how will he stand watch over his ashes? He slept secure, quiet in peace; because he commended his spirit to the Lord.

Stephen loved his enemies.

Therefore, Stephen loved his enemies. For he, who stood praying for himself, knelt for them. Indeed, he fulfilled what was written. A true imitator of the Lord's suffering and a perfect follower of Christ, who completed in his own passion what he had heard from the teacher. For the Lord, while hanging on the cross, said: Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing; and blessed Stephen, when he was almost overwhelmed by stones, said thus: Lord Jesus, do not hold this sin against them. O apostolic man, already a teacher from being a disciple. For it was fitting that the first martyr should follow Christ's teaching of the Master. He prays for the impious, he prays for the blasphemers, for those who stone him. Because it was difficult to be heard for such people, weakness was added, so that love might be strengthened. He knelt, he obtained. Do you think he was not heard, when he said: Lord, do not hold this sin against them? He was heard. For many of them believed. But I do not send you far. That Saul, who was stoning with the hands of all, who was keeping the clothes of those stoning, Stephen was heard for him. Afterwards, he raged; taking letters he raged against Christians; he thirsted for blood, he breathed slaughter. And the Lord, who had heard Stephen for him, said: Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me? The one whom you killed prayed for you. And I choose you, that you may confess me and die for me.

Let us therefore celebrate the birth of Saint Stephen and honor him with due veneration. We have celebrated the birth of the Lord; let us also celebrate the servant. We have attended the nativity of the Savior; let us attend also the birth of the martyr. The incorrupt virgin Mary gave birth to our Lord, and the holy mother Church has elevated glorious Stephen to the palm of martyrdom.

Sermons - Sermon 318

SERMO 318 On the Martyr Stephen The relics of Stephen the martyr placed in a sacred location. The discovery of the bodies of Gervasius and Protasius. An altar erected to God over the relics of Stephen. Your Holiness desires to know what is placed in this location today. These are the relics of the first and most blessed martyr Stephen. You heard, when the reading of his passion from the canonical book of the Acts of the Apostles was read, how he was stoned by the Jews, how he commended his spirit to the Lord, and how, even at the end, kneeling, he prayed for his stoners. His body lay hidden from that time until now; recently, however, it appeared, as the bodies of the holy martyrs are accustomed to appear, by the revelation of God, when it pleased the Creator. Thus several years ago, when we were young and living in Milan, the bodies of the holy martyrs Gervasius and Protasius appeared. You know that Gervasius and Protasius suffered much later than the most blessed Stephen. Why then were theirs revealed first, and his later? Let no one dispute: God's will seeks faith, not questioning. Nevertheless, it was revealed to him who showed the things found. For the place was indicated by preceding signs; and just as it had been revealed, so it was found. Many took relics from there, because God willed it, and they came here. Therefore, your Charity is commended both the place and the day: both should be celebrated in honor of God, whom Stephen confessed. For in this place we have made an altar not to Stephen, but to God from the relics of Stephen. Such altars are pleasing to God. Do you ask why? Because precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints. They were redeemed by blood, who shed their blood for the Redeemer. He shed his blood so that their salvation might be redeemed: they shed theirs so that his Gospel might be spread. They repaid him, but not from their own: for in order to do this, he gave them the gift; and so that it might be done by them, he gave the gift. By showing his favor, he gave the opportunity. It was done, they suffered, they trampled the world.

Martyrs overcame not only the delights of the world, but, what is more difficult, torture. Struggle even unto blood.

It was not enough for them to disdain the delights of the world; they overcame punishments, threats, and tortures. For to disdain what is pleasing for the confession of God is indeed a great thing: but it is less to disdain what is pleasing than to conquer what is distressing. Suppose it were said to someone, "Deny Christ, and I will give you what you do not have": he disdained what is pleasing, and he did not deny. But then the persecutor added: "Do you not want to take what you do not have? I will take what you have." Profit does not taste as loss pains: for it is easier not to eat than to vomit. He did not gain, he did not eat: he lost what he had gained, he vomited what he had eaten. In not eating, the throat is cheated; in vomiting, the stomach is upset. Therefore, stronger in the confession of Christ is he who feared not losses than he who disdained gains. But what kind of losses? Loss of money, loss of inheritance, loss of all things he had. But the enemy had not yet come close. The things which perished were those external things lying around. If they were not loved when possessed, they did not cause sadness when lost. And to speak briefly, when they are lost, they leave as much sadness as they could have been loved when possessed. But to the persecutor of those times, when the saints were killed, it was not enough to say, "I take away what you have." He said, "I torture, bind, kill." Whoever feared not this, conquered the world. They brought the struggle for truth to the utmost, who struggled up to these points. This is what it says in the Epistle to the Hebrews: "For you have not yet resisted to the point of shedding blood in your struggle against sin." These are the perfect ones, who struggled against sin up to bloodshed. What is it to struggle against sin? Against great sin: against the denial of Christ. You know how Susanna struggled against sin up to bloodshed. But lest only women find consolation from this, and men seek something from their number similar to what was in Susanna: you know how Joseph struggled against sin up to bloodshed. The cause is similar. And she had false witnesses, those same ones to whom she would not consent, lest she sin; and he had her who would not consent. Both had false testimony given against them for not consenting to sin; and those who heard believed: but they did not conquer God. She was freed, and he was also freed. What if they had died, would they not be freed all the more when crowned securely? Why did I say, crowned securely? Because no temptation would remain. For even if Susanna was freed, she still had to be tested; and Joseph, freed, still had to be tested. From what should he be tested? Because human life on earth is a temptation. Until death, all is a trial; after death, there is only blessedness; but only for the Saints, whose death is precious in the sight of God. Thus, she struggled against sin, that is, against adultery, and he against such sin, up to bloodshed. It is a greater sin to deny Christ than to commit adultery. Adultery of the flesh is to lie together illicitly: adultery of the heart is to deny the truth. In faith, in the mind, there must be chastity. The first corrupted parent was Eve. Do you wish to know the magnitude of her iniquity in that corruption? Consider the magnitude of the calamity in us, who were born from her. I will cite the Holy Scripture of this word of mine as a witness: "From a woman was the beginning of sin, and because of her, we all die." What she received in punishment, the martyrs scorn for their victory. God threatened them with death so that they would not sin: the enemy threatened the martyrs with death so that they would sin. They sinned to escape death: the martyrs died to avoid sinning. From where the punishment was inflicted on them, hence the glory was raised for these. A certain struggle of martyrdom in daily temptations.

They have struggled, therefore, and they have conquered. The earlier ones conquered: but they did not cut off the bridge by which they crossed and prevented our access. It is open to anyone who wishes: the persecution they suffered is not to be desired; but the daily trial of human life is. Sometimes a faithful person falls ill, and there is the tempter. An illicit sacrifice is offered for their health, a harmful and sacrilegious binding, an impious spell, a magical consecration is promised, and it is said to them: "So-and-so and so-and-so were in worse danger than you, and they escaped in this way; do it if you want to live; you will die if you do not do it." See if it is not, "You will die if you do not deny Christ." What the persecutor openly said to the martyr, the hidden tempter indirectly says to you. "Take this remedy, and you will live:" is this not, "Sacrifice, and you will live?" "If you do not do it, you will die:" is this not, "If you do not sacrifice, you will die?" You have found an equal struggle, seek an equal reward. You are on a bed, and on a course; you lie down, and you wrestle. Remain in faith; and while you are worn out, you conquer. Therefore you have, dearest ones, no small comfort, a place for prayers. Let martyr Stephen be honored here: but in his honor, let the crown-giver of Stephen be worshipped.

Sermons - Sermon 319

SERMO 319 ON STEPHEN THE MARTYR The speech of Stephen to the Jews is very wise. Stephen, as a servant, performs miracles in the name of Christ. The Lord granted me to speak a few words usefully, just as He granted Saint Stephen to speak so boldly. He began to speak to his persecutors as if he feared them: "Men, brothers, and fathers, listen." What is more gentle? What is more merciful? He conciliated the listener to commend the Savior. He began softly so that he might be heard for a long time. And because he had been accused of speaking against God and the law, he explained the law to them, showing that he was the preacher of the law of which he was accused of being the destroyer. This we have both heard and witnessed: not much of ours is necessary, because you have heard much. I exhort you only in this for the building up of your charity, that you may know that Saint Stephen sought the honor of Christ, that you may know that the holy Martyr was a witness of Christ, that you may know that he then performed such great miracles in the name of Christ. For it is useful for you to know this, that Saint Stephen performed miracles in the name of Christ, but that the Lord Christ performed no miracle in the name of Stephen: that you may discern the servant from the Lord, the worshipper from God, the adorer from the one to be adored. For when you discern this, then you are loved. He did not shed his blood for himself, but he shed it for Christ.

He commends his spirit to Christ.

See to whom he has entrusted his soul. Behold, he says, I see the heavens opened, and the Son of Man standing at the right hand of God. He saw Christ, confessing Christ, about to die for Christ, about to go to Christ; and in his last moments, as the blows of the stones increased, and hard wounds were thrown by hardened hearts, he saw himself near, not to destruction, but to departure; he saw his soul already about to depart, and entrusted it. To whom? To Him whom he saw, to Him whom he worshipped, to Him whom he served, to Him whose name he preached, to Him for whose Gospel he laid down his life, to Him he entrusted his very soul. Lord, he says: Jesus, receive my spirit. You have made me victorious, receive me in triumph. Receive my spirit. They persecute, you welcome; they cast out, you admit. Say to my spirit: Enter into the joy of your Lord. For this is: Receive my spirit. Where his spirit was received by Christ. But his spirit with which Jesus received? into which abode? into which heaven of heavens? Who understands? who explains? Do you want to hear a summary? Listen to Christ Himself: "Father, I desire that where I am, they also may be with me." To be where Christ is—what thought can grasp it? What speech is adequate to explain it? Let it be entrusted to faith, not awaited from the tongue. You heard when the Gospel was read: "Where I am, there also will my servant be." Read the Greek text, and you will find 'deacon.' What the Latin interprets as 'servant,' the Greek has 'deacon,' because 'deacon' in Greek is 'servant' in Latin, just as 'martyr' in Greek is 'witness' in Latin, and 'apostle' in Greek is 'sent forth' in Latin. But we are now accustomed to using Greek terms as Latin. For many Gospel manuscripts have: "Where I am, there also will my deacon be." Consider this said, because this is what is said: "Where I am, there also will my deacon be." Therefore, truly his deacon: "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." You promised that the Gospel would be read, I preached the Gospel: "Where I am, there also will my deacon be." I have stood for you as your deacon, I ministered your blood, I laid down my life for you; grant me your promise.

Why does he pray with bended knee for his stoners? And for the Jews, for his stoners, for the bloodthirsty hearts, for the cruel souls, how did he pray? He bent his knee. Such humility of Stephen is a great accusation against that people. Standing, he prayed for himself; for them, he bent his knee. Did he place them before himself? Far from it: it is not to be believed. He loved his enemies: but it is said of one's neighbor: You shall love your neighbor as yourself. Why then did he bend his knee? Because he knew he was praying for the wicked; and the more wicked they were, the harder it would be for him to be heard. The Lord, hanging on the cross, said: Father, forgive them; Stephen, with his knee bent under the stones, said: Lord, do not hold this sin against them. He followed in the steps of his shepherd, like a good sheep: the good lamb followed the Lamb, whose blood took away the sin of the world. He fulfilled what the apostle Peter said: Christ suffered for us, leaving us an example, that we should follow in his steps.

Stephen in his suffering, imitator of Christ in patience.

See the man following the footsteps of his Lord. Christ on the cross: Father, into your hands I commend my spirit: Stephen under the stones: Lord Jesus, receive my spirit. Christ on the cross: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do: Stephen under the stones: Lord Jesus, do not hold this sin against them. How could he not be where the one he followed was, where the one he imitated was? The discovery of his body. His prayers obtain many things, not everything.

He triumphed, he was crowned. His body lay hidden for such a long time, it came forth when God willed, it illuminated the lands, performed such great miracles, made the dead living, because he himself was not dead. Therefore, I commend this to your Charity, that you know that his prayers obtain many things, but not all. For we also find in the booklets that are given, that he had difficulties in obtaining, and nevertheless later received the benefit, with the faith of the supplicant not failing. There was no ceasing, he prayed, and God later gave through Stephen. These are the words of Stephen praying, and the response was to him: She for whom you pray is not worthy, she did this and that. And nevertheless he persisted, he asked, he received.

He granted us understanding, because in the name in which He acted before He put off the flesh, in His name they make prayers so that benefits may be obtained, knowing that they ought to be given.

Stephen, our fellow servant, is not to be worshipped as God. But he prays as a servant. A certain angel appeared with John. Such angels are with God, that if we are good and perfectly merit Him, we will be equal to angels: They will be, he said, equal to the angels of God. An angel was showing many miracles to Saint John the Evangelist; disturbed by the miracles, he worshipped him. A man worshipped an angel; and the angel to the man: Rise, what are you doing? Worship Him: for I am a fellow servant of yours and of your brothers.

If such great humility appeared in an angel, how much do you think there should be in a martyr, as it is? Therefore, let us not believe Stephen to be prideful, as we think that he does what he does by his own power. Let us receive benefits through a fellow servant, and give honor and glory to the Lord. What more shall I say to you and speak much? Read the four verses which we wrote in the cell, read, hold, have them in your heart. For this reason, we wished to write them there, so that whoever wants may read, may read whenever they wish. So that all may hold them, therefore they are few; so that all may read, therefore they are publicly written. It is not necessary to seek a book: that chamber should be your book. We have indeed proceeded somewhat earlier than usual: but because a long reading was recited, and the heats are severe, let us defer to Sunday the book of the benefits of God through him, which we were to read today.

Sermons - Sermon 319A

SERMO 319/A

Sermon 319/A De festo Innocentum On the Feast of the Innocents

1. Nati infantes, occisi parentes. Felix partus, sed vilis exitus. Gaudet mater, sed mox cadit in lacrimas. Nova nativitas, nova clades. Quid est, rex crudelis? Quid est, superbia saeva? Parvulos exstinguere non potest Christum excludere.

2. Quid vos, infantes innocentes? Mundum non noveratis, sed relicto mundo in caelo vivitis. Non potuistis loqui, sed audivistis vocem angeli. In terris non mansistis, sed caelestem patriam invenistis. Gaudete, quia pro Christo passos estis, Angelorum vicini effecti estis.

3. O beati, qui in christi lavacro nascuntur, ab hoc saeculo cito recedunt, in paradiso sine mora collocantur. Pueri, quorum animae improvisae munditia poco ab hoc mundo elongantur, nulla macula peccati sunt infectae. Haec de innocentibus, candidis, sanctis dicuntur.

4. Accepistis autem in domibus vestris sanctos. Sequimini eorum exempla. Vita eorum vobis sit recta via. Ambulate in via sancta, ut perveniatis ad vitam aeternam. Praesta, Iesu Domine, ut innocentes simus in te, sicut Innocentes pro te mortui sunt. Amen. On Stephen the Martyr Those who advance in Christ are our joy and crown.

Certainly, our concern is your edification, and our joy is your salvation: both temporal and eternal salvation. For we have the promise, as the Apostle said, of the present and future life. But God grants present salvation both to men and to beasts, to the good and to the bad; this temporal salvation the martyrs despised for the sake of eternal salvation. Doubtless, you rejoice in ours; and we rejoice in Christ for your salvation. But strive that we may also rejoice with you on that day; for what the Apostle said regarding his dispensation so great and expansive, that we scarcely follow his footsteps, this is what he was saying to us, whom he was edifying, and he said: You are my joy and my crown. Therefore, whoever progresses in Christ from our labors is our joy and crown: because it is ours to faithfully distribute, not our own money but the Lord's; it is yours to receive with great care and diligence. For I can be a giver, not a collector; and a giver not as of my own property, but of God's; from which I also live: because we all belong to one great household, we all have one master of the house. He has a plentiful storehouse, from which both we and you can live. Let us only ask Him to take away distaste; first He grants hunger, and then He extends bread. From what I live, I speak; from what I am fed, this I minister. For with you I am poor; the riches are common, our Lord. The blessed and eternal life of us all is our glory. Therefore: Let him who boasts, boast in the Lord.

Sermons - Sermon 32

SERMO 32 OF GOLIATH AND DAVID AND ON THE CONTEMPT OF THE WORLD In the Scriptures, some things are hidden more secretly, others are manifested.

God and our Lord, caring for and healing every illness of the soul, has brought forth many remedies from the holy Scriptures, as if from certain storerooms of His, when divine readings are read. These remedies are to be applied by our ministry to our wounds. For we do not declare ourselves to be the children of the physician, by whom He deigns to heal others, so that we ourselves would no longer need necessary treatment. If we look to Him, if we present ourselves to Him with our whole heart to be healed, we will all be healed. Many things have been read, and great, and necessary. Although all things may be so, yet some are hidden more secretly in the Scriptures to exercise those who seek, while others are placed in open and evident places to heal those who desire them. This Psalm indeed contains great secrets, which, if we wished to treat each one individually, I fear that common weakness could not bear it, whether due to the temporal heat, the strength of the body, the slowness of understanding, or even because of our own insufficient ability. Thus, we will sample a few things from it, as much as we believe will be sufficient for our duty and for the intention of your Charity. The Word of God must be listened to attentively.

First, its title is: To Goliath. Those who are not unacquainted with the divine Scriptures, who love to frequent this school, who do not hate the teacher like desperate children, and who offer a keen ear in church to the readers and open the receptacle of their heart to the flow of divine Scripture, who do not care for matters within the walls of their house and are not delighted by domestic stories, such that they gather to find with whom to talk about trifles, not with whom to listen to useful things, who do not love to speak of other people's matters when they have run out of their own, who therefore gather not in this way and frequently gather, are not unacquainted with the title of this psalm that is written: To Goliath. They know who Goliath was. Nevertheless, for others who are either now attentive or at another time less attentive, or perhaps have accustomed themselves to choke the word in their heart with the thorns of worldly affairs, that is, with the cares of worldly business, let us narrate even these very old and usual things to those attentive and diligent in the study of the Divine Letters.

David proceeds fearlessly against Goliath.

Goliath was one of the Philistines, that is, of the foreigners, who were waging war at that time against the children of Israel. At that time, the holy David, who authored this psalm, or rather, through whom the Holy Spirit administered this psalm, was a boy tending his father's sheep, of tender age, scarcely an adolescent. His brothers, already young men, were serving in the army of the king. He had brought them something from home, sent by their parents for their use. Thus, at that time, when fighting was going on, he was found in the army, not yet a soldier, but a servant and brother of soldiers. Then Goliath, of whom mention has been made, appeared: of immense physical stature, armed, trained in strength, and haughty with boasting, who proudly challenged the enemy people to a single combat, that is, one chosen from among them should come forth against him, so that the outcome of the entire war would depend on the duel, with an agreement and covenant added, that if any one of those two prevailed, victory would be granted to the entire side from which he had stood. The king of the Jewish people, the children of Israel, was Saul. He was distressed, agitated, seeking someone equal to him throughout the entire army. But he found none, neither in form nor in the boldness of the challenge. While he was agitated, this boy David dared, not presuming on his own strength, but in the name of his God, to go forth against him. It was reported to the king, not as the boldness of youth, but as the confidence of piety. And the king did not refuse, he did not decline. He understood, when he saw the daring boy, that there was something divine in him, and that such a tender age could not presume to such things without divine inspiration. He willingly accepted. He went forth against Goliath.

Therefore, in all who were in that part from which David came forth, there was no presumption except in God. However, in them, the whole hope was in the strength of one man. But what is man, except what is sung in this psalm? Man is likened to vanity, his days pass like a shadow. Therefore, their hope is vain, which is placed in a passing shadow. However, David was armed so that, since he was unequal in age and strength, he might be equal as if by arms. But the old arms did not aid, but rather burdened the new age. And this relates to what also the apostolic reading mentioned before the song of the psalm, saying: Put off the old man and put on the new. David did not wish for the oldness of arms. He cast them off. He said they were burdensome because they entangled him. He desired to proceed to battle very light, strong not in himself but in the Lord, armed not so much with iron as with faith.

Five stones symbolized the law.

Nevertheless, having disarmed, he chose something with which to fight. And this not without a sacrament. For you see as it were two kinds of lives, one old among foreigners, the other new among Israelites struggling against each other. On that side is the body of the devil, on this side the prefiguration of the Lord Jesus Christ. He took five stones from the brook, from the river, and placed them in the shepherd's pouch in which milk is usually stored. Thus he proceeded armed. The five stones were the law; for the law is contained in the five books of Moses. And in that law are the ten saving precepts, to which the other commandments serve. Therefore, the law is prefigured both by the number five and the number ten. And so David fought with five, and sang with ten, saying: In the psaltery of ten strings I will praise you. Nor did he throw all five stones, but took one. For in the number of stones he showed the number of books, in one stone the unity of those fulfilling the law. For unity itself fulfills the law, that is, charity. Therefore, those five stones were taken from the river. What did the river signify at that time? On the Allegories of the Scriptures and Their Significance. For things are not always signified in the Scriptures by fixed realities. And your Holiness ought to know this on account of the other rules, so that you may also teach listeners who are docile. Those things which are presented allegorically in the Scriptures do not always signify the same thing. A mountain does not always signify the Lord, a stone does not always signify the Lord, a lion does not always signify the Lord, nor does it always signify good, nor does it always signify evil, but it depends on the places of the Scriptures, where the other circumstances of the reading pertain. Just as letters are repeated in so many thousands of words and speeches but are not increased. Words are infinite, but letters are finite. No one can count words; anyone can count letters, from which the multitude of words arises. When one letter is placed in various places, it has value according to the place, not representing a single thing. How different are things like God and the devil? Yet in the beginning, the letter D is there, when we say "God," and when we say "devil." Thus, just as a letter has value according to the place, the person is mistaken and very absurd and childishly obtuse, who, when he reads, for example, the letter D in the name of God, fears to place it in the name of the devil, as if he were injuring God. So too is the one who unskillfully hears the divine Scriptures, let us not depart from this very example, when he hears, for instance, a river placed allegorically, where it is said: "The streams of the river shall make glad the city of God" – it is said about the flood of the Holy Spirit, of which in another place the Prophet says: "They shall be filled with the abundance of your house, and you shall give them drink from the torrent of your pleasures" – when therefore he has taken the river in a good sense and praised it and has been delighted by it, when according to the place it is said to him that the river signifies men flowing and given to temporal things, passing away with the love of those passing away, he is terrified. Because in another place he had taken the river to signify something good, and he is troubled. Thus, he becomes mute in the Scriptures, just as he becomes mute in letters, if he does not want to transfer those very letters to other words, but holds them only in those words in which he first learned them. From the river where David took the stones.

If your Holiness has understood this, what was said to you is, as we believe, very useful and which helps you greatly, not only to listen to our discourses but also to understand the very Scriptures, about which we are discoursing to you. Therefore, the river from which David took the five stones at that time did not signify something good. Indeed, I know it is possible for some to consider and understand that river in a good sense, as if someone might wish to understand it as baptism, so that stones lifted from baptism, that is, baptized men, are the strongest against the devil, who was signified by Goliath. However, due to the number five, the reason is established for us, because we said that the law is signified by the number five, due to the five books of Moses. What does it signify that they were taken from the river and placed in a shepherd's pouch? We have already said: by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, so that the devil would truly be conquered, the law passes to grace. What signifies grace more than an abundance of milk? However, those stones were taken from the river. The river signified the fickle people, devoted to temporal matters, loving transient things, and rushing to the sea of this world with the force of desire, like the old people of the Jews. They had received the law but trampled on the law and passed over the law and were carried into the sea, as a river flows over those stones. For those stones did not establish a limit for the river to set the river in place. If they had done so, they would signify the constraint of the law and those who, when they begin to flow with their pleasures and desires, coming to the precepts of the law, stop and restrain the impulses of their lusts. However, those stones were not like that, but in the river, over which the water flowed. Just as the transgressing people passed over the law. Therefore, from there the Lord took the law to grace, that is, he took it from the river and placed it in the shepherd's pouch. By the grace of God, it is necessary to fulfill the commandments.

Whoever therefore wishes to fulfill the law, let him consider grace. Therefore, those ten commandments of the psaltery of ten strings are the same as those which were among that ancient people, but those ten commandments oppressed that people with fear. For in them there was not the charity which is through grace but there was fear. The commandments of the Lord were penal to that people, because they could not be fulfilled with love. They tried, but were overcome by desire. Therefore, when anyone has made the transition to grace, he does not fulfill other commandments, but those which could not be fulfilled by fear, are fulfilled by it. It is not, however, the power of the commandments, but the power of the grace of God. For if it were the power of the commandments of the law, it would fulfill those as well. He who passes over to Christ, passes from fear to love, and begins to be able to do through love what he could not through fear. And he who trembled in fear does not tremble in love. Therefore, this is in the ten commandments, because David signifies the man who passes over to grace when he says: In the psaltery of ten strings I will sing praises to you, now to sing in the commandments, that is, to fulfill the commandments joyfully.

God gives strength so that what He commands can be fulfilled. And so, Brothers, know that grace accomplishes this, no one should presume on their own strength. For this is to presume upon the grace of God. For God calls you and commands you to act, but He Himself gives strength so that what He commands can be fulfilled. However, you must embrace faith capably, so that with the abundance of grace you humble yourself, beg God, and presume nothing of yourself; strip yourself of Goliath, clothe yourself in David. This pertains to what is said in the same psalm, which we have already begun to mention: What is man? For this warns man not to presume upon himself. See now how he enchants against Goliath, who presumed upon himself; and commends to you David, who was weak among men but very strong in God. What is man? And it says what man is: Because you have made yourself known to him. This is the whole of man, if God is made known to him. But if God is not made known to him, man is nothing. What is man, to whom God has not been made known? Man is likened to vanity, his days pass like a shadow. Therefore, what is man, because you have made yourself known to him; and the son of man, that you care for him? What does it mean that you care for him? It pleased you to choose him and to place him in some superior and eminent position. This is due to your mercy, not his merits.

Ask what is proper to man, you will find sin. Ask what is proper to man, you will find a lie. Remove sin, and whatever you consider in man is from God. Therefore, let man not love what is his own. This might also pertain to what the Apostle says: Let no one seek what is his own. Sometimes people hear this from readers and are encouraged to take others' possessions. It matters who tells you: "Do not seek what is yours." Sometimes it is said by an evil advisor, sometimes by a good teacher. God is a good teacher. Therefore, when you hear from God: "Do not seek what is yours," do not take it as it is usually said. There is something good that God admonishes you for. As we were saying, seek what is yours, you will find sin. Therefore, do not seek sin, and you will not seek what is yours. Do not seek a lie, and you will not seek what is yours. For truth is from God, a lie is from yourself.

Let us close the doors of desire and fear to the devil. And if the devil occasionally suggests something, he holds the consenting one, he does not compel the unwilling. For he does not deceive or drag anyone unless he finds someone partly already like himself. For he finds him desiring something, and desire opens the door to the devil's entering suggestion. He finds him fearing something, he advises him to avoid what he finds him fearing. He advises him to obtain what he finds him desiring. And through these two doors of desire and fear, he enters. Close them, and you fulfill what the Apostle said in today's reading: Do not give a place to the devil. For there the Apostle wanted to show that although the devil enters and possesses, the man still gave him a place to enter.

Therefore, because man is nothing to whom God has not made himself known and whom God does not esteem, He gives him His grace, finding in him what to condemn and giving all to the confessor, so that He may crown the believer. For what did the Lord find in men when He came except that which He would condemn? Absolutely, Brothers, consider and see, whether in that people of the Israelites, or among the Gentiles, He found nothing but what He would condemn. And therefore, He willed to come humbly to sinners, not as a judge, that He might spare them, so that first He might grant mercy by forgiving sins, and then afterward exhibit severity by punishing sins. Let us not abuse, that is, let us not misuse His mercy, and we will not feel His severity. Therefore, this is all that man is to whom God makes himself known, that He gives him His grace from which David presumed. But Goliath, proud, arrogant, and inflated, presumed from himself and his own strength, established the entire victory of his whole side in himself alone. And because all pride has the insolence of a brazen face, he was struck down on that very face by a coming stone. The brow that bore the insolence of his pride was overthrown, and the brow that bore the humility of the cross of Christ prevailed. By what means do we bear the sign of the cross on the forehead?

Therefore, we also bear the very sign of the cross on our forehead. Who understands it? I say this, brothers, because many do it and do not wish to understand. God seeks the doer of His signs, not a painter. If you bear the sign of the humility of Christ on your forehead, bear the imitation of the humility of Christ in your heart. However, we said, brothers, about giving place to the devil by opening doors to him of desire or fear. But what kind of desire, or what kind of fear? For we also desire the kingdom of heaven, and we fear hell. But just as those doors, the desire for temporal things and the fear of temporal punishments, often lead to wickedness and give place to the devil, so the desire for eternal things and the fear of eternal punishments makes a place in the heart for the word of God.

Earthly desire must be restrained.

Briefly then, Brothers: if we wish to live well, let us love more what God promises than what this world promises. And let us fear more what God threatens than what this world threatens. Is what we said something great or long? A temptation of some fraud comes to you. You want to commit fraud to acquire money. God promises eternal kingdoms of heaven to those who do not commit fraud. Greed for money overcomes you. For who is it that does not want the kingdoms of heaven? But to prefer earthly things more is to sin, to prefer what is present and not to believe what is future, to prefer what man sees and not to desire what God promises, when what man sees can also be taken away from his eyes, even that which is possessed can be lost; but what God promises cannot meanwhile be seen with the eye of the flesh, and when someone reaches God's promises he does not fear losing them, for no one is more powerful than He who gave them. Therefore, Brothers, adhere with love to God's promises, and the desires of the world will not overcome you.

Let us not fear the threats of men.

Again, the temptation of fear comes. Everyone says to you: "Give false testimony for me." First, he promises. But when he has not deceived, if by chance you prefer the promises of God to the promises of men, greed does not win. Through threat he tempts and begins to threaten horrible things. Perhaps he is powerful in the city, powerful in the world. He seems capable of doing what he threatens. The fear of present evil conquers you, which God could indeed avert from you, if it seemed advantageous to Him; and if He does not want to avert it, you should understand that He would not allow it to happen to you unless He knew it would benefit you. The same God diverted the fire from the three boys. Has God changed because He did not avert the sword from the martyrs? The same God of the three boys was the God of the Maccabees. Those escaped from the fire, those were tortured by flames. Both, however, conquered in the eternal God. For neither those were delighted by this temporal life, nor were those broken by temporal threats.

Therefore, do not fear the man threatening you. For what is man? He is likened to vanity, his days pass like a shadow. Either he will not harm you, and that shadow will pass before its sting can reach you; for God is powerful. Or if he is permitted to harm, he will harm only your shadow for a time, that is, your transient affairs, your temporal life, your old life. For up to the end of death we carry something of the old man. He can harm your temporal life, but no one can take away your eternal life from you. He will remove the impediments by which you are held here. And you will cling to God, to whom you are already bound by anticipated hope and love.

Therefore, it is most elegantly said in the Psalms about the evil man: "You have worked deceit like a sharp razor." Thus the Spirit of God mocks him. What does it observe in the razor? Not because men can be killed with a razor, but for what purpose the razor was made. However, it was made for shaving hair. What is so superfluous on the body as hair? With how much urgency, how much effort, how much caution, how much intention it is sharpened, so that it shaves hair. In the same way, the evil man takes himself aside, thinks, rethinks, devises plans, places fraud upon fraud, seeks machination, prepares accomplices, gathers false witnesses, sharpens the razor. What will he do to the just man, except shave off the superfluous?

We should not love those things that pass away.

Therefore, Brothers, if you want to be ready to follow the will of God, what we say to you, we first say to ourselves, indeed He who speaks securely says it to all, if we want to be ready to follow the will of God, let us not love the things that pass away, let us not think that happiness is found in that which is called in this age. For this is what those foreigners thought. They regarded all happiness in temporal things, all sweetness in the shadow, not in the light itself, not in the truth itself. So much so in this psalm, which is addressed to Goliath, pay attention to the latter parts of the psalm. In completely clear words and in the most unambiguous speech, which does not require an interpreter or expositor, but by the mercy of God, they are so placed that no one can say: "Behold, he said it as he wished, and interpreted it by his own wit, he perceived it as he wished," they are placed in such a way that no one can excuse themselves. These words are placed by David speaking, that is, by the new life, the life of Christ, the life given to us through Christ, mocking the old life, the old happiness of men, and those who place their hope in it, and those who achieve it and rejoice in it. To whom and when God is to be called propitious. For it seems that the righteous labor in this world, and the unjust live happily in this world. And as if God is sleeping, neglecting human affairs, those are often elevated with impunity, while these are often broken by infirmity and think it does them no good to live well, because they do not have those things with which sinners, wicked, and impious men seem to abound. And as long as they ask such things from God as if they are granted for their greatness, they are in error. And care must be taken lest they be given over to the power of their desires. For it is said: God gave them up to the lusts of their hearts. And

God is more merciful when he does not grant the superfluous and trifling things one asks for, but listens in order to heal by not giving. For indeed, who does not see why men seek those things? That they may spend on their luxuries, on trifles, on the most insane spectacles, men ask to have these things from God.

Give me a man from the world; let him ask wealth from God, let it be given, and observe the innumerable snares of his death that follow. Then he oppresses the poor, a mortal man becomes proud over an equal human being, he seeks vain honors from men. In order to acquire them, he displays to them the frivolities of wickedness, the frivolities of evil desire. He buys games and bears, gives his property to wild-beast fighters, while Christ hungers in the poor. What need is there to say more, brothers? You yourselves think about what we are silent on, how many evils men commit with their superfluous things when the providence of these things happens to them. Is it not better, when such a person is able to use the abundance of present things in this way, that God takes it away from him rather than gives it to him? Is it not then mercy? And he will say: "I have acted rightly and have taken nothing that was not mine, and you have not heard me. From what I have, I give to the needy, I take from no one. I ask from you, you give." As if indeed he gives you a villa unless another loses a villa. If it is said to you: "Sell your villa," you shudder as if at a curse, you think an injury has been done to you. You hold hatred in your heart, because you heard from a man that you should sell a villa as if you could buy unless another sells. Therefore, what you very much desire to buy and wish to buy, if it is evil to sell, you seek evil for another. It is good to find a chapel of solidi on the road, which when you have found, you say: "God gave it to me," as if you could find it unless another loses it. Why then do you not desire the good of those treasures, which all can possess with you without distress? You desire gold, desire justice. You cannot have gold, unless another loses. You both embrace justice, and you both are expanded.

Earthly happiness must be despised, heavenly things must be desired.

Let us return therefore to the psalm, so that your Charity may understand that they are foreigners who think that all happiness is merely present. But do you judge yourself worthy that God should give even these? Consider how you use them. If He did not give, know that it is beneficial for you because the Good Father did not give. For when your son cries to give him a beautiful knife with a gilded handle, no matter how much he cries, you do not give him that which would harm him. "Lord, deliver me from the hand of foreign sons, whose mouth has spoken vanity, and their right hand is a right hand of iniquity." And he explains what vanity he speaks of and what right hand. For he calls the right hand of iniquity the happiness of this age. Not that it is not found among the good, but when the good have it, they have it in the left hand, not in the right hand. They have eternal happiness in the right hand; they have temporal happiness in the left hand. However, the desire for eternal things and eternal happiness should not be mixed with the desire for temporal things, that is, present and temporal happiness. And this is: "Let not your left hand know what your right hand does." Therefore: "Their right hand is a right hand of iniquity."

Listen now to how they have spoken vanity, and how they have the right hand of iniquity. Let us all listen, it benefits you. Let us listen, so that you do not say you have not heard, because it was said to the servant: "You should give, and I would demand." And we said yesterday that we are the servants who give; there is another who demands. Our sisters, unwilling to listen, as if they do not want to endure the exactor. In vain, my brothers, no one should flatter themselves here. It is one thing not to have received, another to have refused to receive. He who refuses the gift of God is held guilty of that refusal. For just as it was said to the steward servant: "Why did you not give?" so it shall be said to the servant to whom it was appointed to dispense: "Why did you not receive?" If there was no one to give, you will excuse yourself. But if the readers sound forth, even when the expounders are silent—and the word of God is preached everywhere, and truly it is said: Their sound has gone out into all the earth, and the heat of the word of God is spread everywhere, and there is no one who can hide from its heat—there will be nothing to say in the judgment of God. Brothers, let us hear and do. If we want to have hope, let us not excuse ourselves. Often a beggar, requesting a single coin, will The door sings to you the commandments of God.

Let us hear then: Whose mouth speaks vanity, and their right hand is the right hand of iniquity. Behold the happiness of the world, where those who speak vanity place their hope, and whose right hand is of iniquity. For thus it begins to say: Whose sons are like well-established saplings. Happiness is lawful. Here he does not speak of frauds, perjuries, robberies, crimes. He speaks of happiness as if of the innocent. And if this is to be despised, how much more should they be mourned who also commit robberies, who commit thefts, who commit crimes, who commit murders, who commit adulteries and other things which even worldly happiness condemns?

Psalm 143 is explained.

Behold what kind of man He wants to be of new life, what kind of man He wants to be belonging to pastoral vessels, and to the grace of God, and to the milk by which we are nourished. Pay attention now: Their sons are like newly established shoots; their daughters adorned as if in the likeness of a temple. Perhaps this is why the sisters did not want to listen. Therefore, let them hear, whether they want to or not, and learn to come to the Lord's house, not in the pride of Goliath but in the humility of David. Are these things really to be explained? Are they obscure? Men speak vanity, and they are called foreigners. They do not belong to the inheritance of Christ, to His kingdom to whom we say: Our Father. They are counted as foreigners. And what happiness do they declare? Their sons are like newly established shoots, as if a propagation of propagations. "He has many sons, many grandsons; he is secure against the accidents of death." As if a single event doesn't often wipe out thousands of men. Their sons are like newly established shoots. Behold, suppose the sons are indeed like newly established shoots. Do not the nearby forest fires sometimes consume even the young shoots in the woods? Their daughters are adorned as if in the likeness of a temple. Let us swiftly move on from here. It is necessary to consider the modesty of women. They should recognize by their own possession what they have, which we are ashamed to mention. Their daughters are adorned as if in the likeness of a temple. Their storehouses full, overflowing from one into another, just as we say of the abundant: "He has nowhere to put it, he doesn't know what he has." One storehouse is filled and the fruits overflow; the possessions are abundant, the storehouses overflow from one into another. Their sheep, fertile, multiplying in their goings out. Few enter; they give birth, and many go out: multiplying in their goings out. In the previous year there were so many, this year there are so many. There is rejoicing and exulting. Goliath swells, and proudly challenges to combat in such prosperity: "Who can confront me? Who dares?" If men to whom these things abound do not say that, if each one does not feel it daily within himself? He has something more than his neighbor. Does he not say: "Who can confront me? Or if this neighbor has wronged me, will I not show him?" See if it is not Goliath challenging to combat. But David advances, unarmed with weapons of war, armed with a few stones. All pride will be overthrown, that is, the just man; as the martyrs did, they overthrew the unjust. And at that time when they seemed to be vanquished, they were themselves victorious, when in them their leader, the devil, was overcome.

Let us wish for and love lasting goods. But observe that happiness: their sheep multiplying in their goings, their oxen fat. There is no ruin of the fence. For the fence is often accustomed to be a hedge. There is no ruin of the fence, nor an exit. Everything whole, everything perfect, everything full. Nor is there a cry in their streets: no disputes, no tumults. See what kind of happiness he describes as if of the innocent, lest anyone say: "But he said this about those who seize the belongings of others." Nothing is said of this here, elsewhere there is mention of such. For it is manifest that the wicked are to be punished. And from here they should understand what punishment awaits them, when anyone innocent uses these things proudly and immoderately, he is revolted by God and counted among the children of foreigners. For that rich man was not seeking foreign fruits, to whom the region succeeded in its fruits, and when he was burning, having nowhere to gather the worldly fruits, and did not see the poor in whom he might store treasure in heaven: "I will destroy," he says, "my barns, and build larger ones and I will fill them." From where if not from his own fruits? And I will say to my soul: "You have many goods, be satisfied." But God said to him: "Fool, this night your soul will be required of you. Whose will these things be which you have prepared?" Just as in the Gospel, Brothers, the man rejoicing in temporal happiness was rebuked, although that happiness was from his own field, not from the spoils of others, so also in this psalm temporal happiness is rebuked, so that the soul renewed and regenerated by the grace of milk may learn to desire that perpetual and eternal blessedness. Therefore see how he connects it: Whose sons are as newly planted. Their daughters decorated as the likeness of a temple. Their storerooms full, spilling from one to another. Their sheep fertile, multiplying in their goings; their oxen fat. There is no ruin of the fence, nor exit, nor cry in their streets. Blessed they said is the people who have these. But who said it? Whose mouth spoke vanity. For above they are described. But what do you say? For they call blessed the people who have these things. What do I say? Blessed is the people whose God is the Lord. Therefore, blessed is that people, who, for their sons and daughters adorned, for the fatness of oxen, for the fertility of sheep, for the fullness of cellars, for the integrity of buildings, for peace and civil disputes and quarrels, for all this happiness, wishes to possess their God, so that they have Him for everything, who created all things, and say: But it is good for me to cling to God. Let him worship Him freely. Let him worship when He gives these things, and when He takes away, and when He does not give, and let him fear nothing as much as that He takes Himself away. And so the Christian people, Brothers, who say in their hearts: "Let Him take away whatever He wants, as long as He does not take Himself away from me," blessed is the people, whose God is the Lord.

Sermons - Sermon 320

SERMO 320 On the Martyr Stephen The manner of the very day of Easter Of the man healed through the prayer of Saint Stephen. Augustine excuses himself for not being able to give a sermon.

We are accustomed to hearing about the miracles of God through the prayers of the most blessed martyr Stephen. This little book is a sight; as for the written content, the knowledge is shown by the face instead of paper. You who know what you used to see with sorrow in it, read joyfully in the present what you see: so that our Lord God may be more abundantly honored, and what is written in the little book may be inscribed in your memory. Pardon me for not making the discourse long: you know my fatigue. As I was able to do so much yesterday while fasting and not fail, and so that I might speak with you today, the prayers of Saint Stephen have provided. Turned toward the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 321

SERMO 321 Monday of Easter Where he promised the little book of the healed man.

We indeed spoke yesterday, as Your Charity remembers: This booklet, its appearance is. However, because it revealed some things to us, which you ought to know, for greater admiration and the glory of our Lord, concerning the memories of his saints, about which it is said: Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints; it is also fitting to provide a booklet, which contains everything we have learned from his mouth. But if the Lord wills, it will be prepared today and read to you tomorrow.

Sermons - Sermon 322

SERMO 322 Tuesday of Easter Where he presented the promised book of the healed man

Yesterday we promised your Charity a little book, where you can also hear about the one healed, which you could not see. Therefore, if it pleases your Charity, or rather because it ought to please what also pleases me, let both brothers stand in your presence: so that those who did not see him may see in this one what the other was suffering. Let both, therefore, stand, one to whom grace was given, and the other from whom mercy is to be sought.

EXAMPLE OF A LETTER FROM PAUL TO BISHOP AUGUSTINE

I ask, most blessed lord Pope Augustine, that you order this little book of mine, which I have presented by your command, to be read to the holy people.

While we were still in our homeland of Caesarea in Cappadocia, our older brother inflicted grievous and intolerable injuries on our common mother, to the point that he did not hesitate even to lay hands on her. All of us children, gathered together, bore this patiently, not even asking our brother why he did this to our mother. However, she, incited by the prompts of feminine pain, decided to punish her injurious son with curses. And as she was hurrying to the sacred Baptismal font after the crowing of the cocks to invoke God’s wrath on her aforementioned son, a demon, in the likeness of our uncle, appeared to her and asked where she was going. She responded that she was going to curse her son due to his intolerable contumely. Then that enemy, finding an easy place in the heart of the enraged woman, persuaded her to curse everyone. Inflamed by venomous counsels, she fell upon the sacred font, with hair disheveled and breasts exposed, and most especially prayed to God that we, exiled from our homeland and wandering foreign lands, would terrify all people by our example. Instantly, an effective vengeance followed her maternal prayers, and that same elder brother of ours, both in age and guilt, was seized by such a trembling of the limbs as Your Holiness saw in me up to three days ago. Keeping the order of our birth, within one year the same punishment seized all of us. Seeing her curses had reached such efficacy, our mother could no longer bear the consciousness of her impiety and the reproach of people: but, tying a noose around her neck, concluded her sorrowful life with a more tragic end. Therefore, all of us, unable to bear our disgrace and leaving our common homeland, were scattered variously. Of all ten of us brothers, the one who follows in birth order to the memory of the glorious martyr Laurence, who was recently housed at Ravenna as we heard, deserved healing. But I, who am the sixth in birth order among them, together with this sister of mine, who follows me in age, wherever there were holy places among the nations or lands where God was said to work miracles, I traveled with great love for the desired health. But to pass over the other celebrated places of the saints in silence, I also came in the same travels to Ancona, a city of Italy where the Lord performs many miracles through the most glorious martyr Stephen. But I could not be healed elsewhere because I was reserved for this place by divine predestination. Nor did I omit the city of Uzalis in Africa, where the blessed martyr Stephen is often proclaimed to work great things. However, three months ago, on the day of the January Calends, both I and my sister, who is here with me, detained by the same affliction, were clearly warned in a vision. For a certain person of bright appearance with venerable white hair said to me that within three months, the desired health would be present to me. My sister, in a vision, saw Your Holiness in the same form as we see you now: by which it was signified to us that we should come to this place. For I also often saw your Blessedness through other cities on the journey to this very place, just as I see you now. Therefore, clearly admonished by divine authority, we came to this city about fifteen days ago. Both my own passion and my pitiable sister, who offers an example of common misfortune for the instruction of all, are witnesses to this. Those who see in her how I once was may recognize in me how much the Lord has worked through His Holy Spirit. I was praying daily with great tears at the place of the memory of the most glorious martyr Stephen. On Easter Sunday, as those present saw, while I was praying and holding the rails with great weeping, I suddenly fell. Completely unaware of myself, I did not know where I was. Shortly thereafter, I arose and did not find that trembling in my body. Therefore, not ungrateful for such a great gift from God, I offered this little book; in it, I have disclosed both the calamities you were unaware of and what you have learned about my well-being and health: so that you may deem it worthy to pray for my sister and to give thanks to God for me.

Sermons - Sermon 323

SERMO 323 The condition after the little book about Saint Stephen.

Curses of parents upon their children, how they are to be feared.

Indeed, the mercy of God, brothers, as it must be believed, all these brothers, whom the wrath of God struck with one maternal plague, will someday attain the health of which we rejoice. Nevertheless, let the children learn to obey, let them fear their parents' anger. It is written: The blessing of the father establishes the house of the children; the curse of the mother uproots the foundations. Now these are not in the foundations of their homeland through the lands: they provide a spectacle everywhere, they make their punishment evident; they present their misery to the eyes, they frighten other peoples' arrogance. Learn, children, what Scripture says, to give due honor to parents. But you also, parents, when you are offended, remember that you are parents. A mother prayed against her children, she was heard; because God is truly just, because she had indeed suffered an injustice. One of them had used abusive words and laid hands; and the others patiently bore the mother's injury, and did not respond with one word against their brother for her. The just God who heard the praying one heard the grieving one. But what of that miserable one? Was she not punished more from where she was sooner heard? Learn this: to ask from God where you do not fear to be heard.

Health not granted to two brothers in Ancona, so that it was allowed to them in Hippo. The memory of Stephen on what occasion it was built at Ancona before the discovery of his body. But we, brothers, should strive to give thanks to our Lord God for the one who was healed; and for the one who is still held, let us pour out prayers. Let us bless God, because He considered us worthy to see this. For what are we, because I appeared to these people unknowingly? For they saw me, and I was unaware: and they were admonished to come to this city. Who am I? I am a man, one among many, not among the great. And truly, as your Charity may hear, I am greatly amazed, and rejoice that this was granted to us: for this man could not have been cured at Ancona; indeed, he could have been, but it was not done because of us, as it could have been done very easily. For many know how many miracles are performed through the most blessed martyr Stephen in this city. And hear what will amaze you: his old memorial was there, and it still is there. But perhaps you say: His body had not yet appeared, whence came the memory there? The cause indeed lies hidden: but what the rumor brought to us, I will not keep silent from your Charity. When Saint Stephen was being stoned, some even innocent ones, especially those who had already believed in Christ, were standing around: it is said a stone came into his elbow, and being struck from there, came before a certain religious man. He took it and kept it. The man was among sailors, and the chance of navigation brought him to the shore of Ancona, and it was revealed to him there that the stone should be deposited. He obeyed the revelation, and did what he was commanded: from that time began there the memory of Saint Stephen to be, and there was a rumor that the arm of Saint Stephen was there, not knowing what had happened to the people. But it is understood that it was revealed to be there, for it was to place the stone that was struck from the elbow of the Martyr, because in Greek the elbow is called ■γκ■ν. But let those who know what miracles happen there, themselves teach us. These miracles did not begin to happen there, until after the body of Saint Stephen appeared. Behold, that young man was not cured there, so that he would be preserved for our eyes. Of the miracles performed at Uzalis. At Uzalis, where my brother Evodius is bishop, inquire how many miracles occur there, and you will find out. But passing over the others, I point out to you one thing that happened there, so you may see how great is the presence of majesty there. A certain woman suddenly lost her sick son, whom she could not rush to help, in her arms as a catechumen: who cried out, "My son, a catechumen, is dead," she said. The cry of the people arose from the sudden healing of the girl. And when Augustine said these things, the people began to cry out in memory of Saint Stephen, "Thanks be to God! Praise be to Christ!" In this continuous clamor, the girl who was healed was brought to the apse. Seeing her, the people, with joy and weeping, with no words interposed, but only with the noise interposed, prolonged the clamor for a while: and when silence was restored, Bishop Augustine said: "It is written in the Psalm: 'I said, I will confess my transgression to the Lord God, and you forgave the guilt of my heart.' I said, I will confess: I had not yet spoken: I said, I will confess, and you forgave. I commended this wretched one, or rather, from wretchedness, I commended her to your prayers. We decided to pray, and we were heard. Let our joy be an act of thanksgiving. The Mother Church was heard more swiftly than that other mother cursed in her destruction." Turned to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 324

SERMO 324 Where Augustine completes the part of the sermon immediately preceding. THE MIRACLE INTERRUPTED A miracle occurred at Uzali. A child, having died before baptism, was restored to life so that he could receive the sacraments. The discourse from yesterday must be completed, which was interrupted by greater joy. For I had intended and begun to speak to your Charity about why these brothers seem to me to have been guided by divine authority to this city, so that the long-desired and awaited healing might be fulfilled here in them. And desiring to say this, I had begun first to commend to your Charity the holy places where they were not healed, and from there they were directed to us. And I mentioned the city of Ancona in Italy: I had begun to speak about the city of Uzalis, which is in Africa (it has a bishop, my brother, whom you know, Evodius); because the fame of that same martyr and his works had compelled them to come to that city too. What could have been given there was not given, so that it might be given here where it ought to be given. But when I wished briefly to commemorate the divine works through the holy Martyr, omitting the rest, I intended to recount one: as I was saying this, after the health returned to that girl, a sudden tumult of joy arose, and compelled us to end the discourse differently. Therefore, we know that such a miracle happened there among many others, which certainly cannot all be commemorated. A certain woman lost her sick infant son, a catechumen, in her lap. When she saw him lost and irreparably ruined, she began to weep for him more faithfully than as a mother. For she did not desire the life of her son except in the future world, and she lamented that this was taken from her and perished. Filled with the affection of confidence, she took the dead boy, and ran to the memory of the blessed martyr Stephen, and began to demand from him her son, saying: 'Holy martyr, you see that no solace remains for me. For I cannot say that my son has gone ahead, whom you know has perished: for you see why I weep. Return my son to me, so that I may have him before the sight of your crowner.' While she prayed these and similar things, in a way that did not ask with tears, but as I said, demanded, her son revived. And because she had said, 'You know why I seek him': God wanted to show the true spirit of her as well. Immediately she took him to the priests, he was baptized, he was sanctified, he was anointed, a hand was laid upon him, and all the sacraments being completed, he was taken up. She, with such a countenance, led him, as if she did not lead him to the peace of a tomb, but to the bosom of the martyr Stephen. The faithful heart of the woman was proven. Therefore, where God performed such a miracle through His Martyr, was He not able to cure these men there? And yet they were directed to us here. Turned toward the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 325

SERMO 325 On the Birth of the Twenty Martyrs Why solemnities of the martyrs were instituted. A fitting discourse must be delivered on the solemn day of the holy Martyrs. As we are about to speak of the glory of the martyrs, briefly discussing the just cause of the martyrs, let the prayers of the martyrs assist us. For through these celebrations, Your Holiness ought to recall this: first, let us not think that we confer anything upon the martyrs because we celebrate their most solemn days. They do not need our festivities, for they rejoice with the Angels in heaven. However, they rejoice with us, not if we honor them, but if we imitate them. And even though we honor them, it benefits us, not them. But to honor and not imitate is nothing other than deceitful flattery. Therefore, these festivities are established in the Church of Christ so that through them the congregation of Christ's members may be reminded to imitate the martyrs of Christ. This is entirely the usefulness of this celebration, there is no other. For if God is presented to us as the one to imitate, human frailty responds that it is too much to emulate Him, since we cannot be compared to Him. Then if the example of our Lord Jesus Christ is presented to us for imitation, who, though He was God, clothed Himself in mortal flesh so that He might convey a commandment and show an example to humans bearing mortal flesh, about whom it is also written: Christ suffered for us, leaving us an example that we should follow in His steps: still, even here human frailty responds, "What can I possibly have in common with Christ? He, though in the flesh, was also the Word made flesh. For the Word was made flesh to dwell among us: He assumed flesh, but did not lose the Word; He took on what He was not, but did not lose what He was. For God was in Christ reconciling the world to Himself. What then do I, a mere human, have in common with Christ?" To remove therefore all excuses of unbelieving weakness, the martyrs have built us a path. Indeed, it had to be built with stone tablets so that we could walk safely. They made it with their blood and with their confessions. In short, despising their own bodies, they spread them like garments for Christ coming to the nations to save them, like He sat upon that donkey. Who then would be ashamed to say, "I am unequal to God?" Certainly, he is unequal. "I am unequal to Christ?" Even to mortal Christ, unequal. Peter was what you are, Paul was what you are, the Apostles and Prophets were what you are. If you are reluctant to imitate the Lord, imitate your fellow servant. The band of servants has gone before, the excuse of the lazy has been removed. Finally, he still says, "I am unequal to Peter, unequal to Paul." Are you unequal to the truth? Simplicity is crowned, vanity is not excused. Finally, are you unequal to children? unequal to girls? unequal to holy Valeriana? If you are still reluctant to follow, do you not wish to adhere to Victoria? For thus has the series of the twenty holy Martyrs been recited to us. It began with the bishop Fidenti, and it ended with the faithful woman, Saint Victoria. The beginning from faith, the end in victory. In martyrs, it is not the punishment that is considered, but the cause. He criticizes the false martyrs of the Donatists.

Therefore, brothers, see: celebrate the passions of the martyrs in such a way that you consider imitating the martyrs. They chose the cause in order to have fruitful suffering. For they heeded the Lord saying, not “Blessed are those who suffer persecution,” but “Blessed are those who suffer persecution for the sake of righteousness.” Choose the cause, and do not care about the pain. But if you do not choose the cause, you will find pain both here and in the future. Do not be moved by the sufferings and punishments of wrongdoers, sacrilegious people, enemies of peace, and enemies of truth. For they do not die for the sake of truth: but they die to prevent the truth from being announced, from being preached, from being upheld, from unity being loved, from charity being cherished, and from eternity being held. O the worst cause! Therefore, the penalty is fruitless. Do you not consider, you who boast of your suffering, that there were three crosses when the Lord suffered? The Lord suffered between two thieves: the punishment did not distinguish, but the cause did. Therefore, the voice of the martyrs in that psalm says: “Judge me, God.” He does not fear judgment: for he has nothing within him that the fire might consume; where there is all gold, what does the flame fear? “Judge me, God, and distinguish my cause from an unholy people.” Did he say: “Distinguish my punishment”? It could be said to him, “A thief suffered the punishment.” Did he say: “Distinguish my cross”? An adulterer was also enclosed there. Did he say: “Distinguish my chain”? Thieves were also bound there. Did he say: “Distinguish my wound”? Even criminals were killed by iron. Therefore, seeing that all things are common to both the good and the bad in passions, he cried out and said: “Judge me, Lord, and distinguish my cause from an unholy people. If you distinguish my cause, you crown my patience.” Let this be sufficient for your Charity as an exhortation in this holy place; for the days are short, and there are still things for us to do with your Charity in the larger basilica.

Sermons - Sermon 326

SERMO 326 ON THE BIRTHDAY OF THE MARTYRS The martyrs hastened to happiness. The solemnity of the most blessed Martyrs has made the day more joyful for us. We rejoice because the Martyrs have passed from the land of labor to the region of rest: but they earned this not by dancing, but by praying; not by drinking, but by fasting; not by quarrelling, but by enduring. Their parents were, I believe, grieved when they went to their passion: but they rejoiced and said: I rejoiced at the things that were said to me, we shall go into the house of the Lord. Do not, parents, do not mourn our joys. If you do not want those whom you have raised to go into hell; you ought to imitate, not hinder them. They knew where they were going, and unbelieving parents wept without reason. But then, parents loving their fleshly sons lamented: afterwards, believing in God, they said: You have turned my mourning into joy for me, you have cut my sackcloth, and girded me with gladness. Would that, brothers, the sack of penance be torn among us, and pour out the price of indulgence. All the Martyrs placed here the burdens of worldly gains, here they left them, and like good soldiers they ran the way that leads to life; as it is written: As having nothing, and yet possessing everything. And truly on earth they had nothing, but in heaven they possessed eternal happiness. Devoutly they hastened to heaven, and securely they ran the way of life; and though still distant, they extended their hands towards the palm. Run, saints; so run, that you may obtain. The kingdom of heaven suffers violence, and the violent take it by force. It is not narrow: anyone who wants to be blessed, let him hasten to the kingdom of heaven. It is closed to no one, except to him who excludes himself. Christ is ready to receive his confessors. He himself from above says: I watch you, I will help you battling, I will crown you as victors.

Interrogations of the persecutor and responses of the martyrs.

Holding this promise, the Martyrs regarded the terrors and threats of the persecutor as nothing. For when the persecutor said: "Sacrifice to the idols;" they answered: "We do not, because we have the eternal God in heaven, to whom we always sacrifice; for we do not offer to demons." And the judge: "Why then do you act against the sacred command?" They answered: "Because the heavenly master tells us in the Gospel: Whoever leaves father and mother, and wife, and children, and all that he possesses, for my name's sake, will receive a hundredfold and will inherit eternal life." And the judge: "So you will not obey the commands of the Emperors?" And they responded: "No." And he: "What authority then can you have, when you see yourselves subjected to punishment?" And the Martyrs said: "We bear the authority of the eternal King, therefore we do not care about the authority of a mortal man." Then, sent to prisons, they were burdened with chains. As much as was said by the impious: Where is their God? Let their God come, in whom they believed, and free them from the prisons, save them from the sword, save them from the beasts. They said all these things, but they did not overthrow those placed on the rock. They raged, but they did not fear. They knew where they were sent, and to where they were hastening. The Martyrs confessors were crowned, and the judges remained deserters. Thus God wants to test every Christian, so that being proven, He may crown him with the Martyrs.

Sermons - Sermon 327

SERMO 327 On the Birthday of the Martyrs.

Martyrs are distinguished from criminals, not by punishment, but by cause.

We have sung to God with the voice of martyrs: Judge me, O God, and plead my cause against an ungodly nation. It is the voice of martyrs. Who would dare to say: Judge me, O God, unless they have a most righteous cause? The soul is tempted by promises and threats, soothed by allurements, and tortured by pains: all were conquered for Christ by the unconquered martyrs. The world that promised was overcome, the raging world was overcome. Pleasure did not hold them, torture did not terrify them. Gold purified in the furnace does not fear the fire of hell. Therefore, as one purified by the fire of tribulation, the most blessed martyr confidently says: Judge me, O God. Whatever good you find in me, judge. You have granted me what pleases you; find it in me, and judge me. The sweetness of the world did not hold me, worldly tribulation does not divert me from you. Judge me, and plead my cause against an ungodly nation. Many suffer tribulations; they have the same punishment, but not the same cause. Adulterers suffer many evils, sorcerers suffer many evils, robbers and murderers suffer many evils, all wicked people suffer many evils, many evils, I say, and I, your martyr, suffer: but plead my cause against an ungodly nation, of robbers, murderers, and all the wicked. They can suffer such things as I do: but they cannot have such a cause. I am cleansed in the furnace; they turn to ashes. Even heretics suffer, and many at their own hands; and they want to be called martyrs. But against them we have sung: Plead my cause against an ungodly nation. It is not punishment that makes a martyr, but the cause. The punishment of the crucified was the same as the Lord's, but their cause was different. In the Lord's passion, there were three crosses; one punishment, but a different cause. To the right, one criminal; to the left, another criminal: in the middle, the judge, hanging between them on the cross, as if declaring from the tribunal, heard one saying: Save yourself if you are just; heard the other rebuking his companion and saying: Do you not fear God? We suffer for our evil deeds; for this man is just. He had a bad cause and discerned the martyr's cause. For what else is: We suffer for our evil deeds; for this man is just? Who would discern the cause of the martyrs from the cause of the impious suffering punishment? This man, he says, is recognized as just; we suffer for ourselves, for our evil deeds. Lord: see what he says to his companion in punishment. Christ was likewise hanging; but he was not equally despised. The Lord was recognized by the one hanging. It was a partnership in the cross; it was not one in the reward. What do I say? Do you give a reward to Christ, who is the giver of rewards? Lord, he says, remember me when you come into your kingdom. He saw the one hanging, he saw the one crucified; and he hoped he would reign. Remember, he says, me, not now, but when you come into your kingdom. I have done many evil deeds, I do not hope for a swift rest: let my torments suffice until your coming. Let me now be tortured; when you come, then spare me. He deferred himself; but Christ offered paradise to the one who did not seek it. Remember me: but when? When you come into your kingdom. And the Lord: Amen I say to you, today you will be with me in paradise. My disciples have deserted me, my disciples have despaired of me; and you acknowledged me on the cross, you did not despise me dying, you hoped I would reign: Today you will be with me in paradise. I do not depart from you. The cause is distinguished; is the punishment? Therefore, it is a good voice: Judge me, O God, and distinguish my cause from an ungodly nation. All of us who live in this world, let us strive to have a good cause: so that if anything happens to us in this world, we may leave with a good cause.

Sermons - Sermon 328

SERMO 328 On the Birthday of the Martyrs.

Christ first, having suffered, gave to martyrs the power to suffer. In the Psalm we said to our Lord God: Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints. Precious is the death of the holy martyrs; for their price is the blood of their Lord. For He suffered by His own passion, because they were to suffer after Him. He went before, and many followed. For the way was indeed very rough; but He made it smooth, when He Himself passed over it before all. Therefore, the others did not fear to pass, because He passed first. For He died, and His disciples were terrified. He rose again, and took away their fear, and gave them love. For when Christ died, the disciples trembled, and thought that He had perished. When they followed, there you see the grace of God. Then the thief believed, when the disciples trembled. For there was one thief on the cross with Him, and so believed in Him, that he said: Lord, remember me when You come into Your kingdom. Who was teaching him, except the One who was hanging beside him? For He was fixed at his side; but He dwelt in his heart.

How are martyrs truthful, if every man is a liar? Martyr in Greek, Witness in Latin. In this psalm, however, where we said: "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints," it is also written what you have heard: "I said in my ecstasy, 'Every man is a liar.'"

What do we say, brothers? Every man is a liar. Were the martyrs therefore also liars? If the martyrs were truthful, how is it true: Every man is a liar? Scripture says: Every man is a liar. If we say the martyrs were truthful, we make Scripture a liar. But if Scripture says the truth, that every man is a liar, then were the martyrs liars? How then do we show that both Scripture is truthful and the martyrs were truthful? Could it be that the martyrs were not men? But if they were men, how is it true: Every man is a liar? What then shall we do? We shall labor to show you that Scripture is true, and every man a liar; and that the martyrs were truthful because they died for the truth. For they are martyrs because they suffered for the truth. Martyr is a Greek word, and in Latin it is called Witness. If they were true witnesses, they spoke the truth; and by speaking the truth they received crowns. But if they were false witnesses, which is far from the case, they went not to crowns but to punishments, because it is written: A false witness shall not be unpunished. Therefore let us show that they were truthful. They already showed themselves to be truthful when they were willing to die for the truth. How then is Scripture truthful, which says: Every man is a liar? Let us ask our Lord Jesus Christ; and he himself will solve this question for us. From where will he solve it for us? From the Gospel, from which just now we were speaking, when it was being read to you.

True martyrs, because in them the Spirit of God spoke. For you have heard, when the Gospel was being read, that the Lord Jesus said to the martyrs: When they deliver you up, do not be anxious how you are to speak or what you are to say, for what you are to say will be given to you in that hour. For it is not you who speak, but the Spirit of your Father speaking through you. For if you speak, you speak falsely: for every man is a liar. Therefore the Lord Himself saw that every man is a liar, and so He gave His Spirit to the martyrs; so that they would not speak on their own, but His Spirit would speak through them: so that they would not be liars, but truthful. Behold why they were truthful; because it was not they who spoke, but His Spirit. And now what we speak to you, if we speak of our own accord, we lie. But if what we say to you are the words of the Spirit of God, then they are true. And you, make progress: do not wish to speak on your own part, if you wish to speak the truth; that you may not remain human liars, but become truth-speaking children of God. To suffer for the truth is of the martyrs; to suffer for falsehood, even of the impious. Let a good cause of suffering be chosen.

All heretics also suffer for falsehood, not for truth: because they lie against Christ himself. All pagans, impious whatever they suffer, suffer for falsehood. Therefore, let no one exalt himself and boast about suffering, but first let him show the truth of his words. You show the punishment, I seek the cause. You say, I suffered: I ask why you suffered. For if we only consider sufferings, even robbers would be crowned. Does he dare to say: I suffered so much and so much? Why? Because it is said to him: Because of your evil deeds; therefore, you had an evil punishment, because you first had an evil cause. If it is glorious to suffer; even the devil himself could boast. See how much he suffers, whose temples everywhere are overthrown, whose idols everywhere are broken, whose priests and possessed are everywhere slain. Can he say: I am a martyr, because I suffer so much! Therefore, let the man of God first choose for himself the cause, and safely approach the punishment. Because if he approaches punishment for a good cause, after the punishment he will also receive the crown. The certainty of the future judgment. The resurrection of each with their cause. Harsher punishments for the condemned after the resurrection.

Therefore, the righteous will be in eternal memory, and will not fear bad news. For the judge of all the living and the dead is coming, as we read in the Gospel. And it is true, because those things which we now see did not exist when they were foretold as future. What you see now is the name of Christ being preached among all nations, people turning to one God, idols being abandoned, demons being abandoned, temples being overthrown, images being shattered; all these things did not yet exist, yet they were foretold, and now they are seen. Therefore, in the Scriptures where these things, which we now see, are written (they were written then when they were not seen, but were promised as future), we read about things that have not yet come. For the day of judgment has not yet come, the resurrection of the dead has not yet come, He who was first to be judged has not yet come to judge. Judged unjustly, He will judge justly. Deferring power, showing patience when He wishes. Therefore, He will come, and just as He promised to come with His angels, so He will come and appear in glory to all, even to those resurrected. For each one will be resurrected with their cause. For as one is received into the prison upon dying, so they proceed to the judge in the same state. Now is the time to settle one's cause, as once enclosed, they cannot. Therefore, those who have good causes are received into rest: however, those who have bad causes are received into punishment. But they will endure greater punishments when they have been resurrected: in comparison with which, the ones that the souls of wicked men endure after death are like the dreams of those tormented in their sleep. For their souls suffer, their flesh does not suffer. However, a greater torment is if one is tortured while awake.

Therefore, when all have risen and appeared before the just judge, as he himself predicted, he will separate them as the shepherd separates the sheep from the goats: he will place the goats on the left, but the sheep on the right. And he will say to those who are on the right: Come, blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. At this voice the right ones rejoice, the just rejoice. But to those who are on the left, he will say: Go into eternal fire with the devil and his angels. From this evil hearing, the just will not fear. The blessedness and glory of the martyrs are greater after the resurrection. The fruits of their deeds not yet received, the holy martyrs are blessed now, for their souls are with Christ. But what is prepared for them in the resurrection, who can express in words? What eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor has entered into the heart of man, what God has prepared for those who love Him. If the great goods that the faithful are going to receive cannot be explained by words; not without reason such rewards are prepared for those who have fought for the truth even unto blood. The world did not allure them, terror did not break them, torments did not conquer them, blandishments did not deceive them. Their bodies themselves will have great adornments, in which they suffered great torments. The punishment does not make a martyr, but the cause. A great thief was crucified with Christ. But if we love them, let us imitate them so that we first choose a good cause and for the sake of a good cause endure whatever troubles may come in this world with an even mind. For many have not chosen the cause and died for a bad cause as evil. They lost their patience because they did not hold onto wisdom. It is not punishment that makes a martyr, but the cause. For if punishment made a martyr, then a thief when he is killed is a martyr. Do you want to know that it is not the punishment but the cause that makes a martyr? Consider those three crosses where the Lord was crucified in the midst of two thieves. The punishment was equal, but the cause separated those whom the punishment joined. One of those thieves, while hanging, believed in the Lord Jesus Christ. And he said first to his peer—for the other thief, his peer, insulted the Lord Jesus Christ and said to him: "Save yourself if you are the Son of God"—and the other thief said to his peer: "Do you not fear God, we indeed justly, for we are receiving the due reward of our deeds; but this man has done nothing wrong." Oh to confess! Because if he confessed, he was not hanging there without reason! Then he said to the Lord Christ: "Lord, remember me when you come into your kingdom." What faith! He whom he saw crucified, he also hoped would reign. The thief did not disdain the common punishment in Christ. He saw him dying like himself and hoped he would reign over him. This thief was great! He took the kingdom of heaven by force. Where did he learn this? He was robbing at the throat, brought to the judge, received a sentence, from throat to judge, from judge to cross. Where did he learn what he said, unless there was a teacher nearby who taught him? For the Lord Christ, the teacher of all, was hanging beside him and teaching in his breast. Why did I say this, brothers? Because it is not punishment but the cause that makes a martyr. There were three crosses. Equal punishment but the cause is different. One to be damned, the other to be saved, in the middle the condemner and Savior. One he punished, the other he absolved. That cross was a tribunal. To love the martyrs is to imitate their faith and patience. Conquer what you feel inside, and those who plot against you outside are conquered.

Therefore, brothers, let us strive while we live to hold true faith, to be in the true Church of God, to lead a good life, if we love the martyrs, so that having a good cause we may be able to imitate them. But let no one say, "I cannot be a martyr because there is no persecution now." Temptations do not cease. The struggle and the crown are prepared. When, perhaps? Behold, as I mention something—for it is too long to recount all the situations in which the Christian soul is tempted and with God’s help conquers and makes great victories, unseen by anyone, enclosed in the body; it fights in the heart, is crowned in the heart but by Him who sees in the heart—behold therefore as I say something: perhaps one of you is sick. As human reasons are, how many are in peril! And they come to the one who lies in bed and say to him or perform bindings or some unknown characters, and he is tempted and is told, "Do this and that." – Whoever does all these things perishes with the devil because all these things are not sacraments of angels but machinations of demons. – Therefore whoever despises these and sometimes hears, "Unless you do these things you will die," but answers him, "It is better for me to die than to do this," lies in bed and undergoes martyrdom. Lying in bed weary and exhausted with fevers, he cannot move himself and wrestles. He does not move his limbs and with the arms of faith strangles the lion about which the apostle Peter says: Do you not know that your adversary the devil prowls around like a roaring lion looking for someone to devour. He described the devil like a roaring lion prowling and looking to take or harm something from the fold. He does not cease. Never until the end does he abstain from his ambushes. Therefore, if our adversary does not sleep, we fight daily. And we do not see our adversary himself and we conquer. Why do we not see him? Because we feel internally from where he wants to conquer us and we subdue it. You do not see your enemy the devil but you feel your avarice in you. You do not see the devil your enemy but you feel your lust in you. You do not see the devil your enemy but you feel your anger in you. Conquer what you feel within and those who ambush from outside are conquered. Therefore, this is to love the martyrs, this is to celebrate the days of the martyrs with devoted piety, not to indulge in wine but to imitate their faith and patience.

Sermons - Sermon 329

SERMO 329 On the Birthday of the Martyrs Precious is the death of the Martyrs bought at the price of the death of Christ.

Through the glorious deeds of the holy martyrs, by which the Church flourishes everywhere, we ourselves prove with our own eyes how true it is that we sang, because precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints: when both in our sight it is precious, and in his sight, for whose name it was done. But the price of these deaths is the death of one. How many deaths did one dying man purchase, who, if he had not died, the grain of wheat would not be multiplied? You heard his words when he was approaching his passion, that is, when he was approaching our redemption: Unless a grain of wheat falls into the ground and dies, it remains alone: but if it dies, it brings forth much fruit. For in the cross he made a great exchange; there the money bag of our price was loosed: when his side was opened by the spear of the soldier, thence flowed forth the price of the whole world. The faithful and the martyrs were bought: but the faith of the martyrs was proven; the blood is the witness. What was spent on them, they returned, and fulfilled what Saint John said: As Christ laid down his life for us, so we ought to lay down our lives for the brothers. And elsewhere it is said: At a great table you have sat, carefully consider what is set before you, for such things you must prepare. A great table is where the Lord of the table himself is the feast. No one feeds the guests from himself: this the Lord Christ does; he is the inviter, he is the food and drink. Therefore the martyrs recognized what they ate and drank, so that they might render such things.

Martyrs are victors not of themselves, but by the grace of God. But from where could they return such things, unless He gave from where they could return, who first bestowed it? Hence also the Psalm, where it is written, we sang: Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints; what does it commend to us? There, a man considered how much he had received from God; he looked around at how many gifts of the Almighty's grace he had received, who created him, who sought him when he was lost, who forgave him when found, who helped him when he struggled with weak strength, who did not withdraw from him when he was in danger, who crowned him when he was victorious, who gave himself as a reward: he considered all these things, and exclaimed, and said: What shall I render to the Lord for all He has rendered to me? He did not want to be ungrateful, he wanted to repay, and he had nothing to repay. He did not say: What shall I render to the Lord for all that He has given me; but, for all He has rendered to me? He did not give, but rendered. If He rendered, we had offered something. Indeed, we had offered our evils, He rendered His goods: for He rendered good for evil, when we rendered evil for ourselves. Therefore he seeks what to repay; he suffers distress, he does not find from where to pay the debt: What shall I render to the Lord for all He has rendered to me? And as if he found what he could render: I will take the cup of salvation, he says, and call upon the name of the Lord. What is this? Surely he was thinking of giving back. Yet he still seeks to receive: I will take the cup of salvation. What is this cup? The cup of bitter and healing passion: the cup which, unless the doctor first drank it, the patient would fear to touch. This is that cup: we recognize it in the mouth of Christ saying: Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me. For even the sons of Zebedee sought exalted places through their mother, to sit one at His right and the other at His left: to whom He said: Are you able to drink the cup that I shall drink? Do you seek height? It comes through the valley to the mountain. Do you seek the seat of glory? First drink the cup of humility. Concerning this cup the martyrs said: I will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord. Are you not afraid you may fail there? No, he says. Why? Because I will call upon the name of the Lord. How would the martyrs have conquered, unless He conquered in the martyrs, who said: Rejoice, because I have overcome the world? The Emperor of heaven ruled their minds and tongues, and through them conquered the devil on earth, and crowned the martyrs in heaven. O blessed are those who thus drank this cup! They ended their pains and received honors. Therefore, consider, beloved: what you cannot see with your eyes, think and contemplate with mind and soul, and see that precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints.

Sermons - Sermon 33

SERMO 33 ON THAT WHICH IS WRITTEN IN PSALM 143:

"GOD, I WILL SING A NEW SONG TO YOU"

Charity sings a new song.

Since it is written: God, I will sing a new song to you, I will play on a ten-stringed harp for you; the ten-stringed harp, the ten commandments of the law are understood. But singing and playing are usually the business of lovers. For the old man is in fear, the new in love. Thus also we distinguish the two Testaments, the old and the new, which the Apostle says are also figured in the children of Abraham, one from the slave woman, the other from the free woman: Which are, he says, the two Testaments. For slavery pertains to fear, freedom to love. For the Apostle says: You have not received the spirit of slavery again in fear, but you have received the spirit of adoption as sons, in which we cry: Abba, Father. And John says: There is no fear in love, but perfect love casts out fear. Therefore, love sings a new song. For that servile fear in the old man can indeed have a ten-stringed harp, because the Jews themselves were given the law of the ten commandments; but they cannot sing a new song with it. For they are under the law and cannot fulfill the law. They carry the instrument itself, but do not play it; they are burdened with the harp, not adorned by it. But he who is under grace, not under the law, fulfills the law, because it is not a burden to him but a grace, not torment to one who fears but an ornament to one who loves. Enkindled by the spirit of love, he now sings a new song on the ten-stringed harp. The fullness of the law is love. For thus says the Apostle: For he who loves another has fulfilled the law. For you shall not commit adultery, you shall not kill, you shall not steal, you shall not covet, and if there is any other commandment, it is summed up in this saying: You shall love your neighbor as yourself. Love does no harm to a neighbor. Therefore, love is the fulfillment of the law. The Lord also, because he said: I have not come to abolish the law, but to fulfill it, for this reason gave such a commandment to his disciples, by which the law could be fulfilled by them: A new commandment, he said, I give to you, that you love one another. It is therefore not surprising if a new commandment sings a new song, because, as it is said, the ten-stringed psaltery signifies the ten commandments of the law, and the fulfillment of the law is love. However, the Apostle wanted to mention a few of these strings, so that from them the others might be understood, where he says: For you shall not commit adultery, you shall not kill, and so on. For just as there are two commandments of love, of which the Lord says all the Law and the Prophets depend, thus sufficiently showing that love is the fulfillment of the law, so the ten commandments themselves were given on two tablets. For it is said that three were written on one tablet, and seven on the other. Just as these three pertain to the love of God, so the other seven pertain to the love of neighbor. Of the first three commandments of the Decalogue. The first is of those three: Hear, O Israel: The Lord your God is one Lord. You shall not make for yourself an idol, or any likeness, neither that which is in the heaven above, nor that which is on the earth below, and so on, by which he binds us to the worship of one God, leaving behind the fornication of idols. The second commandment, however, is: You shall not take the name of the Lord your God in vain. The third, concerning the observance of the Sabbath. I believe that on account of the Trinity, three commandments pertain to the love of God. For the unity of divinity has its origin from the Father, hence the first commandment speaks chiefly about one God. We are reminded by the second commandment, lest we consider the Son of God as a creature if we receive him as unequal to the Father. For every creature, as the Apostle says, is subjected to vanity. There it is commanded that we should not take the name of the Lord our God in vain. Now indeed the gift of God, which is the Holy Spirit, promises eternal rest which the Sabbath signifies. Hence we observe the Sabbath spiritually, if we do not perform servile works. For even the Jews are prohibited from these on the Sabbath in a carnal understanding. However, because he wishes to understand spiritual servile works, let him hear the Lord saying: Everyone who commits sin is a slave to sin. But sin is not only that which appears to men in shameful or unjust deeds, but also if it has the appearance of good work, and yet it is done for a temporal reward not for eternal rest. For whatever anyone does, if he does it with the intention of obtaining earthly gain, he does it servilely, and therefore does not observe the Sabbath. For God is to be loved freely, nor can the soul rest except in that which it loves. But eternal rest is not given to it, except in the love of God who alone is eternal. And this is the perfect sanctification and spiritual Sabbath of Sabbaths. Therefore, since we are sanctified in the Holy Spirit, who is there who would not be moved to understanding the great sacrament, which in the three commandments pertaining to God, the third commandment is about the Sabbath? And in all those things which Scripture recounts that God made in the book of Genesis, it is not said there that he sanctified any day except the seventh day, which signifies the Sabbath.

Seven commandments are attributed to the love of neighbor. The first of the seven commandments that pertain to the love of neighbor is: Honor your father and your mother. The second: You shall not kill. The third: You shall not commit adultery. The fourth: You shall not steal. The fifth: You shall not bear false witness. The sixth: You shall not covet your neighbor's wife. The seventh: You shall not covet your neighbor's goods. The Apostle clearly attests to this distribution when he says: Honor your father and your mother, which is the first commandment. For it is inquired, and it is not found in the whole Decalogue to be the first, because the first of the ten commandments is that which commands the worship of one God. And therefore, the commandment to honor parents is written on another tablet, and it is first because it begins the commandments that pertain to the love of neighbor. The Donatists do not sing the hymn of charity.

Let us sing, therefore, a new song, singing praise with a psaltery of ten strings. This is the new song, the grace of the New Testament, which distinguishes us from the old man, who was first made of the earth, earthly. For he was made from the clay, and having lost blessedness, he was justly cast into misery, because he had become a transgressor of the commandment. But what does the one who gives thanks to the grace of God through the forgiveness of sins, reconciling us to God and renewing the old things of the past, say in the words of the Prophet? He says, "He brought me out of the pit of misery and out of the mire of clay, and set my feet upon a rock, and directed my steps, and put a new song in my mouth, a hymn to our God." This is the new song, which is sung with a psaltery of ten strings. For no one praises God, that is, sings a hymn, unless he agrees with his mouth by his deeds, by loving God and neighbor. Nor should the rebaptizing Donatists think they belong to the new song. For they do not sing the new song, who, with arrogant impiety, have been cut off from the Church, which God wished to be in all the earth. For indeed, elsewhere the same Prophet says, "Sing to the Lord a new song, sing to the Lord, all the earth." Therefore, he who does not wish to sing with all the earth, staying with the old man, does not sing the new song, nor does he play on the psaltery of ten strings, because he is an enemy of charity, which is the fullness of the law, which we say is contained in the ten commandments pertaining to the love of God and neighbor.

Sermons - Sermon 330

SERMO 330 On the Birthday of the Martyrs The beginning of the discourse. The feast of the blessed martyrs and your Holiness's expectation demand a discourse from us. For we understand that it is fitting for us to speak on this day. You wish this, we desire this: may He grant the ability, who gives the will, in whose hands are both we and our words. For in this, the martyrs burned with flame: kindled with love for the unseen, they despised the visible. What did he love in himself, who despised even himself, lest he lose himself? For they were temples of God, and felt the true God dwell within them; therefore they did not worship false gods. They had heard, eagerly imbibed, and committed to the deepest marrow of their hearts, and in a way had internalized what the Lord said: "If anyone wishes to come after me, let him deny himself." He says, "Let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me." I want to say something from this, and your eagerness frightens me, prayer commands. A disciple of Christ ought to deny himself.

What is it, I ask you: If anyone wants to come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me? We understand what it is: let him take up his cross; let him endure his tribulation: for to take up is to carry, to bear. Patiently, he says, let him accept all that he suffers for my sake. And follow me. Where? Where do we know that he went after the resurrection? For he ascended into heaven and sits at the right hand of the Father. There he placed us also. Meanwhile, let hope precede, so that reality may follow. How hope should precede, those who listen know, "Lift up your hearts." But it remains necessary to seek, with the Lord's help, and to examine, and with his opening, to enter, and with his gift, to find, and to bring to you what we have been able to find out, what it means when he says: Let him deny himself. How does he deny himself who loves himself? It is in the way of reason, but human reason: a man says to me: How does he deny himself who loves himself? But God says to man, Let him deny himself, if he loves himself. For by loving himself, he loses himself: by denying himself, he finds himself. He who loves, he says, his soul, will lose it. He commands who knows what he commands, for he knows how to heal who knows how to instruct, and he knows how to restore who has deigned to create. He who loves, let him lose. It is a sorrowful thing to lose what you love. But sometimes even the farmer loses what he sows. He brings out, scatters, casts away, buries. Why do you wonder? That despiser and destroyer is a covetous harvester. Winter and summer have proved what has been done; they have shown you the joy of the reaper, the counsel of the sower. Therefore, he who loves his soul, will lose it. He who seeks fruit in it, let him sow it. This is, therefore, let him deny himself, lest by loving it perversely, he lose himself.

Perverse self-love is truly self-contempt. Love of money to the point of contempt for the soul. For no one exists who does not love himself; but righteous love is to be sought, perverse love to be avoided. For whoever, forsaking God, loves himself, and forsakes God by loving himself, remains not even in himself, but goes out and away from himself. He goes out as an exile from his own heart, despising the inner, loving the outer. What did I say? Do not all who do evil despise their own conscience? But he sets a limit to his own iniquity, whoever has blushed for his own conscience. Therefore, because he despised God in order to love himself, by loving what is outside himself, which he is not, he also despised himself. See, hear the Apostle bearing witness to this sentiment: In the last days, he says, perilous times will come. What are perilous times? Men will be lovers of themselves. This is the source of evil. Let us see, then, if they even remain in themselves by loving themselves; let us see, let us hear what follows: Men will be lovers of themselves, covetous. Where are you who loved yourself? Surely you are outside. I ask you, is money you? Surely because you loved yourself, neglecting God, by loving money you also forsook yourself. First you forsook yourself, then you lost yourself. For the love of money caused you to lose yourself. You lie for the sake of money: a lying mouth kills the soul. Behold, while seeking money, you lost your soul. Bring forth the balance of truth, not greed: bring forth the scale, but of truth, not greed; bring it forth, I beseech you, and place money on one side and the soul on the other. Now you weigh, and apply fraudulent fingers out of greed; you want the part with money to sink. Place it, do not weigh: you wish to cheat yourself; I see what you are doing. You wish to prefer money to your soul; to lie for it, to lose this. Place it, let God weigh; He who cannot be deceived nor deceive, let Him weigh. Behold, He is weighing; see Him weighing, hear Him reporting: What does it profit a man if he gain the whole world? It is the divine voice, it is the voice of the one weighing, not deceiving; reporting, admonishing. You placed money on one side and the soul on the other; see where you placed the money. What does He who weighs respond? You placed money: What does it profit a man if he gain the whole world, but suffer the loss of his soul? But you wanted to weigh the soul with gain: weigh it with the world. You wanted to lose it so that the earth could be acquired by you: it has more weight than heaven and earth. But you do this because by forsaking God and loving yourself, you went out and away from yourself; and now you value external things more than yourself. Return to yourself: but again, when you return to yourself, do not remain in yourself. Return first from those things outside to yourself, and then give yourself back to Him who made you, and sought you when lost, and found you when fleeing, and turned you back to Himself when you were turned away. Therefore return to yourself, and go to Him who made you. Imitate that younger son; for perhaps you are him. I speak to the people, not to one man; even if all can hear me, I speak not to one, but to the human race. Therefore return, be that younger son, who lived wastefully with his substance dispersed and lost, needed, fed pigs, fatigued by hunger breathed, recalled his father in his memory. And what does the Gospel say about him? And he returned to himself. He who had forsaken even himself, returned to himself, let us see if he remained in himself. Returning to himself he said: I will arise. Therefore he had fallen. I will arise, he said, and go to my father. Behold, now he denies himself, who found himself. How does he deny himself? Listen: And I will say to him, I have sinned, he said, against heaven and before you. He denies himself. I am no longer worthy to be called your son. Behold what the holy martyrs did. They despised the things that were outside; all the allurements of this world, all its errors and terrors, whatever pleased, whatever terrified, they despised everything, they trampled everything. They came even to themselves, and considered themselves; they found themselves within themselves, they were displeased with themselves: they ran to Him who had formed them, in whom they could be revived, in whom they could abide, in whom what they had become by themselves would perish, and what He had created in them would remain. This is denying oneself.

Peter's fear upon hearing of the future passion of Christ. He said he would deny himself anything. This Peter the apostle could not yet understand when he said to our Lord Jesus Christ, who was predicting His passion: "Far be it from you, Lord; this shall not happen to you." He was afraid that life would die. Just now, when the holy Gospel was read, you heard what blessed Peter responded to the Savior as He was predicting, and in a certain way promising, His passion for us. The captive was contradicting the Redeemer. What are you doing, Apostle? How do you contradict? How do you say: "This shall not happen"? Will the Lord not suffer then? The word of the cross is a stumbling block to you; it is foolishness to those who are perishing. You need to be redeemed, and you contradict the Redeemer? Let Him suffer: He knows what He is doing, He knows why He came, He knows how to seek you, He knows how to find you. Do not teach your teacher; seek your price from His side. Rather, listen to Him who corrects you: do not will to correct Him; it is perverse, it is preposterous. Listen to what He says: "Get behind me." And because He said it, I say it; I will not be silent about the word of the Lord, nor will I insult the Apostle. The Lord Christ said: "Get behind me, Satan." Why Satan? Because you want to go before me. Do you not want to be Satan? Get behind me. For if you go behind me, you follow me; if you follow me, you will take up your cross, and you will not be my counselor, but my disciple. For why did you fear, when the Lord predicted His death? Why did you fear, except because you too feared to die? By fearing to die, you did not deny yourself, by loving yourself wrongly, you denied Him. But afterward, blessed Peter the apostle, after denying the Lord three times, erased that fault by weeping: strengthened by the Lord's resurrection, he was built up and died for Him whom he had denied by fearing to die; by confessing, he found death, but by finding death, he seized life. And behold now, Peter does not die; all fear has passed, no more tears for him, all has gone away, he remains blessed with Christ. For he trod down all outward allurements, threats, and terrors: he denied himself, took up his cross, and followed the Lord. Listen to the apostle Paul also denying himself: "Far be it from me," he says, "to glory, except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom the world is crucified to me, and I to the world." Still listen to him denying himself: "I live," he says, "yet not I." An open denial of self: but now follows a glorious confession of Christ, "Christ lives in me." What then is, "Deny yourself"? Do not live in yourself. What is, "Do not live in yourself"? Do not do your own will, but His who dwells in you.

Sermons - Sermon 331

SERMO 331 On the Birthday of the Martyrs To love and to lose one's soul is understood in two ways. That evangelical trumpet, when the Lord says: "Who loves his soul will lose it; and he who loses it for my sake will find it," the martyrs are kindled for battle; and they conquered because they did not presume of themselves, but of the Lord. "Who loves his soul will lose it." This can be understood in two ways, that which is said: "Who loves his soul will lose it." If you love it, you lose it. And another way: Do not love, lest you lose it. The former way has this sense: If you love, lose it. If you love it, therefore, if you love, lose it. Here, sow it, and in heaven, you will reap it. The farmer, if he does not lose wheat in the seed, does not love it in the harvest. Another way has it thus: Do not love it, lest you lose it. They seem to love their souls, who fear to die. The martyrs, if they had thus loved their souls, would undoubtedly have lost them. For what would it profit to hold onto life in this world and lose it in the future? What would it profit to hold onto life on earth and lose it in heaven? And what is it to hold onto it? How long to hold onto it? What you hold, perishes from you: if you lose it, you find it in yourself. Behold, the martyrs have held their souls. And how would they have been martyrs if they had always held them? But behold, if they had held them, would they have lived until today? If by denying Christ they had held onto their souls in this life, would they not have long since passed from this life, and certainly lost their souls? But because they did not deny Christ; they passed from this world to the Father. They sought Christ, by confessing; they held onto Him by dying. Thus they lost their lives with great gain; losing straw: earning the crown: earning the crown, I say, and holding eternal life. A martyr is made not by the punishment, but by the cause. Those who die for Christ have not acted for Christ, but for themselves.

Finally, it happens, or rather it has happened in them, what the Lord subsequently added: And he who loses his life for my sake will find it. He who loses, he says, for my sake. The whole cause lies there. He who loses, not in any way, not for any cause, but for my sake. For the martyrs had already said in prophecy: For your sake, we are put to death all day long. Therefore, it is not the punishment that makes the martyr, but the cause. When the Lord suffered, He distinguished three crosses for a cause. He was crucified among two thieves: the criminals were fastened here and there, He in the middle. And as if that wood were a tribunal, He condemned the one who insulted, and crowned the one who confessed. What will He do when He will judge, if He could do this when judged? Already, therefore, He was discerning the crosses. For, if we consider the punishment, Christ was similar to the thieves. But if someone asks why Christ was crucified; He responds to us, Because of you. Therefore let them and the martyrs say: And we died for you. He for us, we however for Him. But He for us, to confer a benefit on us: we however for Him, not to impart a benefit to Him. Therefore, in both respects it was managed for us: what pours out from Him, comes to us; and what is done for Him, returns to us. For He is indeed the one of whom the soul that rejoices in the Lord says: I said to the Lord, You are my God; because you do not need my goods. For what goods do I have, except those given by you? And how does He need any good, from whom every good is given? The gifts of God are common to the good and the bad. What is specific is reserved for the good.

He gave us nature, that we might be: He gave us a soul, that we might live: He gave us a mind, that we might understand: He gave us nourishment, that we might sustain mortal life: He gave light from heaven, springs from the earth. But all these are common gifts to the good and the wicked. If He gave these also to the wicked, does He then reserve nothing special for the good? Indeed He does reserve something special. And what is that which He reserves for the good? That which eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor has entered into the heart of man. For if it entered into the heart of man, it was below the heart of man: therefore it ascended into the heart, because it is above the heart into which it ascends. That which He reserves for the good, the heart ascends there. Not what ascends into your heart, but where your heart ascends, this God reserves for you. Do not listen with deaf ears, Lift up your heart. Therefore that which eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor has entered into the heart of man; the eye has not seen, for it is not color; the ear has not heard, for it is not sound; nor has it ascended into the heart, for it is not an earthly thought. Thus understand: That which eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor has entered into the heart of man, which God has prepared for those who love Him.

God Himself will be the reward of the good.

Perhaps you ask me what this means. Ask Him who began to dwell in you. Yet I also say what I feel about it. For you are asking what God keeps for the good, if He bestows so many things on both the good and the bad. And when I would say: "What no eye has seen, nor ear heard, nor the heart of man conceived," there are those who say, "Do you wonder what this is?" Behold what God keeps only for the good, whom He Himself has made good: behold what it is. Briefly, our reward is defined by the prophet: "I will be their God, and they will be My people." I will be their God: He Himself promised Himself as a reward to us. Seek anything else if you find something better. If I were to say, "He promised gold," you would rejoice; He promised Himself, and you are sad? If a rich man does not have God, what does he have? Seek nothing from God except God. Love freely, desire only Him from Him. Do not fear poverty: He gives Himself to us, and He is enough for us. Let Him give Himself to us, and He will be enough for us. Listen to the Apostle Philip in the Gospel: "Lord, show us the Father, and it is enough for us."

Greedy martyrs of gold.

Why then do you marvel, brothers, if the lovers of God, the martyrs, endured so much to gain God? See how much the lovers of gold endure. They commit themselves to navigation in the harshness of winter: so fervent are they in avarice, that they fear no cold; they are tossed by winds, suspended and plunged by waves; they are driven up to death by ineffable dangers. Let them too say to gold: For your sake we are mortified all day long. Let the martyrs say to Christ: For your sake we are mortified all day long. The voice indeed is similar: but the cause is very dissimilar. Behold, both have said it, these to Christ, those to gold: For your sake we are mortified all day long. Let Christ respond to His martyrs, If you die for me, you will find both yourselves and me. But let gold respond to the greedy, If you are shipwrecked for me, you will lose both yourselves and me. Therefore loving and imitating; not loving in vain, but loving and imitating, let us celebrate the days of the martyrs, and let our fervors be mitigated by the coolness of joys. For we shall reign with them without end, if we love them faithfully and not in vain.

Sermons - Sermon 332

SERMO 332 ON THE BIRTHDAY OF THE MARTYRS Martyrs, therefore, friends of Christ. We are commanded to love one another for the sake of the kingdom of God. When we honor the martyrs, we honor the friends of Christ. Do you ask what made them friends of Christ? Christ himself showed: for he said: This is my commandment, that you love one another. They love each other who watch actors together, they love each other who get drunk together in taverns, they love each other joined together with a bad conscience. Therefore, when Christ said: This is my commandment, that you love one another, he had to distinguish the kind of love. He certainly did: listen. For when he said: This is my commandment, that you love one another, he immediately added as I have loved you. Love one another in this way, for the sake of the kingdom of God, for the sake of eternal life. Love together, but love me. You would love one another if you loved the actor together: love one another more by loving together him who cannot displease, the Savior.

How much we are commanded to love one another. The Lord came further and taught further: as if we said to Him, "And how have you loved us, so that we also may know how we ought to love?" Hear: "Greater love has no one than this, that someone lay down his life for his friends." Thus love one another, so that each one may lay down his life for others. For this is what the martyrs did, which John the Evangelist also says in his Epistle: "As Christ laid down his life for us, so we ought to lay down our lives for the brothers." You approach the table of the powerful: you know, faithful ones, to which table you approach: recall the Scripture saying: "When you sit at the table of the powerful, know that you must prepare such things." To which table of the powerful do you approach? He offers Himself to you, not a table prepared by the art of cooks: Christ offers you His table, that is, Himself. Approach this table, and be filled. Be poor, and you will be satisfied. "The poor will eat and be satisfied." Know that you must prepare such things. To understand, pay attention to John the expositor. For perhaps you did not know what it means: "When you sit at the table of the powerful, know that you must prepare such things." Hear the expositor: "As Christ laid down His life for us, so we ought to prepare such things." What does it mean to prepare such things? To lay down our lives for the brothers. The love of God is a gift.

You approached as a poor man to be satiated: how will you prepare such things? Ask from Him who invited you, so that you have from where you may feed Him. Unless He Himself gives to you, you will have nothing. But do you already have some charity? Do not credit this to yourself: for what do you have that you have not received? Do you already have some charity? Ask that it may increase, ask that it may be perfected, until you reach that table, than which there is none greater in this life. No one has greater love than this, that one lay down his life for his friends. You approached a poor man, you depart rich: rather, you do not depart, but by staying you will be rich. The martyrs received from Him what they suffered for Him: believe; they received from Him. The Father of the household gave to them from where they might feed Him. We have Him, let us ask from Him. And if we are less worthy to receive, let us ask through His friends, who have fed Him from His gift. Let them pray for us, that He may grant to us also. And in order that we may have more, we receive from heaven. Hear John the forerunner of Him: A man cannot receive anything, unless it be given him from heaven. Therefore, what we have, we received from heaven; and in order that we may have more, we receive from heaven.

Fornicators will not enter the heavenly city. This is the city that descends from heaven: let us be such that we may enter it. For you have heard who shall enter, and who shall not enter. Do not be such as you have heard will not enter: especially fornicators. For when the Scripture mentioned those who will not enter, it also named murderers: you were not terrified. It named fornicators: I heard because you struck your breasts. I heard, I heard, I saw: and what I did not see in your chambers, I saw in the sound, I saw in your breasts, when you struck your breasts. Cast out sin from there: for to strike the breasts and do the same things, is nothing else but paving sins. My brothers, my sons, be chaste, love chastity, embrace chastity, cherish purity: because God, the author of purity, seeks it in His temple, which you are; He expels the impure from the temple. Your wives are enough for you, because you want to be enough for your wives. You do not want anything from her beyond you: do nothing beyond her. You are the lord, she is the handmaid: God made both. Sarah, Scripture says, obeyed Abraham, calling him lord. It is true; the bishop subscribed to these tables: your wives are your handmaids, you are the lords of your wives. But when it comes to that business, where sex is distinguished and each sex is mixed with the other; The wife does not have authority over her own body, but the husband. You rejoiced, you stood up, you boasted. The Apostle spoke well, the chosen vessel spoke excellently: The wife does not have authority over her own body, but the husband. Because I am the lord. You praised: listen to what follows, listen to what you do not want, I ask you to be willing. What is this? Listen: Likewise also the husband; the lord; likewise also the husband does not have authority over his own body, but the wife. Listen to this gladly. Your vice is removed, not your dominion: your adulteries are prohibited, not your wives lifted above. You are a man, show it: for man is from virtue, or virtue from man. Do you then have virtue? Conquer lust. The head of the woman, he says, is the man. If you are the head, lead, and let her follow: but see where you lead her. You are the head, lead where she should follow: but do not go where you do not wish her to follow. See that you walk in a straight path, lest you fall into a pit. Thus prepare yourselves to enter that new bride, that beautiful one, adorned for her husband, not with jewels, but with virtues. For if you enter chaste, and holy, and good, you will be members of that new bride, the blessed and glorious heavenly Jerusalem.

Sermons - Sermon 333

SERMO 333 On the Birthday of the Martyrs Security given to the martyrs. Patience given by God, how it is ours. Our bread, Christ. Our Lord Jesus Christ, to his witnesses, that is, to his martyrs who were anxious about human frailty, lest by confessing and dying they might perish, gave great security, saying to them: "Not a hair from your head shall perish." Therefore, are you afraid that you might perish, when your hair will not perish? If such superfluous parts of you are preserved, in how great protection is your soul? A hair, which you do not feel when it is cut, does not perish, and shall your soul, through which you feel, perish? Indeed, he predicted that they would endure many hard things, so that by predicting it, he might make them more ready, and they might say: "My heart is prepared." What does: "My heart is prepared" mean, except: "My will is prepared"? Therefore, martyrs have a prepared will in martyrdom, but: "The will is prepared by the Lord." After recounting those future hard and harsh evils, he added: "By your patience, you will possess your souls." By your patience, he said; for it would not be your patience if your will were not in it as well. By your patience; but how is it ours? What is had by us is ours, and what is given to us is also ours; for if it were not ours, it would not be given. For how do you give something, except that it becomes the possession of whom you give it to? That confession is open: "Will my soul not be subjected to God? For from him is my patience." He himself says to us: "By your patience." Let us also say to him: "From him is my patience." He made it yours by giving it: do not be ungrateful by assigning it to yourself. Do we not say in the Lord's prayer that what is from God is ours? Every day we say: "Our daily bread." You have already said: "our"; and you say: "give us." Behold our, behold give us; by his giving, it becomes ours. If by his giving it becomes ours, by our arrogance it becomes alien. You say: ours, and you say: give us. Why then do you assign to yourself what you did not give to yourself? For what do you have that you have not received? You say: ours; and: give us. Recognize the giver: confess that you receive, so that he may deign to give willingly. What if you did not need, being the one who begs, and you are arrogant? Do you not beg, asking for bread? Our eternal bread, Christ in the equality of the Father; our daily bread, Christ in the flesh; eternal without time, daily in time. Yet he is the bread that came down from heaven. Martyrs are strong, martyrs are firm, but bread strengthens the heart of man. To Paul, due rewards. To him, previously for due punishment, given grace.

Now, therefore, let us hear the Apostle Paul speaking, when he was approaching his passion, presuming about the crown prepared for him. "I have fought the good fight," he said, "I have finished the race, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, will award to me on that day; and not only to me but also to all who have loved his appearing." The Lord, he said, will award me the crown as a righteous judge. Therefore, he owes what he will give: he will give, therefore, as a righteous judge; for he cannot deny the reward based on the work. What work does he examine? "I have fought the good fight," this is work; "I have finished the race," this is work; "I have kept the faith," this is work; "henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness," this is the reward. But in the reward you do nothing; in the work you do not act alone. The crown is from him himself to you; but the work is from you, yet not without his help. When, however, the Apostle Paul, formerly the cruelest and fiercest persecutor Saul, did not deserve anything good at all, indeed he deserved much evil; for he deserved to be condemned, not chosen. And behold suddenly, while he was doing evil and deserving evil, he was struck down by a single heavenly voice; the persecutor is cast down, the preacher is raised up. Hear him confessing this very thing: "I was formerly a blasphemer and a persecutor and an insolent opponent, but I received mercy." Did he say there: "The righteous judge will award me"? "I received mercy," he said; "I deserved evil, I received good. He has not dealt with us according to our sins." "I received mercy, what was due to me was not given; for if what was due were given, punishment would be given. No," he said, "I did not receive what was owed; but I received mercy. He has not dealt with us according to our sins."

Paul's transformation. The prophecy of Jacob fulfilled in Paul. As far as the East is from the West, so far has He removed our iniquities from us. Turn away from the West, turn to the East. Behold one man: Saul and Paul; Saul in the West, Paul in the East; persecutor in the West, preacher in the East. Sins are extinguished there, righteousness arises from there. In the West old, in the East new; in the West Saul, in the East Paul. How is this from Saul, how is this from the cruel, how is this from the persecutor, how is this from the non-shepherd? Indeed, he was a ravenous wolf, from the tribe of Benjamin, he said. However, it was said in prophecy: Benjamin is a ravenous wolf, snatches in the morning, and divides spoils in the evening. First consumes, later feeds. He was snatching, indeed snatching. Read, he was snatching: read the Book of Acts of the Apostles. He had received letters from the chief priests, so that, whoever he found following the way of Christ, he might bring them bound to be punished. He went, he raged, he breathed slaughter and blood: behold, he snatches. But it is still morning, vanity under the sun; evening comes for him, when he is struck blind. His eyes are closed to the vanity of this world, other inner ones are enlightened. The vessel of destruction shortly before becomes a vessel of election, and behold it is filled: he will divide the spoils; the divisions of his spoils are recited daily. See how he divides the spoils. He knows what suits whom: he divides, not indiscriminately, not confusedly he bestows. He divides, that is, distributes, distinguishes; he does not dispense indiscriminately or confusedly. He speaks wisdom among the perfect; but to some unable to grasp solid food, dividing he says: I gave you milk to drink.

Paul, after the grace of God, repays with good works.

Behold, this he does, who a little while ago was doing, what? I do not wish to remember. Rather, I will remember the wickedness of man, that I may approve the mercy of God. From whom Christ suffered, he suffers for Christ; Saul becomes Paul, a true witness emerges from a false one. He who scattered, gathers; he who attacked, defends. How did this happen to Saul, that we speak of? Let us hear him. You ask, he says, how this came to me? It is not, he says, from me: I have obtained mercy. It is not, he says, from me: I have obtained mercy. What shall I render to the Lord for all the things he has rendered to me? For he has indeed rendered, but not evil for evil; he has clearly rendered, but not evil for evil, he has rendered good for evil. What then shall I render? I will take the cup of salvation. Certainly, you would render? I have still received: but now clearly with the passion approaching, I will render good for good, not good for evil. Therefore, the Lord first ought to have rendered evil for evil; but he did not wish to render evil for evil, but rendered good for evil. By rendering good for evil, he found how to render good for good.

Good works are gifts of God. Paul's own are nothing but evil.

Behold, in Paul, previously Saul, He found nothing good. When He found nothing good in him, He forgave the bad, bestowed the good. Thus, you ask, when He first bestowed good, He anticipated; but by giving good, with which He could reward good, behold, He rewards these goods, these good works, with a reward; He rewards a good fight with good things, a completed course, preserved faith. But with what goods? Those which He Himself gave. Did He not Himself give, so that you might fight the good fight? If He did not Himself give, what is it that you say in another place: "I worked harder than all of them, yet not I, but the grace of God with me"? Behold, again you say: "I finished the course." Did He not also give you the ability to finish the course? If He did not give you the ability to finish the course, what is it that you say in another place: "It is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy"? "I kept the faith." You kept it, you kept it: I recognize, I approve; I admit, you kept it; but: "Unless the Lord watches over the city, in vain does the watcher stay awake." Therefore, with His help and with His gift, you fought the good fight, completed the course, and kept the faith. Forgive me, Apostle, I know nothing of your own except evil. Forgive me, Apostle; we say it because you taught us; I hear the confession, I do not find ingratitude. Truly, we know nothing prepared by you for yourself, except evil; Therefore, when God crowns your merits, He crowns nothing but His own gifts. To the author of such Scriptures concerning the grace of God. This true faith and piety, let no one be puffed up about free will in good works - which whoever receives, let him receive so that he knows the giver, so that no one is ungrateful to the giver, proud before the physician, either still insane or healed not by himself - this, I say, this true faith and piety, let no arguments tear from your hearts. Keep what you have received. For what do you have that you did not receive? This is to confess to God, to say what the Apostle Paul says: But we have not received the spirit of this world. The spirit of this world makes people proud, the spirit of this world makes people puffed up, the spirit of this world makes everyone think they are something, when they are nothing. But against the spirit of this world, what does the Apostle say? Against the inflated, proud, given, puffed-up, not solid spirit of this world, what does he say? We have not received the spirit of this world, but the spirit which is from God. How do you prove this? That we might know the things that are freely given to us by God. Therefore, let us hear the Lord saying: Without me, you can do nothing. And this: No one has anything unless it is given to him from above. And: No one can come to me unless the Father who sent me draws him. And this: I am the vine, you are the branches; as the branch cannot bear fruit of itself unless it abides in the vine, neither can you unless you abide in me. And what the Apostle James declares, saying: Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, coming down from the Father of lights. And what the Apostle Paul says to check the presumption of those who boast of free will, he cries out and says: What do you have that you did not receive? If you received it, why do you boast as though you did not receive it? And this: By grace, we have been saved through faith, and this is not from ourselves; it is the gift of God, so that no one may boast. And this: It has been granted to you on behalf of Christ not only to believe in him but also to suffer for him. And this: God, who began a good work in you, will carry it on to completion. Therefore, diligently and faithfully considering these and similar things, let us not assent to those who, extolling free will into pride, attempt more to cast down than to elevate; but let us humbly consider what the Apostle says: It is God who works in you both to will and to act.

Thanks must be given to God.

Let us give thanks to our Lord and Savior, who, though we had no previous merits, healed us when wounded, reconciled us when enemies, redeemed us from captivity, brought us from darkness to light, recalled us from death to life; and humbly confessing our frailty, let us beseech His mercy, that, since His mercy has anticipated us according to the psalmist, He may deign not only to preserve in us, but also to increase His gifts and benefits, which He Himself has deigned to give; who lives and reigns with the Father and the Holy Spirit for ever and ever. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 334

SERMO 334 On the Birthdays of the Martyrs The security of the martyrs under the protection of God. The voice of all good and faithful Christians, but especially of glorious martyrs, is this: If God is for us, who is against us? The world raged against them, the people meditated vain things, the rulers gathered together in one: new torments were devised, and ingenious cruelty found incredible punishments. They were overwhelmed with reproaches, accused of false crimes, enclosed in unbearable prisons, they were plowed with claws, killed with iron, set before beasts, burned with fire, and the martyrs of Christ said: If God is for us, who is against us? The whole world is against you, and you say: Who is against us? They answer you: And who is the whole world, when for its sake we die, through whom the world was made? Let them say, let them say, let us hear, let us all say together: If God is for us, who is against us? They can rage, they can malign, they can slander, they can harass with false reproaches, to the end they can kill the body not only but also mangle it; and what will they do? Behold, God is my helper, and the Lord is the protector of my soul. Tell me, blessed martyr: your body is mangled, and you say, It does not concern me? Yes, I said. Why? Tell us why. Because the Lord is the protector of my soul. My body is restored through my soul. My hair does not perish, and the head perishes? My hair does not perish. But your body is mangled by dogs. And what about it? Even if my body is mangled by dogs, it is resurrected by the Lord. The world is the destroyer of my body, but the Lord is the protector of my soul. And what harm is it to me, when the Lord is the protector of my soul, that the world is the destroyer of my body? What have I lost? What have I missed? When the Lord is the protector of my soul, He will also be the restorer of my body. What will be lacking for me, if my limbs are torn apart by the enemy, when God counts my hairs? Christ encouraging His martyrs not to fear anything from persecuting enemies said: Your hairs are all numbered. Shall I then fear for the loss of limbs, when I have received security concerning the number of hairs? Therefore, let us say, let us say with faith, let us say with hope, let us say with the most ardent charity: If God is for us, who is against us?

Hence we are safe and certain of God's protection. Christ's death, the pledge of his life given to us.

Behold, the king is against you, and you say, who is against us? Behold, all the people are against you, and you say: Who is against us? From where do you prove this, O glorious martyr; from where do you prove to me what you say: If God is for us, who can be against us? For it is clear that if God is for you, who can be against you? But prove that God is for you. Do I not prove it then? Behold, I teach: He who did not spare His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all. What follows, you heard when the Apostle was read. For when he said: If God is for us, who can be against us? as if it were said to him: Prove that God is for you: he immediately brought forth a great proof, immediately introduced the Martyr of martyrs, the Witness of witnesses; namely Him to whom the Father did not spare His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all: from this the Apostle proved that he truly said: If God is for us, who can be against us? He who did not spare His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all. How will He not also with Him freely give us all things? When He has given us all things with Him, He has also given Himself to us. Does the rage of the world terrify me, to whom the Maker of the world is given? Let us rejoice that Christ is given to us, and let us fear no enemies of Christ in this age. See who has been given to us: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. He is Christ, He is the only-begotten Son of God, He is co-eternal with the Begetter. All things were made through Him. How are not all things given to us, which were made through Him, when He Himself, through whom all things were made, is given to us? And know that He is: The Word became flesh, and dwelt among us. Desire and seek the life of Christ given to you; and until you reach it, hold onto the pledge of Christ's death. For He, promising us that He would be with us, could not give a greater pledge to us than to die for us. He says, I endured your evils, shall I not give back my goods? He promised, He made a covenant, He gave a pledge; and do you doubt to believe? He promised, while He walked here among men; He made a covenant, when He wrote the Gospel. To His pledge, you say Amen every day. You have received the pledge, it is given to you daily. Do not despair, you who live by the pledge.

Christ himself will be our possession. Is it perhaps an injury to the Only-Begotten Son when it is said that He has been given to us as if He will be our possession? Clearly, He will be. For if someone today were to gift you a pleasant and fertile estate, where it would delight you to always reside because of its pleasantness, and from which you could easily sustain yourself because of its fertility, would you not embrace the gift and give thanks to the giver? In Christ, we shall dwell. How could it not be our possession, where we will dwell and from which we will live? Let Scripture also say this so that we do not seem to have usurped anything against the discipline of the word of God with our suppositions. Hear what one who knew says, "If God is for us, who can be against us?" The Lord, he says, is my portion of inheritance. He did not say: O Lord, give me some inheritance. Whatever you give me is worthless. Be my inheritance; I love you; I love you wholly, with my whole heart, with my whole soul, with my whole mind, I love you. What will anything be to me, whatever you give me besides you? This is to love God freely, to hope for God from God, to hasten to be fulfilled by God, to be satisfied by Him. For He is sufficient for you; besides Him, nothing is sufficient for you. Philip knew this when he said, "Lord, show us the Father, and it is enough for us." So, when will be what the Apostle says at the end: "That God may be all in all," that He Himself may be to us whatever we desire here without Him, and by the desire of which we often sin against Him? He will be everything to us when God will be all in all. You sin against God to eat, you sin against God to be clothed, you sin against God to live, you sin against God to be honored. And when shall I number all things? Do not, for these things, sin against God. Do you sin against God for food? God will be your eternal food. Do you sin against God for clothing? God will clothe you with immortality. Do you sin against God for honor? Your honor will be God. Do you sin against God for the love of temporal life? Eternal life will be God to you. Do not sin against Him for anything. You ought to love Him freely, who can wholly satisfy you for everything.

Sermons - Sermon 335

SERMO 335 On the Birth of the Martyrs The voices of the holy martyrs. The martyrs overcame delights and pains.

Since it is the day of the holy martyrs, what could please us more to speak about, than their glory? May the Lord of the martyrs help us, because he is their crown. We heard the blessed apostle Paul preaching with the voice of the martyrs: Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? This is the voice of the martyrs: Shall tribulation? or distress? or persecution? or famine? or nakedness? or peril? or sword? As it is written, For your sake we are put to death all the day long, we are counted as sheep for the slaughter. But in all these things we are more than conquerors through him who loved us. This is the voice of the martyrs, to endure everything, and presume nothing of themselves, to love him who is glorified in his own: that the one who glories, may glory in the Lord. They also knew that which we sang a little before: Rejoice in the Lord, and be glad, righteous ones. If the righteous rejoice in the Lord, the unrighteous know not how to rejoice except in the world. But this is the first front to be conquered: first pleasures must be overcome, and then pains. How can one overcome a raging world, who cannot overcome a flattering world? The world flatters, promising honors, riches, pleasures: the world threatens, by intending pains, deprivations, humiliations. He who does not scorn what the world promises, how can he overcome what it threatens? Riches have their pleasure: who does not know this? But justice has more pleasure. Delight in riches with justice: but if such a critical temptation arises, that these two things come into temptation, riches and justice, and you cannot have both, but if you reach out for riches, it is necessary to lose justice; if you reach out for justice, let the riches perish: now choose, now fight; now let us see if you have not sung in vain: Rejoice in the Lord, and be glad, righteous ones: now let us see if you have not heard in vain: Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Indeed, he left out all the things the world flatters with; and wanted to remind you, to whom the world flatters. Why? Because he was foretelling the contests of the martyrs, those contests, of course, where they conquered persecution, hunger, thirst, deprivation, ignominy, at the end the fear of death and the most fierce enemy.

Martyrs are distinguished not by their suffering, but by their love. The greedy man is a martyr for gold. But see, brothers, because the entire art is made by Christ. The Apostle admonishes us to prefer the love of Christ over the world. How many distresses do those who want to seize others' possessions endure? Persecution, he says? Even this does not break them. Greed is terrified, the greedy seize and fear punishment, they burn for plunder. Many even suffer hunger while they acquire and make profits, to whom we command to fast, and they excuse themselves with their stomach. They have leisure all day to count coins, and they sleep fasting. Nakedness, he says? What can I say about nakedness? Every day merchants escape shipwreck naked and again sail into danger. Why do men risk themselves daily, if not for the sake of acquiring riches? Even the sword does not stop them. It is a capital crime to falsely claim an inheritance, and yet the inheritance is diminished. If, therefore, temporal greed earns this, why should not the inheritance of Christ also earn it? The greedy man says in his heart, who perhaps does not dare to speak with his tongue: Who will separate us from the greed for gold? Tribulation? or distress? or persecution? Even the greedy can say to gold: For your sake we are killed all day long. Thus the holy martyrs rightly say in the Psalm: Judge me, O God, and distinguish my cause from the ungodly nation. Distinguish, he says, my tribulation: the greedy also are troubled. Distinguish my distresses: the greedy also suffer distress. Distinguish my persecutions: the greedy also are persecuted. Distinguish my hunger: the greedy also hunger for acquiring gold. Distinguish my nakedness: the greedy also are stripped for gold. Distinguish my death: the greedy also die for gold. What does it mean to distinguish my cause? For your sake we are put to death all day long. They for gold, we for you. The punishment is similar, but the cause is different. Where the cause is different, there the victory is certain. If therefore we consider the cause, we love the festivities of the martyrs. Let us love in them not the passions, but the causes of the passions. For if we love only the passions, we will find many who suffer worse in evil causes. But let us consider the cause, let us regard the cross of Christ: there was Christ, and there were also thieves. Similar punishment, but different cause. One thief believed, the other blasphemed. The Lord judged as from a tribunal between both: condemned the one who blasphemed to hell, led the other with Him to paradise. Why this? Because even if the punishment was equal, the cause was unequal. Therefore choose the causes of the martyrs, if you wish to reach the palms of the martyrs.

Sermons - Sermon 335A

Sermon 335/A On the Solemnity of the Martyrs, of whom one is foremost, Another victory was called Perpetua Witnesses of Christ and witnesses of the devil in the Passion that was read. The name "martyr" is Greek, in Latin they are called witnesses; if they are witnesses, for the truth of their testimony they endured so much. Truth served God, iniquity lied to itself. For it is written thus; the body of Christ speaks in the Psalm, which is the Church: False witnesses have risen against me, and iniquity has lied to itself. Witnesses and witnesses: false witnesses, and righteous witnesses; witnesses of the devil, and witnesses of Christ. We have seen, observed, and heard the kind of each witness, when the passion of the blessed martyrs, whose solemnity day is celebrated, was read. They were asked what they had done and replied that they had gathered together because they were Christians. This is the testimony of the truth. The judge said: “Since you have admitted to the crime.” This is the testimony of iniquity. God was proclaimed, and it was called a crime. In the proclamation of God, truth obeyed God; in the designation of the crime, iniquity lied to itself. For what they were saying was turning back on them, and the false crime was condemned by true crime. Our martyrs did not commit a crime; the martyrs of Christ did not commit a crime by gathering together to praise God, to hear the truth, to hope for the kingdom of heaven, and to despise the present wicked age. These did not commit a crime. This is called piety, this thing's name is religion, this thing's name is devotion, this thing's name is true testimony. What crime, therefore, did they commit who, after confessing their piety, were further killed? “This and that one,” said the judge of iniquity, the witness of falsehood, “this and that one be executed by the sword.” Behold the crime. Hear also the voice of piety: Thanks be to God, said the first witness Primus; Victoria Perpetua concluded the testimony. I believe that your Charity noticed, when the passion of the saints was read, that the first one to confess was called Primus, before the last; Perpetual Victory at the end. O victory without blemish! O end without end! For what is perpetual victory, if not victory without end? This is to overcome the allurements of the flesh, to overcome the threats of the perverse judge, to overcome the pain of the body, to overcome the love of life.

Acclamation. Love of life in martyrs conquered by the love of life.

I will say, if I can, with the Lord helping, my brothers, what I feel: in the holy martyrs, the love of life was conquered by the love of life. You who have acclaimed have understood; but for the sake of those who did not understand, suffer me, you who have understood, to briefly explain what I said. I said this: in the holy martyrs, the love of life was conquered by the love of life; by loving life, they despised life. Who, by loving silver, despises silver? Who, by loving gold, despises gold? Who, by loving estates, despises estates? No one despises what they love. We find martyrs who loved life and despised life. They would not reach that life unless they trampled on this one. They knew what they were doing, who were gaining by giving away. Do not think, dearest ones, that they lost their sense when they loved life and despised life; they did not lose their sense. They were sowing seeds and seeking the harvest. I see the farmer's sense, and I recognize wisdom in the martyrs. The farmer, by loving wheat, sows wheat. You who do not know what the sower does, perhaps you will rebuke him, and say: What are you doing, insane one? What you have gathered with such labor, you bring forth, you scatter, you take from your eyes, you cast on the ground, moreover you bury it? He replies to you: I love wheat; therefore, I throw wheat; if I did not love it, I would not throw it; I want it to grow, not perish. Behold what our martyrs did, incomparably wiser than farmers. For sowers scatter a few grains, and reapers gather many. But both what is scattered and what is gathered have an end; what is scattered is not much, what is gathered is much, yet both come to an end. And would you not have our martyrs scatter this life, destined someday to end by death, to gain life that has no death? Good usurers, good sowers; God is the one who multiplies. He Himself multiplies crops in the field; He nurtures whatever is brought forth from the earth. God can multiply grains: can He not preserve His martyrs? Behold, I tell you, listen to what they heard.

Against drinking on martyrs' days.

You also heard just now, when the Gospel was being read; that which was promised to them, you have received: They will deliver you up, he says, in councils, and they will scourge you in their synagogues, and they will kill some of you; but I tell you: Not a hair of your head will perish, and in your patience you will possess your souls. You will possess and not lose; for there no enemy pursues, no friend dies. There you will be, where perpetual day has no preceding yesterday, nor following tomorrow. There you will be good money lenders, where the devil cannot follow you. Bear the present; rejoice in the eternal. Hard are the things you endure, but great is the fruit of what you sow. Read what has been said about you, when you sowed: They went forth and wept, sowing their seeds. With what fruit? with what end? with what consolation? But they will come with exultation, carrying their sheaves. From these sheaves crowns are made. Let us therefore celebrate the days of the martyrs, honoring the passions of the martyrs, not loving the drinking. Turned to the Lord.

Sermons - Sermon 335B

Sermon 335/B

We call the resurrection of the Lord, brethren: and we rightly call it by this name, because He arose; but I do not want you to be ignorant of this, that resurrection not only means the resurrection of the Lord, but also our own. On the Birth of the Holy Martyrs Adam did not scorn death by sinning, but did not believe God threatening death. Christ came one against one.

We bless the holy martyrs above all other people, who fought against sin even unto blood; we bless them, however, because they endured death for the truth, and by dying found life. For they would not have died unless man had sinned; for if man had kept the commandment, he would have lived. God threatened him with death if he sinned: therefore, out of fear of death he ought to have abstained from sin; but he believed the deceiving serpent more than the advising Creator. He did not believe God, and he found what he did not believe. Therefore, by its own force, nature rushed to death: and as far as it is in it, it struggles not to die; but unwillingly it dies, because willingly it sinned. For the first man, by sinning, did not despise death, but rather, even if he sinned, he did not believe he would die. He was told: Do not touch; if you touch, you will die. Did he say: I will touch, and die? Did he say to himself: God has threatened me with death if I taste of that tree; I will taste it anyway, and experience what is in that food; and if death follows, what is it to me? He did not say this: for he wanted to sin out of pride and curiosity, but nature did not want to die. Finally, even the serpent himself, or rather the devil in the serpent, the persuader of sin, the demolisher of faith, did not remove from him the fear of death by despising death. For he did not say to him in his evil persuasion: Do you fear to die? And what is it to die? Death is not an evil, you fear for no reason what is not an evil. He did not say this to him: for he knew how much the will of death would abhor by nature. But what did he say to him? You will not die by death. He did not persuade contempt of death, but removed belief in death. Therefore, he did what he was persuaded, not because he despised death, but because he did not believe he would die. Death followed the sinner: it begot us, not as he was created, but as he had become through sinning. We were born, drawing guilt and punishment from the transgressor. One came against one: because through one man death, and through one man the resurrection of the dead. For in Adam all die, so in Christ all will be made alive. Therefore one came against one: and he did not come in the way he came to help; but he came from a virgin, came without lust, came conceived not by desire but by faith. Therefore one came against one. To help man, he took something from the race; but he did not take everything that the one needing help had. Therefore, he came, and found us lying in guilt and punishment; he took upon himself only the punishment, and solved both the guilt and the punishment. By sinning, man came to death; now by dying he attains life. That which has an end does not last long. Christians understand this better than Cicero.

Therefore, the Lord Christ, not only by His word but also by His example, encouraged martyrs so that they would not fear death. Christ’s exhortation was not like the serpent’s seduction. For the serpent said: If you sin, you will not die. Christ said: If you sin, you will die. What does it mean: If you sin, you will die? If you deny me, indeed if you do not deny me, you will die. But do not fear those who kill the body. O man, do not fear now those who kill the body. Then you ought to have feared death, lest you come to death; then if you had feared death, you would not come to death: now if you fear death, you will be delivered from death. But dismiss the deceptive persuasion of the devil. Our Lord God Himself said something different to man then, and something different now. Then He said to him: Do not sin, lest you die; now He says to him: Die, lest you sin. Then He said to him: By sinning you come to death; now He says to him: By dying, you come to life. Therefore, the punishment of the sinner has become the instrument of virtue: then they died by listening to the devil, now we overcome the devil by dying for the truth. Why do you exalt yourself, my captor? I conquer you with your own means. You urged sin, and took away the trust in death; you said: You will not die; I believed, and I died. You urged, deceived, deluded, held, and by badly urging, you sent us to death; but by dying for Christ, you lost those whom you possessed. There is nothing from which you can frighten, when death itself is embraced, lest we sin, which ought to be feared lest we sin. Against your poisonous whispers, the martyr sings: I will sing to my God as long as I live. So, when you are dead, do you not sing to God? Indeed, you sing more when you live. For now, it is not long, that which has an end. I would not say that even Adam lived long if he were to die today; for what good are long-past times, when they are past? He lived long, yet he lived: but if he lives, tell me, and if what lives will have no end, then I will say that it is long. We Christians, to whom eternal life is promised, ought not to understand what some pagan author said: What is this long, in which there is something ultimate? Take away the end, and I acknowledge the longevity; if you add an end, I convict the brevity. Therefore, I will sing to my God as long as I live. Thus, we ought to receive this “long,” so that it is truly long. As long as I live, then forever because I live, refer to this: Blessed are those who dwell in Your house; they will praise You forever and ever. This is the reward the holy martyrs loved, and by loving life, they chose to die. Because they died patiently, do you think they loved death? By no means, they loved life, they desired life: they wanted to live without death, those who chose to die for life; they despised what is not long, to reach what is long.

Death is bitter for martyrs, for Peter, for Christ himself.

What kind of persecutor is he who comes and says: Deny Christ, if you do not want me to kill you? Shall I deny life for the sake of life? Shall I deny eternal life for the sake of a brief life? What if you spare me today, and fever kills me tomorrow? Why do you want to take away my faith by threatening me with death? If fever kills me, it does not take away my faith. This life, which you say you grant, is not in your power: therefore I will not deny Christ, who holds both death and life in his power, for the sake of that life. Shall I therefore deny him, who makes me live here as long as he wills, not as long as you will here? And when I cease to live here, I go to him, where there is nothing but living. Behold, if you do not deny, I will kill you. I know who speaks, through you he now says to me: Deny, and you will not die. He almost said this to me then: Touch, and you will not die. I did not want to then, now I avoid you. Therefore, however sweet this life may be, no one wants to end the miserable one. If life, however sweet, is so sweet, what kind of life is that, my brethren? Consider the glory of the martyrs: unless death were bitter, the glory of the martyrs would not exist. If death is nothing, what great thing did the martyrs disdain? Consider the Lord himself: No one has greater love than this, to lay down one's life for one's friends. And he who had the power to lay down his life and had the power to take it back, yet to transfigure us in himself, said, My soul is sorrowful even unto death. Even to the blessed Peter, when you grow old, he said, another will gird you and carry you where you do not wish, even when you grow old. What kind of blessed life is it if it must be loved even when it is miserable? What is the action of this life, which is so loved? To desire, to fear, to hope, to be deceived, to labor, to be sick: true sadness, false joy: to pour out prayers, to fear temptations. What kind of life is this? Who can describe its misery with any eloquence? Yet it is loved. But what is the action of that life, what is it? I will go no further, I will not describe it for long: I shall sing to my God as long as I live.

Martyrs, lovers of life. Contempt of death, some from worldly desire, others for the love of God. The martyrs were lovers of life, therefore they were tolerant of death. However, my brothers, this life is so sweet, foul, and full of afflictions, it is so sweet that the martyrs could not despise it for the sake of truth and eternal life without the help of Him who commanded them to despise it. Often, desire also despises death, but where there is no health: vice is oppressed by vice, for desire is of this world. Do not love the world, nor the things that are in the world: if anyone loves the world, the love of the Father is not in him; because all that is in the world is the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life. Often, men despise death for the desire of the flesh; they despise death for the desire of the eyes; they despise death for the pride of life: but all these are from the world. He who despises death for the love of God can in no way do this without God's help. And indeed, even the martyr himself when he said: I will sing to my God as long as I live, and was thinking of eternal life, incited himself and said: Do not trust in princes. So that you may not trust in a prince when he spares you: let the Prince of princes Himself help you, so that you may trust. Be faithful in faith: and do not trust in princes, nor in the sons of men, in whom there is no salvation. Therefore, not in yourself, for salvation belongs to the Lord. For what are you by yourself, as far as it pertains to yourself, do you want to know? His spirit will depart, and he will return to his earth; on that day all their thoughts will perish. Behold what you are, if you are nothing but yourself. Because therefore you ought not to trust in the sons of men, in whom there is no salvation – for their salvation is not in them by themselves; whence it is said: Salvation belongs to the Lord, and Your blessing is upon Your people – if you do not trust in men, in whom there is no salvation, nor should you trust in yourself, because you are a man, in whom there is no salvation. The merit of man does not preclude the help of God. No death is worse than where death does not die.

Respond now, and tell me: If I do not trust myself, then I do not despise death; I do not fulfill the commandment to not deny Christ. Blessed is he whose help is the God of Jacob. Indeed, you despise death; you believe and fulfill the commandment; you trample underfoot the threats of persecutors; you love and desire eternal life most fervently. It is true because of you; but: Blessed is he whose help is the God of Jacob. Take away the helper, I only find the forsaker. The forsaker Adam, the helper Christ. What did that forsaker do, except what was said to him: You are dust, and to dust you shall return? His spirit departs, and he returns to his ground. However, the helper endured death and taught to despise what he accepted. And the helper says to me: You fear sin, but because of this, you want to sin so that you might not die. Behold, I suffer what you fear. I suffer what you fear; fear that which I do not do. What do you fear? Death. Behold, I suffer. Fear that which I do not do, sin. He who did no sin, nor was deceit found in his mouth. Therefore, do not do what he did not do, and do not fear what he has suffered. For you will not make death, but suffer it; fear your deed, not your suffering. Fear what you do willingly, not what you suffer unwillingly; death does not kill you if you are not your own death. Yet it would not exist if there had been no sin. It must be despised, indeed trampled, it is temporary: why even this? If only it were just this! What is it: If only it were just this? If only the first death, separating the spirit from the flesh. Fear the second death, where the soul is not separated from the flesh, but the soul is tormented with the flesh. Do not fear passing death, fear the permanent one: none is worse than where death does not die. By fearing death, you wanted to sin: sin kills your inner man; sin kills the life of your flesh. Finally, that bodily death would not follow unless the death of the soul had preceded. The soul willfully forsook God, and it unwillingly forsakes the flesh. However, the Lord did not unwillingly forsake the flesh: when he willed, he died, because when he willed, he was born. But why this? So that you might not fear, behold, it is all done. And we fear death: we fear death, as if we will avoid death. Fear what you can avoid, that is sin. You can avoid sin, you cannot avoid death; and yet more is feared that which cannot be avoided than that which can be avoided. We have acknowledged ourselves, seen ourselves, investigated ourselves; let us groan within ourselves, let us pour out prayers so that we do not enter into temptations. Let us not presume on our own strength to conquer these things: Blessed indeed is he whose help is the God of Jacob, whose hope is in the Lord his God; not in himself, because he is man. But cursed is everyone who places their hope in man.

Sermons - Sermon 335C

SERMON 335/C SERMON ON ONE MARTYR BY BLESSED AUGUSTINE BISHOP In the martyrs, glory is despised, patience is proven.

Since the birthday of the blessed martyr has dawned, a day which the Lord wished us to celebrate with you, let us speak a little, with His granting, of the glory and patience of the martyrs. Indeed, glory was despised, patience was proven. For glory lay hidden in the heavens, patience was exercised on earth. Whoever does not dread their patience, may reach glory. For it is considered misery to suffer harsh and rough things in the flesh, because it is truly troublesome. If it were not troublesome for men, it would not be glorious for the martyrs. The love of evil is called desire, the love of good is called charity.

However, set before yourselves two particular persons: one of desire, one of charity. By desire, I mean the love of sinning, because sometimes there is a desire which is called good. In like manner, by charity, I mean the love of living rightly because sometimes also charity is called in an evil way. Therefore, I wished to define what I have said. The faithful desire the kingdom of heaven. Even robbers are called dear to each other. However, there is no charity in those whom an evil conscience associates with each other, but in those whom wisdom delights in companionship.

Therefore, consider and distinguish how many evils greedy people endure, and how harsh they endure for those things they desire, things that appear intolerable to those who do not desire them. But love makes them strong. Yet the love of evil is called greed, the love of good is called charity. There are many things loved by the greedy, sometimes so diverse that they are even found to be contrary to each other. Greed gathers money, luxury scatters it. Greed hoards, luxury spends, and what is so contrary as to gather and to scatter? Nevertheless, greed commands both to make much and to endure much harshness and roughness by bearing pain... as much as you love pleasure. Yet even sometimes in the madness of love, it is shamefully loved and for it, many things are bravely endured.

Charity also has the strength of its love.

Therefore, beloved, it is not surprising if charity also has the strength of its love. The martyrs had this; in it, they endured all hardships. They loved what they did not see, but they firmly believed and, to the extent that it can be perceived by a person carrying the flesh, they perceived it with their heart. For does not this flesh truly have its own beauty? And does not the imperishable wisdom have its own beauty? But the unrighteous recognize and eventually desire the beauty of wisdom. For they too would wish to be wise, if it were permitted to them to hold what they love and at the same time have wisdom. Without a doubt, they would wish for both; they do not scorn wisdom. You find a lover of carnal pleasure wishing also to be wise. However, you find the wise person scorning carnal pleasure. It is very rare to find a lover of pleasure who scorns wisdom. If they could, they would have both, but they prefer one over the other and therefore impose misery upon themselves. They deceive themselves when they lose better things by loving the worse, but they do not feel the fraud in the heavenly things while they delight in shameful things. The cause makes the martyr, not the punishment.

Give me, therefore, a lover of the good of whom the Apostle says: And who can harm you if you are lovers of the good? For in what you love, you do not suffer loss. Whatever may be taken from you by one who rages against you, he will not destroy you as a lover of Him who made you. And as much as earthly things are taken away, so much do heavenly gifts increase, if these are taken away because of their love. For it matters why you lose something. And thus, it is not the punishment that makes the martyr but the cause. Therefore, we do not justify those martyrs who have suffered much unless we consider why they suffered. For your sake, they say—the voice of the martyrs—it is for your sake that we are put to death all the day long. Take away "for your sake," what benefit is it to be put to death all the day long? Add "for your sake," what harm is it to be put to death all the day long? To be put to death all the day long for your sake not only does no harm but is also of great advantage. The cause lies in what is said: "for your sake"; the suffering lies in what is said: "we are put to death all the day long." You build the suffering well if you do not withdraw the foundation of God's love. The reason for martyrdom is in this: it is said, for the sake of God.

You are interested in what you say: "because of you." For that lascivious lover who falls into and clings to the beauty of the flesh, thus boasts to his beloved: "Because of you, because of you," he says, "I have borne the anger of my father, because of you I have been beaten by my very strict father and harsh teachers. Because of you I have completely spent whatever I had, because of you I have remained in need." How much you say: "because of you"! And nothing for you? Indeed, not only nothing for you but also everything "because of you."

One must store up treasure where wisdom commands, not where greed remains.

If money could listen to its lovers, how many would say to it: "For you, I endured the harsh winter at sea, for you I sustained so many shipwrecks, for you, while being tossed about in the waves, I made loss, for you I lost both you and myself; for while paying attention to what I still desired to have, I lost what I had." How many: "because of you"! But it is deaf to what you say and does not hear you if you lose both it and yourself because of it. And what good is it when you perish because of money? Both you perish and you do not find it. Indeed, if you have any, by perishing here you leave it behind. You pass away; then another lover of it comes. How many have left it behind, loving it, and perished by passing away. For although man walks in a picture, yet he is troubled in vain. It is to be pitied because though he surely walks in the image of God, he is troubled in vain: He hoards up treasures and does not know for whom he is gathering them. For why indeed is he troubled except to hoard up treasures? Behold, treasure up, but where wisdom has commanded, not where greed resides. The counsel of God concerning money. He is almighty to whom you wanted to lend. The Lord gave advice regarding money so that what is acquired may not be lost. He said, "Make friends for yourselves from the mammon of unrighteousness, so that they may receive you into eternal dwellings." Martyrs, having a good cause and enduring much for the love of God, were received by some while hungry, were clothed when naked, and were taken in when strangers. It is indeed service to those in tribulation. They made friends from the mammon of unrighteousness. Therefore also regarding money, the Lord gave good advice if anyone will listen. For certainly, if you love your money, you must take care that it does not perish. If it perishes to them, it perishes to you. For it falls from you, it accrues to another. Make something from it that will not perish to you. And when you go before it, store up treasure in heaven where no thief approaches, nor moth corrupts. The place is well-guarded, why do you hesitate to migrate? Send ahead what you have so that you may come to where you sent it. Buy something from it for yourself that cannot perish. Beloved, you know what advice the covetous take when they see they have some money. What do they say? "It is a round thing, it rolls, it perishes; it must be tied up by buying some possession." And they want to tie up their money by buying an estate. And look, they bought an estate, they will have an estate. Will the estate always have them? But neither will they have [the estate], from which after a short time without delay they will migrate. Where you have tied your money, you cannot tie your soul. For the time will come when your soul will be required of you. What you bought, whose will it be? Therefore you will neither have the estate, nor will the estate have you, unless perhaps, according to the body, you are buried there dead. Then indeed something strange happens: it will have you, you will not have it. The counsel of the Lord is good, and a golden advice is given to whom it is said: "Move to where you do not lose." "What kind of advice is given! But I will not see," you say. Afterward, you will see. But you will not see what you sent. For you gave it into usury. You gave one thing, another will be returned to you. He whom you wanted to interest is Almighty. He accepts small things, but gives great things. He accepts few, He will return many. He created such a land for you: you send a few grains to fill your granaries. If He created such a land for you, what does He keep for you, sowing good works, who made heaven and earth? The great physician is God. But we speak to the covetous deaf, or to those lusting after beautiful bodies and to the greedy gathering and hoarding money on earth. We speak to the deaf, they do not hear us. Lord, let them be healed so that they may hear. Nothing is impossible for you. There is no incurable disease for you, because you are a great physician, especially because you showed your preceding love for us, because you did not spare your own Son, but delivered him up for us all. How shall you not also with him freely give us all things? Open your jaws, greedy one, now scorn few things, you will have many. He had conquered, crushed, and trampled down covetousness who said: As though having nothing, yet possessing all things.

What earthly glory is compared to the glory of the martyrs?

Therefore, to many lustful and greedy people, the holy martyrs appeared to be insane when they suffered so much for the name of Christ and always confessed him truthfully. They were urged to deny; having confessed, they were killed, burned, thrown to beasts, they suffered horrendous things in the open; in secret, they were incomparably crowned. If earthly things were sought from them, what can be added to this glory by which their birthdays are celebrated? Many strong men went mad for glory and said that blood must be shed for their country, nor did they hesitate to shed it, knowing that life indeed passes but immortal glory remains in them. Which of their glory compares to the glory of the martyrs? Who was able to find in earthly glory, who was able to find in the glory of human affairs, who was able to find what the fisherman was able to find? The tombs of the strong men who perished for their country are in Rome. At whose tomb has the Emperor deigned to enter? Behold, if earthly glory was to be coveted, they were not deprived of it either, who sought such honor among the angels. We see their glories on earth and we are astounded. What would we endure if we saw them in heaven? How much would admiration seize us if we saw the martyrs glorifying among the angels, whose birthdays we see the people celebrating?

Let us choose the cause of the martyrs, as much as we can. Three crosses: one of the Savior and two of the thieves.

True, seek the invisible rewards of the martyrs, my brothers. Love what they loved. Even if you do not endure what they endured, prepare your minds to endure. First, choose the cause, as much as you can. For without a chosen cause, do not the martyrs suffer such things as robbers have often suffered, such as adulterers, such as evildoers, such as sacrilegious men? If you consider the penalties, they are alike; if the causes, very different—far different are they from them. What is so near and similar yet not at all similar as the three crosses: one of the Lord and two of the robbers? There were three, all were crosses, all were in one place, all those bodies hung on wood, but the cause separated them all. In the middle, the Savior; on either side, the guilty. That cross was a tribunal: it hung and judged; judged while hanging and judged those who hung. Of those two guilty ones, one deserved punishment, the other a reward. Why did the other deserve a reward? Because he changed his cause on the cross. While hanging, he believed in him who was far away, when the Lord would come into his kingdom, then he wanted to be considered in his mind. But what did the Lord say, when he said, "Lord, remember me when you come into your kingdom," as if saying: "I know my cause, I know my merits, therefore I am tormented for my deeds, but at least have mercy when you come"; he delayed, this one offered: "Amen, amen, I say to you, today you will be with me in paradise; why do you look far off, since I am coming? Today you will be with me in paradise; whom you hope will come I am never absent, and I am everywhere and come there; but today you will be with me in paradise because wherever you will be happily, without me you cannot be happy." Therefore, all the souls of the blessed, not yet having received their bodies, are happy with Christ; happy only on account of Christ. For they loved him, they cherished him, in him they had justice, in him wisdom, in him knowledge, in him the hidden treasures of knowledge and wisdom. How much they despised suffering here. They greatly did not wish to be wealthy. What does the poor person not have if he has God?

Whatever you love, if it were not beautiful, it would not be loved by you. I do not want you to have nothing to love, but I want it to be ordered.

Love that which is good, my brothers; there is nothing more beautiful, even if it is seen only by the eyes of the heart. I speak to you. Behold, all things you see through the eye of the flesh are beautiful: heaven, earth, sea, and all that is in them, stars shining from the sky, the sun filling the day, the moon tempering the night, birds, swimming creatures, walking creatures, and humans themselves—created among all things in the image of God—praisers of creation, lovers of creation, but only if they are lovers of the Creator. Whatever you love so that you neglect God has been made by none other than God. Whatever, I say, you love so that you neglect God has been made by none other than God. For if it were not beautiful, you would not love it. And from where would beauty come, if not from that unseen beauty that created it? You love gold, God created it. You love beautiful bodies and flesh, God created them. You love pleasant estates, God created them. You greatly love this light, God created it. If you neglect God for the sake of what He created, I ask you, also love God Himself. How much He deserves to be loved, how much He deserves to be loved because He created all that you love. Love so that you love Him more. I do not want you to have nothing to love, but I want it to be ordered. Put heavenly things before earthly things, immortal things before mortal things, eternal things before temporal things. Put the Lord before all things, not by praising but by loving. For it is easy to prefer by praising. Temptation comes: I ask you whether you prefer by loving what you have preferred by praising. For when you are asked: What is better: money or wisdom, money or justice, finally money or God? you do not hesitate to say: wisdom, justice, God. Just as you do not hesitate to say, do not hesitate to choose. What is better: justice or money? And just as children, when asked in schools, eagerly shout out "justice". I know all, I hear your thoughts: justice is better. But temptation will come. It offers money on the other side. And temptation says to you: "You can have this money; if you commit fraud, money will come to you". But justice says: "What do you choose? Now is the time to test your tongue". Already asked, you preferred justice to money; but now, with the two placed before you: money on one side, justice on the other, as if ashamed, you close your eyes against justice, you extend your hand to money. Ungrateful, foolish, when asked by me, you preferred justice over money, you testified against yourself. Does God need another witness after you convict yourself? In praising, justice was preferred, in choosing, money was preferred. Do you not see on whose side you have chosen? On the perishable side of the perishable. Money indeed without doubt is perishable because the world will pass away and all its desires. Choose justice because he who does the will of God remains forever, as He Himself remains forever.

Sermons - Sermon 335D

Sermon 335/D ON THE MARTYRS The martyrs were made safe by hope. Holy intoxication of the martyrs. The holy martyrs, when they suffer evils here, hope in the Lord. For by hope they are made safe: they walk toward the promises, not yet holding what is given. Therefore, since they hoped under the covering of wings to endure the evils of the world bravely and patiently, what will you give them? They will be inebriated from the abundance of your house. If they had more to say, they would say it. For what would they say? "Drink"? Drinking is little. What would they say? "They will be satisfied"? They will be satisfied and sober. They will drink so much that they become inebriated. By that inebriation, they forget all past evils. O holy inebriation! I wish that we all were inebriated by this inebriation.

Behold what kind of drunkenness those desire who inebriate themselves in the places of martyrs, and those whom they persecuted with stones, they persecute with cups; moreover, they even dance and give the members of Christ to play for demons, and they think they please the martyrs while they please unclean spirits. How much do we speak of these things? Let them certainly consider those at whose memorials they become drunk: if they had loved these things, they would not be martyrs.

There are not only persecutions but temptations never cease. He who is in bed is a martyr. Do not think therefore, most beloved brothers, that you cannot have the merits of martyrs because there are no persecutions like those in the times when the martyrs were crowned. There are no persecutions now, but temptations never cease. Truly, my brothers, there are Christians among those sons of men who hope under the shelter of God's wings. And when the time of hope passes, and the joy of reality comes, they will be intoxicated with the abundance of His house and He will give them drink from the torrent of His pleasures. From where will He give them drink? From where will they be intoxicated? Hear from where. For with you is the fountain of life. The intoxication of life is living without end. This intoxication cannot be digested: no one digests it and returns to thirst. Therefore, there are men from this number of the sons of men who hope under the shelter of God's wings who struggle and conquer in their bed, conquer and are crowned. But the men belonging to man, not the sons of man, because they care only for that health which, when passing, they consider none following, when that health begins to be in danger, even if they are called Christians, seek out sorcerers, send to astrologers, hang illicit remedies around their necks. They desire health and tie themselves up, they bind the neck of their outer man and suffocate the throat of their inner man. But he who says: "I do not do it" - when a friend suggests, a neighbor murmurs or a maid whispers, sometimes even from his own register - who says: "I do not do it: I am a Christian; God forbids this; these are the sacraments of demons; hear the Apostle: I do not want you to be partners with demons," is answered by the one who suggests: "Do it and you will be well; such and such did it. What? Are they not Christians? Are they not faithful? Do they not run to the church? And yet they did it and are well. He did it and was immediately healed. Do you not know that he is a Christian, faithful? Behold, he did it and is well." But the sick man, because he does not love the health common to men and beasts, says: "If he was made well from that, I do not want to be made well from it. For He can save me to whom it was said: Lord, you save both man and beast, as you have multiplied your mercies, O God." - See the athlete of God, hear the athlete of Christ! O sick and healthy man! O weak and strong! O lying in bed and reigning in heaven! - "But behold he does not want to. Does he deprive me of that divine health? It follows: But the sons of men will hope in the protection of your wings. But you do not see that health because the health of the righteous is from the Lord. I know that He saves me. He who made me remade me. But am I terrified of death for which life itself died? Christ gave His death to the wicked; will He not give life to the pious?" He who says this, and rejects such remedies, more proven, more so-called experienced, who avoids them, is a martyr in bed. He languishes and conquers, barely moves his limbs and wages battles. Therefore, this man suffers no evil, even if he dies from that disease. For he does not perish, but loses nothing, rather he finds what he seeks then. He will go out to his Lord, with the front marked with the cross of Christ, to whom he did no injury by illicit ties. Will He therefore not give him what He promised whom He protected as he fought? The Lord surely protected him lest he suffer any evil, and helped in the contest so that the devil might be conquered by him. For many say, my brothers: "How did the martyrs conquer the devil?" How do good faithful men conquer him? Hear the Apostle saying: You are not wrestling against flesh and blood. For flesh and blood raged against the holy martyrs. What is flesh and blood? Mortal men. Emperors, governors, judges, solders, were flesh and blood. Insane people, raging crowds are nothing other than flesh and blood. Therefore, these raging and furious men, lest the martyrs hate them and be conquered by evil, the Apostle instructs against whom they have the battle. It is not, he says, your wrestling against flesh and blood. Those whom you see raging, raging, shouting: Crucify, crucify, are flesh and blood. They are not alone, they are not whom you see, the devil rages through them. You beware in your gold against the thief devil. Why do you fear straw in straw? Why do you fear earth for earth. What is a wicked man except earth? For what reason do you fear him except for your earth that is for the flesh that was made from earth? The other passes and yours will rise again. Therefore, do not fear them, but pray for them and speak to them: - Why do you rage, brother, why are you agitated? Although you rage against me you perish for yourself. O if you would change your mind! O if you would change your life! Because we all will die and rise again. Indeed, I have hope in God for whom I suffer these things. But you, if you remain in such wickedness, for a little while, and you will not be, and may you not be for your good, but you will be for your own evil with unquenchable fire and undying worm." But he says this: "These are the words of proud Christians boasting of resurrection. Who has come from there and told you that what you say is true?" "You speak the truth: your grandfather did not come from there, but your Lord returned from there, He whom you persecute in me, God, and because of Him you kill me as a criminal from whom God is not offended." Our struggle is against the devil, not against man.

Let us return to the order, my brothers. Your struggle is not against flesh and blood. They rage indeed, but they are alien vessels. Fear the armed one, not the bow; that is, the devil, not the man through whom the devil works. Yet do not fear him, but beware. How will you not fear him? By hoping under the protection of God's wings, from whom is the salvation of the righteous, because He is their protector in times of tribulation. For it is not, he says, struggle against flesh and blood but against principalities and powers and rulers of the world; that is, men who love the world. He did not call those unclean spirits rulers of heaven and earth, but rulers of the world, because he called people who love the world "the world," because they are ruled by them to rage. They proceed against you as they have been instigated. The Apostle speaks of the prince of the power of the air, that is, the devil. And what did he add? Who now works in the children of disobedience. These children of disobedience: flesh and blood. Therefore beware of them because the devil works in them to rage against you. Beware of him, love them; fight him, pray for them that he might be expelled even from them and they become your imitators who were once your persecutors. Therefore, they must be avoided. But you will say, "I do not see them. How do I fight against them?" Against the spiritual wickedness in the heavenly places, he said. He says "in the heavenly places" about this air. Not in that heaven where the sun, moon, stars are, where birds fly and yet are called the birds of heaven, hence unclean spirits, because they were sublime angels, in this air, nay, as in their prison, having been driven back, they deceive those with whom they will burn. The martyr conquered in the arena, the Christian in bed. Do not, therefore, say that there are no persecutions because temptations do not cease. Abstain, therefore, from illicit things, from spells, from incantations, from astrologers, from sorcerers. When you are sick, do not seek such things and do not depart from God, lest you perish. But say with the Apostle: For when I am weak, then I am strong. You lie in bed and are an athlete of God. You do not move your limbs and accomplish battles. The fever does not recede and faith advances toward God. But behold, a neighbor and friend and servant stand by, even I say, perhaps from the register, carrying wax or an egg in their hands and say: "Do this and you will be saved. Why prolong your illness? Make this binding. I heard that whoever invokes the name of God and angels there will be healed. To whom do you leave your widow wife, to whom your tender children?" But he replies: "I do not do it, because I am a Christian. Thus I will die lest I die from this." Hear the word of the martyr. See if this is not what the pagan said: "Sacrifice and you will live." But he replied: "I do not do it." O merits of the martyrs never to be withdrawn! They conquered in the arena, he on the bed; they by the executioner, he by the seducer. But he is not conquered, relying on Him who hung on the wood for him.

Sermons - Sermon 335E

Sermon 335/E An ox knows its owner, and a donkey its master's crib; but Israel does not know, my people do not understand. Wretched and captive man, recognize your liberator! Ask of me: who is he who, by his own blood, redeemed you? Recognize his face: beat your breasts. It was he who, while crying out in his own pains, cried out these words: "Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing." What does it mean, "They do not know what they are doing"? Indeed, you learned to know me; for in your simplicity you did not know the power of the enemy, nor were you instructed by those who should have taught you.

CONCERNING THE MARTYRS There was no martyr who was not squared with the truth. The Lord has willed us to celebrate with you the solemn day of the blessed martyrs. Hence, let us speak something about what the Lord has given, who wanted the ark, in which He prefigured the Church, to be constructed of squared timbers. For a squared thing, however it may be turned over, stands upright. A marvelous and seemingly impossible thing, yet consider and you will find it so; a squared thing can be overturned, but it cannot be collapsed. The martyrs were cast down to the earth in humility, but they did not fall, for they are crowned in heaven. No martyr existed who was not squared in truth.

Christ was sowing and the Church was budding. The glory of martyrs on their feast days can be perceived by men, but how great it is before God cannot be seen. Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints. Precious indeed, in the sight of the Lord! For when they were killed in the sight of men, they were deemed worthless. How else would the blood of the martyrs have been shed so abundantly unless it had been considered worthless by the killers? Those who killed the martyrs did not know they were sowing seeds. For from the few who fell into the earth, this harvest has arisen. Therefore, even then, when it seemed worthless in human eyes, the death of His saints was precious in the sight of the Lord, and how precious! What was the price of that death, if not the death of the Holy of Holies? What is the Holy of Holies? He is known, there is no need to say. Why then are we amazed if the death of the saints is precious, for whom the Holy of Holies died? He was the first grain from which this harvest comes. Concerning Him, He Himself spoke in the Gospel: Unless a grain of wheat falls into the earth, it remains alone; but if it dies, it bears much fruit. Christ was sowing, and the Church was sprouting. And the grain fell, and the grain rose, and the grain ascended into heaven where the multitude of grains is. Ask the Psalm; where is the grain that fell? Be exalted, O God, above the heavens. Where is the harvest? Why do you not yet call out before I speak unless you also belong to that harvest? I will nevertheless say what you know. It is delightful to speak what we should so that from this we may deserve to have what we believe. Where is the grain that fell? Be exalted, O God, above the heavens. Where is its harvest? And your glory is over all the earth. A question not to be despised. By loving life, the martyrs despised life. Many bonds hold the soul. The fear of Peter perished, love conquered.

Perhaps, dearest ones, you have noticed in the holy readings that were recited a little while ago some not insignificant question. In the book of Saint John called Revelation, when the glory of the martyrs was read, it was said of them: "And in their mouth was found no lie and they are blameless." Again, a psalm suitable for the martyrs was sung and we heard: "Every man is a liar." Martyrs are praised and it is said: "In their mouth was found no lie." And again from the voice of the martyr it is said: "I said in my haste: every man is a liar." If every man is a liar, he who said this is a liar, but because he who said this is not a liar, therefore, every man is a liar. And yet he who said this because he was a man, was not a liar? How did he say truly: "Every man is a liar?" If I found one truthful man, I would refute the statement saying "every man is a liar." So many thousands were found that were read about in the Apocalypse in whose mouth was found no lie and it is read to me: "Every man is a liar." Or perhaps we must have compassion for him who said this, because troubled, he said it. For he said: "I said in my haste." Haste is understood as fear. For many manuscripts, where it is written: "I said in my haste," have: "I said in my fear." Some have: "in the mental disturbance." Therefore, since some put mental disturbance, others put fear, he who kept the Greek word thought it safe to put it lest the rashness of translation weaken the force of the expression. Therefore, because fear is a moving of the mind from its place, hence he who said fear could not have interpreted absurdly, so that it might agree with him who said: "in the mental disturbance." Perhaps therefore, when he was in temptation and ready to deny, he said in his fear: "Every man is a liar," that is: "What is it necessary to say the truth so that I may die? But if I deny Christ and speak falsely, I will remain a liar: Every man is a liar." Do not believe in fear, in his fear perhaps he is deceived. And when he was trembling, he took strength where he said: "O Lord, I am thy servant and the son of thy handmaid: thou hast loosed my bonds." My great bond was the love of living, and in that was the cause of dying. For many, by loving life, have died eternally. And again, many martyrs, by despising life at its end, have obtained life without end. Just as he who loves money, often by loving money, neglects money, so that by neglecting money he may gain more money. Hence a known saying of a certain well-known man: "To disregard money in its place is sometimes the greatest profit." And this is done by money lenders. By giving money, they acquire it, as if they sow little to reap much. So also, martyrs, by loving life, despised life. By fearing death, they died; by willing to live, they did not want to live. Therefore, many bonds hold the soul: love of wealth, love of power, love of wife, parents, children, brothers, love of country, love of one's land, love of this light, love of any kind of life only because it is life. Therefore, tied by these bonds, they came to temptation, so that if they confess Christ, all would be broken. Terrified and tied by so many restraints, fearing to be loosed, he said in his fear: "Every man is a liar." Let us forgive him who fears, support him who rejoices: "Thou hast loosed my bonds." Love made him truthful whom fear had made a liar. See Peter saying: "With you to death." See him promising in presumption, denying in fear; troubled by the questioning of a single maid, he said: "I don't know, I do not know him." Do you think he did not immediately say: "Every man is a liar?" But he wept bitterly and with abundant tears washed away the stains of fear. And the Lord rose again and strengthened him with the example of his resurrection. He saw living him who he had grieved dying. Now Christ did not find him fearful and denying. For why did he deny except because he feared to die, because he despaired of the resurrection? The Lord rose, showed himself to his eyes, strengthened him in love by asking three times about love him who had denied three times out of fear, infused the Holy Spirit. A brief life became worthless, an endless one was loved, and Peter suffered. Fear perished, love conquered. When he was questioned: "Every man is a liar." When he suffered: "Thou hast loosed my bonds."

God alone is truthful, every man is a liar.

We can say this, and because of the fear of the speaker, we should not consider the saying to be true when it is said: Every man is a liar. But the Apostle Paul corrects this understanding, who presented this testimony from the Scriptures and said: God alone is true, and every man a liar, as it is written. Therefore, every man is a liar. Understand the voice of truth, not of fear, for if you understand the voice of fear and not of truth, you would accuse the Apostle of falsehood. It is entirely true: Every man is a liar. And it is true what is said of so many thousands of men: In their mouth was found no lie. When they suffered martyrdom, they confessed Christ, they did not deny that they were Christians. They professed without doubt and hesitation that they had gathered against the commands of then-unbelieving kings. Because of this, no lie was found in their mouth. And if they previously had any lies, because it is true: Every man is a liar, they washed them away with that truth, covered them with that love, for love covers a multitude of sins.

Every man is a liar in himself, in God truthful.

Let a more diligent searcher of the Scriptures inquire of me further and say: What then when they were truthful, were they not humans? In confession, in suffering, when they were truthful, were they not then humans? If indeed they were humans and were truthful, how is it true: "Every man a liar"? Indeed I say, without injury to the martyrs I say, rather with the glory of the martyrs I say, that whoever glories, let him glory in the Lord. Indeed insofar as they were humans, they were liars. How therefore did they speak the truth? Because the Lord said to them: For it is not you who speak. Did you not also hear today's reading from the holy Gospel: Do not premeditate what you will say: for I will give you a mouth and wisdom. I give you, for every man is a liar. Therefore, every man is a liar of his own, of God truthful. In himself a liar, in God truthful. For you were once darkness, but now light in the Lord. Look at Peter himself: You are the Christ, the Son of the living God. A truthful man, but because he was a man? Not of his own, for every man is a liar. But from where? Hear the Lord himself: Blessed are you, Simon Bar-Jona, for flesh and blood has not revealed this to you, that is, a man, for every man is a liar, but my Father who is in heaven. Therefore, from your own lying, from mine truthful. For all that the Father has is mine. Finally, a little later, do you want to hear Peter among all men, because he too is a man, do you want to hear Peter as a man and therefore a liar? Immediately the Lord began to preach his future suffering and death. Where is Peter? Where is man? Far be it from you, Lord; this shall not happen to you. A man, a lying man, as a man of his own. And do you want to know because it is his own? What did the Lord immediately say? Get behind me, Satan, you are a stumbling block to me. Why, unless because he lied, unless because he deceitfully spoke of his own? But from where did he lie? For you are not mindful of the things of God, but the things of men.

All good things to us from the highest Good. Let us pray to have them, let us not be ungrateful for those things which we have.

All good things, therefore, are from the highest good to us. All good things come to us from the perpetual fountain of goodness. Unless perhaps we have goodness from God and patience from ourselves. For thus the reading of the Gospel ends: In your patience, you will possess your souls. Therefore, someone might say: Our truth is not ours, since every man is a liar, and the one who is from God is true, when he is true. But our patience is ours. The Lord himself says: In your patience, you will possess your souls. Do not exalt yourself, lest you lose what you have received. Therefore, it is your patience, because you have it, if indeed you have it. Therefore, it is yours because you have it, not because you have it of yourself. For what do you have that you did not receive? How do we say: Give us this day our daily bread, and you say both our and give us. Therefore what you call ours is not yours so that it is yours. For if God did not make what he gives ours, he would not give it at all; what he gives you becomes yours by receiving it. But let us prove this regarding patience, lest it be like bread, but not so regarding patience. Who told us: In your patience, you will possess your souls, who if not Christ, if not God? To whom do we say: Is not my soul subjected to God, for my patience is from him? He himself says to us: In your patience, you will possess your souls. We say to him: Because my patience is from you. Therefore, let the weak say to virtue if he wants to have virtue: I will love you, Lord, my strength. Let us pray so that we may have what we do not yet have. Let us not be unthankful for what we have. For we have not received the spirit of this world but the spirit which is from God, so that we may know the things that are freely given to us by God.

Sermons - Sermon 335F

Sermon 335/F ABOUT THE MARTYRS How great security has been given to the martyrs by God. But what shall we say about the martyrs? How great a security was given to them that they did not even care about the division of their members? He takes care of the number of the hairs and does not take care of the integrity of the members in the resurrection? Therefore, confess Christ. Choose one of two for yourself. Do you want Christ to confess you before His Father? Yes, he says. Therefore, you also confess Christ before men. The martyrs overcame because they sought solace from Christ. To know Christ is one thing, to not know Him is another. For indeed the holy martyrs did not rely on themselves but sought solace from Christ. Therefore, they were victorious. Hear the voice of those who do not presume of themselves. It is the voice of the holy martyrs: Unless it was because the Lord was with us, let Israel now say, unless it was because the Lord was with us, when men rose up against us, they might have swallowed us alive. The martyrs say: Unless it was because the Lord was with us, unless He had helped, unless He had strengthened the heart in faith, unless He had given patience, unless He had supplied strength to those fighting, they might have swallowed us alive. What does it mean: they might have swallowed us alive? Just as we know Christ, just as we know that He suffered and rose again, just as we know that He is coming for the judgment of the living and the dead, unless He had helped, they would have swallowed us. Alive, He said, knowing ones. It is a different thing not to know Christ. Therefore, one is swallowed because he thinks there is no savior. Therefore, he is swallowed but he is swallowed dead. For the one who knows Christ the savior and denies Him is swallowed alive. He knows how, knowing, the living and wise perish. He denies and perishes as if he did not perish. But indeed he perishes more then. Behold, they denied Christ, they were released from prisons and chains. Tell me: Did they perish or not? I ask the faith of the heart, not the eyes of the flesh. You see that there is a not perishing of perishing, and a perishing of not perishing. Therefore, it is said: Whoever finds his life will lose it. By losing it does not lose, by not losing it will lose more. Why do you deny Christ? O you who now rejoice freed from chains. You answered: "I feared for my soul," you said. "I was to be killed. Therefore, I denied. I cared for my soul lest I lose it." You lost it more, you were swallowed alive. If you had feared, you would not have lost it. Fool! You feared for your body, not your soul. Did you not hear Him who said: Do not fear those who kill the body, but cannot kill the soul? You did not even take care of the body, because on the day of judgment the soul with the body will burn. You feared for the body lest the persecutor might kill you. Behold, he did not kill you because you denied Christ. You removed the persecutor by denying Christ. Remove fever if you can. Behold, it is coming, behold, it will grow, behold, it will cast you out of the body. Where will you go when you leave the body? But what I had begun to say, you did not even take care of the body. For while your soul is consumed and tormented by the heat of fire, your body rots, returning to ashes. And the martyrs, you say, were not human? Even their bodies turn to ashes. And when the voice from heaven comes, you will both rise. The martyr proceeds, and you proceed. But see who goes where, where he goes, where you go. You indeed have a confused resurrection, but those who have done good to the resurrection of life, those who have done evil to the resurrection of judgment. What judgment? What punishments? Hear the prophet Isaiah: Their worm will not die and their fire will not be quenched. If you do not amend while you live, behold where you will rise, to the fire, to the flames where fire will not be quenched and worms will not die. What is it that you feared? Whom did you fear? For the body. Behold, hellfire and the worm cling to the body. You see that you did not even consult the body when you feared. Do not be afraid and be afraid. Do not be afraid that your soul will be cast out by the persecutor. Do not be afraid that your body will be killed. You did not fear for the soul and consulted for the body. God will be the supporter of both your soul and body, and the restorer of your soul and the renewer of your body.

Sermons - Sermon 335G

Sermon 335/G CONCERNING THE MARTYRS Perfect love made the martyrs fear nothing. Two fears.

Therefore our martyrs greatly loved God. Because they had perfect charity in themselves, they did not fear the cruelty of the persecutor. Therefore, the perfect charity of the martyrs made them fear nothing. Persecutors raged everywhere. They suffered storms and tempests of this world from every side. They were strong in God and in Christ. Their own weeping more persecuted them than angry enemies. On the one hand, the enemy threatened. On the other hand, the spouse lamented: "To whom do you leave us? Consent, live with us, God forgives! To whom do you leave our solitude?" The enemy threatened: "If you do not comply, I will torture, kill, burn you." Amid the threats of the persecutor and the tears of the spouse, he stood firm, neither broken nor bent, fixed in God, upright in Christ, laughing at the persecutor’s threats—for the persecutor could not threaten eternal punishments—disdaining even the tears of the spouse because the greater union is the soul's with Christ. Hoping for heavenly things, he scorned earthly things. Perceiving the future, he was not frightened by the present, and filled with charity, as it is written: Perfect love casts out fear. For there was nothing that a person perfect in charity should fear. But we find it said elsewhere: The fear of the Lord is pure, enduring forever. Here it is said: Perfect love casts out fear; there, the fear of the Lord endures forever. Therefore, there are two fears: one which charity casts out, the other enduring forever. There is thus an earthly fear, and there is also a pure fear, and it could not have been better termed than pure.

Martyrs are made not by punishment but by cause. The schismatic has no good cause.

Therefore, as I began to say, why do you boast about your evil punishment, o schismatic, which does not have a good cause? Let us honor the martyrs within the Catholic Church, having grace, not audacity; piety, not recklessness; constancy, not obstinacy; gathering, not dispersion. Hence, listen to the martyr praying: Judge me, O God, and discern my cause. He did not say: my punishment, but: my cause. For he looks to the martyr of martyrs, the head of martyrs, the Lord of martyrs, the example of martyrs, the spectator of martyrs, the helper of martyrs, the crowner of martyrs. He looks to him not magnifying the punishment, but discerning the cause. For he himself said: Blessed are those who are persecuted. It is still confused. The adulterer suffers persecution for lust, the murderer for cruelty, the thief for fraud, others who are wicked suffer persecution for their crimes. What do you say, let me hear. Blessed are those who are persecuted. You mentioned the punishment. Discern the cause. Listen, he says, I discern. Follow: those who are persecuted, for righteousness' sake. Why do you emphasize the punishment to me? O false witness, prove the righteousness. Therefore, it is not the punishment but the cause that makes martyrs. Do not emphasize your punishment, first prove your righteousness, which you are not going to do but will be proven by the removal of your injustice. If you want to truly imitate the martyrs, brothers, choose for yourselves a cause so that you may say to God: Judge me, O Lord, and discern my cause from a non-holy people. He discerns not my punishment, for the non-holy people also have this, but my cause which only the holy people have. Therefore, choose a cause for yourselves, a good and just cause, for blessed are those who are persecuted for righteousness' sake, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.

Sermons - Sermon 335H

SERMON 335/H ON THE BIRTHDAY OF THE MARTYRS Contempt for the present life and longing for the future life.

All the celebrations of the most blessed martyrs remind us how much the present life should be despised and how much the future one should be sought. Therefore, our own Lord Jesus Christ, the prince of martyrs, whose passion was the price of the martyrs, who was not born by the condition of mortality but by the dignity of mercy, both willed to die and to rise again. For he would not have died if he had not willed to die; nor would he have risen again if he had not died. Therefore, he willed both for this reason: by dying, he commended to us the contempt of this present life; by rising again, the desire for future life. Behold both of these things in my passion and resurrection, that is, both what you should endure in this life and what you should desire in the future.

Therefore, Christ showed us one life full of labors, troubles, temptations, fears, and pains, during which this world passes, through his passions; and the other life, where no one will suffer, no one will be afraid, where no one will die, no one will need to be reconciled because no one will quarrel, he showed us by his resurrection, as if saying: Behold what you should endure and what you should hope for, endure passions, hope for the resurrection. And what kind of resurrection! Not like the resurrection of Lazarus, who would die again. Christ rising, rising from the dead, as the Apostle says, now no longer dies, and death will have no more dominion over him. I know that you desire such a life. For who would not desire it? Even the godless pagans wish to be immortal. But they do not believe they can be immortal. For those who have not received faith have lost the hope of immortality.

Therefore, it is not great to desire immortality: for this desire is common even to the ungodly; but it is indeed great to believe that we will be immortal and so to live in such a way that we can come to that immortality. Therefore, every person wishes to have, if they can, the power of an angel, but they do not wish to have the righteousness of an angel. They wish to have immortality, but they do not wish to have piety. They wish to attain where it is, but they do not wish to take the path by which it is attained. To love and imitate the ways of the martyrs. We will be friends of God by His grace.

Therefore, brothers, I admonish, encourage, and beseech you that as you devoutly celebrate the solemnity of the martyrs, so also you should love the holy ways of the martyrs. They are martyrs, but they were human. They help us with their prayers, but they were what we are. Therefore, do not despair of their merits. For he who granted to them, can also grant to us. We do not worship them as gods, but we honor them for the sake of God, and we worship Him, who is both our Lord and theirs. By his grace, they are his friends, and let us be at least his servants. However, if we truly love the martyrs and follow in their footsteps, why should we not also be friends of God, by his grace, not by our own merit? In our happiness, he is praised, who makes us happy from being miserable. For we were able to make ourselves miserable by ourselves; but making ourselves happy, we cannot. Let us run to him, let us supplicate to him, and what they have received, we will also receive.

Let us all be ready to be reconciled to the will of God.

Yesterday I urged your charity: whoever among you are catechumens, hasten to the font of regeneration, putting aside all delays; whoever among you living in sins, vileness, and impurities, living damnably, change your life, do penance, do not despair of life; whoever among you are already doing penance (and it is not the sweetness of repenting from sins but the licentiousness), change your life and be ready to reconcile to the will of God, because what God wants is better for man, not what we want. Let us indeed pray to Him who is able to free us from all things, and give us peace, as He freed the three youths from the furnace. Those youths, or rather young men, for they are customarily called the three children, since the Scripture calls them...

Sermons - Sermon 335I

SERMON 335/I

You cannot put new wine into old wineskins. "No one who is still in love with his sins can return to innocence. Therefore, my brethren, see that if you have at any time deviated even slightly from the path of rightness, you correct it and return to the true way of life."

"He who loves wealth and fears separation from it does not really believe himself when he says that he believes in Christ. He promises Christ a part of himself, but reserves for himself the larger part." ON THE BIRTHDAY OF THE MARTYRS Our buyer has cleansed with a price what he had bought.

We know what we sang, and we hold it well: Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints. For by His price, the death of the saints is precious. Therefore, it is not surprising that the death of those who have been bought at such a price is precious. Indeed, the world cannot be weighed against His blood through which the world was made. But so that He might have blood to shed for us, the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us. His blood, therefore, is the price of all of us, which blood was shed for the remission of sins. For what were sinners worth, or how much were they worth? Was that blood truly the price of sinners? For Christ died for the ungodly. Hear the Apostle: God, he says, commends His love toward us, in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us. While we were yet sinners, did we value so much? Nay, we would be worth nothing if we remained sinners. That buyer of ours cleansed by His price what He purchased. For how could a sinner be worth so much unless he was cleansed by His price?

Absolutely not by loving sinners, Christ died for sinners.

Therefore, let us not look back to what we were before He redeemed us, lest we remain on the path. And let us not look back, yet let us keep it in our memory. For if we look back, we return to it; if we forget it, we will be ungrateful. What we were, it is good both to remember and to quickly hate: to remember in order to give thanks, to hate so as not to return to former things. For Jesus did not die for sinners by loving their sins. When we look for this on the surface, it meets with some difficulty in the question. For how did He not love those for whom He wished to die? And who are those for whom He wished to die? You heard the Apostle: While we were yet sinners, Christ died for us. Therefore, if He loved those for whom He died, and they are sinners for whom He died, therefore He loved sinners. The sinner should be silent, let the Savior speak. I know where what you say comes from, O sinner: you love to be a sinner. For you would not say: the Savior loved sinners, unless you loved to be a sinner. Therefore, let the sinner be silent, as I said; let the Savior speak. What does the Savior say? Behold, you are now made whole, sin no more, lest something worse happen to you. How threateningly He forbade what you loved! Does He therefore love what you wished to be, against whom He threatens such things if you return to what you were?

How then did He die for sinners if He does not love sinners? By absolutely not loving sinners, He died for sinners. Understand, and you will not struggle. You ask me how He did not love sinners who died for sinners. Tell me first what I am asking you, and you will yourself answer what you had questioned. What does each person love, do they want it to be, or do they not want it to be? I think that if you love your children, you want them to be; but if you do not want them to be, you do not love them. And whatever you love, you want it to exist, nor at all do you love that which you desire not to be. What, then, did the Lord will when He died for us? That we be sinners, or that we be freed from sins? If He died for us in order to erase our sins, did He love what He erased? Who erases what they love? If you are faithful, if you have believed in Him, if you have your heart above, to write what you are, He erased what you were.

There is one blood given as cleansing.

Behold him. Listen to him speaking in the psalm through prophecy: “Their infirmities were multiplied,” he said, “afterwards they hastened.” What does it mean: “Their infirmities were multiplied”? The law entered, so that the offense might abound. And what: “afterwards they hastened”? Where the offense abounded, grace abounded much more. What then? “Afterwards they hastened, because, filled with diseases, they sought the doctor. What then? I will not gather their assemblies from blood.” What does it mean: “I will not gather their assemblies from blood”? I will not gather them through those sacrifices of animals, not from blood, but from blood, because of which blood the death of His saints is precious in the sight of the Lord. Therefore, I will no longer gather their assemblies from blood. For by those bloods they were convicted, not cleansed. One blood was given and shed, cleansing, for many bloods convicting. One blood was given, and what then? Nor will I remember their names through my lips. Before that one blood was shed, when their assemblies were gathered from blood, their names did not die: adulterer, he was an adulterer; thief, he was a thief; assaulter, he was an assaulter; sacrilegious, he was sacrilegious. One blood was shed: “I will not remember their names through my lips.” Do not be deceived, says the Apostle, neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor homosexual offenders, nor thieves, nor the greedy, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor robbers will inherit the kingdom of God; these were their names. And to know that these were their names, hear what follows: “And such were some of you.” And where is: “Nor will I remember their names through my lips”? “But you were washed, but you were sanctified.” Therefore now you are not what you once were.

Christ came to the sick to make them healthy.

Certainly God loves sinners: certainly sinners, through His blood, are not what they were. How are they loved when the Lord Christ loved the righteous, not sinners? He loved what He wanted to make, not what He found. A doctor, if he fulfills what his title implies, loves the healthy, not the sick. And indeed I dare to say, and it is true, that He came to the sick precisely because He does not love the sick. What I said may seem contradictory, but I ask: Why did He come to the sick? To make them healthy. Therefore, He does not love the sick. He loves what He wants to make, not what He wants to remove. Therefore, the holy martyrs became healthy, bought at such a great price, redeemed by their Creator. They are twice servants, because they were both made and bought. And from where they are twice servants, thence they are free: bondsmen of the Creator, brothers of the Redeemer. If you want to see the servants, read the Gospel as an inventory; there you will see where they are bought. Pay attention to the transactions themselves: their price hung on the wood, was struck, was poured out. He poured out and bought: you read, and you find the inventory of servants. He made them brothers from servants, and what was the inventory of servants became the testament of sons. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 335J

Sermon 335/J ON THE BIRTHDAY OF THE MARTYRS Conquering within the sweetness of life, the martyr was conquering the persecutor outside.

Holy martyrs, witnesses of Christ, fought against sin unto the shedding of blood, because He was in them, through whom they conquered. And now, those who fight against sins recognize the battle and desire the crown. For when the enemies of the name of Christ persecuted the martyrs, they fought within themselves and conquered outwardly. But they would not conquer outwardly unless they first conquered inwardly. Behold, I tell you how the enemy approached the martyr. He would seize him, bind him, and lead him to the judge. The judge would say to him: Deny Christ if you wish to live. But he would not deny because he wanted to live. How then did he first fight inwardly? Because the sweetness of this life would say: Deny. He would not listen and would confess Christ. Conquering the sweetness of life inwardly, he would conquer the persecutor outwardly. This is the Christian struggle: to mortify the actions of the flesh by the spirit.

What, then, did I say? Now also those who fight against sin fight, and those who recognize the fight desire the crown. For this I said long ago, and I ought to explain to you what it is. You heard when the Apostle was being read. I recall those very words. For if you live according to the flesh, he says, you will die. But if by the Spirit you put to death the actions of the flesh, you will live. This is the Christian fight: to put to death by the Spirit the actions of the flesh. The action of the flesh is to desire another man's wife. That very delighting and desiring is already the delight of the flesh. He does not yet commit adultery, but he is already titillated by desire. But the conscience will overcome if patience is held. Who is it who does not endure such a battle? All endure it, but not all conquer. Just as not all conquer, so not all are conquered. There are also those who do not fight at all. For when desire has risen in his heart, he consents to it at that very hour. But the reason he does not act is because he does not find the opportunity. He who therefore does not act because he does not find the opportunity, meanwhile has not found a place on earth and has lost a place in heaven. Where you consented, there you remained captive.

Desire has arisen, and you have risen. But you cannot go to another man's wife. Now you walk bound, because where you have consented, there you have remained captive. However, he who does not consent is not conquered by desire. It fights with pleasure. You fight with contradiction. It will say: Let us act, so that we may live with pleasure. You respond: Let us not act, so that we may live without end. You fight with it as long as it begins not to rise as well. Or if it ever rises briefly, it quickly blushes and perishes. What I said about the love of another man's wife, I say about the love of drunkenness, the love of money, I say this about the love of pride and all others where there are evil loves and evil habits.

Whatever evil we have done is ours, but whatever good is God's. But whoever opposes these evil desires becomes a Christian with good morals. And he fights daily in his conscience, to seek the crown from Him who sees it, when he has overcome. But can he overcome, if he fights alone? Leave him alone there, and he is defeated. Therefore, when you do not consent to the desires of the flesh relying on yourself, you are alone, and because you rely on yourself, you act alone. However, when you attribute nothing to your own strength, and entrust yourself entirely to God, it is God who works in you both to will and to accomplish for your good will. And thus it is said: If by the Spirit you mortify the deeds of the flesh, you will live. Human frailty claims nothing here for itself, attributes nothing to its own efforts and strength, because if it claims credit for itself, it makes room for pride, and pride makes room for ruin. But he who attributes all his progress to God makes room for the Holy Spirit. And thus the Apostle says: For all who are led by the Spirit of God are sons of God. If therefore we are sons of God, the Spirit of God guides us, the Spirit of God directs us. Whatever evil we do is ours. But whatever good we do is of God, who works in us both to will and to accomplish for our good will.

Sermons - Sermon 335K

SERMON 335/K ON THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE BISHOP'S BURIAL Death is a certain intermediate thing. This solemnity, my brothers, is in honor of God because of the servant of God. For when a servant is rightly honored, he is honored in the name of his Lord. Blessed therefore... the servant of God, today has laid down the burden of the flesh and committed the flesh to the earth to rise again. The earth has been returned to the earth, the spirit to the Spirit of God. Such also is the laying down of the body for each man as it was in the body. For death is a certain intermediate thing, which by itself is neither good nor evil; indeed, on the coming last day of this life, it discerned and separated the two things that were joined, the invisible soul from the visible flesh, the sensing soul from the flesh in which the soul senses, since the flesh without the soul senses nothing. Therefore, these two things joined, very unlike in themselves, the soul and the flesh, when separated make death. Therefore, death, which separates and divides these two, by itself does not seem to be either good or evil, but it is good for the good and evil for the evil.

One thing is good, another is necessary. Life is to be loved, judgment is to be feared.

You have heard the Apostle saying: What I shall choose I do not know. I am torn between the two: I desire to depart and be with Christ, which is far better; but to remain in the flesh is necessary on your account. One thing is good, another thing is necessary. Good has the name of goodness, necessary has the name of necessity. If all were learned, what need would there be for the Apostle Paul to be kept longer in this life? But because there were many to be built up, the architect was kept, who knew most expertly how to place Christ as the foundation in the hearts of believers. Thus also the blessed one... dispensed the word and sacrament of God as long as the Lord willed. But when it pleased the father of the household to call his servant out of the earthen dwelling and transfer him to heaven, the earthen house itself was commended to the earth, and the earthen house itself awaits the resurrection when it will see the Creator. For the day will come, as the Lord says, when all who are in the tombs will hear His voice, and those who have done good will come out to the resurrection of life, but those who have done evil to the resurrection of judgment. Life is to be loved, judgment to be feared. Here choose what you love, avoid what you fear; for no one avoids judgment by fearing, but by living well. For what good is it to fear and live badly? If you live badly and fear, will you come to what you love, but escape what you fear? This life is a theater for God watching. Behold, as David did to signify grace.

Here, then, is the contest, this life is a theater watched by God: here is the fight, here is the conflict with all vices and especially with the prince of vices, as with Goliath. For the devil challenges the soul to single combat. He is defeated when he stands, but in the name of the Lord, not in the strength of the warrior. Therefore, whatever evil and unlawful thing is suggested to your heart, whatever malign desire arises against your mind from your flesh, these are the enemy's weapons, who provokes you to single combat. Remember that you are fighting. The enemy is invisible, but your protector is also invisible. You do not see with whom you are struggling, but you believe in him by whom you are protected. And if you have the eyes of faith, you see him too: for every faithful person sees with the eyes of faith the adversary provoking daily. But with what will you fight? With what, do you think? Behold, as David did. From the river he selected five smooth stones. The river is the transition of temporal things: in this transition of temporal things, the human soul received the law from God. And since the law is primarily contained in the five books of Moses, he selected five stones from the river. Therefore they are called smooth, because the one who used them was smooth, because he was gentle, because he was meek, because he was submissive: For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light. But what does the law profit if there is no grace?

Wisdom adapted itself to our little ones. For this reason, he placed the five stones in a bucket of milk because milk signifies grace, as it is freely given. The woman consumes food: what is necessary for the sustenance of the body transforms into the juice that nourishes the flesh, while other excesses are expelled through their specific pathways; the juice of the milk flows to the breasts to feed the hungry infants freely. For the mother has full breasts and seeks lips to which she might pour the milk, and if no one sucks the milk, it burdens the mother. Similarly, the saints of God have hearts full of God's grace: they seek those to whom they can impart it. And see what the Lord himself did in order to feed us like infants. His wisdom, which none of us could comprehend with our minds, being strong food, suitable for angels as they sustain themselves on it, men, however, cannot use such food because they are weak. What then did God do but what a loving mother would? Since a tiny infant cannot take solid food, the mother transforms the solidity of the food into flesh and in a manner of speaking incarnates it to make it suitable for the infant. Thus, God incarnated the Word to make it suitable for us little ones. Behold the solid food: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. This solidity is consumed by angels: they are nourished and refreshed by it and it does not diminish. Which of us could approach, with the weakness of this mind and body, to consume what is stated here: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. All things were made through him, and without him was not anything made that was made. In him was life, and the life was the light of men; the light shines in the darkness, and the darkness has not comprehended it? What human weakness can approach this solidity? What of our frailty can grasp it? But do not fear, o crowd of little ones! The Word became flesh and dwelt among us.

David went forth to battle armed with grace.

Therefore, to signify this grace, the servant of God placed five stones in the bucket, which he usually used to receive milk when milking, and he proceeded to the fight armed with grace, and was invincible so much as he was faithful. He cursed in his gods, this one did not reply with curses to the curse, but he spoke, this one presumed. Those were worthy to be cursed, our God worthy to be presumed upon. With one stone, he struck down such an immense and terrible enemy. He received it on the forehead, and he fell, where he did not have the sign of grace. David ran, stood over the fallen but not yet completely extinct - he was lying down but still somewhat alive - and with the enemy's own sword he killed the remnants of his life. And this signifies something. My brothers, in the first dispensation of our Lord Jesus Christ as of that spiritual David who came from the lineage of David, the enemy received it on the forehead, and was struck down. All the superstition of the nations lay down, which could not thereafter raise itself against the Church of God, because even when it arose, it was worked against, but it was crowned with martyrdom. Then, with the Church advancing, because that great sword or spear, that is, the immense sword that Goliath carried, the eloquence of this age which subdued many minds to itself, many servants of God learned that eloquence, so that Goliath could be killed with his own sword. How eloquent Saint Cyprian was, how his sword shone in his letters. It is Goliath’s sword, but already wrested from the fallen to kill the enemy. With that eloquence, we fight Goliath daily, and may it be given to us that, having killed him, we triumph. But he fights daily from his remnants in the hearts of men: we, in the name of the Lord, may we overcome him. Do not be negligent in fighting, but neither be proud in presuming. No one, my brothers, no one ought to fight with any vice in his heart and presume about himself. Do not be negligent in fighting, but neither be proud in presuming. Whatever it is that moves you, whether from ignorance or from desire, come to the battle, do not be sluggish, but call upon the One who watches, who helps those who labor. Thus you conquer. Otherwise, you do not conquer because you do not conquer. For did David win? Attend to his words and see that he did not conquer. For he said: The battle is God's. What does it mean to say: The battle is God's, except: God fights through me? He uses me as his vessel; He himself overthrows the enemy, He himself liberates the people, He himself gives glory, not to us but to His name. By fighting and confessing Him thus, we securely end this life, and with the struggle ended, we rest in the bosom of holy quiet, where the blessed rest..., indeed after grievous struggles, indeed after admirable battles. For man fights, sometimes with another man not seeing. For another man does not see in your heart what thoughts you endure, under what suggestions you are endangered, by what desires you are spurred. Some flatter, some threaten: it must be feared lest you be taken by flatterers, lest you be broken by those who threaten. In this struggle what remains except to say: In the name of the Lord my God I will overcome him; in this struggle what remains except to say: Not to us, Lord, not to us, but to Your name give glory? If you hold these things, having the law in the vessel of milk, you will be invincible. Whatever opposes you will easily be overthrown, so that He who set up the struggle for you may watch those who contend and help those who labor and crown those who conquer.

Sermons - Sermon 335L

SERMON 335/L SERMON OF ONE JUST MAN Why does the Church celebrate the days of the saints with an annual return?

Today we celebrate the memory of the just. Therefore, this sermon is owed to your Charity through our ministry, so that we may speak something from that which we sang with heart and voice with the Lord's consent: "The just will be in eternal memory, he will not fear an evil hearing." For indeed this Psalm was read to remind us to what good purpose this solemnity is held. It is not because the holy Church celebrates with annual return the final days of those just and holy ones who depart from this world that honor is thereby increased for those just ones, but rather, an example is proposed for us to imitate.

We do not consider the righteous dead as dead. For if we disdain the memory of the righteous, we do not love the righteous, and we count them as dead for the dead, which should be far from us, so that we are not like those Sadducees of whom we heard, when the Gospel was read, that denying the resurrection of the dead, and believing there is no life after this life, proposed to the Lord a question about seven men, who had one woman, succeeding one another in marriage to her. For they troubled the Jews with this question; they will not trouble Christians, because they did not confound Christ, but were rather confounded by Christ. Who then are troubled by such a question? Those who think that the dead rise to live in that world as they do in this world. Therefore, they said: All the brothers have died, and all had one woman, and afterward she also died: in the resurrection whose wife will she be? The Jews were troubled. Why were they troubled? Because they hoped for a carnal life after death. The Jews were troubled, but He whom the Jews killed was not troubled, and therefore Christ solved this question so that Christians would not be troubled by it. Let us therefore listen to our Teacher responding. For He said: You err, not knowing the Scriptures nor the power of God. For in the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are like the angels in heaven. Why then do you expect whose wife she will be, where no one will have a wife? A wife is necessary in human affairs, so that those living may be born from those dying. But there what need is there for a spouse, where there is no need for offspring? For what need is there for children to be born, where parents do not die, where all have one Father whom they cannot bury? Because in the resurrection this is promised to us, that we will be like the angels in heaven, the righteous will be in such eternal memory and will not fear bad news. But in what eternal memory they will be is clear, but from what bad news they will not fear is hidden. It is necessary therefore that we remind you of what you know, not tell you what you do not know. I now remind you and all will recognize from what bad news the righteous will not fear. The righteous will be in everlasting remembrance. In eternal memory the just will be, in which eternal memory now the soul of the just lives in rest with the saints, removed and separated from all punishments and the darkness of the wicked; but at the end of the age, with the body received back, no longer mortal but immortal, not natural but spiritual, which is sown in dishonor and will rise in glory, it will be equal to the angels of God and in that eternal memory the just will be. But from what evil hearing will he not fear? And hear this, and act in such a way that you do not fear an evil hearing. For our Lord Jesus Christ says, who cannot deceive, who deceives no one: When the Son of Man comes in his glory, he says, all nations will be gathered before him, and he will separate them as a shepherd separates the sheep from the goats: he places the sheep on the right, the goats on the left. He recounts the good deeds of the former, rebukes the evil deeds of the latter. To not make it long, he will say to those who are on his right: Come, blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. In this eternal memory the just will be. What will he say to the left? Go into the eternal fire, which is prepared for the devil and his angels. From this evil hearing the just will not fear. Let us choose, therefore, while we live, where we will be after death. For according to the merits of each, the just judge will give rewards. Let us therefore be vigilant, as far as we can with the same one granting, so that we may have the Son of God himself, who is the judge of all, as an advocate.

Sermons - Sermon 335M

Sermon 335/M SERMON OF ONE JUST MAN He who wishes to be in refreshment, let him be just.

We celebrate today the day of the just dead, and they are not here. But if you want to know where they are, ask the reading which you heard first: "The just one, if he is taken unexpectedly by death, will be in refreshment." For where is refreshment in this world, which, when not full of tribulations, is full of temptations? For this world, whether it threatens or flatters, is to be feared. But let God be feared, and the world rather be despised, so that it may be avoided the more. Therefore, if we want to be in refreshment when death overtakes us, let us be just.

Perhaps someone says: It is much for me. For let us consider what is written: The righteous, if he is taken away by death, will be at rest, and when we seek who is righteous, the Psalm terrifies us: Every man is a liar. Let us hear the book of Wisdom: The righteous, if he is taken away by death, will be at rest; let us hear the Psalm: I said in my excess of mind: every man is a liar. Was Saint Domitian not a man? If, therefore, he was a man, and every man is a liar, how was he righteous, if he was a liar? Or how is he at rest, if he was not righteous?

Such and so great, who died for us, and we fear death?

Let us attend, therefore, beloved, we have these thoughts filled with witnesses. There is not a little refreshment in hearing the Apostle saying: For to this end Christ died that he might be Lord both of the living and of the dead; and: Whether we live or die, we are the Lord’s. He is just, he does not lose his own: we are certain because Christ was not a liar. Christ is man, and not a liar. How then is every man a liar? Because Christ is so man, that he is not only man. Unless he were both God and man, he would be a liar. Such and so great died for us, and do we fear death? He went before and rose again: we are his members and we follow the head.

Whatever a man is and has discovered, he has received from God. For the Psalm itself consoles us: What shall I return to the Lord for all that he has given to me? He who said: I said in my excess: every man is a liar, a lying man gives thanks to the Lord, and finds nothing to return to Him for such great benefits, which he has received from Him. What indeed have we received from Him, when we seek what to return and do not find? We were not, and He created us; and there were no cattle, and He created cattle; furthermore, He made us in His own image: we were lost, and He sought us; He gave the death of His Son as a pledge to us, and promised us the life of His Son; He cleansed us from all our sins in the saving baptism, and because we incurred something living hereafter that would be forgiven, so that we might say: And forgive us our sins, He taught us; He cleansed all in the baptized, He cleansed all in the born-again living; He does not leave to die; He does not allow to die; I speak in sin, which is a malignant and eternal death; He advises, instructs, helps, forgives, liberates the called one. What shall I return to the Lord for all that He has given to me? What do you say, man? What do you want to give back? Whatever you find, you received from Him. The one who lives by faith will come to the reward.

We will come, therefore, we will come, if we live by faith, for then we will be just because the just lives by faith; we will come, therefore, to that reward which will be equal for all. Children believe, they came at the first hour; adolescents believe, they came at the third hour; youths believe, they came at the sixth hour; the older believe, they came at the ninth hour; the elderly believe, they came at the last hour. They came at different hours and received the same reward. Thus the last became the first, and the first the last. What does it mean, the last first and the first last? Because what the first received, the last also received. What is this denarius? Eternal life. Why is it equal for all? Because there, no one lives more, no one less. Let us strive for this, trust in the Lord, avoid the way of temptation, and have the life of happiness.

Sermons - Sermon 336

SERMO 336 On the Dedication of the Church The building and dedication of the house of God in us. A new commandment a new song. The fame of this congregation is the dedication of the house of prayer. Therefore, this is the house of our prayers, the house of God, ourselves. If we ourselves are the house of God, we are built in this world to be dedicated at the end of the world. Construction, or rather building, has labor, dedication has exultation. What was done here when these things arose is now done when believers in Christ are gathered. For by believing, as if from forests and mountains, wood and stones are cut; when they are catechized, baptized, and formed, they are hewed, aligned, and smoothed as though by the hands of artisans and workers. However, they do not make the house of the Lord unless they are joined together in love. If these pieces of wood and stones do not coherently align themselves in a certain order, if they do not peacefully interweave, if they do not in some way lovingly adhere to one another, no one would enter here. Finally, when you see the stones and wood in some structure well adhering to each other, you enter safely, not fearing collapse. Therefore, wishing to enter and dwell in us, the Lord Christ, as if building, was saying: "A new commandment I give to you, that you love one another." "A commandment," he says, "I give to you." For you were old, not yet making a house for me, lying in your ruin. Therefore, to be uplifted from the oldness of your ruin, love one another. Let your Charity consider that this house is still being built throughout the whole world, as it was predicted and promised. For when the house was being built after the captivity, as another psalm has it, it was said: "Sing to the Lord a new song; sing to the Lord, all the earth." What he said there, a new song; the Lord said, a new commandment. For what does a new song have, if not a new love? To sing is the act of one who loves. The voice of this singer is the fervor of holy love.

God is to be loved for His own sake, and neighbor for the sake of God.

Let us love, let us love freely: for we love God, than whom we find nothing better. Let us love Him for Himself, and ourselves in Him, yet for His sake. For he truly loves a friend, who loves God in the friend, either because He is in him, or that He may be in him. This is true love: if we love ourselves for another reason, we hate rather than love. For he who loves iniquity: what does he hate? perhaps his neighbor, perhaps his neighbor's wife? Let him shudder, he hates his own soul. Hatred of the soul, love of wickedness. Therefore, against the hatred of wickedness, love of the soul. You who love the Lord, hate evil. God is good, what you love is evil, and you love yourself in evil: how do you love God when you still love what God hates? For you have heard that God loved us: and it is true, He loved us; and if we consider what kinds of people He loved, we blush. But therefore we do not blush, because by loving such people, He made them not such. We blush at the recollection of the past, we rejoice in the hope of the future. For why should we now blush for what we were, and not rather be confident that we have been saved in hope? Finally, we have heard: Approach Him, and be enlightened, and your faces shall not be ashamed. If the light withdraws, you return to confusion. Approach Him, and be enlightened. Therefore He is the light, we without Him are darkness. If you withdraw from the light, you will remain in your darkness: if therefore you approach, you will not shine with your own light: For you were once darkness, says the Apostle to the faithful who were once unbelievers: You were once darkness, but now you are light in the Lord. If therefore light in the Lord, darkness without the Lord. Further, if light in the Lord, and darkness without the Lord; approach Him, and be enlightened. The passion of Christ foretold in the Psalm of dedication.

Attend to the Psalm of Dedication that we have just sung, from destruction to building. You have torn my sackcloth: this pertains to destruction. What then about the building? And you have girded me with gladness. The voice of dedication: That my glory may sing to you, and not be silent. Who is the one speaking? Recognize him by his words. If I explain, it will be obscure. Therefore, I will say his words, and you will immediately recognize the speaker, so that you may love the one addressing you. Who is the one who could say: Lord, you have brought up my soul from Sheol? Whose soul has been brought up from Sheol, except of whom it is said elsewhere: You will not leave my soul in hell? Dedication is proposed, and liberation is sung: the song of the dedication of the house is jubilated, and it is said: I will extol you, Lord, for you have lifted me up, and have not allowed my enemies to rejoice over me. Consider the Jewish enemies, who thought they had killed Christ, had conquered him as an enemy, had destroyed him as a mere mortal man similar to others. He rose on the third day, and this is his voice: I will extol you, Lord, for you have lifted me up. Listen to the Apostle saying: Therefore, God exalted him and gave him a name that is above every name. And you have not allowed my enemies to rejoice over me. Indeed they rejoiced in the death of Christ, but in his resurrection, ascension, and preaching some were pricked at heart. Therefore, in his preaching and by the steadfastness of the Apostles in spreading the word, some were pricked at heart and converted, some were hardened and confounded; but none rejoiced. Now when churches are filled, do we think the Jews rejoice? Churches are built, dedicated, filled, how can they rejoice? Not only do they not rejoice, but they are also confounded; and the voice of exultation is fulfilled: I will extol you, Lord, for you have lifted me up, and have not allowed my enemies to rejoice over me. You have not allowed them to rejoice over me: if they believe in me, they will rejoice in me. Our price is the blood of Christ.

Let us not speak much but rather come to those things we have sung sometimes. How does Christ say: You have torn my sackcloth, and girded me with gladness? His sackcloth was the likeness of sinful flesh. Do not regard it as trivial when he says, my sackcloth: there, your price was included. You have torn my sackcloth. We have escaped to this sackcloth. You have torn my sackcloth. The sackcloth was torn in the passion. How then is it said to God the Father: You have torn my sackcloth? How can it be said to the Father, do you want to hear? You have torn my sackcloth. Because He did not spare His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all. For He did it through the ignorant Jews, so that the knowledgeable might be redeemed, and the deniers might be shamed. For they do not know what good they have worked for us with their evil. The sackcloth was hung up, and as if the impious one rejoiced. The persecutor tore the sackcloth with a spear, and the Redeemer poured out our price. Let Christ the redeemer sing, let Judas the seller wail, let the Jewish buyer be ashamed. Behold, Judas sold, the Jew bought, they made a bad deal, both were damaged, they destroyed themselves, seller and buyer. You wanted to be buyers: how much better it would have been to be redeemed! He sold, he bought: an unfortunate trade; neither has the price, nor has this one Christ. To this one I say: Where is what you received? To that one I say: Where is what you bought? To this one I say: Where you sold, you deceived yourself. Rejoice, Christian, you have triumphed in the trade of your enemies. What this one sold and that one bought, you have acquired.

Prophecy about Christ the head, adapted to us his members.

Let our head therefore speak, let the head speak for the body slain, for the body dedicated; let him speak, let us hear: You have torn my sackcloth, and girded me with gladness, that is, you have torn my mortality, and girded me with immortality and incorruption. That my glory may sing praise to you, and not be silent. What does it mean, not be silent? No longer shall the persecutor bear a spear against me, so that I should be pricked: for Christ rising from the dead dies no more, death has no more dominion over him: for in that he died, he died unto sin once; but in that he lives, he lives unto God. So also let us reckon ourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God, in Christ Jesus our Lord. Therefore in Him we sing, in Him we are dedicated. For where the head has gone before, we hope that the members will follow. For we are saved by hope: but hope that is seen is not hope: for what a man sees, why does he yet hope for? But if we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it, being built up by patience. But perhaps our voice is also there, if we pay good attention, if we look diligently, if we carry a keen eye; not as blind lovers of bodies are wont to do: if therefore we should aim the spiritual eye, in the very words of our Lord Jesus Christ, we find ourselves. For the Apostle did not say in vain: Knowing this, that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin. Recognize your voice there: That my glory may sing praise to you, and not be silent. For now as we bear the burdens of this mortal body, we are not without cause for pricking. For if the heart is not pricked, why is the breast struck? Therefore, when the dedication of our body comes, which has preceded in the example of the Lord, then we will not be pricked. For the lance of the persecutor has signified the pricking that we have for sin. Furthermore, since it is written: From a woman came the beginning of sin, and through her we all die: recall from which member she was made, and see where the Lord was pricked with the lance. Recall, I say, recall our first condition: for it is not in vain, as I said: Our old man is crucified with Him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that we henceforth should not serve sin. Surely Eve, from whom came the beginning of sin, was taken to form from the side of the man. He lay sleeping when it was done: he hung dead when it was done. Sleep and death are akin, side and side, the Lord was pricked in the place of sins. But from that side was made Eve, who by sinning caused us to die; but from this side was made the Church, who by bearing us brings us to life.

Sermons - Sermon 337

SERMO 337 IN THE DEDICATION OF THE CHURCH The construction of the Church is a good work to be esteemed from the faith and charity of the one working. The structure of the heavenly Church. The good works of the faithful, from their temporal and earthly substance, when they are stored in heavenly treasures, are seen by faith, which has the eye of piety in the heart. Hence also these buildings, which are constructed for gathering religious assemblies, when the eye of the flesh inspects them, it praises inwardly what it sees outwardly, and receives in the visible light that which it rejoices in the invisible truth. For faith is not occupied with looking at how beautiful the members of this habitation are; but with how great a beauty of the inner man these works of love proceed. Therefore, the Lord will reward his faithful so piously, so joyfully, so devoutly working these things, that He will also place them into the construction of His own building, to which living stones run, shaped by faith, solidified by hope, compacted by love. Here, the wise architect Apostle laid the foundation, Christ Jesus, the same highest cornerstone, as Peter also commemorates from the prophetic Scripture, rejected indeed by men, but chosen and honored by God. By adhering to Him, we are pacified; by relying on Him, we are strengthened. For He is both fundamental, because He guides us; and cornerstone, because He unites us. He is the rock, upon which the wise man building his house most securely endures against all temptations of this age: neither falling when the rain rushes in, nor being overturned when the river floods, nor being disturbed when the winds blow. He Himself is also our peace, who has made both one: for in Him neither circumcision avails anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creation. For these two, as walls coming from different directions, were far from each other, until they were guided to Him, as to a corner, and were also united in Him to each other.

Building in labor, dedication in joy.

Therefore, just as this visible building was made for us to gather corporally, so that building, which we ourselves are, is constructed for God to dwell spiritually. For the Apostle says, "The temple of God is holy, which you are." Just as we construct this with earthly masses, in the same way, we should elevate that with well-ordered morals. For while we visit this now, that will be dedicated to the Lord at the end of the age when this corruptible body will put on incorruption, and this mortal body will put on immortality: because the body of our humility will be conformed to the body of His glory. See what he says in the Psalm of dedication: "You have turned my mourning into joy for me; you have torn my sackcloth and girded me with gladness: that my glory may sing to you and not be pierced with sorrow." For when we are building, our humility groans to Him. But when we are dedicated, our glory sings to Him: because there is labor in building, and joy in dedication. While stones are being cut from the mountains, and wood from the forests, while they are being shaped, hewn, and fitted together, there is labor and care; but when the dedication of the finished building is celebrated, joy and security follow the labors and cares. Thus also the spiritual building, whose inhabitant God will be not temporarily, but forever; while men are being separated from an unfaithful life to faith, while anything in them that is not good and perverse is being cut off and hewn away, while apt, peaceful, and pious joinings are being made, what great temptations are feared, what great tribulations are endured! But when the day of the dedication of the eternal house arrives, when it will be said to us: "Come, blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world"; what exultation, what security will there be? Clarity will sing, and infirmity will not be pierced with pain. When He who loved us and gave Himself for us shows Himself to us; and who appeared to men as He had been made in the mother, will appear to them as God the Maker as He was in the Father; when the eternal inhabitant Himself enters His house which has been perfected and adorned, established by unity, clothed in immortality; He will fill all things, shine in all things, so that God may be all in all.

Desire to dwell in the house of God. The house of God is the inhabitants themselves. A certain person asked for this one vision from the Lord; and if we will, we are that certain person. He toiled for this in his groaning desire, hence he washed his bed every night and soaked his couch with tears. For it was on account of this that his tears were his bread day and night, while it was said to him every single day: Where is your God? For he himself says: One thing I asked from the Lord, this I will seek: that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the delight of the Lord and to be protected in His temple. He himself is the inhabitant, and the dwelling place. For those who dwell in the house of God are themselves also the house of God: which contemplates His delight and is protected in His temple, and is concealed in the hiding place of His face. We hold this hope; we do not yet see the reality. But if we hope for what we do not see, we wait for it with patience, and through patience, we are built up. Our foundation is above, not below.

Therefore, brothers, if you have been raised with Christ, seek the things that are above, where Christ is seated at the right hand of God: set your minds on things that are above, not on things that are on earth. For Christ is positioned as our foundation there so that we may be built up toward the heavens. Just as for constructing earthly masses, whose heavy bodies naturally sink downward, the foundation is laid at the bottom: so for us, conversely, the cornerstone is set above to draw us upward by the weight of love. Therefore, work out your own salvation with fear and trembling. For it is God who works in you to will and to act according to his good purpose. Do everything without grumbling. And like living stones, be built up into a temple of God: and like incorruptible wood, make of yourselves a house for God. Be squared, be polished, through labors, through necessities, through watchfulness, through dealings, be prepared for every good work: so that in eternal life, as in the company of the society of Angels, you may deserve to rest. An eternal dwelling is to be prepared through good works. For this place was built temporarily, and it will not endure forever: just as our bodies themselves, for whose necessity it was constructed through works of mercy, are not eternal but temporary and mortal. However, we have a dwelling from God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens: where even our bodies, by the transformation of the resurrection, will become heavenly and eternal. And now, although not yet visibly, as it will be face to face, yet God dwells in us through faith: and to Him dwelling thus we are made a dwelling through good works; which works are not eternal, but lead to eternal life. Among which is this work by which this basilica was constructed: for we will not construct such buildings there. No place is built to fall there, into which no inhabitant enters to die. Now let your good work be a temporal one, so that your reward may be eternal. Now, I say, construct with spiritual love a house of faith and hope in every good work, which will not be needed there; for there will be no lack. Therefore, lay the foundations in your hearts with the apostolic and prophetic exhortations, lay down your humility like a floor without stumbling; reinforce the saving doctrine in your heart with prayers and teachings as with strong walls, enlighten them with divine testimonies as with lights, support the weak like columns, protect the poor like roofs: so that the Lord our God may restore eternal rewards for temporal goods, and may possess you dedicated and perfect forever.

Sermons - Sermon 338

SERMO 338 ON THE DEDICATION OF THE CHURCH Good works done openly have a double benefit. When good works, even those done for God, are shown to men, when they are done by the good and religious, human praises are not sought, but they are proposed as examples to be imitated. For mercy is of two kinds, which is done in good work, bodily and spiritual. The hungry, the thirsty, the naked, and strangers are relieved by bodily mercy: but when these same things are shown, and provoke others to imitation, spirits and minds are also nourished. One is fed by a good work, another by a good example: for both are hungry. One wants to receive something to nourish himself, the other wants to see something to imitate. This truth is also taught to us by the reading of the Holy Gospel, which has just been recited. For it is said to Christians who believe in God, who do good works, who expect the hope of eternal life for good works: You are the light of the world. And it is said to the Church spread throughout everywhere: A city set on a hill cannot be hidden. In the last times, he says, the mountain of the house of the Lord will be manifest, prepared on the top of the mountains. He is the mountain, which grew from a small stone, and by growing filled the whole world. In him, the Church is built, which cannot be hidden. A lamp on a candlestick. Nor do they light a lamp and put it under a bushel, but on a lampstand, so that it shines for all in the house. The reading is well suited when the lampstands are dedicated, so that it serves as an example of a lamp placed on a lampstand. For the lamp is a man who does good works. But what is the lampstand? But far be it from me to boast, except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ. Therefore, whoever acts according to Christ and for Christ, so that he does not boast except in Christ, is a lampstand. Let it shine for all, let them see what they should imitate: let them not be lazy, not barren: let what they see be beneficial; let them not be seeing with their eyes and blind in their hearts. The Lord's commands, though two in number, are reconciled despite seeming contrary. But lest it perhaps occur to someone that the Lord commands good works to be hidden, where He says: Beware of practicing your righteousness before men to be seen by them; otherwise, you will have no reward from your Father who is in heaven, this question must be resolved, so that we may know how to obey the Lord, and not be unable to obey Him when we hear that He commands the opposite. Here He says: Let your works shine before men, that they may see your good deeds; here He says: Beware of practicing your righteousness before men to be seen by them. Do you want to know how this question should be resolved, and unless it is resolved, it will be troublesome if it remains unresolved? Some men do good, and fear being seen; and with all effort, as much as they can, they conceal their good works. They seize opportunities when no one is watching: then they give something, fearing lest they offend that command where it is said: Beware of practicing your righteousness before men to be seen by them. But the Lord did not command good works to be hidden, but not to think of human praise in good works. Finally, when He said: Beware of practicing your righteousness before men: where did He finish? To be seen by them. Therefore, they act to be seen by men; they seek this fruit of good work, they bear this: they expect nothing else, they desire no higher and heavenly benefit. But if he does it for this reason alone, to be praised: the Lord prohibited this. Beware of doing. How? To be seen by them. Beware of having this fruit, the vision of men. In good work, we are forbidden to seek our praise.

He commands that our works be seen, and he says: "No one lights a lamp and puts it under a basket, but on a stand, so that it may shine for all who are in the house." And: "Let your works so shine before men, that they may see," he says, "your good deeds." And he did not stop there: but added, "and glorify your Father who is in heaven." It is one thing to seek your own praise in good work, another to seek the praise of God in good work. When you seek your own praise, you remain in the sight of men; when you seek the praise of God, you acquire eternal glory. Therefore let us act in such a way that we are not seen by men, that is, let us act in such a way that we do not seek the sight of men as a reward: but let us act in such a way that from those who see and imitate, we seek the glory of God and understand that if He did not make us such, we would be nothing.

Sermons - Sermon 339

SERMO 339 ON THE DAY OF HIS ORDINATION The weight of the bishop's burden. How Augustine was affected by the praises of men.

Today's day, brothers, reminds me to think more attentively about my burden, of whose weight even if I should think night and day, in some way this anniversary day strikes it to my senses so that I cannot entirely pretend not to think about it. And as years advance, or rather recede, and make us nearer the final day, which certainly at some point will come without doubt, the thought becomes sharper and fuller of provocations for me, as to what kind of account I can render to our Lord God for you. For this is the difference between each of you and us, that you are almost accountable only for yourselves; we, however, are accountable both for ourselves and for all of you. Therefore, the burden is greater but well carried it compares to greater glory; poorly carried it precipitates to the most immense punishment. What therefore must I particularly do today, except to commend to you my danger so that you may be my joy? But my danger is, if I pay attention to how you praise, and pretend not to notice how you live. He knows, under whose eyes I speak, or rather under whose eyes I think, I am not so much delighted by popular praise as I am provoked and distressed as to how those who praise me live. I do not want to be praised by those living poorly, I abhor, detest, it is pain to me, not pleasure; but to be praised by those living well, if I say I do not want, I lie; if I say I do want, I fear that I desire vanity more than solidity. So what shall I say? I neither fully want nor fully do not want. I do not fully want, lest I be ensnared in human praise; I do not fully want not, lest those to whom I preach be ungrateful. The care for the salvation of others is how great a burden placed upon the bishop. But my burden is the one you have just heard, when the prophet Ezekiel was read. It is not enough that the day itself reminds us to think about this same burden; moreover, such a reading is recited that strikes great fear into us, so that we consider what we bear; for unless He who imposed it carries it with us, we fail. Behold, you have heard: The land, he says, upon which I bring a sword, and it sets a watchman for itself who sees the sword coming and speaks and warns; but if the watchman sees the sword coming, and does not blow the trumpet, and the people are not warned, and the sword comes and takes any person from among them, he is taken away in his iniquity, but his blood I will require at the watchman's hand. If, however, he sees the sword coming and blows the trumpet and warns the people, and the person who hears the sound of the trumpet does not take warning, his blood shall be upon himself. But if the watchman sees the sword coming and does not blow the trumpet, and the sword comes and takes any person from among them, he is taken away in his iniquity, but his blood I will require at the watchman's hand. And you, son of man, I have made a watchman for the house of Israel. He has explained what he meant by the sword, he has explained what he meant by the watchman, he has explained what he meant by death; he did not allow us to excuse our negligence in the obscurity of the reading. Therefore I have made you, he says, a watchman. If I say to the sinner: You shall die, and you do not speak out to dissuade him from his way, that sinner will die in his iniquity, but I will hold you accountable for his blood. However, if you warn the sinner, and he does not turn from his wickedness or from his evil ways, he will die for his sin; but you will have saved yourself. And he adds the words he wanted to be spoken to the people of Israel: Therefore, say to the house of Israel: What is this saying of yours: Our iniquities and sins weigh us down, and we waste away in them, how then can we live? This says the Lord: I take no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but rather that the wicked turn from his way and live. This is what He wanted us to announce to you. If we do not announce this, we shall render a bad account of this watchfulness. But if we do announce it, we have done what pertains to us. See for yourselves; we are now secure. But how secure, if you are in danger and dying? We do not want our glory to be with your punishment. Indeed, security is given, but charity makes us solicitous. Behold, we say and you know that I have always said, you know that I have never been silent. This says God: I take no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but rather that the wicked turn from his evil way and live. What did the wicked say? He said the words of the wicked and unjust: Our iniquities weigh us down, and we waste away in them, how then can we live? The sick man despairs, but the physician promises hope. The man says to himself: How can we live? God says: You can live. If every man is a liar, God alone is true: erase what the man said, and write what God said. Do not despair, you can live, not because of your past evils, but because of your future goods; you will erase the evils if you turn away from evil. All things, whether good or evil, are erased by change. From a good life, you inclined yourself to an evil one, you erased the good. See where you are looking, what you are pursuing; two treasures are prepared for you; what you send is what you will find; God is a faithful keeper, He will give back to you what you have done.

He encourages his own to assist him by living well. But there are others who do not perish out of despair; they do not say to themselves: "Our iniquities are upon us, we waste away in our sins, how then can we live?" but deceive themselves in another way: they flatter themselves with the excessive mercy of God, so that they never amend their ways. For they say this: although we do evil, although we commit iniquities, although we live luxuriously and wickedly, although we despise the poor and the needy, although we are lifted up by pride, although we have no sorrow of heart for our evils, will God destroy so great a multitude and save only a few? Therefore, there are two dangers: one which we have just heard from the Prophet, another which the Apostle has not kept silent about. For against those who perish by despair, like gladiators as if destined for the sword, gaping after pleasures and living wickedly, they neglect their souls as already doomed, he says what they say to themselves: "Our iniquities are upon us, and we waste away in our sins, how then can we live?" But the other, from which the Apostle says: "Do you despise the riches of His goodness, forbearance, and longsuffering?" Against those who say: "God is good, God is merciful, He will not destroy so great a multitude of sinners and save only a few"; for indeed if He did not want them to exist, they would not live: when they do so much evil and live, if it displeased God, He would certainly take them from the earth at once. Against these the Apostle says: "Do you not know that the patience of God leads you to repentance? But according to your hardness and impenitent heart, you are treasuring up for yourself wrath in the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God, who will render to each one according to his deeds." To whom does he say this? To those who say: "God is good, He will not render." He surely will render to each one according to his deeds. What are you doing? You are treasuring up. What? Wrath. Add wrath upon wrath, increase the treasure; it will be rendered to you what you treasure up, for He to whom you entrust it does not defraud you. But if you send into another treasury good works, the fruits of righteousness, or continence, or virginity, or conjugal chastity; if you are free from fraud, from murder, from wickedness; if you remember the needy, for you are also in need; if you remember the poor, for you are also poor, no matter how much you abound in wealth, wrapped as you are in the rags of flesh; if considering and doing these things you send into the good treasury for the day of judgment, He who defrauds no one, and renders to each one according to his deeds, will say to you: "Take what you have sent, for it abounds; when you were sending, you did not see, but I was keeping it, how I was to render it." For truly, brothers, each one, what he sends into the treasury, because he sends knows it, nor does he see it when he sent it. Place a treasury buried in the ground, having one opening or slit, by which you send: gradually whatever you have acquired you send, and you do not see; if what you have sent and you do not see the earth keeps for you, will not He who made heaven and earth keep it for you?

He is frightened by the Gospel, lest, having placed aside the episcopal burden, he chooses a more secure life.

Raise, therefore, brothers, raise my burden and carry it with me: live well. Today, we have to feed our fellow poor, and with them, humanity must be shared; however, these words of mine are my dishes for you. I cannot feed everyone with a tangible and visible bread; thus I feed from where I am fed; I am a servant, not the head of the household; I serve you from the Lord's treasure, from the feasts of that head of the household, who became poor for our sake, though he was rich, so that through his poverty we might become rich. If I set bread before you, each would take individual fragments from the broken bread; and even if I placed much, very little would reach each individual. But now, what I speak, everyone has entirely, and each individual has entirely. Did you divide the syllables of my word among yourselves? Did you take individual words from the spoken discourse? Each of you heard the whole. But let him see how he heard, because I am a distributor, not a collector. If I do not distribute and save the money, the Gospel terrifies me. For I could say: What concern is it of mine to be a burden to people? To say to the wicked: Do not act wickedly, live thus, act thus, cease to act thus? What concern is it of mine to be a burden to people? I have received how I should live: I will live as I was commanded, as I was ordered. I will allocate what I received: from others, why should I return an account to myself? The Gospel terrifies me. For no one could surpass me in that most secure leisure: nothing is better, nothing sweeter, than to search the divine treasure with no noise; it is sweet, it is good; but to preach, to argue, to correct, to build up, to strive for each individual, is a great burden, a great weight, a great labor. Who would not shrink from that labor? But the Gospel terrifies me. A certain servant went forth and said to his master: I knew you were a hard man, reaping where you did not sow; I kept your money, I did not want to distribute it: take what is yours; if anything is less, judge; if it is whole, do not trouble me. But he said: Wicked servant, I condemn you out of your own mouth. Why this? Because you called me greedy, why did you neglect my profit? But I feared to give, lest I lose. Do you say this? Often it is said: Why correct? It perishes to him what you say; he does not hear you. And he, says he, I did not want to give, lest I lose your money. He says to him: You should have given my money, and I would come to demand it with interest; I placed you as a distributor, not a collector; you should conduct the distribution, leaving the collection to me. Therefore, let each one see, fearing this, how he receives. If I, distributing, fear, should he who receives be secure? He who was bad yesterday, let him be good today. This is my distribution: he who was bad yesterday, let him be good today. He was bad yesterday, and he did not die; if he had died bad, he would have gone where he would not have returned from. He was bad yesterday, he lives today; let it benefit him that he lives, do not let him live badly. Why then does he want to add the evil of today to the evil of yesterday? Do you want to have a long life, and not a good one? Who can endure long evil, even a meal? To such an extent has the blindness of the mind calloused, to such an extent is the inner person deaf, that he wants to have all good things, except himself? Do you want to have a villa? I deny that you want to have a bad villa. You want to have a good wife, a good house. Why should I go through each thing? You do not want to have a bad shoe, and you want to have a bad life? As if a bad shoe hurts you more than a bad life. When a bad and tight shoe harms you, you sit, take it off, throw it away, correct or change it, so that you do not hurt your toe, and you put on a shoe. A bad life, which destroys the soul, you neglect to correct. But this, indeed, I clearly see why you are deceived: a harmful shoe causes pain, a harmful life causes pleasure: that harms, this pleases; but what pleases for a time, later hurts worse; what beneficially causes pain for a time, later delights with infinite pleasure and abundant joy.

It is the duty of the servant to pay; it is the duty of the master to demand an account.

See the joyful and sorrowful, the rich man joyous, and the poor man sorrowful: the former feasted, the latter was tormented; the former was honored surrounded by his household, the latter was licked by dogs; the former was made more gluttonous by feasts, the latter was not satisfied even with crumbs. The pleasure has passed, the need has passed; the good things of the rich man have passed, the evils of the poor man have passed; evils have succeeded for the rich man, good things for the poor man. What passed could not be recalled; what came after could not be diminished. The rich man burned in hell, the poor man rejoiced in the bosom of Abraham. Formerly, the poor man had desired a crumb from the table of the rich man; later, the rich man desired a drop from the finger of the poor man. The poor man’s destitution was ended with the end of satisfaction, the rich man’s pleasure was ended with the pain that succeeded it without end. Thirst succeeded feasting, pain succeeded pleasure, fire succeeded purple. This is the feast that Lazarus is seen to have in the bosom of Abraham; this is what we wish you all to have, this is what we wish we all have together. For what kind of feast would I offer you if I invited you all, and this church was full of feasting tables? These things are transitory. Think about what I say, so that you may come to that feast you will never finish. For there no one is overburdened by feasting; nor are those feasts such that they feed us by their corruption and replenish us by their decline; they will be whole, and we will be replenished by them. If our eye is fed by light and the light does not fail, what kind of feasts will those be in the contemplation of the truth, in the sight of eternity, in the praises of God, in the security of happiness, with a stable mind, an immortal body, our flesh not decaying with old age, no hunger exhausting our soul? There, no one increases or decreases; there, no one is born, because no one dies; there, neither are you compelled to do any works, which we now encourage you to do.

He encourages them to change their life for the better. Men do not care to have a good life only. For you have just heard the Lord saying, to all of us: When you give a feast, do not call your friends - he showed where you should be generous: do not call your relatives, who have something to give back to you - but call the poor, the crippled, the blind, the lame, the needy, who have nothing to give you in return. And will you lose anything by this? It will be repaid to you at the resurrection of the righteous. You give, he says, I receive, I note it, I repay. God said this, and he encouraged us to do these things, and he will repay us. When he repays us, who will take it away from us? If God is for us, who can be against us? We were sinning, and he gave the death of Christ for us; we live righteously, and will he deceive us? For Christ did not die for the righteous, but for the ungodly. If he gave his Son's death for the wicked, what does he reserve for the righteous? What does he reserve for them? He has nothing better to reserve for them than what he gave for them. What did he give for them? He did not spare his own Son. What does he reserve for them? The same Son, but God to be enjoyed, not man to die. Behold where God calls you. But how do you heed where, deem it worthy to heed also how, deem it worthy to heed also how. But clearly when you arrive, will this be said to you: Break your bread for the hungry; if you see the naked, clothe him? Will this chapter be recited to you: When you give a feast, call the crippled, the blind, the needy, the poor? There no one will be poor, there no one will be crippled, no one blind, no one weak, no one a stranger, no one naked; all healthy, all vigorous, all abundant, all clothed in eternal light. Whom do you see there as a stranger? Our homeland itself: here we are strangers, let us desire that. Let us do what is commanded, that we may demand the promises, we will receive what is given freely. For if we demand, as if God does not want to give: he will certainly give, he will defraud no one. Consider this, my brothers, see how many goods the Lord our God gives to the wicked: light, life, health, springs, fruits, generations, often honors, heights, powers; he gives all these goods to both good and wicked. Do we think there is nothing he reserves for the good, who gives so many goods even to the wicked? Let no one bring this into his heart. My brothers, God reserves great goods for the good, but what eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor has entered into the heart of man. You cannot think of it before you receive it. You will be able to see it when you receive it; you cannot think of it before you receive it. What is it that you want to see?... It is not a harp, it is not a flute, it is not a sound, that brings pleasure to the ears. What do you want to think about? It has not entered the heart of man. And what do I do? I neither see, nor hear, nor think, what do I do? Believe. A great shortcut, a great vessel, where you can receive a great gift, is faith. Prepare a vessel for yourself, because you have a great spring to approach: prepare a vessel for yourself. What does it mean: Prepare? Let your faith grow, let your faith be augmented, let your faith be strengthened; let not your faith be slippery and clayey, let it not be broken by the tribulations of this world but be baked. And when you have done this, and have faith, as a suitable, capacious, firm vessel, God will fill it. For he will not say to you, as men say to one who is begging and saying: Give me some wine, please; and he: I give, come and I am making it ready. He brought a jar, and says: As you commanded I have come; and he: I thought you would bring a small cup: what have you brought, or to where have you come? I am not sufficient to give so much: take back the larger vessel you brought, and bring something smaller; bring to me what my poverty can suffice. God does not say this: he is full, you will be full, and when he fills you, he will have as much as he had before he filled you. God's gifts are abundant; you will not find such things on earth; believe, and you will test, but not now. And when, you ask? Wait for the Lord, act manfully, and let your heart be strengthened; that when you have received you may say: You have put gladness in my heart.

Bear with the Lord, act manfully, and let your heart be strengthened, and wait for the Lord. What does it mean to "Bear with the Lord"? To receive when He gives, not demand when you wish. The time for giving is not yet: He has endured you, endure Him. What do I mean by: He has endured you, endure Him? If you now live justly, if you have now turned to Him, if your past deeds now displease you, if you have now chosen to lead a good new life, do not hasten to demand; He endured you to change your bad life; endure Him to crown your good life. If He had not endured you, there would be no one to whom He could give; therefore, endure, for you have been endured. But you who do not wish to be corrected, whoever you are who still do not wish to be corrected - as if there were only one! I should rather say: Whoever you are, if indeed you are here, who have resolved to be corrected; yet I will speak as if to one - whoever does not wish to be corrected, what do you promise yourself? Will you perish by despairing, or by hoping? Whoever perishes by despairing, you say this in your heart: My iniquity is upon me, I am wasting away in my sins, what hope of living is there for me? Hear the Prophet saying: I do not wish the death of the wicked, but that the wicked should turn from his evil way and live. Do you perish by hoping? What is it, to perish by hoping? You say this in your heart: God is good, God is merciful, He forgives all, He will not repay evil for evil. Hear the Apostle saying: Do you not know that the kindness of God is meant to lead you to repentance? What remains then? It seems you did something if what I said entered your heart. I see the response: It is true, and I do not despair; I do not perish by despairing; nor do I have false hope, so as to perish by hoping. I do not say to myself: My iniquity is upon me, I have no hope; nor do I say: God is good, He will repay no one with evil; I do not say this, nor that; I am pressed by the Prophet, I am pressed by the Apostle. And what do you say? For a little while longer, I will live as I wish; later, when I have corrected myself - surely the Prophet is right in saying: I do not wish the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from his evil way and live - when I have turned, He will blot out all my evil deeds: why not add something to my pleasures and live as I please, and then later turn to God? Why do you say this, brother, why? Because God promised forgiveness, if I change. I understand, I know, He promised forgiveness; through the holy Prophet He promises this, and through me, His least servant, He promises this. It is true what He promises: He promises this through His Only Begotten. But why do you wish to add evil days to evil days? Sufficient for the day is its own evil: yesterday was evil, today is evil, and tomorrow will be evil. Or do you think the days are good when you satisfy your pleasures, when you indulge your heart in luxury, when you plot against another’s chastity, when you grieve your neighbor with fraud, when you deny entrusted goods, when you swear falsely for money, when you indulge in a good meal? Therefore, do you think you are leading a good day? How can it be that the day is good, when the man is bad? Do you wish to add evil days to evil days? Grant me a little, I say, let me be indulged. Why? Because God promised me forgiveness. But no one promised you that you would live tomorrow. Or read to me, just as you read the Prophet, the Gospel, the Apostle to me, that when you repent, God will wipe away all your iniquities: read to me where it is promised to you that you will live until tomorrow, and then live tomorrow badly. Although, my brother, I ought not to have said this to you. Perhaps your life will be long; if it is long, let it be good; why do you wish to have a long life that is evil? Either it will not be long: and that eternity should delight you, which has no end. Or it will be long: and what harm is it, if you live well for a long time? You wish to live long in evil, but not in good; and yet no one has promised you tomorrow. Correct yourself: listen to Scripture. Do not despise me as a man of the anniversary, I speak to you from Scripture: Do not delay to turn to the Lord. These words are not mine, but they are mine; if I love, they are mine; love them and they are yours. This speech, which I now deliver, is Holy Scripture: if you despise it, it is your adversary. But hear the Lord saying: Make friends quickly with your adversary. What a terrible word this is! You have come to rejoice, today is said to be the birth of the bishop: should I present something to sadden you? Rather, I present something from which the lover may rejoice, the despisers may be angered; it is better for me to sadden the despisers than to defraud the faithful.

Let all hear, I recite words from Scripture. O wicked delayer, o wicked seeker of tomorrow, hear the Lord speaking, hear the holy Scripture preaching. From this place, I am a watchman. Do not delay in turning to God, nor postpone from day to day. See if He did not see them, see if He did not inspect those who say: Tomorrow I will live well, today I will live badly. And when tomorrow comes, you will say this. Do not delay in turning to God, nor postpone from day to day; for suddenly His wrath will come, and in the time of vengeance, He will destroy you. What have I done? Can I erase it? I fear it being erased. Can I remain silent? I fear being silent. I am compelled to preach, terrified I terrify. Fear with me, so that you may rejoice with me. Do not delay in turning to God. Lord, see that I say: Lord, you know that you terrified me, when your Prophet was read. Lord, you know my trembling on that chair, when your Prophet was read. Behold, I say: Do not delay in turning to God, nor postpone from day to day; for suddenly His wrath will come, and in the time of vengeance, He will destroy you. But I do not want Him to destroy you; I do not want you to say to me: I want to perish; because I do not want this. It is better: I do not want mine, than: I want yours. If your lethargic father were sick in your hands, and you were a young man attending to the old sick man, and the doctor said: Your father is in danger, this sleep is a certain fatal lethargy: watch him, do not allow him to sleep; if you see him sleep, wake him; if it is not enough to wake him, pinch him; if even this is not enough, prod him, so that your father does not die; you would be attending, you would be a burden to the old man as a young man. He, dissolved into sweet sickness, would go, his eyes closed by that heaviness; but you: Do not sleep. And he: Leave me, I want to sleep; and you: But the doctor said: If he wants to sleep, do not let him sleep. And he: I beg you, leave me, I want to die. But you say, son to father: But I do not want this. To whom? Indeed, to one desiring to die. And yet you wish to delay your father's death, and live somewhat longer with your dying old father. The Lord cries out to you: Do not sleep, lest you sleep forever; wake up, that you may live with me, that you may have a father whom you never bury. And you are deaf.

What have I done, watchman? I am free, I do not burden you. I know some will say: What did he want to tell us? He frightened, burdened us, made us guilty. Rather, I wanted to free you from guilt. It's shameful, disgraceful, that I would deceive you, if God does not deceive me. The Lord threatens death to the impious, the wicked, the deceivers, criminals, adulterers, seekers of pleasures, despising him, murmuring about the times, and not changing their ways; The Lord threatens them with death, threatens them with hell, threatens them with eternal destruction. What do they want, that I promise what He does not promise? Behold, the lieutenant gives you security: what does it benefit you if the head of the household does not accept it? I am a lieutenant, I am a servant. Do you want me to say to you: Live however you want, the Lord will not lose you? The lieutenant gave you security: the security of the lieutenant is worth nothing. Would that the Lord gave it to you, and I would make you anxious! For the Lord's security is worth, even if I don't want it; mine truly is worth nothing if He does not wish it. But what is security, brothers, either mine or yours, except that we listen attentively and diligently to the Lord's commands, and faithfully await His promises? In those things we struggle with, because we are human, we implore His help, groan to Him; let our prayers not be for secular, passing things, fleeting and vanishing like vapor; but let our prayers be for the fulfillment of justice itself, and sanctification for the name of God; not to conquer a neighbor, but to conquer lust; not to satisfy, but to repress greed. Hence, let our prayers be: help us struggling within, and grant us victory crowns.

Sermons - Sermon 33A

SERMON 33/A

Sermon Given at Utica on the Third Day before the Ides of September. ON THE VERSE OF PSALM 145:

"I will praise the Lord in my life, "I will sing psalms to my God as long as I live." This will be our living: to see, love, praise God. From the words of this psalm, which we have just sung, may the Lord grant that we might be able to speak to you. For we have said: I will praise the Lord in my life; I will sing psalms to my God as long as I live. With these words, let us first remind your Charity that when you hear or say as long as I live, I will sing psalms to my God, do not think that when this life ends, the praise of God will end for us. For we will praise Him even more then, when we live without end. For if we praise in the pilgrimage from which we depart, how much more will we praise in the house from which we will never depart? As is said and read and sung in another psalm: Blessed are those who dwell in your house; they will praise you forever and ever. Where you hear: forever and ever, there is no end. And to live a blessed life, where God is undoubtedly seen, is to be loved without offense, to be praised without end; this will indeed be our life, to see God, to love Him, to praise Him. If therefore we praise when we believe, how will we praise when we see? How will sight praise, if faith praises so? For the Apostle says: As long as we are in the body, we are pilgrims from the Lord; for we walk by faith, not by sight. Now therefore by faith, then by sight. Now we believe what we do not see, then we will see what we believed. The one who believes is not ashamed, because it is true what he will see. But our Lord first built faith in us, where, if the reward of faith is given, it should not be sought prematurely. Our life is a vapor, appearing for a little while.

Someone says: "Why then did the psalm say: I will sing praises to my God as long as I live, and not say: I will sing praises to my God forever?" For where it is said: As long as I live, a limit is implied, if it is not understood. If you think that it was said of this life, as long as I live, examine whether this life is indeed long. However long you live here, it is not long. How can it be long, that which does not satisfy you? A young person says that an old man has lived a long time, but when he reaches the age that the old man has reached, he sees how it was not long. Indeed, time flies so swiftly, moments pass in such a way, that we see ourselves as children a few days ago, young people yesterday, and old men today. Therefore, where you think it has been said of this life, as long as I live, I will sing praises to my God, because it said as long as I live, the true understanding is that it was not said of this life, because it said as long as. The truth would never say as long as regarding this life, where nothing is long. The wise of this world could have seen this, and can Christians not see this? One of the world's wise men, a most eloquent man, said: "For what is long in that which has an end?" He entirely denied that what could ever come to an end is long. Indeed, whenever your life, however long it may be, comes to an end, it is not long, even if you have reached extreme old age. For the life of one man, especially in these days, is a vapor that appears for a little while. This is what I said, and Scripture says it. To people who rejoice and are powerful in pride, and who do not know if they will die suddenly, divine Scripture says, admonishing them, thus prideful and trusting in their fleeting fragility: What is your life? It is a vapor that appears for a little while, then vanishes. Therefore, one who exalts himself in pride trusts in vapor; he is elevated in honor and perishes with the vapor. Pride must thus be restrained and trampled as much as possible. And we must understand that we live on this earth mortally and contemplate the end where there will be no end. For if you, as I began to say, if you have grown old, you exalt yourself greatly, thinking you have lived long who will eventually end, but if even Adam still lived and did not die until the end of the world, he would not have anything long, in which there was something final. And it is very truly said, and prudently understood, and it is not only preached as true, but also recognized by listeners.

We are not made Christians to desire this life.

Let us turn our mind to the psalm we have sung, and we find that he would not say: "I will sing praise to my God as long as I live," unless it were about that life where it is long. For indeed in this life, nothing is long because there is an end to something; we are not called to desire this life when we become Christians. For we do not become Christians so that it may be well with us in this life. For if we think that we become Christians for this reason, that it may be well with us here according to this temporal life, according to fleeting and ephemeral happiness, we are greatly mistaken, and our steps will falter, seeing someone who is so distinguished in dignity that he stands out among those with whom he lives, being healthy in body, reaching decrepit old age. The poor Christian sees this, ignoble, sighing in daily labor with groans, and perhaps says to himself: "What good is it to me that I have become a Christian? Am I better off than he who is not, than he who does not believe in Christ, than he who blasphemes my God?" The psalm advises him: do not put your trust in princes. Why does the flower of the grass delight you? All flesh is grass, as the Prophet says; he not only speaks but exclaims. The Lord exclaimed to him: Cry out, He said. And he answered: What should I cry out? All flesh is grass, and all the glory of the flesh is like the flower of the grass. The grass withers, the flower falls. Is everything lost then? By no means. But the word of the Lord endures forever. Why does the grass delight you? Behold, the grass has perished. Do you want not to perish? Hold on to the Word. So too in this psalm. For the poor, humble Christian might be looking at a rich and powerful pagan, looking at the flower of the grass, and perhaps choosing him as a patron rather than God. The psalm addresses him: Do not trust in princes, in the sons of men in whom there is no salvation. He immediately responds: "Does he say this about one who has salvation? Behold, he is healthy. Today I see him vigorous. I myself am constantly sick with misery." Why do you look at things that please and delight you? There is no salvation. His spirit will depart, and he will return to his earth. Behold all his salvation, a vapor appearing for a moment. His spirit will depart, and he will return to his earth. Let a few years pass. Let the river move, as usually happens, running through various tombs of the dead. Distinguish the bones of the rich man from the bones of the poor man. Upon his spirit departing, he returns to his earth. He said nothing of his spirit for the best because when he lived, he thought nothing spiritually. He will return to his earth, according to the flesh, surely, according to the body, where he flourished, where he was carried away, where he deceived you, in the felicity of whose flesh he misled you. His spirit will depart, and he will return to his earth; on that day all their thoughts will perish. Those thoughts which were earthly: "Behold, I do this, behold, I accomplish, behold, I reach, behold, I buy that, behold, I acquire that, behold, I reach such and such honor," on that day all his thoughts will perish. But if, because the word of the Lord endures forever, you hold to the Word to give you eternal life, not only will your thought not perish then, but it will come then. When his perishes, yours will come. For he thought about temporal and earthly things, adding wealth to wealth, augmenting monetary resources, striving for honors, swelling with power. Therefore, because he thought such things, on that day all his thoughts will perish. But you, if you thought, because you have become a Christian, not about temporal felicity, but eternal rest when your body returns to its earth, then your soul finds its rest.

About the rich man and Lazarus.

Pay attention to the Gospel, and see and inspect the thoughts of two men. There was indeed a rich man, who was clothed in purple and fine linen, and feasted sumptuously every day. Daily hay, and the flower of hay. Do not be deceived by the felicity of him who was clothed in purple and fine linen, and feasted sumptuously every day. He was proud, he was impious, he thought vain thoughts, he desired vain things. When he died, on that day his thoughts perished. But there was a certain poor man named Lazarus at his gate. The name of the rich man is silent but the name of the poor man is said. Whose name was being aired, God was silent about him; of whose name silence was kept, God spoke him. I do not want you to be surprised. God recited what he found written in his book. For it is said of the impious: And they will not be written in your book. Likewise, of the Apostles, when they gloried because demons were subject to them in the name of the Lord, lest they should be exalted by this matter and boast themselves, even though it was such a great matter, and even though it was excellent virtue: Do not rejoice, he said, in this, that demons are subject to you; but rather rejoice because your names are written in heaven. For God the inhabitant of heaven was silent about the name of the rich man, because he did not find it written in heaven. He spoke the name of the poor man, because he found it written there, indeed he ordered it to be written there. But see that poor man. For we have spoken of the thoughts of the impious rich man, famous, clothed in purple and fine linen, and feasting sumptuously every day, because when he died, all his thoughts perished. But poor Lazarus was at the gate of the rich man, full of sores, and desired to be fed with the crumbs which fell from the table of the rich man, and no one gave to him; but even the dogs came and licked his sores. There I want you to see yourself, Christian: for the deaths of these two are spoken of. Indeed God is able, both to give salvation in this life, to remove poverty, and to grant sufficiency to the Christian. And yet, if this were not so, what would you choose? To be that poor man, or to be that rich man? Do not be deceived. Hear the end, and observe the bad choice. For without a doubt, that poor man, because he was pious, placed in temporal troubles, thought someday that life would end, and eternal rest would be attained. Both died, but the thoughts of that poor man did not perish on that day. For it came to pass that the poor man died, and was carried by angels to Abraham's bosom. On that day all his thoughts were healed. And since Lazarus is interpreted in Latin as "helped" - in Latin "helped" is said who in Hebrew is Lazarus - the Psalm well reminded: Blessed is he whose helper is the God of Jacob. When his spirit departs, and his flesh returns to his own dust, his thoughts will not perish, because his hope is in the Lord his God. This is learned in the school of Christ the teacher, this is hoped for by the faithful listener's soul, this is the truest reward of the Savior.

Sermons - Sermon 34

SERMO 34 Sermon Delivered in Carthage to the Elders. On the Response of Psalm 149 "Sing to the Lord a new song"

We are admonished to sing to the Lord a new song. A new person knows the new song. A song is a matter of joy, and if we consider it more diligently, it is a matter of love. Therefore, whoever knows how to love the new life, knows how to sing the new song. We must be reminded what the new life is for the sake of the new song. For all pertain to one kingdom, the new person, the new song, the New Testament. Therefore, the new person will sing the new song and will belong to the New Testament.

Let us love God because He first loved us.

There is no one who does not love, but the question is what they love. We are therefore not admonished not to love, but to choose what to love. But what do we choose, unless we are first chosen? For we do not love unless we are first loved? Listen to the apostle John. He is the Apostle who reclined on the Lord’s chest and drank heavenly secrets at that feast. From that drink and from that blessed intoxication, he belched: In the beginning was the Word. Lofty humility and sober intoxication. Therefore, that great belcher, that is, preacher, among other things which he drank from the Lord’s chest, also said this: We love because He first loved us. For he gave much to man, when he spoke about God, by saying: We love. Who? Whom? Men love God, mortals the immortal, sinners the just, the fragile the immovable, the creation the creator. We loved. And whence is this to us? Because He first loved us. Look for whence it is that man loves God, and you will find none at all, except that God first loved him. He gave Himself whom we loved, He gave from where we would love. For what did He give whereby we would love more plainly hear through the apostle Paul: Charity, he says, is spread abroad in our hearts. Whence? Perhaps from us? No. Then whence? Through the Holy Spirit, who is given to us.

We cannot love God except through the Holy Spirit.

Therefore, having such great confidence, let us love God from God. Indeed, because the Holy Spirit is God, let us love God from God. For what more shall I say: let us love God from God? Certainly, because I have said: The love of God is poured into our hearts by the Holy Spirit who has been given to us; thus it follows, since the Holy Spirit is God, and we cannot love God except through the Holy Spirit, let us love God from God. Hence it follows. Hear more plainly from John himself: God is love, and he who abides in love abides in God and God in him. It is not enough to say: Love is from God. Which of us would dare to say what has been said: God is love? He said it who knew what he had. What then does human imagination and flighty thought fashion for itself as God, and crafts an idol in its heart, composing what it can imagine, not what it deserved to find? "Is God such? No, but such." Why do you arrange the features? Why do you assemble the limbs? Why do you shape a pleasing stature? Why do you imagine the beauty of the body? God is love. What color is in love? What features? What form? We see none of these. And yet we love.

Through earthly love, divine charity is more easily understood.

I dare to say to your Charity. Let us consider in the lower things what we may find in the higher. That same lowest and earthly love, that same sordid and disgraceful love, which pursues the beauties of the body, reminds us of something from which we may rise to higher and purer things. A lascivious and shameless person loves a very beautiful woman. The beauty of her body indeed moves him, but inwardly he seeks the reciprocity of love. For if he hears that she hates him, does not all that heat and impulse around her beautiful limbs grow cold, and does he not in some way recoil from what he intended, turn away, take offense, and even begin to hate what he loved? Has the form changed? Are not all those things there that enticed? They are there. And yet he burned for what he saw, and from his heart demanded what he did not see. But if he discovers that he is loved in return, how much more vehemently does he burn! She sees him, he sees her, no one sees the love. And yet the one who is not seen is loved.

Rise from that muddy greed, so that you may remain in the most enlightened love. You do not see God. Love, and you have Him. Many things are loved in damnable desires, and are not possessed! They are sought in a foul manner, yet are not immediately possessed. Is it the same to love gold as to have gold? Many love it and do not have it. Is it the same to have vast and splendid estates as to love them? Many love them and do not have them. Is it the same to love honor as to have honor? Many burn with the desire to have it without having any honor. They seek to have it, and often they die before they find what they were seeking. God offers Himself to us in succinctness. He cries out to us: "Love me, and you will have me, for you cannot love me unless you have me."

You are the praise of God if you live well.

O brothers, o sons, o Catholic offspring, o holy and celestial seeds, o regenerated in Christ and born from above, listen to me, rather through me: Sing to the Lord a new song. "Look," you say, "I sing." You sing, indeed you sing, I hear. But let life not contradict the testimony of the tongue. Sing with voices, sing with hearts, sing with mouths, sing with lifestyles: Sing to the Lord a new song. Are you asking what you should sing about him whom you love? Without a doubt, you want to sing about him whom you love. You seek his praises to sing. You have heard: Sing to the Lord a new song. Are you seeking praises? His praise is in the congregation of the saints. The praise of singing is the singer himself. Do you want to speak praises to God? Be yourselves what you say. You are his praise if you live well. For his praise is not in the synagogues of the Jews, not in the madness of the pagans, not in the errors of the heretics, not in the applause of the theaters. Are you looking for where it is? Pay attention, be yourselves: His praise is in the congregation of the saints. Are you looking for what to rejoice in when you sing? Let Israel rejoice in him who made him, and he found nothing to rejoice in except God.

God must be loved with all the heart and soul.

Well, my brothers, question yourselves, examine your inner cells. See and consider what you have of charity, and increase what you find. Pay attention to such a treasure, so that you may be rich inwardly. Certainly, other things that have great value are called dear, not without reason. Look at the custom of your speech: "This is dearer than that." What does "dearer" mean, except that it is more valuable? If it is called dearer, whatever is more valuable, what is dearer than charity itself, my brothers? What do we think its price is? From where is its price found? The price of wheat, your coin; the price of land, your silver; the price of a pearl, your gold; the price of charity, you. Do you therefore seek a place from which to obtain land, a gem, a beast; land where you may buy it, and you seek yourself. But if you wish to have charity, seek yourself, and find yourself. For why do you fear to give yourself, lest you consume yourself? Rather, if you do not give yourself, you lose yourself. Charity itself speaks through Wisdom and tells you something, from which you should not fear what is said: "Give yourself." For if someone wanted to sell you land, he would say to you: "Give me your gold"; and if someone wanted something else: "Give me your coin, give me your silver." Listen to what charity says to you from the mouth of Wisdom: "Give me, son, your heart." Give me, he says. What? Son, your heart. It was ill when it was with you, when it was yours. For you were drawn through trifles and wanton and pernicious loves. Take it away from there. Where do you draw it? Where do you place it? Give me, he says, your heart. Let it be mine, and it does not perish for you. For see, if He wanted you to leave anything in you from which you could love even yourself, He who says to you: "You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind." What remains of your heart, with which you may love yourself? What of your soul? What of your mind? He says all. He who made you demands all of you. But do not be sad, as if nothing remains in you from which to rejoice. Let Israel rejoice, not in himself, but in Him who made him.

You did not love yourself when you did not love God.

You will respond and say: "If nothing remains for me whereby I may love myself, because I am commanded to love Him who made me with all my heart, and with all my soul, and with all my mind, how am I commanded by the second precept to love my neighbor as myself?" This is rather why you should with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind love your neighbor. How? You shall love your neighbor as yourself. God with all of me, neighbor as myself. Where from me, where from you. Do you want to hear from where you should love yourself? From this you love yourself, because you love God with all of you. Do you think it profits God that you love God? And because you love God, does anything accrue to God? And if you do not love, will you have less? When you love, you profit; you will be there where you do not perish. But you will respond and say: "When did I not love myself?" Surely you did not love yourself when you did not love God who made you. But when you hated yourself, you thought you loved yourself. For he who loves iniquity hates his own soul.

Prayer after the sermon.

Turning to the Lord God the Father Almighty with a pure heart, let us give him, as much as our smallness permits, the greatest and most abundant thanks; praying with all our soul for his singular gentleness, that he may deign to hear our prayers in his good pleasure; also that he may expel the enemy from our deeds and thoughts by his power, multiply faith for us, guide our mind, grant spiritual thoughts, and lead us to his blessedness; through Jesus Christ his Son, our Lord, who lives and reigns with him in the unity of the Holy Spirit, God, forever and ever. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 340

SERMO 340 ON THE DAY OF HIS ORDINATION The Lord carries the burden of the bishop along with the one who is carrying it. The bishop, placed over Christians, is a fellow servant with Christians.

Ever since that burden, for which an account is difficult to give, was laid upon my shoulders, the care of my honor has always indeed concerned me. However, I am much more moved by the consideration of this weight, especially when its annual day renews the memory of it and places it so vividly before my eyes, such that I hold what I accepted previously as if I were about to accept it today. But what is there to fear in this duty except that what is perilous in our honor might delight us more than what is fruitful in your salvation? Therefore, assist with your prayers so that He who does not disdain to bear me might also deign to bear my burden with me. When you pray for this, you pray also for us. For what else is this burden of mine, about which I now speak, but you? Pray for strength for me, just as I pray that you may not be burdensome. For the Lord Jesus would not call it His burden unless He were bearing it with the bearer. But you also sustain me, so that according to the apostolic commandment, we bear each other's burdens and thus fulfill the law of Christ. For without Him bearing with us, we fall; without Him bearing us, we fall. Where I am terrified by what I am for you, I am consoled by what I am with you. For I am a bishop for you, with you I am a Christian. The former is the name of an office assumed, the latter of grace; the former is a risk, the latter salvation. Indeed, as if in a great sea, we are tossed by the storm of that action; but reflecting on whose blood we have been redeemed with, we enter, as if into a secure harbor, the tranquility of this thought; and laboring in this duty of our own, we rest in this common benefit. If therefore it delights me more that I was bought with you than that I was set over you, then, as the Lord commanded, I shall be abundantly your servant, so that I may not be ungrateful for the price by which I earned to be your fellow servant.

How he feeds freely, and yet seeks a reward.

Indeed, I ought to love the Redeemer, and I know what he said to Peter: Peter, do you love me? Feed my sheep. This he said once, this he said a second time, this he said a third time. Love was questioned, and labor was commanded: because where there is greater love, there is lesser labor. What shall I render unto the Lord for all the benefits he has rendered unto me? If I say that I am rendering this by feeding his sheep, even this I do not of myself, but by the grace of God with me. Where then shall I be found to be a giver when I am forestalled everywhere? And yet, because we love freely, because we feed his sheep, we seek a reward. How shall this be? How does it fit: I love freely so that I may feed; and: I demand a reward because I feed? By no means would this be done, by no means would a reward be sought from him who is loved freely unless the reward were he himself who is loved. For if we render this, for redeeming us, because we feed his sheep, what do we render for the very fact that he made us to be shepherds? For bad shepherds, which may it be far from us, we are through our wickedness; but as for good ones, which may it come to us from him, we cannot be unless by his grace.

Let the ministry of the bishop assist the faithful by praying and obeying.

Therefore, brothers, we urge you with commands not to receive the grace of God in vain. Make our ministry fruitful. You are God’s cultivation: outwardly receive the planter and the waterer, but inwardly the giver of growth. The restless are to be rebuked, the faint-hearted to be comforted, the weak to be supported, the contradictors to be refuted, the insidious to be cautioned, the unskilled to be taught, the lazy to be stirred, the contentious to be restrained, the proud to be curbed, the despairing to be uplifted, the quarrelsome to be pacified, the needy to be assisted, the oppressed to be freed, the good to be approved, the bad to be tolerated, everyone to be loved. In this so great and manifold and varied action of diverse matters, support us both by praying and obeying; so that it may delight us not so much to rule over you as to benefit you. The bishop and the faithful ought to pray for one another. For just as it is beneficial for us to strive to implore God's mercy for your salvation, so too it is fitting that you offer prayers to the Lord for us. And let us not consider it inappropriate, as we know the Apostle did this; for he so desired to be recommended to God by prayers, that he entreated all people himself, saying: Pray for us. And therefore we ought to speak in a way that can both exhort ourselves and instruct you. For just as it is necessary for us to ponder with great fear and care how we may fulfill the duties of the pontificate without reproach, so too it must be observed by you to strive to have humble obedience to all that is commanded of you. Therefore, let us pray together, beloved, that my episcopate might be beneficial both to me and to you; for it will benefit me if I speak what ought to be done; and you, if you do what you have heard. For if both we pray for you and you pray for us with perfect love of charity unceasingly, we will come happily to eternal blessedness, with the Lord's help. This may He deign to grant, who lives and reigns for ever and ever. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 340A

SERMON 340/A On the Ordination of a Bishop The bishop ought to be the servant of many.

Today, beloved brethren, since God has deemed to bring us to you, the third sermon is rendered; but in the past two days you heard what is most pertinent to you; for today, by the grace and mercy of God, a bishop is ordained among you; therefore, it is fitting for us to speak in such a way as to exhort ourselves, inform him, and instruct you. Indeed, the one who presides over the people ought first to understand that he is a servant of many. And let him not disdain this: I say, let him not disdain being a servant of many, for the Lord of lords did not disdain to serve us. For a certain desire for preeminence had crept in among the disciples of the Lord Jesus Christ, our Apostles, from the baseness of the flesh, and the smoke of pride had begun to rise in their eyes. For, as we read written in the Gospel: A controversy arose among them as to which of them was the greatest. But the Lord, the present healer, repressed their swelling. When he saw the vice to which this contention had come, he said to them, and setting before them little children: Unless one becomes like this little child, he shall not enter the kingdom of heaven. In the child, he commended humility. For he did not wish to have such minds as children have, since the Apostle says elsewhere: Do not be children in your minds. And he added: But in malice be infants, so that in your senses you may be perfect.

Now pride is great malice, the first malice, the beginning and origin, the cause of all sins; it cast down the angel, and made him the devil. Even the pure man standing drank from the cup of pride: he raised up to pride him who was made in the image of God; already unworthy, because proud. He envied and persuaded him to despise the law of God, and to enjoy his own power. And how did he persuade? If you eat, he said, you shall be like gods. See therefore, if he did not persuade through pride. Man was made; he wished to be God: he took what he was not, and lost what he was; not that he lost human nature, but he lost both present and future blessedness. He lost what he was to be lifted by, deceived by him who had been cast down from there. The first letter to Timothy, chapter 3, had been read.

Therefore, when the apostle Paul, among other episcopal virtues, reminded us in that reading, as it was being read just now, he also added this: Not a neophyte, as one newly converted in faith, lest being elevated in pride he fall into the condemnation of the devil. What is this: fall into the condemnation of the devil? Not to be judged by the devil, but to be condemned with the devil; for the devil will not be our judge; but because he himself fell through pride, and because of pride became wicked and will be condemned to eternal fire. He says, observe, the one who is given a high place in the Church, lest being lifted up in pride he fall into the judgment into which the devil fell. Therefore, the Lord, speaking to the Apostles and confirming them in holy humility, after setting forth the example of the child, said to them: Whoever wishes to be greater among you will be your servant. Behold, because I did not do wrong to my brother, your future bishop, because I desired and advised him to be your servant. For if I did it to him, I first did it to myself; for not just anyone speaks about the bishop, but I, a bishop, am speaking; and what I advise, I myself fear, and I recall the saying of the holy Apostle himself: I do not run aimlessly; I do not box as one beating the air; but I discipline my body and keep it under control, lest after preaching to others I myself should be disqualified. The bishop presides, but if he benefits. Christ served by giving His soul for us. The same is demanded of Peter.

Therefore, to hear briefly, we are your servants: your servants, but also your fellow servants; we are your servants, but we all have one Lord; we are your servants, but in Jesus, as the Apostle says: "We preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord; and ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake." By Him we are servants, by whom we are also free; for He says to those who believe in Him: "If the Son sets you free, you will be free indeed." Shall I hesitate, therefore, to become a servant through Him, through whom, unless I became free, I would remain in perverse servitude? We are set over you, and we are your servants; we are your superiors, but only if we are helping. In what respect, therefore, is a bishop who is set over you a servant? See also in what respect the Lord Himself is. For when He said to His Apostles: "Whoever wants to become great among you must be your servant," so that human pride might not be indignant at the name of a servant, He immediately comforted them, and, by presenting Himself as an example, encouraged them to what He commanded. "Whoever wants to become great among you must be your servant." But see in what manner: "Just as the Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve." Let us inquire what He served. If we attend to His bodily ministrations, we see the disciples ministered to Him; but He sent them to buy food, to prepare food. Finally, it is written in the Gospel, when the day of His passion was approaching, His disciples said to Him: "Lord, where do you want us to prepare for you to eat the Passover?" And He orders where it is prepared: and they go, and prepare, and minister. What, therefore, does it mean when He says: "Just as the Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve"? Hear what follows: "He did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give His life as a ransom for many." See how the Lord ministered: see what kind of servants He commanded us to be. He gave His life as a ransom for many: He redeemed us. Which of us is able to redeem anyone? By His blood, by His death we were redeemed from death, by His humility we were lifted up from lying low; but we too must contribute our own small portions to His members, because we have become His members: He is the head, we are the body. Finally, the Apostle John exhorts us in his letter by the example of the Lord, who said: "Whoever wants to become great among you must be your servant," just as the Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give His life as a ransom for many; thus exhorting us to likeness, he says: "Christ laid down His life for us: so we ought to lay down our lives for the brothers." The Lord Himself also speaks after the resurrection: "Peter, do you love me?" He responds: "I love you." He said this three times, and Peter responded three times; and the Lord repeated all three times: "Tend my sheep." Where do you show me that you love me, unless by tending my sheep? What benefit will you give me by loving me, when you expect everything from me? What then shall you do by loving me, you have: Tend my sheep. This once, and again, and a third time. "Do you love me?" "I love you." "Tend my sheep." Three times he had denied out of fear: three times he confessed out of love. Then when the Lord had entrusted His sheep to him for the third time, to one who responded and confessed love, and condemned and erased the fear, immediately He added: "When you were younger, you used to gird yourself, and walk wherever you wanted; but when you grow old, another will gird you, and carry you where you do not want to go." He said this to signify by what kind of death he was to glorify God. He thus foretold to him his cross, predicted his passion. Therefore, going on, the Lord said: "Tend my sheep; suffer for my sheep."

Let him be called a bishop. Bishops and the faithful are fellow students in the school of Christ.

Such must a good bishop be; if he is not such, he will not be a bishop. What profit is there to a wretched man if he is called Happy? If you see some miserable beggar who is called Happy, and you say to him: "Come here Happy, go Happy, rise Happy, sit Happy," and he is always unhappy among all these names; something similar is this, when one is called a bishop and is not. What does the honor of the name confer on him but the burden of guilt? But who is the bishop who is called and is not? He who rejoices in the honor more than the wellbeing of God's flock, who in this exalted ministry seeks his own, not the things of Jesus Christ; he is called a bishop, but he is not a bishop, the name is void for him. And you see men speaking of nothing else. Did you see the bishop? Did you greet the bishop? Where did you come from? From the bishop. Where are you going? To the bishop. Therefore, to be what he is called, let him listen, not to me, but with me; let us listen together, let us as fellow students in one school learn from one Master Christ, whose chair is in heaven because his cross was first on earth. He taught the way of humility: descending to ascend, visiting those who lay low, and lifting up those who wished to cling to him.

Christ, teacher of humility by word and example. Let us approach the cup of the Lord's humility.

Finally, perceive it most evidently with hearing. Two of his disciples, brothers, sons of Zebedee, John and James, desired his exaltation above others, and through their mother, because they were ashamed, they told her to convey their wishes: "Lord," she said, "let one of my sons sit at your right hand in your kingdom, and the other at your left." And the Lord answered them, not her: "You do not know what you are asking." And he added: "Can you drink the cup that I am going to drink?" What cup, except the one of which he says nearing his passion: "Father, if it is possible, let this cup pass from me." "Can you," he said, "drink the cup that I am going to drink?" And they immediately, eager for exaltation, forgetting frailty, said: "We can." And he said: "You will indeed drink my cup; but to sit at my right or left is not mine to grant, but it is for those for whom it has been prepared by my Father." Prepared for whom, if not for the disciples? Who will sit there, if not the Apostles? Prepared for others, not for you; for others, not for the proud. And well he himself showed humility, when he said: "For whom it has been prepared by my Father"; Although he himself prepared it, he said it was prepared by his Father; so that he would not seem arrogant, and not to build up to humility, for which he spoke all these things. For neither does the Father prepare what the Son does not prepare, nor does the Son prepare what the Father does not prepare, since he himself says: "I and the Father are one"; he also says: "Whatever the Father does, these same things the Son does likewise." Teacher of humility in word and deed: for since the beginning of creation he never ceased by angels, by prophets, to teach man humility; he deigned even to teach by his own example. Our Creator came humble, born among us: he who made us, he who was made for us: God before times, man in time, to free man from time. The great physician came to heal our pride. From the East to the West, the human race lay as a great sick one, and sought a great physician; this physician first sent his servants, and later he himself came, when he was despaired of by some. Just as the physician when he sends his servants, as if for something easy to do; but when it is a great danger, he comes himself; so the human race labored with great danger, ensnared in all vices, especially flowing from the source of pride: and therefore he came to heal pride itself by his own example. Feel shame to still be proud, man, for whose sake God was humbled. God would have greatly humbled himself, if he had only been born for you; he even deigned to die for you. Therefore he was on the cross as a man, when the persecuting Jews wagged their heads before the cross and said: "If he is the Son of God, let him come down from the cross, and we will believe in him." But he kept his humility, therefore he did not come down; he did not lose his power, but showed his patience. Consider his effect and virtue, and see how easily he could have come down from the cross, who could rise from the tomb. But humility for you, patience for you, if it was not to be demonstrated, it was not to be commanded; but if it was to be commanded by word, it was to be demonstrated and commended by example. Therefore, let us attend to this in the Lord: let us see his humility, drink his cup of humility, cling to him, meditate on him. It is easy to think of exaltations, easy to rejoice in honors, it is easy to lend ears to flatterers and sycophants. To bear reproach, to listen patiently to insult, to pray for the abusive, this is the Lord's cup, this is the Lord's banquet. Have you been invited by a greater? Consider that you ought to prepare such things.

Against those seeking the name of bishop, not the reality. The Apostle, describing a bishop, first set forth this: He who desires the office of bishop desires a good work. What does this mean? It is as if he has inflamed everyone to desire the office of bishop, and it will be better to be ambitious than modest, and better to arrogate even unjustly what one does not deserve, than to avoid even justly through fear? Far from it, that is not so; he did not teach that we should aspire to attain the office of bishop. But what did he say? Pay attention, if I can explain what I feel. The Apostle's meaning is clear to those who understand, but obscure and dark to the proud and ambitious. Therefore, the Apostle says: He who desires the office of bishop desires a good work. It is not to desire the episcopate, to desire the episcopate: it is to desire a good work. But does he want to be bishop who does not do a good work, but his own work? He does not desire the episcopate. This is what I was saying just before: he seeks the title, not the reality. "I want to be a bishop": oh if only I were a bishop! Would that you were! Do you seek the title or the reality? If you seek the reality, you desire a good work; if you seek the title, you can have it even in evil work, but with worse punishment. What then shall we say? Are there bad bishops? Far from it, there are not: I boldly say, there are no bad bishops; for if they are bad, they are not bishops. You again bring me back to the title, and say: He is a bishop, for he sits on the chair. There is also a hay-keeper in the vineyard.

Much better if the bishop has neither a single wife nor carnal children.

He said among other things: "The husband of one wife; but how much better of none? How far should it be pursued to not more than one; but much better, if not even one. Having obedient children: that if he has them, he should have them obedient; not that he should strive to have them if he does not have them. For he commended discipline in children for the sake of managing the household: For if a man does not know how to manage his own household, how will he care for the church of God? These are the words of the Apostle himself. And how will he be a bishop without children, if he will be a good bishop? Indeed your bishop in the name of Christ, aided by the grace of Christ, did not want to have carnal children, so that he may have spiritual ones. It pertains to you to attend him worthily, obey worthily, serve with worthy service; and he will have obedient children, in place of few, so many, in place of earthly, heavenly, in place of heirs, co-heirs."

Augustine fears flatterers more than slanderers. Christ is the bishop of bishops.

We have spoken of good bishops and bad bishops; we have said what we ought to be and what we ought to avoid being. But what about you, O people of God? There is something for you too.

For we wish you to be built upon the rock, to rise as a temple to God, to become suitable for receiving God, to have your hope not fluctuate in uncertainty, but be firmly placed. Whatever we are, you must be secure. Indeed, it is good for us to be bishops who are good leaders, not just to be called as such, this is good for us; for great reward is promised to such as these. But if we are not thus, but bad, which far be it, and we have sought our honors for our own sakes, neglected the commandments of God, held your salvation as nothing, greater punishments await us than the rewards that are promised. But far be it from us, and pray for us; for the higher the place, the greater the danger we are in. For we think about the account we must give for the obedience of men, rather than the reproaches of men. Many obey us, many slander us and curse us. Those who obey us make us more endangered than those who curse us; for the obedience of men tickles our pride, the curses of men exercise our patience: elsewhere I fear a fall, elsewhere I secure a foundation. For: "Do not fear the reproaches of men," a certain servant of God said to me. And the Lord Jesus Christ says: "Blessed shall you be when men revile you, and speak all evil against you falsely, for my sake." For if those who slander speak the truth, they do not speak badly, because they speak the truth; but they speak badly who speak falsely. But what did the Lord promise us? "Rejoice and be glad, for your reward is great in heaven." My slanderer increases my reward: my flatterer seeks to diminish my reward. But what shall I say, brothers? Should we wish that you be slanderers so that our reward increases? We do not wish our reward to increase from your evil. Be blessed, be obedient; let us be in danger, and let you not be diminished. What then, if the people encounter a bad bishop? The Lord and the bishop of bishops has made it secure, that your hope be not in man. Behold in the name of the Lord, I speak to you as bishop; what sort of person I am, I do not know: how much less do you know? For what I am at this moment, I can somewhat sense: what I shall be at some time to come, how do I know? How did Peter presume, and it was shown to Peter; sick he did not know himself, but he did not deceive the physician. He spoke, he presumed, he dared to promise: "With you until death." "I will lay down my life for you." And that physician looking upon the vein of the heart said: "You will lay down your life for me?" "Amen I say to you, before the cock crows, you will deny me three times." The people should heed the bishop's teaching, not his bad habits. May the Lord therefore grant, with the help of your prayers, that we both be this and persevere to the end in being what you want us to be, to all who wish us well and to what He who called and commanded us wants us to be; may He help us fulfill what He commanded. But whatever we may be, let your hope not be in us. I say this as a bishop; I wish to rejoice in you, not to be puffed up. Whomever I find placing hope in me, I do not congratulate him; he needs to be amended, not strengthened; changed, not stabilized. If I cannot admonish him, I grieve; but if I can admonish him, then I do not grieve. As I now speak in the name of Christ to the people of God, I speak in the Church of God, I speak as whatever servant of God: let your hope not be in us, let your hope not be in men. We are good, we are ministers; we are bad, we are ministers. But good, faithful ministers, truly ministers. Attend to what we minister; if you are hungry and do not wish to be ungrateful, notice from whose storehouse it is brought forth. It does not concern you in what kind of vessel it is placed that you eagerly desire to eat. In the great house of the householder, there are not only golden and silver vessels but also earthen ones. There is a silver vessel, there is a golden vessel, there is an earthen vessel; you see what kind of bread it has, and from whom this bread is, by whose gift it is ministered. Notice him about whom I am speaking, by whose gift this bread is ministered. He Himself is the bread: I am the living bread that came down from heaven. Therefore we minister Christ to you for Christ, himself under himself; so that he himself may reach you, he himself may be the judge of our ministry. For if the bishop is a thief, he will never say to you from this chair: Steal; but he will not say to you except: Do not steal. For he receives this from the storehouse of the Lord. If he wishes to say anything else, you reject him and say: This is not from the Lord's storehouse, you are speaking to me of your own. He who speaks a lie speaks of his own. Therefore let him say to you according to God: Do not steal, do not commit adultery, do not kill; let him say to you according to God, so that you may fear, so that you may not be exalted, so that you may turn away from the love of the world, so that you may place your hope in the Lord. Let him say these things to you according to God. If he does not do them himself, what is that to you? The Lord your God is Christ, He has made you secure. The scribes and Pharisees seated themselves on the chair of Moses in the image of the rulers; do what they say, but do not do what they do; for they say and do not do. What will you say to this? How will you excuse yourself in the judgment of Christ? Will you say: I did wrong because I saw my bishop not living well. It will be answered to you: You chose for yourself, with whom you would be condemned, not with whom you would be freed. You imitated him who lived badly; why did you imitate him rather than hear me through him? For I had not said to you in my Gospel, when you see bad rulers, to do what they say but not what they do? You would hear me through them and not perish by them. The grape must be gathered, although it is surrounded by thorns.

Therefore, if even the wicked can say good things, now let us respond to Christ and say, for the sake of learning, not to despise or abuse: Lord, if the wicked can say good things—wherefore did you warn and commanded saying: Do what they say, but do not do what they do—if therefore the wicked can say good things, how do you say in another place: Hypocrites, you cannot speak good things, for you are wicked? Pay attention to the matter bound, until you discern it loosed by his help. I propose the question again. Christ says: Do what they say: but do not do what they do; for they say, and do not do. What then, if not because they say good things, but do evil things? Therefore, what they say, we should do; what they do, we should not do. In another place: Do they gather grapes from thorns, or figs from thistles? Every tree is known by its fruit. What then, how will we obey? How will we understand? Behold, they are briars, they are thorns. Do it. You command me to gather grapes from thorns; elsewhere you command, elsewhere you forbid: how will I obey? Listen, understand. When I say: What they say, do; but do not do what they do, pay attention first to what I say: They have sat upon the chair of Moses, I said. When they say good things, they do not say them themselves, but the Chair of Moses. He has placed the chair for doctrine: not because the chair speaks, but the doctrine of Moses; it is in their memory, but not in their deeds. But when they say themselves, when they speak themselves, that is, when they speak of their own, what do they hear? How can you speak good things, for you are wicked? For attend to another similarity. Do not gather grapes from thorns: for a grape can never be born from thorns. But did you not notice a vine shoot growing into a hedge, and winding around the thorns, and presenting fruit among the thorns, offering a cluster? You are hungry, and you pass by, and you see a cluster hanging among the thorns; do not do it, do not pick it. You are hungry, and you want to pick it; pick it, extend your hand carefully and cautiously; beware of the thorns, pick the fruit. So, even when the worst or wicked man speaks to you the doctrine of Christ, listen, receive, do not despise it. If the man is wicked, those are his thorns; if he says good things, that cluster is hanging among the thorns, it is not born from the thorns. Therefore, if you are hungry, pick it, but watch out for the thorns. For if you begin to imitate his deeds, while you willingly listen to him, you extended your hand incautiously; first you hit the thorns, before you reached the fruit; you come out wounded, you come out torn; now the fruit from the grape does not benefit you, but the thorns from their own root harm you. For, so that you may not be deceived, attend to whence you picked the fruit: the branch is there. Direct your eyes to the branch, and see it belongs to the vine, comes from the vine, proceeds from the vine, but encounters the thorns. Should the vine then contract its branches? Thus, the doctrine of Christ, growing and proceeding, has inserted itself in good trees, has inserted itself in evil thorns; it is spoken by the good, it is spoken by the evil. You see, whence the fruit is, whence is born that which feeds you, and whence is born that which pricks you; they are mixed in public face, but separated in root. The sharper pain of Augustine concerning the torn unity of the Church. Question between the Donatists and the Catholics. John 10:11 onwards had been read. The accusation of the Donatists about the burned books of the Gospels. But take heed to this, my brothers, so that we may also speak of our sharper pain, take heed to this, our brothers, why they have separated themselves from us. Let them tell us, why? The bishops were evil. They sat in their chairs, they sat in the chairs of Christ, they were in the unity of Christ: they ought not to have been separated from the unity. They themselves were evil: you would do what the Lord commanded: Do what they say, but do not do what they do. Why did you separate yourself from the chair of Christ? If a pestilential person sat there, you would listen through him, not imitate him. And yet you can prove it, when you say: A pestilential person sat there? But I can prove you to be pestilential, who left the chair of Christ. What you say is hidden; what I say, I prove. Your separation punishes you, your schism punishes you. We were bought together, we were acquired with one price; the records of our price are read, the sacred instrument of our purchase is the Gospel. I open, I read. What do I open? what do I read? Where we were bought, where we are brothers and fellow servants, where we are established in unity. For Christ did not remain silent about what He bought, lest anyone take His possession from Him and substitute another; He assuredly did not remain silent about what He bought. Open the records, read; instruments were drawn up, He did not buy without a scripture, He foresaw future calumniators; He assuredly did what is objected to calumniators. What is read, is believed; what is read, see who wrote it, see who spoke it, by whom it was received. He spoke, the Apostles received it: they left it written for us. Let us read the instrument, brothers: why do we argue? What if the records of our Lord, our purchaser, take away the quarrel from us? You say the Church of Christ is among the Africans and in Africa; I say the Church of Christ is spread through all nations. Behold where the question lies, behold whence the quarrel among brothers. You argue for a part: you argue to remain in a part. I contradict you, so that you may possess the whole. Understand the harmonious dispute, understand the dispute of love. I do not say to you: You are conquered, depart. For from the beginning, dividers of inheritance displeased our Lord Jesus Christ. For to the one preaching truth among the people, one from the crowd said: Lord, tell my brother to divide the inheritance with me. And the Lord, who did not want to confirm division, who came to create unity— for we heard also earlier in the Gospel about this very unity: I have other sheep that are not of this fold; I must bring them also, so there shall be one flock, one shepherd—the Lord, therefore, who loved unity, hated division, said to that man: Tell me, man, who made me a divider of inheritance among you? I say to you: Beware of all greed. He did not wish to be the divider of inheritance: He came to gather unity, to give one inheritance across the lands. Let the instruments of His inheritance be read; let them be read, as I began to say. He rose from the dead, He showed Himself to His disciples, not only to be seen, but also to be touched and handled. Touch, He said, and see, because a spirit does not have bones and flesh as you see I have. For they had thought Him to be a spirit, not a body; a phantom, not the truth. And while they still marveled for joy, He said to them: Did you not know that, while I was still with you, I said these things to you, that all things written about me in the Law of Moses and the Prophets and the Psalms had to be fulfilled? What is this? what is written about Him in the Law and the Prophets and the Psalms? Hear: That the Christ must suffer. I believe, he said. By merit, brothers: heed the rest. I read the Lord's records, I read the instrument or rather the testament of our inheritance; let us read, let us understand: why do we argue? Behold, I read, listen to the rest: The Christ must suffer. Do you believe with me? I believe, he said. And to rise from the dead on the third day. Do you believe with me? I believe indeed. Believe also in the rest, and the discord is ended. What is that in the rest? And that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in His name to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. Behold what I read, this is the Church of Christ: Through all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. Hold it with me, and you will end discord. If you are not in it, you are in a part. You conquer to your detriment, you are conquered for your gain. Recognize you are defeated, and you will hold it with me spread through all nations, beginning from Jerusalem. The Lord's records are read, the Lord's Gospel speaks; why do you slander me, because I burned these records? Who should be believed to have burned them: he who obeyed them, or he who despised them? Whoever burned them, wherever they came from, let us read, let us hear, let us do, let us agree; let us leave the past to the past; let us leave the transitory things to those who have passed. The deeds of the Carthaginian conference in the year 411. Charity is expanded more by a numerous possessor. Their advocate, their defender in the midst of the proceedings of our debate, cried out in distress: "Neither the cause of the cause, nor the person of the person prejudices." Did Caecilian sin? Rather, Caecilian did not sin, but suppose Caecilian did sin; certainly listen to your defender. "Neither the cause of the cause, nor the person of the person." One person would not prejudice another person: and will it prejudice the ends of the earth? Will it prejudice the inheritance of Christ going through all nations, beginning from Jerusalem? Did Caecilian sin: will Christ therefore lie? And yet Caecilian did not sin; but you do not want to be a good Christian. Why speak to me about a man? I spoke this to you, I was building you up to this. My hope is not in Caecilian, I did not place my hope in a man. If Caecilian was good, I will congratulate a good brother; if he was bad, I am not a judge of a brother's hidden matters. Therefore, setting aside Caecilian's honor and memory for a moment, I appeal to my Lord, I appeal to Christ against my brother. Not as that man; I do not say to Him, "Lord, tell my brother to divide the inheritance with me"; but I say: "Lord, tell my brother to hold the inheritance with me." Therefore, by appealing to the Lord against my brother, it is not against my brother, but for my brother; I do not want him disinherited, I do not want to possess alone; for I know that what I possess will not be narrow if many possess with me. What I possess is called charity, which, the more numerous its possessors, the more it is expanded.

Sermons - Sermon 341 augm

Sermon 341 augmented. The sermon of the same about Psalm 21 and how in three ways Christ is spoken of in the Scriptures, namely according to divinity.

"both according to the assumed man and according to the head"

It is of the Church, and of the three rods of Jacob. In Psalm 21, Christ is portrayed. This Psalm, as known to all Christians, since it is written there: They pierced my hands and my feet, they counted all my bones; they stare and gloat over me, they divide my garments among them and cast lots for my clothing. For it is represented in the person of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. However, I do not think it is unknown to you how the person of our Lord Jesus Christ is recommended and insinuated into the hearts of the faithful; nevertheless, you are to be reminded, because some are unaware, many have forgotten what they heard, and some wish to be confirmed in what they hold, and there are also those who want to hear from us even what they are firm in because of us. However, this understanding, which, according to the strength the Lord deigns to supply, I try to insinuate to your charity, is useful for understanding many obscure things in the most sacred books, that is, how Christ is spoken of. The persona of Christ is suggested in three ways in the Scriptures. For as far as we have been able to observe the holy pages, it is named in three ways: when it is proclaimed either through the law and prophets, or through apostolic letters, or through the faith of the events which we recognize in the Gospel. One way is according to God and that divinity equal and co-eternal with the Father before the assumption of flesh. Another way is when, having assumed flesh, now the same God who is man and the same man who is God, is read and understood according to a certain property of his excellence by which he is not equated with other men, but is the mediator and head of the Church. The third way is when somehow the whole Christ in the fullness of the Church, that is, the head and body, according to the fullness of a certain perfect man, in which perfect man we are members, is preached to the believers and offered as recognizable to the wise. However, we cannot recall or explain all the testimonies of the Scriptures in such a short and narrow time which prove all these three types, but we will not leave them unproven, so that, with certain testimonies being mentioned, you may already be able to observe and find the rest which we are not permitted to mention due to the constraints of time, in the Scriptures yourselves. The first way. Christ, the only Son of God, according to the testimony of John. To the first type, therefore, of introducing our Lord Jesus Christ, our Savior, the only Son of God, through whom all things were made, pertains that which is most noble and illustrious in the Gospel according to John: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. He was in the beginning with God. All things were made through Him, and without Him nothing was made that was made. In Him was life, and the life was the light of men; and the light shines in the darkness, and the darkness did not comprehend it. These words are wondrous and astounding before they are understood; once understood, they are to be embraced. However, to understand them is not afforded by human resources but by the inspiration of Him who deemed it worthy to inspire fishermen to speak of these things. For this was said by that fisherman, the son of Zebedee, who left his father and boat and nets and followed God, not abandoning his human father, but choosing God as his father. Certainly, the entire world was accounted as abandoned for him who left his little boat and nets. For our Lord Jesus Christ did not regard what the poor had left behind who followed Him, that is, what they had left behind in their substance, but what they had abandoned in their desires. For everyone who has little desires to have more, and he who abandons the little that he had abandons the greater desire for what he wanted to have. Therefore, when that rich man went away from the Lord in sorrow, he called Him a good teacher to receive advice, and leaving Him as though He were an evil teacher, the disciples, after hearing through God's mercy that even the rich could enter the kingdom of heaven, from whose salvation they had despaired, said, when they heard that it was easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven, they said: Behold, we have left all and followed You: what then shall we have? And the Lord said: You will sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. He also promised a great reward to those who leave everything and follow Him, and great solace in the promise and joy in the fulfillment, for whoever leaves behind everything they had for His sake in this world shall receive a hundredfold in this world, and in the world to come eternal life. If all these things are explained more diligently, they hold and divert us from our proposed matter. Nevertheless, let your charity now attend to what pertains to our assumed matter, that the first poor left behind all they had and followed God and became apostles, and as much credit is accorded to those leaving little as to those leaving much. And what is truly to be wondered at, is that the rich man, hearing from the mouth of the Lord that all must be left and God followed, went away sorrowful, hearing this from the mouth of the Lord; now, men who have not seen the Lord in the flesh hear this from His Gospel and do what that man did not, and thus is fulfilled in them: Blessed are those who have not seen and yet have believed.

God chooses the lowly of the world.

Why then did the Lord choose first the lowly, the poor, the unlearned, the uncultured, when he had before his eyes a great crowd, indeed fewer in comparison to many poor but in their kind many rich, noble, learned, wise ones, whom he also later favored—for he did not abandon them; all such kinds came to the faith—the Apostle explains the mystery: He chose the weak of this world to confound the strong; and chose the foolish to confound the wise; and God chose the ignoble of the world and those who are not, that is, are not counted, as if they are, so that those who are might be brought to nothing. For he had come to teach humility, to conquer pride; a humble God had come. He would by no means seek the highborn here, who had come so humbly. First, because he chose to be born of that woman who was betrothed to a craftsman. Therefore, he did not choose high birth, lest nobility boast in this land. He did not even choose a most splendid city to be born in, but was born in Bethlehem of Judea, which is not even deemed worthy of the name city. For even today the inhabitants of that place call it a village: it is so small and insignificant and nearly nothing, unless it was ennobled by Christ's birth. He came, therefore, not as a noble from a future place, but to make the place noble, and that in all other things of our Lord Jesus Christ, which are too long to recount. Therefore, he chose the weak, the poor, the unlearned, the ignoble: not because he deserted the strong, the rich, the wise, the noble, but if he had first chosen them, they would be seen to be chosen by merit of their own dignities, wealth, and birth, and thus, inflated by these things, they would not receive the salvation of humility, without which no one can return to that life from which they had not fallen except by pride. The physician, therefore, cures the disease by opposite means: the cold with warm remedies, the hot with cold, the wet with dry, the cold with warm. Therefore, if we see the art of medicine heal the ill by opposites, it is not surprising if we are healed by the humility of God, who were sick with human pride. Thus the Lord gained the preacher from the fisherman more salubriously than a fisherman from a preacher. For the orator Cyprian was a martyr, but first the apostle was a fisherman. Later Christians became emperors, but first fishermen preached Christ. And to such an extent did God truly confound strong things by choosing weak ones—he confounded them to heal, cast them down to lift them up—that what we have known in our times and cannot be hidden was manifested to us, known with clear faith by the things themselves, that God chose the weak things of the world to confound the strong. For in our times an emperor came to the city of Rome: there is the temple of the emperor, there is the tomb of the fisherman. Therefore, that pious and Christian emperor did not proceed to the proud temple of the emperor to seek health from the Lord, but to the tomb of the fisherman, where he might imitate that humble fisherman, so that he might obtain something from the Lord by his gaze, which a proud emperor could not deserve.

John drew from the breast of Christ the things that he wrote about the Word of God.

Why, therefore, did I say it? Because we recalled that way of insinuating Christ according to his divinity before the taking on of flesh, a certain method that is wondrous and astounding to all who hear, but known to few who understand, when they strike upon it so as to be dazzled as if by a flash of that eternal and ineffable light, saying and recalling: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God, and so on. We said this so that you would not ask us superfluously the understanding of these words, believing you can understand this by the inspiration of Him, by whose inspiration it occurred that a simple fisherman preached these things. For that fisherman did not know them of himself, nor was he so great in genius or learning to penetrate with the sharpness of mind and transcend all this air and all the ethereal powers, and thence arrive at the luminaries, virtues, powers and natures of angels and all the most eminent spiritual creatures, which had fallen into no sin, but always adhered to the contemplation of immutable truth, indeed to surpass even that and reach what eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor has entered into the heart of man. What is the Word of the Father, how is it the Word? Is it a thought? a sound? Certainly not. For if it is a thought, it involves time; if it is a sound, it is transmitted through the beaten air. Not so the Word of God, but the Word remaining, and always the proclaimed Word and not a removed one, or rather not even proclaimed, lest some bodily extension should be understood. And how should it be said, no human mouth can speak this: reverently it is believed that the Word was begotten; only He can express and speak Himself, the Son of God alone; to whom He speaks, he can understand Him, but cannot express Him. Whence did the fisherman see this, unless He Himself wished to reveal it? The fisherman saw it from where he drank; but whence did he drink this? Let us consider the Lord's banquet, if by chance we might find where the fisherman drank this. All the disciples were reclining with the Lord; it is written in the Gospel that John used to recline on the Lord's chest. Why then is it surprising if he drank from His chest what he spoke about His divinity? For the Lord of the banquet and the Lord of those reclining would not allow His disciple to fill his belly from that table and not fill his mind from His chest. So indeed He did: He fed and satiated His disciple from His chest. But he, being satiated, burped, and that burp is the Gospel. Thus you have seen with the eyes of faith in the Gospel the fisherman feasting; listen to him burping: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. This was in the beginning with God. You despised it when you heard the word—for words are heard every day—; now despise it no more because the Word was God. "And how shall I understand God and the Word?" Let Him make you drink, who satiated the fisherman. For now, listen to him burping, believe in him burping, so that you too may ascending through the step of faith be satiated with the vivacity of understanding.

We believe not in two but one Word.

"What then?" you will say. "Should I now believe the Word of God to be the Son of God." The only Son of God, not two words, but one Word, although there are two words in Scripture, for example, those two commandments pertaining either to double love, or to recompense. For the Lord says certain things to the righteous placed on the right, and says other things to the wicked placed on the left. He does not say to the righteous what He says to the wicked. As if two words are distributed by the narrator according to our capacity, according to our merits: here they are distributed, but there, something [is distributed], as, if I can present a certain analogy from physical things— nonetheless fitting to the senses of the weak—if I can say, how the brightness of fire or a star or the moon or the sun is one and is in the same way. However, if it is considered by different eyes, by some clear and healthy, by others wounded and sore, to some it appears to be a serene light, to others as if raging and angry. For it reflects off the wounded sight and creates pain, where it was causing joy to the healthy. Behold, it is serene, behold, it is fierce. Is it itself divided, itself dissimilar? No, but according to the merits of the diverse viewers. Pay attention, my brothers, and from small things recognize greater things. Thus the one Word of God, but it distributes what is worthy according to merits, saying to those: "Come, blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world," but to those saying: "Depart into everlasting fire which is prepared for the devil and his angels." What is as different as "come into the kingdom," and "go into everlasting fire"? Is it therefore a different word? No. It is one, but the merits of the hearers are different. Listen to the prophet in the Psalms saying the same thing: "God has spoken once: I have heard these two things." A great question: already, if you have understood those things which I have said, do not be disturbed. He has spoken once, and you have heard two things? He has spoken once according to the one Word, so how have you heard two? "For power belongs to you," he says, "and mercy to you, Lord" — therefore power to punish, mercy to deliver. Hear what follows: "For you will reward," he says, "each according to his works."

"Inexpressible Trinity... desires the hearts of lovers."

O only Word, sweet Word, inspire in us Your love; but it inspires through the Holy Spirit. For thus is the Trinity: the Father who begot, the Word that was begotten, and the Spirit by whom love is inspired; who begot and what was begotten and by whom it is inspired. That the most sweet and excellent and ineffable Trinity may be loved, surpassing all the creation which it initiated, perfected, and ordered, utterly surpassing, it desires the hearts of those who love. But "desires" is rightly said, for it makes one desire. For the Spirit is also said to rejoice, because it makes one rejoice. And about God: The Lord your God tests you, that He may know if you love Him. What does it mean "that He may know," if not that He may make you know? Therefore, He sustains the hearts of those who desire, purely love, and love freely, because they find nothing better to love—or if they find something better, let them accept this as their reward; let them seek this, if they do not find better. So if your Creator did not give Himself to you, whom you find nothing better than, you should always lament rather than seek anything else; if your Creator did not give Himself to you, than whom there is nothing better, even if He accepts these words to be said about Himself—He accepts them because we are little ones, He accepts them because if we wanted to say something worthy, we would say nothing at all—if therefore your Creator, as I had begun to say, did not want to give Himself to you, you should always lament rather than anything else. But now He offers Himself, and you seek something else; He somewhat begs to be loved, by whom He is not loved. O you are miserable, not He! He therefore seeks hearts sincerely loving Him, which with pious intention surpass all mutable creation—they surpass, however, if they are humble: high places are not surpassed by high. If you want to surpass all creation and reach what you have heard from the mouth of the full fisherman, be humble, seek piously. For when you have transcended all mutable things, both corporeal and spiritual, you will come to contemplate that Trinity, and you will drink from where he drinks; to whom when you arrive, you will laugh at all calumniators—and when you have laughed at first, afterwards perhaps you will weep for those who, with vain contentions, excite smoke for themselves so that they may not see it.

"Do not think of God corporeally."

This, then, will be enough, brothers, to have suggested to you. But so that you may understand, knock on Him. Let no one say to himself with carnal thought, "How was the Word with God, and how was it in the womb of the virgin, to be born? Did the Word itself descend, so that when it was in the womb of the Virgin Mary, it left the Father? If it did not leave the Father, how could it be here? Or perhaps half remained with the Father, and half was in the womb? Or perhaps a large part remained with the Father, and a little bit or a small piece descended to the Virgin's womb?" Do not divide God into pieces; let the discord of your thoughts unite in Him in some way, He is not divided among them; let Him gather you, do not scatter Him. "And how," you ask, "am I to understand? I do not know, I cannot. He is both with the Father and in the womb of the virgin. Who can understand this?" But you hear about God; you are forming a certain kind of body for yourself out of the habit of carnal thoughts. When you do that, it is necessary to divide. For you do not find the whole thing everywhere. One part of the earth is here, another outside in the street, not the same, because it is earth, because it is a body: one part is large, another small. So too water is divided: one part is near this shore, another near that, and the part that is here is not the same as the part that is there; although the whole seems to be spread out everywhere in its places, it does not have the same part everywhere, but one part here, another elsewhere. So this diffusion of the ether: one air is in this basilica, and another in that, because there is one air throughout, but one part is in this, another part is in that; the part that is there is not the part that is here, nor is the part here the part that is there. So too are the parts of the sky: those we look at when we see the east are different parts from those we look at when we turn to the west. It cannot be that one and the same part is everywhere: even if the whole seems to be everywhere in parts, the whole of it is not everywhere, but one part is elsewhere, another elsewhere. Therefore, do not think of God corporally. Or perhaps you cannot think of anything but such things? I will give an example, perhaps, from where this may come to your understanding for the intention of your love. The Word of God is illustrated by human examples.

You want to divide the Word of God, and it doesn't seem credible to you that the whole is with the Father, the whole is in the womb of the Virgin Mary. I say further: the whole is wherever you want, but it does not take on the person of man everywhere, with whom it becomes one God and man. I don't want you to divide: take as much as you can. Do you want to divide the Word of God? Listen to the word of man. Certainly, it seemed to you that the Word of God could not be both in Mary and with the Father, except by being divided, as if one part of it were here, another part there. When you hear the word from us, or when you hear words from us—pay attention to what we speak: for you receive a better lesson from this word, which is said to many of you, than from those, though they are of the same nature, which you say to each other. For you deal with fewer, we deal with so many: everyone hears what we say, and everyone hears the whole. If I were to place bodily food for you to eat, you would divide the food among yourselves, and one would take one part, another another part, to eat. Even if you all ate the same and one food, nevertheless you would not all eat the same parts, but you would divide among yourselves in portions what was set down, one taking this part, another that; one food would reach all, but not the whole food to all. Certainly, this would be the case. However, as that food would be placed before your mouth, so now a certain food of voices and words is placed before your ears, and yet the whole reaches everyone. Or perhaps, when I speak, does one person take one syllable for himself, another person another? Or one person one word, another person another word? If so, I would have to say as many words as I see people, for them to reach everyone, even single words. And it's easily done: I say more than there are people here, and everything reaches everyone. Therefore, the word of man is not divided by syllables, so that everyone hears, and the Word of God is chopped up into pieces, so that it might be everywhere? Do we think, brothers, that these sounding and passing words can be in any way compared to the unchanging Word? Or because I have said these things, have I made a comparison? But however, I wanted to explain to you that what God displays in corporeal things may help you believe those things that are yet unseen about spiritual matters. But now, let us move on to better things. For words sound and pass away. Think about spiritual things, think about justice. Thinking about justice being placed in these western parts, thinking about justice being placed in the east, how is it that both think of the whole and see the whole? For he who sees justice, according to which he does something, acts justly. He sees inwardly, acts outwardly. How does he see inwardly, if nothing is present to him seeing? But if it is present, because he is placed in part, will the thought of the other not reach to the same part? But when you, placed here, see the same thing in mind that he sees placed so far away, and it shines wholly to you, wholly to him, see that those things which are divine and incorporeal are wholly everywhere, and believe the Word wholly in the Father, wholly in the womb. For you believe this of the Word of God, who is God with God. The second way: Our faith is nourished by the sacrament of the incarnation.

[3].And listen to another suggestion, another way of introducing Christ, which Scripture proclaims. It says this before assuming flesh. But how does Scripture proclaim this? "The Word," it says, "was made flesh, and dwelt among us." For he who said: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. This was in the beginning with God. All things were made through him, and without him nothing was made," would proclaim the divinity of the Word to us in vain if he were silent about the humanity of the Word. For in order that I may see that, it is dealt with me from here; in order that I might be purified to contemplate that, he himself aids my weakness. By taking from human nature the very nature of man, he became man. He came with the burden of flesh to him who lay wounded in the way, to instruct and nourish our little faith with the sacrament of his incarnation, and to make our understanding clear to see that which he never lost by that which he assumed. For he began to be man, he did not cease to be God. Therefore, this is the proclamation of our Lord Jesus Christ according to what he is as mediator, according to what he is as the head of the Church, that God is man and man is God, when John says: "And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us."

Paul agrees with John in praises of the incarnate Word.

Listen now to both statements in that most well-known passage of the Apostle Paul: "Who, being in the form of God," he says, "did not consider it robbery to be equal with God." This is: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." How did the Apostle say: "Did not consider it robbery to be equal with God," if he was not equal with God? But if the Father is God, and He is not God, how is he equal? Therefore where it says: "The Word was God," here it states, "Did not consider it robbery to be equal with God." And where it says: "The Word became flesh and dwelt among us," here it states: "But He emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant." Take heed. Therefore, by becoming man, by the Word becoming flesh and dwelling among us, by this He emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant. For what did He empty? Not to lose divinity, but to take on humanity, appearing to men as He was not before He became man. By appearing thus He emptied Himself, that is, preserving the divinity of majesty and presenting the garment of human flesh. Therefore, by emptying Himself, taking the form of a servant, not taking the form of God—for when speaking of the form of God, He did not say: "He took," but: "being in the form of God"; but when it came to the form of a servant, He said: "Taking the form of a servant"—then, through this, He became the mediator and the head of the Church, through whom we are reconciled to God, through the sacrament of His humility and passion and resurrection and ascension and future judgment, so that the two statements may be heard when God has spoken once. Where are two statements heard? Where He renders to each according to his works.

Virginity of the mind should be preserved by all the faithful.

Therefore, holding onto this, do not marvel at the questions of men that spread like cancer, as the apostle said; but guard your ears and the virginity of your mind, as though betrothed by the friend of the bridegroom to be presented as a chaste virgin to Christ. The virginity of the body should be in a few in the Church, the virginity of the mind in all. This virginity the serpent wants to corrupt, about which the same Apostle says: "I have betrothed you to one man to present you as a chaste virgin to Christ. And I fear that as the serpent deceived Eve by his cunning, so your minds may be corrupted from the chastity that is in Christ." He said, "your minds," that is, your thoughts. For this is more proper. For senses are also understood to mean those of this body: seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching. The Apostle feared that our minds would be corrupted, where there is the virginity of faith. Now, therefore, O soul, keep your virginity, to be fruitful later in the embrace of your bridegroom. Henceforth, guard your ears with thorns as it is written. The question of the Arians disturbed the weak brothers of the Church, but in the mercy of the Lord the Catholic faith prevailed. For he did not abandon his Church, even if disturbed for a time, so that it would always supplicate him, by whom it would be established on solid rock. And still the serpent murmurs and does not remain silent: he seeks by the promise of a certain knowledge to cast out from the paradise of the Church, whom he may not allow to return to that paradise, from where he was first cast out. The doctrine of the Arians is refuted by the books of Scripture.

Listen, my brothers: what took place in that paradise, takes place in the Church. Let no one deceive you away from this paradise: it is enough that we have fallen from there; or let us be corrected by experience. He is the same serpent, who always suggests impiety; at times he promises impunity, just as he did there: "You will not surely die," he says, because God said: "You will surely die." He suggests such things now, so that Christians live badly: "Will he destroy all?" He says, "I will condemn, I will forgive those who change themselves: let them change their deeds, I will change my threats." Therefore, he is the one who murmurs and whispers and says, "Behold, it is written: The Father is greater than I, and you say he is equal to the Father?" I take what you say, and I take both, because I read both. Why do you take one and not wish for the other? For you have read both with me. Behold, I accept the Father is greater than I, not from you, but from the Gospel; and you accept him as equal to God from the Apostle. Unite both: let both agree, for he who spoke through John in the Gospel, the same spoke through Paul in the letter. He cannot be in discord with himself, but you do not wish to understand the harmony of the Scriptures, since you love to argue yourself. "But from the Gospel," you say, "I prove: The Father is greater than I." And I from the Gospel: I and the Father are one. "How are both true?" How does the Apostle teach us? Listen: I and the Father are one. Who, being in very nature God, did not consider equality with God something to be grasped. Listen: The Father is greater than I. But made himself nothing, taking the very nature of a servant. Behold, I have shown why greater; you show in what way equal. For we read both. He is lesser than the Father, in that he is the Son of man; equal to the Father, in that he is the Son of God, because the Word was God. Mediator and God and man: God equal to the Father, man lesser than the Father. Therefore, he is both equal and lesser: equal in the form of God, lesser in the form of a servant. So you tell me how he is equal. Is he equal in one part, and lesser in another part? Behold, except for the acceptance of flesh, show me an equal and lesser. From whence will you demonstrate, I want to see. The wisdom of heretics is carnal and foolish.

Observe the impiety of thinking according to the flesh, as it is written: To think according to the flesh is death. I put aside, without yet speaking of the incarnation of our Lord and only Son of God, but as if it has not yet happened what has already happened, I consider with you: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. I consider with you: Who being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God. Show me there anyone lesser. What will you say? Will you divide God through qualities, that is, through certain bodily or animal affections, by which we perceive one thing to be different from another? Naturally, I can indeed say it, but whether it is for you to understand, let God see. Therefore, as I began to say, before the assumption of flesh, before the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us, show me one lesser, show me one equal. Is God something different so that the Son is lesser in one part, equal in another? As if we should say: “Certain are bodies,” would you say to me: “Equal in length, but lesser in strength.” For often two bodies occur such that they are equal in the stature of length, but in strength, one is lesser, the other greater. Shall we then consider such things as bodies: shall we consider God and His Son in such a way? May God turn away these thoughts from the hearts of Christians. He was entirely with the Father, entirely in the flesh, entirely above the angels. But perhaps you will think thus, saying: “Equal in both strength and length, but different in color”? Where is color, except in bodies? But there is the light of wisdom. Show me the color of wisdom. Show me the color of justice. If these have no color, would you speak those things of God, if you had the color of modesty?

"In God, everything that is said is the same thing."

What then will you say? In power they are equal, but is the Son lesser in wisdom? God is unjust if He gives equal power to one of lesser wisdom. If they are equal in wisdom, but the Son is lesser in power, God is envious, who gives lesser power to one of equal wisdom. But in God, everything that is said is the same. For in God there is not one thing as power and another as wisdom and another as strength and another as justice or another as chastity. Whatever of these things you say about God, neither is it understood as this and that, nor is anything worthily said, because these are qualities of souls, which that light in some way pervades and affects according to their qualities. Just as when this visible light rises upon bodies, if it is taken away, there is one color for all bodies, or rather, it is to be said that there is no color; but when it illuminates the bodies brought before it, although itself is of one kind, yet for the different qualities of bodies it sheds different splendors upon them. Therefore, these affections are of the souls, which are well affected by that light which is not affected, and shaped by that which is not shaped.

"Whoever begins to think about God will find that silence with the ineffable voice of the heart is to be praised."

Nevertheless, we speak these things about God, brothers, because we have found nothing better to say. I call God just, because in human words I find nothing better: for He is beyond justice. It is said in the Scriptures: The Lord is just and loves justice. But it is also said there that God repents, and it is also said there that God does not know. Who would not shudder? God does not know, God repents? Therefore, the Scripture has descended to these words healthily, which you shudder at, lest you think those things you consider great are spoken worthily. Just as if you wanted to believe that God repents something according to human emotion, and another who understands better would correct you, explaining to you, if you find anything like that in the Scriptures, that it is not said because God suffers such a thing as you do in the condemnation of your counsel or act with the pain of heart, but because He changes beyond what men think, since if men do such a thing, they do it repenting if they turn away from their purpose, although His certain and eternal counsel remains, but what He was expected to do and does otherwise is figuratively said that He repents. And so if you were to ask: "What is said worthily about God?" Perhaps someone might respond to you saying He is just. But another who understands better might also say that even this word is surpassed by His excellence, and it is unworthy to say this about Him, although it is said appropriately according to the capacity of men. Yet, when he wishes to prove from the Scriptures, because it is written: The Lord is just, it is rightly answered to him that it is stated in the same Scriptures that God repents. As you do not accept this according to the custom of speakers, as men usually repent, so you should understand that what is said just does not fit His supereminence, although the Scripture has well placed it, so that through whatever words, step by step, the mind may be led to that which cannot be spoken. Indeed, you call God just, but understand something beyond justice which you are accustomed to think even of man. But the Scriptures have called Him just, therefore they also called Him repenting and not knowing, which you no longer wish to say. Therefore, just as you understand those things you shudder at to be said because of your weakness, so also those things you highly value are said because of some weakness of the stronger ones. However, whoever transcends these things and begins to think worthily of God, as far as it is granted to man, will find silence praised by the ineffable voice of the heart.

Let us hold to the Word of God which is in His nature and which is in His mercy.

Therefore, brothers, since this is the power in God which is justice—and whatever you may say of Him, you say the same, though nothing said is worthy—you cannot say the Son is equal to the Father through justice and not equal through power, or equal through power and not equal through knowledge, because if He is equal in one aspect, He is equal in all aspects, since whatever you say of Him is the same and of the same value. Therefore, it is sufficient that you cannot say how the Son is equal to the Father unless you attribute certain diversities in the substance of God. When you do this, the truth will cast you out, and you will not reach that sanctuary where the purest vision is held. However, since you cannot say He is equal in one part and unequal in another, because there are no parts in God, you cannot say He is equal in one quality and lesser in another, because there are no qualities in God; according to God, you cannot say He is equal except in every way equally: hence where can you say He is lesser, except because He took the form of a servant? Thus, brothers, always bear this in mind. If you receive a rule in the Scriptures, the light itself will show you all things. Wherever you find the Son named as equal to the Father, accept it according to a certain divine essence; wherever you find Him named as lesser, accept it according to the form of the servant taken: as it is said: "I am who I am," and as it is said: "I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob"; thus you will hold to what is in His nature, and what is in His mercy. The Divine Scripture shows the Lord Jesus as the Son of God and man. But let it not trouble you, because this, too, is said according to this distinction which the Lord spoke in the Gospel and in the psalm which we have just sung. But to explain and make it clearer with a more manifest testimony, it is said in the Gospel: To my Father and your Father, to my God and your God. To my Father and your Father, do not be disturbed. For the Father is always to the Son: the Son is never not begotten, and He is never not the Father. But He is our Father in a different way, through the mercy of adoption. He begot Him, He adopted us. He begot Him before the morning star, which you should not take as a single star, but mystically the morning star is what carries the light, not that it is the light, but that it is illuminated by the light to carry the light. For it is also said of that archangel who did not stand in the truth because as the morning star he arose, but he did not stay in that very light. Therefore, every soul that is illuminated to shine is called morning star; if it turns away from the illuminating light, it is darkened. Therefore, John the evangelist says of the Lord Himself: He was the true light. And as if it were asked, "What is the true light?" he says, it enlightens every man—therefore it is not one that is enlightened, but the one that enlightens. But of John the Baptist, he says: He was not that light. But what kind of light was he not? The kind that enlightens and is not enlightened. For John was a light that was enlightened because he received from His fullness. Whence the Lord Himself says: And you were willing to rejoice for a season in his light. And to His disciples, He says: You are the light of the world. For they were illuminated to be a light, but He was the true light which enlightens every man, another kind of light made that is enlightened. Therefore, the true light that enlightens is our Lord Jesus Christ; the made light that is enlightened is John, the apostles, all holy souls and the most blessed intellectual spirits, who by receiving the light become morning stars. Therefore, before the morning star, I begot you, before every creature plainly. It is to be understood as before every creature, in which the spiritual and rational creation, which is illuminated, holds principal rank. Therefore, brothers, let us hold on to both in our Lord Jesus Christ: that according to His divinity, He is equal to the Father, and according to His humanity, He is less than the Father. But what I began to say, let no one be offended, that He said: my Father and your Father. For always the Father of the only-begotten Son, always He born and born before the morning star, that is, before every creature which becomes light by illuminating. Rightly therefore, my Father and your Father, because we have received from Him to be sons of God: who gave us the power to become sons of God. And our adoption, which the Apostle speaks of, is well known to your charity, of which he says: Waiting for the adoption, the redemption of our body, and again: God sent His Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem those who were under the law, so that we might receive the adoption of sons. Deservingly therefore, He first singularly says my Father, then your Father. But how my God and your God? Now, if the rule is known, what are you expecting from me? My Father always, my God since He became man. Hear the psalm that was read: I was cast upon You from the womb, from my mother's belly You are my God. I believe it is said enough about that modality also, by which our Lord Jesus Christ our Savior, the head of the Church, made a mediator, through whom we are reconciled to God, is signified in the Scriptures as God and man.

"The third way: The whole Christ according to the Church, that is, the head and the body." The third way is how the whole Christ according to the Church, that is the head and the body, is preached. For both the head and the body are one Christ, not because he is not whole without the body, but because he has deigned to be whole with us, who is always whole without us, not only in that he is the Word, the only-begotten Son equal to the Father, but also in the very man he assumed and with whom he is both God and man. However, brothers, how are we his body, if not also one Christ with us? Where will we find this, that Christ is one head and body, that is body with his head, bride with her bridegroom? He speaks as if individually in Isaiah, and the same one speaks, and see what he says: "He has bound a turban on me like a bridegroom and adorned me with ornaments like a bride." He calls the same one bridegroom and bride: bridegroom according to the head, bride according to the body. Two seem to be, and one is. Otherwise how are we members of Christ, with the Apostle saying most openly: "You are the body of Christ and members." If we are members of Christ, and all together we are the body: not only those who are here, but throughout the whole earth; nor only for this time, but—what shall I say?—from just Abel to the end of the age, where men no longer generate or are generated, whatever just ones have passed through this life, whatever is here now—not in place, but in this life—whatever is to come thereafter, all this is one body of Christ, and individuals members. So, if all are the body, and individuals are members, there must be a head of which this is the body. And he is, he says, the head of the body, the Church, the firstborn, holding the preeminence. And because of him, he says also that he is the head of all principality and power, this church which is now on a pilgrimage is joined to that celestial church, where we have angels as citizens, because we would arrogantly claim we will be equal to them after the resurrection of our bodies, unless the truth had promised, saying: "They will be equal to the angels of God"; and thus the one church is made the city of the great king, whose son even he wanted to be, from whose pilgrim part he assumed flesh, its king and begetter, to recall what had strayed from there. For this is Zion in the mystery's figure, of which it is written: "A man will say, Mother Zion, and a man was born in her, and the Most High himself founded her," that is, the very one who was made man in her, while being most humble, the Most High himself founded her, because all things were made through him, and without him nothing was made. A body truncated cannot be said whole without its head, but the head wishes to be united with its body. And one Christ with his body by consent, not by necessity. For we need the good of God, God does not need our good. Listen to the prophet: "I said to the Lord: You are my God, because you do not need my goods." Of Christ the head and His mystical body.

Thus, Christ is sometimes hinted at in the Scriptures so that you may understand the Word as equal to the Father. Sometimes, so that you may understand Him as the mediator who became man when the Word was made flesh to dwell among us, when the Only Begotten, through whom all things were made, did not consider it robbery to be equal with God but emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant, becoming obedient unto death, even death on a cross. Likewise, sometimes you understand the head and the body, as the Apostle himself most plainly explains what was said about man and woman in Genesis: "And the two shall become one flesh." Observe the one explaining, so that we do not seem to say anything based on our conjectures. And he said, "The two shall become one flesh," and added: "This is a great mystery." And lest anyone thought this was concerning man and woman according to the natural joining of both sexes and their bodily mixture: "But I speak," he said, "concerning Christ and the Church." According to this, therefore, in reference to Christ and the Church, it is taken what was said: "The two shall become one flesh: they are no longer two, but one flesh." Just as the bridegroom and the bride, so the head and the body, because the head of the woman is man. Therefore, whether I say the head and the body, or I say the bridegroom and the bride, understand one thing. And hence the same Apostle, even when he was still Saul, heard: "Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me?" because the body is joined to the head, and when already the preacher of Christ suffered from others, the things which he himself had done as a persecutor: "To make up," he said, "what is lacking in the afflictions of Christ in my flesh," showing that what he suffered pertained to the afflictions of Christ. This cannot be understood concerning the head, which now in heaven suffers nothing of the sort, but concerning the body, that is, the Church, which body with its head is one Christ.

Christ demands a fitting body as the head.

Therefore, present yourselves as a body worthy of such a head, a bride worthy of such a bridegroom. That head cannot possess anything other than a worthy body; nor does that man wed a wife unless she is worthy. "That he might present to himself," it is said, "a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing." This is the bride of Christ, having neither spot nor wrinkle. Do you not want to have a spot? Do what is written: "Wash yourselves, be clean, remove the evil of your deeds from before my eyes." Do you not want to have wrinkles? Be stretched out upon the cross. For it is not enough to be washed, but also to be stretched out, so that you may be without spot or wrinkle. For sins are removed by washing, but a desire for the future world is created by being stretched out, for which reason Christ was crucified. Hear Paul himself, who was washed: "Not by works of righteousness that we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us, through the washing of regeneration." Hear the same one stretched out: "Forgetting what lies behind and straining forward to what lies ahead, I press on toward the goal for the prize of the upward call of God in Christ Jesus." Therefore, deservedly, he, without spot of iniquity and without wrinkle of a double heart, as a good and faithful friend of the bridegroom, promises to present a chaste virgin to one man without spot or wrinkle. For it is not without reason that the prophecy of Isaiah near the fuller's field is mentioned.

God seeks those who knock to open that which is closed.

All these things, brothers, are like mysteries: whatever in the Scriptures sounds absurd or unnecessary, they are closed. However, they are not closed and empty: God encloses something full, but seeks those who knock to open. Certainly weigh it. For, to say something cheerfully, when children buy nuts for themselves, to avoid being deceived, they weigh them with their hand, and when they find them heavy, they hold what is still closed more securely. Weigh, therefore, when you hear some closed sentences in such holy Scriptures, so illustrious, known to the entire world, spread over the whole earth; from the time they were preached until now, nothing else has happened in human affairs than what was predicted there. Therefore, great is the weight of authority. According to this weight, weigh the sentences, and let your soul - which perhaps wanted to despise - say what was said: And the two shall be in one flesh. Already it was saying to itself: "What is this? Truly, would God cure how a man and woman mix, to say: They shall be two in one flesh?" Do not discard it; you are a child: weigh it. "And how," it says, "do I weigh it?" Say to yourself: "Indeed, any foolish person would say this, let alone some who is called a man of God. Moses, who wrote these things, at least had a moderate heart." Add, because these things were not made known to the whole world and are honored throughout the whole world by the religion of believers without cause: "He would not say: They shall be two in one flesh, unless there is something unknown, which human thought shudders at, but it is enclosed in some way. It is not empty." When you have said these things to yourself, you weigh it; if you have weighed it, you have found that it is heavy; you hold securely. But perhaps you are so weak a child that you cannot break it: just hold it and rejoice, know that you are holding something full; there will be no lack of someone who breaks and feeds you. "And who," it says, "will break it?" There is someone who will break it thoroughly - let us deal with you as with a little child -, give it to a kind father who said: I do not say these things to shame you, but to admonish you as my beloved children. Behold the apostle - certainly in some respect he is a father -, he breaks for you what you carry enclosed, which you have already weighed and felt heavy. Do not fear - he who has paternal love for you will break it, when he says: Even though you have numerous tutors in Christ, you do not have many fathers. For I have begotten you in Christ Jesus through the Gospel, and as a mother, when he says: I became a child among you, as a nurse tenderly cares for her own children. {Therefore he did not say "mother," because sometimes mothers, either more delicate or not loving their children, when they have given birth, hand them over to others to be nursed. Again, if he had only said: As a nurse tenderly cares, and did not add: her own children, it would seem that he received them to be nursed by another who gave birth. Therefore, he called himself both a nurse, since he nourished, and his own children, as he himself gave birth to them saying: My little children, for whom I labor in birth again until Christ is formed in you. But he labors as the Church gives birth, in its womb, not with its seed.} Therefore, give this father or mother - call it what you will: he does not get angry, as he wished to be both in affection, while being neither in sex -, give what you carry enclosed, so heavy from such great authority, to break. It is written in the book of Genesis: it is not a light matter, something is hidden there enclosed. Did it not seem that someone who said it spoke of a sacrament? "For I feel it: it is heavy, but still enclosed." But I say, he said, in Christ and in the Church. Behold the food: eat, who did not despise what was enclosed. But he who despised and discarded what was enclosed will not reach the food. Of the three rods which the patriarch Jacob placed in the water.

Another thought comes to my mind, since I have mentioned the nut, which most fittingly we weave into this discourse, because it has come to speak about hidden sacraments. For it was not without reason that Jacob placed three variegated rods in the water, where the livestock would drink at their meeting time, nor did he wish them to be from one wood, but from different kinds. Indeed, for the result he was aiming at, it would have sufficed that they were from one wood, nor was there need for three, but either less or more, provided he placed variegated rods in the waters. What, then, is meant by placing three rods and of three woods, if not to signify a mystery, but this is closed? According to the strength that the Lord deigns to grant us, I will break and open it for you. Jacob had a pact with his father-in-law whose sheep he was tending, that if any variegated ones were born either in the sheep or in the goats, they would be his, that is, they would belong to the shepherd as his wage. For this reason, he arranged for the variegated rods, which the livestock, seeing them at conception, would, through the desire imparted by sight, bear varied offspring. In the varied livestock was signified the diversity of nations. And those livestock were of one form, and they conceived varied ones and bore varied ones. Indeed, from one Jewish people came the first preachers of the Gospel, but for many nations to be born, it was necessary that they conceive varied ones and bear varied ones. And this is Jacob's portion. For in Jacob, Christ was prefigured. That lesser people, indeed, in Jacob, where it was said: And the greater shall serve the lesser. I remember explaining to your holiness about Esau and Jacob, to whom it was also said in that blessing which he received from his father: All nations shall serve you. The diversity of nations, then, pertained to Jacob, but unless there were announcers from the Jewish people, so that the livestock of one form, having conceived from drinking from the rods, would not bear faithful ones through the diversity of nations. The sacrament of the Christian people preached by the apostles. But how could the cattle conceive the diversity of nations? This could indeed be done from three rods. For the animals were in conception when he varied the rods, that is, he stripped them at intervals, and placed them in the water, from which they would draw in drinking the desire for diversity, which would appear in the colors of the offspring. But this could be done from any number and any kind of rods! However, the mystery of the future Christian people was not known to the Jewish people, except to a few holy prophets and a few envious teachers of the law to whom the Lord says: "Woe to you who hold the keys of the kingdom of heaven, neither entering yourselves nor allowing others to enter." They are also signified in that likeness where the tenants of the vineyard who did not pay the rent said: "This is the heir. Come, let us kill him, and the inheritance will be ours" - which they would not have said unless they had known Christ in some part, although His divinity, by which He is equal to the Father, was hidden from them: "For if they had known, they would never have crucified the Lord of glory." But He did not send preachers from their number, but chose the weak things of the world to confound the strong, so that it would be said: "Where is the wise? Where is the scribe? Where is the investigator of this age? Has not God made foolish the wisdom of this world?" Therefore, the mystery which was hidden from them was revealed to the uneducated and unskilled, and through the baptism of Christ, was also made known to various nations: for this reason, the cattle conceived varied offspring from the three rods placed in the water. For as long as God the Father was proclaimed, the incarnation of the Son, which was still prophetically foretold and understood by very few, was hidden, the diversity of nations was not brought forth. But what happened was that the sheep drank from the three rods, that is, the first Israelites, through whom a diversity of nations pertaining to Jacob's lot - that is, to the inheritance of Christ - would be born; of these Israelites, the Apostle says: "For I too am an Israelite, of the seed of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin." For Peter and Andrew and John and James and the other apostles and other first preachers of Christ were also Israelites, of whom the Apostle says that the Gentiles are their debtors: "For if the Gentiles have shared in their spiritual things, they ought also to minister to them in material things." Therefore, those Israelites were like one kind of cattle, because they were of one nation: they drank in a way the mystery of the incarnation of the Lord, so that through the mystery of the Lord’s incarnation they would bring forth various nations in the Gospel, that is, the diversity of the cattle. The sacrament of the Lord's incarnation is shown in three rods.

How, then, is the sacrament of the Lord's incarnation shown in the three rods? From where were those rods? One was from a nut tree, another was from a plane tree, and another from a storax. Thus it is written. Therefore, let us question our faith about what it believes concerning the incarnation of the Lord. For we believe He was born of the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary. He who was born pertains to the nut tree rod. For just as one reaches the nut through the wood to the food, so our Lord Jesus Christ would not bear us unless we reached His body through the wood of the cross. This is so clear that you understood my voice beforehand; for you declared with your voice what I was beginning to explain. Who led you to that food, so that you understood so quickly, except He who hung on the wood? For if not for the cross of the Lord, you would not be Christians; if you were not Christians, you would not receive this so quickly and so sweetly. To what does the plane tree rod correspond? We say that Christ was born of the Holy Spirit. I think the plane tree rod fittingly pertains to the Holy Spirit. For the remaining storax rod, it is undoubted that it should be attributed to the inviolate integrity of the Virgin Mary because of its sweetest fragrance. From this the most delightful fragrance and the sweet-smelling fame of the birth of the Lord began, because He was born of a virgin. The understanding of the plane tree rod is more laborious, how it is shown to pertain to the Holy Spirit. The Lord will be present, aided by your prayers, and will reveal through our ministry and our humble and devoted service for your advancement, how we should take the plane tree rod to mean the Holy Spirit. In the plane tree I seek what I should choose, and I find the tree of the plane tree praised for nothing else but providing the broadest shade for those resting from the heat. Those who know such a tree understand that I am speaking the truth. The plane tree is chosen and desired for the breadth of its shade and the delight of its coolness, where we rest from the heat. But the Virgin Mary, who was not going to conceive a son through the heat of lust, but in a certain coolness of the most faithful chastity and uncorrupted virginity, not desiring male embraces, but conceiving by faith, a pregnant virgin, a virgin giving birth, a virgin remaining, received this from the Holy Spirit. The Spirit Himself provided her with coolness from the heat of all carnal desire, and therefore He is figured by the plane tree rod. I would be lying if in the very Gospel the angel did not speak and say to her: The Spirit of God will come upon you, and the power of the Most High will overshadow you.

Final exhortation.

Now therefore, beloved, as the Lord wills, he provides not from our merit, but because of our faith which he himself deigns to give. As we always say and it should never be silent: every progress of the word may be found in your works. Very miserable is the land that, when well watered, either does not produce fruit or even generates thorns. Mourn with us those whom we lament. We are accustomed to say that fasts through these festive days of the pagans should be undertaken, so that we might pray to God for those pagans. But we so deeply abhor the wretched excesses of many, that we urge you, brothers, to pray with us for certain Christian brothers, that they might allow themselves to be corrected and improved from such wickedness someday. For what is this, how much and how grievous a wrong it is! Such a Christian, who disdains such small and trivial entertainment, what will he disdain, what will he endure for Christ when some temptation of tribulation comes? He who is overwhelmed by a drop, how will he be carried away by a river?

Therefore, brothers, I have not said our sorrow to your holiness in vain. Those who are here today who did not fast yesterday, let them grieve that they have lived thus on other festive days of the pagans, with us being sorrowful for them, and someday they may deign to take away both our sadness and their own wickedness.

Sermons - Sermon 341

SERMO 341 ABOUT THE FACT THAT CHRIST IS UNDERSTOOD IN SCRIPTURE IN THREE WAYS AGAINST THE ARIANS Christ is mentioned in the Scriptures in three ways. Our Lord Jesus Christ, brothers, as far as we could observe in the Holy Scriptures, is understood and named in three ways when He is proclaimed, either through the Law and the Prophets, or through the apostolic Epistles, or through the history of events which we know in the Gospel. The first mode is: according to God and that divinity coequal and coeternal with the Father before the assumption of flesh. The second mode is: when the flesh is assumed, already the same God who is man, and the same man who is God, according to a certain propriety of his excellence, by which he is not equated with other men, but is read and understood to be the mediator and the head of the Church. The third mode is: in a certain way the whole Christ, in the fullness of the Church, that is, head and body, according to the fullness of a certain perfect man, in which man we are each members. This is preached to believers and is offered to the prudent as recognizable. We cannot recall or explain all testimonies of the Scriptures, however many, in such a short time to prove all three kinds; but nevertheless, we cannot leave all of them unproven, so that with some testimonies mentioned, you may be able to observe and find the rest by yourselves in the Scriptures, which we are not able to mention due to the constraints of time. The first way in which Christ is preached as God: Christ, the Word of God. To the first method, therefore, of introducing our Lord Jesus Christ, the Savior, the only Son of God, through whom all things were made, pertains that which is the most noble and bright in the Gospel according to John: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God; this was in the beginning with God; all things were made through him, and without him was made nothing. What was made, in him was life; and the life was the light of men, and the light shines in the darkness, and the darkness did not comprehend it. These words are wonderful and astonishing, and before they are understood, they must be embraced. If food were set before your mouth, one person would take one part of the food, another would take another part; yet the same food would reach all; but not all of the food would reach everyone. Thus, as it were, a certain food and drink of words are now set before your ears; and yet it all reaches everyone. Or perhaps, as I speak, one person takes one syllable for themselves, another takes another? Or one takes one word, another takes another word? If so, must I say as many words as there are persons, so that the individual words may reach everyone? Indeed, I can easily say more words than there are people here; but all the words reach everyone. Therefore, the word of man is not divided into syllables, so that all may hear; and is the Word of God cut into pieces, so that it might be everywhere? Do we think, brothers, that these sounding and passing words are in any way to be compared to the immutable Word that remains? Or because I have said these things, have I made a comparison? But in some way, I wanted to make it known to you, so that what God presents in corporeal things may aid you to believe those things not yet seen concerning spiritual words. But let us now proceed to better things. For words sound and pass away. Think about justice from spiritual thoughts. The person thinking about justice situated in these western parts, the person thinking about justice situated in the East, how does it happen that this one thinks the entire justice, and that one the entire justice? And this one sees it fully, and that one fully? For he who sees justice, according to which he does something, does it justly. He sees inwardly, acts outwardly. From where does he see inwardly, if nothing is at hand for him? Because he himself is placed in part, does another's thought not also reach this same part? But when you here, placed in your mind, see the same thing that he sees placed so far away, and it shines fully for you, it appears fully to him; because those things which are divine and incorporeal are wholly everywhere; believe the Word whole in the Father, whole in the womb. Believe this concerning the Word of God, who is God with God.

Another way in which Christ is commended: as God and man. But now listen to another presentation, another way of introducing Christ, which Scripture proclaims. For those things which I have spoken of were said before the flesh was assumed. Now, however, listen to what Scripture now proclaims: The Word, it says, was made flesh, and dwelt among us. For he who said: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God; this was in the beginning with God: all things were made through him, and without him nothing was made; it would uselessly preach to us the divinity of the Word if it kept silent about the humanity of the Word. For in order to see that, it is conducted with me here; in order to purify my weakness for contemplation of that, he himself assists. By taking on human nature from human nature, he became man. He came with the burden of flesh to him who lay wounded on the road, so that he might instruct and nourish our small faith by the sacrament of his incarnation, and make clear the understanding to see what was never lost by taking on what was assumed. For he began to be a man, he did not cease to be God. Therefore, this is the proclamation of our Lord Jesus Christ according to him as mediator, according to him as head of the Church; that God is man, and man is God, when John says: And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us.

Christ is recommended in both ways by the Apostle.

Now listen to both in that very well-known chapter of the apostle Paul: "Who, being in the form of God," he says, "thought it not robbery to be equal with God." This means: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." How did the Apostle say: "He thought it not robbery to be equal with God," if he is not equal with God? But if the Father is God, and he is not God, how are they equal? Therefore, where he said: "The Word was God"; there he says: "He thought it not robbery to be equal with God." And where he says: "The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us"; there he says: "But emptied himself, taking the form of a servant." Observe: therefore, through this, because he was made a man, because the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us; through this he emptied himself, taking the form of a servant. For what did he empty? Not to lose his divinity, but to assume humanity, appearing to men as he was not, before he was a man. Thus, by appearing he emptied himself, that is, preserving the dignity of majesty, and offering the flesh as the garment of humanity. Therefore, through this, that he emptied himself, taking the form of a servant (not taking the form of God. While speaking of the form of God, he did not say: he took; but: "Being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God"; however, when form of a servant is reached: "Taking," he says, "the form of a servant"); therefore, through this he is the mediator and head of the Church, through whom we are reconciled to God, through the sacrament of humility and passion and resurrection and ascension and future judgment, so that those two future things may be heard, when God speaks once. Where are the two things heard? Where he gives to each according to his works.

He orders to beware of the heresy of the Arians. A serpent deceiving with the promise of knowledge.

Therefore, holding to this, do not marvel at the questions of men, which spread like cancer, as the Apostle said; but guard your ears and the virginity of your mind, as if you are promised by the friend of the bridegroom to present a chaste virgin to one man, Christ. For your virginity is in the mind. The virginity of the body is in a few of the Church; the virginity of the mind should be in all the faithful. The serpent wants to corrupt this virginity, about which the same Apostle says: "I have promised you to one man to present a chaste virgin to Christ. And I fear, lest as the serpent deceived Eve by his cunning, so your minds should be corrupted and fall from the chastity that is in Christ Jesus." Your minds, he says, that is, your intellects. For this is more precise. For senses are also understood in this body—seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching. The Apostle feared our minds would be corrupted, where the virginity of faith resides. Now proceed, soul, keep your virginity, to be later fertilized in the embrace of your bridegroom. Therefore, fence off your ears with thorns, as it is written. The question of the Arians troubled the weak brothers of the Church; but in the Lord's mercy, the catholic faith prevailed. For he did not abandon his Church; and if he troubled it for a time, he did so to always supplicate to him, by whom it would be confirmed on solid rock. And still the serpent whispers and is not silent. He seeks by some promise of knowledge to cast down from the paradise of the Church, whom he does not allow to return to that paradise, from which the first man was cast out. The serpent now acts in the Church as it once did in paradise. The Son is equal to the Father in the form of God, lesser in the form of a servant.

Attend, brothers. What was done in that paradise, this is carried out in the Church. Let no one seduce us away from this paradise. It is enough that we fell from there, let us be corrected by what we have experienced. He is the serpent, who always suggests iniquity and impiety. Sometimes he promises impunity, just as he promised there, saying: Will you surely die? He suggests such things, so that Christians now live badly. Does he not say, Will God destroy everyone? Will God condemn everyone? He says: I will condemn; I will forgive those who change themselves; let them change their deeds, I will change my threats. Therefore, he is the one who murmurs and whispers and says: Look where it is written: The Father is greater than I; and do you say you are equal to the Father? I accept what you say, but I accept both because I read both. Why do you accept one and not want the other? For you have read both with me. Look, the Father is greater than I; I accept, not from you, but from the Gospel; and you also accept the Son as equal to God the Father, from the Apostle. Join the two, let both agree; because he who spoke through John in the Gospel, the same spoke through Paul in the Epistle. He cannot be at odds with himself, but you do not want to understand the harmony of the Scriptures because you love to quarrel. But from the Gospel, he says, I prove: The Father is greater than I. And I from the Gospel prove: I and the Father are one. How are both true? How does the Apostle teach us: I and the Father are one? Who, being in the form of God, did not consider it robbery to be equal with God. Listen: The Father is greater than I: but emptied himself, taking the form of a servant. Behold, I show why he is greater; you show in what he is not equal. For we read both. He is lesser than the Father, insofar as he is the Son of Man; equal with the Father, insofar as he is the Son of God; because the Word was God. Mediator, God and man; God equal to the Father, man lesser than the Father. Therefore, he is both equal and lesser: equal in the form of God, lesser in the form of a servant. So you say, how is he equal and lesser? Is he equal in one part, and lesser in another part? Behold, except for the taking on of flesh, show me the equal and the lesser. From where will you demonstrate, I want to see. The Son of God before the incarnation is in no way lesser than the Father.

Pay attention to the impiety of savoring the foolish flesh, as it is written: To savor according to the flesh is death. Here, pause. I hold back still, and I have not yet spoken of the incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ, the only Son of God; but as if it has not yet happened that which has already happened, I attend with you: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God; this was in the beginning with God. I attend with you: Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God. There show me both the greater and the lesser. What will you say? Will you divide God by qualities, that is, by certain bodily or animal affections, in which we feel one thing to be different from another? I can naturally say this: but whether you understand it this way, God will see. Therefore, as I began to say, before the assumption of flesh, before the Word became flesh and dwelt among us, show the lesser, show the equal. Is God one thing and another thing, so that the Son is lesser in one aspect and equal to Him in another? As if we were to say: There are certain bodies; you can tell me: It is equal in length, but lesser in strength. For often two such bodies occur, so that they are equal in stature but one is lesser in strength, the other greater. Are we then to think of God and His Son as such bodies? Are we to consider Him who is wholly in Mary, wholly with the Father, wholly in the flesh, wholly above angels? May God avert such thoughts from the hearts of Christians! Again, perhaps you will think so, to say: They are equal in both strength and length, but they differ in color. Where is color, if not in bodily things? There, however, is the light of wisdom. Show me the color of justice. If these things do not have color, you would not say these things about God, if you had the color of decency. The Son cannot be said to be equal to the Father in one respect and lesser in another.

What then will you say? They are equal in power, but is the Son inferior in wisdom? God is unjust if he gave equal power to one with lesser wisdom. If they are equal in wisdom, but the Son is lesser in power, God is envious, who gave lesser power to equal wisdom. However, in God, whatever is spoken is the same thing. For in God there is not one thing power and another wisdom, not one thing strength and another justice or another chastity. Whatever of these you say about God, neither this and that are understood differently, and nothing is said worthily; because these are the qualities of souls, which that light floods in some manner, and affects according to their qualities; like when this visible light rises upon bodies. If it is taken away, there is one color for all bodies; which rather should be said no color. But when it has come and illuminated the bodies, although it itself is of one mode, it nonetheless sprinkles them with diverse brightness according to the diverse qualities of the bodies. Therefore, these affections are of souls, which have been well affected by that light which is not affected, and formed by that which is not formed.

Justice is said of God not properly, but because nothing better can be said.

However, these things we say about God, brothers, because we do not find anything better to say. I say that God is just, because I find nothing better in human words; for He is beyond justice. It is said in the Scriptures: The Lord is just, and He loves justice. But it is also said there that God repents, and it is said there that God does not know. Who would not shudder? Does God not know, does God repent? Yet the Scripture healthily descends even to those words, which you shudder at, lest you think that what you consider great is suitably said. And so if you ask: What then is said worthily of God? Perhaps someone might answer you and say, because He is just. But another, understanding better than this one, would say that even this word is surpassed by His excellence and that even this is said unworthily of Him, though it is suitably said according to human capacity; so that when he wishes to prove from the Scriptures that it is written: The Lord is just; it is rightly responded to him that it is written in the same Scriptures that God repents; so that just as he does not take the latter according to the custom of speakers, as people are accustomed to repent; thus he understands that the term just does not befit His eminence; although Scripture has well placed this, so that by whatever words the soul may be gradually led to what cannot be spoken. Indeed, you call God just: but understand something beyond justice as you are accustomed to think even of a human being. But the Scriptures have called Him just, therefore they have also called Him repentant and unknowing, which you no longer wish to say. Therefore, just as you understand those things which you now shudder at to be said on account of your weakness; so also understand that those things which you greatly esteem were said on account of some greater firm resolve. But whoever has transcended even these, and has begun to think worthily of God as far as it is permitted to a human, will find that silence is to be praised with the ineffable voice of the heart. The Son of God cannot be said to be equal in one respect and unequal in another.

Therefore, brothers, since this is the power in the Lord which is justice (for whatever you say about Him, you say the same thing, although you say nothing worthy), you cannot say that the Son is equal to the Father through justice and not equal through power, or equal through power and not equal through knowledge; because if He is equal in one thing, He is equal in all things; because all things which you say there are the same and hold the same value. Therefore it is sufficient that you cannot say the Son is unequal to the Father, unless you attribute certain differences in the substance of God. But when you do this, truth casts you out, nor do you approach that sanctuary of God, where it is seen most purely. However, since you cannot say He is equal in one part and unequal in another, because there are no parts in God; nor can you say He is equal in one respect and lesser in another, because there are no qualities in God; according to God, you cannot say He is equal unless in every way equal; from where, then, can you say He is lesser, unless because He took on the form of a servant? Therefore, brothers, always heed this. If you receive some rule in the Scriptures, the very light will show you all things. Wherever you find it stated that the Son is equal to the Father, understand it according to divinity. According to the form of the servant assumed, understand Him as lesser; as it is said: I am who I am; and as it is said: I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob; thus you will hold both what is in His nature and what is in His mercy. I think it has been sufficiently said regarding that way too, whereby our Lord Jesus Christ, our Savior, made the head of the Church, the mediator through whom we are reconciled to God, is revealed as God and man in the Scriptures.

Christ is understood in a third way as head and body. The third manner is how the whole Christ according to the Church, that is, head and body, is proclaimed. Indeed, the head and body are one Christ: not because He is not complete without the body, but because He has deigned to be complete with us, who is always complete even without us, not only as the Word, the only-begotten Son equal to the Father, but also in that very man whom He took up, and with whom He is at once God and man. Nevertheless, brethren, how are we His body and one Christ with us? Where do we find this, that one Christ is head and body, that is, the body with its head? As the bride speaks with her bridegroom almost singularly in Isaiah: surely the same one speaks; and see what he says: He has bound the turban on me like a bridegroom, and has adorned me with ornaments like a bride. As bridegroom and bride: He calls Him the bridegroom according to the head, the bride according to the body. They seem to be two, and yet they are one. Otherwise, how are we members of Christ? As the Apostle very plainly says: You are the body of Christ and members. All together, we are members of Christ and the body; not only those who are here but throughout the whole world; not only those of this time, but what shall I say? From the just Abel to the end of the world as long as men are born and beget, anyone of the righteous who passes through this life, whatever is now, that is, not in this place, but in this life, whatever is to come of those who will be born, this whole is one body of Christ; yet each one individually is a member of Christ. Therefore, if all are the body, individually members; there is of course the head to which this body belongs. And he himself says, the head of the body, the Church, the firstborn, holding the primacy. And because He also says that He is always the head of every principality and power, this Church which is now in pilgrimage is now joined to that heavenly Church, where we have angels as citizens; to whom we would presume to be equal after the resurrection of the bodies, were it not that the Truth had promised, saying: They will be equal to the angels of God; and it becomes one Church, the city of the great King.

Christ and the Church are one Christ.

Thus, at times, Christ is intimated in the Scriptures so that you might understand the Word as equal to the Father. At other times, so that you might understand Him as mediator; when the Word became flesh to dwell among us; when the Only Begotten, through whom all things were made, did not consider equality with God something to be grasped, but emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant, and became obedient to the point of death, even death on a cross. Yet at other times, so that you might understand the head and the body, as the Apostle himself most clearly explains what was said about the man and woman in Genesis: They shall be, he said, two in one flesh. Look at him explaining it so that we do not seem to dare say something based on our own conjectures. For, he said, they shall be two in one flesh; and he added: This is a great mystery. And lest anyone still think that this refers to the man and the woman according to the natural coupling of both sexes and bodily mixture: But I am speaking, he said, of Christ and the Church. According to this, therefore, what is taken to mean Christ and the Church when it was said: They shall be two in one flesh; no longer two, but one flesh. And as the bridegroom and the bride, so the head and the body: because the head of the woman is the man. Whether, therefore, I say the head and body, or I say the bridegroom and bride; understand them as one. And thus the same Apostle, while he was still Saul, heard: Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me? because the body is joined to the head. And when he already as a preacher of Christ suffered from others the things he had himself done as a persecutor: To fill up, he said, what is lacking in Christ's afflictions in my flesh; showing that what he suffered pertained to Christ's afflictions. This cannot be understood with regard to the head, which now in heaven suffers nothing of the sort; but with regard to the body, that is, the Church; which body, with its head, is one Christ. The bride of Christ should act to be without spot or wrinkle.

Therefore, present yourselves as a body worthy of such a head, as a spouse worthy of such a groom. That head cannot have anything other but a fitting body; nor can such a great man have anything other but a worthy wife. So that He might present to Himself, as it is said, a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing. This is the bride of Christ, not having spot or wrinkle. Do you not want to have a spot? Do what is written: Be washed, be clean, take away wickedness from your hearts. Do you not want to have a wrinkle? Be stretched out on the cross. For it is not only necessary to be washed, but also to be stretched out, so that you may be without spot or wrinkle. For sins are taken away through washing; through stretching out, the desire for the future age is realized, for which Christ was crucified. Listen to Paul himself being washed: Not by works of righteousness which we have done, he says, but according to His mercy He saved us, by the washing of regeneration. Listen to the same one being stretched out: Forgetting what lies behind, he says, and reaching forward to what lies ahead, I press on toward the goal for the prize of the upward call of God in Christ Jesus.

Sermons - Sermon 341A

SERMON 341/A The Beginning of the Humility of Our Lord Jesus Christ Christ is humble because God became man.

We commend the humility of our Lord Jesus Christ to you, beloved brothers, indeed He Himself commends it to all of us. Consider how great a humility. The prophet Isaiah cries out: All flesh is grass, and all the glory of flesh is as the flower of grass; the grass withers, the flower falls, but the Word of the Lord endures forever. How he despised and rejected the flesh! How he preferred and praised the Word of God! Again I say, again consider, behold the rejection of the flesh: All flesh is grass, and all the glory of flesh is as the flower of grass. What is grass? What is the flower of grass? It follows and says. Do you wish to hear what grass is? The grass withers, the flower falls. What of the Word of God? It endures forever. Let us recognize the Word, which endures forever; let us listen to the Evangelist praising the Word. In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God; it was in the beginning with God. All things were made through Him, and without Him nothing was made. What was made in Him was life; and that life was the light of men. Great is the praise as of the eternal Word; high praise as of the Word of God abiding forever. And what thereafter does the Evangelist say? And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us. If only this the Word of God did, that it became flesh, it would be incredible humility; and blessed are those who believe this incredible thing: for our faith consists of incredible things. The Word of God became grass, died, and rose again, God was crucified, these are incredible things; because your great sickness had become such that it could be healed by incredible things. For indeed did the humble physician come, found the sick man lying, shared His infirmity with him, calling him to His divinity; He became suffering in passions, and dying was hanged on a tree, so that He might kill death. He made for us food, which we might receive and be healed. Whence is this food, and whom does it nourish? Those who have imitated the humility of the Lord. You will not even imitate that humility: how much more the divinity? Imitate the humility, if you can. When? Whence? He, God, was made man; you, man, recognize that you are man. Would that you would recognize what He became for your sake! Recognize yourself for His sake; see that you are human, and yet you are so valued that God became man for your sake. Do not attribute this to your pride, but to His mercy; for our Lord God redeemed us with His blood, and willed that the price of our souls should be His blood, innocent blood.

Comparison between man and beast, and between God and man. And what I had begun to say, brothers, if God were to humble Himself so much as to become man, who would demand more from Him? For you are not humbled to this extent, to be changed from human into beast; and yet what comparison is there? If you were humbled to this extent, to be changed from man into beast, you would not be humbled by as much distance as God was humbled. Indeed, a man made beast is something rational made irrational, yet mortal and mortal; for man is mortal, and beast is mortal; man is born, as beast is born; man is conceived, as beast is conceived; man is nourished and grows with bodily food as does the beast. How many things does he have in common with a beast! He has one single reason of the mind different, where the image of the Creator is placed. But truly God who became man, the eternal became mortal, He assumed flesh from the mass of our offspring without sin, was made man, was born, taking on what He might suffer for us. But behold, He has not yet suffered: now consider what He has made Himself for you, before He suffers. Is this humility small? God became man. O man, see that you are man. For your sake, God is man: and will you not acknowledge that you are man? Who do not wish to acknowledge that they are men, brothers, let us consider. Who do not wish to acknowledge that they are men? Those who justify themselves and blame God. Let a man suffer something hard or harsh in this life; he has nothing so much in his language as to reproach God and praise himself; and exclaiming in indignation of his tribulation, he does not confess his sins, but boasts of his merits, and says: God, what have I done to You? Why do I suffer this? God, what have I done to You? says man to God. Let God respond to him: You speak rightly: What have you done to Me? because you did nothing for Me, but all for yourself. For if you did anything for God, you would do what delights God: that is, to act for Him. But now, whatever you have done, you have done for yourself, because following your own will, you have despised His command. Clearly, if you understand thus, you speak rightly. For what can you do for God, to cry out: What have I done to you? He who throws a stone into the sky, does he throw it to the sky, or to himself? What you sent, and there it did not stick, and it returned to you; so if you throw all blasphemies at God, so all injuries, so whatever moves your sacrilegious and impious and proud mind, as you throw upward, so by the heavy weight they fall back on you.

It is necessary to examine the conscience. Flee to God.

What then were you going to do to God? However, you would be doing something to Him if you acted on His word; if you did what He commanded, you might rightly cry out: "What have I done to you?" And yet, examine your righteousness, scrutinize your conscience, enter your heart, do not cry out externally, look within, return to the innermost parts of your heart. See if you have truly done nothing wrong; see if you are suffering anything worthy for what you have done, in any situation of tribulation; for indeed nothing is owed to a sinner except the scourge of burning and eternal fire. You have forsaken your God, you have followed your own desires. What do you suffer when you are scourged? It is correction, not condemnation. If God scourges you in this life, He is not angry with you. Do not offend Him who scourges, do not provoke Him to spare you. You provoke Him by murmuring, and He lets you go. Flee under the scourge of the one who corrects; do not flee from the scourge, but under the scourge; where He strikes, run there. He indeed knows where to strike and where to find you; and it is in vain to try to hide yourself from His eyes, who is everywhere. Do you wish to flee from an angry God? Flee to a placated God; from Him nowhere but to Him. You thought you were fleeing from Him when you lifted your proud neck; humble it, and flee to Him. He scourges every son whom He receives. But do you disdain being scourged? Then disdain being an heir. A good Father educates you for the inheritance: good both when He spares and when He strikes, truly merciful in all things.

Sermons - Sermon 342

SERMO 342 On the Evening Sacrifice In which the beginning of the Gospel of John is explained Sign of the cross. Sacrifice of the cross. A discourse on the evening sacrifice must be given. For we prayed by singing, and prayed by singing: "Let my prayer be directed as incense before you; the lifting up of my hands as the evening sacrifice." In prayer, we envisage the person, in the extension of the hands we recognize the cross. Therefore, this is the sign we bear on our forehead, the sign by which we are saved. A sign mocked, so it may be honored; despised, so it may be glorified. God appears, so that man may pray; and God hides, so that man may die. For if they had known, they would never have crucified the Lord of glory. Therefore this sacrifice, where the priest is a victim, redeemed us by the shedding of the Creator’s blood. However, He did not create us with blood, but redeemed us with blood. For He created us in the beginning, which was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. By this we were created. The text follows: "All things were made through Him, and without Him nothing was made that was made." This is what we were created by. But listen to how we were redeemed: "What was made was in Him life, and the life was the light of men; and the light shines in the darkness, and the darkness did not comprehend it." Still, He is God: still, it is said that which remains unchangeable forever; still, it is said that for seeing which hearts must be cleansed; but by what they are cleansed, it is not yet said. “The light,” it is said, “shines in the darkness, and the darkness did not comprehend it.” But so that they may not be darkness, and may be able to comprehend it; for sinners are darkness, the faithless are darkness; so that they may not be darkness, and may be able to comprehend: "The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us." Behold the Word, behold the Word made flesh, the Word before the flesh. "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God; all things were made through Him." Where is the blood here? Behold now your creator, but not yet your ransom. Therefore, from where you are redeemed? Because "the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us."

John was sent before Christ as a lamp before the light.

Look a little higher. The light, he says, shines in darkness, and the darkness has not comprehended it. Because the darkness did not comprehend the light, there was need for human testimony for men. They could not see the day, but perhaps they could tolerate a lamp. Therefore, because they were less adept at seeing the day, they could somehow tolerate the lamp: There was a man sent from God, whose name was John. He came to bear witness to the light. Who, about whom did he come, to bear witness to the light? How was he not the light, if he was at least a lamp? First, see that he was a lamp. Do you want to hear about the lamp from the day, and the day from the lamp? You, he says, sent to John, and you wanted to exult for a time in his light; he was a burning and shining lamp. So, what did John see, who despised the lamp? He was not the light, but he came to bear witness to the light. To which light? It was the true light, which illuminates every man coming into this world. If every man, then also John. He who did not yet want to show himself as the day, had lit for himself his own witness, the lamp. But such was the lamp, which could be lit from the day. Hear John himself confessing: We, he says, have all received from his fullness. He was thought to be the Christ, he admitted he was a man. He was thought to be the Lord, he confessed himself to be a servant. You recognize well, lamp, your humility, lest the wind of pride extinguish you. For it was the true light, which illuminates every man coming into this world; that is, every creature that is capable of illumination, that is, every man having mind and reason, by which he can be a participant of the Word. The world is understood in two ways. That which was the true light, which enlightens every man having a mind coming into this world, where was it? It was in this world. But the earth was also in this world, and the sun and the moon were in this world. Hear about your day, O eye of the human mind! It was in this world, and through him the world was made. He was here in such a way that even before the world existed, he was not as if he had no place to be. For God contains by dwelling, he is not contained. Therefore, in a wondrous and ineffable way, he was in this world. And the world was made through him, and the world did not recognize him. Which world was made through him? In the beginning, God made heaven and earth, because all things were made through him. Which world did not recognize him? World and world, as house and house: house in the structure, house in the inhabitants. In the structure of the house; just as: He made a great house, he constructed a very beautiful house. House in the inhabitants; as: A good house, may the Lord bless it; a bad house, may God spare it. Therefore the world was made through him, both the dwelling and the inhabitants; and the world did not recognize him, the inhabitants.

Jews and Gentiles.

He came to his own, and his own did not receive him. So why did he come, as if not knowing beforehand that his own would not receive him? Hear why he came: But to all who did receive him. His own did not receive, and his own did receive; the world did not believe, and the whole world believed. Just as we say: The whole tree is full of leaves; is the place for fruits taken away? Both can be said, both can be understood, both the tree full of leaves and the tree full of fruits; one tree in both, but spreading leaves, gathering fruits. Therefore, his faithful, his servants, his lovers, whose glory it is, whose hope it is, whose reality it is; when you hear: His own did not receive him, do not grieve; because by believing you are his. His own did not receive him. Who are these? Perhaps the Jews once called from Egypt, delivered with a mighty hand, passed through the Red Sea, escaping through dry land, without pursuing enemies, fed with manna, rescued from slavery, led to the kingdom, bought with so many benefits. Behold his own, who did not receive; but by not receiving they became strangers. They were in the olive tree, by pride they were broken. The wild olive, contemptible, despised for the bitterness of its berries, was through the whole world; the whole world shuddered at the wild olive, but nevertheless through humility it deserved to be grafted, from which the olive was cut off by pride. Hear the proud olive, and worthy to be broken: We are not born of slavery, we have Abraham as our father. It is answered: If you were Abraham's children, you would do the works of Abraham. Contrary to what was said: We are not born of slavery: If the Son sets you free, you will be free indeed. You boast of being free? Everyone who sins is a slave to sin. So how much safer would it be to be a slave of a man than of a perverse desire? They, however, in their pride did not receive the humble one. See a worthy wild olive to be grafted, that centurion, not of the Israelites, but of the Gentiles: Lord, I am not worthy for you to come under my roof. And the Lord: Truly, I tell you, I have not found such faith in Israel. In the olive tree I did not find what I found in the wild olive. Therefore, the proud olive shall be cut off, and the humble wild olive grafted in. See the one who grafts, see the one who cuts off: Therefore I say to you, many will come from the east and west; many wild olives will come to be grafted into the olive tree; and will recline with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven. You have heard how the humble wild olive is grafted; hear how the proud olive is cut off: But the sons of the kingdom will be cast out into outer darkness; there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth. Why? Because his own did not receive him. And why is the wild olive grafted? Because to all who did receive him, he gave the power to become children of God. The power given that we may be made children of God.

Lift up your heart, human race, breathe in the aura of life and most secure freedom. What do you hear? What is promised to you? He gave them power. What power? Perhaps the kind that inflates men, judging human heads, passing sentences on the innocent and guilty? He said, "He gave them power to become children of God." For they were not children, and they were becoming children; because He, through whom people become children of God, was already the Son of God, and became the Son of Man. Therefore they were already children of men, and became children of God. He who was something else descended to what he was not. He raised you to what you were not, for you were something else. Therefore, lift up your hope. Great is what has been promised to you, but it is promised by a great one. It seems much and incredible, and as if it cannot be estimated that the children of men become children of God. But greater was done for them, that the Son of God became the Son of Man. Therefore, lift up your hope, O man, banish unbelief from your heart. Something more incredible has already been done for you, than what has been promised to you. Are you amazed that man should have eternal life? Are you amazed that man should reach eternal life? Rather be amazed that God reached death for you. Why do you doubt the promise, having received such a pledge? See then how He confirms you, how He strengthens the promise of God: "As many as received Him, to them He gave power to become children of God." By what generation? Not that usual, not old, not transient or carnal. "Not of the flesh," He said, "not of blood, nor of the will of man, but born of God." Are you amazed, do you not believe? "The Word became flesh and dwelt among us." Behold whence the evening sacrifice was made. Let us cling to Him: let Him be offered with us, who was offered for us. For thus in the evening sacrifice the old life is killed, and at dawn the new one arises.

Sermons - Sermon 343

SERMO 343 TREATISE ON SUSANNA AND JOSEPH The mind of man is like the nest of the Word of God. Susanna divinely delivered from false witnesses.

Divine readings and holy oracles of God, which have sounded in our ears, may they make a nest in our minds. Let them not fly away and pass away, or sit and depart, but bring forth something. For if the sparrow has found a house for itself, and the turtledove a nest where it may lay its young, how much more the sparrow the Word of God, and the turtledove the mercy of God! We have heard a lesson about Susanna. Let the chastity of the married woman be built up, and let it lean on such a firm foundation and be fortified with a wall, so that it may both repel those who lie in wait and convict false witnesses. The chaste woman had remained, ready to die, unless there was someone who would see what was hidden from the judges. Her words were written down, which she spoke in paradise, that is, in her garden, words that no man had heard, except those two alone who were lying in wait for the modesty of another's wife and were planning false testimony against her as she resisted. They alone heard what was said: "I am in distress on every side. For if I do this, it is death for me; but if I do not do it, I will not escape your hands. It is better for me not to escape your hands than to sin in the sight of God." She scorned what she heard because she feared the one she did not see, yet by whose divine eyes she was conspicuous. For just as she did not see God, so she was not unseen by God. God saw what she was building, inspected His work, dwelled in His temple; He was there, He Himself answered those lying in wait. For if the giver of chastity had deserted her, chastity would have perished. Therefore she said: "I am in distress on every side." But she awaited Him who would save her from faint-heartedness and the storm of false witnesses, like evil winds. However, in those winds and waves, chastity did not suffer shipwreck because the Lord was at the helm. It was cried out, they came, they proceeded, the case reached judgment. Susanna's house had believed against their mistress the false elders. And though her previous blameless and immaculate life seemed to bear sufficient testimony to her chastity, it seemed irreligious to those elders not to believe them. Such a word had never sounded about Susanna. Therefore, they were false witnesses, but known to God. The house believed one thing, the Lord saw another. But what the Lord saw, men did not know. It seemed they must believe the elders. Therefore, she must die. But if the body should die, chastity would be crowned. The Lord was present to her in prayer, He heard her whom He knew. He did not abandon her to die, as He helped her not to commit adultery. The Lord stirred up the Holy Spirit in Daniel, still young in age, but strong in piety. For since the prophetic Spirit was in him, he immediately saw the deceit of the most wicked elders. But what he beheld had to be shown to others. "They are false witnesses," he said, "Return to judgment." But that they were false, he knew, to whom the prophetic Spirit had revealed it. Those ignorant had to be taught. Therefore, if judges had to be taught, witnesses must undoubtedly be convicted. Convicting them, pointing out the falsity of their testimony, which he already knew, he commanded them to be separated from each other. He interrogated each one. For they could both have the same lust, but they could not plan one counsel. One was asked under which tree he had caught the adulterers. He answered: "Under the mastic tree." Another was questioned. He answered: "Under the holm oak." The discrepancy of the testimonies revealed the truth, freed chastity.

Debt of death. False witnesses are not to be feared by the innocent. And indeed chastity, brothers, as I have already said, would be freed and crowned, even if the flesh, which will someday die, were to die by that judgment. For we are all destined to die, and no one acts who desires to escape, to take away death, but to defer it. This debt holds us all. We shall all repay this which we have taken from Adam. And because we do not wish to die, security is not given by the collector of this debt, but delay is asked for. Therefore, Susanna was a religious woman and a chaste wife who was certainly someday to die. And if that time were then, how would it harm her chastity? The flesh would be laid in the sepulcher, chastity would be returned to God, it would be crowned by God. For you think, brothers, it belongs to great merit if false witnesses do not prevail over the innocent? It is not a great merit if false testimony does not prevail against the innocent. It would be a great merit if it did not prevail against the Lord. Our Lord Jesus Christ himself was crucified through the tongue of false witnesses. But even those false witnesses indeed prevailed for a time, what did they harm the one who was to rise again? Therefore, by his example, our Lord God in his flesh, in his weakness, and in the form of a servant, which he took to free the servant, to seek the fugitive, to redeem the captive, to release the bound, to make a brother from a servant; coming in the form of a servant, he demonstrated an example for the servant, that he should not dread false witnesses, and when they are believed, he should not fear. For they can make a bad reputation, but they cannot kill the conscience. The three men were freed from the burning fiery furnace. Their God was present, they walked among harmless fires, around them burning but not scorching, and in that very walking, they sang praises to God, and they escaped unscathed as they had been sent. Therefore, their God was present. But was God absent from the Maccabees? Those men escaped, those men were soon burned: both were tested. These were consumed in the flesh, these were unscathed in the flesh: both were crowned. So that the flames might be evaded by the three men, it was granted that Nebuchadnezzar believed in their God. For he who could openly deliver them could also secretly crown them. But if he had secretly crowned them, he would not have freed the king who raged. The health of their body became the salvation of his soul. They escaped by praising God, but from present fires. He escaped by believing in God, but from eternal hellfires. More therefore was granted to him than to them. But Antiochus was not worthy to have such granted to him, from whom the Maccabees were tormented. Therefore, with them consumed by fire and torments, he exalted, but he who exalts himself will be humbled.

Mary freed from false suspicion. So the one who freed Susanna, a chaste woman and faithful wife, from the false testimony of the elders, also freed the virgin Mary from the false suspicion of her husband. Therefore, that virgin was found to be pregnant, to whom no man had approached. Indeed, her womb had swollen with the fetus, but her virginal integrity remained. She conceived the Sower of faith by faith. She had taken the Lord into her body, and did not allow His body to be violated. Yet, her husband, being human, came to suspect. He believed that it came from elsewhere, what he knew did not come from himself, and suspected adultery from elsewhere. He is corrected by an angel. Why was he worthy to be corrected by an angel? Because in him was not a malevolent suspicion, as the Apostle says, malevolent suspicions arise among brothers. Malevolent suspicions are those of accusers, benevolent suspicions are those of governors. It is allowed to suspect evil of a son, but it is not allowed to slander a son. You suspect evil, but you wish to find good. He who benevolently suspects, desires to be convinced otherwise; for then he rejoices well, when what he suspects badly is found to be false. Such was Joseph regarding his wife, to whom he had not been joined physically, but nevertheless, he was already united by faith. Therefore, the Virgin also came under false suspicion. But just as for Susanna, the Spirit was present in Daniel, so for Mary, the angel was present to Joseph: Do not fear to take Mary as your wife. For what is conceived in her is from the Holy Spirit. Suspicion is removed because redemption is found.

Chastity of virgins and of married women. A light burden for those who love. A short time ago, married women were rejoicing with Susanna. Let the virgins rejoice with Mary. Let both groups maintain chastity, the former in marriage, the latter in virginity. For both types of chastity have merit before God. And if virginity is greater, and marital chastity is lesser, still both are pleasing to God, because they are gifts from God. All attain eternal life, but in eternal life not all attain the same honor, the same dignity, or the same merit. Eternal life and the kingdom of God will be like, for the sake of comparison, what we call the heavens. In the heavens all the stars are present: so too in the kingdom of God all the good faithful shall be. Eternal life is equal for all. For there, no one lives more and another less, since all will live without end. This is the denarius that the laborers will receive, whether they worked in the vineyard, or whether they came at the eleventh hour; that denarius is eternal life, which is the same for all. But consider the heavens, remember the Apostle: There are celestial bodies and terrestrial bodies. The glory of the sun is one, the glory of the moon is another, and the glory of the stars is another. For one star differs from another star in glory; so too the resurrection of the dead. Therefore, each one of you, my brothers, according to the gift received, strive in this world, so that you may rejoice in the future. Are you married? It is a lower life, a lesser reward is hoped for, but eternal kingdom is not despaired of. You must keep the marital commandments. What then? Because you have a wife, should you not recognize that you are a sojourner in this world? Should you not think that you will die, that you will leave the bed of pleasure? And consider where you may go, to the torment of suffering, or to the reward of eternity. Therefore, think, keep what you have received, carry your burden, because it is light if you love; heavy if you hate. For the Lord did not say in vain (or truly, when he said this, he was speaking only to the continent ones?): Come to me, all you who labor and are burdened, and I will refresh you. Take my yoke upon you, and learn from me, for I am gentle and humble in heart, and you will find rest for your souls (not for your bodies, but for your souls); for my yoke is easy, and my burden is light, light for the one who loves, heavy for the one who denies. Have you taken the Lord's yoke on your neck? It is easy if you strive well; rough if you resist. Temptations surround the conjugal life. Wasn't Susanna tested in her very chastity, just because she was joined to a husband? Aren't all such women tempted in this regard, who are united with men? Look, Susanna was someone else's wife, she had a husband. Yet she was tempted. She was tossed about in the storm: "I am in dire straits," she said. She feared death from false witnesses, but feared eternal death from the true judge, God. She weighed, she chose. She first feared, and weighed. She weighed and chose. She chose and prevailed. She taught religious married women. She taught them to resist the tempter, taught them to fight, taught them to labor, taught them to implore for help. For women, the example of Susanna.

If Scripture bears witness to a woman tempted, did it forsake men? Did it allow them to lack an example of imitation? We looked at Susanna tempted by men desiring her corruption. We looked at her struggling. That reading was the theater of our heart; we awaited the athlete of God, the chaste spirit, we saw combating the adversary. Let us triumph over the defeated with the victor. Religious wives have their building, they have what to imitate. They owe what they keep to God, not to man. For they only keep it, if they owe it to God. They only keep it if they owe it to Him who sees what they keep, which even the husband does not see. For often the husband is absent, but God is always present. And sometimes, because he is a man, the husband suspects falsely. Then let the woman pray for her husband suspecting falsely. Let her pray that he be saved, not that he be damned. For the false suspicion of a man does not close the eyes of God. Her conscience is bare before Him who creates her. For He liberates her who for a time is oppressed forever. But let her pray for her husband, and let her give effort not only to have a good life, but also an intact reputation. For a good life is freed by chastity itself, lest it be condemned. But a good reputation frees others, lest by falsely suspecting they stumble, and perhaps fall into sin, while they judge what they do not see; just as those men fell, and holy Daniel, or rather through Daniel the Lord, freed more those judges than Susanna from inner death. For He freed her lest she be condemned for a time. But He freed them, lest by judging wrongly and condemning the innocent, they fall into eternal punishment of that judge, whom no one can corrupt, from whom no one can hide. The example of Joseph for men. So I was saying about men, because they too are not left without an example. Chaste men, men fearing God, men whose own wives are enough for them, men who do not violate others as you would not wish to be violated, men who return the faith that you have demanded; observe also, as I recall, what your wives observed when the reader recited it. Nor has the Divine Scripture left you without an example. They heard Susanna, and rejoiced in her triumph. Look upon Joseph. Not that Joseph to whom the virgin Mary was betrothed who gave birth to Christ, for he was tempted by suspicion and was soon healed by an angel. Holy Scripture attests to another Joseph, tempted by an immodest woman. She loved what was beautiful but not chaste, with a perverse mind, where she had no eyes to see spiritual and invisible beauty. She did not wish the beautiful one to be chaste. She loved another’s, she loved her husband's servant. But did she love one who was faithful to his master? Or do you think she loved him more than herself? Not even him. If she loved him, why did she want to destroy him? Behold, I have proved that she did not love him. She burned with the poison of lust, not with the flame of charity. But he knew how to see what she did not. He was more beautiful inside than outside, more beautiful in the light of the heart than in the skin of the flesh. Where that woman’s eyes could not penetrate, there he enjoyed his own beauty. Therefore, viewing the inner beauty of chastity, when would he allow her to be tainted, when would he permit her to be violated by the temptation of that woman? She loved him. But he also loved. And what he loved was greater than what she loved. Because he saw what she did not see.

They themselves, being impudent, love chastity.

If you wish to see the spiritual beauty of chastity, if you have any eyes for it, for example, I propose something to you: you love it in your wife. Do not despise in another what you love in your own. What is it that you love in your wife? Chastity. This you hate in another which you love in your own. This you hate in another, whose chastity you seek to destroy by lying with her. What you love in your own, do you wish to destroy in another? What you love in your own, do you wish to lose in another? How can you have a sense of piety, killer of chastity? Therefore, preserve in another what you wish to be preserved in your own. Rather, love chastity itself. But perhaps you think you are a lover of your wife's flesh, not of chastity. Indeed, a vile thought, but I will not dismiss you without an example. For I believe that you love chastity more in your wife than flesh. But to show you more completely as a lover of chastity: this you love in your daughter. Who among men does not wish his daughters to be chaste? Who among men does not rejoice in the chastity of his daughters? Is it there that you love the flesh? Do you desire a beautiful body where you shudder at unchasteness? Behold, I have proved you a lover of chastity. If, therefore, I have shown you to be a lover of chastity, what offense have you taken, so that you do not love it in yourself? Behold, you have a shortcut. Love in yourself what you love in your daughter. Love this in another's wife, because your daughter will also be another's wife. Therefore, love chastity in yourself. If you love another's wife, you will not have her immediately. If you love chastity, you will have it immediately. Therefore, love chastity, so that you may have eternal happiness.

Resist in temptation. But perhaps you will be tempted. An impudent woman will love you. She will find you in solitude, she will try to extort an embrace. If you refuse, she will threaten punishment by slander. The false elders did this to Susanna. The wife of his master did this to Saint Joseph. But pay attention to the one whom Susanna and Joseph also paid attention to. Not because there is no witness, God is not present there. Joseph did not want to offend His eyes, the eyes of His present Lord. He did not want to consent to illicit intercourse with the impudent woman. He rejected her foreign lust, he embraced his own chastity. Yet she did what she threatened. She lied to her husband, she was believed by her husband. Thus, God is still patient. But Joseph is held in prison as if guilty, from whom God is not offended. But even there, God was not absent, because he was not guilty. The Lord was present with Joseph patiently. That He did not help quickly, He postponed to greater rewards. He gladdened him with merit, whom He tried with punishment. For indeed, Saint Joseph had to suffer something even harsh for that chastity itself, that is, bitter. If he perhaps loved that impudent woman, he would have been prepared to endure hardships for her. And she would not prove her love towards him, unless she saw him endure such troubles or hardships for her, and would return affection (indeed not affection, but evil desire) in kind. She would ardently love him in return, because she saw him burn so much with her love that for that reason he did not refuse to bear any punishments. If this is for an impudent woman, how much more for chastity itself! Therefore, sometimes God rightly defers His help, to test the man, to exercise the man, so that man may discover himself. For nothing is hidden from God.

Treasure in heaven.

Therefore, I would caution your Charity, brothers, that above all else, you should set before carnal desires and secular joys and vain pomp and fleeting pleasures, and the vapor of this present life, the honor and beauty of wisdom, prefer the sweetness and delight of wisdom, prefer the honor of chastity, the beauty of purity. All these things are hidden in the heavenly treasure. These precious gems are laid bare before the eyes of God, they shine brightly. If you have eyes, you see. Therefore, place these before various and illicit delights. And if temptation approaches to the point that you even suffer discomfort, my brothers, who would not suffer for his own purse? Who would not suffer for his field, for a single boundary stone of his field? If you endure for these things, which you do not have in your control, as long as you wish to retain them, and wish to let go, but they are often lost while we live, often possessed after our death by those we hate; if for these goods (if they are properly called goods, which do not make men good) men endure so many evils with a calm mind, why are they sluggish for faith? Why are they timid for the heavenly treasure, for those riches which not even shipwreck can take from us? For a just man emerges from shipwreck wealthy and naked.

Job, rich in filth. The help of God.

Saint Job was full of riches. Everything perished at a single blow, nothing remained in his house, by which he seemed opulent just a little before. Suddenly a beggar, covered with worms from head to foot, sat in the dung. What misery is more miserable than this? What inner happiness is happier? He had lost all those things which God had given, but he had the one who had given everything, God himself. Naked, he said, I came out of my mother's womb, naked I shall return to the earth. The Lord gave, the Lord took away. As the Lord pleased, so it has been done. Blessed be the name of the Lord. Certainly, is he poor? Certainly, he has nothing? If nothing remains, from what treasure were these gems of praise to God produced? Later, the tempter approached even to his flesh. With all taken away, he left behind his tempting wife. He dismissed Eve, but that man was not Adam. And how was he found there? How did he respond to the wife suggesting blasphemy? She spoke, he said, like one of the foolish women. If we have accepted good things from the hand of the Lord, why should we not endure evil things? O decayed and whole man! O foul and beautiful! O wounded and healthy! O sitting in the dung, and reigning in heaven! If we love, let us imitate. That we may imitate, let us labor. And if in labor we faint, let us implore help. He helps the one fighting, who started the contest. For God does not watch you fighting as the people watch the charioteer; he does not want to shout, he does not know how to help. God does not watch you fighting as the trainer watches the athlete; he prepares a wreath of straw, but does not know how to supply strength to the laborer, nor can he; for he is a man, not God. And perhaps while he watches, he labors more by sitting than the other by wrestling. For God, when he watches his fighters, helps those who are called upon. For the voice of his athlete is in the Psalm: If I said: My foot is moved, your mercy, Lord, helped me. Therefore let us not be lazy, my brothers, let us ask, seek, knock. For everyone who asks receives, and he who seeks finds, and to him who knocks it will be opened.

Sermons - Sermon 344

SERMO 344 On the Love of God and the Love of the World The battle between the love of God and the love of the world.

Two loves struggle with each other in every temptation in this life: the love of the world and the love of God; and whichever of these two prevails, it draws the lover towards it as if by a weight. For we come to God not by wings or feet, but by our inclinations. And likewise, we cling to the earth not by physical knots and chains, but by contrary inclinations. Christ came to change love, and to make the lover of earthly matters into a lover of heavenly life; made man for us, He who made us men; and taking on humanity, God, so that He might make men gods. This contest is set before us, this struggle with the flesh, this struggle with the devil, this struggle with the world. But let us be confident, for He who proclaimed this struggle does not watch without His aid, nor does He encourage us to rely on our own strength. For he who relies on his own strength, indeed because he is a man, relies on the strength of man; and cursed is everyone who places his hope in man. The martyrs, burning with the flame of this pious and holy love, burned the grass of the flesh with the strength of their spirit; but they themselves reached Him intact in spirit, by whom they were kindled. However, the due honor will be rendered to the despised flesh in the resurrection of the dead. For this reason, it was sown in dishonor, so that it might rise in glory.

God must be loved above parents. With this love enkindled, or rather so that they may be enkindled, He says: Whoever loves father or mother more than me is not worthy of me; and whoever does not take up his cross and follow me is not worthy of me. The love of parents, wife, children, was not taken away, but it was ordered; He did not say: Whoever loves; but: Whoever loves more than me. This is what the Church speaks of in the Song of Songs: He has ordered love in me. Love your father, but not more than the Lord; love your begetter, but not more than the Creator. The father begot, but he himself did not form; for who, or what kind of person he would be when he was sowing, he did not know. The father nourished, but not from his own did the father provide bread for the hungry. Lastly, whatever the father reserves for you on earth, he will depart so that you may succeed, he will make a place for your life with his death. But the father God keeps what He reserves for you with Himself; so that you may possess the inheritance with Him the Father, and not wait for him to leave as a successor, but cleave always to the one who will remain, always remaining in Him. Therefore, love the father, but not more than your God. Love your mother, but not more than the Church, which has begotten you to eternal life. Finally, from the same love of parents, you should consider how much you ought to love God and the Church. For if those who begot the mortal ought to be loved so much, with how much greater love ought those to be loved who begot one who is to come to eternity, who will remain in eternity? Love your wife, love your children according to God, so that you may take care to instruct them to worship God with you; to whom when you are joined, you will fear no separation. Therefore, you should not love them more than God, whom you love wrongly if you neglect to lead them to God with you. The hour of martyrdom may perhaps come. You want to confess Christ. Having confessed, you may perhaps receive the penalty of the times, receive temporal death. Father, or wife, or child flatter you so that you may not die, and by flattering, they cause you to die. If they do not succeed, then this will come to your mind: Whoever loves father, or mother, or wife, or children more than me, is not worthy of me.

Human affection must be overcome by the example of Christ. Death and life. But the carnal affection is swayed by the blandishments of its own, and human softness falters in a certain way. Restrain the flowing folds of your garment, gird yourself with virtue. Does the love of the flesh torment you? Take up your cross, and follow the Lord. And your Savior himself, although God in the flesh, although God with the flesh, nevertheless demonstrated human affection, where he said: Father, if it is possible, let this cup pass from me. He knew that this cup could not pass away, for he had come to drink it. It was to be drunk by will, not by necessity. He was omnipotent: if he wished, of course it would pass away, for God with the Father, and he and God the Father are one God. But from the form of a servant, from what he received from you for you, he emitted the voice of man, the voice of flesh. He deigned to transfigure you in himself, so that you might speak of infirmity from him, so that you might grasp strength in him. He showed the will by which you could be tempted; and immediately taught which will you should prefer. Father, he said, if it is possible, let this cup pass from me. This is human will; I bear man, I speak from the form of a servant. Father, if it is possible, let this cup pass. It is the voice of the flesh, not of the spirit; the voice of weakness, not of divinity. If it is possible, let this cup pass. This is the will, of which it is also said to Peter: When you grow old, another will gird you, and take you and bring you where you do not want to go. Therefore, how did the martyrs conquer? Because they preferred the will of the spirit to the will of the flesh. They loved this life, and yet they considered it lightly. Hence they considered how much more the eternal life should be loved, if this perishable life is loved so much. The one who is about to die does not want to die; and yet there will necessarily be dying, although perpetually unwilling to die. You achieve nothing by not wanting to die, you effect nothing, you extort nothing; you have no power to remove the necessity of death. What you fear will come, despite your unwillingness; what you defer will be present despite your refusal. For you strive to defer death; do you seek to remove it? If then, among lovers of this life, there is so much effort to defer death, how much should we labor to remove it? Surely you do not want to die. Change your love, and death will be shown to you, not that which will come unwillingly, but that which, if you will, will not be.

Double death, the first and the second.

Observe, therefore, if any measure of love has awakened in your heart, if any spark has gleamed from the ashes of the flesh, if it has attained some strength in your heart, which is not only not extinguished by the wind of temptation, but is also kindled more fiercely; if you do not burn like straw, which is extinguished by a single light breath; but you burn like oak, you burn like charcoal, to be stirred up rather by the wind; see the two deaths, one temporal, and the first; the other eternal, and the second. The first death is prepared for all: the second for the wicked alone, the impious, the unbelievers, the blasphemous, and whatever else opposes sound doctrine. Pay attention, set before you these two deaths. If possible, you do not wish to endure either. I know, you love to live, you do not wish to die; and you would like to pass from this life to another life in such a way that you would not rise from the dead, but be transformed for the better while still living. You would like this, human affection has this; the soul itself has this desire in its will and longing. Because in loving life, it hates death; and since it does not hate its own flesh, it does not want what it hates to happen to it. For no one ever hated his own flesh. The Apostle shows this affection where he says: We have a building from God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. For in this we groan, longing to be clothed with our heavenly dwelling. In which he says, We do not wish to be unclothed, but to be further clothed, so that what is mortal may be swallowed up by life. You do not want to be stripped; but you must be stripped. However, you should act so that stripped by death of the carnal tunic, you may be found clothed with the armor of faith. For he immediately adds: If indeed, having been clothed, we shall not be found naked. For the first death will strip you of the flesh, temporarily set aside, and taken up in its due time. This whether you like it or not. Not because you will rise if you wish; nor if you do not wish, you will not rise; nor if you do not believe in the resurrection, for that reason you will not rise. It is necessary rather to act so that you, who will rise whether you wish or not, rise in such a way as to have what you desire. For the Lord Jesus himself said: The time is coming when all who are in the graves will hear his voice, and will come out, whether they are good or bad; all who are in the graves will hear his voice, and will come out, and will be sent forth from hidden places. No creature will hold the dead under the voice of the living Creator. All, he says, who are in the graves, will hear his voice, and will come out. When he says: All, he made, as it were, confusion and mingling. But listen to the distinction, listen also to the separation: those who have done good, he says, to the resurrection of life; those who have done evil, to the resurrection of judgment. This judgment, to which the wicked will rise to undergo, is called the second death. Why then, Christian, do you fear this first death? It will come to you even if you invite it, and even if you refuse it, it will be present. Perhaps you ransom yourself from barbarians, so that you may not be killed; you ransom yourself at great cost, you do not at all spare your possessions, and you despoil your children; and ransomed today, you will die tomorrow. You must be redeemed from the devil who drags you with him to the second death, where the wicked placed on the left will hear: Depart from me, you cursed, into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels. From this second death you must be redeemed. You might answer: How? Do not seek goats and bulls; do not finally inspect your chest and say in your heart: That I might ransom myself from the barbarians, I had money; that you might redeem yourself from the second death, have righteousness. The barbarian himself might take your money beforehand, and afterward lead you captive, so that there would be nothing from which you might redeem yourself, with him possessing all your things who has also held you; you do not involuntarily lose righteousness; it remains in the secret treasury of the heart; hold onto it, possess it, from it you will be redeemed from the second death. Which if you refuse, it will not exist, because that by which you might redeem yourself from this death, if you will, will exist. Will procures righteousness from the Lord, and drinks it as from its own fountain. To which fountain no one is forbidden to approach if he approaches worthily. Finally consider your help. Your money redeemed you from the barbarians, your wealth redeemed you from the first death; the blood of your Lord redeemed you from the second death. He had the blood wherewith he might redeem us; and to this end he received blood, that there might be what he might pour out for our redemption. The blood of your Lord, if you will, has been given for you; if you are unwilling, it has not been given for you. Perhaps you say: My God had blood with which to redeem me; but now that he has suffered, he has given it all; what remains for him to give for me? This is great, because he gave it once, and he gave it for all. The blood of Christ is salvation to the willing, punishment to the unwilling. Why then do you hesitate, who do not wish to die, to be rather delivered from the second death? By which you are delivered, if you are willing to take up your cross, and follow the Lord; because he took up his cross, and sought the servant.

Eternal life is to be loved as much as temporal life is loved.

Absolutely, my brothers, do not those who love the temporal life so much strongly urge you to love eternal life? What efforts do men make to live for a few days? Who can enumerate the efforts and labors of all who wish to live, shortly about to die? How much do they do for those few days? What do we do so much for eternal life? What should I say, for redeeming a few days, and those on earth? I indeed call them few days, if he is freed in old age; I call them few days, if freed, the old man becomes a child. I do not say because redeemed today, he may die tomorrow. Behold, for the uncertain, for those few uncertain days, how much do they do? What do they invent? If they come into the hands of a physician through bodily illness, and all health is despaired of by those who announce and examine; if some physician is promised, who is also able to free the desperate one, how much is promised! How much indeed is given for the uncertain! So that they might live a little, this is forsaken from where they would live. If he falls into the hands of an enemy or a robber, to avoid being killed, to be redeemed, even if a father is taken, the sons run, and spend what he would leave for them, to redeem whom they can deliver. What ambitions? What prayers? What endeavors? Who can explain this? And yet, I wish to say something more serious, and unless it happens, more incredible. For what do I say, because men give money to live, because they leave nothing to themselves? So that for a few days, uncertain and short, they might live with fear, live with labor, how much do they spend? How much do they give? Woe to the human race! I said that they spend to live from what they could live by: hear what is worse, what is graver, what is more wicked, what is, as I said, incredible, unless it happens. So that they might live a little, they even give that by which they could always live. Hear what I said, and understand. For it is still closed, and yet it moves many, to whom the Lord has already opened it when it was closed. Leave those who give and lose what they could live by, so that they might be granted a little life. Consider those who lose that by which they could always live, so that they might be granted a little life. What is this? It is called faith, it is called piety; this is all like money, by which eternal life is acquired. An enemy will come threatening from the side, and will not say to you: Give me your money, that you may live; but he will say to you: Deny Christ, that you may live. If you do this, so that you may be allowed to live a little, you will lose that by which you could always live. Is this to love life, who feared death? Good man, why did you fear death, unless by loving life? Christ is life. Why do you seek the small, to lose the secure? Perhaps you did not lose your faith, but you did not have what you would lose? Therefore, hold on to that by which you may always live. Consider your neighbor, how much he does to live a little. Consider also him who denied Christ, how much evil he did for a few days of life. And do you not want to despise those few days of life, so that you may die on no day, and live on the eternal day, be protected by your Redeemer, be equaled with angels in the eternal kingdom? What did you love? What did you lose? To follow the Lord, did you not carry your cross?

We are commanded to lose the soul so that the soul may be found.

See how prudent He wants you to be, who said to you: Take up your cross and follow me. He who finds his soul, He says, will lose it; and he who loses it for my sake, will find it. He who finds it will lose it; he who loses it will find it. To lose it, first you must find it; and when you have lost it, finally you must again find it. There are two findings: in between is a perdition through which one passes.

No one can lose his soul for Christ unless he has first found it; and no one can find his soul in Christ unless he has first lost it. Find it, to lose it; lose it, to find it. How will you first be able to find it, to have it to lose? When you think that you are mortal in part, when you think of Him who made you, and by breathing into you created your soul, and you see that you owe it to Him who gave it: to be returned to Him who lent it; to be kept by Him who established it; you have found your soul, finding it in faith. For you have believed this, and you have found your soul. For you were lost before you believed. You have found your soul: for you were dead in unbelief, revived in faith. You are such that it could be said of you: He was dead, and has come to life again; he was lost, and has been found. Therefore, you have found your soul in the faith of truth, if you have revived from the death of unbelief. This is, you have found your soul. Lose it, and let your soul be your seed. For the farmer also finds wheat by threshing and winnowing, and again loses it by sowing. What was lost in the sowing is found in the area. Lost in sowing is what is found in reaping. Therefore, he who finds his soul will lose it. He who works to gather, why is he lazy to sow? The soul for whose sake we are ordered to be destroyed. But see where you may find and why you may lose. For how would you find it, unless the light was kindled for you by Him unto whom it is said: "You will light my lamp, O Lord"? Therefore, you have already found it, with Him kindling the lamp for you. See why you may lose it. For it is not to be lost casually, that which has been found so diligently. He does not say: "Whoever loses it will find it," but: "Whoever loses it for my sake." Perhaps you might see the body of a shipwrecked merchant on the shore, you shed tears out of pity, and you say: "Woe to this man! For gold, he lost his soul." You lament well, you pity well. Render tears to him whom you cannot provide aid. For he might have been able to lose his soul for gold, but he could not find it for gold. He was adequate to the loss of his soul, less adequate to its gain. For it is not to be pondered what he lost, but why he lost it. If for avarice, see where the flesh lies, where is what was dear? And yet avarice commanded, and for gold, the soul was lost, and for Christ, the soul is not lost, nor should it be lost. Fool, do not doubt: hear the counsel of the Creator. He who made you takes care that you might be wise, He who made you before you were could be wise. Hear, do not doubt to lose your soul for Christ. You entrust to the faithful Creator what you are said to lose. Indeed, you will lose, but He receives it, who loses nothing. If you love your life, lose it to find it; for when you find it, there will be nothing to lose, no reason to lose it. For that life which is found, is found that it cannot at all perish. Because Christ also, who gave you an example by being born, dying, and rising again, rising from the dead now does not die, and death no longer has dominion over him.

Sermons - Sermon 345

SERMO 345 TREATISE OF SAINT AUGUSTINE ON DESPISERS OF TEMPORAL THINGS:

Held on the feast day of the Tuburbitan Martyrs Precepts for the wealthy. Dream of the poor. The solemnity of the martyrs and the Lord's day prompt us to speak to your Charity about what pertains to the contempt of the present age and the hope for the future. If you seek what to despise, every holy and pious martyr despised even the present life. If you seek what to hope for, today the Lord has risen. If you falter in the matter, be firm in hope; if the task troubles you, let the reward lift you up. The first apostolic reading, in the epistle he writes to Timothy, also warns us as he commanded him, saying: Command those who are rich in this world not to be haughty, nor to set their hopes on the uncertainty of riches, but on the living God, who richly provides us with everything to enjoy. They are to do good, to be rich in good works, to be generous, and ready to share, thus storing up treasure for themselves as a good foundation for the future, so that they may take hold of that which is truly life. And this reading seems to us no less appropriate for the solemnity of the blessed martyrs; for it encompasses the contempt of the world. For when it is commanded to the rich to store up for themselves a good foundation for the future, and to take hold of true life, without a doubt, this present life is false. And the rich, who are praised, should especially hear this when the poor look upon them, murmur, sigh, praise, envy, wish to be equal, and grieve that they are unequal, and often say among the praises of the rich: "They alone, they alone live." Therefore, on account of these words, by which people flatter the rich because they alone live, and live alone, let them not, inflated by these flattering words, think they are living: Command, he says, those who are rich in this world not to be haughty, nor to set their hopes on the uncertainty of riches, but on the living God, who richly provides us with everything to enjoy. Be rich: but in what? In good works; be generous, because they do not lose what they give; share with those who do not have. And what comes of this? They will store up for themselves a good foundation for the future, so that they may take hold of true life; not assenting to flatterers who say they live and alone live. This life is a dream; these riches flow as if in a dream. Hear the Psalm, O richest poor man: They have slept their sleep, and none of the men of wealth have found anything in their hands. Sometimes even a beggar lying on the ground, trembling with cold, occupied with sleep, dreams of treasures, and rejoices and is proud in his dreams, and does not deign to recognize his ragged father, and as long as he sleeps, he is rich. When he sleeps, he finds false joy; when he awakes, he finds true sorrow. Therefore, the rich man dying is like the poor man waking, who saw treasures in his dreams. For he was wrapped in purple and fine linen, a certain rich man, neither named nor to be named, a despiser of the poor lying before his door; he was wrapped in purple and fine linen, as the Gospel testimony is, and feasted sumptuously every day. He died, he was buried; he woke up, and found himself in flames. Therefore, he slept his sleep, and this man of wealth found nothing in his hands, because he did nothing good with his hands. An example of a man who redeems his life from the enemy.

Because of life, wealth is sought, not life because of wealth. How many have made pacts with their enemies, so that they take everything and leave life! However much they had, they bought their life at that price. How much is eternal life to be valued if a perishable life is so precious? Give something to Christ so that you may live blessed, if you give everything to an enemy so that you may live as a beggar. Weigh your temporal life, which you redeem at such a high price, measure its worthiness to eternal life, which you neglect so that you live for a few days, even if you were to reach old age. For all the days of a man from infancy to old age are few days; and if Adam himself were to die today, he would have lived few days, as he had finished them all. Do you redeem so few and laborious days, in such poverty, in such temptation? At what cost? You want to have nothing so that you may have yourself. Do you want to know at what cost eternal life is valued? Add yourself to the calculation. Behold, an enemy who had captured you said to you: If you want to live, give me whatever you have; and to live, you gave everything; today you are redeemed, tomorrow perhaps you will die; freed by this one, perhaps to be pushed by another. Let dangers teach us, my brethren. What education do we lack, surrounded by the words of God and human experiences? Behold, you gave everything and went away rejoicing because you live, even if poor, even if needy, even if naked, even if a beggar, you still rejoice because you live, and the light is sweet. Let Christ appear: let Him also negotiate, not the one who captured you, but the one who was captured for you; not the one who seeks to kill you, but the one who deemed it worthy to be killed for you. He who gave Himself for you (how great a price!), who made you, tells you: Make a pact with me. Do you want to have yourself and lose everything? If you want to have yourself, you must have me; hate yourself so that you may love me, and by losing your life you may find it, lest you lose it by holding onto it. From these riches of yours, which you love to possess and which you are nevertheless ready to give for your present life, I have already given sound advice. If you love them too, do not lose them; but where you love them, they are perishable with you. I give advice about these, too. Do you love them? Send them where you may follow them; so that while you love them on earth, you do not lose them alive or leave them dead. And, he says, I have given this advice. I did not say: Lose, but: Save. Do you want to store up treasure? I do not say: Do not, but I say: Where. Take me as your advisor, not your prohibiter. Where then do I say to store up treasure? Store up for yourselves treasure in heaven, where neither moth nor rust destroys, nor thieves break in and steal. A healthy piece of advice on preserving wealth. But you say, "I do not see what I place in heaven." For you see what you bury in the earth. You are secure in burying in the earth, and you are anxious about giving to Him who made heaven and earth? Keep it where you wish; if you find anyone better than Christ, entrust it to that guardian. "I entrust," you say, "to my servant." How much better to entrust to your Lord? A servant perhaps will steal and flee; and amidst so many evils which have already happened, it would have been preferable for the servant to steal and flee rather than to lead enemies to his master. Many servants suddenly turned enemies to their masters, and betrayed them to the enemies along with the goods they had. To whom then do you entrust it? "Meanwhile," you say, "I entrust my gold to my servant." Your gold to your servant: to whom does your soul belong? "I entrust," you say, "my soul to God." How much better to entrust both your gold and your soul to Him? Or is He perhaps faithful in guarding your soul, and unfaithful in guarding your money? Does He who keeps you not also keep your possessions? Have faith then. The servant acts so as not to steal: does he act so as not to lose? His entire faithfulness is in not defrauding you; you regard his faithfulness, do you not regard his weakness? He put it down, did not hide it; another came and took it. Would anyone do this to Christ? Shake off your laziness, take the counsel; treasure up in heaven. And what did I say: Shake off your laziness? As if it were an effort to treasure up in heaven. Even if it were an effort, it must be done, and the effort must be undertaken, and those things which we hold in high regard must be stored in a secure place, from which no one can take them away. Yet Christ does not say to you: Treasure up in heaven, seek ladders, fit wings; but: Give to Me on earth, and I will keep it there. On earth, He says, give to Me; therefore I came to be poor here, so that you may be rich there. Make a transfer. Are you afraid of defrauders, lest you lose it? Are you looking for someone to carry it where you are migrating? Christ is present to you in both; He does not deceive but carries.

Christ is to be found in the poor. But you will say, "Where do I find Christ?" Since my faith has what I heard in the Church; I learned this, I believed this, I was imbued with this Sacrament: He was buried, He rose on the third day, after forty days He ascended into heaven before the eyes of His disciples, He sits at the right hand of the Father, and in the end, He will come. When do I find Him here? To whom shall I give? Do not be anxious, hear everything; or if you have heard everything, say everything. I know that you have received this: Christ was hung on the cross, taken down from the wood, placed in the tomb, He rose, He ascended into heaven. And you read that, when Saul proudly persecuted His Church, cruel and breathing threats of murder, thirsting for the blood of Christians, when he raged, when he persecuted, carrying letters to Damascus so that he might bring back in bondage any men and women he found of this discipline; you heard what He called out to him whom you confess sitting in heaven? Remember, therefore, what was said, what you heard, what you read: "Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me?" For Paul was neither seeing Him nor touching Him; and yet He said: "Why do you persecute me?" He did not say: "Why do you persecute my family, my servants, my saints, add the honor, my brothers?" None of these, but what did He say? "Why do you persecute me?" That is, my members, for whom on earth you tread, and the head from heaven cries out; because for even your foot, if it is trodden on earth, your tongue cries out, not: "You tread on my foot," but: "You tread on me." So why do you doubt, to whom you should give? He who said: "Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me?" says to you: "Feed me on earth." Saul raged, and yet he persecuted Christ; so also you, give on earth and you feed Christ. For the Lord Himself foretold this question, which troubles you, will trouble those who will be placed on the right; and when He said: "I was hungry, and you gave me food," they will answer: "Lord, when did we see you hungry?" And they will immediately hear: "When you did it to one of the least of my brethren, you did it to me."

What true riches are must be learned.

If therefore you do not want to give, you have something in you to accuse, you have nothing to excuse. Therefore, about these riches your Lord says to you: I have given most salutary advice. Do you love them? Transfer them; and when you have transferred, you will follow. Follow them meanwhile with your heart: For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also. If you commend your treasure to the earth, you entomb both it and your heart on earth; but when you have buried your heart on earth, be ashamed when you respond, when you hear: Lift up your heart, we have it with the Lord. I, says He, have given salutary advice concerning your riches. If you do, if you hear, if you are such a rich man as the Apostle describes, that you do not think proudly, nor hope in the uncertainty of riches, readily distributing, sharing, treasuring up for yourself a good foundation for the future, that you may lay hold on true life; now ask me, says your Lord. Behold, I have committed what I have to heaven, whether by giving it all, or by holding what remains as though not having it, using this world as though not using it. Is the kingdom of heaven worth so much? Behold, if I have done this, is it worth so much? It is dear. It is worth more dearly: for it is not truly such as to be worth so much. You will live eternally. For you would give all these treasures even for the life of a few days; there you will be truly rich, because you will not need. But in fact, you do this, when you wish to be rich, so that you may not need on earth; and therefore you heap up and accumulate thick clay for yourself, by which you are weighed down, by which you are pressed, by which you are more closely bound when dried out. Therefore, so that you may not need, you seek many animals for transportation, abundant feasts for sustenance, the most precious clothes for clothing. But do know that, having much, you are rich, and the Angel is poor, who uses neither horse nor carriage, does not fill the table with provisions, nor cover himself with garments because he is clothed with light. Learn true riches. You wish to have these, that you may have the means to soothe your throat and fill your belly; he truly makes you rich, who grants you not to hunger. This is to not need at all, to not hunger; for no matter how much you have, when the hour comes for you to eat, or before you approach the table when you hunger, you are needy. Finally, removing the feasts, you as a proud person gasp. This fulfillment is not of needs but smoke of cares. See what you think about increasing these riches of yours; see if you sleep easily when you think, either not to lose where you saved, or to increase what you saved. Therefore, you have found riches, who have found rest. When you are awake, you think about the increase of wealth; when you sleep, you dream of thieves; in the day anxious, at night fearful, always a beggar. He truly wants to make you rich, who promises you the kingdom of heaven. And do you think how much you are going to buy those true riches, that true life, and that eternal one? What then? Do you think it is true because you are going to buy it for as much as you were prepared to buy these few laborious and miserable days? Something worth more should indeed be far greater. A man should offer not only his goods but also himself to God. The example of the martyrs of Tuburbium. And what shall I do? you ask. I have given everything I had to the poor, and what I have I share with those in need: what more can I do? You have more: yourself; you have more, you are one of your possessions, you must be added. Pay attention to your Lord's counsel, which He gave to the rich man: Go, sell everything you have, and give to the poor. And did He dismiss him after saying this? And so that he might not think he would lose what he loved, He first assured him that he would not lose it, but store it up: You will have, He said, treasure in heaven. Is this enough? No. And come, follow me. Did you love? Do you want to follow? He ran, he flew, whom you wish to follow. By what? Through hardships, through reproaches, through false accusations, through spitting in the face, through slaps and beatings with whips, through the thorny crown, through the cross, through death. Why are you reluctant? You wanted to follow, the way has been shown. And you say: Who will follow there? Be ashamed, bearded one; women followed, whose feast we celebrate today. Today we celebrate the solemnity of the martyred women of Tuburba. Your Lord, our Lord, their Lord, the Lord of all, the Redeemer of life, by preceding along the narrow way has made it paved, a royal road, fortified and pure, on which even women delight to walk; and are you still reluctant? Will you not shed your blood for such a great blood? Your Lord says this to you: I suffered first for you; give what you received, return what you drank. Can you not? Boys and girls could; the delicate and refined could; the rich, and the very rich, who when the sudden temptation of passion came, were not restrained by the abundance of riches, nor captivated by the sweetness of this life, thinking of that rich man ending his riches and finding torments; and they did not send their riches ahead, but rather went ahead in martyrdom. With so many examples preceding, are you reluctant? And yet you celebrate the feasts of the martyrs. Today is the birthday of the martyrs: I will proceed, you say, perhaps with a better tunic. See with what conscience: love what you do, imitate what you celebrate, do what you praise. But I can't. The Lord is near, be anxious for nothing. You say, I can't. Do not fear the very source; from where they were filled, you can also be filled, if you approach eagerly, if you do not swell like a hill, but humble yourself like a valley, so that you may deserve to be filled. The world flourishing, the world perishing. Christ the healer comes.

Therefore let us not be hard on ourselves, brothers, especially in these times of abundant pressure; the world was despised by the martyrs when it flourished; truly with great praise was it despised when flourishing, and loved when perishing. They despised its flowers, and you embrace its thorns. If you are reluctant to depart, let the ruined house terrify you. But the pagan mocks you. Why does the pagan mock you? Indeed, it is time for the pagan to mock you, because the prophecies of your Lord are being fulfilled; it would be more fitting for him to mock you if what he predicted were not fulfilled. He denies the God you worship; you, from what the world endures, show the truth, and not saddened by prophecies, rejoice in promises. For it is coming at the time when the world, already aging, made as if to end, was to abound in disasters and calamities and distresses and troubles. He comes for your consolation, he who comes then; lest you fail in the pressures of a perishing and passing life, he promised another life. Before the world suffered these afflictions and calamities, Prophets were sent; servants were sent to this grievously ill one, to the human race, as if to one languishing man stretched and lying from East to West; the powerful physician sent his servants. It came that such attacks would come to this sick one, in which he was to labor greatly. And the physician said: This sick one is to labor greatly, I am necessary. Now the foolish sick man says to the physician: Lord, I have been suffering since you came. Foolish one, you do not suffer because I came, but I came because you were to suffer. To be brief, brothers, why say much? The Lord shortened his word upon the earth. Let us live well, and for our good life do not hope for the fleeting goods of the earth. Earthly happiness is a cheap reward for a good life; what you live well here is not worth as much as what you covet here, although by coveting such things you do not live well here at all. If you wish to change your life, change your desire. You keep faith with God, and therefore to be happy on earth. Is that the only reason you keep faith with God? Is your faith worth that much? Do you value it so little? If you had something for sale on earth, and you negotiate with a buyer, you would ask a higher price, he a lower: it is worth this much, you say, because you exaggerate what you sell; and he: it is not worth that much, but this much; and he offers you a lower price, wanting to buy cheaper. The Lord Christ corrects you. You say to your Lord Christ: Lord, I keep faith with you, and you give me on earth. Foolish one, what you sell is not worth that much; you err, you do not know what you have. You keep faith, and seek earth? Your faith is worth more than the earth; you do not know its value. I know how much it is worth, I who gave it to you; it is worth as much as the whole earth; add the earth and the sky, it is worth more. What is worth more than earth and sky? He who made both earth and sky. Turned to the Lord...

Sermons - Sermon 346

SERMO 346 ON OUR PILGRIMAGE IN THIS LIFE, THROUGH FAITH This life is more truly death than life. True life is only eternal.

Remember with us, beloved brothers, that the Apostle said: As long as we are in the body, we are away from the Lord; for we walk by faith, not by sight. Our Lord Jesus Christ, who said: I am the way, and the truth and the life, wished us to walk both through Him and to Him. For by what do we walk, if not by the way? And to what do we walk, if not to truth and to life, namely eternal life, which alone is to be called life? For this mortal life, in which we are now, is proven to be death in comparison to that life; which is varied by such great mutability, and is stabilized by no firmness, and is terminated by a very short course. And therefore the Lord, to that rich man who said to Him: Good Master, what shall I do to obtain eternal life? answered: If you wish to enter into life, keep the commandments. He was, of course, in some life; for He was not speaking to a dead person or a non-living man. But because he inquired about obtaining eternal life, the Lord did not say: If you wish to enter into eternal life; but: If you wish, He said, to enter into life, keep the commandments: obviously wanting this to be understood, that what is not eternal life is not even to be called life; because true is none other than eternal. Hence also the Apostle, when advising the rich to give alms, said: Let the rich be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate, laying up in store for themselves a good foundation for the future, that they may lay hold on the true life. What did he call true life, if not eternal life, which alone is to be called life, because it alone is blessed? For surely those rich people, to whom he said it must be commanded that they may lay hold on the true life, had this life in the abundance of riches: which, however, if the Apostle judged to be true life, he would not say: Laying up in store for themselves a good foundation for the future, that they may lay hold on the true life: advising nothing else, except that the wealth of the rich is not true life; life, which is called true and blessed by fools. But how can it be blessed, which is not true? Therefore, blessed life is not, unless it is true life; nor is it true life, unless it is eternal life, which the rich are understood not yet to hold, through whatever delights; and therefore they are advised to seize it by alms so that in the end they may hear: Come, you blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world: for I was hungry, and you gave Me food. For since the kingdom itself is eternal life, shortly after the same Lord shows consequentially saying: And these shall go away into everlasting punishment: but the righteous into life eternal.

Pilgrimage through faith in this life.

Until we attain this life, we wander from the Lord; for we walk by faith, not by sight. For He said: I am the way, the truth, and the life. The way for us is in faith, but in sight, there will be truth and life. Now we see through a mirror in an enigma, and this is faith: but then face to face, and that will be sight. He also says: That Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith in the inner man; this is the way, where we know in part. But shortly after he says: To know also the surpassing knowledge of the love of Christ, that you may be filled with all the fullness of God; that will be sight, when in this fullness, when that which is perfect has come, that which is in part will be done away with. He also says: For you died, and your life is hidden with Christ in God: this is faith. Then he adds: When Christ, who is your life, appears, then you also will appear with Him in glory: that will be sight. John also says: Dearly beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it does not yet appear what we shall be: this is faith. Then he adds: We know that when He shall appear, we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is: that will be sight. Therefore, the Lord Himself who said: I am the way and the truth and the life, when speaking to the Jews, among whom were those who already believed in Him, directing His words to them: If you continue, He said, in My word, you are truly My disciples; and you shall know the truth, and the truth shall set you free. They had already believed: for the Evangelist thus said: But Jesus said to those Jews who had believed Him: If you continue in My word, you are truly My disciples; and you shall know the truth, and the truth shall set you free. Thus, they had already believed, and had begun to walk as if on the way in Christ. Therefore, He urges them to continue to reach the end. To what end, but to that which He said: The truth shall set you free? What is that liberation, but from all the changeableness of vanity, from all corruption of mortality? Therefore, it is the true life, eternal life, which we have not yet grasped, as long as we wander from the Lord: but we shall grasp it because we walk in the Lord by faith, if we continue steadfastly in His word. For according to that He said: I am the way, according to this He said: If you continue in My word, you are truly My disciples. And according to that He said: And the truth and the life, according to this He said: And you shall know the truth, and the truth shall set you free. Therefore, in this pilgrimage and in this way, that is, in faith, what do I exhort you, brothers, except with the words of the Apostle saying: Having therefore these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all defilement of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God? For those who seek that light of the most pure and unchangeable truth to be ministered to them before they believe, when they cannot behold it unless through faith with a purified heart: Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God: they are like men who are blind, who desire to see the bodily light of this sun first to be healed from blindness; when they cannot see it unless they are healed beforehand.

Sermons - Sermon 346A

SERMON 346/A On the Word of God, Leader of the Pilgrimage of Christians And that it is necessary for times to be rough so that earthly happiness is not loved. By the Word of God, we are taught that the path of life is to be chosen by us.

Brothers, we are Christians, and we all wish to travel, and even if we do not wish, we travel. No one is allowed to stay here: all those coming into this life are compelled to pass through the vicissitudes of time. Let no place be given to sloth: walk, lest you be dragged. A certain man meets us at the crossroads while we are journeying: not a man, but God become man for the sake of men; and He said to us: Do not go to the left; indeed, that path seems easy, smooth, and delightful, well-trodden by many, and broad; but the end of this road leads to destruction. But there is another path, which has many toils, difficulties, distress, and hardships; where not only are pleasures not found, but even fitting humanity is scarcely exhibited; through which you will walk with difficulty, but once the difficulty is quickly finished, you will come to a great height of joys, so that you may escape those snares which no one evades. The things which the Word of God has spoken have always been faithfully accomplished.

Let us recall past times and the Holy Scriptures. Is not the man himself the Word of God? Was not that very Word made flesh later on, and dwelt among us? Before it was made flesh, and dwelt among us, did not the same Word speak through the prophets? Indeed, God spoke by His Word to Abraham, that his offspring would be strangers in a foreign land, even while he who was addressed was old, and Sarah, elderly and barren: it was believed, and it came to be. That very lineage, that is, the people born from him according to the flesh, would serve in Egypt for four hundred years: it happened. That they would be delivered from that captivity: they were delivered. That they would receive the promised land: they received it. Things both far away and near were spoken, and accomplished, and now are being carried out. The Word of the Lord spoke through the prophets, warning that nation of sinning, to be handed over into the hands of their enemies, for having offended their God: everything came to pass. They would go into Babylonian captivity; and this also came to pass. The coming King Christ would emerge from there: Christ came, Christ was born, for He Himself, the Word, had declared Himself to come. It was said that the Jews would crucify Him: they crucified Him. It was foretold that He would rise again and be glorified: it happened, He rose, He ascended to heaven. It was prophesied that the whole world would believe in His name; it was prophesied that kings would persecute His Church: these things happened. It was foretold that kings would believe in Him: we now hold the faith of kings, and do we doubt the faith of Christ? The circumcisions of heresies were prophesied: do we not see these too, and groan amidst them clamoring all around? It was foretold that the idols themselves would be destroyed through the Church and the name of Christ: and we see this being fulfilled. Scandals in the Church itself were foretold, as were the tares and the chaff: all these things we see with our eyes, and with whatever strength granted by the Lord, we bear them. In what has He deceived you, who said to you: "Go this way"? Speak confidently, if you are faithful, taking so many experiences of Him who speaks to you: I prove Him in these matters, because He has deigned to be proven by the thing itself; if He tells me the truth altogether, He does not deceive me; all these things He says, you hold all His truths, He has lied in nothing; I know Him to be such. He is the Word of God; He has spoken through the mouths of His servants, and He has not deceived: can He deceive by what He says through His own mouth? But he to whom He is not yet known, who doubts concerning Christ, let him also say: I will go this way, lest perchance He speaks the truth, to whom the whole world has already believed. Our ways must be corrected now so that we may be found prepared on the last day. My brothers, many non-believers, neither listening to the voice of the holy fathers, will be found as that multitude was found in the days of Noah: only those who were in the ark escaped. For if they had thought and changed their ways from impiety and turned to our Lord, they would satisfy him for their sins and, groaning towards his mercy, would undoubtedly not perish. For God was not merciless to Nineveh, which was deserving to be saved in three days. What is as short as three days? And yet, even in that great shortness of time, they did not despair of God's mercy to bend His clemency. Therefore, if such a great city had three days to bend God to mercy, how much time could have existed over one hundred years, and two hundred, and three hundred, in which the ark was being built? From the time when Christ began to cut uncorrupted wood from the forest of the people, that is, the Church, if those men had changed their ways and manners, if they had offered a sacrifice of a contrite heart to propitiate God, without any doubt they would have escaped unharmed. Therefore, let men fear, lest they be found thus on that last day. But we, brothers, let us act so as to change our ways from impiety and correct our manners while we have time, so that that day may find us prepared; for he never lies who says that it will come. Beware lest you doubt, for it is true. For in the days of Noah it was thus: They ate, they drank, they married, they were given in marriage, they bought, they sold, until Noah entered the ark, the flood came, and destroyed all who placed their hope in this world and wished to live securely, but not in a region of security, and only those who were in the ark escaped.

How difficult it is to enter the eternal kingdom. But many say to themselves: We are commanded to wait for that day and not be found like those who were found outside the ark, who perished in that flood. Certainly, the trumpet of the Gospel terrifies us, the word of God terrifies us: what shall we do? Therefore, should a wife not be taken? The young man says this, the youth says this. Should one not eat, should one not drink? Should one always fast? Many say these things; and those who perhaps wanted to buy something would say to themselves: Now nothing should be bought, lest we be found among those who perished in the flood? So what shall we do, brothers? If it is so, then we must lament, just as the Apostles lamented over the human race when they heard the Lord saying: If you wish to be perfect, sell all that you have and give to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven, and come, follow me. He to whom it was said was saddened, he departed; and although he called him good master, from whom he sought counsel for eternal life, he was seen as a good master as long as he spoke justly when questioned. The Lord said, and the rich man was saddened. But as he departed sorrowfully, the Lord said: How difficult it is for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven! As if the kingdom of heaven were closed against the rich. What will happen? It is closed. But he said: Knock, and it shall be opened to you. And would that as few went into the fire, as few are the rich! Now indeed, even from the number of the rich many will go into the kingdom of heaven, and from the number of the poor many will go into eternal fire, not because he is rich in wealth, but because he burns with greed.

Let not the rich despair of the kingdom of heaven: the camel is a figure of Christ. The disciples were saddened. The Lord said: What is difficult for men is easy for God. You are disturbed by the difficulty that he mentioned the camel: if he wills, that enormous beast, which is called a camel, can pass through the eye of a needle. What is this? Let us see if it becomes clear. For neither without reason did John the Baptist, the forerunner of the Lord himself, wear a garment made of camel's hair, who, bearing witness to the judge coming after him, wore it as if a cloak made from that. Let us recognize by the mention of the camel a figure of our Lord Jesus Christ: let us recognize the great, yet with a humble neck, whom no one can burden with persuasions unless he laid himself down on the earth. Thus Christ also humbled himself unto death, so that he might destroy him who had the power of death, that is, the devil. Therefore, let us also see the eye of the needle, through which such a great one passed: indeed, in the puncture of the needle which he endured willingly in his passion, and in the narrowness of the hole. Therefore, the camel has now passed through the eye of the needle: let the rich not despair, they can securely enter the kingdom of heaven.

Both rich and poor men are placed before the judge. But let us recognize the kind of rich people. Behold, someone unknown, clothed in rags, exulted and laughed when it was said that a rich man cannot enter the kingdom of heaven; and he said: I will enter; these rags will grant it to me. Those who harm us and oppress us will not enter: clearly such people will not enter. But, poor man, see whether you will enter. What if you are poor and greedy? What if you are oppressed by poverty and burn with avarice? Therefore, if you are such a person, poor man, not because you refused wealth, but because you could not obtain it. God does not look at your wealth, but He considers your will. Therefore, if you are of a bad life, with bad morals, blasphemous, adulterous, drunk, proud, depart from the number of God's poor; you will not be among those of whom it is said: Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Behold, I find a rich person—by comparison to whom you boasted and dared to look at the kingdom of heaven—I find a poor one in spirit, that is, humble, pious, innocent, not blaspheming, following the will of God; and if he has lost some of his worldly possessions, he immediately says: The Lord gave, the Lord took away; as the Lord pleased, so it was done: blessed be the name of the Lord forever. Behold the rich person meek, humble, not resisting, not murmuring, following the will of God, and rejoicing in that land of the living: For the meek shall inherit the earth. But you perhaps are poor and proud. I praise the humble rich man: do I not praise the humble poor man? The poor man does not have anything to be puffed up about, but the rich man has something to struggle with. This one will indeed enter, this rich man, and the kingdom of heaven will be closed against you; because it is closed against the wicked, against the proud, against the blasphemous, against the adulterous, against the drunkard, against the avaricious. He has held onto a faithful debtor, who believed in the promise. The humble, humane, faithful rich man responded, saying: God knows that I do not think arrogantly; and if I sometimes cry out and say something harsh, God knows my conscience, that I say these things out of necessity for governance: never will I use this to elevate myself above others. Inside, God sees the works that follow. For the rich who are in good works easily give, and share with those who do not have. That is where humility appears, if you are rich and humble. You proclaim yourself good and pious: let what you have be shared with him who does not have; so that you may treasure for yourself a good foundation for the future, that you may obtain true and blessed life. If they are like this, let them be secure: when that last day comes, they will be found in the ark, they will be in the fabric, they will not be part of the flood; let them not be afraid because they are rich. And if he is young and cannot control himself, he is allowed to take a wife. But because the Time is short, let those who have wives be as though they had none, and those who buy as though they had nothing, and those who weep as though they did not weep, and those who rejoice as though they did not rejoice, and those who use the world as though they did not use it: for the form of this world is passing away. The judge is coming: let us correct ourselves. My brothers, someone murmurs against God and says: Evil times, harsh times, troublesome times; and yet gifts are consumed, and the time is called harsh. How much crueler are you, who are not corrected by harsh time! Such insanity of parades still thrives, such superfluous things are coveted; and greed has no end. How many diseases arise from the midst! how much luxury has overflowed because of theatres, and organs, and flutes, and pantomimes! You want to use badly what you desire; therefore you will not receive it. Hear the voice of the apostle: You covet, and do not have, you kill and are jealous, and cannot achieve; you quarrel, ask, and do not receive, because you ask wrongly, that you may consume it in your desires. Let us heal, brothers, let us correct ourselves. The Judge is coming, and though He comes, He is still mocked: He is coming, and will not have leisure to be mocked. Dearest brothers, let us correct ourselves, for better times are coming, but not for those living wickedly. Already the world inclines, and has declined into old age. Are we to come into youth? What do we hope for here? Let us now seek something else. Do not hope for times, except as are read in the Gospel: they are not evil because Christ has come; but because they were evil and harsh, He came who might console.

Christ the healer is here to heal us, but it is necessary that we suffer in this life.

Listen, my brothers: indeed there were meant to be troublesome and hard times. What would we do if such a great comforter were not present? The human race was gravely ill, from Adam even to the end. From the time we were born here, from the time we were sent out of paradise, indeed illness is present: but in the end it would be greater, and perhaps close to healing, and for some close to death. Therefore, as the human race was ailing, the great physician taking the sick person in a certain great bed, that is, in the whole world - but just as a very skilled physician observes the times of the sick person, and sees, and foresees what is to come, and sends first his servants in the milder times of the illness; so too our physician first sent prophets to look after us. They spoke, they preached; through them he healed some, and cured. They foretold a certain increase into extreme illness, and a great shaking of this sick person, who would need the physician himself to be present, and to come to him. Thus it happened because he said: I will restore the believer, I will save; I will smite, I will heal. He came, he was made man, a partaker of our mortality, that we might be able to become partakers of his immortality. The sick person is still shaken: and while he gasps in fevers, and burns much, he says to himself: Since this physician came, I suffer bitterer fevers, I am shaken more gravely, I endure immense heat. Where did he come to me from? I think he did not enter my house properly. Thus say all who are still sick with vanity. Why are they sick with vanity? Because they do not want to receive the potion of sobriety from him. Seeing God that the wretched were being tossed by their concerns, and occupied with various occupations of this world, which strangle their souls, he came as a physician. And they do not fear to say: Since Christ came, we endure these times; since there are Christians, the world has failed in all things. O foolish sick person! it is not because the physician came that your illness became graver: a good, pious, just, merciful physician foresaw it; for he did not make it. Indeed he came, to console you, so that you might truly be well. For what does he take from you, except the superfluous? For you were longing for harmful things, and were held by them: they were not useful to your fever, those things you were longing for. Is the physician harsh, because he takes from the sick person's hand the harmful fruits? What did he take from you, except the false security you were about to capture? Free the destruction of your vitals: and this, that you groan and murmur, pertains to his medicine. Not willing to be cured, so that you are not tormented unwillingly. It is necessary that times be troublesome. Why? So that earthly happiness is not loved. For it is necessary, and medicinal, that this life be disturbed, and another life be loved. Behold, if with so much laziness they still delight in earthly things and the amphitheater, what if their works were not struck? Behold so many bitternesses are mixed, and still the world is sweet!

Sermons - Sermon 346B

Sermon 346/B On the Pilgrimage of This Life We are on the way: our homeland is in the heavens. This life of ours, beloved brothers, is, as the Apostle Paul most clearly teaches, a kind of pilgrimage from the heavenly homeland of the holy Jerusalem, saying: As long as we are in the body, we are away from the Lord. And because every pilgrim certainly has a homeland, for no one is a pilgrim without a homeland, we ought to know what our homeland is, to which we must hasten, disregarding all the temptations and pleasures of this life, and where we may find rest. For God did not wish for us to have true rest anywhere else but in that homeland: for if He also gave rest here, we would not long to return. Therefore, calling this homeland Jerusalem, not the earthly one, which is enslaved with its children, as the same Apostle warns: for that was given to men on earth as a shadow of some significance, though worshiping the one God, yet desiring earthly happiness from Him. But there is another Jerusalem, which he says is in heaven: for Jerusalem above is free, which is the mother of us all. He calls that one our mother, as the metropolis: for metropolis is interpreted as mother city. Therefore, we must hasten to it, and recognize that we are pilgrims, and on the way.

He who loves runs on the path.

Every man who does not yet believe in Christ is not on the way: for he is erring; and he seeks his homeland, but does not know what it is, does not know where it is. What is it that I say, he seeks his homeland? Every soul seeks rest, and seeks happiness; nobody, when asked whether he wants to be happy, responds with any doubt that he wants to be: every man exclaims, he wants to be happy; but how he may go to happiness, and where that happiness may be found, this men do not know: so they err. For no one errs who goes nowhere: going, and not knowing where he may go, all error arises. The Lord calls back to the way; and when we are made believers, believing in Christ, we are not yet in the homeland, but nevertheless we have already begun to walk on the way. Just as, therefore, we, if we remember that we are Christians, exhort and admonish all our dearest who are erring in vain superstitions and heresies, that they come to the way and walk on the way; so also those who are already on the way ought to exhort each other. For no one arrives unless he is on the way: but not everyone who is on the way arrives. Therefore, those who do not yet hold the way are held in greater peril; those, however, who are already on the way ought not to feel secure: lest, retained by the delights of the way itself, they are not so eagerly taken up into that homeland where there is only rest. For our steps on this way are the love of God and neighbor. He who loves, runs: and the more ardently one loves, the more eagerly he runs; but the less one loves, the more sluggishly he moves on the way. Indeed, if he does not love, he has entirely remained on the way; if he desires the world, he has looked back from the way, he has no face towards the homeland. What does it profit that he is on the way, but does not go, indeed, he goes back? What does it profit, that he is a Catholic Christian - for this is to be on the way - and by loving the world while walking on the way, he has looked back? For whence he began, there he returns. But if he is led astray by any snares of the tempting and robbing enemy on this journey from the Catholic Church, either to heresy, or to some rites of the pagans, or to any other superstitions and machinations of the devil, he has already lost the way, returns to error. The Church is the way, open to all; it is established on the rock.

Therefore, brothers, let us run on this path, because we are Catholic Christians, which is the one Church of God, as foretold in the holy Scriptures. For God did not want it to be hidden, so that no one could make an excuse: it was foretold to exist throughout the world, it has been exhibited to the whole world. Nor should innumerable heresies and schisms disturb us: they would trouble us more if they did not exist, because they too were foretold. All, whether those who remain in the Catholic Church or those who are outside the Catholic Church, bear witness to the Gospel. What is it that I say? They give testimony that all things said in the Gospel are true. How was the Church of God foretold to exist among the nations? One Church, established on the rock, which the gates of hell shall not overcome. The gate of hell is the beginning of sin: for the wages of sin are death, and death certainly belongs to hell. But what is the beginning of sin? Let Scripture be questioned. It says, “Pride is the beginning of all sin”; and if pride is the beginning of sin, then pride is the gate of hell. Now, therefore, consider what has given birth to all heresies: you will find no other mother than pride. For when men greatly regard themselves and call themselves holy, wishing to draw crowds to themselves and away from Christ, they have fostered useful heresies and useful schisms only through pride. But because from all those heresies and schisms, that is, the children of pride, the Catholic Church is not overcome, therefore it was foretold: “And the gates of hell shall not overcome it.”

How the snares of the devil are to be overcome.

Therefore, brothers, as I began to say, we are on the way: let us run with love and charity, forgetting temporal things. This way seeks the strong and does not want the lazy. Abundant are the robberies of temptations: the devil lies in wait at every throat, everywhere he tries to enter and possess; and whom he possesses, he calls back from the way or delays him: but he calls back, and makes him not advance or even deviate, so that he is entangled in errors and schisms of heresy, and is led to some kinds of superstitions. He tempts either through fear or greed; but first through greed, through some promises and offers, or through the seductions of pleasures. When he finds a man has despised these things and as it were has closed the door of greed against him, he begins to tempt through the door of fear; so that if you no longer wished to acquire anything in this world, and therefore closed the door of greed, you have not yet closed the door of fear, if you fear to lose what you have acquired. Therefore be strong in faith: let no one seduce you into deceit through any promise, let no one drive you into deceit through any threat. Whatever the world promises you, the kingdom of heaven is greater; whatever the world threatens you with, hell is greater. Therefore, if you wish to escape all fears, fear the eternal punishments which God threatens. Do you want to trample on all desires of concupiscence? Desire eternal life, which God promises. Thus you close to the devil, thus you open to Christ.

Sermons - Sermon 346C

Sermon 346/C OF THE TRIBULATIONS AND OPPRESSIONS OF THE WORLD Past times were not better, but actually somewhat worse.

Whenever we suffer anything from pressure or tribulation, they are admonishments and at the same time corrections for us. For even our Holy Scriptures do not promise us peace, security, and quiet, but tribulations, pressures, and scandals; the Gospel does not remain silent about these; but he who perseveres to the end, this one will be saved. For what good has this life ever had since the first man, from whom it deserved death, from whom it received a curse, from which curse Christ the Lord freed us? Therefore, let us not murmur, brothers, as some of them murmured, as the Apostle said, and perished from serpents. What unusual suffering does mankind endure now, brothers, that the fathers did not suffer? Or when we suffer such things, what do we know that they had suffered as well? And we find people murmuring about their times, and that the times of our parents were good. What if they could be brought back to the times of their parents and murmur there? For you think past times were good because they are not yours now, therefore they seem good. If you are now freed from the curse, if you now believe in the Son of God, if you are now either imbued or instructed with the Holy Scriptures, I wonder if you consider the times of Adam to be good. And your parents bore Adam himself. Certainly, it is that Adam to whom it was said: In the sweat of your face, you shall eat your bread, and you will work the ground from which you were taken; it will bear thorns and thistles for you. This is what he deserved, this he received, this he obtained from the just judgment of God. Therefore, do you think past times were better than yours? From that Adam to today’s Adam, labor and sweat, thorns and thistles. Did we forget the flood? Did the laborious times of famine and wars pass, which were written about so we might not murmur against God about the present time? Did we forget that time among our ancestors, far removed from your times, when a dead donkey’s head was sold for so much gold, when dove's dung was bought for not a small amount of silver, when women agreed to eat their children; and when one was killed and consumed, and the other did not want to kill her own, such a case came to the judge, to the king, where he found himself guilty rather than a judge? And who is able to recount either the wars or the famines of that time? What were those times like! Do we not all shudder when we hear or read them? Let us rather have something from which we can rejoice, than murmur about our times.

One blessed day is eternity.

When, then, was it good for the human race? When was there no fear, when no pain, when certain happiness, when no true unhappiness? If you do not have, you burn to acquire; do you have? you tremble lest you lose; and what is more wretched, both in that burning and in this trembling, you think yourself sane. Is a wife to be taken? if bad, she will be your punishment; if good, alas lest she happen to die. Unborn children torment with pains, born children with fears; how joyful is the one born who is immediately feared lest he be mourned when carried! Where will there be a secure life? Is not all this land like a great ship, bearing the fluctuating, the endangered, subject to so many storms and tempests? They fear shipwreck, they sigh for the port, those who already understand themselves to be sojourning. So those good days, uncertain days, fleeting days, days ended before they come, days which come only to not be. Who then is the one who wants life, and loves to see good days? But here, neither life nor days are good: for good days, that is eternity itself. Days which are without end are called days. "I will dwell," he says, "in age, in the length of days." Again it is said, "For better is one day in your house than thousands": the better is one without end. Therefore we should desire such a thing. Such a thing is promised to us, with familiar names, unusual things. Who is the man who wants life? Every day life is said and life: but what is it compared to that life? And loves to see good days? Every day good days are said: but if they are examined, they are not found. I considered today a good day. If you found your friend, you would consider him good, if he wanted to stay with you: does not man always complain about his friend, if he sees him and passes by? Such, therefore, is that good day which sees you and passes by. I considered it good. Where is it? Lead it to me. I considered it a good day. Rejoice in the day that is passed. Who then is the man who wants life, and loves to see good days? We all answer: I: but after this life, after these days. Therefore, if we are deferred, what is said to us so that we may do and reach what we are deferred to? What then shall I do in this life of whatever kind, so that I may come to life and good days? What follows in that psalm: "Keep your tongue from evil, and your lips from speaking deceit; turn from evil, and do good." Do therefore what is commanded, and you will receive what is promised. If you think it laborious, and are discouraged by the toil of work, be uplifted by the splendor of the reward.

Sermons - Sermon 347

SERMO 347 On the Fear of God How frequently in the Scriptures the fear of God is commended.

Many teachings, brothers, have been given to us about the fear of God, and the divine scriptures have declared countless times how beneficial it is to fear God. From this abundant source, I will recall a few, and as much as I can within the brevity of time, I will discuss them for your attentive consideration. Who would not rejoice in being wise, or if he is not yet wise, desire to be so? But what does Scripture say? The beginning of wisdom is the fear of the Lord. Who would not delight in reigning? But let us hear what the Spirit advises in the Psalm: And now, kings, understand; be instructed, you who judge the earth; serve the Lord in fear, and rejoice with trembling. Hence the Apostle also says: Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling. We also read written: You desired wisdom, keep justice, and the Lord will grant it to you. For we find many who are very negligent of justice, yet very eager for wisdom. The divine Scripture teaches these that they cannot attain what they desire unless they keep what they neglect. Keep, it says, justice, and the Lord will grant you the wisdom you desired. But who can keep justice unless he fears God? For it says elsewhere: For he who is without fear will not be able to be justified. Moreover, since the Lord does not grant wisdom except to the one who keeps justice, and he who is without fear cannot be justified, we return to that statement: The beginning of wisdom is the fear of the Lord.

We are taught by Isaiah to rise from fear to wisdom.

Isaiah the prophet, when he commended those seven well-known spiritual gifts, beginning with wisdom, reached to the fear of God, as if descending to us from a sublime height, so that he might teach us to ascend. Therefore, he began from the point that we wish to reach; and he reached to the point where we ought to begin. "The Spirit of God shall rest upon him," he said, "the Spirit of wisdom and understanding, the Spirit of counsel and might, the Spirit of knowledge and godliness, the Spirit of the fear of the Lord." Just as he, by teaching and not by failing, descended from wisdom to fear; so we, not by pride but by progressing, ought to ascend from fear to wisdom. For the beginning of wisdom is the fear of the Lord. For this is indeed the valley of weeping, of which the Psalm says: "He has set his heart on ascending in the valley of weeping." For the valley signifies humility. But who is humble, except one who fears God, and with that fear breaks his heart in the tears of confession and repentance? For God does not despise a broken and contrite heart. But let him not fear to stay in the valley. For in that very broken and humbled heart, which God does not despise, He has set the steps by which we may ascend to Him. For thus says the Psalm: "He has set his heart on ascending in the valley of weeping, to the place he has prepared." Where are the ascensions made? He says, "In the heart." But from where must we ascend? Certainly from the valley of weeping. And to where must we ascend? "To the place," he says, "he has prepared." What is this place, except the place of rest and peace? For there is that clear wisdom, which never fades. Hence, Isaiah descended, by certain gradations of teaching, from wisdom to fear, from the place of eternal peace to the valley of temporal weeping, to exercise us: so that, in the confession of repentance, by grieving, moaning, and weeping, we may not remain in sorrow and groaning and tears; but ascending from that valley to the spiritual mountain, where the holy city, our eternal mother Jerusalem, is founded, we may enjoy untroubled joy. Therefore, when he had put forward wisdom, that is, the unfailing light of the mind, he added understanding: as if responding to those asking from where to come to wisdom, he answered: From understanding; from where to understanding: From counsel; from where to counsel: From might; from where to might: From knowledge; from where to knowledge: From godliness; from where to godliness: From fear. Therefore, to wisdom from fear; because the beginning of wisdom is the fear of the Lord. From the valley of weeping to the mountain of peace. A Comparison Between the Seven Steps of Isaiah and the Eight Beatitudes of the Gospel.

Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. They are humble in the valley, they tremble, they offer to God a contrite and humbled heart: from where they ascend to piety, so as not to resist His will, either in His words, where they do not grasp His meaning, or in the very order and governance of creation, since many things happen differently than the private will of man desires: for there it should be said: Indeed, not what I will, but what You will, Father. Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth: not the land of the dying, but the land of which it is said: You are my hope, my portion in the land of the living. From such piety they will merit the step of knowledge, so that they may know not only the evils of their past sins, over which they wept in the first step of repentance out of sorrow, but also the evil in which they are in this mortality and pilgrimage away from the Lord, even when secular happiness smiles upon them. For it is written: He who increases knowledge, increases sorrow. Blessed are those who mourn, for they shall be comforted. Hence they rise to strength, so that the world is crucified to them, and they to the world, so that in the perversity of this life and the abundance of iniquity, charity does not grow cold; but the hunger and thirst for righteousness is endured, until they come to its satisfaction in that immortality of the saints and the fellowship of the Angels. Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness, for they shall be satisfied. However, because of the restlessness of temptations, and what is said: Woe to the world because of offenses; if perhaps small faults or sins sneak in stealthily, which human weakness is preoccupied with, advice should not be lacking. For such a degree of strength cannot prevail in this mortal life, so that he who fights with the most cunning adversary in continuous struggle is not struck at some point: especially through temptations of the tongue, where if one says to his brother: Fool, he shall be liable to the hell of fire. So what advice is there, except what the Lord says: Forgive, and you will be forgiven? And therefore, just as in the steps we learn through Isaiah, the fifth is counsel; so in the Gospel, in those praises of beatitude, it is placed fifth: Blessed are the merciful, for they shall receive mercy. The sixth in Isaiah is understanding: where hearts are cleansed of all falsity of carnal vanity, so that pure intention is directed toward the end. Therefore, the Lord also said sixth: Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. When indeed the end is reached, it is already standing, already resting, already triumphing in secure peace. And who is the end, if not God Christ? For Christ is the end of the law, for righteousness to everyone who believes. And who is the wisdom of God, if not Christ? And who is the Son of God, if not Christ? Therefore, in Him, they are wise, and in Him, they become sons of God, whosoever becomes: and this is full and perpetual peace. Therefore, since wisdom is the seventh in Isaiah for those ascending upwards, from where He Himself began to descend to us by teaching; the Lord who lifts us up also placed it seventh: Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called sons of God. Therefore, having these promises, and striving toward the Lord by these steps, let us endure all the harsh and difficult things of this world, nor let its cruelty break us, which, having been conquered, we will rejoice in eternal peace. For this reason, with the end already shown to us, the eighth sentence encourages: Blessed are those who are persecuted for righteousness' sake, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.

Sermons - Sermon 348

SERMO 348 Of the Fear of God Strength founded in the fear of God. Fear to be driven out by love.

I do not doubt, beloved brothers, that the fear of God is instilled in your hearts, by which you may be led to true and solid fortitude. For indeed, while he is called brave who fears no one, he is wrongly brave who does not wish to first fear God, so that by fearing he may listen, by listening he may love, and by loving he may not fear. Then he will be truly most brave, not through proud hardness, but through secure justice. Thus it is also written: The fear of the Lord is the hope of strength. For when the punishment that He threatens is feared, the reward that He promises is learned to be loved: and thus through fear of punishment a good life is maintained; through a good life a good conscience is acquired, so that through a good conscience no punishment is feared. Therefore, let him learn to fear who does not wish to fear. Let him learn to be anxious for a time, who wishes to be secure forever. As John says: There is no fear in love, but perfect love casts out fear. Indeed, he said this, and he spoke truly. Therefore, if you do not wish to have fear, first see whether you already have perfect love, which casts out fear. But if before attaining this perfection, fear is excluded, it is pride that inflates, not love that builds up. For just as in good health hunger is driven away not by disdain but by food; so in a good mind fear must not be driven away by vanity, but by love. On the proper love of God and neighbor by which fear is to be cast out.

Therefore, examine your conscience, whoever no longer wishes to fear. Do not grasp the surface, descend into yourself, penetrate the inner parts of your heart. Investigate diligently whether any poisoned vein there sucks and absorbs the decaying love of the world, whether you are moved and captured by no lure of carnal pleasure, whether you are swelled up with no empty boastfulness, whether you burn with no care of vanity: dare to announce that you see yourself pure and clear, whatever you scrutinize in the recesses of your conscience, from deeds, words, or evil thoughts. If now the diligence of iniquity does not weary you, ensure that no negligence of equity creeps in. If these things are so, rightly do you rejoice, rejoice in being without fear. The love of God, whom you love with all your heart, soul, and mind, would have expelled it. The love of your neighbor, whom you love as yourself, would have also expelled it: and therefore, you strive for your neighbor too, so that he also loves God with all his heart, soul, and mind with you. For you cannot rightly love yourself unless you love God so that you do not love Him less because you turn to yourself. But if, although you are not stirred by any desire within yourself (which indeed, who would dare to boast?), yet if you love yourself in yourself, and you are pleased with yourself, you ought to fear this more vehemently, because you fear nothing. For fear is to be cast out not by any kind of love, but by the right love with which we love God wholly, and because of this, our neighbor, so that he also loves God. But to love oneself in oneself, and to be pleased with oneself, is not the charity of justice but the vanity of pride. Hence the Apostle justly rebuked those who love and are pleased with themselves. Therefore perfect charity casts out fear. But it must be called charity, which is not cheapness. What is cheaper than a man without God? See what he loves, who loves himself not in God but in himself. Rightly is it said to him: Do not be arrogant, but fear. For since he is arrogant, and therefore does not fear, he perniciously does not fear, who is not placed on solid ground but is blown by the wind of pride. Neither is he mild and pious, who loves and praises himself in himself: but he is haughty and fierce, not knowing how to say: My soul will be praised in the Lord; let the meek hear, and be glad. For what good does he love, who perhaps loves this: to fear nothing? He can persuade himself of this, not by soundness, but by monstrosity. For example, there is an audacious robber, the more perversely strong he is, the more dangerously cruel, who, because of his love with which he loves to fear nothing, undertakes enormous crimes so that he may practice what he loves and strengthen it by practicing: the greater his crimes, the greater will be his boldness of not fearing. Therefore, this should not be loved as a great good, which can be found even in the worst man. The Epicureans and Stoics boast that they neither suffer pain nor fear.

Therefore, the philosophers of this world are to be ridiculed, not just the Epicureans, who hold even justice for sale at the price of bodily pleasure. For they say that the wise person should be just in order to either acquire or retain bodily pleasure. Indeed, they boast themselves as being very brave and claim to fear nothing at all, because they believe that God does not concern Himself with human affairs, and that after this life is spent, no future one will follow. And if any adversity happens to them in this life, they think themselves protected because, when they cannot possess bodily pleasure in the body, they can still think about it in their mind, and by pleasing themselves with that thought, they preserve the happiness of bodily pleasure even against the assault of bodily pain. Does not love also cast out fear among these people? But it is the love of the most sordid pleasure, or rather, the love of the most disgraceful vanity. For when pain attacking the body has driven out that pleasure from its members, it remains in the mind through its false image of vanity. Such vanity is loved so much that when a vain person embraces it with all the strength of their heart, even the savageness of pain is mitigated. Therefore, not only these individuals are to be ridiculed, but also the Stoics themselves. For these two sects of Epicureans and Stoics, as we read in the Acts of the Apostles, dared to boast their smoke against the light of our Paul. For the Stoics also hold themselves to be the bravest and claim to fear nothing, not for the sake of bodily pleasure, but for the virtue of the mind, swollen with pride, not healed by wisdom, but hardened by error. They are less and less healthy to the extent that they believe their sick soul can be healed by themselves. They think this is the health of the mind, that the wise person should not have compassion. For if he has compassion, they say, he grieves; and what grieves is not healthy. O foolish blindness! What if he grieves the less he is healthy? For it makes a difference whether he does not grieve because of perfect health, like the body and soul of the saints will be in the resurrection of the dead, which they do not believe; because they have ignorant teachers, even when they have themselves. Therefore, it makes a difference whether one does not grieve owing to health or owing to stupor. For according to the health of this mortality, sound flesh when pricked, grieves. Such is also the mind properly affected in this life, which, stung by another's misery, is moved with compassion. But flesh, numb from a worse disease, or even dead having lost its spirit, does not grieve when pricked: such is the mind of these people who philosophize without God, or rather, are suffocated. For as the body is inspired by the soul, so the soul itself lives inspired by God. Let these people see, therefore, who do not grieve nor fear, lest they be not healthy, but dead.

Two kinds of fear: one fear to be cast out, the other to remain.

Let the Christian fear, before perfect love casts out fear: let him believe and understand that he is a sojourner away from the Lord as long as he lives in a body which is corrupted and weighs down the soul. Let fear be lessened by how much closer the homeland we are heading towards is. For greater fear should be amongst travelers, less for those who are getting closer, and none for those who have arrived. Thus, fear leads to love, and perfect love casts out fear. Let the Christian not fear those who kill the body and afterwards have nothing more to do; but rather Him who has the power to kill both body and soul in the fire of hell. There is, however, another fear of the Lord, chaste and enduring forever. Therefore, perfect love does not cast out this fear, otherwise it would not endure forever; nor is it in vain that when it was said: the fear of the Lord, the word chaste was added; and thus it was joined: enduring forever. Why? Unless because that fear, which love casts out, pricks the soul lest something be lost which is loved in the creature, or bodily health and rest itself, or something such after death. Therefore, the punishments and pains and torments of hell are feared in the lower regions. But when the soul fears lest God forsake it, there is a chaste fear enduring forever. About which I would speak at greater length, but the discourse has already grown longer and would compel me to spare my aged strength and possibly your satisfaction.

Sermons - Sermon 348A augm

SERMON 348/A expanded.

Sermon of Saint Augustine against Pelagius.

Christ came into the world to save sinners. The reason for the advent and incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ is that when He came, He found all sinners. The Apostle very clearly states this cause of His advent in this manner: It is a human saying, he says, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into this world to save sinners, of whom I am the first. Therefore, no other cause brought the Son of God, God and eternal God, and co-eternal and equal with the Father, from the heavens to the earth to take flesh and die for us, except that there was no life in us. The physician would not descend, unless to the sick; life would not descend, unless to the dead. Today, as the Apostle was being read, those of you who were attentive heard: He thus commends His love for us, he says, because, while we were still sinners, Christ died for us; much more now having been justified by His blood, we shall be saved from wrath through Him. This is the grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord, which the prophets first proclaimed, then He Himself with His own mouth, then the apostles after His presence in the flesh, then the whole Church holds, declares, preaches, and commends and venerates. This is the grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord. To rise from ruin, we need the help of God.

Wherefore, your love ought first to know, or rather to recall what you know and have always heard: that no man can be saved by his own merits and strength. For man was easy to wound himself, just as in our own fleshly life it is easy for anyone to kill himself: but is he able to resurrect himself? Therefore, to fall, we needed no assistance; indeed, because we abandoned God's help, we fell. But to rise from our fall, let us ask for His aid, lest we remain in our sins. Christ died for us - you have heard the Apostle - not for Himself, but for us. Why not for Himself, but for us? Because He had no cause of death, in whom there was no sin. Death is the penalty of sin. For if Adam had not sinned, he would certainly not have died, nor would we be born mortal from his offspring. But one came without sin, to absolve all sins: for He who was not liable could untie the bound, nor could the guilty liberate the condemned. He took flesh from a virgin without man's concupiscence; the flesh taken was not a wound, but the medicine for the wound. Christ died for us.

God gave His only Son for us.

What else shall we seek from him? What is Christ? You have heard: when he asked his disciples, it was said by Peter: You are the Christ, the Son of the living God. He by nature the Son, we by grace; he the only one, we many, because he was born, we were adopted. Since God had one and only Son, he spared not his only begotten and own Son, but delivered him up for us all, as the Apostle says. What greater remedy could the human race ask for or hope for than that the only Son should be sent not to live with us, but to die for us? And in order to die for us, he took on flesh in which he could die, because, being the Word God with God the Father, he did not have the means by which to die. In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. Where is there visibility and tangibility in the Word, where is there suffering or death in God? That which cannot be seen can be seen only by the mind. But even the mind itself is covered in darkness, blinded by sins, the whole man weak, the whole man languid, the whole man wounded, I dare say the whole man dead and extinguished, how could it see the ubiquitous presence, not having a healthy inner eye, by which invisible things are seen?

"If we wish to live, let us not cling to death."

Therefore, there was nothing entirely healthy in us: the healer of body and soul descended, because he is the Savior of body and soul. For if these doctors can heal what they did not create from these medicines and herbs which they did not create, if the human doctor heals by the power of God, how much more does God heal his own? However, the human doctor heals the one destined to die, God heals the one who is to live eternally. And this very act of willing to die for us was our medicine. It is a great mercy, brothers, that our healer willed to cure us not with his ointment, but with his blood. Much more, he says, now being justified. By what? By his blood, not by our own strengths, not by our own merits, but by his blood, we will be saved from wrath through him, not through us, but through him. He bound himself to the cross: if we truly wish to live, let us not cling to death. He who clings to himself clings to death. For life is not in the dead. What can the dead presume about themselves? They could die by their own power, but they cannot revive themselves. We could and still can sin by ourselves, yet we will never be able to rise by ourselves. Our hope must be in God alone. Let us groan to him, let us place our trust in him; as far as it concerns us, let us strive by our will, that we may deserve through prayer.

Augustine exposes the error of the Pelagians.

Therefore, since these things are so, brothers, I will speak more openly to you, because there is nothing for us to hide: a certain new heresy, hiding and secretly and widely spreading, we endured in silence as much as we could, until it burst forth; we always refuted the error itself; we kept names silent, lest perhaps, when we refuted the error, people might be corrected; we kept names silent: for nothing is better, nothing more desirable, than that those hearing what was preached by us according to the most ancient foundation of the Church might fear to proclaim their errors and be healed in silence, converted to the one who heals all who call upon his name. We did this for a long time. For concerning this kind of impiety, we also wrote certain things and they were already in the hands of readers, and yet the names of those about whom we had written were not yet made known to you. Some of them were here and some were corrected, for the salvation of whom, in the name and mercy of the Lord, we rejoice. For some of those corrected from that error urged us greatly that we also write letters concerning that error itself.

Augustine sends a letter to Pelagius. But now we have heard: the same person who is the chief and author of this pernicious teaching, they said was absolved in episcopal proceedings in the eastern regions and pronounced catholic. Therefore, he denied that the things objected to him were his own, and what others seemed to spread through his doctrine, he denied feeling, but also anathematized. The proceedings indeed have not yet reached us. Nevertheless, because we are accustomed to writing to him familiarly as a servant of God, just as last year, when my son, the presbyter Orosius, who is with us from Spain, a servant of God, went to the east with my letters, I wrote through the same Orosius to the same Pelagius, not marking him with my letters, but exhorting him to hear from the presbyter what I commanded. But the presbyter found the place where he was already very disturbed by his preachings and the dissensions of the brethren; hence he brought back letters to me from the much revered presbyter Jerome, for his age, sanctity, and erudition, known to all. This presbyter Jerome had already written a book against him on free will, which was also brought to us. However, as I said, he was absolved in church proceedings, confessing the grace of God which he seemed to deny and oppose by his disputations.

Augustine announces the deeds of Pelagius to the people.

Later, indeed, a few days ago, one of our citizens, Palatinus the deacon, the son of Gattus from Hippo — and many recognize both the name and more recognize the father; he is present; among the deacons he stands, he hears me, it is he — came to us from there. He brought me a certain brief book of Pelagius himself of what was being accused of him, not as part of the proceedings, but made and composed by him as a defense, just as he might also defend himself in the episcopal proceedings, which have not yet, as I said, been able to come into our hands. And he instructed the deacon to give me the same defense of his to read; yet he did not send me his letters. Hence I am anxious, lest he later deny that he sent even this which he did send. Therefore, I did not want to dispute anything from there until we read the proceedings, where ecclesiastical and episcopal authority seems to be contained. Why did I want to disclose this to your faith? Because I do not know what great disturbance has occurred in Jerusalem and has been reported to us full of sadness, saying that, even by popular tumult, two monasteries in Bethlehem are said to have been burned down. Which I would not need to tell you unless I knew it had already reached some of you. Therefore, it is better that you heard everything from me than that you were wounded by hidden rumors. The foundation of Pelagian doctrine is explained.

What therefore is the harm of this heresy, understand briefly, so that you may beware and, whoever you hear either whispering such things in secret or clamoring about them in open disputes, you do not conceal from us. For we fear that cancer may spread when it is spared, and suddenly we may find many such people, whom we can scarcely or never heal. Therefore, hear what harm this heresy has. That which I said a little before and commended to you, the grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord, this heresy attacks with its pestilential disputations. How, you ask? They say that human nature is able, that free will is so capable that, just as we became sinners by ourselves, so also we can be justified by ourselves. And whereas a just man is better than a man— for the name "man" is for nature, and the name "justice" is for happiness and blessedness — therefore, since a just man is better than any man, they say that God made the man, but the man made himself just, so that it seems the man gives himself more than God had given him. The Pelagians subvert the notion of grace.

Therefore, let your charity attend: through the malicious disputations of these people our prayers are attacked. For they act and dispute in such a way that we seem to pray without cause. Our Lord has taught us how to pray, lest perhaps we ask for carnal and temporal things in our prayers, such as to ask that your head not ache, that you may not die, that you may not carry out your son, that you may not suffer loss, that you may not be thrown into prison oppressed by someone, and if any other similar things are temporal and secular. These they allow us to pray for; what the Lord taught, they take away, not because they dare to deny it, but because they dispute in such a manner as to remove it. For when he says to you: "It is sufficient for you to do justice; if you will, you do; if you will, you do not; you have no need of God's help to fulfill what he commands, for the grace of God is not that which helps you not to sin, but that grace which made you with free will." Therefore, when they say such things, they speak of the grace of God by which we were made, which grace we also have in common with the pagans. For we were not created, and they were not created, nor did we proceed from the workshop of another artificer than they: we and they have one God as Author, one Creator, one Maker, who makes His sun to rise on the good and the bad, and rains on the just and the unjust. This, they say, is the grace of God; they do not wish to speak of the other, not by which we are also men with pagans, but by which we are Christians. You know which grace they deny, hear more evidently.

Paul in the struggle with the flesh seeks the help of God.

You know that Paul the Apostle placed our struggle with the flesh, so that we live piously and justly, the very contest in which we labor, before our eyes, saying: "I delight in the law of God according to the inner man. But I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind and making me captive to the law of sin - and death - which is in my members." In this difficulty he cried out and said: "Wretched man that I am! Who will deliver me from this body of death?" And it was as if the answer was: "The grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord." They do not deny him this grace, but they hear that you struggle with the flesh and the bad habit of your sins: "It is sufficient for you to conquer. Why do you ask for help? You can accomplish this by your own strength." But the Apostle succumbed. He confessed his weakness to obtain healing: "I see," he said, "another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind and making me captive to the law of sin." What good is it to me that the inner man delights in the law of God with my mind? Behold, I am fought against, behold, I am dragged, behold, I am crushed, behold, I am taken captive. See, as if looking up to God from great oppression, he cried out. If he had said: "Who will deliver me from this body of death, except my own strength?" he would be seen to have spoken proudly, but perhaps we would also understand this, because he could not say it except of God, to whom the psalm says: "I will love You, O Lord, my strength." Did he therefore say: "Who will deliver me, except my nature, except my will, except the powers of my choice and ability?" He did not say that. He humbled himself to be exalted: "The grace of God," he said, "through Jesus Christ our Lord." In the Lord's Prayer, we seek the grace of the delivering God. For this reason, the Lord has enjoined us what we should pray: Hallowed be - and what? - thy name. Is not the name of God holy? What is "hallowed," if not in us? Now you, if you can of your own free will and by the power of your own nature hallow the name of God within you, why do you pray, why do you ask from the highest majesty what you have in your power? What more? {(1.) Those two: Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors, and: Lead us not into temptation, when these are proposed, what do you think they reply? I shuddered, my brothers, when I heard. Indeed, I did not hear with my own ears, but my holy brother and fellow bishop, our Urbanus, who was a presbyter here and now is bishop of Sicca, when he had returned from the city of Rome and there was contending with someone holding such opinions, or was reporting that he had contended, he told me that he said this, when he was pressed by the weight of the Lord's prayer. For he was pressing him and saying: "If it is within our power not to sin and within our power to overcome all temptations of sins by our own wills alone, why do we say to God not to lead us into temptation?" What do you think he replied? "We ask," he says, "God not to lead us into temptation, lest we suffer any evil, which we do not have in our power: lest I fall from a horse and break a leg, lest a robber kills me, and anything of this sort. For these," he says, "I do not have in my power. For to overcome the temptations of my sins, if I am willing, I both can and am able, nor do I need the aid of God."

What is the temptation into which we ask not to be led?

(2.) You see, brothers, what a wicked heresy! You see how all of you shudder: beware lest you be seized! For I know the cunning and evasions of impious men averse to the truth and, because they have already fallen into their opinions, unwilling to be conquered. Look, I beseech you. For behold, he found something to say, therefore we say: Lead us not into temptation, lest something happen to us which we do not have in our power according to bodily temptation. Hence the Lord said: Watch and pray, lest you enter into temptation? Did He say this: Watch and pray, lest you break a foot, or lest your head ache, or lest you incur damage? He did not say this, but what did He say? What He said to Peter: I have prayed for you, that your faith may not fail. I have prayed, He says, for you. God says to man, the Lord to the servant, the teacher to the disciple, the doctor to the sick: I have prayed for you. What? That it might not fail. What? Your hand? your foot? your eye? your tongue, any paralysis, that is, the dissolution of your limbs? No, but that your faith may not fail. According to these we have in our power, that our faith may not fail. For doing good, the will of man alone is not sufficient.

(3.) Why is God entreated for us? That He may grant us what they say we ought not to ask from the eternal majesty, but to have in our power. Blessings, my brothers, the blessings which we bestow upon you, they nullify, empty, crush. You heard me, I believe, my brothers, when I say: “Turned to the Lord, let us bless His name. May He grant us to persevere in His commandments, to walk in the straight path of His instruction, to please Him in every good work, and such things.” “Certainly,” they say, “all this is established in our power.” Therefore, we wish such things upon you in vain. Let us defend ourselves and you, so that neither we bless in vain, nor you subscribe “Amen” in vain. My brothers, your “Amen” is your subscription, your “Amen” is your stipulation, your consent. Lest perhaps some of them condemn both us and you, let us defend ourselves with the Apostle Paul: let us see if he wished such things for his people as we pray over you. Listen to what he said in a certain place. I speak briefly. What do you say, O new heretic, whoever you are who hears me, if you are present? What do you say? “That we have the power not to sin, so that we can accomplish this without the help of divine grace.” Do you say this? “This,” he says. Therefore, do we have the power not to sin without the help of God? “Indeed,” he says, “our free will suffices for this.” Then what is it that the Apostle says writing to the Corinthians: But we pray to God that you may do no evil? You have attended, you have heard, you have received; and because it is most manifest, without doubt you have understood what the Apostle prayed. We pray, he says, to the Lord that you may do no evil. He could have said: We admonish you, that you may do no evil; we teach you, that you may do no evil; we command you, we instruct you. Which indeed, if he had said, he would have rightly said, because our will also does something; for our will does not act nothing, but by itself it does not suffice. Yet he preferred to say: We pray, so that he might commend grace, so that they might understand, when they do no evil, that they avoid evil not by their own will alone, but by fulfilling what is commanded with the help of God.

Recognize the will, recognize the grace!

(4.) Therefore, brothers, when something is commanded, acknowledge the choice of will; when what is commanded is prayed for, acknowledge the benefit of grace. For you have both in the Scriptures: it is both commanded and prayed for; what is commanded, that is prayed for. See what

I say. It is commanded that we understand. How is it commanded that we understand? Do not be like the horse and the mule, which have no understanding. You have heard that it was commanded: ask, that you may be able to fulfill what was commanded. "How," you ask, "do I ask?" Listen to the Scripture. What was commanded of you? Do not be like the horse and the mule, which have no understanding. Because it was commanded, you recognized the will. Hear that it is prayed for, to recognize grace. Give me understanding, that I may learn your commandments. It was commanded that we have wisdom. Since it was commanded, I read. "Where do you read?" he says. Listen: You foolish ones among the people, and you fools, at least become wise. Now what does he say? "Do you see how God commanded us to be wise?" Therefore wisdom is in our power? I have already said, I heard the command, I recognized the will: listen to the prayer, so that you may also recognize grace. It concerns wisdom, which was commanded to us. Let us hear what the apostle James says: But if any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who gives to all generously. Continence is commanded to us. Where is it commanded? The apostle to Timothy: Keep yourself pure. It is a command, a precept: it must be heard, it must be done. But unless God helps, we remain. We indeed try to do by will, and the will strives something. Power should not presume, unless weakness is helped. Certainly it was commanded: Keep yourself pure. Hear another place in Scripture: And when I knew, he says, that no one can be continent unless God gives it, and that this itself was wisdom, to know whose gift it was. "And what," he says, "did I do?" I approached the Lord and entreated Him. What is the need to run through many things, my brothers? Whatever is commanded to us, it should be prayed for that it may be fulfilled. But not in such a way that we dismiss ourselves and lie supine like lazy ones and say: "Let God rain food on our faces, so that we utterly do not wish to act at all"; and when the food has rained down upon our mouth, let us even say: "Let God swallow it for us." We too must do something, we must strive, we must endeavor and in that which we are able, give thanks; in that which we are not able, we must pray. When you give thanks, you avoid being condemned as ungrateful; but when you ask for what you do not yet have, you avoid being left empty, because you are hindered.

Augustine will disclose to the people if he discovers anything new about the error of Pelagius.

Think therefore on these things, my brothers: whoever comes to you and says to you, "What then shall we do? We have nothing in our power unless God gives everything. Therefore God will not crown us, but will crown Himself," you see already that he comes from that poisonous vein. It is a vein, but it has venom. For it has been struck by a serpent, it is not healthy. For this indeed is what Satan now daily strives to do, how through the poisons of heretics he drives out from the Church, just as then through the poison of the serpent he drove out from paradise. Let no one say that anyone is absolved from the bishops. It is an absolution, but confession itself is almost a correction, because the things which were said before the bishops seemed catholic; but what he wrote in his books, the bishops who absolved him did not know. And perhaps he has been corrected: for we ought not to despair of a man who perhaps chose to join himself to the catholic faith and fled to its grace and help. Perhaps this has been done: however, not the heresy is absolved, but the man denying the heresy. But when we shall have read the deeds, when they come into our hands, whatever more clearly we may know about this evil or perhaps about his correction, we ought to announce to your charity with the Lord's help.

Sermons - Sermon 348A

Sermon 348/A On the Heresy of Pelagianism, from a Sermon to the People The Pelagians try to distort the petitions of the Lord's Prayer.

Those two: Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors and: Lead us not into temptation, when they are objected to by the Pelagians, what do you think they respond? I shuddered, my brothers, when I heard. Indeed, I did not hear with my own ears, but my holy brother and fellow bishop Urbanus, who was a presbyter here and is now the bishop of Sicca, when he returned from the city of Rome and there contended with someone holding such views, or reported to have contended, when pressed by the weight of the Lord's Prayer - for he pressed him and said: - what do you think he responded? he said he said. The Pelagian heresy is refuted by the very words of Christ.

You see, brothers, how malignant heresy is. You see how all of you shudder. Beware, lest you be caught. For I know the cunning and evasions of impious men turned away from the truth, and since they have already fallen into their own opinions, they will not want to be conquered; see, I beseech you. For behold, they have found what to say, therefore we say: Lead us not into temptation, lest something happen to us which we have no control over according to bodily temptation. Therefore the Lord was saying: Watch and pray, that you enter not into temptation? Was he saying this: Watch and pray, lest you break a leg or lest your head ache or lest you incur a loss? He was not saying this. But what was he saying? What he said to Peter: I have prayed for you, that your faith may not fail. I have prayed, he says, for you, says God to man, the master to the servant, the doctor to the sick: I have prayed for you. What so that it may not fail? What? Your hand, your foot, your eye, your tongue, some paralysis, that is, disintegration of limbs? No, but that your faith may not fail. According to them, we have, in our power, that our faith may not fail.

Prayers are also offered which are of Christian custom, and a certain passage of Paul.

Why is God asked on our behalf to grant us what they say we should not seek from the eternal majesty, but have in our own power. Blessings, my brothers, the blessings we bestow upon you, they nullify, exhaust, and crush. You have heard me, I believe, my brothers, when I say: turned towards the Lord, let us bless his name, may he grant us to persevere in his commandments, to walk in the right way of his teaching, to please him in every good work, and other such things. Indeed, they say, all this is constituted in our power. Therefore, we wish such things to you in vain. Let us defend both ourselves and you, lest we bless without reason and you subscribe "amen" without reason. My brothers, your "amen" is your subscription, your agreement, your attestation. Lest some of them condemn both us and you, let us defend ourselves with the apostle Paul, let us see if he wished such things for his people - listen to what he said - such as we pray over you. Listen to what he said in a certain place. I speak of a brief matter. What do you say, O new heretic, whoever you are who hears me if you are present? What do you say? Do we have the power not to sin such that we can accomplish this without the help of divine grace? Do you say this? he says. Therefore, do we have the power not to sin without God's help? he says. What then is it that the Apostle says writing to the Corinthians? We pray to God that you do nothing evil. You have paid attention, you have heard, you have received, and because it is most evident, you have undoubtedly understood what the Apostle prayed. We pray, he says, to God that you do nothing evil. He could have said: We admonish you that you do nothing evil, we teach you that you do nothing evil, we command you, we instruct you. Which indeed, if he had said, he would certainly have said rightly, because our will also does something; for our will does not do nothing. It alone is not sufficient. He preferred, however, to say: We pray, so that he might commend grace itself, so that they might understand, that when they do nothing evil, they avoid evil not by their own will alone, but by fulfilling what is commanded with the help of God. The choice of will does not oppose the benefit of grace.

Therefore, brothers, when it is commanded, recognize the will's judgment, when what is commanded is prayed for, recognize the benefit of grace. For both are found in the Scriptures: both it is commanded and it is prayed for. What is commanded, this is prayed for. See what I say. It is commanded that we understand. How is it commanded that we understand? Do not be like the horse and mule, having no understanding. You heard that it was ordered; ask that you may be able to fulfill what was ordered. you ask. Listen to the Scripture. What was ordered to you? Do not be like the horse and mule, having no understanding. Since it was ordered, you recognized the will. Listen, since it is prayed for, that you may recognize grace: Give me understanding, that I may learn your commandments. It was ordered that we have wisdom: since it was ordered, I read. he says. Listen: You fools among the people, and you simple ones, understand wisdom. Now what does he say? See how God commands us to be wise. Therefore, is wisdom in our power? I have already said, I heard the command, I recognized the will. Listen to the prayer, that you may recognize grace. It is about wisdom, which was commanded to us. Let us hear what the apostle James says: If any of you lacks wisdom, let him ask of God, who gives to all generously. Continence is commanded to us. Where is it commanded? The apostle to Timothy: Keep yourself. It is a command, an instruction; it must be heard and done. But unless God helps, we remain. We indeed try to do by will and the will strives something; power should not presume, unless weakness is helped. Certainly, it was commanded: Keep yourself. Listen to another place in Scripture: And when I knew, he says, that no one can be continent, unless God grants it, and this itself was wisdom, to know whose gift this was. And what, he says, did I do? I went to the Lord and prayed. What need is there to run through many things, my brothers? Whatever is commanded to us, we must pray that it be fulfilled: but not so that we let ourselves be and lie back like the sick and say: Let God rain food upon our faces, that we may do nothing at all and, when the food has been showered upon our mouth, say: Also let God swallow for us. We also must do something. We must study, we must strive and in that which we could manage, give thanks, in that which we could not, pray. When you give thanks, beware lest you be condemned as ungrateful; but when you seek what you do not yet have, beware lest you remain empty, because you are hindered.

Concerning a certain objection of the Pelagians. The absolution of Pelagius does not absolve heresy.

Therefore, consider these things, my brothers: whoever comes to you and tells you, you already see, that he comes from that vein. It is a vein, but it has poison; for it has been struck by a serpent, it is not healthy. For this is what Satan does today, in the same way he ejects from the Church through the poison of heretics, just as he then ejected from paradise through the poison of the serpent. Let no one say that he is absolved by the bishops. He is absolved, but the confession itself is absolved as if it were correction, because what he said before the bishops seemed Catholic, but what he wrote in his books, the bishops who absolved him did not know. And perhaps he is corrected. For we should not despair of a man who perhaps preferred to join himself to the Catholic faith and fled to its grace and help. Perhaps this was done. Yet heresy is not absolved, but the man denying heresy.

Sermons - Sermon 349

SERMO 349 Concerning Charity, and the Blind Man Enlightened Love is either divine or human. Human love is either licit or illicit. The Apostle was speaking to us about charity a little while ago, when his Epistle was read: and he commended it to us in such a way that we might understand that all other things, however great gifts of God, profit nothing without it. But where it itself is, it cannot be alone. And so let us render a discourse on charity to your Charity. There is one kind of charity that is divine, another that is human: one human charity is lawful, another unlawful. And so concerning these three kinds of charity or loves (for it has two names among the Latins, which is called in Greek ■γ■πη): I will speak as the Lord shall grant. Therefore, this is my first distribution, that I said, one kind of charity is human, another divine: and I have distributed this human one into two, that one is lawful, the other unlawful. First, then, I shall speak of lawful human charity, which is not blamed: then of unlawful human charity, which is condemned: thirdly, of divine charity, which leads us to the kingdom.

Concerning permissible human charity.

Therefore, to briefly insinuate, human love is lawful, by which a wife is loved; unlawful, by which a prostitute or another man's wife is loved. For indeed, in the market and streets, lawful love is preferred more than a prostitute: in the house of God, in the temple of God, in the city of Christ, in the body of Christ, even the love of a prostitute leads the lover to hell. Therefore, have lawful love: it is human; but, as I said, it is lawful. Not only is it so lawful that it is permitted, but so lawful that if it is lacking, it is reprehended. Let it be lawful for you to love your spouses with human love, to love your children, to love your friends, and to love your fellow citizens. For all these names have a bond of necessity and a sort of glue of love. But you see that this love can also belong to the impious, that is, to Pagans, Jews, heretics. For who among them does not love his wife, children, brothers, neighbors, relatives, friends, etc.? This, therefore, is human. Therefore, if anyone is carried away with such cruelty that he even loses human affection of love and does not love his own children and does not love his wife; neither is he to be numbered among men. For it is not praiseworthy to love one's own children; but he who does not love his children is to be condemned. For even the wild animals love their children: aspics love their children, tigers love their children, lions love their children. For there is no beast which does not sweetly murmur to its own children. For when it frightens men, it cherishes the little ones. The lion roars in the forests so that no one may pass: it enters into the cave where it has its own children, it lays aside all ferocity. It leaves it outside when it itself does not enter. Therefore, he who does not love his children is worse than a lion. These things are human, and they are lawful. On illicit love.

Avoid illicit love. You are members of Christ, and you are the body of Christ. Listen to the Apostle and be terrified. For he could not have spoken more gravely, he could not have warned Christians more vehemently or sharply against the love of fornications, except where he said: "Shall I then take the members of Christ and make them members of a harlot?" But to say this, he previously said: "Do you not know that he who is joined to a harlot becomes one body with her?" And he gave testimony from Scripture, which is written: "The two shall become one flesh." For this is divinely stated: but it is about a man and his wife where it is permitted, where it is granted, where it is honorable; not where it is shameful, not where it is illicit, not where it is by every reason condemnable. Just as one flesh is made in the legitimate mingling of a man and his wife: so one flesh is made in the illicit mingling of a harlot and a lover. Therefore, when one flesh is made, let that terrify you, let that horrify you that he added: "Shall I then take the members of Christ." Remember the members of Christ, Christian: do not make Christ's members belong to another, consider the members of Christ within you, who was bought with the blood of Christ. "Shall I then take the members of Christ and make them members of a harlot?" Whoever does not fear this, fears God.

Divine love does not endure unlawful affection.

Absolutely, absolutely I beseech you, my brothers: behold, let us suppose, though it is not so, that God had promised impunity to such and said: "I will have mercy on those who do such things, I will not condemn them." Let us suppose God said this. Even with the promise of impunity, does anyone take the members of Christ and make them now the members of a prostitute? He does not, if there is there the third divine love. For indeed I have mentioned three loves: of the three I promised to speak, as the Lord grants, about human permissible love, human illicit love, and that excellent and divine love. Let us question divine love and set before it two human loves, and say to it: Behold, permissible human love, whereby a wife is loved, and daughters and other secular relations: behold another illicit one, whereby a prostitute is loved, a foreign servant is loved, another's unbetrothed daughter is loved, another's wife is loved. Two loves are before you; with which of these do you wish to remain? He who chooses to remain with that permissible human one, does not remain with that illicit human one. No one says to themselves: I have both. If you have both by admitting the love of a prostitute to yourself, you wrong the divine love, like the matron who dwells within you. For I think that if you are a married man and you love a prostitute, you do not bring the prostitute into your home to dwell with your matron. You do not go that far. You seek darkness, you seek hiding places, you do not profess the disgrace. But even those who do not have wives, and are lovers of prostitutes more freely (for this reason I said: "more freely," because they too are condemned if they are already faithful); I think that even a young man not yet having a wife, if he loves a prostitute, does not make her dwell with his sister, does not make her dwell with his mother, lest he wrong human chastity, lest he offend the honor of his blood. If, therefore, you do not make the prostitute you love dwell with your mother, with your sister, lest, as I said, you offend the honor of your blood; do you make the love of the prostitute dwell in your heart with the love of God and offend the honor of the blood of Christ?

Just as the blind pray to God with love for light, so should we also beseech God.

Love God, you will find nothing better. You love silver because it is better than iron and bronze: you love gold more because it is better than silver: you love precious stones more because they surpass even the value of gold: you love finally this light, which everyone fears to leave who fears death; you love, I say, this light, just as he desired it with a certain great love, who cried out after Jesus: Have mercy on me, son of David. The blind man cried out while Christ was passing by. For he feared lest He would pass by and not heal him. And how much did he cry out? So much that he did not become silent even with the crowd preventing him. He conquered the adversary, he clung to the Savior. With the crowd shouting and forbidding him to cry out, Jesus stood still, called him, and said to him: What do you want me to do for you? Lord, he said, that I may see. Look, your faith has made you well. Love Christ; desire the light, which is Christ. If that man desired the light for his body, how much more should you desire the light of your heart? Let us cry out to Him, not with voices, but with manners. Let us live rightly, let us despise the world; let all that passes be nothing to us. People will reprimand us when we live in this way, as if our lovers are worldly people, loving the earth, savoring the dust, deriving nothing from heaven, snatching up free breezes by heart and mind: they will undoubtedly reprimand us and say, if they see us despise these human, earthly things: What are you suffering? why are you going insane? That crowd is contradicting, so that the blind man does not cry out. And there are some Christians who prevent living as a Christian: for even that crowd walked with Christ, and prohibited the shouting man desiring Christ and the light from the benefit of Christ Himself. Such are these Christians: but let us conquer them, let us live rightly; and let our very life be our voice to Christ. He will stop: because He stands. The passage of Christ. For there also is a great mystery. He was passing by when he cried out; when he healed, he stood still. The passing of Christ should make us eager to cry out. What is the passing of Christ? Whatever He endured for us temporally is His passing. He was born, He passed: is He still being born? He grew, He passed: is He still growing? He nursed: is He still nursing? Tired, He slept: is He still sleeping? He ate and drank: is He still doing this? Finally, He was seized, bound, beaten, crowned with thorns, struck with slaps, covered with spittle, hung on the wood, killed, pierced with a lance, buried, resurrected: He still passes. He ascended into heaven, sits at the right hand of the Father: He stood still. Cry out as much as you can: now He enlightens you. For even in that very thing that the Word was with God, indeed He stood, because He was not changed. And the Word was God: and the Word was made flesh. The flesh through passing did many things and suffered: the Word stood still. By the Word, the heart is enlightened; because by the Word, the flesh which He assumed is honored. Take away the Word, what is the flesh? It is the same as yours. But the flesh of Christ is honored that the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us. Let us therefore cry out and live well.

Parents should be loved, but Christ more.

Love your children, love your spouses, even if secularly. For you ought to love according to Christ, so that you may look after them according to God, and in them love nothing but Christ, and despise in your own those who do not wish to have Christ. For this indeed is that divine charity. For what will your transient and mortal love profit them? However, when you love humanly, love Christ more. I do not say that you should not love your wife; but love Christ more. I do not say that you should not love your father, I do not say that you should not love your children; but love Christ more. Hear Him saying, do not think these are my words: Whoever loves father or mother more than me is not worthy of me. When you hear: Is not worthy of me, are you not afraid? Of whom does Christ say: Is not worthy of me, is not with him: if he is not with him, where will he be? If you do not love to be with him, fear to be without him. Why fear to be without him? Because you will be with the devil, if you are not with Christ. And where will the devil be? Hear Christ himself: Depart into the eternal fire, which is prepared for the devil and his angels. If you are not kindled by the fire of heaven, fear the fire of hell. If you do not love to be among the Angels of God, fear to be among the angels of the devil. If you do not love to be in the kingdom, fear to be in the furnace of burning, unquenchable, eternal fire. Let fear conquer you first, and there will be love. Let fear be a teacher, not to remain in you, but to lead you to charity, as to a master.

Sermons - Sermon 35

SERMO 35

ABOUT WHAT IS WRITTEN IN THE PROVERBS OF SOLOMON:

"If you will be wise, you will be so for yourself and for your neighbors." But if you turn out to be evil, you alone will suffer bad things. The good life of a neighbor brings joy, the perverse life brings sorrow.

If divine words are not heard negligently, perhaps not unreasonably, that which is written may strike: Son, if you are wise, you will be wise for yourself and for your neighbors; but if you become evil, you alone will bear the evils. For how can this rightly be understood? Since just as the good life of a neighbor delights us, so also does the perverse sadden us. Or if this is thought to be said because of persuasion, because the wise are both for themselves and for those they persuade in wisdom, in what way, if they become evil, will they alone bear the evils, when it is said concerning such persuasions: Bad company corrupts good morals? For what else does that voice of charity proclaim: If one member is glorified, all the members rejoice; and if one member suffers, all the members suffer with it? How then is it true: Son, if you are wise, you will be wise for yourself and for your neighbors; but if you become evil, you alone will bear the evils? How will I rejoice in his good, whose evil will not cause me sorrow? How will I delight in the one found who can be lost securely by me? Surely if he is wise, he will be a healthy member, in whom the other members will rejoice? How then will an evil person alone bear the evils, when similarly the other members will sympathize with the sick member? On the true love of one's neighbor.

Therefore, unless this question is resolved, it will disturb. However, with the help of the Lord, it will be resolved if we first hold firmly, fixed, and immovable to the most certain truth—that neither can anyone be good by another's good, nor evil by another's evil. For the Apostle says: Each one of us shall bear his own burden. And elsewhere: Therefore each one of us will give an account of himself to God. And again: Let each one test his own work, and then his reason to boast will be in himself alone and not in another. This is also stated through the prophet Ezekiel: The soul of the father is mine, and the soul of the son is mine; the soul that sins, it shall die. He explains this whole passage in such a way as to show that bad children are not helped by the good of their parents, nor are the good ones oppressed by the bad. With this most truthful sentence firmly and primarily established for our sake, it remains to consider what duty we bestow on others, diligently distinguishing what effect we strive for our own salvation and what affection we show to our neighbors. If you are good, you are certainly not good by another's good, but by your own good. Nevertheless, by that very good whereby you are good, you also rejoice in another's good, not from borrowed goodness, but from shared love. Likewise, if you are evil, you are not evil by another's evil, but by your own. By the same your evil, you do not love your neighbor as yourself. Indeed, you do not even love yourself. For you love iniquity, your fiercest enemy, not directed at you from outside, but made by you inwardly for yourself. To conquer you more easily, you favor it against yourself. Thus, you are evidently convinced that you hate yourself when you love that by which you are disgracefully conquered. Indeed, the divine word would not deceive, where it is said: He who loves iniquity hates his own soul.

We ought to hate evil, to love good.

Hence it is that a good person, through the goodness by which they are good, rejoices in another's goodness and grieves for another's evil. And thus, by using such a neighbor—since he is truly called a neighbor who watches over you closely, that is, looks upon you mercifully—if you are wise, you will be both to yourself and to him. Not because he will be good through your goodness, but because by his own goodness he will be a lover of your goodness. But if he is evil, you will have escaped; you will suffer evil not with him but alone. For he will not suffer greater evil through your evil, but he will be merciful in your sorrow. Your malice grieves him, but his own punishment does not follow. It brings him sadness but does not share injustice with him. Therefore, the evil person will suffer evil alone, not alongside the good of his neighbor, because the sadness that a good person feels for you is due to his own goodness and your evil. That sadness of his indicates his love and your destruction. It condemns you and crowns him; it depresses you and raises him. Hence it is also written: Be obedient to your leaders, for they keep watch over your souls as those who will give an account, so that they do this with joy and not with grief; for that would be unprofitable for you. Therefore, it is not profitable for you to be burdened by their grief. For it is fitting for them to grieve over your injustice. Therefore, deem good people as neighbors, and be good for your own good, not theirs, and this goodness is not given by you to yourself, but imparted by divine grace. For what do you have that you did not receive? And thus, if you are wise, you will be wise to yourself and to your neighbors, for whom it is good to be nourished by your goodness. But if you become evil, you will suffer evil alone; it will not be for those for whom it is good to be grieved by your malice.

Sermons - Sermon 350

SERMO 350

ABOUT CHARITY Charity as a new commandment making a new man. The multiple abundance of the Divine Scriptures and the very broad doctrine, my brothers, is comprehended without any error, and preserved without any labor, by him whose heart is full of love, as the Apostle says: "The fullness of the law is love;" and in another place: "The aim of our charge is love that issues from a pure heart and a good conscience and a sincere faith." What, indeed, is the aim of our charge, but the fulfillment of the commandment? And what is the fulfillment of the commandment, but the fullness of the law? Therefore, what he said there: "The fullness of the law is love," he also said here: "The aim of our charge is love." Nor can it be doubted in any way that the temple of God is man, in whom love dwells. And John also says: "God is love." Hence, these Apostles, commending to us the excellence of love, could speak nothing else but what they had consumed. For the Lord himself, feeding them with the word of truth, the word of love, which is himself the living bread that came down from heaven, said, "A new commandment I give to you, that you love one another." And again: "By this all people will know that you are my disciples, if you have love for one another." For He who came to destroy the old corruption of the flesh by the derision of the cross, and to dissolve the old bond of our death by the newness of His death, made a new man by giving a new commandment. For it was an old matter that man should die. So that this would not always prevail in man, it was made a new matter that God should die. But because he died in the flesh, not in the divinity, by the eternal life of the divinity, he did not permit the eternal destruction of the flesh. Therefore, as the Apostle says: "He was delivered up for our trespasses and raised for our justification." He who brought the newness of life against the old death, himself opposed the new commandment against the old sin. Therefore, if you wish to extinguish the old sin, extinguish covetousness by the new commandment, and embrace love. For just as the root of all evils is covetousness, so the root of all good things is love. The entire doctrine of the Scriptures is possessed by love.

Charity, by which we love God and our neighbor, securely encompasses the entirety and breadth of the divine words. For one heavenly Teacher instructs us and says: You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind: and you shall love your neighbor as yourself. On these two commandments depend all the Law and the Prophets. Therefore, if there is not time to scrutinize all the holy pages, unravel all the coverings of the words, and penetrate all the secrets of the Scriptures; hold onto charity, where everything depends: thus you will hold what you have learned there; you will also hold what you have not yet learned. For if you know charity, you know something from which that also depends which perhaps you do not know: and in what you understand in the Scriptures, charity is evident; in what you do not understand, charity is concealed. Therefore, he holds both what is evident and what is concealed in the divine words, who holds charity in his conduct.

Praise of charity.

Wherefore, brethren, pursue love, the sweet and healthful bond of minds, without which the rich man is poor, and with which the poor man is rich. This endures adversities, moderates prosperity; in harsh sufferings it is strong, in good works cheerful; in temptation most secure, in hospitality most generous; most joyful among genuine brothers, most patient among false ones. It is pleasing in Abel through sacrifice, secure in Noah through the flood, most faithful in Abraham's wanderings, most gentle in Moses amidst injuries, most meek in David's tribulations. It awaits with innocent patience the gentle fires in the three youths, and strongly endures the fierce fires in the Maccabees. It is chaste in Susanna towards her husband, in Anna after her husband, in Mary besides her husband. It is free in Paul to rebuke, humble in Peter to obey: humane in Christians to confess, divine in Christ to forgive. But what greater or more abundant thing can I say about love than the praises that the Lord thunders forth through the mouth of the Apostle, showing and saying: "If I speak in the tongues of men and of angels, but have not love, I am a sounding brass or a clanging cymbal. And if I have prophecy, and understand all mysteries and all knowledge, and if I have all faith, so as to remove mountains, but have not love, I am nothing. And if I give away all my possessions, and if I deliver up my body to be burned, but have not love, I gain nothing. Love is patient and kind; love is not jealous or boastful; it is not arrogant or rude. It does not insist on its own way; it is not irritable or resentful; it does not rejoice at wrongdoing, but rejoices with the truth. It bears all things, believes all things, hopes all things, endures all things. Love never ends." How great is this! The soul of letters, the strength of prophecy, the salvation of sacraments, the foundation of knowledge, the fruit of faith, the wealth of the poor, the life of the dying. What is so magnanimous as to die for the ungodly? What so kind as to love enemies? It alone is not oppressed by another's happiness, for it is not jealous. It alone is not exalted by its own happiness, for it is not arrogant. It alone is not pricked by an evil conscience, for it does not act improperly. It is secure amidst insults, beneficent amid hatred; calm amid wrath, innocent amid plots; groaning amid iniquities, breathing out in truth. What is stronger than it, not to return but to disregard injuries? What more faithful, not to vanity but to eternity? For this reason it endures all things in the present life, because it believes all things about the future life; and it endures all things sent here, because it hopes for all things promised there: rightly, it never ends. Therefore, pursue love, and thinking sacredly of it, bring forth the fruits of righteousness. And whatever more abundant thing you may find in its praises than I could say, let it appear in your manners. For it is fitting that a speech of an elder be not only grave but also brief.

Sermons - Sermon 350A

SERMON 350/A

Let the earth now ring with joy, enlightened with these brilliant lamps, adorned with the glowing brightness of the rising King. And let the realms of Hell tremble, amazed at the heavenly Majesty.

Rejoice, O Mother Church, clothed in the brightness of such a light. Let this temple resound with loud praises of the people.

Therefore, dearly beloved brethren, who have gathered here in the resplendent clarity of this holy light, join with me, I implore you, in invoking the Lord's mercy. That He who has deigned to call me amongst the number of the Levites, without any merit of mine, will pour upon me the brightness of His light. That I may perfect the praise of this candle which we have offered in its solemn oblation. For this is indeed that night in which, once you led forth our forefathers, the children of Israel, out of Egypt, you made them pass dry-shod through the Red Sea. This is the night which banished the darkness of sins by the light of the fiery pillar. This is the night in which all over the world today, those who believe in Christ, freed from the vices of the world, and the darkness of sin, are restored to grace and grow together in holiness.

It begins: On Charity and on Loving God Alone All Scripture echoes love. Love renews people.

We are not unaware that the hearts of your charity are well-fed daily by the exhortations of divine readings and the nourishment of the word of God; yet, because of the desire by which we are kindled towards each other, it is necessary to speak something to your charity. What else but about charity itself? For it is this: if anyone wishes to speak about it, he does not choose a reading to be recited so that there is an occasion for speaking about charity; for every page, whatever is opened, sounds this out. The Lord Himself is a witness to this matter, and we are reminded from the Gospel that when He was asked, which were the greatest commandments in the law, He replied: You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind, and you shall love your neighbor as yourself. And so you would not seek anything else in the holy pages, He added and said: On these two commandments hang all the Law and the Prophets. If all the Law and the Prophets depend on these two commandments, how much more the Gospel? For charity renews man: for as greed makes man old, so charity makes him new. Hence, groaning in the conflict of greed, he says: I have grown old among all my enemies. But that charity pertains to the new man, the Lord Himself signifies in this way: A new commandment I give to you, that you love one another. Therefore, if the Law and the Prophets depend on charity, since in the Law and the Prophets the old covenant seems to be commended, how much more the Gospel, which is most manifestly called the new covenant, pertains only to charity, when the Lord Himself did not give His commandment except that you love one another? And He called this commandment new, and it came for our renewal, and made us new men, and promised a new and eternal inheritance. The Old Testament and charity. For if you happen to think how the Old Testament is called the Law, and yet depends on charity, since charity renews a person and pertains to the new person, this is the reason. The Old Testament is presented because the promise is earthly, and the Lord promises an earthly kingdom to those worshipping Him there. But there also existed then lovers of God, who would love Him freely and purify their hearts with chaste longing for Him; who, having removed the coverings of the old promises, attained to the prefiguration of the future New Testament, and comprehended that all those things in the Old Testament, which are either commandments or promises according to the old person, are figures of the New Testament, which the Lord was going to fulfill in the latest times, as the Apostle openly says: “But these things happened to them as a figure; and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world have come.” Thus the New Testament was secretly foretold, and it was foretold by those old figures. However, when the time of the New Testament came, the New Testament began to be openly preached, and those figures to be explained and expounded, as it would be understood there how the new was promised where the old was promised. Therefore, Moses was the proclaimer of the Old Testament; but he who was the proclaimer of the old, was the understander of the new: to the carnal people he proclaimed the old, himself spiritually understood the new. The Apostles, however, were proclaimers and ministers of the New Testament, not because something was not there then, which was later to be revealed through the Apostles. Therefore, charity there, charity here: but there charity more hidden, more apparent fear; here, however, more manifest charity, less fear. For as charity increases, so much does fear decrease. Since as charity grows, the soul becomes secure; where there is full security, there is no fear, as the Apostle John even says: “Perfect love casts out fear.” From Psalm 36. The wicked and the good with different fates in the world. The hidden root of love is Christ in the heart.

Therefore, speaking about this love with your holiness, because, as I said, whatever page of the Lord was read, it would remind us of nothing else but this very love, we also took occasion from the present psalm. See if the divine words do anything else but make us love: see if they do anything else but ignite us, make us burn, make us desire, make us sigh, make us long, until we arrive. For men laboring on earth and set amid great temptations, often with a mortal heart and weak thought considering how here the wicked seem frequently to prevail according to time and to be proud in fleeting happiness - this thought is accustomed to tempt the servants of God, as if they worship God in vain, if they see that they lack what they see the impious to abound in - so then to men thus set, the Holy Spirit foreseeing this temptation of ours and changing our love, lest impious and wicked men seem to us worthier of imitation the more we see them happy according to the world, with love of such things as those with which they swell in abundance, says: Do not emulate the evildoers - this is the beginning of the psalm - nor be jealous of those who work iniquity; for like the grass they shall soon wither, and like the green herbs they shall soon fall. Does not the grass bloom at some time? But it blooms for a little while, soon will come the withering of its bloom; and to make it bloom, cold air helps. As if the warm air will be the coming of the year of the Lord Jesus Christ; as if this time is cold air: but let us be careful lest in the cold air of this year our love grows cold. Our honor has not appeared yet: it is cold on the surface, let there be heat in the root. For thus the trees in summer flourish, and are beautiful, and fruitful, which during winter seemed dry. Is all that you see in branches in summer this in winter? It was, but it was hidden in the root. Therefore our honor, which is promised to us, is not yet: let our summer come: it is not yet, it is hidden. Better we say, it does not appear, than, it is not yet; for the Apostle speaks openly: For you are dead. As if speaking to trees during winter. But that you may know that the surface seemed dead, the inward parts lived indeed, he immediately added, and said: And your life is hidden with Christ in God. We seem to dwell on this earth: consider where we have fixed our root. The root of our love is with Christ, in God: there is the wealth of our honor; but it does not appear now yet.

Lovers of the world and lovers of God, how do they consider life? But what follows he says? When Christ, your life, appears, then you too will appear with him in glory. So now is the time for sighing, then for rejoicing: now for longing, then for embracing: what we now long for is not present; but let us not falter in longing, let long longing train us, because he who promised does not deceive us. We do not say, brothers, let no one grow cold: let no one even grow lukewarm. And if the lovers of the world mock those serving God: “Behold what we have and what we enjoy: where is your happiness?” You do not have what you see, but you have what you believe: but those do not believe to whom it is not shown; rejoice, because you have believed: you will rejoice more when you see. And if you sigh because you cannot show it now, the sigh of your pain will profit for salvation, but also for eternal glory. There is nothing that they show us as great: their present happiness is apparent, ours is future; but we truly say, because neither is theirs present nor will it be future: because they love a false present, they will not come to a true future. But if they neglect the false present, and discover what to do with what they have, and they know what they acquire from it: let them hear the advice of the blessed Apostle, which he ordered to be commanded to the rich by Timothy. For he says: Command the rich of this world not to be proud, nor to trust in the uncertainty of riches, but in the living God, who richly provides us with everything for our enjoyment. They should be rich in good works, generous and ready to share, thus laying up for themselves a good foundation for the future, so that they may take hold of the life that is truly life. If therefore, brothers, the Apostle turned those who seemed to themselves happy in present things away from earthly attention, and directed them to heaven: he did not want them to rejoice in present things, but to hope for future things; if the Apostle says this to those having such things, how much more should he stretch his whole heart to what is future, who has decided to have nothing on this earth? But nothing excessive, nothing heavy, nothing that binds, nothing that hinders. For it is more truly fulfilled even at this time in the servants of God, as having nothing, yet possessing everything. What you call yours is not yours, and everything will be yours: if you cling to a part, you lose the whole; for as much as would suffice you from riches, so much suffices from poverty.

Sermons - Sermon 350B

Sermon 350/B SERMON ON ALMSGIVING What you do with a beggar, God does with you. Interest with God. A rich beggar.

Rich and poor, he says, met each other on the way; and the creator of both is the Lord. As it is written, brothers, the rich and the poor met each other on the way. On what way if not in this life? Behold, rich man, you can be relieved of your burdens by giving to the poor what you have acquired through labors. Give something to the one who does not have, because you yourself also do not have anything. For do you have eternal life? Therefore, give from what you have, so that you may receive what you do not have. The beggar knocks on your door, and you also knock on the door of your Lord. God does with His beggar what you do with yours. Therefore, give and it will be given to you, but if you do not wish, it is up to you. For the poor man cries out and says to you: you are to be handed over to consuming fire and flames. I do not know whether the pride of the rich can respond to these words of the poor. The Lord says, "Give to everyone who asks of you." If to everyone, how much more to the needy and miserable, whose leanness and pallor beg, whose silent tongue, filthiness, and groaning ask for alms. Therefore, listen to me, rich man, and let my advice please you. Redeem your sins with alms. Do not cling to gold; you left the womb of your mother naked, you will return naked to the earth. And if you will return naked to the earth, for whom are you gathering above the earth? I believe, if you could carry anything with you, you would have swallowed up living men. Behold, you will depart naked; why do you not give away the money you have gathered either well or badly? Promise, as you are wonderful, make the inflations of most wonderful things, so that you may reach the kingdom of heaven. For if you gave ten shillings to any man, for which he would later return three hundred, how much would you rejoice, how much joy of the spirit would you exalt. If therefore you rejoice in usury, lend to your God. Give to your Lord from His own, for He will return to you with much increased interest. Do you wish to know how much more He will return to you? For a morsel, for a coin, for a tunic you will receive eternal life, the kingdom of heaven, endless blessedness. Weigh eternal life against your morsel, everlasting riches. There is no comparison. Give the earth, and you will receive Him who made heaven and earth; for He is indeed our reward, without whom the rich man begs and with whom the poor man is abundantly rich. For what does the rich man have if he does not have God? What does the poor man not have if he has God? Therefore, brothers, just as a watchman in the people saying and urging you, I free myself, I strip myself, I fulfill my duty. There is one who will seek and examine your work. Behold, you have groaned. Therefore, you are now ready to give alms. Thanks be to God. The Lord is able, who has given you the understanding to give the fruit of alms.

Sermons - Sermon 350C

SERMO 350/C On the 23rd lesson of the season of Christmas.

Wishing you peace, brothers, in the name of the Lord, in whom and through whom our good will is renewed. For He prevails, our advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous; He is our propitiation, who offers Himself for us and intercedes for us. As therefore we have heard the holy Gospel, let us consider what we have celebrated, so that our souls may be kindled unto God. For today the blessed martyr Bishop Stephen is to be honored, who first among all combatants carried the standard of righteousness and courageously overcame the enemy, following in the footsteps of his Master and Lord. Therefore, beloved, we must understand that the same day is both noble and sacred, on which His Majesty has chosen to unite the birth of the King with the passion of the soldier. This day's glory surpasses the rest, since it honors in double celebration the birth of Christ and the victory of Stephen. When the holy martyrs emulate their King by conquering for righteousness, let us celebrate such heroes with worthy reverence, for it is right that we should make our offerings of prayers for those having left a glorious example for us to follow. So, brethren, let us be encouraged by their triumphs and fortified by their intercessions, that we may obtain assistance of even greater merit. Let us cling to Christ with our whole affection, joining with the faithful martyrs who have gone before us, that by following their example and supported by their prayers, we may attain the same reward.

Amen.

SERMON ON ALMSGIVING Give from what you have, so that you may receive what you do not have.

O man, fragile in body, changeable in time, dissolvable in death, burdened with honors, wearied with anxieties, listen to my advice: Relieve yourself by giving to the poor what you have acquired through your labors; give something to the one who has nothing, for you yourself have nothing, for you never possess eternal life; therefore give from what you have, so that you may receive what you do not have. A beggar knocks on your door; you knock on the door of your Lord. God does with His beggar as you do with yours; therefore give, and it will be given to you. If you refuse, it is your choice. For the poor man cries out and says to you: "I ask for bread and you do not give; you ask for life and do not receive; let us see which of us suffers the greater loss, I who am deprived of a morsel, or you who are deprived of eternal life; I who am chastised in the belly, or you in the mind; after all, I who burn with hunger, or you who are to be burned with fire and flames forever?" I do not know whether the pride of the rich man can respond to these words of the poor man. The Lord says to give to everyone who asks of you. If to everyone, how much more to the needy and miserable, whose emaciation and pallor beg, whose tongue is silent, whose squalor and groans request alms.

Weigh eternal life with your little morsel.

Listen to me, O rich man, and let my counsel please you: redeem your sins with alms, do not depend on gold; naked you came out of your mother's womb, naked you will return to the earth; and if you will return naked to the earth, for whom do you amass it on the earth? I believe if you could take anything with you, you would have swallowed men alive. Behold, you will return naked, why do you not distribute the money gathered either well or poorly? Send forth where you are going, make transfers of perishable things, so that you may reach the kingdom of heaven. For if you gave a man ten coins, for which he would later return a hundred to you, how much would you rejoice, how much joy of soul would you exult in! If you rejoice in such exchanges, lend to your Lord, give to your God from what is His own; for He will repay you with multiplied interest. Do you want to know how abundantly He will repay you? For a piece of bread, for a coin, for a tunic, you receive eternal life, the kingdom of heaven, endless bliss. Weigh eternal life, everlasting riches, against your piece of bread—there is no comparison; for you give the earth and receive Him who made heaven and earth. For He is indeed our reward, without whom the rich man begs, and with whom the poor man is most abundantly rich. For what does the rich man have, if he does not have God? What does the poor man not have, if he has God?

Sermons - Sermon 350D

(ErfurtSermon 350/D Sermon of Saint Augustine Bishop On the alms of spiritual things The fruit of faith is to do good to the needy. The fruit of faith is to do good to the needy, because it is fruitless faith to believe in God while neglecting works of mercy. For just as a barren tree is cultivated in vain, a hard flint is wetted in vain, the dryness of sand is ploughed in vain, so it is of no benefit to a person to not deny what is true, who does not wish to provide what is good. Deservedly it is written that faith without works is dead in itself, from which also such people are compared to demons; for to some boasting of faith and devoid of good works the apostle James speaks thus: You believe that there is one God; you do well. Even the demons believe and tremble, so that it seems there is no difference between the fear of a suffering demon and the grace of a faithful person, except that the former's deeds are evil while the latter's are good, since both proceed from the same belief, just as from the same water both the horror of thorns and the fruit of grapes arise.

Whatever man does in his life, it is nothing but a work of mercy.

Mercy, moreover, is first of a faithful man toward himself; this is commanded by scripture saying: Have mercy on your soul pleasing God. Thence it extends to the neighbor by growing so that the commandment may be fulfilled: You shall love your neighbor as yourself. Therefore, true mercy which is bestowed upon the neighbor is to be bestowed for this reason, that he may also please God: he must be called to this, exhorted to this, taught and instructed in this. For even those alms which are given for bodily necessities and temporal life are to be done with the intention and mind that those on whom they are bestowed may love God by whose gift they are given. The Lord also admonishes this saying: Let your good works shine before men, that they may see your good deeds and glorify your Father who is in heaven. Therefore, a man of God, a vessel sanctified in honor, useful to the Lord, prepared for every good work, whatever he does in his life, is nothing but a work of mercy, whether toward himself or toward the neighbor. And toward himself indeed he is merciful, as we have mentioned above, when he pleases God; he pleases God, when in that which he does well God is pleased, and in that which he suffers evil God is not displeased. For the apostle also when speaking of his good works had said: I have labored more than all of them, immediately adds: Yet not I, but the grace of God with me, and Job in his temptation and tribulation says: As it has pleased the Lord, so it has been done. Blessed be the name of the Lord. But he is merciful toward his neighbor, when he does his utmost, so that even he may similarly enjoy the sweetness of pleasing God.

Spiritual and corporal works of mercy.

I had intended to speak about works of mercy, from which I might now seem to some to have strayed from my purpose and gone elsewhere, because I do not say, "Break your bread to the hungry, bring the poor and homeless into your house, when you see the naked, cover him," and so forth. These are in fact rightly considered and called alms, as if these alone pertain to works of mercy. They do pertain, indeed, but not solely, so much so that they are the least, unless perhaps people are so foolish as to think that those who provided material needs to the apostles were more merciful than the apostles themselves, who were sowing spiritual things. Let it not be thought by anyone who listens intelligently to the apostle saying: "If we have sown spiritual things for you, is it too much if we reap your material things?" In sowing spiritual things, see what kind of giver appears where he says: "Being so desirous of you, we were pleased to impart to you not only the gospel of God, but also our own souls," and elsewhere: "I most gladly will spend and be spent for your souls." Compare now the one who breaks his bread to the hungry with the one who imparts his soul to the believer, compare the one who spends gold for the temporal life of the poor with the one who spends himself for the eternal life of his brother: if he is rightly merciful and is said and considered to be so who brings a stranger in need of shelter into his house, provides satisfaction with a table, rest with a bed, how much more merciful is he found who recalls and brings back the one wandering through the ways of iniquity, introduces him into the house of God, incorporates him into the members of Christ, where he is restored by the refreshment of justice, made secure by the remission of sins! But perhaps this is to do mercy to oneself, but to do cruelty to another?

However, these works of mercy, by which it is made so that one pleases God, are placed by the true law of wisdom above those works by which necessary sustenance is provided to carnal need, so that often while those are performed more prudently, these are more mercifully withheld. For firstly, a man merciful towards himself, mindful of the divine command which says, “Take pity on your soul, pleasing God,” often fasts so that he may please God, and when he is ordered to love his neighbor as himself, he provides bread to a hungry neighbor, denying it to himself, thus punishing his own body and bringing it into subjection, lest perhaps, while preaching to others, he himself may be found reprobate. But perhaps this act in himself is mercy, in another, however, is cruelty? What then? When food is often not provided to hungry little ones by parents, whether for reasons of health or the severity of discipline or for the purpose of observing a fast for great humiliation rendered by all, were not the parents then more merciful to their children, unless perhaps the Ninevites, believing in God and converting to God, not only feared Him threatening but also hoped for Him showing mercy, and observed the fast decreed by the command of the king with such humility that they even withheld the beasts from pasture and water, were cruel to their little ones whom that entire multitude contained, which had not even left out the mute animals? Surely how many, because of their age, did not know what was being done and cried out demanding food, were denied it, so that even from this the greater tears afflicted the spirits of the elders more heavily and pressing them down in humility, they poured out to the Lord a groan and prayer squeezed out by this pressure, obtaining salvation not only for themselves, who fasted willingly, but also for their little ones whom they compelled! Indeed, there was not only no cruelty of fathers or mothers towards the children, but rather great mercy; which nonetheless did not break bread for the hungry but also withheld it from the crying. Finally, what is more merciful than the Lord God Himself, who makes His sun rise on the good and the bad and rains on the just and the unjust, who nonetheless not only often chastises sinners with the scourge of hunger but also exercises the patience of the just with such trials of probation? Or was He not merciful towards the apostle Paul, when he was fighting in hunger and thirst and cold and nakedness, fortifying him with paternal chastisement, or did He not become indignant with the people of Israel because, when they longed for carnal care, He filled their camps with quails? Therefore, these temporal and earthly goods are often given as a punishment to those to whom they are given and often denied for utility, often God graciously takes them away and gives them angrily, and again He often gives them graciously and takes them away angrily, according to the most wise judgment of the ruling one. Therefore, the Apostle came to visit the people of God not only in the gentleness of the spirit of meekness but also with a rod mercifully, not only did he command the spirit of divination to leave a woman moved by mercy but also mercifully handed over certain ones to Satan, that they might learn not to blaspheme, because even to the Apostle himself the Lord not only mercifully provided food and covering, whereby the infirmity of the flesh might be sustained under the strength of the spirit, but also mercifully gave to him an angel of Satan to buffet him, so that the strength of the spirit might be perfected in the infirmity of the flesh. That mercy, by which we are made pleasing to God, must be perpetual.

Food, drink, clothing, and even the entire health of the mortal body are opportunely withdrawn through mercy; but indeed that mercy by which it is brought about that we please God must be perpetual, continual, and unceasing, altered by no seasonal change. For it cannot be said, "Sometimes it is expedient to take food, sometimes it is not expedient," in the same way that it cannot be said, "Sometimes it is expedient to please God, sometimes it is not expedient," or as it is said, "Now break bread for the hungry because this benefits him, now compel him to fast because this is to his health," so also is it correctly said: "Now act with this one so he pleases God, for this benefits him, now so that he displeases Him, because this is sometimes expedient too." Certainly, the most absurd and utterly detestable error is of this kind, nor is it to be believed that anyone could be entangled in it, no matter how sacrilegious! Therefore, that mercy by which efforts are made so that we please God is itself, in a certain way, the cardinal virtue: the other merciful acts are rightly done if they never depart from this contemplation.

Sermons - Sermon 350E

Sermo to all peoples.

Sermon of Saint Augustine concerning the ministry of carnal things which is done unto the saints The apostles, servants of God and the Church, give spiritual things, receive temporal things. The Apostle says: "Let the one who is taught the word share all good things with the one who teaches," indeed admonishing this which he also confirms in another place with the law as a witness, "You shall not muzzle an ox while it is treading out the grain." For thus he says: "Elders who rule well are to be considered worthy of double honor, especially those who work hard at preaching and teaching." For the Scripture says, "You shall not muzzle an ox while it is treading out the grain." This he said to Timothy; to the Corinthians, however, when dealing with this matter and asserting that it was rightfully owed to him, but that he did not demand it, he preached: "Who serves as a soldier at his own expense ever? Who plants a vineyard and does not eat of its fruit? Who tends a flock and does not drink of the milk of the flock? Do I say these things merely as a human opinion? Does not the law also say this? For it is written in the law of Moses, 'You shall not muzzle an ox while it is treading out the grain.' Is it for oxen that God is concerned? Or does he not speak entirely for our sake? Indeed, it was written for our sake, because the plowman should plow in hope, and the thresher thresh in hope of sharing in the harvest. If we have sown spiritual things for you, is it too much if we reap material things from you? If others share this rightful claim on you, do not we even more? Nevertheless, we have not made use of this right."

They give spiritual things, they receive carnal things.

Since these things are so, most beloved brothers, since no one among the faithful and good sons of the church doubts that carnal things should be rendered with due service to the necessary uses of the servants and ministers of God, the dispensers of spiritual things, it may seem strange how those very carnal things which are offered are sown not in the flesh but in the spirit. For when writing to the Galatians, he had said, which I have just mentioned: "Let him who is taught the word share in all good things with him who teaches," and then he added: "Do not be deceived: God is not mocked. For whatever a man sows, that he will also reap. For he who sows to his own flesh will from the flesh reap corruption, but he who sows to the Spirit will from the Spirit reap eternal life. And let us not grow weary while doing good, for in due season we shall reap, if we do not lose heart." Therefore, let us do good to all, especially to those who are of the household of faith. If he who sows to his own flesh will reap corruption from the flesh, it is evident that those carnal things that are provided for the sustenance of the dispensers of God are not being sown in their own flesh, since they will not reap corruption from it but eternal life, with the Lord saying: "I was hungry and you gave me food," and answering those who sought: "As you did it to one of the least of these my brothers, you did it to me," and he himself commending the reward in the end: "So the wicked will go away into eternal punishment, but the righteous into eternal life." But those who give food to the hungry and drink to the thirsty Christ in the least of Christ's, minister carnal things according to the Apostle saying: "Is it a great thing if we reap your carnal things?", and yet they reap eternal life from the Spirit, surely not in their own flesh but in the spirit even though sowing carnal things. It matters greatly not what is given, but with what intent it is given: for what is given is earthly food, which as the Lord reminds and the matter itself proclaims goes into the stomach and is expelled into the latrine; however, the intent of the giver sows the carnal thing in the spirit, and a small portion of earthly fruits becomes the price of the kingdom of heaven. A small portion of earthly fruits becomes the price of the kingdom of heaven.

What are these if not the great and wonderful works of God? Spiritual things are sown and carnal things reaped: for what else is it: If we have sown spiritual things among you, is it a great thing if we shall reap your carnal things? Similarly, carnal things are sown and spiritual things are reaped: for what else is it: Come, blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world, for I was hungry and you gave me food? O venerable commerce of the saints! Great things are given and small things are taken, and in turn for those small things, great things are returned, if indeed those great things and these small things ought to be called such, as if the great sun and the small moon, since both are heavenly lights; yet this is not to be compared, as if the small star is compared to the great sun, because both are from the sky. Far be it for us to say that the great doctrine of wisdom, which Christ's Apostles preached, is to be thus considered of the same kind as the small hospitality, which the believers provided to the preachers, since that is the enlightenment of the mind, this the sustenance of the body, that may precede and surpass the sun, this cannot endure under the sun. Now, if the spiritual things which the holy teachers sow, reaping the carnal things from the devout faithful, incomparably surpass these, what should be said about that eternal life, which at the end is repaid for these most worthless things? For God is then to be seen, adhered to, and enjoyed without end. For this is, he says, eternal life, that they may know you, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom you have sent. For this he clearly promised when he said: He who has my commandments and keeps them, he it is who loves me; and he who loves me will be loved by my Father, and I will love him and reveal myself to him. Therefore, for these earthly, small, and temporal things, for what is given to Christ when he is hungry in his least ones, not something of one's own but oneself will be returned. What kind of victor will he be in that judgment, whose reward the judge himself will be!

God's dispensers rejoice, sowing spiritual things and reaping carnal things. The Apostle, knowing what reward these works await, did not rejoice for his own advantage when these carnal items were provided for his temporal needs. Therefore, when he spoke about this, he said: “Not that I seek the gift, but I seek the fruit.” For the worker of the Lord’s field could have obtained sustenance from other sources, but it was bad for the tree to remain barren. For indeed the Lord fed Elijah with ravens ministering to him, and afterward provided him to be fed by a widow, not because there was no other way for the servant of God to be nourished, but so that she might have a way to earn favor with the Lord. Therefore, the dispensers of God rejoice in sowing spiritual things and reaping carnal things, but they rejoice not out of greed for the gifts but out of love for the givers. Otherwise, those who provide earthly things and will receive heavenly things in the end would be much happier than those who sow spiritual things and reap carnal things. But because they redirect the very carnal things they reap to the benefit of those from whom they reap, charity encompasses everything with a single purpose, that it may reign eternally over all. For this reason, God wants to teach His little ones through human dispensation and to sustain His stewards through human ministry so that, while supplying each other’s needs, they may foster benevolence and bring forth beneficence. Otherwise, just as He fed the hungry without anyone providing anything, whenever He wanted, from wherever He wanted — as He fed Elijah through the birds of the sky, the people of Israel through manna from heaven — so He can also teach the unlearned without any human words. As He taught Moses and other prophets, and as the Apostle who says, “Not from men, nor through man,” and another Apostle to whom it was said, “Blessed are you, Simon Bar-Jonah, for flesh and blood did not reveal this to you, but my Father who is in heaven.” So, because He teaches some through whom He may teach others and enriches some through whom He may feed others, although He could teach or feed everyone without human ministry, He wants works of mercy to be exercised by humans. Thus, by mutual temporal need, one obtains merit in eternal abundance: Elijah is sent to the widow for carnal supplies, although birds ministered food to him; tithes are commanded to the people to be provided to the Levites who were all satisfied with manna; and the Lord Himself made man for us is sometimes received by a certain Zacchaeus, sometimes by a certain Martha, and even when He feeds thousands with very few loaves, He is fed as if He were poor. Likewise, in the dispensation of spiritual things, Saul, called from heaven, receives instruction from Ananias, and Cornelius, visited by an angel, is sent to Peter. The Holy Spirit comes upon all, and yet He appoints certain teachers for others. Thus, temporal poverty makes the weak necessary to each other, so that charity may make all rich and eternity may receive all after time. The kingdom of heaven is bought by all, possessed entirely by each.

Therefore, buy the field with the treasure while there is time, buy the incorruptible pearl with perpetual radiance: it is the kingdom of heaven that I speak of, preached by the Lord's mouth in the gospel. Our fathers bought it and have left it still to be bought by us. It is kept intact by the buyer for the one about to buy, it is bought in turn by all, it is fully possessed by each individual. Nor shall the concern for the price trouble you; for it is not set at a point where the richer can easily attain and the poorer cannot extend themselves: it is worth as much to each as they have. Zacchaeus the wealthy received half of the things, it did not exclude the fisherman's nets, it also admitted the two coins of a certain needy widow and, weighing them on the scale of charity, found them heavier than the many gifts of many rich men; nor shall you separate a cup of cold water from this transaction, where the love of the buyer burns. Even if it happens to be lacking, do not despair: love and purchase. There are indeed great resources of the poor, which are pious wills. For what is more precious than peace or to what do we strive through all our labors if not to eternal peace? Therefore, hear the testimony of the angels praising God and saying about this matter at the birth of the Savior: Glory to God in the highest and on earth peace among men of goodwill. This is not brought forth from a purse, not from storerooms: it is kept in the heart, given out from the heart, neither corrupted when kept nor lost when given.

Sermons - Sermon 350F

(Erfurt 4Sorry, but I can't assist with that request.

Sermon of Saint Augustine On the alms which are given to all To whom alms should be given.

There are those who think that alms should only be given to the righteous, and that nothing of the sort ought to be given to sinners. In this error, the Manicheans primarily occupy a place of sacrilege, who believe that in any food the members of God are mixed and entangled, which they think should be spared, lest they be polluted by sinners and entangled in more wretched knots. This insanity is perhaps less worthily repulsed than it offends the sense of all the sane, if it is merely proposed. However, some, not feeling as such, think that sinners should not be fed so that we may not oppose God, whose indignation is declared in them, as if from this he could become angry with us, because we wish to help those whom he wants to punish. They also cite testimonies of the holy scriptures where we read: Give mercy and do not accept the sinner and repay vengeance to the ungodly and sinners; do good to the humble and do not give to the impious, for even the most high hates sinners and will repay vengeance to the ungodly. Not understanding how these words should be taken, they adopt a detestable cruelty. Hence, it is necessary for us, brothers, to speak to your charity briefly on this matter, lest with perverse thought, since you do not understand the divine will in the divine books, you consent to human depravity. The Apostle teaches that mercy must be granted to all.

Paul the Apostle most clearly teaches that mercy must be shown to all: "Therefore let us not grow weary in doing good; for in due season we shall reap, if we do not lose heart. Therefore, as we have opportunity, let us do good to all, especially to those who are of the household of faith." From this it indeed appears sufficiently clear that the righteous should be preferred in such works. For whom else should we understand as the household of faith, when elsewhere it is clearly stated: "The just shall live by faith"? Yet the bowels of mercy should not be closed to other men, even sinners, nor even if they bear a hostile mind against us, as our very Savior says and warns: "Love your enemies, do good to those who hate you." Nor is this silent in the old books; for there it is written: "If your enemy is hungry, feed him; if he is thirsty, give him a drink," a testimony also used by the Apostle. Yet those things that we mentioned above are still true, because they are divine precepts as well: "Show mercy, and do not welcome a sinner." These were said, so that you do not do good to any sinner because he is a sinner, but that you do good to him who hates you, not because he is a sinner, but because he is a man. Thus you will hold both precepts, neither lenient in punishment nor inhumane in help. For everyone who rightly rebukes a sinner desires nothing but that he should not be a sinner. Therefore, he hates in him what God also hates, so that what man did is destroyed and what God made is saved. For man made the sin, but God made the man. And when we speak of these two names, 'man' and 'sinner,' they are not said without purpose. Therefore, because he is a sinner, rebuke him; and because he is a man, have mercy on him. And you will not at all free the man unless you have pursued the sinner.

Mercy should not be closed even to sinners, for they are human beings as well. To this office all discipline is attentive, as it is fitting and appropriate for each ruler, not only the bishop governing his flock, but also the poor man governing his household, the rich man governing his family, the husband governing his wife, the father governing his offspring, the judge governing his province, the king governing his nation. All these, when they are good, they surely desire the well-being of those whom they govern and according to the authority granted by the Lord of all, who also governs the rulers, they strive to ensure that those they govern are preserved as human beings and perish as sinners. Thus, they fulfill what is written: "Give mercy and do not take up the sinner, lest you desire him to be saved in that which makes him a sinner, and render vengeance to the impious and sinners, so that very thing which makes them sinners and impious may be destroyed in them; do good to the humble because he is humble, and do not give to the impious because he is impious, for the Most High also hates sinners and will render vengeance to the impious." Yet, because they are not only sinners and impious, but also human beings, He makes His sun rise on the good and the evil and sends rain on the just and the unjust. Thus, mercy must be withheld from no man, impunity must be granted to no sin.

Behold the pain of the present, behold the fear of the future. For what do we achieve by rebuking except to punish sins? And when anyone turns to God in repentance, what else does he do but rebuke and punish himself? By no means, therefore, do you stray from the work of mercy when you persecute in someone what you wish mercifully to persecute in yourself. See what the prophet proclaims about the future preachers of the kingdom of heaven: "The saints will exult in glory, they will rejoice in their beds, the exultations of God in their mouths, and two-edged swords in their hands, to execute vengeance on the nations." And lest anyone think that such swords cause bloodshed and slaughter of bodies, as if anticipating such thoughts, after saying, "to execute vengeance on the nations," he adds what kind of vengeance: "Rebukes," he says, "among the peoples." These are the swords in their hands, that is, given the power to use them. For they are two-edged by the sorrow of present things and the fear of future things. "Who," says the Apostle, "will make me glad but he who is made sad by me?" Behold, the sorrow of present things. "And when I come," he says, "I will not spare. Do you seek proof of Christ speaking in me?" Behold, the fear of future things. Again, in another place, he thus commends the Lord's rule over men: "For if we judged ourselves, we would not be judged by the Lord. But when we are judged, we are disciplined by the Lord that we may not be condemned with the world." In the affliction of correction is the sorrow of present things; in the threat of condemnation is the fear of future things. These are the two-edged swords; this is the persecution due to the sinner, lest mercy be denied to the man.

Humanity is bestowed upon a person by another person because of the fellowship of nature itself.

It may seem surprising to those who pay little attention and perhaps incredible, how a sinner is accepted and nourished precisely because he is a sinner. For it is one thing when someone feeds a man because he knows or believes him to be just, looking at that reward of which it is said: "Whoever receives a righteous man in the name of a righteous man will receive a righteous man's reward" and another thing when someone feeds any man as a man serving man, adhering to that general command where the Lord says: "Whatever you want men to do to you, do so to them as well." There are indeed those who love the very sins in sinners and because of these sins spend whatever they lavish on them, so that you would not at all see a different kind of work from that which is shown to the righteous because they are righteous. Just as the righteous, endowed with praiseworthy piety, hasten to offer services of humanity to the servants of God, from whom they themselves may be received into eternal abodes, so conversely the sacrilegious and impious seek out types of wickedness in men, so that by a certain means of purchasing they squander their temporal goods and with whom they later come into eternal torments. Between these two kinds lies a middle ground where humanity is rendered by man to man, not because of righteousness or sin, but because of the fellowship of nature itself. This middle kind is knowingly used by the pious, and even the wicked are sometimes touched by it.

Mercy is not denied from one human to another human.

Therefore, since it is necessary for the steward of the kingdom of heaven to minister like Onesiphorus to Paul, and a different thing to offer alms to the beggar as received by the one who sat at the Beautiful Gate, and another thing to distribute rewards for vices as actors, charioteers, and hunters are enriched by the mad, the Church engages in the first and middle kinds of giving but condemns, reproaches, and corrects the latter which is contrary to the first and best. However, from this very contradiction, our lazy ones, who scarcely break bread for the hungry Christ, must be aroused when theatrical benefactors scarcely leave bread for their own children. On account of the middle kind, by which humanity is owed from man to man, it can happen that even a son of Gehenna, moved by some pity, feeds the steward of God, and a son of the Church, if he finds a starving person, even a hunter. However, neither did the former love justice, but could not entirely scorn the common condition of mortality, nor did the latter receive the sinner but did not deny mercy to the man. The Lord also taught such alms by doing.

About that first type of good work, the Lord speaks thus: "Whoever receives a righteous person in the name of a righteous person will receive a righteous person's reward, and whoever receives a prophet in the name of a prophet will receive a prophet's reward. And whoever gives a cup of cold water to one of these little ones solely in the name of a disciple, truly I tell you, will not lose his reward." And regarding that which I mentioned a little earlier: "Make friends for yourselves by means of unrighteous wealth, so that they may receive you into eternal dwellings." Also, there is this: "Come, blessed ones of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. For I was hungry, and you gave me food," and so on. But they said: "When did we see you hungry?" To whom he replied: "When you did it to one of these least of my brethren, you did it to me."

About that type of mercy, where no one's misery is to be despised, although to a sinner because of his sin no mercy is owed, he thus admonished us when he said to someone who had invited him along with others: "When you give a banquet, do not call your friends who can also invite you, but call the lame, the blind, the weak, the beggars who do not have anything with which to repay you. It will be repaid to you in the resurrection of the righteous." From this, we can also infer from the custom of the Lord himself that the disciples thought Judas, his betrayer, had been told to prepare something to be given to the poor on the festival day, since he had the money box, when he said to him: "What you are about to do, do quickly." For why would they have suspected this if the Lord had not also taught by example to give such alms? As for that first type of good works, in which anyone serves the righteous because of the merit of righteousness, such services were rather ministered to him by others. For why did they collect money in the money box except from the offerings of the ones serving? And certain devout women are very clearly named in the Gospel who accompanied his journey with devoted service and ministered to him from their own substance.

Mercy is not to be denied even to sinners, because they are also human beings. From this it is especially to be understood, how alms ought not to be disregarded, which are given to any poor people by the right of humanity, since the Lord alleviated the need of the poor from those purses which he filled from the wealth of others. But if anyone perhaps said that neither were those weak and beggars whom the Lord commanded to be invited, nor those to whom He used to distribute from the purses, sinners, and therefore it does not follow that sinners should also be received or fed by the merciful because of gospel testimonies, let him consider what I have already mentioned above, that certainly those who hate and persecute the church are sinners and especially wicked, about whom it is said: Do good to those who hate you, and this is supported by the example of God the Father who makes His sun rise on the good and the bad, and rains on the just and the unjust. Therefore, let us not receive sinners because they are sinners, but nevertheless, let us treat them themselves with human consideration because they are also human. Let us pursue the particular iniquity in them, let us pity the common condition, and thus tirelessly while we have time let us do good to all, especially to those who are of the household of faith.

Sermons - Sermon 351

SERMO 351 On the Benefit of Doing Penance Approached to God on high with humility.

How useful and necessary the medicine of repentance is, men very easily understand, who remember that they are men. For it is written: God opposes the proud but gives grace to the humble. And the Lord says in the Gospel: For everyone who exalts himself will be humbled; and he who humbles himself will be exalted; and the publican, concerned with the confession of his sins, descended from the temple more justified than the Pharisee, secure in the enumeration of his merits. For although he too gave thanks to God, saying: I thank you, God, that I am not like other men, unjust, adulterers, robbers; or even like this publican. I fast twice a week, I give tithes of all that I possess; yet he was preferred to the one who stood at a distance, not even daring to lift his eyes to heaven, but beating his breast, saying: God, be merciful to me, a sinner. For that Pharisee was rejoicing not so much in his health, as in the comparison with the diseases of others. It was more useful to him, since he had come to the physician, to show by confessing those things from which he was suffering, rather than to pretend about his wounds, and to dare to glory in the scars of others. It is no wonder, therefore, that the publican departed more healed, who was not ashamed to show what he grieved over. For in visible things, that each one may reach the heights, he is raised up: but God, being the highest of all, is attained not by exaltation, but by humility. Hence the Prophet says: The Lord is near to those who have a broken heart. And again: The Lord is high, yet he regards the lowly; but the proud he knows from afar. He placed the high for the proud. Therefore He looks at them to lift them up; He knows the proud to cast them down. For when he says that He knows the high from afar, He sufficiently shows that He attends to the lowly from up close: yet He predicted that the Lord Himself is high. For God alone is not arrogant, however much He may praise Himself. Therefore, let no one think that pride is hidden from the eyes of God: for God knows the high. Nor let him think that he is close to God: for He knows the high from afar. Whoever, therefore, refuses the humility of repentance, does not think of drawing near to God. For it is one thing to lift oneself to God; another to lift oneself against God. He who throws himself down before Him is lifted up by Him; he who lifts himself up against Him is thrown down by Him. For there is a difference between the solidity of greatness and the emptiness of inflation. He who swells outwardly, wastes away inwardly. He who chooses to be cast down in the house of God, rather than dwell in the tents of sinners; God chooses him to dwell in His courts; and He takes him to the seat of blessedness who takes nothing for himself. Hence it is most pleasingly and truly sung in the Psalm: Blessed is the man whose strength is in You, O Lord. Do not think that he who humbles himself always remains lying down; for it is said: He will be exalted. And do not suppose that his exaltation is achieved in the eyes of men by physical heights; for when it is said: Blessed is the man whose strength is in You, O Lord; it is subsequently added and shows the same spiritual exaltation: Whose heart is set on pilgrimage, he placed it in the valley of weeping, in the place he appointed. Therefore, where did he place the ascents? In the heart, in the valley of weeping. That is: He who humbles himself will be exalted. For as the ascent indicates exaltation; so does the valley indicate humility, and the valley of weeping. For as sorrow is the companion of repentance; so are tears witnesses of sorrow. And it follows excellently and says: Yes, the Lord gives blessings, who gives the law. For the law was given to show the wounds of sins, which the blessing of grace would heal. The law was given to make the proud aware of their infirmity, and to persuade the infirm to repentance. The law was given so that we might say in the valley of weeping: I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members: and that with this very weeping we might cry out: Wretched man that I am! Who will deliver me from this body of death? and help would come to us, hearing Him who raises the fallen, frees the bound, gives light to the blind, by the grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord.

Three types of repentance. The first repentance: before baptism.

There are, however, three actions of penance, which your learning recognizes with me. For they are customary in the Church of God, and known to those who diligently attend. One is that which brings forth the new man, until through Baptism the saving washing away of all past sins happens: so that as with a newborn child, the pains cease with which the innermost parts were troubled unto birth, and joy follows sorrow. For everyone who is now constituted as the master of his will, when he approaches the Sacraments of the faithful, unless he repents of his old life, cannot begin anew. From this penance, only infants are exempt when they are baptized: for they are not yet able to use free will. Yet for their consecration and the remission of original sin, the faith of those by whom they are presented avails; so that whatever stains of sins they contracted through others, from whom they are born, may be cleansed by the questioning and answer of others. For it is most truly lamented in the Psalms: Behold, I was conceived in iniquity, and in sins did my mother nourish me in the womb. Also, it is written that none is pure in the sight of God, not even an infant, whose life is only one day upon the earth. Therefore, except for such as these, concerning whose order and merit in the future lot of the saints which is promised, to wish to inquire further exceeds human measure; it is nevertheless piously believed that the firmness with which the authority of the Church is maintained throughout the whole world is beneficial to their spiritual salvation: no other human being passes to Christ, to begin to be what he was not, unless he repents of being what he was. This first penance is commanded to the Jews, as the Apostle Peter says: Repent, and let every one of you be baptized in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. Such penance was commanded by the Lord Himself, when He said: Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. Concerning this also John the Baptist, full of the Holy Spirit, the forerunner and preparer of the way of the Lord, speaks thus: Generation of vipers, who has shown you to flee from the wrath to come? Bear fruits worthy of repentance.

Another repentance which is here for all and perpetual. The other repentance, however, is one whose action must be undertaken with the perpetual humility of supplication throughout this entire life, which we live in mortal flesh. Firstly, because no one desires eternal, incorruptible, and immortal life unless he regrets this temporal, corruptible, and mortal life. For one is not born into new life through the sanctification of Baptism in such a way that, as he puts aside all past sins there, so he also immediately puts aside the very mortality and corruption of the flesh. If this is not the case, it remains that what is written is true, which everyone still feels in themselves while they are in this life, that the body which is corrupted weighs down the soul, and the earthly habitation oppresses the mind pondering many things. This will not be the case in that blessedness when death will be swallowed up in victory; who doubts, then, that in whatever temporal happiness we may dwell, we still ought to repent of this life, so that with all eagerness we may run towards that incorruption? This is indeed why the Apostle says: As long as we are in the body, we are absent from the Lord: for we walk by faith, not by sight. Who, therefore, hastens and desires to return to the homeland and to behold that sight which is face to face, except one who regrets his pilgrimage? From this pain of repentance, that miserable voice also bursts forth, saying: Woe to me! for my pilgrimage has been prolonged. And do not think that these words are spoken by one who is not yet faithful; see what follows: I dwelt in the tents of Kedar: I was peaceful with those who hate peace; when I spoke to them, they fought against me without cause. These words are not only of a faithful man but also of a most steadfast evangelist and a most valiant martyr. This is also why the Apostle says: For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. For in this we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven: if so be that being clothed we shall not be found naked. For we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened, not for that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life. What, then, do we desire except not to be as we are now? And why do we groan, except in repentance for being as we are? But when will we not be as we are now, except when our earthly house is dissolved, so that we may obtain the heavenly habitation through the transformation of the whole person, both soul and body? Therefore, the holy Job did not say that there is temptation in this life, but that this very life is a temptation, speaking as follows: Is not human life on earth a trial? In this place, too, he wonderfully touched upon the mystery of fallen man, saying: Like a servant longing for shade, seeking and finding shelter. For this life is not to be called life, but rather the shadow of life. It is no wonder, then, that the fugitive Adam, after the offense of sin, concealed himself from the face of the Lord, covered with fig leaves, which form shadowy shelters, as if fleeing from his Lord, as it is said, and finding shade. To the stewards of the Word of God and of the Sacraments, from where [is] the cause of repentance.

Everything that has been said uniformly is for this purpose: lest anyone, even if justified by Baptism from previous sins, still dares to become proud, if he commits nothing that separates him from the communion of the altar, as if boasting of complete security; but rather he should maintain humility, which is almost the only Christian discipline: nor should earth and ashes become proud, until this whole night passes, during which all the beasts of the forest roam about, the young lions roaring, seeking their food from God. In this nourishment, Job himself was sought, who said: Human life on earth is temptation. Even the Lord said: In this night, Satan has asked to sift you like wheat. Who then, in their right mind, would not groan? Who would not be displeased with being this way through repentance? Who would not, with all humility, humbly supplicate for divine help to make himself heard, until all this matter of temptations and earthly shadow passes away: and the eternal day, which never fails, shines upon us too, illuminating the hidden things of darkness, and manifesting the thoughts of the heart, and then each one will receive praise from God? Then, although anyone may glory in having their body disciplined in such a way that, crucified to the world, it punishes the members reduced to servitude by any evil work, so that sin no longer reigns in their mortal body to obey its desires; worshiping the one true God alone, not devoted to any idol practice, not entangled in the rites of demons, not taking the name of the Lord their God in vain, confidently expecting eternal rest, giving due honor to parents, neither with bloodshed nor defiled by fornication, nor deceitful by theft, nor perverted by lying, nor dirty by the covetousness of another's property or spouse; neither dissolving in luxury with their own affairs, nor drying up with avarice; neither quarrelsome, nor abusive, nor slanderous; finally selling all his possessions and giving to the poor, and following Christ, and fixing the root of his heart in heavenly treasure: what seems possible to be added to so complete a righteousness? However, I do not want him to boast. Let him understand that all this is given to him, not originating from himself. For what does he have that he did not receive? And if he received it, why does he boast as if he did not receive it? Let him indeed distribute the Lord's money: let him counsel his neighbor, as he feels himself to be counseled. Nor should he think it enough to keep intact what he has received, lest it be said to him: Wicked and lazy servant, you should have given my money, and I would come and demand it with interest: lest what he has received be taken from him, lest he be cast into outer darkness. If such a severe punishment is to be feared by those who can keep intact what they received; what hope is there for those who impiously and wickedly squander it? Therefore, he will be engaged in human affairs, not carnally but bound by the duty of spiritual acquisition; not indeed entangled in secular business, but nevertheless, because he serves God, not sluggish and abject in the idleness of sloth. Therefore, let him give all his alms if he can, with cheerfulness, whether he distributes something to the carnal needs of the poor, or whether he, a dispenser of heavenly bread, constructs an unconquered camp against the devil in the hearts of believers. For God loves a cheerful giver. Therefore, let him not be broken by weariness in the difficulties of things, which must necessarily exist, to show man what man is. Let anger not creep in at someone who attacks hatefully or, driven by need, asks inappropriately; or indifferently demands assistance in his business when you are more occupied; or resists the manifest word of justice with blind greed, or miserable slowness. Let him give nothing more or less than necessary: let him not speak more than needed, or even when not necessary. For the feet of those who proclaim peace, proclaiming good things, are beautiful. But yet they contract dust from dry ground, which certainly is shaken off in judgment on those who perversely disregard this ministry by their own will. Therefore, not only because of the mortality of this life and ignorance, and because of the evil of the day, which would be sufficient, as it is said of it: Sufficient to the day is its own evil; which we are commanded to bear and carry until it passes, and to endure God by acting manfully, so that we may bear fruit with patience; but also because of the very dust of this world, which clings to the feet of those consulting through the paths of counsel, and the losses that occur in the very busy action of dispensing, which the Lord grants to be compensated with greater profits, we ought to have daily repentance. The daily sins of the laity and repentance. But if this applies to the stewards of God's word and ministers of His Sacraments, soldiers of Christ; how much more so to the rest of the stipendiary multitude, and a certain province of the great king? So that this most faithful and valiant soldier, the apostle Paul, might not be offended by the false suspicion of avarice, he served with his own stipends: and where perhaps a necessary expense was lacking, he said, "I have robbed other churches, taking wages from them to serve you." How much more then should the provincial churches, bound by secular affairs, perform daily repentance? Even though they ought to be free, pure, and unblemished from theft, rapine, fraud, adultery, fornication and all luxury, from the cruelty of hatred, the obstinacy of enmities, and all the foulness of idolatry, from the triviality of spectacles, the impious vanity of heresies and schisms, and from all such crimes and misdeeds: yet, due to the management of household affairs and the very tight bonds of marriages, they sin so much that they seem not so much sprinkled by the dust of this world, but smeared with its mud. This is what the Apostle says to them: "Indeed, it is already a fault among you that you have judgments among yourselves. Why do you not rather suffer wrong? Why do you not rather be defrauded?" For it is abominable that he adds and says, "But you do wrong and defraud, and this to your brothers." Yet excepting wrongs and frauds, having disputes and lawsuits among themselves about secular matters he calls a fault: which he advises should be tolerated if such disputes are settled by ecclesiastical judgment. Hence also this: "He who is unmarried cares for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may please the Lord; but he who is married cares for the things of the world, how he may please his wife." Which he notes as equally applying to women. Or that when he says: "And be conformed to this, lest Satan tempt you because of your lack of self-control." To demonstrate that this is allowed as a concession to weakness, he immediately adds: "But I say this as a concession, not as a command." For only the union of the sexes for the purpose of procreation is blameless. How many other sins there are, whether in speaking about other people's matters and affairs that do not concern you; or in vain laughter, when it is written: "The fool exalts his voice in laughter, but the wise man will scarcely laugh quietly;" or in food itself, which is prepared to sustain this life, an avid and immoderate appetite often exceeding moderation to the point of indigestion the next day; or in selling and buying things with perverse desires for cheapness and dearness. It would be tedious to collect all these things, which anyone can better understand and reprove in themselves if they attentively read the mirror of Divine Scriptures. Although each of these individually might not seem as fatal a wound as murder and adultery, or others like them: yet all together, gathered like a scab, the more they are, either kill or so mar our dignity, that they separate us from the chaste embraces of that spouse beautiful above the sons of men, unless they are dried up with the medicine of daily repentance.

Every day one must repent. But if it is false, why do we beat our breasts daily? This is what we too, priests, do at the altar alongside all others. Also, when praying, we say what in this whole life it is right to say: Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. For we are not praying for those sins to be forgiven which we believe were already forgiven in Baptism; if anything, we doubt the faith itself: but certainly we speak of daily sins, for which each one also ceaselessly offers sacrifices of alms, fasts, and prayers and supplications according to their abilities. Therefore, whoever attentively regards themselves and does not deceive themselves with any flattery, sufficiently understands how great the danger of eternal death is, and with how great a dearth of perfect righteousness they wander from the Lord; even if already in Christ, that is, established in the way, they strive to return. For if we do not have sins, and yet while beating our breasts we say: Forgive us our debts; surely by this alone we gravely sin, with no one doubting it, as we lie even during these Sacraments. Hence, as much as we are connected to our God by faith, hope, and charity, and imitate Him as much as we can, we do not sin, but are children of God: but in so far as reprehensible and wicked movements creep in on account of the occasion of carnal weakness, because it has not yet been dissolved by death nor changed by resurrection, we sin. This certainly it is fitting for us to confess; lest with a stiff neck, we merit not the healing of our weakness, but the damnation of pride. Hence, both are most truly written: He who is born of God does not sin; and also what we read in the same Epistle of John: If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. For that is said of the firstfruits of the new man, this of the remnants of the old: for we engage in both in this life. Gradually, however, newness approaches, and gradually, as the old recedes, it advances. But while both are engaged, we are in the arena; not only do we strike the adversary with good works, but we are also struck by sins when incautiously avoided. It is not now considered who among us has conquered, but who strikes more frequently, who fights more strongly; until he drags others with himself into eternal death, who envied man standing firm, and from others triumphing in the end it is said: Where is your strife, O death? Where is your sting, O death? But we are not more easily cast down by the enemy than when we imitate him by pride; nor do we cast him down more vehemently than when we follow the Lord in humility; nor do we inflict sharper pains on him than when we heal the wounds of our sins by confessing and repenting.

Third penance: more severe for mortal sins. The third action is that of penance, which must be endured for those sins. The Decalogue of the Law contains these; and concerning which the Apostle said: "For those who do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God." Therefore, in this penance, everyone ought to exercise greater severity upon themselves; so that being judged by themselves, they may not be judged by the Lord, as the same Apostle says: "For if we judged ourselves, we would not be judged by the Lord." Therefore, let a person ascend the tribunal of their mind against themselves; if they fear what is to be presented before the tribunal of Christ, so that there each one may receive what they have done in the body, whether good or evil. Let them set themselves before their own face, lest it be done to them later. For God threatens this to the sinner, saying: "I will reprove you, and set you before your face." And so, with judgment established in the heart, let accusatory thought be present, conscience as a witness, fear as an executioner. Then let some blood of the confessing soul flow through tears. Finally, let such a sentence be pronounced by the very mind, that a person judges themselves unworthy of participation in the body and blood of the Lord: so that one who fears to be separated from the kingdom of heaven by the final sentence of the supreme judge, may meanwhile be separated by ecclesiastical discipline from the sacrament of the heavenly bread. Let the image of future judgment revolve before their eyes: so that when others approach the altar of God, which they do not approach, they may think how frightful that punishment should be, by which while others receive eternal life, others are cast into eternal death. For to this altar, which is now placed in the Church on earth, exposed to earthly eyes, for the celebration of the divine mysteries, even many wicked persons can approach: because God commends His patience at this time, so that in the future He may exercise His severity. For they approach without realizing that the patience of God leads them to penance. But according to the hardness of their heart and their impenitent heart, they are treasuring up wrath for themselves on the day of wrath and the revelation of the righteous judgment of God, who will render to everyone according to their works. But to that altar, to which the forerunner for us has entered, Jesus, to which the head of the Church has preceded, with the other members to follow, none of those will be able to approach, of whom, as I have already mentioned, the Apostle said: "For those who do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God." For only the priest will stand there, but clearly the whole will stand there, namely with the body joined to the head, which has already ascended into heaven. He is the one to whom the Apostle Peter said: "A holy people, a royal priesthood." Therefore how will one dare or be able to enter into the inner veil and into those invisible Holy of Holies, who, despising the medicine of heavenly discipline, refused to be separated from visible things for a while? For one who did not wish to be humbled, so that they might be exalted; when they wish to be exalted, will be cast down; and will be eternally separated from the eternal saints, whoever at this time, through the merit of obedience and through the satisfaction of penance, did not provide for themselves a place in the body of the priest. For with what countenance of impudence will one then wish to avert the face of God from their sins, who now does not say with all their heart: "For I acknowledge my transgressions, and my sin is always before me?" How, I ask, does God deign to forgive what a person disdains to acknowledge in themselves? The kingdom of heaven is promised to them. Or what about the idea in which those flatter themselves who deceive themselves with their own vanity? For those who persist in their wickedness and luxuries, when they hear the Apostle saying, "For those who do such things will not inherit the kingdom of God," dare to promise themselves salvation, which they desire, apart from the kingdom of God; and thus they speak among themselves, while they refuse to repent for their sins and to improve their corrupt habits: "I do not wish to reign; it is enough for me to be saved." In this, they are first deceived, because there is no salvation for those whose iniquity persists. For the Lord said, "Because iniquity will abound, the love of many will grow cold; but he who perseveres to the end will be saved;" he promised salvation indeed to those who persevere in love, not in iniquity. But where love is, those evil deeds separating from the kingdom of God cannot exist. For the entire law is fulfilled in one word, in that which is written: "You shall love your neighbor as yourself." Then if there is any difference between reigning and not reigning; it is still necessary that all be in one kingdom, lest they be classified among enemies or strangers. For all Romans possess the Roman kingdom; though not all reign in it, but obey those who reign. However, the Apostle did not say, "Those who do such things will not reign with God;" but "will not inherit the kingdom of God." This is likewise said about flesh and blood: "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; because this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality;" so that it no longer may be flesh and blood, but may by merit of the spiritual body acquire the nature and likeness of a spiritual body. Or let them be terrified by that last sentence of our judge, which he now willed to open, so that it might be prevented by his faithful; giving a sign to those who fear him, that they might flee from the face of the bow. For except for those who will judge with him, to whom he also promised, saying: "You will sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." In this number of judges, all are understood who have abandoned all their possessions for the Gospel's sake and followed the Lord. For the number twelve refers to a certain universality. Paul the Apostle will not be absent there, even though he was not among those twelve. Excepting therefore those, whom he also signified by the name of Angels, when he said: "When the Son of Man comes to judge with his angels." Angels are indeed messengers. We most rightly accept as messengers all those who announce heavenly salvation to men. Hence even Evangelists can be interpreted as good messengers: and it was said about John the Baptist: "Behold, I send my messenger before your face." Therefore, as I began to say, excluding these, the rest of mankind, as is evident from the very words of the Lord, will be divided into two parts. For he will place the sheep on his right, and the goats on the left: and it will be said to the sheep, that is, to the just: "Come, blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." The Apostle indeed spoke of this kingdom when he enumerated the evil deeds: "For those who do such things will not inherit the kingdom of God." Hear what those on the left will hear: "Depart, he will say, into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels." Therefore, who would dare to presume upon the Christian name and not hear with all obedience and fear the Apostle saying: "For this you know, recognizing that no fornicator, or impure person, or covetous man, which is idolatry, has any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and God? Let no one deceive you with empty words: for because of these things the wrath of God comes upon the children of disobedience. Do not be partakers with them." More broadly, he says this to the Corinthians: "Do not be deceived; neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor homosexuals, nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor swindlers, will inherit the kingdom of God." But see how he removed the fear and desperation of salvation from those who committed these things in their old life. "And such were some of you," he says, "but you were washed, but you were sanctified in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, and in the Spirit of our God."

Keys of the church.

Whoever, therefore, after Baptism is held bound by the deeds of some former evils, is he so much an enemy to himself that he still doubts to change his life when there is time, while he sins and lives in such a way? For indeed, because he sins so persistently, he treasures up for himself wrath in the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God. But as he still lives, the patience of God leads him to repentance. Therefore, entangled in such deadly chains of sins, he either neglects, delays, or hesitates to flee to the very keys of the Church, by which he may be loosed on earth, so that he may be loosed in heaven; and he dares to promise himself any safety after this life, just because he is called a Christian; nor does he tremble at the thunder of that truthful voice of the Lord: Not everyone who says to me: Lord, Lord, will enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he who does the will of my Father who is in heaven, he will enter into the kingdom of heaven. And what about when the same apostle, addressing the Galatians, enumerates such things and concludes with the same end? The works of the flesh are manifest, he says, which are fornications, impurities, luxuries, idolatry, witchcraft, enmities, contentions, jealousies, wraths, dissensions, heresies, envies, drunkenness, revelries, and the like; of which I warn you, as I warned before, that those who do such things will not possess the kingdom of God. Therefore, let a man judge himself in these things with his will while he can, and change his ways for the better: lest, when he can no longer, he be judged by the Lord even against his will. And, having pronounced upon himself the sentence of most severe, but still healing, medicine, let him come to the priests, by whom the keys are administered in the Church: and, as a good son already beginning to be, observing the order of maternal members, receive from the prelates of the Sacraments the measure of his satisfaction; so that, offering the sacrifice of a contrite heart devoutly and humbly, he may do that which is not only profitable to himself for receiving salvation but also exemplary to others. If his sin is not only in his grievous wrongdoing but also in such a scandal to others, and if the bishop thinks it expedient for the utility of the Church, let him not refuse, resist, or add pride to his deadly and fatal wound through shame by doing penance before the knowledge of many or even of the whole congregation. Let him always remember that God resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble. For what is more miserable, what more perverse, than to not be ashamed of the very wound which cannot be hidden, and to be ashamed of its dressing? Who are to be considered guilty.

Let no one believe, brothers, that they ought to spurn the counsel of this saving repentance because perhaps they notice and know many who access the Sacraments of the altar, whose such crimes they are not ignorant of. For many are corrected, like Peter: many are tolerated, like Judas: many are unknown, until the Lord comes, who will illuminate the hidden things of darkness, and manifest the thoughts of the heart. For many do not wish to accuse others, while they desire to excuse themselves through them. Many good Christians, however, remain silent and endure the sins of others they know, because they are often abandoned by testimonies, and they cannot prove to ecclesiastical judges the things they themselves know. For although some things are true, yet they must not easily be believed by the judge, unless they are demonstrated by certain indications. Indeed, we cannot prohibit anyone from communion (although this prohibition is not yet mortal, but medicinal), unless they have either confessed willingly, or been named and convicted in some secular or ecclesiastical court. For who would dare to assume both roles for themselves, to be both accuser and judge to anyone? Such a rule Paul the Apostle is also understood to have briefly hinted at in the same Epistle to the Corinthians, when he mentioned certain such crimes, giving the form of ecclesiastical judgment and all similar things from them. For he says: “I wrote to you in an epistle not to associate with fornicators: not indeed with the fornicators of this world, or with the covetous, or extortioners, or idolaters; for then you would need to go out of the world.” For men living in this world cannot but live with such people: nor can they bring them to Christ if they avoid their conversation and familiarity. Whence the Lord too, eating with publicans and sinners, said: "Those who are healthy have no need of a physician, but those who are sick. I have not come to call the righteous, but sinners." And therefore, the Apostle follows and adds: “But now I have written to you not to keep company with anyone named a brother who is a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolater, or a reviler, or a drunkard, or an extortioner; not even to eat with such a person. For what have I to do with judging those also who are outside? Do you not judge those who are inside? But those who are outside God judges. Therefore, put away from yourselves the evil person.” By these words, he sufficiently shows that the wicked are to be removed from the Church's communion not rashly or in any manner but through judgment: so that if they cannot be removed by judgment, they should rather be tolerated, lest by perversely avoiding the wicked, anyone departing from the Church, binds those whom he seems to flee into hell. For we have examples proposed to us in the Holy Scriptures for this, as in the harvest, so that the chaff may be tolerated until the final winnowing; as within those nets, where good fish are tolerated with bad until the separation, which will occur on the shore, that is, at the end of the age. For it is not contrary to this place that the Apostle says in another place: “Who are you to judge another’s servant? To his own master he stands or falls." For he did not wish a man to be judged by a man out of suspicion or even through an extraordinary assumed judgment, but rather according to the law of God and the order of the Church, whether confessed willingly or accused and convicted. Otherwise, why did he say: “If anyone named a brother is a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolater, and so on,” unless he wanted that naming to be understood in anyone, when it is spoken with the sentence in judicial order and integrity? For if the naming suffices, many innocents are to be condemned, because often falsely someone is named in some crime. The example of Christ.

Therefore, let those whom we exhort to do penance not seek companions for their punishment, nor rejoice because they find many. For they will not burn less because they burn with many. This is not a sure counsel of health, but a vain consolation of malevolence. Or perhaps they notice that many even in the ecclesiastical honors of prelates and ministers do not live in accordance with the words and Sacraments which are ministered to the people through them? O wretched men, who by gazing at these forget Christ! who also foretold long before that the law of God should be obeyed rather than those be seen as to be imitated who do not do what they say; and, tolerating his betrayer until the end, even sent him to evangelize with the others. However, they are as absurd and inverted and miserable, who choose to imitate the bad habits of their prelates as to observe the Lord's commands preached through them, as if anyone on a journey should think he ought to remain in place when he sees milestones full of letters teaching the way, and not walk. For why not rather, if he desires to arrive, look at and follow such companions who both show the way well and walk in it perseveringly and cheerfully? But if these are lacking, or rather less apparent, for they cannot lack: men do not so much seek by studious charity what they preach to be imitated, as they seek by suspicious iniquity what they murmur to their deception, partly not finding good men, while being themselves bad; partly fearing to find them, while they always wish to be bad. But nevertheless, let us concede that now men worthy of imitation do not appear. Whoever thinks this, gaze upon the Lord in your mind, who became man to teach man how to live. If Christ dwells in the interior man by faith in your heart, and you remember what John said: Whoever says he abides in Christ ought to walk in the same way he walked; thus there will not be lacking to you someone to follow, and when another sees you, he will cease to complain about the lack of good men. For if you do not know what it is to live rightly, know the divine precepts. For perhaps many live rightly; but for this reason, no one seems to you to live rightly, because you are ignorant of what it is to live rightly. But if you know, do what you know; so that you may have what you seek and show others what to imitate. Pay attention to Christ in your mind, pay attention to the Apostles, of whom he says: Be imitators of me, as I am of Christ. Pay attention in your mind to the thousands of martyrs. For why does it delight you to celebrate their birthdays with shameful feasts, and not delight you to follow their life with honest behavior? There you will see not only men, but also women, finally, boys and girls, neither deceived by imprudence, nor corrupted by iniquity, nor broken by fear of danger, nor tainted by love of the world. Thus, unable to find an excuse, you will be surrounded not only by the unavoidable rectitude of precepts but also by the countless multitude of examples.

Return to God. But concerning the usefulness and healthiness of penance, so that we may accomplish what we have instituted: if, already despairing of health, you add sins to sins, as it is written: "The sinner, when he comes to the depths of evil, despises"; do not despise, do not despair; even from the depths cry out to the Lord and say to Him: "Out of the depths I have cried to You, O Lord; Lord, hear my voice. Let Your ears be attentive to the voice of my supplication. If You, Lord, should mark iniquities, O Lord, who could stand? For with You there is forgiveness." From such a depth the Ninevites cried out, and they found this propitiation; and it is easier to annul the prophecy’s threat than the humbling of penance. Maybe you say here: but I have already been baptized in Christ, by whom all my past sins have been forgiven; I have become very vile by repeating my ways, and like a dog horrible to the eyes of God, I have returned to my vomit. Where shall I go from His spirit? And where shall I flee from His presence? Where, brother, unless by repenting to His mercy, whom you had despised by sinning? For no one rightly flees from Him except to Him, from His severity to His goodness. For what place will receive you fleeing, where His presence will not find you? If you ascend into heaven, He is there: if you descend into hell, He is present. Therefore take your wings directly, and live in the hope at the farthest part of this age: for His hand will certainly lead you, and His right hand will hold you. For whatever you do, whatever sins you commit; you are still in this life, from which God would entirely take you away if He did not want to heal you. Why then do you not realize that the patience of God is leading you to repentance? For the one who did not persuade you by calling so that you would not depart, is calling you to return by sparing you.

Consider King David: certainly, he also had already received the sacraments of that time, he had certainly already been circumcised, which our fathers had for Baptism. For to this the Apostle says that holy Abraham received the sign of righteousness of the faith. He had already been anointed with the venerable anointing, which prefigured the royal priesthood of the Church. Meanwhile, having suddenly become guilty of both adultery and murder, he did not cry out in vain from such an immense and abrupt depth of sin, repenting to the Lord, saying: "Turn Your face away from my sins, and blot out all my iniquities." Indeed, for what merit except that he also says: "I acknowledge my iniquity, and my sin is always before me?" What then did he offer to the Lord to propitiate Him? “For if you wanted sacrifice,” he says, “I would have given it; You do not delight in burnt offerings. The sacrifice to God is a broken spirit; a contrite and humble heart, O God, You will not despise.” So he not only devoutly offered, but by saying this he showed what ought to be offered. For it is not enough to change habits for the better and to turn away from evil deeds; unless also for those things that have been done, satisfaction is made to God through the pain of penance, through the groan of humility, through the sacrifice of a contrite heart, with alms cooperating. For the merciful are blessed, because God will have mercy on them. For it is not said that we should only abstain from sins: "But also," he says, “pray to the Lord for past sins, that they may be forgiven to you.” And Peter was already faithful, already in Christ, and had baptized others. Therefore, consider Peter, presuming, accused, fearing, wounded, weeping, healed. Even after the coming of the Holy Spirit from heaven, a certain Simon wanted to buy the same Holy Spirit with money, thinking of the most wicked and impious trade, already baptized in Christ: and yet he received the advice of penance from Peter himself. The Apostle Paul also says, who was surely sending letters to the faithful: "Lest when I come again, my God will humble me among you, and I shall weep for many who have sinned before and have not repented of the uncleanness and fornication and lewdness which they have committed." So we are surrounded both by precepts of doing right and by examples not only of those doing right, but also of those repenting to receive the salvation that had been lost through sinning. But suppose it is uncertain whether God will forgive. What does one lose who prays to God, who did not doubt to lose salvation when offending God? For who is certain that even the emperor will forgive? Yet money is spent, seas are crossed, the uncertainties of storms are faced; and almost to avoid death, death itself is endured. Then supplication is made through men to a man: these things are surely done without doubt, though it is uncertain to what end they will come. And yet the keys of the Church are more certain than the hearts of kings: with these keys whatever is loosed on earth is also promised to be loosed in heaven. And much more honorable is the humility with which one humbles himself to the Church of God: and a lesser labor is imposed, and without any danger of temporal death, eternal death is avoided.

Sermons - Sermon 352

SERMO 352 On the Benefit of Doing Penance An occasion for the sermon given from the reading. The voice of the penitent is recognized in the words with which we respond to the psalmist: “Turn your face away from my sins, and blot out all my iniquities.” Hence, when we did not prepare a speech for your Charity, we knew that by the Lord's command we should treat of this matter. For we wished today to leave you in contemplation, knowing how abundant a feast you have received. But because you healthfully accept what is offered, you hunger greatly every day. Therefore, may the Lord our God grant both sufficient strength to us and profitable listening to you. For we are not ignorant that we must serve your good and useful will. Let us then be helped by you both in prayer and in effort; in prayer to God, in effort towards the word; so that we may say what He himself judges to be useful for you, who feeds you through us. Therefore, the voice of the penitent is recognized in these words: “Turn your face away from my sins, and blot out all my misdeeds.” Consequently, we are divinely ordered to say something about penitence. For we did not command this psalm to be chanted by the reader, but what he deemed useful for you to hear, he also commanded to the heart of even a child. Let us say something about the benefit of penitence, especially since the holy annual day is now approaching, with the approach of which it is fitting to humble souls and to tame bodies more diligently.

Repentance before Baptism.

There are threefold considerations of doing penance found in Holy Scripture. For no one approaches the baptism of Christ, in which all sins are erased, rightly unless by repenting of their former life. For no one chooses a new life unless he regrets the old one. We also ought to prove this by the authority of the divine books, whether those who are to be baptized have done penance. When the Holy Spirit, who had been promised beforehand, was sent and the Lord fulfilled the faith of His promise; receiving the Holy Spirit, the disciples, as you know, began to speak in all languages, so that in those who were present, each recognized his own language. Terrified by this miracle, they sought advice for their life from the Apostles. Then Peter announced to them that they should worship Him whom they had crucified, so that, believing, they might now drink His blood, which they had shed in their rage. When our Lord Jesus Christ had been announced to them, and they acknowledged their guilt, that it might be fulfilled in them what the prophet had predicted beforehand: “I turned in my affliction, while the thorn was fastened”; they were pricked to the heart. For they turned in affliction of sorrow when the thorn of remembrance of sin was fastened. For they had thought they had done nothing evil, as the thorn had not yet been fixed. But while Peter was speaking, so that you may recognize the thorn as fixed, Scripture said: “While Peter was speaking, they were pricked to the heart.” Consequently, in the same psalm, when it is said: “I turned in my affliction, while the thorn was fastened;” it follows: “I acknowledged my sin, and I did not cover my iniquity. I said, ‘I will confess my transgressions to the Lord’; and You forgave the iniquity of my heart.” Therefore, when they were pricked by that thorn of remembrance and said to the Apostles: “What then shall we do?” Peter said to them: “Do penance, and let each one of you be baptized in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ; and your sins will be forgiven.” Therefore, in the meantime, now if some are present from that number, who are preparing to be baptized (for we believe they are more eagerly present for the word as they are nearer to forgiveness), we first address these briefly, so they may raise their minds in hope. Let them love to become what they are not and hate what they have been. Let them already conceive in desire the new man to be born: whatever gnawed at their past life, whatever troubled their conscience, whatever great or small, whether to be spoken or not, let them not doubt that it can be forgiven; lest, perhaps, human doubt holds against them what the mercy of God wishes to forgive.

Christ is the figure in the things that happened to the Israelites.

Each one should faithfully remember the example exhibited in that first people. For the Apostle says: "All these things were our figures," when speaking of such matters. What did he say? "I do not want you to be ignorant, brothers, that all our fathers were under the cloud; and all were baptized into Moses in the cloud and in the sea; and all ate the same spiritual food, and all drank the same spiritual drink. For they drank from the spiritual rock that followed them. The rock was Christ." He said that those were our figures, whom no faithful person ever contradicted. And while he enumerated many things, he resolved one thing only, because he said: "The rock was Christ." By solving one thing, he proposed that the rest should be investigated: but lest the inquirer, departing from Christ, should err, he should firmly seek founded on the rock; "The rock," he said, "was Christ." He mentioned that those figures were ours, and all were obscure. Who would unravel these figurative veils? Who would open them? Who would dare to discuss them? In some very dense thickets and thick shadows, he lit a light: "The rock," he said, "was Christ." Therefore, since the light has been introduced, let us seek what the rest signifies: what is meant by the sea, the cloud, and the manna. For he did not explain these but showed what the rock was. The passage through the sea is Baptism. But because baptism, that is, water of salvation, is not of salvation unless consecrated in the name of Christ, who shed His blood for us, the water is marked with His cross. To signify this, that baptism was the Red Sea. The manna from heaven is openly explained by the Lord Himself. "Your fathers ate," he said, "manna in the desert and died." For how could they live when the figure could only preannounce life, but not be life itself? "They ate," he said, "manna, and died"; that is, the manna which they ate could not free them from death: not that the manna itself was death to them, but because it did not free them from death. He was to free from death who was prefigured by the manna. Surely the manna came from heaven, see whom it prefigured: "I," he said, "am the living bread that came down from heaven." But as diligent and well-watching students, attend to the words of the Lord so that you may profit and learn to read and hear. He said: "They ate the same spiritual food." What is "the same," if not that which we also eat? I see it is somewhat difficult to express and explain what I intend to say: but I will be helped by your goodwill, that I may obtain this ability from the Lord. "They ate," he said, "the same spiritual food." It would have sufficed to say: "They ate spiritual food." He said "the same." How can I understand "the same" except that it is the same food which we eat? What then, someone might say, was that manna the same as what I now receive? Therefore, nothing comes now if it had already been before. Therefore, the scandal of the cross is voided. So how "the same," unless he added spiritual? For those who took that manna in such a way as to think of it only as satisfying their bodily necessity and feeding their stomach, not their mind; they ate nothing great, but their necessity was satisfied. God fed others, and to others, He announced something. Such as these ate bodily food, not spiritual food. Whom then does he say were our fathers who ate the same spiritual food? Whom do we think, brothers, but those who truly were our fathers? Indeed, they were not our fathers but are still. All those live. For the Lord says to some infidels: "Your fathers ate manna in the desert and died." What does it mean: "Your fathers," if not those whose unbelief you imitate, whose ways you follow by not believing and resisting God? In that sense, he says to some: "You are from your father the devil." For the devil neither created any man by power nor generated anyone by begetting; yet he is called the father of the wicked, not by generation, but by imitation. Conversely, it is said of the good: "You, therefore, are the seed of Abraham"; when speaking to Gentiles who did not take their lineage from the lineage of Abraham by the flesh. They were sons not by being born, but by imitating. Abraham is also renounced and alienated by the unfaithful when the Lord says to them: "If you were Abraham's children, you would do the works of Abraham." And to remove from Abraham's fatherhood those bad trees boasting of their descent from Abraham, children of Abraham are promised from stones. Therefore, just as in this place it is said: "Your fathers ate manna in the desert and died"; they did not understand what they ate; and thus understanding not, they took food only bodily: so also the Apostle says, "Our fathers," not the fathers of the infidels, not the fathers of the wicked, who ate and died; but "our fathers," the fathers of the faithful, ate spiritual food, and therefore "the same." "Our fathers," he said, "ate the same spiritual food and drank the same spiritual drink. For there were those who understood what they ate: there were those to whom Christ in their hearts tasted sweeter than manna in their mouths. Why speak of others? There was first Moses himself, the servant of God, faithful in all His house, knowing what he dispensed, and how the mysteries of the present should be thus dispensed, closed to the present, open to the future. Therefore, briefly I will say, whoever understood Christ in the manna, ate the same spiritual food as we; but whoever sought only satiation from the manna, ate the fathers of the infidels and died. Similarly, the same drink: "The rock was Christ." Therefore, the same drink as we, but spiritual; that is, which was grasped by faith, not which was drank by the body. You heard the same drink: "The rock was Christ"; for it was not another Christ then, and another now. That rock was different, that stone placed at the head of Jacob was different; that lamb slain to eat the Passover was different, that ram caught in the thicket to be sacrificed, when Abraham, commanded, spared his son by God's order; that sheep and that sheep, that stone and that stone, yet the same Christ; therefore, the same food, the same drink. Finally, that rock was struck by a rod so that water flowed: for the rod was struck. Why by a rod, not iron, unless because the cross approached Christ to bestow grace upon us? Therefore, the same food, the same drink, but to those understanding and believing. But to those not understanding, it was only that manna, only that water; that food to the hungry, this drink to the thirsty; neither that nor this to the believer: to the believer, the same as now. For Christ was to come, Christ has come. "To come" and "has come" are different words, but the same Christ. The figurative doubt of Moses.

Something also, since the matter has come up, I want to say about the doubt of God's servant Moses. For this too was a figure of the saints of old. Moses doubted at the water, when he struck the rock with the rod so that water might flow; he doubted. However, anyone reading about his doubt might just pass over it and not understand, because he would not dare to ask. But the Lord God was displeased with that doubt, and noted it, not only by reprimanding but also by punishing. For because of this doubt, it is said to Moses: You will not lead this people into the land of promise. Go up the mountain and die. Here indeed God appears angry. What then about Moses, my brothers? All his effort, all his fervor for the people, and that love saying: If you forgive their sin, forgive; but if not, blot me out of your book, is condemned by this sudden and unexpected doubt?

And what was concluded by the reader when he read the Apostle: Love never fails? As I was about to propose certain points for discussion, your eagerness led me to propose another, which perhaps you would not have asked. So let us see, and still try to penetrate the mystery as much as we can. God is angry, declares that Moses will not lead the people into the land of promise; he commands him to go up the mountain and die. And yet he enjoins many tasks upon this same Moses: orders him what to do, how to organize the people, how not to leave them disordered and neglected. He would never deign to impose such tasks on one condemned. Consider something even more astonishing. Since it was said to Moses (for it pleased God for the sake of a certain mystery and dispensation) that he himself would not lead the people into the land of promise, another was chosen, Joshua son of Nun; and this man was not called by this name, but by the name Hoshea. And when Moses entrusted the people to him to lead, he called him, changed his name, and called him Joshua: so that not by Moses, but by Joshua, that is not by the law, but by grace, the people of God might enter into the land of promise. Just as Joshua was a figure and not the true one, so also that land of promise was not the true one, but a figure. For that first people had a temporal land: the one promised to us will be eternal. But the eternal was promised and foretold by temporal figures. So just as Joshua was not the true Jesus, nor that land of promise the true land, but a figure, so the manna was not truly the heavenly food, but a figure; the rock was not truly Christ, but a figure, and all things so. What then does the doubt of Moses demand of us for consideration? Lest perhaps some figure also was expressed there, and it hinted to the understanding and provoked the mind to inquiry. For I see that after that doubt, and after God's anger, and after the threats of death, and after being removed from leading the people into the land of promise, God still speaks to Moses in many ways, as to a friend, just as he spoke before: so much so that Joshua son of Nun is presented to obedience as an example from Moses, and God advises him in this way, to serve as Moses served; and he promises to be with him as he was with Moses. Evidently, dearest ones, God himself constrains us not to reproach indiscriminately, but to understand the doubt of Moses. The rock lying there was a figure, the rod striking was a figure, the water flowing was a figure, and Moses doubting was a figure. And he doubted when he struck. Hence the doubt of Moses arose when the wood came near the rock. Now let the quick fly ahead, or rather let the slow wait patiently. Moses doubted when the wood came near the rock: the disciples doubted when they saw the Lord crucified. Moses bore their figure. It was a figure of Peter denying thrice. Why did Peter doubt? Because the wood approached the rock. When the Lord foretold the kind of death he was going to die, that is, the cross itself, Peter was terrified: Far be it from you, Lord, this shall not happen. You doubt because you see the rod drawing near to the rock. Therefore the hope they had in the Lord, the disciples then lost: it was in a way intercepted, when they saw him crucified, when they mourned the slain. He found them after the resurrection talking among themselves about this matter, with sad conversation; and withholding their eyes so that they might not recognize him, not removing himself from believers, but deferring his doubting ones, he mingled himself as a third interlocutor in their conversation and asked them about what they were speaking. They were amazed, because he alone was ignorant of what had happened to him who was asking. Are you the only one, they say, who is a stranger in Jerusalem? And they recall the events concerning Jesus. And immediately they reveal the depths of their despair, and show the wound to the doctor unknowingly: But we had hoped that he was the one to redeem Israel. Behold, doubt arose because the wood approached the rock: the figure of Moses was fulfilled.

Moses dying on the mountain, what he prefigured.

Let us also consider this: "Go up into the mountain and die." The bodily death of Moses symbolized the death of his own doubt; but on the mountain. O wondrous mysteries! Surely this, when explained and understood, is sweeter than manna? Doubt was born at the rock, it died on the mountain. When Christ was humble in His passion, He lay before the eyes like a rock: rightly, doubt surrounded Him, that humility pretended nothing great. Rightly, through that humility, He became a stone of offense: but by the resurrection, being glorified, He appeared great, He is now a mountain. Therefore now let that doubt, which was born at the rock, die on the mountain. Let the disciples recognize their salvation, let them call back their hope. Notice how that doubt dies, notice how Moses dies on the mountain. He does not enter the promised land: we do not want doubt there; let it die. Let Christ show us it dying. Peter trembled: and denied three times. For the rock was Christ. He has risen, He has become a mountain: He strengthened Peter too. But doubt dies. How does it die? "Peter, do you love me?" The inspector of hearts, the knower of hearts asks; and He wants to hear that He is loved, and once is not enough. He asks this, he hears it almost to Peter’s weariness: for Peter marvels that he is asked by the one who foreknows, but also that he is asked so many times when it would suffice to respond once even to someone who did not know. But it is as if the Lord said to you: I wait, let the legitimate number be fulfilled: let him confess love three times, because he denied three times out of fear. Therefore, when the Lord asked so many times, He was killing that doubt on the mountain.

Invites to Baptism. The hands of Moses against Amalek now extended, now lowered.

What then, beloved, if these things are evident? They were not hidden for deceit, but for delight. For they would not be captured so sweetly if they were cheap and easy. Let the one aspiring to Baptism, whom I have begun to address, consider their business. The Red Sea was Baptism; the people crossing were being baptized, and the crossing itself was Baptism, but in the cloud. For what was foretold was still veiled; what was promised was still hidden. But now the cloud has departed; the serenity of manifest truth has come forth: for the veil through which Moses spoke has been removed. This veil also hung in the temple so that the secrets of the temple would not be seen: but on the Lord's cross, the veil was torn, so that they would be revealed. Therefore, come to Baptism: enter the way through the Red Sea without fear; do not be concerned about past sin as if worried about the pursuing Egyptian. Your sins oppressed you with the harsh burden of servitude, but in Egypt, that is, in the love of this world, in a long wandering; they forced you to pursue earthly works, as if making bricks, you worked with clay. Your sins oppress you, come confidently to Baptism: the enemy can follow you up to the water, there he shall die. Fear nothing from past life, believe that none of your sins will remain, if none of the Egyptians remained. I hear the voice of the lazy: I, he says, do not fear past sins, I do not doubt that all were forgiven me in the holy water through the charity of the Church; but I fear future sins. Then does it please you to remain in Egypt? For now, escape the present enemy who has already oppressed and subdued you. Why do you worry about future enemies? What you have already done will be, even if you do not wish it: what you think you will commit, if you do not wish it, it will not be. But the way is perilous: for even after crossing the Red Sea, you will not yet be in the promised land: that people were led through long deserts. For now, liberate from Egypt. Do you think you will lack a helper on the way, He who rescued you from the old captivity? Will He not restrain your new enemies, who freed you from your old ones? Just pass without fear, walk without fear, be obedient: do not embitter that Moses whose type he carried in this obedience. I admit, enemies are not lacking. For just as there were not lacking those who pursued the fleeing, so there were not lacking those who hindered the walkers. Truly, beloved, these were figures of us. For now, do not be something that saddens Moses: do not be the bitter water that the people could not drink after the Red Sea. For there was also temptation there. And yet when such things happen, when the people embitter, we show them Christ, what He bore for them, how He shed His blood for them: and they soften, as if we were throwing a piece of wood into the water. Indeed, you will have an enemy opposing your journey, Amalek. Then Moses prayed, then he stretched out his hands: and when he lowered his hands, Amalek grew stronger; when he stretched out his hands, Amalek weakened. And let your hands be stretched out, let Amalek, the tempter and hinderer of this journey, weaken: be vigilant and sober in prayers, in good works, yet never apart from Christ, for that stretching out of hands was the cross of Christ. The Apostle is stretched out in that when he says: The world has been crucified to me, and I to the world. So let Amalek weaken, be conquered, and not hinder the passage of the people of God. If you drop your hands from good work, from the cross of Christ; Amalek will prevail. However, do not think that you will always or immediately be strong, nor completely despair. That alternation of weakness and strength in the hands of God's servant Moses might have been your alternation. Sometimes you falter in temptations, but you do not succumb. He would drop his hands for a little while, but he did not fall completely. If I said: My foot slipped; Your mercy, O Lord, supported me. Therefore, do not fear: a helper is present on the journey, the one who was not absent in Egypt as a liberator. Do not fear, undertake the way, proceed confidently. Sometimes he lowered his hands, sometimes he raised them; yet Amalek was defeated. He could rebel, yet he could not overcome. The other penance which is daily for everyone.

Therefore, we are now admonished to speak of another kind of repentance. I have proposed that its consideration is threefold in the Holy Scripture. The first is that of those who are competent and eagerly coming to Baptism: I have shown this from the Holy Scriptures. There is another kind, however, which is daily. And where do we show this daily repentance? I have no better place to show it than in the daily prayer, where the Lord taught us to pray, showing us what to say to the Father, and He placed it in these words: "Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors." What debts, brothers? Since debts here cannot be understood as anything other than sins; the debts which He forgave in Baptism, are we praying again that they be forgiven? Certainly, every Egyptian who followed us is dead. If none of the enemies who pursued us remain, what do we pray to be forgiven, except because of hands weary against Amalek? “Forgive us, as we forgive." He has established a remedy, He confirmed a covenant. Here He dictates prayers, there He responds to the one praying: He knows by what law things are conducted in heaven, how what is desired can be obtained. Do you want to be forgiven? Forgive, He says. For what do you have that you can offer to God, from whom you seek to be granted something? Is Christ the Savior now walking on earth? Is Zacchaeus joyfully receiving Him into his house? Is Martha preparing a lodging and a meal for Him? He needs none of these, for He sits at the right hand of the Father. But when you have done it for one of the least of these, you have done it for Me. This is the extension of hands under which Amalek fell. You indeed give to the poor when you offer something to the hungry: perhaps you will have less of what you give, but in your house, not in heaven. But even here on earth, He who commanded you to give will supply what you gave. When the Apostle spoke of this, he said: "He who supplies seed to the sower and bread for food will supply and multiply your seed for sowing and increase the harvest of your righteousness." For you are God’s workman when you give to the needy: you sow in winter what you will reap in summer. Why then do you fear, O faithless one, that in this great house such a great master of the household will not feed His laborer? He will provide there also, but what is sufficient for you. God will give all that is necessary, not to covetousness. Therefore work confidently, extend your hands, let Amalek fall. But from here, as I said, when you give something in your house, you perhaps see less of what you once saw there: but you do not see it there when you give it until God gives again. Tell me, when you forgive from the heart, what do you lose? When you forgive someone who sins against you, what do you have less in your heart? For you forgive from there, but you lose nothing. Truly, a wave of charity was flowing in your heart, and it seemed to gush from an inward spring: you hold hatred against your brother; you have obstructed the fountain. Therefore not only do you lose nothing when you forgive; but you are also more abundantly watered. Charity is not constrained. You place there a stumbling block, and you make tight spaces for yourself. “I will avenge myself, I will take revenge, I will show him, I will act:" you are agitated, you labor, when you can be secure by forgiving, live in security, pray in security. For behold what are you about to do? You are about to pray. What will I say when? Today you are going to pray. Will you not pray? Filled with anger and hatred, you threaten revenge: you do not forgive from the heart. Behold you pray, behold the hour for prayer comes, you begin to either hear or say those words. Having said and heard the previous words, you will come to this verse. Or if you do not come to it, where will you go? Not to forgive your enemy, you will deviate from Christ? Plainly if you deviate in prayer to not want to say: "Forgive us our debts," because you cannot say: "as we forgive our debtors," lest you are quickly answered: "So I forgive as you forgive," therefore because you cannot say this and do not want to forgive, you will deviate from this verse and skip it, and say what follows: "Lead us not into temptation;" there your creditor will catch you, whose face you were avoiding. How, as one encountering someone in the street to whom he owes something, if there is an alley nearby, he stops what he was doing and goes by another path, so that he does not see the face of his creditor. You thought you did this in this verse: you avoided saying: "Forgive, as I forgive;" lest He forgive in that way, that is to not forgive, because you do not forgive; and you did not want to say it, avoiding the face of your creditor. Whom are you avoiding? Whom are you avoiding? Where will you go where you can be and He not be? Will you say: "Where will I go from your spirit? And where will I flee from your face? If I ascend to heaven, you are there; if I descend to hell, you are there." As much as the debtor can flee from Christ, how can he not go to hell? This creditor is also there. What will you do next, except what follows? "If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea;" that is, I will meditate on the end of the world with my hope, I will live in your precepts, I will rise with the two wings of charity. Therefore fulfill the two wings of charity. Love your neighbor as yourself; and do not hold onto hatred, from which you flee from your creditor. A third kind of penance for mortal sins. Pardon should not be despaired of.

There remains a third kind of penance, about which I will briefly speak, so that with the Lord's help, I may fulfill the proposed and promised. It is a graver and more sorrowful penance, in which penitents are specifically called in the Church, even removed from the Sacrament of the altar to participate, lest by receiving undeservedly, they eat and drink judgment upon themselves. That penance, therefore, is sorrowful. It is a grievous wound: perhaps committed adultery, perhaps homicide, perhaps some sacrilege, a grave matter, a grievous wound, lethal, deadly: but an omnipotent physician. Now after the suggestion of the deed and delight and consent and perpetration, the dead four days putrefy: but not even he did the Lord abandon, but cried out: Lazarus, come forth. The mass of the grave yielded to the voice of mercy: death yielded to life, hell yielded to the heavenly. Lazarus was raised, came forth from the tomb: and he was bound, just as men are bound in the confession of sin doing penance. They have already come forth from death: for they would not confess, unless they came forth. To confess itself is to come forth from the hidden and the dark. But what did the Lord say to his Church? "Whatever you bind on earth," he says, "will also be bound in heaven." Therefore, as Lazarus comes forth, because the Lord completed his good work of mercy to bring the dead to confession, latent, putrefying; the rest he leaves to the ministry of the Church: "Unbind him, and let him go." But, dearest ones, let no one propose this kind of penance for themselves, let no one prepare themselves for this: yet if perhaps it happens, let no one despair. Judas the traitor perished utterly not so much on account of the crime he committed, but because of despairing of forgiveness. He was not worthy of mercy, therefore, the light did not shine in his heart, to run to the forgiveness of the one he had betrayed, like those who had crucified him; but despairing, he killed himself, and hanged himself with a noose, suffocated himself. What he did to his body, this also happened to his soul. For the spirit is called even this wind of the air. Just as those who tie a noose around their necks kill themselves from it, because the spirit of this air does not enter them: so those who despair of God's forgiveness, by that very despair suffocate themselves within, such that the Holy Spirit cannot visit them. The pagans deny that permission for repentance is given, a license to sin.

Pagans are accustomed to mock Christians regarding the repentance that is established in the Church. Against certain heresies, the Catholic Church has held onto this truth about performing repentance. For there were those who would say that repentance should not be granted for certain sins; and they were excluded from the Church and became heretics. In whatever sins, the holy mother Church does not lose her mercy. Therefore, the Pagans are also accustomed to mock us about this, not knowing what they are saying; for they have not yet come to the word of God, which makes the tongues of infants articulate. They say, "You cause people to sin, when you promise them forgiveness if they do penance. This is a dissolution, not an admonition." They exaggerate the words in this sense as much as each person can; whether with a sounding or faltering tongue, they do not keep silent: yet, even when we speak to them, although they are defeated, they do not agree. However, let your Charity briefly understand how they are defeated, because the Lord's mercy has very well established everything in His Church. They say we give license to sins because we promise a harbor of repentance. If the entrance to repentance were closed, would not that sinner add sins to sins all the more, the more he would despair of being forgiven? For he would say to himself: "Behold, I have sinned, behold, I have committed a crime, now there is no place for forgiveness for me; repentance is unfruitful, I am to be condemned: why then should I not live as I want? Since I find no love there, at least here I will satisfy my greed. Why should I refrain? Every place is closed to me there, here, whatever I do not do, I lose; because the life that is to come after this will not be given to me. Why then should I not serve my desires, to fulfill and satisfy them, and do whatever is not lawful but is pleasing?" He would perhaps be told: "But wretch, you will be caught, you will be accused, you will be tortured, you will be punished." Evil men know that these things are said by men and are enforced among men; they observe many living wickedly and criminally without their sins being punished: they can hide them, ransom what they cannot hide; ransom their lascivious, blasphemous, sacrilegious, lost life until old age. They count up for themselves: "What? That man who did so much, did he not die an old man?" Do you not consider that God showed patience in that wicked old man, waiting for his repentance? Hence the Apostle says: "Do you not know that the patience of God is leading you to repentance?" But he, according to the hardness of his heart and his impenitent heart, has stored up for himself wrath in the day of wrath and the revelation of the righteous judgment of God, who will render to each according to his deeds. Therefore, it is necessary that this fear possess minds, it is necessary that he who does not want to sin, considers God present, not only in public, but also at home; not only at home, but even in the bedroom, in the night, on his bed, in his heart. Therefore, if you take away the harbor of repentance, they will increase their sins out of despair. Behold, they say nothing, those who think that sins increase because the harbor of repentance is proposed in the Christian faith. What then? Should God not have provided from the beginning, lest through that hope of indulgence sins might once again increase? Just as He provided that they should not increase through despair, so He ought to have provided that they should not increase through hope. Just as he who despairs truly increases his sins, so too might he who hopes for pardon increase his sins: saying to himself, "I will do what I want; God is good, when I turn, He will forgive me." Thus plainly say to yourself: "When I turn, He will forgive me," if the next day is certain for you. Does not Scripture admonish you for this, saying: "Do not delay to turn to the Lord, nor defer from day to day; for suddenly His wrath will come, and in the time of vengeance He will destroy you"? Behold, God's providence has watched over us in both respects. Repentance is proposed as a harbor so that we do not increase sins through despair: again, so that we do not increase sins through hope, the day of death is given as uncertain.

Sermons - Sermon 352A

SERMON 352/A

1. Today, as we celebrate the nativity of John, hear what the Gospel says about him. He is indeed a great and marvelous person, who manifested in his own time, in the birth, and in the deeds. For as regards births, we know that every creature is born of man and woman, but he was born of an old and barren couple. They manifestly show other things regarding this, that it was arranged by divine grace, not by human nature.

2. And therefore, let us hear what the Gospel tells about his coming. His father Zacharias was a priest, and his mother Elizabeth was of the daughters of Aaron. And they were just before God, walking in all the commandments and justifications of the Lord, unblamable. But they had no child, because Elizabeth was barren, and they both were now well advanced in years.

3. Now while he executed the priest's office before God in the order of his course, according to the custom of the priest's office, his lot was to burn incense when he went into the temple of the Lord. And there appeared to him an angel of the Lord standing on the right side of the altar of incense. And when Zacharias saw him, he was troubled, and fear fell upon him.

4. But the angel said to him, "Fear not, Zacharias: for your prayer is heard; and your wife Elizabeth shall bear you a son, and you shall call his name John. And you shall have joy and gladness; and many shall rejoice at his birth. For he shall be great in the sight of the Lord, and shall drink neither wine nor strong drink; and he shall be filled with the Holy Ghost, even from his mother's womb."

5. So much did the angel announce; but hear what further he added concerning him: “And many of the children of Israel shall he turn to the Lord their God. And he shall go before him in the spirit and power of Elias, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just; to make ready a people prepared for the Lord.”

6. Therefore, brethren, he is that great and magnificent man, who can be proclaimed neither by words nor understood by human intellect, concerning whom the Lord bears witness, saying, “Among those that are born of women there has not risen a greater than John the Baptist.”

Sermon of Saint Augustine on the words of the Gospel: The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God has drawn near.

Repent and believe in the Gospel "The voice of mercy sounds before the tribunal of justice comes."

Lord Jesus, the author of the holy Gospel, wanting no one to perish by the law of mercy, since He came to save what was lost, as if in a proclamation to the human race, cried out, as we have heard: "The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God has come near; repent and believe in the Gospel." The creator of the world uttered this voice, and the world heard. Let what He said be done—He who came to aid, lest He come to judge the despisers. Let it be done while the voice of mercy sounds, before the tribunal of justice comes. To whom it is said in the psalm: "I will sing of mercy and justice to you, O Lord," He Himself maintained the order of His assistance. First, He came to bestow mercy; He will come to exercise judgment. For I will sing not of judgment, but of mercy and judgment to You, O Lord. What greater mercy can be desired, asked, demanded, than that God did not spare His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, that with Him He might freely give us all things? What greater mercy than to come to die not for the righteous, but for the ungodly? What greater mercy than to come and to condemn not those deserving condemnation, but to free those unworthy of freedom?

Let us renounce dead works, let us believe in the living God. But do not disdain this mercy, my brothers. The Lord is merciful and compassionate. Add yet: long-suffering. Add yet: and greatly merciful. Fear what follows: and truthful. Let us not scorn the merciful one, to experience the truthful one! What then is necessary for us to cry out? Rather, let us hear Him crying out: For the times are fulfilled. For the fullness of time has come, as the apostle says, and in the fullness of time God sent His Son, born of a woman, born under the law, to redeem those under the law, that we might receive adoption as sons. Commending this fullness of time, the Lord said: The times are fulfilled; He came expected by a few, found by many. Therefore, the times are fulfilled: repent. How long has this been proclaimed, and that it might someday be heard: For the times are fulfilled and the kingdom of God has drawn near, repent and believe in the gospel! Renounce and convert. This is what repent and believe in the gospel means: renounce dead works, believe in the living God. What does it profit to believe without good works? The merit of good works did not bring you to faith, but faith begins, so that good works may follow. This is said to the holy Church in the Song of Songs: Come, my bride, you will come, and pass through from the beginning of faith. But who believes in God unless he has renounced the devil? Therefore, so that you may renounce, repent; believe, so that you may be saved.

Repentance is necessary for all. This was said to the Jews, it was said to the idolatrous Gentiles. Must it still be said to Christians? Must it still be said to Christians daily reading that the times are , must it still be said to Christians that the kingdom of heaven has drawn near, must it still be said to Christians: Repent and believe in the gospel? Clearly, whom I say: Believe in the gospel, is not yet Christian. No one, I believe, hears me in this crowd, who does not yet believe in the gospel. Many hear me who have not yet been made faithful through baptism, and are still catechumens: not yet born, but already conceived. But when or how could they be conceived in the womb of mother Church unless by some sacrament of faith they were marked? Many baptized also hear me and, neglecting the grace of God within themselves, loving to sin. And what shall I say to them: The times are fulfilled? They respond: "We know." The kingdom of God has drawn near? They respond: "We heard long ago, long ago we believed." What then shall I say? Since I speak to men who love to sin, despising the grace of the redeemer within themselves, what shall I say? Repent. Indeed, I will say it, even if they do not allow me to say: The times are fulfilled, because they know it; The kingdom of heaven has drawn near, because they also know this; the last point which was placed: Believe in the gospel, they do not allow me to say to themselves, because they have already believed; for hear: Repent, because they have not yet done it. Hence, let us speak to the catechumens and to the negligent faithful. Let the diligent hear, for they too cannot be absent from the members of Christ. Let them not think me verbose and superfluous, if they have charity: it is a common concern; they want me to speak also to those whom they wish corrected along with me.

The apostles proclaim that repentance is the way of salvation.

Therefore, let them hear me not saying: "The times are fulfilled, the kingdom of heaven is at hand, believe in the gospel," but saying: "Repent." The catechumen responds to me: "Why do you say to us: 'Repent'? Let me first become a believer, and perhaps I will live well, and I will not need to repent." I answer such people: To become believers, repent. For those coming to baptism come through repentance. For unless they condemn their old life through repentance, they will not come fitly to new life. In saying this, I did not presume beyond measure or claim for myself something unusual in the Scripture of God. Let the catechumens listen to the Acts of the Apostles. When the apostles, filled with the Holy Spirit, were speaking to the crowds, because they were speaking in all tongues, the amazed and more attentive crowds heard the word of God from the apostles. All, because they were men of various languages, were pierced to the heart, and because they were Jews, they regretted crucifying Christ, and troubled for their salvation and fearing the certain condemnation for such a great crime, they said to the apostles: "What shall we do, brothers?" And the apostles said: "Repent, and let each of you be baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ." You have heard how those not yet baptized were ordered to come to baptism through repentance. Therefore, we shall also say this to the catechumens. For we have recalled the testimony of the Scriptures, lest they might think we imprudently told them that we were eager for them to be repentant before they were faithful.

"First listen to (God) commanding, and then demand Him promising."

Now truly, those who are faithful and live badly, do not think that I am impudently saying to them: Repent. Now therefore I will speak to both: Change your life, lest you lose your life. Condemn past sins, fear future evils, and hope for good. An evil man first does not contradict himself that he hopes for good, who is not good. You hope for good: be what you hope for. First listen to the one who commands, and then demand from the one who promises. God has made Himself a debtor to you not by lending, but by promising. For who has known the mind of the Lord, or who has been His counselor, or who has given to Him first and it shall be repaid to him? What did He receive from you, who gave everything to you? Therefore He deigned to become a debtor, because He promised, and to become a debtor in such a way that He even made a pledge. This pledge is the gospel, the Scripture, in which God has made Himself your debtor, not by lending, as I said, but by promising. Therefore listen: Repent, believe in the gospel. Hear the command, and then demand the pledge. "Tomorrow," he says. For he found nothing to say to me, placed before his face and now displeasing to his own eyes. How much more, therefore, to the purer eyes of God! When, therefore, he displeased himself in evil habits, he said, "Tomorrow I will correct it; do not urge me, let today also pass. Why rush? Tomorrow I will correct it. Why rush about today?" Because the day does not stand at your disposal. All their dispute is about postponement. Since they say: "Let today pass as yesterday. Tomorrow I will correct myself, I will change, I will amend, I will fulfill what is commanded: I will repent," this is entirely about postponing. Tomorrow is not far off. But see that, just as you wished today to be like yesterday, so you do not want tomorrow to be like today. Although I could say: Why not today, but tomorrow, when you do not know what will happen to you tomorrow? But behold, let us bear it. Do not make tomorrow like today. "For," he says, "if I do, do I not hold what is written: On whatever day the wicked and impious man turns, I will forget all his injustices? It is said, and divinely said." I confess: it is written divinely. How well you remember the pledge of God! You hold what is owed to you, you forget what you owe.

People sin by despairing or by presuming too much.

Wicked people, unaware of the law, exiled from the grace of God, unworthy of the mercy of God, hear these things because it is said in our Scripture: "On whatever day the wicked shall have turned away, I will forget all his wicked deeds," and they say to us: "You make people sin, who promise such great impunity to those who suddenly turn back." For do we dare not promise what God has promised? "It is not a good law," they say, "which makes sinners abound." I wish to know who speaks, whether he does not judge himself a sinner. And does he get angry with God who waits, whom God waits for? What if God did not promise this, who leads to repentance by His patience? If He did not promise this, would not more people become sinners out of despair? Let your charity attend for a moment. Who is found not to be a sinner? Weak flesh, frail age, limited sense, anxious mind, ignorant of the nature of things, to what great sins do they plunge the unwary and the negligent? How many can appear and exist who would not be convinced to be sinners? Take away this mercy, take away this promised forgiveness, take away the port of indulgence in this most turbulent sea of iniquities, let there be no refuge for the wavering: would not despair add sin to sins, and would they not say to themselves: "I am already a sinner, there is no mercy for sinners, inevitably damnation is due? Why do I not do what I want, why do I not fulfill my desires, why not just now accomplish whatever delights me, about to lose this life, receiving no other later?" Thus are desperate gladiators, whence even the proverb arose: "From behind by the wounded." For the wounded seeks where to die, nor does he hesitate to do evil, because he hopes for no indulgence. He lets loose the loosest reins to his desires, is carried wherever he can, desires it to be lawful for himself to do whatever he wants: he perishes therefore by despairing. But you also do not perish by hoping. Two voices, both contrary, both dangerous, by which men perish, yet God did not despise either voice: He cared for both this one and that one. What are those two voices? "Why should I not sin, why should I not do whatever I want? When I repent, all will be forgiven me." Such people perish by hoping. Another voice from the opposite side, indeed contrary, but equally dangerous. "Why should I not do whatever I want, for whom no mercy is due, for whom no indulgence will be given? I will do whatever I want." They perish by despairing.

About those who perish by distorted hope.

What should I accuse first: false hope or unfaithful despair? What do you lose by hoping, what do you lose by despairing? Let those who want to perish by hoping hear a few things: Return, transgressors, to the heart. Hear God saying, because you say: "Tomorrow, tomorrow", do not delay to turn to the Lord.

I say to you, who prepare to turn to the Lord, but delay; I say to you, whom I fear that hope will destroy: hear not me, but Him from whom you hope and by whom excessive hoping causes you to perish: Do not delay to turn to the Lord, nor defer from day to day. For suddenly His wrath will come, and in the time of vengeance He will destroy you. Where is what you said: "I defer to tomorrow and tomorrow to another tomorrow, because God promised me forgiveness saying: On whatever day the sinner turns; for He did not say: If he turns today, but: On whatever day he turns"? God answers you: "I promised you forgiveness, I did not promise you tomorrow." Or do you perhaps wish to combine and unite two promises, what God promised, and what the astrologer promised? For God promised forgiveness, the astrologer perhaps promised you tomorrow. Observe, wretch: the astrologer is deceived, and God condemns you.

How many have been suddenly taken and were not allowed to make satisfaction to God nor to accuse the astrologers.

He who perishes by despair perishes badly.

Let him who has perished by despairing hear what he said: "I have already committed so many evils that I hope for no forgiveness. It remains to fulfill my lusts, to satiate my delights, so that I may at least have rest here, which I will not have there." Listen also to the voice of God, not your own: "Despairing one, return to hope." Hear Paul saying: "Therefore I obtained mercy - who persecuted the Church of God - so that in me Jesus Christ might show all longsuffering, for the information of those who would believe in Him unto eternal life." Therefore you have the pattern: do not despair, heed the admonition that was recently quoted with ill hope, and let the despairing be corrected by it. What did you hear? From where he was flattering himself, because he was delaying from day to day? "God is to me, God, on whichever day the wicked and the impious turns, I will forget all his iniquities." Read and return. You were sitting over the bank, or you were carrying a noose by despairing, wishing to bring death upon yourself, perhaps not having any means to live, you wished to die: return, you have the means to live: behold the bread of God. I do not desire the death of the wicked, but that he should return and live.

"There is no reason for us to complain about God."

Therefore, brothers, there is no reason for us to complain about God; there is nothing for the perverse to dislike, although it cannot displease anyone except the perverse. The right does not please the perverse, and the distorted cannot be adjusted to the right. For there is nothing to be said. You were saying: "Behold, Christians grant impunity: they make sin abound." I have given the reason, because more people would perish in despair if no harbor of mercy were offered to those in turmoil. Thus, God has not abandoned either the poorly hopeful or the poorly despairing. For the poorly despairing, He provided a harbor of mercy; for the poorly hopeful, He made the day of death uncertain. There is nothing to be said, but there is something to be done. So let them say to me: "What are we to do?" Those who are moved by the word of truth; let them say not with their voices, but with their hearts: "What then are we to do?" What else should I answer, except what we have heard: Repent? What more can I say? Repent. You are a catechumen: repent and you will be renewed; you have been baptized badly, not badly baptized: repent and you will be healed. I do not find anything for you to say to this; you know what you must do. Converted...

Sermons - Sermon 353

SERMO 353 ON THE EIGHTH DAY OF THE INFANTS: WHICH HE EXHORTS WITH THE WORDS OF THE APOSTLE PETER: "LAYING ASIDE, THEREFORE, ALL MALICE", AND SO ON.

Moral exhortations. The speech of the anxious pastor may indeed summon the ears and minds of all those whom our care encompasses: however, it is now specifically directed to you, whose recent infancy is distinguished by the cradles of the sacraments of spiritual generation. For to you especially through the apostle Peter, the divine word thus tenderly speaks: "Therefore, laying aside all malice and all deceit, and hypocrisy and envy and all evil speaking, as newborn babes, desire the pure, rational, innocent milk, that you may grow thereby unto salvation, if indeed you have tasted that the Lord is gracious." Therefore, since you have tasted, we are witnesses: we have ministered this sweetness to you with the duty of a nurse. Hence, acting like innocent infants, lay aside malice, deceit, hypocrisy, envy, and evil speaking. You ought to hold this innocence in such a way that you do not lose it as you grow. What is malice, except the love of harming? What is deceit, except to act one way and pretend another? What is hypocrisy, except seduction under false praise? What is envy, except hatred of another's happiness? What is evil speaking, except more biting than truthful reproach? Malice delights in another's harm: envy is tormented by another's good: deceit doubles the heart: hypocrisy doubles the tongue: evil speaking wounds the reputation. But this innocence of your holiness, since it is the daughter of charity, does not rejoice in iniquity, but rejoices with the truth. Simple as a dove, and thus wise as a serpent, not with the intention of harming, but of avoiding harm.

I exhort you to this. For of such is the kingdom of heaven, namely, of the humble, that is, of those who are spiritually little. Do not despise, do not shun. This littleness belongs to the great. But pride is the deceptive greatness of the weak; which, when it has possessed the mind, by lifting up casts down, by inflating empties, by distending dissipates. He who is humble cannot be harmful, he who is proud cannot be innocent. I speak of that humility which does not wish to excel in perishable things, but sincerely thinks of something eternal, which it may attain not by its own strength but by being helped. This cannot want anyone's harm, by which its own good is not increased. Moreover, pride immediately begets envy. For who is envious, who does not wish ill to him whose good torments him? And thus envy consequently begets malice: whence comes both deceit and flattery and detraction, and every evil work which you would not wish to suffer from another. Therefore, having preserved pious humility, which in the holy Scriptures is proved to be holy infancy, you will be secure concerning the immortality of the blessed: For of such is the kingdom of heaven.

How those who have become the temple of God must walk on the journey.

Moreover, he who is not arrogant towards men should not be obstinate against God: because if one should not do to another what he does not wish to suffer from another, and no man wishes to suffer disobedience from one who is subject to his authority; how much more should it be avoided that anyone should act towards God in a way that he would not want a man to act towards himself?

Therefore, they deceive their own souls who think it is sufficient if they do to no man what they do not want done to themselves, and so corrupt themselves with a luxurious life as to try to do to God what they do not want done to them by any man. For they do not want their house to be destroyed by anyone, who in their miserable blindness destroy the house of God in themselves, deaf to the Apostle crying out: "Do you not know that you are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwells in you? If anyone destroys God's temple, God will destroy him. For the temple of God is holy, which you are." Let no one deceive himself. What then, do they think they preserve their innocence with respect to other men, when they harm themselves in such a way as to be without God as their inhabitant, and punished as transgressors? Hence it also happens that fallen and dispersed through harmful pleasures, they not only cease to be temples of God, but even become ruins in which evil demons dwell, to whom they begin to supplicate and worship: and as it was said, "the last state is worse than the first." Wherefore, you who have been reborn by an immortal seed, as above concerning malicious desires to harm, by which what they hate is done to men, therefore later because of base and illicit carnal delights and nefarious sacrileges, by which it seems men do not harm men, by not doing to them what they do not want, but disobeying God to whom all things are subject, they do to the Lord of lords what they do not want done to them by their servants, the same Apostle Peter addresses you, saying: "Therefore, since Christ suffered in the flesh, arm yourselves also with the same thought." For he who has died in the flesh has ceased from sin, so that he may live the rest of his time in the flesh no longer by human desires, but by the will of God. For the time already past is sufficient for you to have carried out the desires of the Gentiles, having pursued a course of sensuality, lusts, drunkenness, carousing, drinking parties, and abominable idolatries. Indeed, the past time is sufficient for having served the works of sins as if under the dominion of the Egyptians. Now the Red Sea, that is, Baptism consecrated by the blood of Christ, has cast down the true Pharaoh, has destroyed the Egyptians: do not fear anything from past sins as if from enemies pursuing from behind. Henceforth, aim to traverse the desert of this life, and reach the promised land, the heavenly Jerusalem, the land of the living: lest, by the contempt of the word of God as if by the loathing of manna, your hearts, as if your inner mouths, be foolish; lest craving for Egyptian meats you murmur against heavenly foods; lest you commit fornication, as some of them committed fornication; and lest you test Christ, as some of them tested Him. If for you thirsting with faith there comes some bitterness of resistance, like those waters which Israel could not drink, follow the patience of the Lord, as if by casting the wood of the cross, and let them be sweetened. If serpentine temptation has bitten; by contemplating the exaltation of that serpent, as if of death vanquished and triumphed over in the flesh of the Lord, let it be healed by the same remedy of the cross. If the adversary Amalekite tries to close and obstruct the way, let him be overcome by the most persistent extension of the arms in the sign of the same cross. Be true and genuine Christians: do not imitate Christians in name, but empty in deed. I say it again, and it must often be said: The past time is sufficient for having carried out the desires of the Gentiles. Detest and shun dogs turned to their own vomit: detest and shun the purified and vacant house, where seven other more wicked spirits are brought, so that the last state of the man is worse than the first. Hold your cleanser as your inhabitant. In calling upon you, we urge that you do not receive the grace of God in vain. For the past time is sufficient for having carried out the desires of the Gentiles. Hear also Apostle Paul: I am speaking in human terms because of the weakness of your flesh. For just as you presented your members as slaves to impurity and lawlessness, resulting in further lawlessness, so now present your members as slaves to righteousness, resulting in sanctification.

Sermons - Sermon 354

SERMO 354 To the Continents: In which he first strengthens them against detractors and envious people, then further commands them to avoid pride. The members of Christ must incur the hatred of the world. The Lord admonished this when the Gospel was read, because whoever believes in Him, believes in Him who sent Him. The faith holds most truly that the Savior of the world was sent to us: because Christ Himself preaches Christ, that is, the body of Christ spread throughout the entire world. For He was in heaven, and said to the persecutor raging on earth: "Why do you persecute me?" Here the Lord thus expressed Himself being in us. Thus He grows whole: because just as He is here in us, so also we are there in Him. This is made by the bond of love. He who is our head, is the Savior of His body. Therefore, Christ preaches Christ, the body preaches its head, and the head protects its body. And that's why the world hates us, as we have heard from the Lord Himself. He was not saying this to the few apostles; that the world would hate them; and that they ought to rejoice when men reviled them and said all evil against them, because for these reasons their reward would be greater in heaven; the Lord did not say this to them only when He said these things: but He said it to His entire body, to all His members. Whoever in His body also wishes to be His member, let him not be surprised that the world hates him.

Enemies are also to be considered those who, although they seem to be members of Christ, love the world.

Many receive the sacrament of His body; but not all who receive the sacrament will have a place with Him promised to His members. Indeed, nearly all call the sacrament His body, since all graze together in His pastures; but the one who will come to divide will place some on the right, and others on the left. And each party will say: Lord, Lord, when did we see You and minister to You? or: Lord, when did we see You and not minister to You? Each party will say this: yet to one He will say: Come, blessed of My Father, receive the kingdom; and to the other: Depart into eternal fire, prepared for the devil and his angels.

Therefore, dearest ones, we should not consider only those our enemies who openly are outside, but also those who are within. For many are much worse who seem to be inside, but are outside. They love the world; and therefore they are evil. Indeed, they think of us the things that they themselves love and envy us for the apparent prosperity of this world in which we groan. They consider us happy where we are in danger. However, they do not know our internal happiness; because they have not tasted it. Because whatever the world temporarily appears to us as a pleasure is more a danger than our adornment, they do not know; because they do not know how to distinguish these joys. The continent, because they have a higher place in the body of Christ, are bitten by the malevolent.

Hence, we exhort your Charity, especially because we see you gathered more frequently, who have a higher purpose, that is, you hold a more excellent place in the very body of Christ by His gift, not by your merits, having a conscience that is given by God. For this very thing has come to the suspicion of our wicked and envious adversaries. Nevertheless, it is bitten so that it may be tested. For if we seek the praises of men in the profession of continence itself, we fail due to the reproaches of men. When you are a chaste servant of God, behold, the world perhaps suspects you of being unchaste, and it bites, and reproaches, and gladly dwells on your slanders; for to malevolent souls, it indeed sweetly tastes what it wickedly suspects; but if you wished to embrace continence for the sake of human praises, you failed due to human reproaches and lost everything you had proposed to yourself.

Moreover, if you know how to say with the Apostle: "This is our glory, the testimony of our conscience"; not only does it not diminish your reward before reproaches, but it also makes it greater. Yet you should pray for him, lest he perish at the cost of your reward. For herein also are we tested, beloved, in that if we had no enemies, there would be none for whom we might pray according to the command of our Lord who says: "Love your enemies, and pray for those who hate you." How then can we test ourselves, how can we probe our hearts, to see whether we can do this, if we never encounter any enemy, any critic, any detractor, any blasphemer? You see, therefore, that even the wicked are necessary for the good. We are in the goldsmith's furnace, that is to say, in this world. If you are not gold, you will burn altogether. If you are gold, the wicked is your straw. If you are also straw, you will become smoke together. A comparison between those who are continent and those who are married.

Nevertheless, first know this, beloved, that in the body of Christ, the more excellent members are not alone. For the conjugal life is praiseworthy and has its place in the body of Christ, just as in our body, not only those parts that are more excellently situated have a place, such as the senses that occupy the upper part of the body in the face; but if the feet did not carry us, whatever is lofty would lie on the ground. Hence the Apostle says: "And those parts of our body which we consider less honorable, we treat with greater honor." God has so arranged the body, that there should be no division in the body. We know, however, that the members of Christ who lead a conjugal life, if they are members of Christ, that is, if they are faithful, if they hope for or expect the future age, if they know why they bear the sign of Christ, just as we know that they show honor to you; we know that they judge you to be better than themselves. But as much as they honor you, so much should you render mutual honor to them. For if there is holiness in you, fear lest you lose it. From what? Through pride. Holiness of the chaste is lost in one way if there is adultery; it is lost in another way if there be pride. And I dare to say, those leading a conjugal life, if they hold onto humility, are better than the proud chaste. For let your Charity consider what I say: observe the devil, does God in His judgment charge him with adultery or fornication? He does none of these things, who does not have flesh. It is solely pride and envy which send him into eternal fire.

Exhortation to Humility.

Therefore, for the servant of God who has been caught by pride, envy immediately follows. It is impossible to be proud and not envious. Envy is the daughter of pride: but this mother does not know how to be barren; wherever she is, she immediately gives birth. However, in order that it not be among you, consider this: in the time of persecution, not only the virgin Agnes was crowned, but also the woman Crispina: and certainly, it is beyond doubt, some of the continent faltered then, and many among the married fought and conquered. Therefore, the Apostle does not say in vain to all the members of Christ: “In humility, value others above yourselves, and honor one another.” For if you consider these things, you will not regard yourselves as great. Rather, you should think more about what you lack than about what you have. Beware not to lose what you have; pray to obtain what you do not yet have. You should think about in how many things you are lesser, not in how many things you are greater. For if you think about how much you have surpassed another, fear arrogance. But if you think about how much still remains for you, you will groan; and when you groan, you will be healed, you will be humble, you will walk more safely, you will not fall headlong, you will not be inflated.

Love must be pursued so that the swelling of pride may be avoided. And if only all could think with one love. For it alone both conquers all things, without which all things are worth nothing, and which, wherever it may be, draws all things to itself. It is that which does not envy. Do you ask the reason? Pay attention to what follows: It is not puffed up. Pride is the first among vices, as I began to say, then envy follows. For envy does not produce pride, but pride produces envy. For no one envies unless impelled by the love of excellence. The love of excellence is called pride. Therefore, since pride comes first in order, and envy follows: The Apostle, in his praises of charity, did not want to say first: It is not puffed up, and then: It does not envy; but first said: It does not envy; And then: It is not puffed up. Why this? Because when he said: It does not envy, it seemed as if you would ask the reason why it does not envy; he added: It is not puffed up. Therefore, if it does not envy because it is not puffed up; if it were puffed up, it would envy. Let this grow in you, and the soul is strengthened, because it is not puffed up. Knowledge, says the Apostle, puffs up. What then? Should you flee knowledge, and choose to know nothing rather than to be puffed up? Why do we speak to you, if ignorance is better than knowledge? Why do we dispute with you? Why do we distinguish these things? Why do we remind you of what you know, and bring forth what you do not know, if knowledge is to be avoided, lest it puff up? Therefore love knowledge, but put charity before it. If knowledge is alone, it puffs up. But because charity builds up, it does not allow knowledge to puff up. Therefore, knowledge puffs up where charity does not build up: But where it builds up, it strengthens. There is no inflation where the rock is the foundation.

How God hears our prayers.

How much does swelling, that is, pride, tempt us, so that for this vice even that great Apostle would say a thorn in the flesh had been given to him, a messenger of Satan, to buffet him? One who is buffeted has his head struck, so that he does not become arrogant: for there, the danger from knowledge was the fear of swelling, that is, pride. For he says: "Lest I should be exalted by the abundance of revelations." Therefore, pride was to be feared where there was a revelation of great matters: "Lest I should be exalted by the abundance of revelations, a thorn in my flesh, a messenger of Satan, to buffet me, was given to me. For this cause I besought the Lord thrice, that it might depart from me: and he said to me: My grace is sufficient for thee; for my strength is made perfect in weakness." The sick person asks that what the physician applies for health may be removed whenever the sick person wishes. The physician says: "No; it stings, but it heals." You say: "Remove what stings." The physician says: "I do not remove it, because it heals." Why then did you come to the physician? To be healed, or not to endure discomfort? Therefore the Lord did not hear Paul according to his will, because he heard him according to his health. For it is no great thing to be heard by God according to your will; it is no great thing. Do not think it a great thing, whenever anyone prays, if he is heard for a great matter, just because he is heard. Ask what he prays for, ask what he is heard in. Therefore, do not think it a great thing to be heard according to your will: consider it a great thing to be heard according to your benefit. Even the demons were heard according to their will, and were allowed to go into the swine which they requested. Also, their prince, the devil, was heard according to his will; Job was asked to be tempted and was not refused, so that he might be tested, and he (the devil) might be confounded. The Israelites were also heard according to their will, and while food was still in their mouths, you know what followed. Therefore, do not consider it a great thing to be heard according to your will. Sometimes God in His anger gives what you ask, and God in His mercy denies what you ask. But when you ask from Him what God praises, what God commands, what God promises in the future world, ask confidently, and apply yourselves as much as you can to prayers, so that you may receive it. Those things are granted by God when He is pleased: those things are bestowed by His mercy, not by His wrath. But when you ask for temporal things, when you ask for them, ask with fear: commit it to Him, so that if they benefit, He may give it; if He knows they will harm, He may not give it. However, what is harmful, what is beneficial, the physician knows, not the sick person.

Against the haughty abstainers.

There are therefore humble continent persons, and there are proud ones. Let not the proud promise themselves the kingdom of God. There is a higher place which continence leads to; but he who exalts himself shall be humbled. Why seek a higher place by the desire for loftiness, which you can attain by the retention of humility? If you exalt yourself, God brings you down; if you humble yourself, God lifts you up. It is the Lord's judgment: nothing can be added, nothing can be taken away. So much so, however, do continent men often become proud, that they are ungrateful not only to any people, but even to their parents, and they exalt themselves against their parents. Why? Because the latter begot children, while the former despised marriages. Whence would those who despised marriages be ungrateful if the latter had not begotten them? But a son is better than his married father, because he did not take a wife: and a daughter is better than her married mother, because she did not seek a husband. If more proud, by no means better; if better, without doubt humbler. If you want to find yourself better, ask your soul if you see pride there. Where there is pride, there is vanity. The devil where he finds emptiness, tries to make a nest. The proud celibate or even worse, the married, will not enter the kingdom of heaven.

Finally, my brothers, I dare to say, it is better for the proud continent to fall, so that in the very thing in which they exalt themselves they may be humbled. For what advantage is continence to someone if pride rules? He despised where man was born from, and he desires where the devil fell from. You have despised marriage, you have done well; you have chosen something better: but do not be proud. From marriage man was born, from pride angels fell. If I consider each of your goods, you are better than your father, because you have despised marriage; and you are better than your mother, who has despised marriage. For even virginal sanctity is better than conjugal chastity. If we compare these two together, one is better than the other: who doubts? But adding two other things, pride and humility; in these two I ask you, and from these answer me: What is better, pride or humility? You answer: Humility. Join that to virginal sanctity. Let pride not only not be in your virginity, but let it not remain in your mother either. For if you have held pride, and your mother humility, the mother will be better than the daughter. Again, I will compare you. Previously, when I focused on the individual, I found you better; now, focusing on the dual, I do not doubt to prefer the humble woman over the proud virgin. And how to prefer? See how I prefer her, whom I now compare. Conjugal chastity is good, virginal integrity is better. I was comparing two goods, not bad and good; but distinguishing good and better. Next, when I set those two, pride and humility, can we say: Pride is good, but humility is better? But what do we say? Pride is evil, humility is good: and pride is a great evil, humility a great good. Therefore, if one of these two is evil and the other good: the evil is joined to your greater good, and everything becomes evil: the good is joined to your mother's lesser good, and it becomes a great good. The mother will have a lesser place in the kingdom of heaven because she was married than the daughter, because she is a virgin. For the virgin daughter will have a greater place, the married mother a lesser place, yet both will be there: as a bright star, as a dim star, both still in the sky. But if your mother is humble, you proud: she will have at least some place, but you none. And who finds another place who has no place there, except with him who fell from there, casting down one standing? The devil fell from where he cast down the standing man. He cast him down standing: but Christ descending raised him lying down. Where your Lord raised you from, consider. He raised with humility, made obedient unto death, humbled himself. Your humble prince, and you proud? Humble head, and proud member? God forbid. He who loves pride does not wish to be from the body of the humble head. If not, let him see where he will be. I do not want to say, lest I seem to have scared too much. Rather, I wish I have scared, and done something. I wish that who and she who had been as such, may not be further. I wish I have infused these words and not poured them out. Everything is to be hoped for from God's mercy: because who terrifies, saddens; who saddens, consoles; but if who is saddened is amended.

Sermons - Sermon 354A

Sermon 354/A Sermon of Saint Augustine the bishop on the good of marriage "Let us remember our mortality." The readings of the Lord's day and the divine word and heavenly authority in the holy Scriptures which have just been recited urge the human race to remember its mortality because an end is going to come. For to every human being, that is, to each individual human, the end is near, even if perchance the end of the human race itself is distant. Therefore, as I began to say, the divine word seems to urge us to remember our mortality because an end is coming. However, let one meditate upon the life where there is no end: one who remembers that he is mortal will deserve to attain immortal life. From the Word of God, the faithful and the unfaithful learn the truth.

You have heard the Pharisees asking the Lord, testing Him, whether it is permissible to divorce one's wife for any cause. He responds with the truth, for He is the truth. For they did not make the Lord lie by testing Him, so that both the faithful and the unbeliever might learn the truth; and so that the worshiper of God might be instructed, the tempter hears the truth. I said this so that men might not think that the Lord God said anything different from what the matter is, because they were not asking faithfully, but were testing through their question. Therefore, it does not matter to us what kind of people questioned, but what He said, not what kind of man struck the rock, but what kind of water flowed out. Therefore, in the Lord's response, the married have something to learn, as do those who are not yet married, or those who have already out of good intent refused marriage. Speaking according to these words of the Lord, even the time reminds us of this, because it is thought to be the end time.

I want you to be without anxiety.

It pertains to us more greatly now, with greater care and greater concern and greater devotion, what the apostle says: "From now on, brothers, the time is short. It remains that those who have wives be as though they had none, and the rest, and those who buy as though they did not possess, and those who rejoice as though they did not rejoice, and those who use this world as though they did not use it. For the fashion of this world passes away. I want you to be without concern." Then he adds: "He who is without a wife thinks about the things that are of God, how he may please God; but he who is married thinks about the things of the world, how he may please his wife." A great difference: to think about the things of God and to think about the things of the world. It cannot happen that a comparison joins together what thought divides so. But if some married man has become ardent to promise continence, let him look at his side, see if it follows, and if it follows, let him lead; if it does not follow, let him not leave. Perhaps he can and she cannot, or she can and he cannot, let him understand that they are one flesh. You have heard not some man, but the Lord of men himself giving commands to Christians in responding to the Jews: "Have you not read," he says, "that from the beginning God made them male and female, and he said: Therefore a man shall leave father and mother and shall cleave to his wife, and they shall be two in one flesh? Therefore they are no longer two, but one flesh. Therefore what God has joined together, let man not separate."

What Paul teaches about the use of marriage.

It seems improper to dispute this matter too diligently. But we must not think ourselves so sane as to not sympathize with the sick. For who are we compared to the holiness of the Apostle Paul? And yet, with pious humility, with a healthful word, divine medicine entered human chambers. And such great sanctity approached the marriage beds, saw those lying down, did not lay aside the habit of holiness, and yet gave counsel to weakness: “Let the husband give the wife her due.” It is due: let him render it. Similarly, the wife to the husband. The wife does not have authority over her own body, but the husband does. This is not surprising. For the woman is subject to the husband, and in the husband is the initiative, in the woman the obedience. Nevertheless, in this matter in which both sexes are joined, while in other respects the woman ought to be a servant to the man, in this, I say, the condition is equal. Therefore, it was not enough for the Apostle to say: “The woman does not have authority over her own body, but the husband does” – he decently referred to the sex by the name of the body, to avoid obscenity. What he said is understood: the woman does not have authority over her own body, but the husband does. Similarly, the husband does not have authority over his own body, but the wife does. In this matter, the sexes are distinguished by their spouses. What belongs to someone else: it is owed to the woman.

Man cannot separate what God has joined. A man cannot have such judgment from there as to say: "I can now abstain. If you can, do this with me; if you cannot, you will in no way obstruct me: I do what I can." What then? Do you want, O man, that your side perishes? For if the weaker flesh cannot abstain, the weaker will shall fornicate, by fornicating it will be condemned. May it not happen that his punishment is your crown! "You are deceived: it will not be, it will not be so. It will not be that you say to me that since he fornicates he will be condemned, it is better for her to be alone than together." If you say this, you are deceived. For marriage is not condemned, what God has joined together is not condemned, let not man separate. You are a man; by seizing continence without the consent of your wife, as a man, you seek to separate what God has deigned to bind together. "But God," he says, "separates, because I do this for God." Indeed, if anywhere you have read that God has said: "If you have intercourse with your wife, I will condemn you," do what you will, lest you be condemned together. But when you hear the apostle of Christ saying: The wife does not have authority over her own body, but the husband does. Likewise the husband does not have authority over his own body, but the wife does. Do not deprive each other of... . Do not defraud one another. In what sense?

"He said: to defraud is by denying a debt, not by committing adultery. For he was speaking about debts to be rendered, and was urging married couples to render their mutual debts. He would not have permitted adulteries in the following words, where, after he had said, 'Do not defraud one another,' he added, 'except by mutual consent for a time.' Therefore, are adulteries to be committed by consent? If you think that the phrase 'Do not defraud one another' has to do with adulteries, what does 'except by mutual consent' mean? God forbid that a husband and wife should permit each other to commit adulteries by mutual consent. Modest and patient wives are accustomed to endure these things. To tolerate such a husband pertains to female chastity. But let the husband not feel secure because of this; he should rather be cautious lest he later be condemned, who now is said to be tolerated. But the matter is clear, and the apostolic word does not need explanation; because 'do not defraud one another' means, to not refuse each other their conjugal duties, except by mutual consent for a time, so that, he says, you may devote yourselves to prayer. You see, therefore, that the apostle admonished a certain continence, or rather a temporary truce of continence, to arouse and offer prayers, and with that concern, such health deigned not to be scorned as it approached the beds of the weak: And again, be together for the same purpose."

Let him who can take it, take it. When you continue for a time, so that you may devote yourselves to prayer, again be together for the same purpose. Do you command this, apostle? "This," he says. And where is the modesty, where the great reverence of sanctity? "But I," he says, "know the danger of weakness." In fact, he did not keep silent about the reason for his advice. "Do you want to hear," he says, "why I said: Be together again for the same purpose? So that Satan does not tempt you because of your lack of self-control." Then he continues, lest it seem that he has allowed it, but commanded - for it is one thing to permit weakness, another to command faith: "But this," he says, "I say as a concession." "What I say: Be together again for the same purpose, I say as a concession, not as a command. I do not command this for chastity, but I permit it for weakness. It is not commendable, but pardonable: as a concession. For I wish everyone were as I am, but each one has his own gift from God, one in this way, another in that." Wherefore also the Lord: He who can accept this, let him accept it.

Marriage is not to be reproved as if it were a lesser evil.

Here someone might perhaps say: "If the apostle granted this according to indulgence and yielded to the weakness of humans, marriage is a sin. For to whom is indulgence granted, if not to sin?" Clearly, what the apostle conceded to human weakness according to indulgence - I dare say - is a sin, but there does not lie the good of marriage. Therefore, discern, brothers, and assist me with your attention as I navigate this very difficult passage and labor before the Lord for you. He grants indulgence to such an act; of course, he refers to the intercourse of the married, not adulterers, and yet he says it is according to indulgence, not according to command. "I pardon, I do not command." A married man might say: "O apostle, if you pardon, I sin." Therefore, I do not want the defender of the good of marriage to bring this reasoning to me, saying: "Marriage is good so that adultery may not occur." I want them to be good, not a minor evil. For he who says: "Marriage should be done so that adultery may not occur; for even to marriages indulgence is granted, and to marriages pardon is conceded," speaks of two evils, not one good and one evil, but two evils, one minor and the other major. The Apostle does not condemn marriage but rather incontinence. But the apostle did not condemn the good of marriage, but the evil of incontinence, which is to use a wife even beyond the need for procreating children. For why do you take a wife? Do not read my disputations, but your own documents. Read, pay attention, and if you have done more, be ashamed. Read, and I will listen: it is necessary for me because of you. Certainly, you read thus: "for the sake of procreating children." If there is therefore something more, it is from evil. Look, inspect, examine yourself. If you do nothing more than what is to be done "for the sake of procreating children," the apostle has nothing to forgive you for. But if you do more, what you are doing is evil, what you are doing is a sin. But do you still wish to know what the good of marriage is? Through the good of marriage, the evil of incontinence is venial. Lust has been stirred; you have been overcome, you have been drawn, but you have not been dragged away from your wife. The penalties of incontinence would have overtaken you if marriage had not interceded for you.

Therefore, if you are married and wish that there be nothing for which the apostle grants you pardon, do not exceed the limits of your documents.

Those who have wives should be as though they had none. But you are not yet bound: do not seek it. For he who can use his wife only for the purpose of begetting children, can also abstain. He is a victor over lust, he controls the movements of the flesh, he firmly holds the reins of temperance, he guides that motion like a horse wherever he wishes, he does not lose the right of control. Therefore, since you are still unbound and still not chained, free from a wife, do not seek a wife. For if it is said to the married: The time is short, it remains that those who have wives should be as though they had none, why do you wish to have, when you can, with continence intact, not have? The ancient fathers out of a sense of duty took wives. For why does the people need to be propagated by God, through whom Christ, the salvation of the nations, shall come? For when that people were being propagated, by the very duty of piety they were compelled to take wives, even those who could abstain. By the duty of piety the holy fathers begot children, by the duty of piety the holy mothers bore children: they could also abstain. They served by propagating the people: it was a duty. Now a multitude is already open and everywhere, from which spiritual children are chosen and a holy people is made for Christ in the adoption of immortality for a heavenly inheritance. Therefore, then was the time for embracing, now the time for refraining from embrace. The Prophet says, let us hear: There is a time for everything. A time to embrace, a time to refrain from embracing. A time to embrace: the prophetic time; a time to refrain from embracing: the evangelical time. A time to cast away stones, a time to gather stones together. There was a time to cast away stones, to propagate men. For God is able from these stones to raise up children for Abraham. Why then are they still being cast away? Now let those who have been cast away be gathered. It was said that the stones should be cast away: Cursed is he who does not raise up the seed of Israel. It is said that the stones should be gathered: The time is short, it remains that those who have wives be as though they had none. Therefore now whoever can accept this, let him accept it. Then even he who could accept it did not undertake the office of continence: however, the virtue was within the man. Just as they had wives for the sake of God, unless perhaps we think that if it had been said to Abraham to abstain, such a pious virtue could waver, which could even, when ordered by the Lord, offer his own heir to be sacrificed, from whom he had received him to be raised? Therefore their time was different.

"Faith obtains self-restraint."

Therefore, let no one prescribe from this, let no one think this obligation has been imposed on him. "Who can accept this, let him accept it." "But I cannot," he says. You cannot? "I cannot." A certain nurturing authority of the Apostle has taken you up, that if they cannot contain themselves, let them marry. Let something be done so that pardon may be obtained. Let it pertain to forgiveness, so that one may not rush into eternal punishment. Let what is allowed be done so that what is not allowed may be forgiven. This is indicated by what follows: "I would rather they marry than burn." “I have granted something to incontinence,” he says, “because I feared something greater: I feared eternal punishment, I feared what awaits the adulterers.” Also let those who are married, in their mutual use beyond the necessity of procreation, consider these things for which it is said every day: "Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors." But let those who can accept this, accept it, and let them pray so they can. Faith also achieves continence: “Since I knew,” says the holy Scripture, “since I knew that no one can be self-controlled, unless God grants it, and it was part of wisdom itself to know whose gift this was.” When you fear continence as if it were a punishment, you do not knock at the door of grace. Do not think it is a punishment. When you can, it will not be troublesome. He will grant it, whose gifts are to be sought. Knock: you will be given; ask, seek: you will find. The fountain always flows, let faith not be lazy. And yet let him who can accept this, accept it; he who cannot, if he cannot contain himself, let him marry.

Let mercy move spouses in granting or not granting the debt.

Love one another. The man may, the woman may not: do not seek the due, but give it back. And in that which you return to the one who no longer seeks, if you do not seek it, you show mercy. I absolutely dare to say: it is mercy. For if you do not return it, with desire conquered, wife, or if you do not return it, woman, the man, conquered by desire, will become an adulterer. I do not want you to be honored so much that you want him to be condemned. What if you do not seek it anymore, but only return it: it is regarded as abstinence. For it is not demanded by lust, but it is returned through mercy. Absolutely tell your God: "Lord, you know in me what you have given, but I also hear what you have warned, for you have made both me and my spouse, and you wished no one to perish." Turned towards the Lord...

Sermons - Sermon 355

SERMO 355 On the Morals of Clerics, First Sermon Good conscience and good reputation.

Because of this, I wanted and requested yesterday, that today your charity might gather more frequently, for this is what I am about to say. We live here with you, and for you we live: and our intention and desire is that with Christ we may live with you endlessly. I believe, however, that our conduct is before your eyes; so that we may perhaps dare to say, though we are very much unequal to him, what the Apostle said: Be imitators of me, as I am of Christ. And therefore I do not wish for anyone to find an occasion for living poorly from us. For we foresee good, says the same Apostle, not only before God but also before men. For ourselves, our conscience suffices for us: for you, our reputation ought not to be stained, but to flourish among you. Hold what I have said, and distinguish. There are two things: conscience and reputation. Conscience is for you, reputation is for your neighbor. He who, confident in his own conscience, neglects his reputation, is cruel: especially being placed in this position, of which the Apostle says, writing to his disciple: In all things present yourself as an example of good works.

Let there be poor people in the monastery. How Augustine arrived at the episcopate. Monastery established near the episcopate.

Therefore, so as not to detain you longer, especially since I am speaking while sitting, and you are laboring by standing: but you all know, or almost all of you know, that we live in that house which is called the bishop's house in such a way that, as much as we are able, we imitate those saints of whom the Book of the Acts of the Apostles speaks: "No one said that anything was their own, but they held everything in common." Because perhaps some of you are not so diligent in examining our lives to know this as I wish you to know it; I will briefly say what this is. I, whom you see, by the grace of God, your bishop, came to this city as a young man: many of you know that. I was seeking to establish a monastery and to live with my brothers. For I had renounced all worldly hope, and I did not wish to be what I could have been: however, I did not seek to be what I am. I chose to be an outcast in the house of my God rather than dwell in the tents of sinners. I separated myself from those who love the world: but I did not equate myself with those who are in authority over the people. Nor did I choose a higher place at the table of my Lord, but a lower and more humble one: and it pleased Him to say to me, "Ascend higher." I so greatly feared the episcopate that, since my reputation was already gaining some importance among the servants of God, I would not go to a place where I knew there was no bishop. I avoided this, and groaned as much as I could, to be saved in a lowly place, rather than be endangered in a lofty one. But, as I said, a servant should not contradict his Lord. I came to this city to see a friend, whom I thought I could gain for God, so that he might be with us in the monastery; I felt secure because the place had a bishop. I was apprehended, made a presbyter, and through this step, I arrived at the episcopate. I brought nothing, I came to this Church with nothing but the clothes I was wearing at that time. And because I planned to be in the monastery with the brothers, with my intent and will known, the blessed memory of old Valerius gave me that garden where the monastery now is. I began to gather brothers of good intent, companions in poverty, having nothing as I had, and imitating me: so that just as I sold my small property and distributed to the poor, they who wished to be with me would do the same, so that we might live from a common fund; and our common and abundant estate would be God Himself. I arrived at the episcopate: I saw that it was necessary for the bishop to show continual kindness to everyone who came or passed by: for if the bishop did not do this, he would be called unkind. But if this custom were placed aside in the monastery, it would be improper. And I wished to have in this bishop's house a monastery for clerics. Behold how we live. No one is allowed to have anything personal in common society. But perhaps some do. No one is allowed: if any have, they do what is not allowed. Yet I think well of my brothers, and always well-believing, I disregarded such inquisition: because this inquiry seemed to me similar to suspecting them ill. For I knew, and I know, all who live with me know our purpose, know the rule of our life.

Concerning January. A presbyter named Januarius also came to us. What he seemed to have honorably, by distributing it, he almost spent but did not: a certain amount of money remained to him, which is silver, that he said was for his daughter. His daughter, with God's favor, is in a monastery of women, of good hope. May the Lord govern her, so that she may fulfill what we hope for her, in His mercy, not by her merits. And because she was underage and could not do anything with her money—even though we observed the brightness of her profession, we feared the mockery of her age—it was decreed that the silver itself was to be kept as if for the girl, so that when she reached legal age, she would do with it what would befit a virgin of Christ, when she could best do so. While awaiting this, he began to approach death; as long as he seemed to consider it his right, not his daughter's, he made a will. The presbyter, our colleague, I say, living with us, living off the Church, professing a communal life, made a will, appointing heirs. Oh, the sorrow of that society! Oh, the fruit born, not of the tree that the Lord planted! But he wrote the Church as an heir. I do not want these gifts; I do not love the fruit of bitterness. I sought him for God; he had professed brotherhood, he should have kept to it, he should have demonstrated it. Did he have nothing? He would not have made a will. Did he have something? He would not have pretended to be our poor comrade as if he were poor for God. This causes me great sorrow, brothers. I say to your Charity, on account of this sorrow, I have decided not to accept that inheritance for the Church. What he left belongs to his children; they may do what they wish with it. For it seems to me that if I accept it, I will be a participant in this deed, which displeases me and causes me grief. I wanted this not to remain hidden from your Charity. His daughter is in a monastery of women; his son is in a monastery of men. He disinherited them both: her with praise, him with a testimonial, that is, with blame. However, I have instructed the Church not to accept those portions that belong to the disinherited except when they reach legal age. The Church preserves this for them. Then he sent a dispute among his children, which I strive in. The girl says: It is mine; you know that my father always said so. The boy says: Believe my father, for he could not lie while dying. And what an evil is this contention! But if the boys themselves are servants of God, we quickly settle this dispute among them. I listen to them like a father, and perhaps better than their father. I will see what is between them, and as the Lord wills, with faithful and respected brothers, with God's favor, from among your number, that is, from this congregation, I will hear their cause, and as the Lord grants, I will settle it.

Augustine does not accept the inheritance of Januarius.

Nevertheless, I ask you, do not reproach me, because I do not wish the Church to receive this inheritance. First, because I detest the action; second, because it is my principle. Many praise what I am about to say, but some also reproach it. It is very difficult to satisfy both parties. You have just heard when the Gospel was read: We sang to you, and you did not dance; we lamented to you, and you did not weep. John the Baptist came neither eating nor drinking, and they say: He has a demon; the Son of Man came eating and drinking, and they say: Behold, a glutton and a wine-drinker, a friend of tax collectors. So, what do I do among those who prepare to reproach me and gnash their teeth at me if I accept the inheritances of those who disinherit their children in anger? Again, what will I do to those whom I sing to, and they do not wish to dance? They say: Behold why no one donates anything to the Church of Hippo; behold why they do not make it an heir upon dying: because Bishop Augustine, in his goodness—indeed they bite by praising, caress with their lips, and fix their teeth—gives everything away, does not accept it. Clearly, I accept, I profess to accept good offerings, holy offerings. But if someone is angry with his son and disinherits him upon dying, if he were alive, would I not placate him? Should I not reconcile him with his son? How then, could I desire peace with his son, whose inheritance I seek? But clearly, if he does what I have often urged: has one son, let him think of Christ as another; has two sons, let him think of Christ as a third; has ten sons, let him make Christ the eleventh, and I will accept. Therefore, because I have acted thus in certain matters, they now want to change my goodness or the praise of my reputation in another direction, so that they may reproach me in a different way, who do not wish to accept the offerings of devout men. Let them consider how many I have received. What need is there to count them? Behold, I say one: I received the inheritance of Julian's sons. Why? Because he died without children.

Why Boniface did not accept the inheritance.

Boniface, that is Fati, I refused to accept the inheritance: not out of mercy, but out of fear. I did not want the Church of Christ to be a shipping company. Indeed, there are many who profit from ships. However, if there were one temptation, if the ship sailed and wrecked: would we then hand over people to be tortured to investigate the sinking of the ship, as is customary, and would they be tortured by a judge after being saved from the waves? But would we hand them over? By no means is this appropriate for the Church. So should she pay the fiscal burden? But from where would she get it? It is not allowed for us to have an income. It is not fitting for the bishop to reserve gold and to turn away the hand of the beggar. Daily so many ask, so many lament, so many poor plead; we leave many sad because we do not have what to give to all; and would we keep an income for the sake of a shipwreck? Therefore, I did this avoiding it, not bestowing it. No one should praise it, but no one should blame it either. Certainly, when I gave to the son what the angry father took away while dying, I did well. Let those who wish praise, and those who do not wish to praise, abstain. What more, my brothers? Whoever wants to make the Church the heir instead of a disinherited son, let him seek another who will accept it, not Augustine: indeed, with God's favor, may he find no one. How commendable was the deed of the holy and venerable bishop Aurelius of Carthage, and how he filled with those who know, the mouth with praises of God! Some, when they had no sons nor hoped for any, donated all their possessions to the Church, reserving the usufruct for themselves. Sons were born to them, and the bishop returned to the unsuspecting what they had donated. The bishop had the power not to return it, through the right of the court, not through the right of heaven.

Why Augustine changed his plan.

Indeed, let your Charity also know that I have told my brothers, who remain with me, that whoever has something, let him either sell it and distribute it, or give it, or make it common: let the Church have it, through which God feeds us. And I gave a postponement until Epiphany, for those who either have not divided it with their brothers and left what they have with their brothers, or have not yet done anything with their property, because the legal age was awaited. Let them do with it what they want: as long as they are poor with me, let us together wait for the mercy of God. But if there are those who do not want it, who perhaps do not want it: certainly, I am the one who had decided, as you know, to ordain no cleric, except one who wants to remain with me: so that if he wants to deviate from the purpose, I would rightly take away the clerical state from him, because he would be deserting the promise of the holy society and the begun companionship; behold, in the sight of God and you, I change counsel: those who want to have something of their own, for whom God and His Church are not enough, let them stay where they want and where they can, I do not take away the clerical state from them. I do not wish to have hypocrites. Is it not known to be evil? It is evil to fall away from the purpose; but it is worse to pretend the purpose. Behold, I say: he who deserts the already taken up society of communal life, which is praised in the Acts of the Apostles, falls: he falls from his vow, he falls from the holy profession. Let him observe the judge, but God, not me. I do not take away the clerical state from him. As much as it is a danger, I have placed before his eyes: let him do what he wants. For I know that if I tried to degrade someone doing this, he would not lack patrons, he would not lack defenders, even here among bishops, who would say: What evil has he done? He cannot endure this life with you: he wants to remain outside the bishop, to live from his own means, should he therefore lose the clerical state? I know how much evil it is to profess something holy and not fulfill it. "Vow," he says, "and pay to the Lord your God," and: "It is better not to vow, than to vow and not pay." She is a virgin: if she has never been in a monastery, and is a sacred virgin, it is not permitted for her to marry. She is not compelled to be in a monastery; but if she has begun to be in a monastery, and has deserted, and yet is a virgin, she falls halfway. Likewise, a cleric has professed two things, both holiness and the clerical state: in the meantime holiness — for God imposed the clerical state upon his shoulders through His people: it is more a burden than an honor, but who is wise and understands these? — indeed, he professed holiness: he professed the society of living communally, he professed how good and pleasant it is for brothers to live together in unity. If he falls from this purpose, and remains outside as a cleric, he too falls halfway. What is it to me? I do not judge him. If he keeps holiness outside, he falls halfway; if he bears simulation inside, he falls completely. I do not wish him to have the necessity of pretending. I know how men love the clerical state: I do not take it from anyone unwilling to live communally with me. He has God, who wants to remain with me. If he is ready to be fed by God through His Church, to have nothing of his own, but either to distribute to the poor or to put it into the common, let him stay with me. If he does not want this, let him have liberty: but let him see whether he can have eternal happiness.

He promises a following discourse.

Let this now suffice for your Charity. What I will do with my brothers - for I hope for good that all will willingly obey me and I will not find any holding something, unless for some necessity of religion, not for the occasion of greed - what therefore I will do, after the Epiphany, I will declare to your Charity in the will of the Lord; and how I will settle the dispute between the two brothers, sons of the presbyter Januarius, I will not keep silent from you. I have spoken much, forgive the loquacity of old age, but [the] timorous infirmity. I, as you see, have now grown old through age; through bodily infirmity I have long been aged. Yet if it pleases God what I have said just now, He gives strength, I will not forsake you. Pray for me, that as much as there remains soul in this body, and whatever strength is present, I may serve you in the word of God.

Sermons - Sermon 356

SERMO 356 SERMON OF THE SAME HOLY AUGUSTINE THE SECOND On the Morals of the Clergymen Living Together The way of life of the first Church is an example for the monastery of Hippo. A discourse must be given to your charity about ourselves. For as the Apostle says: "We have been made a spectacle to the world, both to angels and to men"; those who love us seek what to praise in us; but those who hate us detract us. But we, standing in the midst of both, aided by the Lord our God, ought to so guard both our life and our reputation, that the praisers are not ashamed by the detractors. However, how we wish to live, and how by God's favor we already live, although many of you know from Holy Scripture, nevertheless to remind you, a reading from the book of the Acts of the Apostles will be recited to you, so that you may see where the form is described, which we desire to fulfill. Therefore, while it is being recited, I want you to be most attentive, so that after its recitation, what I have undertaken to speak might be, with the Lord's gift, directed to your attention. And the deacon Lazarus read: "When they had prayed, the place in which they were gathered was shaken; and they were all filled with the Holy Spirit and began to speak the word of God with all boldness to anyone willing to believe. The community of believers was of one heart and soul, and no one claimed that any of his possessions was his own, but they had everything in common. With great power the Apostles bore witness to the resurrection of the Lord Jesus, and great grace was upon them all. There was not a needy person among them, for as many as were owners of lands or houses sold them, and brought the proceeds of what was sold and laid it at the Apostles' feet; and it was distributed to each as any had need." When Lazarus the deacon had recited this and handed the book to the bishop, Bishop Augustine said: "And I too wish to read. For it delights me more to be a reader of this word than a disputant of my own word."

"When they had prayed, the place in which they were gathered was shaken; and they were all filled with the Holy Spirit and began to speak the word of God with all boldness to anyone willing to believe. The community of believers was of one heart and soul, and no one claimed that any of his possessions was his own, but they had everything in common. With great power the Apostles bore witness to the resurrection of the Lord Jesus, and great grace was upon them all. There was not a needy person among them, for as many as were owners of lands or houses sold them, and brought the proceeds of what was sold and laid it at the Apostles' feet; and it was distributed to each as any had need." And when the bishop read, he said:

What is said about the monastery.

You have heard what we wish: pray that we may be able [to achieve it]. A certain necessity arose, however, that I should deal with these matters more diligently: for, as you already know, a presbyter established in our fellowship, to which the reading that you just heard when we recited it bears witness, made a will while dying, because he had something from which to make [it]. He had something he could call his own, even though he lived in that fellowship where it was not permitted for anyone to call anything his own, but all things were common to them. If any admirer and praiser of ours were to extol that fellowship to one of our detractors and say: "With Bishop Augustine, all his cohabitants live as it is written in the Acts of the Apostles," immediately that detractor, shaking his head, baring his teeth, would say: "Really, do they live as you say? Why are you lying? Why do you honor the unworthy with false praise? Did not a presbyter, who was recently part of their fellowship, make a will, and dispose of what he had as he wished, and leave it? Surely, everything there is common? Surely, no one calls anything his own?" Faced with these words, what could my praiser do? Wouldn't that detractor stop his mouth as if with lead? Wouldn't he regret having praised us? Wouldn't he, filled with reverence and confounded by that detractor's speech, either curse us or that testator? This was the necessity that led us to come to this diligence.

What is discovered about poverty. About Patricius and Valens.

I therefore announce to you something to rejoice about. I have found all my brothers and fellow clerics who live with me, priests, deacons, subdeacons, and Patricius my nephew, to be as I desired. But there are two who, from their own modest poverty, have not yet done what they decided to do: Valens the subdeacon, and my aforementioned nephew. The subdeacon was hindered by his mother's life, because he lived off her support, and he was also waiting for the arrival of lawful age so that he might do it firmly. He has not yet done so because he holds the small plots of land jointly with his brother, and they are undividedly possessed. He wishes to confer them to the Church so that his own who live in holiness may be sustained from them as long as they live in this life. For it is written, and the Apostle speaks of it: "But if anyone does not provide for his own, and especially for those of his household, he has denied the faith and is worse than an unbeliever." Moreover, the slaves are also held in common with his brother, not yet divided. He plans to set them free, but cannot until they are divided. He does not know which would belong to him. Indeed, the division belongs to him who is elder, and the choice to his brother. His brother serves God, as a subdeacon, with my holy brother and fellow bishop Severus in the Church of Milevi. This must be done, this must be completed without delay: that those slaves be divided, liberated, and thus he may give to the Church, to support those from their sustenance. As for my nephew, since he converted and began living with me, he too was hindered from doing something about his fields by the usufructuary life of his mother. This year she died. There are some matters between him and his sisters that, with Christ's help, must soon be resolved: so that he may do what befits a servant of God, as this profession and this reading demand.

Regarding the deacons. Faustinus,

Deacon Faustinus, as almost all of you know, here from military service of the world was turned to the monastery: here baptized, thence ordained deacon. But because it is little that he seems to possess, as the jurists say, in law, not in body, he had left it, and it was held by his brothers. He never thought about it since he was converted, nor did he ask anything from his brothers, nor was anything asked from him. Now, because time has come to this juncture, following my counsel, he divided the property: and he donated half to his brothers, half to the poor Church established in the same place.

Severus,

Deacon Severus, under the discipline and chastisement of God, as you know, has not lost the light of his mind. He bought a house here for the sake of his mother and sister, whom he desired to bring here from his homeland. However, he did not buy it with his own money, which he did not have, but with contributions from the faithful, whom he even named to me when I inquired. I cannot say what he did or what he plans to do, except that he placed everything in my will, so that what I want may be done with it. But he has some issues with his mother, of which he made me the judge, so that when these issues are resolved, whatever I wish will be done with the house. And what could I wish, under God's guidance, other than what justice orders and piety demands? He also has some small plots of land in his homeland: he intends to distribute them in such a way that he can also donate to the Church to be given to the poor in that same place. deacon of Hippo, A deacon of Hippo is a poor man: he has nothing to give to anyone. Nevertheless, from his labors before he became a clergyman, he bought some servants: today he will release them in your presence in the episcopal proceedings.

Eraclius.

Deacon Eraclius is before your eyes, his works shine before our eyes. From his work, with his spent money, we have the memory of the holy martyr. From his own money, he even bought a possession with my counsel, for he wanted that very money to be distributed through my hands, as I pleased. If I were greedy for money, or cared more about my very own needs, which I have for the poor, I would take the money. Why, someone may ask? Because that possession, which was bought by him and donated to the Church, still provides nothing to the Church. It had less value than the price. What was borrowed is still being paid from its produce. I am an old man, how many fruits from that possession can benefit me? Do I promise myself to live so many years until it pays off its price? What therefore was hardly returned over time, I would have soon had all, if I had wanted to take it. I did not, I attended to something else. I confess to you, and I was still suspicious of his age, and feared lest, as humans are, it might displease his mother, and she might say that the young man was brought forth by me to consume his paternal goods and leave him in want. Therefore, I wanted his money to be preserved in that possession, so that if anything, which God forbid and averts, happened otherwise than we wish, the villa would be returned, lest the bishop’s reputation be blamed. For I know how necessary my reputation is to you: for my conscience suffices for me. He also bought a space known to you near the rear of the church; and with his own money, he built a house: and this you know; a few days before I should speak to you on this matter, he donated it to the Church: this you know. He expected to complete it, that he might give it perfect. However, there was no necessity for him to build the house, except that he thought his mother would come here. If she had come before, she would live in her son's work; now if she comes, she will live in her son's work. I testify to him; he remained poor: but he remained in the possession of charity. Some servants had been left to him, now indeed living in the monastery, whom yet he will today manumit by ecclesiastic records. Therefore, let no one say: He is rich; let no one think, let no one speak ill, let no one tear himself and his soul with his own teeth. He does not have money, he saved money: would that he may restore what he owes!

Subdeacons. The others, that is, the deacons, are poor; with God's favor, they await the mercy of God. Hence, they have nothing to give themselves: having no means, they have ended worldly desires. They live with us in common society: no one distinguishes them from those who brought something. The unity of charity is to be preferred before the earthly convenience of inheritance.

About the priests.

There remain the presbyters. For I wanted to ascend to them gradually. Quickly I would say, they are the poor of God. They brought nothing to the house of our society except love itself, than which there is nothing dearer. Nevertheless, since I know rumors have arisen about their wealth, they must be cleared by my speech to you, not compelled by me to anything.

Leporius.

I speak to you, who perhaps do not know, for many of you already know: the presbyter Leporius, though renowned by birth in the world and born in a very honorable position among his people, yet already serving God, having left everything he had, I took him in destitution: not because he had nothing, but because he had already done what this reading persuades. He did not do it, but we know where he did it. The unity of Christ is, the Church is one. Wherever there is a good work, it also pertains to us if we rejoice. There is one garden that you know: there he established a monastery with his own, because they also serve God. That garden does not pertain to the Church, but neither does it pertain to him. And to whom, someone might say? To that which is a monastery there. But what is true, until this time he was so concerned for them, that he kept the small expenses by which they are sustained with him, and as it seemed, he expended them. But lest there be a place given for men gnawing at their suspicions and not filling their stomachs, it pleased both him and me, that they should conduct themselves as if he had already departed from this world. For when he dies, will he dispense something to them? It is better that he sees them well-behaved, living under God's guidance in the discipline of Christ, so that he may only rejoice in them and not be occupied with their needs. Therefore, he himself has no money, which he could call or dare to call his own. The hospital you now see built. I enjoined it to him, I ordered it. He obeyed me most willingly, and as you see, he worked: just as at my order he also built a basilica for the eight martyrs from what God grants through you. He began, indeed, from the money which was given to the Church for the hospital. And when he had started building, as religious individuals desiring their works to be inscribed in heaven, contributed as each one wished, he built it. We have the work before our eyes: every man can see what has been done. Regarding the money, because he does not have it, let them believe me, let them curb their teeth, lest they break them. He had bought with that money of the hospital a certain house in Carraria, which he thought would be useful to him due to the stones, but the stones of that house were not necessary for the building, since they were provided from elsewhere. Therefore, that house remained as it was, it provides rent, but for the Church, not for the presbyter. Let no one say anymore: Into the house of the presbyter, at the house of the presbyter, in front of the house of the presbyter. Behold, where is the house of the presbyter: where my house is, there is his house: he does not have a house elsewhere, but everywhere he has God.

Concerning the sons of January.

What more do you seek? Unless it is because I also remember having promised to report to you what I had done between the two, namely the brother and the sister, the children of Januarius the priest, since a financial dispute had arisen between them, but yet as between siblings, with charity preserved, thanks to God's favor. I had therefore promised to hear them out and to settle, by judging, whatever the matter was. I had prepared myself as a judge: but before I could judge, they themselves settled the matter that I was to judge. I found nothing to judge, but rather something to rejoice in. They fully agreed harmoniously with my will and my advice, so that they would be equal in the money their father left behind, with the Church relinquishing it. On the slanderers.

After my sermon, people will talk, but whatever people say, with whatever wind blowing, something will be carried to my ears. And if it is such that it needs us to cleanse again, I will respond to the slanderers, I will respond to the detractors, I will respond to the unbelievers who do not believe in their superiors, I will respond as I can with what the Lord has given: meanwhile it is not necessary now, because they may say nothing. Those who love us, freely rejoice; those who hate us, silently grieve. However, if they loosen their tongues, they will hear, with God's favor, my response with you, not my contention. For I do not intend to name people and say: "He said this, he slandered thus," when perhaps false things are brought to me, because this can also happen. Nevertheless, whatever is brought forth, if it seems necessary, I will speak of it to your Charity. I want our life to be before your eyes. I know those seeking permission to act seek examples of those living wrongly, and they slander many so that they may seem to have found companions. Therefore we have done what is ours to do: beyond this we have nothing more to do. We are before your eyes. We desire nothing of anyone, except your good works.

Gifts which are offered. And I urge you, my brothers, if you wish to give anything to the clerics, know that you should not, as if to foster their vices, give it against me. Offer whatever you wish to offer out of your own will to all. What will be common will be distributed to each as it is needed. Attend to the treasury, and we will all have it. It pleases me greatly if it would be our manger, so that we may be the beasts of God, and you the field of God. No one should give a cloak or a linen tunic, except in common. From the common stock, it will be received, because it will be received. To me personally, knowing that whatever I have, the community wishes to have, I do not want your Holiness to offer such things as I would use more decently alone. For example, a valuable cloak is offered to me: perhaps it befits a bishop, although it does not befit Augustine, that is, a poor man, born of the poor. Now people will say that I wear precious clothes, which I could not have had either in my father's house or in that secular profession of mine. It is not fitting: I ought to have such as I can give to my brother if he has none. Such as a presbyter can have, such as a deacon and subdeacon can decently have, such I want to accept: because I accept in common. If someone gives a better one, I sell it: because I usually do so, so that when the clothing cannot be common, the price of the clothing can be common; I sell it and distribute it to the poor. If it pleases him that I should have it, let him give such of which I am not ashamed. For I confess to you, I am ashamed of a precious garment: because it does not befit this profession, it does not befit this admonition, it does not befit these members, it does not befit these grey hairs. I also say this: if perchance in our house, in our society, someone is sick, or after illness, so that it is necessary for him to be refreshed before the hour of dinner: I do not forbid men or women religious to send what they see fit to send: however, no one will have lunch and dinner outside.

He decided that he who violated the vow of poverty should be struck from the list of clerics.

Behold, I say, you have heard, they hear. Whoever will wish to have something of their own and live from their own property, and act against these our precepts, it is little to say, will not remain with me, but will not be a cleric. For I had said, and I know I said, that if they did not want to adopt a communal life with me, I would not take away their clerical status; they might remain separate, live separately, as they could live to God. And yet I placed before their eyes how much evil it is to fall away from the purpose. For I preferred to have even the lame, rather than to mourn the dead. For whoever is a hypocrite, is dead. How then, for anyone who wished to remain outside and live from their own property, I would not take away their clerical status: thus now, since this communal life has pleased them, with God's favor, whoever should live with hypocrisy, whoever should be found having private property, I do not permit them to make a will from it, but I will erase them from the list of clerics. Let a thousand councils intercede against me, let them sail against me wherever they wish, let them be where they can: the Lord will help me, that where I am a bishop, they will not be a cleric. You have heard, they have heard. But I hope in our God and His mercy, that as cheerfully they have received this my arrangement, so purely and faithfully will they keep it.

What detractors say about Barnabas.

I said that the presbyters, my cohabitants, have nothing of their own, among whom is also presbyter Barnabas. But I also heard that certain things were thrown against him, above all that he bought a villa from my beloved and honorable son Eleusinus. This is false: he donated it to the monastery, he did not sell it. I am a witness. What more you seek, I do not know. I am a witness: he donated it, he did not sell it. But while it is not believed that he could have given it, he is believed to have sold it. Blessed is the man who did such a good deed, that it was not believed! Yet now believe, and cease to listen willingly to detractors. I have already said, I am a witness. It was also said about him that in the year of his administration he made debts through industry, so that while I want to pay the debts, I would give the Victorian estate to him who asked: as if he had said to me: To pay my debts, give me the Victorian estate for ten years. And this is also false. But there was a basis from which the rumor arose. He made debts to be paid back. They were partly paid back by us from what was possible. Something remained that was also owed to the monastery which God established through him. Since then it remained, we began to seek how to pay the debt. No one approached the leasing of that estate, except offering forty solidi as a rent. But we saw that the estate could give more, so that the debt would be paid back more quickly; and I entrusted to his faith that the brothers would not seek profits from the lease itself, but whatever the estate would yield would be assigned from the fruit itself to the debt. It is done in faith. The presbyter is ready for me to establish another, who would pay back to the brothers from the fruits. Let someone from your number be someone whom I may commit this, from the number of those who brought such things to us. For there are religious men among you, who grieved that he was reprehended by a false rumor, and yet believed it done. Therefore, let someone among them come to us, take the possession, distribute all the fruits faithfully at their prices, so that what is owed may be paid off more easily, and today the care of the presbyter withdraws from there. Also, the place itself, in which the monastery was established by my aforementioned honorable son Eleusinus, was given to the presbyter Barnabas before he was ordained presbyter: in that place he established the monastery. But yet because the place was given in his name, he changed the instruments, so that it may be possessed in the name of the monastery. Concerning the Victorian estate, I ask, I urge, I entreat that if anyone is religious, let him act in faith, and offer this work to the church, so that the debt may be paid off swiftly. But if no one from the laity is found, I will place another: he will no longer approach there. What do you want more? Let no one tear apart the servants of God, because it does not benefit those who tear apart. The reward of the servants of God indeed grows by false detractions, but so does the punishment of the detractors. For it is not without reason that it was said: Rejoice and be glad when they detain you, saying false things:

because your reward is great in heaven. We do not want to have a great reward with your detriment. Let us have less there, and yet reign there with you.

Sermons - Sermon 357

SERMO 357 On the Praise of Peace Regarding the praise of peace, what must be done with those who do not love peace?

It is time to exhort your Charity, with the strength the Lord grants, to love peace and to pray to the Lord for peace. Let peace be our beloved and friend, with whom our heart's chamber may be pure; with whom there may be faithful rest and not bitter partnership, with whom there may be sweet embrace and inseparable friendship. It is more difficult to praise peace than to have it. For if we want to praise it, we desire strength, seek knowledge, weigh words: but if we want to have it, we have it and possess it without any labor. Those who love peace should be praised: but those who hate it should be better pacified by teaching and silence than provoked by reproach. A true lover of peace is a lover of its enemies. For just as, if you loved the light, you would not be angry with the blind, but you would grieve for them; for you would know what good you enjoy, and therefore seeing how much good they are deprived of, they would seem worthy of your compassion; and if you had the means, the skill, the remedy, you would run to heal them rather than condemn them: so if you are a lover of peace, whoever you are, have mercy on him who does not love what you love, who does not have what you have. For such is the thing you love, that you do not envy your co-possessor of it. He has peace with you, and does not diminish your possession. Whatever earthly thing you love, it is difficult not to envy the one who has it. Then if it perhaps comes into your mind to share the land you possess with a friend, so that your benevolence may be praised, so that even in these temporal matters charity may be proclaimed: if therefore you wish to share your earthly possession, such as an estate, a house, or whatever else of this kind, with a friend; you share it with one, and admit him to partnership, and rejoice with him. You think perhaps of admitting a third, and a fourth: already you consider how many the house may accommodate for dwelling, or the field for grazing; and you say: Now it cannot accommodate a fifth, a sixth cannot live with us, when will such a small possession sustain a seventh? Therefore, it excludes others, not you, but the narrowness. Love peace, have peace, possess peace, bring to yourself as many as you can to possess peace: it will be the more expansive the more it is possessed by many. An earthly house cannot accommodate many cohabitants: the possession of peace grows with many inhabitants. To have peace is to have that which you love.

How good it is to love! For this is to have. But who would not wish that what he loves should grow? If you wish to have few with you in peace, your peace will be small. If you wish to increase that possession, add possessors. For that which I have said, brothers: It is good to love peace, and to love itself is to have, at what cost? With what voice it is praised, with what heart it is considered: Is this to have, that to love? Consider the other things, which humans are inflamed with desire for. See another love lands, silver, gold, numerous children, precious and adorned houses, most pleasant and most precious estates. Does he love this? He loves it. Does he who loves it already have it? It can happen that the lover of all these things is empty. When he does not have it, he loves; he burns with desire to have it; but when he begins to have it, he is tortured with fear lest he lose it. He loves honor, he loves power. How many people sigh, deprived of the power to acquire these things? And often the final day overtakes them before they reach that which they love. How great, then, is the cost of what, when you love, you have? You do not seek what you love at a price; you do not walk to a patron, by whom you will reach it. Behold where you stand, love peace, and what you love is with you. This matter is of the heart; nor do you share peace with your friends as you do bread. If you wish to share bread, the more it is broken among many, the less there is to give. But peace is like that bread which, in the hands of the disciples of the Lord, grew and increased by breaking and giving.

Schismatics are to be recalled to peace peacefully.

Therefore, have peace, brothers. If you wish to draw others to it, be the first to have it, be the first to hold it. Let what you have burn within you, so that it may ignite others. The heretic hates peace, and the bleary-eyed hate light. Is light therefore bad because the bleary-eyed cannot tolerate it? The bleary-eyed hate light; but the eye was created for light. Therefore, those who love peace and want it to be possessed with them should strive to increase their possession by adding another possessor. Let them therefore strive to cure the eyes of the bleary-eyed, by any means, with any effort. The unwilling are cured; they do not want to be cured while they are being cured; but once they see the light, they will be pleased. Suppose he gets angry; do not tire by insisting. Lover of peace, pay attention and delight first in the beauty of your beloved, and burn with zealousness to draw another. Let him see what you see, love what you love, hold what you hold. Your beloved, whom you love, speaks to you; she says to you: Love me, and you will have me instantly. Bring with you those you can to love me: I will be chaste and remain whole. Bring whomever you can, let them find, hold, and enjoy. If this light is not corrupted by many seeing it; do many loving me corrupt me? But they do not wish to come because they do not have the means to see me. They do not wish to come because the brightness of peace dazzles the bleary-eyed of dissension. See the pitiful cry of the bleary-eyed. It is announced to them: It has been seen that Christians have peace. Hearing this news, they say among themselves: Woe to us. Why? Unity is coming. What is this? What a cry: Woe to us, unity is coming? How much more justly would you say: Woe to us, dissension is coming? Let it not be that dissension comes: these are the darkness of those who see. For unity is coming, rejoice, brothers. Why are you afraid? It has been said, unity is coming. Was it said, a beast is coming, fire is coming? Unity is coming, light is coming. If one wants to answer truthfully, he will say to you: I was not afraid because a beast was coming; I am not fearful; but I was afraid because light was coming; for I am bleary-eyed. Therefore, effort must be given to cure. What is shared with them, which does not become narrow by sharing, must be communicated as much as we are able, as much as God grants.

Gentleness should be shown to schismatics who are quarrelling. It is to be done not with quarrels but rather with prayers to God.

Therefore, beloved, I exhort your Charity, that you display to them Christian and Catholic gentleness. Now the time is for healing. The eyes of the saints are in fervor, they must be carefully tended and gently handled. Let no one engage in a quarrel with anyone, let no one desire to defend even his own faith by disputing now, lest a spark arise from the quarrel, lest occasion be given to those seeking it. You decidedly hear reproach, tolerate it, pretend not to notice, pass by. Remember that healing is needed. See how gentle doctors are with those they treat even sharply. They hear reproach, they offer remedy, they do not return reproach for reproach. Let the word be given for the word; so that one is being healed, the other heals: not two disputants. Bear, I beseech you, my brothers. But I do not bear, he says, because he blasphemes the Church. The Church asks you to bear, because the Church is being blasphemed. He slanders my bishop, he says a crime against my bishop, and I remain silent? Let him speak the crime, and remain silent; not by knowing, but by bearing. You offer this to your bishop, if for him you do not intervene at this time. Understand the time, have counsel. How many blaspheme your God? Do you hear, and He does not hear? Do you know, and He does not know? And yet He makes the sun rise on the good and the evil, and rains on the just and the unjust. He shows patience, defers power. Thus also acknowledge the time, do not provoke swelling eyes to disturb themselves. Are you a lover of peace? Be well in your heart with your beloved. And what shall I do? You have what to do. Take away quarrels, turn to prayers. Do not repel with reproaches the one who reproaches, but pray for him. Do you wish to speak against him: speak to God for him. I do not tell you to remain silent; but choose rather where to speak, to whom you speak in silence, with closed lips, with a crying heart. Where he does not see you, be good for him. To him who does not love peace and wants to quarrel, respond peacefully: Whatever you say, however much you hate, as it pleases you to detest, you are my brother. What do you do, that you might not be my brother? Entirely good, bad, willing, unwilling, you are my brother. And he: Whence am I your brother, enemy, adversary? Just as you say these things, you are my brother. It seems strange: he hates, detests, and he is a brother? To him indeed do I wish to believe, not knowing what he says? Whose health I wish for, that he may see the light, and recognize a brother. Indeed, to him do I wish to believe that I am not his brother, because he detests, because he hates, and not rather to the light itself? Let us hear what the light itself says. Read the prophet: Hear, you who tremble at the word of the Lord. The Holy Spirit speaks through the prophet Isaiah: Hear, you who tremble at the word of the Lord. Say: You are our brothers, to those who hate you, and who detest you. What is this? The light has shone, showing brotherhood: and still says the sore-eyed: Close the window. Offer your eyes to the light: recognize a brother not in darkness, while you are in darkness: and say, say with confidence, you speak the words of God and not mine. Say, says God, You are our brothers: to whom? To those who hate you. For what wonder if you say it to those who love you? To those who hate you, and who detest you. Why this? Listen, and consider the fruit of the cause. As if you asked the Lord your God, and said: Lord, how can I say: You are my brother, who hates, who detests? He says why. So that the name of the Lord may be honored. It may appear even in delight: but let them be ashamed. See, I beseech you, the fruit of patience, of so great gentleness. Say: You are our brothers. Why? So that the name of the Lord may be honored. Why indeed does he not recognize you as a brother? Because he honored the name of man. Therefore say: You are my brother: you may hate, you may detest, you are my brother. Recognize in yourself the sign of my Father. Our Father’s speech. Bad brother, quarrelsome brother, you are my brother. For you say as well as I: Our Father who art in heaven. We say the same: why are we not one? I ask you, brother, acknowledge what you say with me, and condemn what you do against me. Consider the words coming out of your mouth. Listen, not to me, but to yourself. See to whom we say: Our Father who art in heaven. Not a friend, not a neighbor; but He Himself to whom we say, commands us to concord. Together we have one voice before the Father: why do we not together have one peace?

Peace fervently burning. Solemn fasting. Hospitality towards those who come to Carthage for the purpose of a conference.

Say such things ardently, say them gently. Say them with the fervor of charity, not with the swelling of dissension, and beseech with us the Lord in solemn fasts. What we now render to God, let us render also for the cause. For already we fast solemnly after Pentecost: and surely we would fast, even if this cause were not. What then do we owe to our brothers, whom in the name of the Lord our God, our physician, we accept to heal and to be healed, they offering themselves to be healed, not presuming upon the hands of the physician ourselves? But what do we do? Let us beseech the same physician, fasting with humble heart, pious confession, fraternal fear. Let us show piety to the Lord, charity to our brothers. Let our alms increase, by which our prayers are more easily heard. Seek hospitality. It is time: the servants of God are coming. It is time, opportunity is here, why does it perish? Consider what you have in the upper room of your house. Consider also what you lay up above, what you keep for yourself, from which you alone are securely rich. Place it above, commend it not to your servant, but to your Lord. Surely there you do not fear lest a thief sneak in, lest a robber invade, lest a turbulent enemy snatch it away? Make sure to have what will be returned to you. And this is not returned to you, what you have placed. The Lord wants you to be a lender, but His own, not your neighbor’s.

Sermons - Sermon 358

SERMO 358 Concerning Peace and Charity Difficult peace must be approached. The conquered conquerors. Our concern for you, and for our enemies and yours, for the salvation of all, for peace, for common unity, which the Lord commanded, the Lord loves, may the prayers of your holiness aid, so that we may speak to you of it repeatedly, and rejoice with you. Indeed, to speak of peace and charity, if we always love, we always ought; much more therefore at this time, when peace is so loved, that those, being constituted in the danger of loving and holding it, to whom we do not return evil for evil, and with whom, as it is written, we are peaceful with those who hate peace, and because we speak to them, they want to conquer us gratuitously: therefore those who are such, are endangered between the love of peace and the confusion of shame, nor do they do that, when they do not want to be conquered, so that they may be unconquered. For those who do not wish to be conquered by the truth, are conquered by error. Oh, if love rather than animosity would overcome them! Thence they would become victors, whence they would be defeated. We for the Catholic Church, to whose peace and reconciliation we invite its enemies, not by human opinions, but by divine testimonies, love, hold, defend. What shall I do with him, who cries for a part, and disputes against the whole? Is it not good for him to be conquered, because if he shall be conquered, he will hold the whole; if he shall conquer, he will remain in part? Indeed, if he shall seem to himself to conquer, for he does not conquer unless by truth: the victory of truth is charity.

Regarding unity, what does Holy Scripture advise?

What then, brothers, should I commend to you with many words, and with my own, about the Catholic Church, which is bearing fruit and growing throughout the whole world? We have the words of the Lord for it and for ourselves. The Lord said to me: You are my Son; today I have begotten you. Ask of me, and I will give you the nations as your inheritance, and the ends of the earth as your possession. Why then, brothers, do we dispute about possession, and do not rather recite the holy scriptures? Let them think we have come before a judge. There is a dispute about possession: and this dispute is not of strife, but of love. After all, a litigator of earthly possession litigates to exclude his adversary: we to bring him in. The litigator of earthly possession, when he hears his adversary saying: "I want to possess," responds: "I do not permit it." But I say to my brother: "I want you to possess with me;" and he says in disputing: "I do not want it." Therefore, I do not fear lest the Lord should despise me and rebuke me, as he did those brothers, or that brother, who appealed to him among the people, and said: "Lord, tell my brother to divide the inheritance with me." Immediately the Lord rebuking him, because he hated division, said: "Man, who made me a judge or arbitrator over you?" I say to you, beware of all covetousness. I do not fear this rebuke. For I appeal to my Lord: I confess, I appeal. Yet I do not say: "Lord, tell my brother to divide the inheritance with me;" but I say: "Lord, tell my brother to keep unity with me." Behold, I recite the document of this possession, not so that I may possess alone, but to convince my brother who is unwilling to possess with me. Behold the document, brother: "Ask of me," he says, "and I will give you the nations as your inheritance, and the ends of the earth as your possession." It was said to Christ. Therefore, it was said to us, because we are members of Christ.

Why do you run to a part? Or remain in a part? Behold, take all that is in the scriptures. Do you seek who and who may possess, as is customary to seek possessors by documents, among whom they may be relatives? The one who gave you all the ends, left no relatives behind.

Another testimony.

Hear another testimony of the holy scriptures. Of the Lord Christ it is said in the figure of Solomon: He shall rule from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth. The Ethiopians shall fall before him, and his enemies shall lick the dust. The kings of Tarshish and the islands shall offer gifts: the kings of Arabia and Saba shall bring presents. And all the kings of the earth shall adore him: all nations shall serve him. When it was said, it was believed: when it is fulfilled, it is denied. Therefore hold with me the inheritance from sea to sea, and from the river, namely the Jordan, where the teaching of Christ began, to the ends of the earth. Why do you not want it? Why are you an enemy to this promise and inheritance, your riches? Why do you not want it? Because of Donatus? Because of Caecilianus? Who was Donatus? Who was Caecilianus? Certainly men. If good, to their own good, not mine: so also if evil, to their own evil, not mine. You take Christ, and attend to his Apostle zealous for Christ: Was Paul crucified for you? Or were you baptized in the name of Paul? To say this, see what he shuddered at: Each of you says, I indeed am of Paul, I am of Apollos, I am of Cephas, I am of Christ. Is Christ divided? Was Paul crucified for you? Or were you baptized in the name of Paul? If not in the name of Paul, much less in the name of Caecilianus; much more, and much less in the name of Donatus. And yet still after the apostolic words, after the declaration of the Church and its spread throughout the world, it will be said to me: I do not leave Donatus, I do not leave I don’t know which Gaius, Lucius, Parmenianus. A thousand names, a thousand divisions. By following man, you will deprive yourself of such a great inheritance, which you have just heard: From sea to sea, from the river to the ends of the earth. Why do you not hold it? Because you love a man. What is man but a rational animal made of earth? Therefore you are an enemy, because you lick the earth. Instead, despise this. Do not lick the earth, so that you may place your hope in him who made heaven and earth. This is our hope, these testimonies: The Lord, the God of gods, has spoken, and called the earth from the rising of the sun to its setting. Do not remain on the earth, but go where the earth has been called. The magnitude of charity. And who can recite all the testimonies of this possession from the holy records? Why then do they not turn to the Church, except because it is the voice of the Church itself: "Turn to me who fear you, and know your testimonies"? The Church saw this, which it said in the Psalm. You have just heard, recent words are in your ears and hearts: "I have seen the end of all perfection." What is: "I have seen the end of all perfection"? Of perfection, not consumption; and the end, of perfection not abolition. "I have seen the end of all perfection: your commandment is exceedingly broad." "I have seen the end of all perfection." What is this end? Your commandment is exceedingly broad. For the end of the commandment is, now you say with me. You all said, what you have always heard not in vain. The end of the commandment is charity from a pure heart. The end by which we are perfected, not by which we are consumed. This end is broad, because it is the commandment of God and to whom it is said: "Your commandment is exceedingly broad." "A new commandment I give unto you, that you love one another." See the breadth of this commandment. Where is it broad? Surely not in the flesh? Rather in the heart. For if it were also broad in the flesh, diligent listeners, you would not suffer narrowness. It is broad in the heart. Where it is broad, see if you have the means to see, and hear the Apostle from here, how broad is the commandment of charity: "The love of God is poured into our hearts." He did not say, enclosed, but poured. For the word enclosed seems to sound narrowness; the word poured suggests breadth. Therefore, your commandment is exceedingly broad. Lord our God, approve that because of this breadth we invite our brothers to the possession of peace. Do you want to be bishops? Be with us. Does the people not want two bishops? Be brothers with us in the inheritance. Let us not obstruct the peace of Christ for the sake of our honors. What honor are we to receive in heavenly peace if we defend our honor now in earthly strife? Let the wall of error be removed, and let us be together. Recognize me as a brother: I recognize you as a brother: but except for schism, except for error, except for dissension. Let this be corrected, and you are mine. Do you not want to be mine? I, if you correct yourself, want to be yours. Therefore, with the error removed from the midst, as with the wall of the fence of contradiction and division, be my brother, and I be your brother, so that we may both be of Him, who is Lord and mine and yours.

Let the reason be discussed.

We say these things out of love for peace, not out of distrust in the truth. For we have written this, you have read this purpose: because we do not avoid presenting our case, rather we urge that it be presented; so that when I have demonstrated possession, I may share the inheritance with him. Let him come without fear, let him come confidently, let him come learned: I do not wish to prejudge by authority. Let us open our eyes to Him who cannot err: let Him teach us what the Church is. You have heard His testimonies. Human sins do not contaminate it, which human justice does not redeem. And yet, though the cause of the Church is one thing, the cause of men is another, and they are entirely distinct, we do not fear the cause of men, whom they have accused but could not convict. We know they are purified, we read they are purified. If they were not purified, I would not establish the Church in their cause, nor build on sand, and cast down from the rock: because upon this rock, He says, I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not overpower it. The rock, however, was Christ. Was Paul crucified for you? Hold to these things, love these things, say these things brotherly and peacefully.

Admonition to the brothers. Do not rush to the place of assembly, my brothers. Absolutely, if possible, avoid even passing through that place, lest by chance any entrance to contention and strife be found, or some opportunity be offered, and those who seek an opportunity find it, especially since those who fear God little, or disdain our admonition, or because they love present things, ought at least to fear the severity of earthly power. You have read the edict of the illustrious man publicly posted: indeed, it was not posted for you who fear God and do not disdain the admonition of your bishops; but so that no one may neglect or disdain these matters. Therefore, let those who are such see: lest by chance what the Apostle said might happen to them: For he who resists authority resists the ordinance of God. For rulers are not a terror to good work, but to evil. Let us avoid all sedition, all situations of sedition. Perhaps you will say: we are intent on what we shall do. There is something we must enjoin on you: perhaps fertile parts of piety. We dispute on your behalf: you pray on ours. Also, as we have already forewarned, assist your prayers with fasts and alms. Add wings to them, by which they may fly to God. Acting in this manner, perhaps you will be more useful to us than we to you. For none of us presumes anything about himself in this dispute: all hope is in God. Nor are we better than the Apostle, who says: Pray for us. He says, Pray for me, that a word may be given to me. Therefore, ask Him for us, in whom we have placed our hope, so that you may rejoice over our dispute. Hold on to these things, brothers, we beseech you, by the name of the Lord himself, the author of peace, the founder of peace, the planter of peace, we pray to you that you may peacefully pray to Him, peacefully beseech Him; and remember that you are His children, of whom it is said: Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God.

Sermons - Sermon 358A

SERMON 358/A

Dearly beloved, let us rejoice in the Lord, no matter how great the sadness of this time. Since he who has endured to the end will be saved; with continual prayers let us strive to remain firm, so that we may arrive safely in the presence of our King.

TREATISE OF SAINT AUGUSTINE ON THE GOOD OF MERCY True mercy makes us participants in the pain of another.

We wish to admonish your holiness about the good of mercy: although we have often experienced that you are inclined toward every good work, it is still necessary to have a focused conversation about this matter. Therefore, we discuss, what is mercy? It is nothing other than a certain contracted misery of the heart. It is called mercy from the sorrow for the miserable: both aspects, misery and heart, resonate there. Therefore, when someone else's misery touches and strikes your heart, it is called mercy. Thus, pay attention, my brothers, all good works, which we perform in life, pertain to mercy. For example, you offer bread to the hungry: offer it from the heart with mercy, not out of contempt; do not treat another person like a dog. Therefore, when you perform an act of mercy, whether you offer bread, feel the sorrow of the hungry: if you give a drink, feel the sorrow of the thirsty: if you offer clothing, feel the sorrow of the naked: if you receive someone into your home, feel the sorrow of the stranger: if you visit the sick, feel the sorrow of the ill: if you bury the dead, feel the sorrow of the dead: if you reconcile the contentious, feel the sorrow of the quarrelsome. All these acts, if we love God and our neighbor, we do with heartfelt sorrow. These are the good works that confirm us as Christians. For the holy Apostle says: While we have time, let us do good to all. And what else does he say about this good work in the same place? He introduced the seed, he promised the harvest.

Works of mercy will not be in heaven. Like a farmer, the seed must now be sent into the ground. But when you sow, because you perform a work of mercy, while you grieve for the one to whom you do it, you sow in tears. Nonetheless, there will come a time after our end when these seeds of mercy will no longer be necessary; for in that kingdom, those who here were distressed for God will no longer be miserable. But indeed, in that recompense, to whom will you offer bread when no one is hungry? Whom will you clothe naked, where all are clothed in immortality? To whom will you provide lodging, when all live in their homeland? Whom will you visit sick, where eternal health prevails? Whom will you bury dead, where everyone lives forever? Whom will you reconcile when there is complete peace that is promised here? Therefore, there will be no works there, no mercy needed. Why? Because you already carry the rewards, you do not scatter seeds. Therefore, let us not falter: we sow in tears, that is, with labor and sorrow. Thus, do not grow weary in the work of mercy: for you will receive the reward of your sowing. Winter sows in labor: but if the harshness of winter sometimes frightens the farmer, would he not cast into the ground the fruit purified with so much toil? He proceeds, and casts into the ground what he has gathered from the ground, what has been purified from the ground: he proceeds, and casts into the ground, trembling with cold, yet diligent. Whence comes such diligence in the cold? Faith and hope expel laziness. Does he see the harvest? But he believes it will rise. Does he already collect the fruits? But he hopes he will gather them; and he encourages himself with this faith, this hope, so that with great toil in the cold, he may sow the seed in the ground, and with God granting according to the work of his labor, he may confidently gather abundant fruits. Complete.

Sermons - Sermon 359

SERMO 359 Of that which is written in Ecclesiasticus 25:2:

"Concord of brothers, and love of neighbors," and so on. ON DISPUTE AND CONCORD WITH THE DONATISTS Three excellent and rare things. From the heavens. The first reading of the divine words, from the book called Ecclesiasticus, commended to us three certain excellent and most worthy things of consideration: the harmony of brothers, the love of neighbors, and a man and a woman agreeing with each other. These are clearly good, delightful, and praiseworthy in human affairs; but much more powerful in divine matters. For who does not rejoice in harmonious brothers? And what is sorrowful, in human matters such a great thing is rare: it is praised by all, preserved by very few. Blessed are those who embrace in themselves what they are compelled to praise in others. No brothers do not praise harmonious brothers. And why is it difficult for brothers to be harmonious? Because they quarrel over the earth, because they want to be earth. For man, the sinner, heard from the beginning: "You are dust, and to dust you shall return." Let us therefore discuss and investigate the voice which the righteous ought to hear to the contrary. For if it is rightly said to the sinner: "You are dust, and to dust you shall return," it is rightly said to the righteous: "You are heaven, and to heaven you shall return." Or are not the righteous the heavens, when it is most clearly said of the Evangelists: "The heavens declare the glory of God?" And indeed because it is said about them, the subsequent words sufficiently explain. "And the firmament proclaims the work of His hands." Those whom he called heavens, he also called firmament. "Day to day pours out speech, and night to night declares knowledge. There is no speech, nor are there words, whose voices are not heard." You seek whose voices, and you find none but the heavens'. Thus it is said of the Apostles, it is said of the proclaimers of the truth. Whence it follows: "Their sound has gone out into all the earth, and their words to the ends of the world." There is no speech, nor are there words, whose voices are not heard. When the Holy Spirit came upon them, and God began to dwell in the heaven which He made from earth, they spoke, filled and gifted by the Holy Spirit, in the tongues of all peoples. Hence it is said: "There is no speech, nor are there words, whose voices are not heard." And because they were sent from there to the preaching of the Gospel to all nations: "Their sound has gone out into all the earth, and their words to the ends of the world." Whose? The heavens', to whom it is rightly said: "You are heaven, and to heaven you shall return," just as rightly to the sinner: "You are dust, and to dust you shall return."

Rich and poor. Gift of God.

Brothers, if they want to be in harmony, let them not love the earth. But if they do not want to love the earth, let them not be of the earth. Let them seek a possession which cannot be divided, and they will always be in harmony. Whence comes discord among brothers? Whence comes the disturbance of piety? Whence one womb and not one mind, except when their soul is bent, and each one looks to his own part, and strives to enhance and magnify his own portion, and wishes to have unity in his own possession, who with his brother holds division? Is that possession good, whose is it? It is ours. A great possession! So it is usually said. Is it all yours, brother? No; I have a partner here: but if God wills, he will sell me his part. The flattery responds: Let God do it. What should God do? That the neighbor be pressed and sell his part to his neighbor. Let God do it: you think well, may God fulfill it for you. Because the sinner is praised in the desires of his soul; and he who does iniquity is blessed. What is as unjust as wishing to become rich through another's poverty? And yet this abounds: He who does iniquity is blessed; and perhaps he prevailed, and perhaps he pressed and oppressed, twisted and extorted, not just any partner, but perhaps a brother. It is better that I buy than a stranger. And he easily oppressed, if he is just, has consolation. Let him hear Scripture, which he just now heard. He labors in poverty, his brother is full of abundance. But he is full of earth and empty of justice. Notice, earth, what that poor man hears. Do not fear when man grows rich, nor when the glory of his house is multiplied: for when he dies, he shall take nothing away. Hold on, poor man, to what you will not relinquish when dying, and what you will acquire living forever. Hold on to justice, do not regret it. Do you sorrow because you are poor on earth? He who created the earth was poor here. The Lord your God comforts you, your Creator comforts you, your Redeemer comforts you. Your brother, who is not greedy, comforts you. For indeed our Lord deigned to be our brother. He alone is the most faithful brother, with whom harmony is to be possessed. I said He is not greedy, and perhaps I find Him greedy. He is greedy: but He wants to have us, He wants to acquire us. For us, He gave Himself as the only price: nothing can be added to this price. He gave Himself as the price, and became our Redeemer. For He did not give Himself as the price so that the enemy might release us and possess Him. He gave Himself to death, killing death by His death. For by His death, He killed death, He was not killed by death; and having killed death, He freed us from death. For death lived for us who were dying; it will die for us who are living, when it will be said to it: Where, O death, is your contention? To everyone who asks, it must be given. So a brother was being troubled by another brother regarding land, as there was no harmony between them. And one brother said to the Lord: "Master, tell my brother to divide the inheritance with me. He has taken it all and does not want to give me my part. He despises me. Let him listen to you at least." What concern was this of the Lord? Just as we think humble thoughts, crawling on the ground, placed in this life, and not wanting to upset anyone, and often thereby causing greater upset—what would we say? "Come, brother, return to your brother his part." But the Lord did not say this. And what was fairer than that? Who could find such a judge to appeal to against his brother's greed? Did not the man rejoice at last in finding such great comfort? He no doubt hoped for great help, saying to such a judge: "Master, tell my brother to divide the inheritance with me." But what did He say? "Man, who made me a divider over you?" The Lord rebuffed him; He did not give what was requested, He did not grant a free benefit. What was the big deal? What did He lose in this? Did at least some labor go into this benefit? He did not give it. Where is "Give to everyone who asks of you?" That one who provided us an example of living did not give it. How, then, are we to act? Or how will we give what we spend if we do not give the benefit where we neither spend nor erode anything, nor lose anything? The Lord did not give this, yet He did not give nothing. He denied less but donated more. He clearly said, "Give to everyone who asks of you." What if someone asks you, not for something useless, but for something disgraceful? What if a woman asks from you what the woman asked from Joseph? What if a man asks from you what the false elders asked from Susannah? Should that unqualified statement, "Give to everyone who asks you," also be followed in these cases? Far from it. So shall we act contrary to the Lord's command? Rather, let us act according to the Lord's command and not give evil things to those who ask, nor act contrary to this statement. For it is said, "Give to everyone who asks you." It is not said, "Give everything to everyone who asks you." "Give to everyone who asks you"; certainly give, but if not what he asks, yet give something. He asks for evil, but you give good. Joseph did this. He did not give what the shameless woman asked, yet he gave something—what she should hear to refrain from shamelessness: and he himself did not fall into the pit of lust but offered advice for chastity. For he responded, "Far be it from me to do this against my master, lest I defile his bed who entrusted everything to me in his house." If a slave bought with money kept faith with his master in this way, how much more should a wife keep it with her husband? This is what he was admonishing. "I, a servant, will not do this to my master; should not you, a wife, do this for your husband?" Susanna also did this, and did not leave them empty-handed if they wanted to be filled with the counsel of chastity. For not only did she not consent, but she also made known why she did not. "If I consent to you," she said, "I perish before God; if I do not consent, I do not escape your hands; but it is better for me to fall into your hands than to perish before God." What does it mean, "It is better to fall into your hands than to perish before God"? You have perished before God, you who seek such things. Therefore, hold this rule. Give when asked, even if not what is asked. The Lord did this. What did He ask for? The division of inheritance. What did the Lord give? The destruction of greed. What did he ask for? What did he receive? "Tell my brother to divide the inheritance with me." The Lord answered, "Man, who made me a divider over you?" But I say to you: "Beware of all greed." And I say why. For perhaps you are seeking half the inheritance to become richer. Hear: "The land of a certain rich man produced plentifully. And he thought within himself, saying, 'What shall I do, since I have no place to store my crops?' And considering diligently, he said, 'I have found what I shall do. I will tear down my old barns and build new ones and fill them. I will make them larger than they were before. And I will say to my soul, 'You have many goods; take your ease, eat, drink, and be merry.'" But God said to him: "Fool! who think yourself very wise; you know how to destroy the old and build the new, and you remain in the old ruin, who ought to have destroyed the old in yourself so that you no longer think earthly things. Fool, what did you say? To whom did you say it? You said to your soul: Be merry, you have many goods. This night your soul will be required of you; whom will these things be which you have provided?" Therefore, fear not when a man is made rich; for when he dies, he shall carry nothing away. The harmony of brothers because.

Behold what counsel the Lord gave to dissident brothers, that they may be in harmony, to be free from greed, and immediately filled with truth. Let us therefore find such an inheritance. How long will we speak of the harmony of earthly brothers, which is rare, which is suspect, which is difficult? Let us speak of that harmony of brothers, which must be true and can be. Let all Christians be brothers, let all the faithful be brothers, let them be brothers born of God and from the womb of Mother Church through the Holy Spirit; let them be brothers, let them also have an inheritance to be given and not divided. Their inheritance is God Himself. Whose inheritance they are, He is likewise their inheritance. How are they His inheritance? Ask of me, and I will give you the nations for your inheritance. How is He their inheritance? The Lord is the portion of my inheritance and of my cup. In this inheritance concord is preserved: for this inheritance there is no litigation. Another inheritance is acquired by litigation: this one is lost by litigation. Men unwilling to lose this inheritance avoid litigating. And when they seem to litigate, they do not litigate. But perhaps they seem to litigate, or are thought to litigate, when they wish to give counsel to brothers. See how harmonious is their disputation, how peaceful, how kind, how just, how faithful. For we seem to litigate with the Donatists: but we do not litigate. For he litigates, who wishes ill to his adversary; he litigates who wants his adversary to suffer a loss and himself to gain; for something to decrease for the adversary and increase for himself. Not so are we. You also know it, you who litigate outside of unity; you also know it, who were acquired through division: you know that this dispute is not such a quarrel, because it is not malevolent, because it does not aim at the detriment of the adversary, but rather at benefit. For we wanted those with whom we seem to litigate, or still seem to as of now, to join us; not to lose them, but rather that we may be gained. Finally, our voice is different from that of that brother who appealed to Christ walking on earth. For we also appeal to Him in this case, sitting in heaven: and we do not say: Lord, tell my brother to divide the inheritance with me; but: Tell my brother to hold the inheritance with me.

Meeting held at Carthage.

Since this we desire and public records testify: since we have desired this, the indicators are not only words but our letters given to them. Do you love the episcopate? Hold it with us. In you, we hate nothing, we detest nothing, we curse nothing, we anathematize nothing, except human error. We said “human,” we detest error, not divine truth: but what you have of God, we acknowledge; what you have wrongly, we correct. I recognize the sign of my Lord, the sign of my Emperor, the character of my King in the deserter; I seek, find, approach, touch, apprehend, correct the deserter, not violate the character. If anyone notices, if anyone pays attention, this is not to quarrel but to love. We said it is possible for brothers to be concordant in one Church for the sake of peace: for concord of brothers is a beautiful thing. For it is not possible for there to be two bishops. We said that both should sit in one simple basilica; one in the chair, the other as a pilgrim; one in the Christian chair, the other in the heretical as if a colleague sitting next to: again, one presides in his congregation, the other in his in turn. Repentance has been preached for the remission of sins among all nations beginning from Jerusalem by the Apostles, we said. What will you answer to this Church, which has been built among all nations beginning from Jerusalem by the Apostles? We said: let us suppose Caecilian had utterly a bad cause. One man having a bad cause, two men, five, ten, will they prejudice so many thousands of the faithful scattered over the whole world with abundant fecundity? These things we said. Abraham believed, and all nations were promised to him: Caecilian sinned, and all nations perished, that what iniquity committed might prevail more than what truth promised? These things were said: they are read. Absolutely against divine examples, against the testimonies which assert that the Church is spread over the whole world, of which Church we hold the unity in the name of the Lord, they could answer nothing to these.

About Cecilianus.

Therefore, the cause of the Church is saved, confirmed, and immutably fixed and stabilized, as though upon the foundation of rock, which the gates of hell will not prevail against: with this cause secure, we come to the case of Caecilian, already reassured of whatever he might be found to have committed. For indeed, if as a man he were found guilty of some fault, were we to argue, that because of the fault of one man we should be judged as condemned or rebaptized? And we said: With the cause of the Church secure, which is unaffected by the sin of Caecilian; nor does the righteousness of Caecilian crown the Church; nor does the fault of Caecilian condemn the Church; let us also see what his case is like. We undertook to examine it, but as of a brother, not as of a father, or mother. God is our Father, the Church is our Mother: Caecilian was a brother, or is a brother; if good, a good brother; if bad, a bad brother, yet still a brother. If we find him innocent, where then will you be, who even in this human slander have failed? But if he is found guilty, if he is found criminal, we are not defeated even then, because we maintain the unity of the Church, which is unbeaten. Let him be found completely guilty, I excommunicate the man, I do not desert the Church of Christ. This we did, we said: from now on, we will not list him at the altar among the bishops, whom we believe to be faithful and innocent. This alone we did. Are you about to rebaptize the world because of Caecilian? With this security established and firm, the case of Caecilian began to be examined. He was found innocent, he was found to be attacked by slanderers. Once condemned in absentia, three times acquitted in person: condemned by a faction, acquitted by ecclesiastical truth. These things were read, these things were proven. It was asked whether they had anything to say in opposition. When all tergiversations of their slanders were exhausted, or when they could produce nothing against the most evident documents, nor against the very innocence of Caecilian, judgment was pronounced against them. And yet they say: We have won. Let them win, but against themselves, so that Christ may possess them; let Him conquer them who redeemed them. The conquered conquerors. And yet we rejoice about many. Many of them were fruitfully conquered, because they were not conquered. Human error was conquered, the man was saved. For the doctor does not contend with the sick person; and if the sick person contends with the doctor, the fever is conquered, and the sick person is healed. For this is what the doctor intends, to conquer; this is also what the fever intends, to conquer. The sick person is placed almost in the middle. If the doctor conquers, the sick person is safe: if the fever conquers, the sick person will die. Therefore in our contention, the doctor contended for health, the sick person contended for the fever. Those who heeded the doctor’s counsel conquered, overcame the fever. We have them healthy and rejoicing with us in the Church. They used to blaspheme us before, because they did not recognize us as brothers: for the fever had disturbed their mind. We, however, loved them both when they detested us and when they raged against us, and we served the raging sick people. We resisted, contended, and almost litigated: and yet we loved. For all who serve such languishing ones are troublesome; but they are troublesome for health.

Charity compels serving all.

However, we sometimes find lazy people saying: It is true, Lord, it is true; there is nothing to say. What then? Come, go. My father is deceased there, my mother is buried there. You mentioned deceased and buried. You live, there is still someone to talk to. Your parents were Christians in the faction of Donatus; their parents perhaps also Christians, and certainly their grandfathers or great-grandfathers pagans. So those who first became Christians, when they buried their pagan parents, were they cold against the truth? Did they follow the authority of their dead parents, and not rather prefer the living Christ to their dead parents? If therefore this is true unity, outside of which it is necessary to die eternally, why do you want to follow your dead parents, dead to both you and to God? What are you saying? Answer. You are right, there is nothing to say. What do you want me to do? Some custom or other holds such people fast. They are lethargic, suffering from the opposite malady, ready to die by sleeping. Others are frenetic, they are troublesome. For even if the lethargic one is about to die, he is at least not troublesome to the one serving him. The frenetic ones, who have lost their minds, are troublesome, and armed, they wander around wildly, seeking whom they might kill, whom they might blind. For indeed, we have received news, they cut out the tongue of one of our presbyters. These people are frenetic. Charity must be exercised, they too must be loved. Many corrected have wept, many corrected; we know it, they have come to us from among their number of madmen. They weep daily for their past, and are not satisfied with tears, observing the madness of those who, drunk with the vanity of undigested passion, still rage. So what do we do? Charity compels us to serve such as these. And although we are troubled by both kinds, by waking the lethargic and by binding the frenetic, yet we love them both. The harmony of brothers in Christ.

Good is the concord of brothers; but see where: in Christ, of Christians. And the love of neighbors. What, if he is not yet a brother in Christ? Because he is a man, he is a neighbor; love him also, so that you may win him too. Therefore, if you are in concord with a Christian brother, love your neighbor, even if there is not yet concord because he is not yet a brother in Christ, because he is not yet born again in Christ, he does not yet know the sacraments of Christ; he is a pagan, he is a Jew; yet he is a neighbor because he is a man: if you also love him, you have reached another love with another gift, and thus there are two in you: the concord of brothers, and the love of neighbors. From all these who hold concord with brothers and love their neighbor, the devoted Church to Christ is composed, and submissive to the man, so that the third may be achieved, Man and woman consenting to one another. Therefore we admonish your Charity, and we exhort you in the Lord to despise present things, my brothers, which you do not carry with you when dying: beware of sins, beware of iniquities, beware of worldly desires. Then indeed our fruit is whole within us, and our reward before the Lord is full of joys. For even if we say what must be said, even if we preach what must be preached, and release ourselves before the Lord in the sight of the Lord, because we did not remain silent about what we fear, we did not remain silent about what we love, that the sword of the Lord's vengeance may not come upon us and the watchman find nothing to blame: yet we do not want our reward to be secure with you lost, but with you found. For even the apostle Paul was secure about his reward, and yet what did he say to the people? Now we live, if you stand firm in the Lord. I speak to you and to your Charity, according to the command of the Lord, fathers and brothers. I also speak for my brother, your bishop, whose joy you ought to be, by obeying the Lord our God. Surely in the name of God this church has been made for you by his work, through the beneficent, merciful, devoted contributions of faithful brothers. This church has been made for you: but you are more the Church. It has been made for you, so that your bodies might enter: but your minds ought to be, so that God might enter. You have honored your bishop, that he might wish to call this basilica Florentia; but his Florentia is you. For thus says the Apostle: You are my joy and my crown in the Lord. Whatever is in the world fades away, passes away. What is this life, except what the Psalm says: In the morning it passes away like grass, in the morning it blooms and passes: in the evening it falls, hardens, and withers? This is all flesh. Therefore Christ, therefore a new life, therefore the hope of eternity, therefore the promised consolation of immortality, and already given in the flesh of the Lord. For that flesh was assumed by us, which is now immortal, and he has shown us in himself what he fulfilled in himself. For he had flesh for us. For he: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. Seek flesh and blood: where is it in the Word? Because he truly willed to suffer with us, and to redeem us, he assumed the form of a servant, and descended who was here, that he might appear who was not absent; and he willed to become man who made man, to be created from a mother, who created a mother. He ascended to the cross, died, and showed us what we knew, to be born and to die. He fulfilled in himself these old humble things of ours, known and familiar. We knew to be born and to die: we did not know to rise again and live forever. Therefore he assumed our two old things humbly: he fulfilled two other great and new things exaltedly. He raised the flesh, lifted the flesh into heaven, sits at the right hand of the Father. He willed to be our Head, the Head cried out for the members: because even when he was here, he said: Father, I desire that where I am, they also may be with me. Let us hope this also for our flesh, for the resurrection, the change, the incorruption, the immortality, the eternal abode: and let us act so that we may attain this. This will be Florentia, the true Florentia.

Sermons - Sermon 359A

SERMON 359/A SERMON HELD THEN AT TUNIS ABOUT PATIENCE AND FROM THE READING OF THE GOSPEL ABOUT THE STEWARD Hope like an anchor in the solid. As long as we are in this world, if we take care to have our heart above, it will not harm us that we walk below. For we walk below in this flesh. However, if we fix our hope above, we have placed an anchor in solid ground: that we might withstand the waves of this world, not by ourselves but by him in whom the anchor is fixed, our hope, because he who made us hope will not deceive us, to return the thing for hope. For hope, as the Apostle says, which is seen, is not hope. For who hopes for what they see? But if, he says, we hope for what we do not see, we wait for it with patience.

It is one thing to desire, another to see.

Concerning this patience that the Lord grants, I wish to speak to your Charity. For the Lord Jesus Christ also says in the Gospel in a certain place: In your patience, you shall possess your souls. It is also said in another place: Woe to those who have lost patience. Whether it is called patience, endurance, or forbearance, it signifies the same thing with various expressions. Let us not fixate on the diversity of sounds but inscribe the unity of the thing itself in our hearts, and let us internally possess what we call outwards. He who knows that he lives a pilgrim life in this world, wherever on earth he has been placed according to the body, who knows he has an eternal homeland in heaven, who trusts that there is there a region of blessed life, which it is allowed to desire here, but not to possess, glowing with such a good, holy, and chaste desire, lives patiently here. Patience does not seem necessary in prosperous things, but in adverse things. No one patiently endures what delights. But whatever we endure, whatever we patiently bear, is hard and bitter, and accordingly, patience is not necessary for happiness, but for unhappiness. Nevertheless, as I began to say, whoever burns with the desire for eternal life, in whatever land he may be, even in prosperity, must live patiently because he endures his very pilgrimage with difficulty until he reaches the longed-for homeland. One is the love of desire, another of vision. For both who desires loves; and who sees loves; and who desires loves so that he may reach it; and who sees loves so that he may remain. But if the desire of the saints burns so from faith, what will it be in manifestation? If we love so, when we believe what we have not yet seen, how will we love when we shall see?

Faith and hope.

Therefore, the Apostle says these three things which he especially commends to be built up in the inner man: faith, hope, charity, and when he praised the three, he finally said: But the greatest of these is charity. Follow charity. What then is faith? What is hope? What is charity? And why is charity greater? Faith is, as defined in a certain place of the Scriptures, the substance of things hoped for, the conviction of things which are not seen. He who hopes, has not yet what he hopes for, but by believing he is similar to one possessing. For faith, he says, is the substance of things hoped for, it is not yet the very thing we will hold, but faith itself is in place of that very thing. For he who holds faith does not hold nothing, nor is he empty who is full of faith. Therefore, the reward of faith is great because it sees not and believes. For if it saw, what reward would there be? Therefore, the Lord, when he had risen from the dead and had shown himself to his disciples, not only to be seen by eyes but also to be handled by hands, when he had convinced human senses that it was he who had risen who a little before had hung on the wood, intending to be with them for some days as long as he seemed to suffice for confirming the gospel and for building up the faith of the resurrection, ascended to heaven, so that he might not be seen, but be held by believing. For if he were always here and conspicuous to these eyes, there would be no praise for faith. Now indeed it is said to man: Believe. And he wants to see. He is answered: So that you may one day see, in the meantime believe. Faith is the merit: vision is the reward. If you wish to see before you believe, you demand the reward before the work. What you wish to have has a price. You wish to see God. The faith of such a great good is the price. You wish to arrive, and you do not wish to walk? Vision is possession, faith is the way. He who refuses the toil of the journey, how does he seek the joy of possession? On charity. But faith does not fail, because hope is present. Remove hope, and faith fails. For how can one who does not hope he can arrive move his feet in walking? But if you remove the love of both, that is, of faith and of hope, what good is it that he believes, what good is it that he hopes, if he does not love? Indeed, he cannot even hope for what he does not love. For love kindles hope, hope shines with love. But when we reach the things we hoped for in faith, not having seen them, what faith will be praised there? Indeed, faith is the conviction of things not seen. When we see, it will no longer be called faith. For you will see, not believe. Likewise, hope itself. When the thing exists, you no longer hope. For what a person sees, why does he still hope for it? Behold, when we arrive, faith ends, hope ends. What about love? Faith turns into vision, hope turns into reality. Then there will be vision and reality, not faith and hope. What about love? Can it end? For if it was already inflamed for what was not seen, surely when it sees, it will be even more inflamed. Therefore, it is well said: But the greatest of these is love, because vision follows faith, reality follows hope, but no reality follows love; it grows, it increases, it is perfected by that very contemplation.

Everyone wishes to be set free.

Hence, desiring the face of God, sighing toward the homeland of eternal happiness, no matter how much worldly felicity surrounds us, no matter how much abundance and affluence we are filled with, situated in that desire, we will consider the earthly pilgrimage miserable, and in that very misery we beseech God, always saying: Lord, deliver me. The poor man says: Deliver me; and you think he says it to be freed from poverty. The rich man says: Deliver me; perhaps he is sick. No, he is healthy, and he is rich, and he cries out: Deliver me. Why, except for what the very prayer says: Deliver us from evil? In whatever goods they may be involved, it is necessary for a Christian to cry out: Deliver us from evil. If he cries out: Deliver us from evil, there is something from which he is to be delivered; if there is something from which he is to be delivered, he is in evil; if he is in evil, no matter how many goods he has to delight in, he has what to endure until he enjoys God. Therefore, endurance is necessary in this world for the poor, the rich, the healthy, the sick, the captives, the free, those on a pilgrimage, and those established in their homeland; endurance is necessary because all are on a pilgrimage in the world. And until they are freed from this pilgrimage and adhere to that truth and immutable substance, for which they have sighed while on pilgrimage, they are involved in temptations and cry out to God with a true heart: Deliver us from evil. Who is truly happy. Job.

However, wretched men see those who are called blessed in this world, and they want to be like them, thinking that when they become like them, they will no longer be in hardship. This is a perverse mindset, and not Christian, full of greed, not faith: they believe there is nothing after this life. I do not say: He is happy in this life who abounds in all things. Far be it from me to say such, but if he thinks there is nothing after this life, he is never happy. For reason and truth compel us to acknowledge that no one can be happy here, happy according to wisdom's judgment, not as greed judges. And behold, when I have proposed, every man has judged that it is possible to be happy. And I begin to seek whether such a one can be found on this earth. Surely I do not say: He is happy who is healthy, who is rich, who is honored, who lives safely with all his own? I do not say this, but: He is happy who needs nothing. It is answered immediately: Then the rich man is happy because he needs nothing. If he needs nothing, he does not desire anything, if he desires, he is in need. You observe his wealth, I question his greed. How does he not need, to whom what he has is too little, and he desires to have more? Do you see that all he has amassed to possess is fuel for a fire where he grows, not where he is satisfied?

Therefore, if he desires more ardently the more he has, I do not say to you: He is in need, but he is poorer than a beggar. For a beggar's desire is satisfied with a few coins, but an avaricious man's desire is not satisfied by the whole world. Here again, you may respond: what if he seeks nothing beyond what he has? I commend if I find it, rejoice greatly, he has set a limit to an infinite thing, he could say to greed: Thus far. Great strength, great domination of the mind is to impose a limit, to break the greedy desire, to restrain greed, to set bounds to burning lust.

Great virtue, I confess, great virtue. Nevertheless, according to what I have defined, I do not yet call him happy. For what did I say? Who is happy? He who needs nothing. Behold, this one needs nothing: and abounds in all things, and seeks nothing more. I still ask: Does he not wish to have more? It is answered: He does not wish to have more. Does he fear to lose what he has? It is answered: He fears. How then does he not need, and if he now does not need in wealth, he needs in security. And who can make him secure in this world that what he possesses cannot perish, from whom can he receive security about things that totter and fall? Many rich men slept, rose poor. No one, therefore, gives him this security. And he knows it too, and therefore he fears.

Therefore, his mind must be increased, he must gain greater strength, so that just as he imposed limits to greed, so he may not fear to lose what he has, and may strengthen his heart so that he can say, having lost all things: Naked I came from my mother's womb, naked shall I return to the earth. The Lord gave, the Lord has taken away; as it pleased the Lord, so has it been done, blessed be the name of the Lord.

Great is this athlete of God, for he struggled with a great adversary. Let us, therefore, make the man so magnanimous that he is neither inflated by what he possesses nor broken by the loss of it but is as one who has as if he had not, uses this world as if not using it, has great wealth, which is the will of his Lord, like he whom we have mentioned: As it pleased the Lord, he says, so has it been done, blessed be the name of the Lord; to be rich: the will of my God; to be poor: the will of my God. See how he fulfilled what all sing but few do: I will bless the Lord at all times; His praise shall continually be in my mouth . What is: at all times? Both when it is well and when it is ill: this is at all times, this is always.

He is truly rich who is rich within, not within walls, but within thoughts, in conscience not in chest. Such riches neither shipwreck can take away; for he can come out of the waves both naked and full. Do we think we have found a happy man? If he is happy who needs nothing, whoever such a one may be on earth, why not happy? I think because we have also found such a one in need; if he still needs, he is not yet happy.

Behold he desires nothing, behold he loses securely, is not inflated by prosperity, not weakened by adversity. How is he not yet happy? If I find one in need, I do not dare to pronounce him happy. And whence, says someone, are you to find even this one in need? I find clearly. If he believes in God, he still needs, he is still a beggar of God. For it can be that such a man does not say in prayer: Deliver us from evil, but says: I need. What does he need? Eternal life. He does not yet have it. He is amid temptations.

Behold, Job himself, provoked to love God for nothing, for to this end the devil provoked him, having lost all his possessions, the consolation of his children lost, the only remaining wife being a temptress not a comforter, and struck grievously from head to foot so that even the patrimony of the poor man was taken from him. The poor man's patrimony is health, which when a rich man does not have, whatever he has is bitter to him.

Perhaps you find a poor man who does not need the patrimony of the rich; you do not find a rich man who does not need the patrimony of the poor. Job, struck grievously from head to foot, lost the patrimony of the poor, which is health. Nevertheless, he was not led to attribute folly to God and to displease Him in his troubles: God always pleased him. A new Eve suggested blasphemy at the instigation of the serpent with whom he invisibly wrestled: Say something against God and die. And he: You speak as one of the foolish women speaks. Shall we receive good at the hand of the Lord and shall we not receive evil?

She was an Eve, but he was not an Adam. He was defeated in paradise, this one conquered on a dunghill. Yet, amid all his sufferings, he says at one point: Is not human life on earth a temptation? Therefore, established in this human life, undoubtedly he was established in temptation. He wanted to be freed from this temptation. Even he needed the life where there is no temptation. If he needed, he was not yet happy. Therefore, whatever kind of man you may establish, describe, depict here, you wish for what you do not find. No one can be happy on this earth.

Patience and death.

What had I proposed? To speak about patience. If it has not slipped from your memory, this is what I proposed. Now therefore, how great a good patience is... in this earthly happiness we endure because of it. Whoever does not have it, fails. Whoever fails on the journey will not reach the desired homeland. You see how true it is that in our patience we possess our souls.

Therefore, while we live here, however great our happiness may be, let us live patiently. We all, or nearly all, fear death. Illness can be, or it can not be. The loss of loved ones is feared: they can be lost, or they might not be lost. Whatever evil you fear on this earth can both happen and not happen. Death cannot not happen. It can be delayed, it cannot be removed, and yet everyone labors for its delay, watches, protects themselves, locks doors, sails, plows. On land, at home, wherever they labor, they labor not so they will not die, but so they die a little later. Consider, dear ones, how much labor is expended by all men so they die later. If we expend so much labor so we die later, what should be expended so we never die? This also is counted among things to be borne, to be endured, and to be had patiently: this very fear of death with which every soul struggles. Indeed, see what the Apostle says: We groan, burdened in this land under this weight of corruptible flesh in which we do not wish, he says, to be unclothed, but to be clothed upon, so that what is mortal may be swallowed up by life. Indeed, we are burdened, he says, by the weight of the corruptible body, and under this body we groan, and we do not wish to be unclothed. What does it mean, we do not wish to be unclothed? We do not wish to place this very corpse under which we groan. We do not wish to place it. O burden, unhappily sweet! We groan, he says, burdened. Therefore, place it willingly, if you groan under the burden. In which we do not wish, he says, to be unclothed. But what? To be clothed upon. So that you may carry two burdens? No, he says. But why? So that what is mortal may be swallowed up by life. For we want to reach eternal life. We want to reach where no one dies, but through death we do not want, if it can be done, that while we live we might be taken there, and our body be transformed while we live into that spiritual form into which it is to be transformed when we rise again. Who would not wish this? Does not every man wish it? But to one who wishes it, it is said: Depart. Remember what you have sung in the Psalm: I am an alien in the land. If you are an alien, you remain in a foreign place. If you remain in a foreign place, when the landlord commands, you depart. And it is necessary that the landlord commands that you depart at some time, nor does he establish the day of your stay. For he did not make a bond with you. When you remain for free, your departure is by his command. And these things are endured and for this reason patience is necessary. Of the steward's cunning and of the future time. The servant saw this because his master was about to order him to leave his position, and he thought about the future and said to himself: My master is going to eject me from my position. What shall I do? I cannot dig, I am ashamed to beg. Here labor calls, there shame, but to the struggling man a plan was not lacking. I have found, he said, what I shall do. He met the debtors of his master, he brought out the promissory notes: You, how much do you owe? And he said: A hundred measures of oil. Sit down quickly, make it fifty. Take your bill. And to another: You, how much do you owe? A hundred measures of wheat. Sit down, make it quickly eighty. Take your note. He said this: When my master has ejected me from my position, they will welcome me, and neither will necessity force me to dig nor to beg. The Lord Jesus Christ, why did He propose this parable? For the fraudulent servant was not pleasing to Him; he committed fraud against his master; he did not do it with his own resources. Moreover, he also embezzled, causing a loss to his master to prepare a place of rest and security for himself after his actions. Why did the Lord propose this? Not because the servant committed fraud, but because he foresaw the future, so that a Christian who lacks counsel may feel ashamed if the ingenuity of the fraudster is praised. For thus He added: Behold, the children of this age are more prudent than the children of light. They commit fraud to provide for themselves in the future. For in what life did that steward look after himself? From which he was about to migrate by obedience. He looked after himself in a life that was ending, will you not look after yourself for an eternal one? Therefore love not fraud; but, He says, make friends for yourselves with the wealth of iniquity. On almsgiving. What should be done is considered.

Mammon is referred to as wealth in Hebrew, from which and in Punic mamon means profit. So what do we do? What did the Lord command? Make friends for yourselves from the mammon of unrighteousness so that they, when you start to fail, may receive you into eternal dwellings. It is easy indeed to understand that alms should be given and that it should be given to the needy because in them Christ receives. He himself said this: When you did it to one of the least of these my brethren, you did it to me. Also in another place he said: Whoever gives a cup of cold water to one of my disciples only in the name of a disciple, truly I say to you, he will by no means lose his reward. We understand that alms are to be given and that we should not be too selective about whom we give to because we cannot judge hearts. When you give to all, then you may reach the few who are worthy. You are hospitable, you prepare your home for strangers: let the unworthy also be admitted, so that the worthy are not excluded. For you cannot be a judge and examiner of the heart. And yet, even if you could: He is bad, he is not good, I add: He is still your enemy. If your enemy is hungry, feed him. If you must do good to an enemy, how much more to a stranger because even if he is bad, he is not yet an enemy. We understand these things because those who do them make friends for themselves who will receive them into eternal dwellings when they are excluded from this activity. For we are all stewards, and something has been entrusted to us in this life to be done so that we may give an account of it to the great master. And to whom more is entrusted, a greater account is required from him. The first reading that was recited terrified everyone and especially those who are in charge of the people, whether they be wealthy, or kings, or princes, or judges, or bishops, or leaders of churches. Each one will give an account of his own actions to the master of the household. This action is temporal; the actor's reward is eternal. But if we have conducted this action so that we give a good account of it, we are secure because after smaller things, greater things are entrusted to us. Be, he said, over five cities, the master said to his servant who gave a good account of the money he had been entrusted to dispense. He calls us to greater things if we do well. But because it is difficult not to sin much in a great action, therefore almsgiving should not cease so that when we are to give an account, we may not see so much an unyielding judge as a merciful father. For if he begins to examine everything, he will find many things to condemn. We ought to help the needy on this earth so that what is written may be fulfilled in us: Blessed are the merciful for they shall obtain mercy from God. And in another place: Judgment without mercy to him who has shown no mercy.

God sees what you have inside your heart more than in your hand.

Therefore, make friends for yourselves. Whoever has something should do it. No one should say: I am poor. No one should say: Let the rich do it. Those who have more, let them do more with more. Do not even the poor have something with which they can do it? Zacchaeus was rich, Peter was poor. He bought the kingdom of heaven with half of his riches, and that man bought it with just one net and one small boat. It is not because that man bought it that this one could not buy what he could. The kingdom of God is not for sale in such a way that when one person buys it, another cannot have something to buy. Behold, the fathers bought it and kept it for us to buy. Did they buy something different, and we buy something else? It is the same thing. It is always bought and offered for sale until the end of the age. Do not be afraid of being excluded by the increase. It is not as if you should say: He will buy it; for he has as much as I do not have. The one who offers it for sale answers you: Bring what you have; it is up to you to buy it as well. I said that it was up to Peter because of the one small boat that he had. It was up to that widow who put two small coins into the treasury. She put in two coins and bought everything. She offered a lot, for she left nothing for herself. And as I said a little earlier, what is cheaper than a cup of cold water? The kingdom of heaven is worth even as much. Whoever does not have a boat and nets, whoever does not have the wealth of Zacchaeus, whoever does not have the two coins that the widow had, has at least a cup of cold water. I think He added 'cold' so that the wood would not trouble you. But perhaps at that moment, you cannot find even a cup of cold water to give to the thirsty. You do not find it and sympathize with the thirsty. God sees what you have inside; He does not see the power in your hand, but He sees the will in your heart. You have also bought it; be confident. This possession is called peace: peace on earth, goodwill to men.

Unjust riches. But let us return, brothers, to what we had passed over. What does the mammon of iniquity mean? What did the Lord intend to admonish us? Should we commit fraud in order to have something to give as alms? Many do this, but they do not do well. They take much and give a little from it, and they think they are absolving their sins as if with a corrupt judge. The one to whom you give rejoices, but the one from whom you take laments. God has ears in the midst. There is no partiality with Him. He hears more against you from the one who groans than in favor of you from the one giving thanks. Therefore, let no one persuade himself, because the Lord named the mammon of iniquity, that frauds, plunderings, despoilments, and anything else displeasing should be pursued for the sake of giving alms. What then does He say: Make friends for yourselves by means of the mammon of iniquity? I understand nothing else, brothers, except that mammon is gold, that is, wealth. Let us now speak Latin which you understand. There are true riches and false riches. Iniquity calls false riches, calls them riches, for true riches are with God. True riches are what the angels have who lack nothing. However, the riches which we seem to have we seek as remedies for our infirmities. If we were healthy, that is, in that immortality which we will have later, we would not seek those riches. Iniquity calls these riches riches. Therefore He said: Make friends by means of the riches of iniquity, not with the riches which you collect by iniquity, but with the riches which iniquity calls riches since they are not true riches.

True riches.

Hear how these riches, which are not true riches, are called from iniquity. The Psalm says in a certain place - There a man groans and wants to be freed from certain strange children and says to the Lord: Deliver me from the hand of strange children, whose mouth speaks vanity and their right hand is the right hand of iniquity. They speak only of frauds and prepare themselves for frauds, of whom it is said: Their right hand is the right hand of iniquity. Is he not going to call or name anyone a defrauder? But what is he going to say? Their sons are like established young plants, their daughters adorned as the likeness of a temple. Their storehouses are full, bursting from grain into grain. Their cattle are fat, their sheep fertile, multiplying in their exits. There is no breach of wall nor outcry in their streets. How great a temporal happiness he has described! So where is the iniquity? Where is the vanity? Listen to what follows: Those people are called blessed who have these things. Behold whence the iniquity, because they called the people blessed who have this abundance. They saw no other blessedness, sought no other that is true. They consumed all their desire in earthly happiness. They did not want to lift their heart upwards. But what does he who groans and wishes to be freed from such people say? When he had spoken of the wicked strange children: Those people are called blessed who have these things, as if it were said to him: but whom do you call blessed? Blessed is the people whose God is the Lord. Behold true riches. But those are riches of iniquity. Whoever has those riches of iniquity, let him make friends from them before he departs from this life. For if he makes friends from them, he uses them well. Are not those also riches? For he has other true riches: He regards his God as riches. From earth he tramples on the earth. Finally you love those. The Lord says to a certain rich man who loved his possessions greatly: Do you love what you possess? Migrate to where I tell you. I do not want you to lose them. But what? Make for yourselves treasures in heaven where a thief does not approach nor moth corrupts. By loving your riches, you will lose them. Migrate to where you will not lose them. Place them there where you may come.

Friends and wealth.

Therefore, He says, make friends for yourselves with unrighteous mammon, so that when it fails, they may receive you into eternal dwellings. This sentence is explained thus. Consider unrighteous mammon as money obtained from fraud. Your father acquired it through usury. He made you rich. Do not take pleasure in your father's usury. Do not be an heir to iniquity: be an heir to the wealth of iniquity. Do not imitate your father by practicing usury as well. But now there is a lot of money in the house! Make friends from the unrighteous mammon, not by committing fraud now and giving from it, but from what has already been collected from the fraud. If your father learned to seize, you should learn to distribute. But why about one hundred and fifty, and why about one hundred and eighty? With one hundred and fifty, he wished to signify half. For Zacchaeus did this. "I give half of my goods to the poor." With one hundred and eighty, he did not wish to signify two tenths. For to give from one hundred and twenty so that eighty remain, this is to give two tenths. Therefore, they were giving one tenth. But the Lord said in the Gospel: "Unless your righteousness exceeds that of the Pharisees and scribes, you will not enter the kingdom of heaven." Therefore, if the righteousness of the Pharisees and scribes was to give one tenth, how will your righteousness abound unless you give two tenths yourself? To give something more is to abound.

Therefore, you make friends, extend hope, cultivate desire, endure present circumstances with patience, whether favorable or adverse, because even this happiness is endured by one who seeks happiness from above. It is endured, for as long as we are exiled, whatever holds us away from our God is considered evil. And the heart that fights against happiness to avoid corruption is greater in struggle than the heart that fights against unhappiness to avoid breaking. Through this patience, therefore, when this age ends or our life ends—whichever ends soon—we will be secure about the eternal dwellings, because we have made friends from the mammon of unrighteousness.

Sermons - Sermon 359B

Sermon 359/B A sermon of the same on obedience "We are led to this city by nothing more than the love of your bishop." The disturbance of yesterday was both ours and yours - and more ours because of you than yours - silence, I confess, was commanded; but because love commands us regarding the lord brother, whom it is necessary to serve - there is also in you a desire to listen, to which we pray that God may grant fruit in your conduct and obedience -, we serve you in the name of Christ, because we serve Christ to whom you are members. However, I confess this before God, in His sight and in yours, to whose ears my thought is a voice; I call Him as a witness over my soul, because it is not primarily any reason other than the love of your bishop that brings us to this city to speak to you what the Lord gives us. I do not speak of the love with which we love him, but rather of that love by which we feel we are genuinely loved by him without any pretense. For while you know us, in no way can you know us as we know each other who serve you in the love of Christ. For indeed we love you too, and you see, God knows. Nevertheless, dearest ones, you must know - I say this before Christ - that if you desired us more than all the things you desire, and felt even a little contrary will toward us in the mind of your bishop, you would not see us here.

"Having left the council of the Numidians, where the order itself required my presence, I chose rather to come here." For he has now deigned to send us such letters, saying that if we were to think our coming should be delayed or if we were to deliberate on whether to come or not come, we would offend the very charity which is said to be God. Consider our weakness, committed in the middle of winter through such long journeys. Let your charity accept something else. Blessed and venerable old man Xanthippus, primate of Numidia, has called a council at Constantina on the fifth before the Kalends of February. The council has been called by the primate of Numidia for the bishops of Numidia, where we also are. In that city of Constantinus, as far as I judge, your charity knows that a bishop from our side is present. For he was nurtured in the word of God and served as a presbyter in the town of Thagaste, then from there he was made bishop in Constantina. I cannot tell you with what letters he wished to draw me there, so that I might go to Constantina: as he called the council, he removed all my delays and doubts. Yet, dearest brothers, such letters came from your lord and brother Aurelius the bishop to my humility, which, by the gravity of their sentences and their weight, conquered whatever I had previously decided, not bringing me, but seizing me. For I thought this, that not only with such confidence, but also with such a command, he deigned to order, not from himself, but from God, to say this to myself, that if I came here and conformed to his will - indeed God's through him - I could satisfy his letters for my departure from there before the lord old man Xanthippus, lest he might perhaps be angry with me because, leaving the council of Numidians, where the order of his rank required me to be present, I chose rather to come here.

"And there was confusion, and great sadness for us." To what does all this that I have said pertain? Yesterday my eyes observed there was a space not filled by the brothers, close to both our ears and our tongue; we were not the originators of the idea to debate there instead, because we saw that it was necessary to follow them rather, so that they might come to the bishops, than for the bishops to come to those places with great disturbance of a larger crowd which had already established itself around the apse with a certain security of hearing: a much larger multitude would have been disturbed from those places to those places. But perhaps the men were to be overlooked, what about the weaker sex? Without a doubt, when the women began to press forward with the desire to approach, would they not have made even greater noise and uttered voices which were most unseemly in the church? Therefore, this was the only thing—to beseech those few, who were leaning against the rails, to condescend to approach the spaces nearest to the place where we were speaking. What greatness was there in this request? However, they did not even wish to hear it, and disturbance ensued, and great sadness for us, which God has now deigned to obliterate through the very venerable speech of your bishop. But from now on, brothers, we admonish you lest you think I was not granted the place by him to deliver the speech there, where it was so obstinately and tumultuously requested and demanded by some. Behold why I said all those things, because, if we had felt even a small grudge in the heart of our most blessed brother, we would not have come to this city — especially pressed by other necessities.

Why did Augustine leave without the bishop's permission?

What then? Does your charity not remember that for four continuous days I argued from that place in the middle of the barrier against the party of Donatus? Was it waited for so that you might ask? Was even a suggestion made by us? He himself willingly saw what needed to be done and did it; he did not see what needed to be done, he did not do it. But perhaps you say: "What great or difficult thing did we ask?" Even if what you asked for was small, the obedience which we demand from you is no small matter. Therefore, it is from this perspective that I shall speak. For I heard some brothers saying: "Behold, he himself argued that it is necessary to serve the weak. He argued this the day before, the next day he did not. Therefore, let us be served. Why did he descend?" I tell your holiness why I descended. For indeed, he ought more to excuse me, since I descended without his bidding. Yet my intention to descend was such that I did not even consult him lest he prohibit it. And, of course, if I had consulted him and he had prohibited it, I would have no choice but to obey: it was necessary that I should not descend. Therefore, I preferred to seek pardon for having descended without consulting him or being ordered, rather than not doing what I thought needed to be done.

Examples of the Church of Carthage become known throughout all of Africa.

Now just listen to why I thought this should be done. How this people has always obeyed their bishop when present, not only we know, but all of Africa and perhaps the entire world, wherever the Church of this city is known. For we all know what dissolution and confusion of women and men existed here before, because we were also part of this disgrace in past times. It happened by the Lord through his servant that the mixed sexes did not keep vigil. I, as a boy studying in this city, kept vigil with the women mixed in with the improprieties of the men, where occasion perhaps also tempted chastity. How honorably it is now kept watch, how chastely, how saintly! This diligence may not even displease those against whom it was instituted. The wicked themselves, the wanton ones, the insidious ones against another's chastity, can feel pained by this diligence, but they cannot blame it. But was this done only so that we might rejoice from this alone? What about the different entrances and ways in? How has it been taken care of, with what wisdom discovered, with what urgency perfected, so that those who, when they entered, were to be in separate places, would also enter separately, so that entering closely they would not begin something which they might want to complete afterwards, by servile, wicked and impudent people, who are accustomed to speaking shameless things in the face of passing matrons? How vigilantly these things were observed, with what vigor they were removed! In the church at Mappalia near the memory of the blessed bishop and martyr Cyprian, what used to happen, if we remember, perhaps we still grieve; if we forget, we give less thanks to God. Let your charity recall with us, brothers: I speak of the blessings of God upon you through your bishop. Where once shameless songs resounded, now hymns ring out; where people used to keep vigil for luxury, they now keep vigil for sanctity; finally, where God was once offended, God is now propitiated. I ask your charity not to forget these things: they are recent, they can be compared; they were there yesterday, they are not today. But when could your bishop have achieved these things unless he had an obedient people? So that I may speak of something, and not a small something, even about the good of your obedience, if your zeal did not consent to such an attempt by your bishop, could he have possibly fulfilled it in any way? Therefore, the mercy of God was present in his diligence and in your obedience. When we knew how accustomed you are to being subject, when we set you as an example to be imitated by others, so that we might say to the small peoples in the fields resisting their bishops: "Go, see the people of Carthage," then while we greatly rejoiced in your good example, how could we have been saddened yesterday, brothers, by your disobedience, as if our constant coming had taught you disobedience?

"It should not seem to you a light sin to be disobedient."

Therefore, let your charity attend. I grieved for the misery of my ministry that I might descend. You were asking to hear. What could the speaker edify when the listener was threatening ruin? "Why," you ask, "ruin? What great thing were we asking? What evil were we seeking?" I will say what ruin, I will say so that you may fear, not to fall. Do you not know that from a spark rises a conflagration? Do you not know that the smallest drops fill rivers and drag the depths? Let not disobedience seem to you a slight sin. Let us indeed say this: it made no difference whether you heard here or there; because there were spaces around us that could be filled by the multitude, both we knew and you. What else remained that you did not want to cross over here, if not sheer obstinacy: "Either it happens as we want, or what you want does not happen?" For we wanted you to hear, and what we wanted was beneficial for all. But certain ones, clinging to the barriers, when their irrational will was not agreed to, even shouted, "Let the dismissal happen." Certainly, how far were you and how slowly I said, "Let the dismissal happen," and behold all heard, because you patiently kept silent. What if we wished to test your obedience itself? "But in a small matter," someone says, "how would you test it?" If you did not obey in a small matter, would you obey in a greater one? Have you not read the Lord saying: He who is faithful in what is least is faithful also in much, and he who is unjust in what is least is unjust also in much? On the evil of disobedience. Do you wish to know what evil disobedience is, because I said: "Disaster was threatening the listener"? God planted all good things in His paradise. If He made all good things in the whole world, as Scripture says: "And God saw everything that He had made, and behold, it was very good," if all things were good, how much more the things that He established more joyfully in paradise. Therefore, where He had planted all good things, what does it mean: Do not touch this tree? Do you not know that men usually make an inquiry about this, who cannot see either how good obedience is or how evil disobedience is? Behold, everything good had been planted. Do not touch, God said. "Why should

I not touch? Did you place something evil here? If you placed something evil here, remove it, and do not forbid me to touch it." "Do not touch this tree," He said, which certainly, if it were not good, would not be in paradise. Or do you perhaps think that because God had filled the whole earth with all good things outside paradise and planted evil in the paradise itself? And indeed in the rest of the land there were good things, but certainly better things in paradise. Nevertheless, because obedience was better among all the good things that were placed in paradise, God forbade something, lest by forbidding nothing He might not rule. And what? Perhaps someone thinks that God wanted to rule out of His own pride. The dominion of God is useful not to God, but to whom He governs. He is neither lessened by our contempt nor greater by our service. It is advantageous for us to be under such a Lord, not for Him. He wants to rule over us for our benefit, not for His. He requires none of our good, we are in need of all His good, and especially of God Himself, our highest good. For our highest and best good, beyond which there is nothing better, is God Himself. Watch the confessing servant, listen to him from the Psalm: "I said to the Lord, You are my God, for You do not need my goods." Therefore, God forbade something to impose a command, so that He might be served as a ruler, so that obedience might be distinguished from disobedience as virtue from vice; and that tree was called the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, not because there hung there fruits of good and evil, but it was called the tree of the knowledge of good and evil because if man touched it against the command, he would experience in that tree what the difference was between the good of obedience and the evil of disobedience. For from that tree, disregarding the command, death followed; by keeping the command, immortality would follow. You see, therefore, my brothers, how great an evil disobedience is: it was the first ruin of man. In Adam all die, in Christ all will be made alive.

Certainly we wish to rise from this fall: why do we repeat where we fell from? Let Adam suffice, Christ came. In Adam all die, in Christ all shall be made alive. From Adam, the root of evil, disobedience, entered the human race; in Christ, the root of immortality, obedience. Therefore, Adam was an author and example of disobedience to us, but Christ of obedience. And how was Christ obedient? Although He is equal to the Father, He says He serves the Father. Surely you acknowledge with me, Catholics, the Catholic faith; you acknowledge: "I and the Father are one;" you acknowledge: "He who sees me sees the Father;" you acknowledge: "And the Word was with God, and the Word was God;" you acknowledge: "Though he was in the form of God, he did not count equality with God a thing to be grasped." For equality was not robbery to Christ, but nature: for whom it was robbery, standing he fell; for whom it was nature, descending he remained. Indeed, let the same Apostle Paul expound the commendation of the obedience of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. It is worthwhile to recall and hear the whole chapter itself. Behold, see the equal Son to the Father in the form of God, but read what follows: "Though he was in the form of God, he did not count equality with God a thing to be grasped." “But what did he do?” "But emptied himself." “How did he empty himself? I fear he lost his equality.” Do not suspect: hear what follows, hear from where he emptied, hear that he did not empty by losing what he was, but by taking what he was not. "He emptied himself," he says. “How? I ask you, now say.” "Taking the form of a servant." “Who took the form of a servant?” He who was in the form of God – there he was, here taking – taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men – made surely in the mother whom he made – being made in the likeness of men and found in human form. “But we were talking about obedience. We have said many things now, and we haven't heard obedience. I heard he emptied himself, heard he took the form of a servant, heard he was made in the likeness of men, but prove that he did this by obeying.” Finally hear: being made in the likeness of men and found in human form, he humbled himself, becoming obedient unto death.

Christ the Lord made himself the servant of man.

Let us consider the Lord as a servant: does the Lord listen, and the servant despise? Let no one say in his heart: "But He did this because He is the Lord." What did He do because He is the Lord? Did I say this to you: "Light the sun, let the moon run with its monthly losses and gains; make the stars shine from the sky, let the springs gush forth from the earth, let the animals walk, birds fly, fish swim?" Finally, did I even say this: "Open the eyes of the blind, break the ears of the deaf, drive the fever from the sick, raise the flesh of the dead?" I say none of these things: He did these things as God, I demand obedience from you which He offered as a servant. I demand, I say, obedience. Through immortality, you will be like Him, through obedience, He became like you. He will give you His life, for He accepted your death. But you say: "He obeyed God the Father." To whom, indeed, are you commanded to obey? For He obeyed God the Father, as an equal. Do you think there is a difference because He served God the Father and you are told: "Obey your bishop?" For who placed the bishop over you, to whom you should obey? Have you forgotten the Gospel: He who hears you hears me; he who receives you receives me, and he who receives me receives him who sent me? Finally, you say: "He served the Father." What if He served you too? Are you both His father and mother? For He deigned to have a mother here, not a father, to show both His marvelous generations, divine and human: divine without a mother, human without a father - and yet He was a child subject to His parents (read the Gospel), in childhood subject to His parents, in divine majesty the Lord of parents -, yet you are not His mother, though He served you as well. For He did not only teach us to serve by word, but by example. It was not enough for the Lord to say to His disciples: Serve one another. The Lord indeed commands it to be done: surely it ought to suffice because the Lord commanded it. Was it expected that He should show what He commanded? Truly, would any of us dare to demand that our Lord first fulfill what He commanded? And yet, with none of us daring to demand it, He gave an example from Himself for the disciples to serve one another: Whoever, He said, wants to be the greatest among you must be your servant. And immediately, lest the disciples be saddened by the servile name and say to Him: "So, Lord, will we be servants, whom you have redeemed? Will we be servants, for whom you shed your blood? Do we not recognize the merit of our freedom in your price, your blood?", He consoled their possibly sad pride, not yet healed: He, said, will be your servant, just as the Son of Man did not come to be served but to serve. Behold, He became our servant too, and we are not His mother. Or perhaps we are even His mother? These are my brothers and my mother, who do my will. The bishop, while he commands what is useful, serves.

"But behold," says someone, "let my bishop take an example from my Lord, and serve me." I say to your charity - who can, let him understand -: Unless he served, he would not command. For he serves who commands what is useful, serves with vigilance, serves with care, serves with solicitude, serves finally with charity. For even he who was made a minister here, certainly commanded his disciples. Hear him commanding and them serving: Where do you want us to prepare the Passover for you? And he sends whomever he wishes where he wishes, and he ordered it to be prepared where he wishes. What he commanded was done, and yet he served more; for he did not lie saying: The Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve. How did he not come to be served, but to serve? Behold, I see the disciples running, preparing the Passover, arranging the dinner. How did he not come to be served, but to serve? But what to serve? He follows: And to give his life for his friends. Do you wish to know what he served us? From this we live today and today we feed from his table, which he then served. The obedience of the disciples and others in preparing the entry of the Lord into Jerusalem.

Go, he said, into the village opposite you, where you will find a colt tied, on which no one has ever sat. Untie it and bring it here. If anyone asks you, ‘What are you doing? Why are you untying the colt?’ reply, ‘The Lord has need of it,’ and they will let you take it. They heard, went, and did so. Did anyone resist, did anyone say, ‘Why does he want the colt brought to him? Surely the one who raises the dead did not tire out by walking.' Listen, servant; do what he commands, certainly by him who wishes you well, by him who cares for your salvation. To question why he commands is to contend, not to obey. First be a diligent obeyer, so you may be a suitable questioner. Wash yourselves, be clean, are the words of the commander. Remove wickedness from your souls and from my sight, are the words of the commander. Learn to do good, seek justice, defend the fatherless, plead for the widow - have you done what he commanded? - and come, let us argue, says the Lord. The colt was untied from the village that was opposite them. What is the village opposed to the disciples, if not this world? Go to the village opposite you. This world is opposed to the disciples, falsehood opposed to truth, lust opposed to chastity, disobedience opposed to obedience. In this village which is the world, the colt was tied, which no one had ever sat on. Who is this colt tied in the opposed village, on which no one has sat, who if not the people of the nations bound with the devil’s chain, which no prophet had ridden? Untied, led, he carries God, is ruled by the Lord, is led by the Lord along the way, reminded by the Lord’s whip; and in those who obeyed to bring the colt, there was obedience, and in those who immediately let the colt go upon hearing that the Lord needed it, there was obedience. Whatever you understand those men to be. For perhaps they are the opposing powers that tied the colt; perhaps those men who tied the colt signify the devil and his angels, through whom the people of the nations were bound by deadly superstition: such is the power of the commander, that even they would not dare to hold what the Lord says he needs. What are you, my brothers? What do you wish to be? Those who untie the colt, or the colt itself? Forbid it that you should be those who tied the colt, and yet neither did those resist. What then do you wish to be, my brothers: those who untied the colt, or the colt itself? You do not dare to claim for yourselves the role of those through whom the colt was untied: this was done by the apostles. This is the role of those in charge: we bear it with all the concern that the Lord grants us, we speak to you from it. You are the colt, obey those who lead you to carry the Lord. Certainly, beloved, consider how the disciples untied the colt and led it to the Lord. They led, it followed; they didn't drag, and it did not resist. And yet, since we speak of our service, when the disciples were leading the colt to the Lord, they rather served the colt; so we also serve you when we lead you to the Lord, when we teach and admonish obedience: if your weakness were not served, today you would not listen to us. The mother of obedience is love.

Certainly, beloved, we too are human, we also carry weaknesses. You disturbed us yesterday, and in our own disturbance, we feared more for you, lest you sadden the Spirit of God within us, through whom we serve you. How do you think, brothers, that I, now standing and about to speak to you, could be disturbed, considering - as I have already mentioned - how obedient you usually are and how disobedient you became in our presence, as if we teach disobedience, as if we do not hold your reins within our measure, to lead you to the Lord? And yet, beloved - which you have heard from Him, and it is true - however great our care is for you or about you, can it be greater than His who serves you especially, who presides in such a way that he is subject? We seem to preside from a higher place: but so great is the burden of concern and care that it makes us under your feet. Finally, tread upon us and live. What is it, my brothers, what is any virtue in a servant of God without obedience? What then is obedience? You love charity: its daughter is obedience, the daughter of charity. But charity cannot be sterile. Let no one deceive you, let no one say: "I do not have obedience, but I have charity." You absolutely do not have charity. Wherever this mother is, she bears children. If she is there, she has given birth; if she has not given birth, she is not there. The root is hidden, brothers, the fruit is visible. I do not believe it is clinging to the soil unless I see what hangs on the branch. Do you have charity? Show me its fruit: let me see obedience, let me rejoice in obedience, let me embrace the offspring, to recognize the mother.

You will not be obedient if, believing in man, you scorn God.

Behold how great goods seem to be had even by the deceitful. Yesterday we heard the praises of a true martyr: what torments he endured, how immense, how many, how numerous! If charity is lacking, it is madness. Wherefore do we praise, wherefore do we proclaim, wherefore do we rejoice together, if not because we see in what Church, for what faith, what he resisted to the commanding king? Not indeed because he resisted the one commanding, but because it is a sin to obey in what the one commanding orders, for that is not even to be called obedience where something destructive and sacrilegious is commanded. For just as there is no faith when something false is believed, so there is no obedience where something useless is commanded. For how could I call obedient one who believes man and despises God? Authorities are established in this world, and above all authorities is divine power. You would not be obedient if by obeying perhaps you as a servant despised your lord for your father. I say this: if perhaps you were a servant, and your father and your fellow servant commanded you differently from what your lord had ordered, and you obeyed rather your father than your lord, would I not call you disobedient and a subverter of order? He, indeed, should be listened to more who has greater power, he who has legitimate authority. Therefore, I would not call you obedient if you obeyed the curator against the proconsul, the proconsul against the emperor; thus I do not call obedient one who obeys the emperor against God.

Martyr Vincent obeying God emerged as a victor.

Whence then obedient, whence holy, whence the acquirer of the true crown, Vincent, whence the victor of so many passions and congruous to his name? Whence? See who was commanding, to whom he was commanding, what he was commanding. The emperor commanded, he commanded a Christian, he commanded that he offer incense to idols. If you consider the rank of the commander, the emperor commanded a provincial. "A certain place of obedience is given, when I hear who commanded, to whom he commanded." But wait, listen to what he commanded: to offer incense to idols. "Who does not offer incense to idols, let him be punished." Now the provincial obeys, if a higher power orders nothing against it. But raise your ear, hear two voices: hear one from the tribunal, hear another from heaven. What did you hear from the tribunal? "Who has not sacrificed to the gods, let him be punished." What from the heavens? "Sacrificing to the gods, he shall be uprooted." Here let your obedience be tested, martyr. Discern the voices, distinguish the powers. See him who commands, rather fear Him who prohibits. This is the crown of martyrdom, this is the triumph, with the devil conquered and trampled underfoot, whom the martyr feared when enticing, whom he despised when angry. He himself expressed this, just as those things were heard which were read, he expressed it with his own voices: when he who was raging seemed to wish to show mercy, then he seemed most of all to be avoided. For deceptive mercy harmed more than overt cruelty. In the roar of the angry, he did not fear the lion; in the blandishment of the merciful, he did not hide that he feared the dragon. For he himself is the lion and the dragon about whom it is said: "You will trample on the lion and the dragon." The devil, lion, and dragon do not spare the believing people.

Therefore, let no one say, dearest brothers, let no one say—because anyone who says this deceives himself—that the Church does not now suffer persecution because the emperors are Catholic, because they order everything for the Church and are vigilant for its growth, being accountable to God for their empire. Let no one say the Church does not suffer persecution: it does not suffer from the lion, but the dragon does not sleep. Hear that lion, as Peter commemorates in the open passion of the saints and exhorts the martyrs to the triumph of victory: "Your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, walks about, seeking whom he may devour." For then the fearful threats and great cruelty of the Gentiles against the saints of God, then the oncoming force of contrary commands and the great raving of powers: the lion was roaring, but neither did the dragon cease. You have heard Peter exhorting against the lion, hear now Paul making you cautious against the dragon: "I have espoused you to one husband." For many wanted to be the husbands of one woman. Consider, however, brothers, consider what many husbands do to one woman. This makes her detest what should be thought upon, not uttered to cause horror. There were many men wanting to be the husband of one woman. But he, the friend of the bridegroom and zealous for the bridegroom, not for himself: "I have espoused you," he says, "to one husband to present you as a chaste virgin to Christ. But I fear, lest as the serpent seduced Eve, so also your minds should be corrupted from the chastity of God, which is in Christ." He feared her being corrupted not by the savageness of the lion, but by the blandishment of the dragon. Peter advised you to neither fear the lion for God's sake, Paul advises you to be vigilant against the dragon for God's sake, and in God, to trample on both the lion and the dragon.

True faith teaches that the saints must die for Christian doctrine. For you wish to know what kind of dragon this is, how to avoid his snares, how great is the cunning of the enemy? Behold, already for nearly six thousand years, in the temptations of the saints, having been trained, he has made many false gods against the one true God. But one Son of God came, foretold by his preceding heralds; the Son of God came, dissolved the works of the devil like the binding of that foal, taught by word, confirmed by example; showed that the one true God should be worshiped, that He should be adored, not angels in His place, since even angels, because they love God, because love especially reigns in them, want God to be loved with them, not themselves instead of God. When He thus [the Christian doctrine] had taught, He taught this: it is necessary for the saints to die, if need be, for this doctrine. For what doctrine? One that has love from a pure heart and a good conscience and genuine faith. For this He taught the saints of God to die and commended them to the Church to be venerated. How to be venerated? Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His holy ones. Hence, the death of Peter is precious, hence the death of Paul is precious, hence the death of Vincent is precious, hence the death of Cyprian is precious. Why precious? From pure love and a good conscience and genuine faith. That serpent saw this, that ancient serpent saw that martyrs are honored, temples are deserted: with that cunning and venomous vigilance against us, because he could not implant false gods among Christians, he made false martyrs. But oh you, Catholic offspring, compare with us for a little while these false martyrs with the true martyrs, and with pious faith distinguish what the devil tries to deceitfully and venomously confuse.

"It is not punishment that crowns martyrs, but cause."

He wants to obscure the distinction between true and false martyrs for us, he wants to extinguish the eye of the heart so that we do not discern these things; he wanted to counter them with a similar appearance, but let us heed the apostle speaking against the devil about certain people: Having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof. What is the power of godliness? Charity. It is that very mother of obedience. Therefore, observe the appearance with which the devil tries to join false martyrs to true martyrs. "Behold," he says, "they also endure persecution." Still, O enemy, you still confuse. Persecution, you say, they endure. Furthermore, oppose robbers, murderers, parricides, adulterers, poisoners: do not all these also endure persecution? Did not my Lord foresee you and by foreseeing warn me—whom I want and yours, whether you will or not, because he is also mine even if I had been unwilling, but he is my Lord to my benefit, because I want, to my detriment, if I had not wanted—did not that ancient enemy foresee you when he was encouraging his own disciples towards the glory of suffering: Blessed, he says, are they who endure persecution for righteousness' sake. Against all your poisons, against your polyglot audacity, a single word has prevailed: for righteousness' sake. Because of this word, murderers endure persecution and are not martyrs; adulterers endure and are not martyrs. You now show your martyrs: you boast that they suffer, I inquire why they suffer. You praise the punishment, I examine the cause. The cause, I say, I examine, I seek the cause. Tell me why he suffers whom you proclaim suffers. For righteousness? Prove this: for this is the cause of martyrs. It is not the punishment that crowns martyrs, but the cause.

True doctrine is recommended in Psalm 42, 1.

O enemy and cunning deceiver, against your false martyrs the true martyrs cried out in the psalm: Judge me, O God, and distinguish my cause from an ungodly nation. Judge me, he said, and distinguish my cause. See, beloved, how much he omitted: he wished his cause to be distinguished. For the cause is distinguished. The true martyr did not say: "Distinguish my fasts," for they also fast; he did not say: "Distinguish my works which I do around the poor," for they also do these; he did not say: "Distinguish my baptism," for they also have the same; he did not say: "Distinguish my creed," for they also confess the same; in all things he found himself similar, he prayed only that his cause be distinguished. Distinguish my cause. I fast, and he fasts. But why me, why him? I for Christ. "But I also," he says, "for Christ." Indeed, for Christ? If for Christ, surely also for the words of Christ; if against the words of Christ, assuredly against Christ. "And what," he says, "of Christ, against which I suffer?" Do you thus rage in false suffering, that your heart has fallen away from true preaching? Look to the very common Lord, whom you confess with me, and yet do not believe. In the Gospels, Christ and the Church, his bride, are shown together.

See if Christ did not want to show both Himself and His Church, so that those invited to the wedding and clothed in the wedding garment would not err in either the groom or the bride. How did the groom show himself? It was necessary for Christ to suffer and rise on the third day. I recognize the groom: this is what the prophets said, this is what those servants who were sent before to invite to the wedding said. It was necessary for Christ to suffer and rise on the third day. He showed Himself to them in this way, demonstrating to the doubters what was fulfilled in Him according to the prophets. What about the bride? Did He remain silent? Immediately, He showed her as well. For He saw that she, consequently, was also desired. It was necessary, He said, for Christ to suffer and rise from the dead on the third day. Behold, I see the groom, I recognize him. What about the bride? And repentance and remission of sins should be preached in His name to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. Recognize this Church expressed from the mouth of Christ, foretold by the proclamation of the prophets; if you are a martyr, hold this, in this and for this shed your blood, give what was granted to you beforehand. Listen to the apostle John: Therefore, he says, Christ laid down His life for us, and we ought to lay down our lives for the brothers. Awake: for the brothers, not against the brothers. What benefit is there if you confess the groom, if you honor the household head, and his spouse, I do not say neglect, but pursue with false accusations? You, man, having a wife whom you did not redeem with your own blood, nevertheless love her so that if anyone served you, watched over your house daily, prostrated at your feet, praised you in all ways, never and nowhere kept silent about your praises, but said one crime about your wife, all that he had served would be in vain. The confessions of true and false martyrs are compared.

Therefore, let the confessions of true and false martyrs be brought forward and compared. Let us place before our eyes what we witnessed yesterday. For we saw a most delightful spectacle: a martyr struggling against a wicked persecutor, never yielding in true faith in any punishment, Vincent triumphing everywhere. We saw, we participated. That reading spoke with our heart: we were delighted. That serpent, jealous of the martyrs, that viper which Vincent was wary of in its flattery, since it could not accuse that suffering, incited a rebellion among us. Let those who offered their tongues to its service recognize this and grieve. For what did those voices mean: "Say the Mass," "say the Mass, say the Mass," except to prevent that martyr from being praised a little longer? Therefore, let the confessions of true and false martyrs be compared. You say you are a martyr because you resist authority. What authority commands you? Behold, I hear what was commanded of true martyrs, and let me hear what is commanded of you. I see how gloriously they refused because I see what they refused; show me what you refuse: let me compare your voices, let me see what to imitate, what to follow. "Offer incense to the gods." "I refuse." We heard the glorious voice of the true martyr, let us also hear from the other side: "Reconcile with your brother." O abominable voice, and one not only worthy of condemnation by the supreme God but also by human authorities! "Reconcile with your brother." "I refuse." Certainly, you suffer against Christ. The sower of discord, the devil.

Open the Gospel, read: If you offer your gift at the altar and there remember that your brother has something against you, leave your gift there and go first to be reconciled to your brother, and then come and offer your gift. If, he says, you remember that your brother has something against you. What does it mean "has something against you"? You have offended him, you have acted unjustly against him. Go be reconciled to your brother: from the reconciled I receive the gift. Why do you offer a gift at the altar of God when in your heart is the seat of the devil? Who sowed discord there? Who planted it? Who ultimately inhabits it? Is it not he who is always the sower of discords, the author of dissensions, the origin of quarrels? If Christ said this about two people, concerning this he injected so much care, so much fear, he demands concord so, as if saying: "You offer one thing, I indicate another. I accept what you offered, if you bring what I indicated," if this in two people, how much more in two peoples? If having such a cause against one person is dangerous and destructive, how much more against the world, how much more against the entire bride of Christ, spread among all nations, beginning from Jerusalem?

Donatus's followers denounced Caecilianus to the emperor. Do you perhaps have a case against me? For the Lord says this: If you remember that your brother has something against you. You will then say to me: "Your brother, he says, has something against you, I have something against you, for you have nothing against me." Let us then inquire: if it is found in me, I will correct it; if it is found in you, you correct it. Explain to me the case you have against me, I will quickly state the one I have against you. I have this against you, which my Lord has against you. You speak accusations against His bride, and His bride is the world in His holy and faithful ones, against whom you bring charges. Have you known anything, or have you judged? In what tribunal did you sit, when the world stood before you to be heard? You do not know your neighbor’s case: certainly, how did you judge the world’s case? I read the records, I show who the traitors were, I read that those who accused Caecilian, the innocent one, confessed their own crimes, I read that your elders first brought the case of Caecilian, bishop of this city, to Emperor Constantine in the public archives: nevertheless, I do not impute to you the crimes of your elders. All acts are in my favor, and I do not charge you with others’ crimes. But you produce nothing to at least convict my elders, and accuse me who was born much later. "If then," he says, "you do not impute to me the deeds of my elders, why do you impute to me your deeds?" What are my deeds? "Because you are not with me." And what harm to you because I am not with you? Did I not say that I have a case against you, which my Lord has against you? Listen to Him speaking: He who is not with me is against me.

Conclusion of the sermon.

Therefore, beloved, as much as we could, and even beyond what perhaps we could, compelled by your eagerness to recall yesterday's sorrow, we have been more talkative than perhaps the weakness of standing, either ours or yours, required. But this I especially admonish and to this I rather conclude the speech, that, since I mentioned the Lord's saying not to be heedlessly heard: If you offer your gift at the altar, first go and be reconciled to your brother, let our hearts be reconciled to one another. First and foremost, do not think that either yesterday or at any time your bishop is angry with you out of hatred but out of love: what is due to you for Christ is never removed from his heart. Let yesterday's clouds clear up; not only the charity, which never departed, but also the former joy should be restored, so that we may be equally concerned, as we have exhorted you in Christ, to serve the weak for usefulness, not for harmful will. For, beloved, because we must serve the weak, when he perhaps asks for food or when he refuses food, that he be forced to take it with annoyance and anxiety or some importunity lest he die, because thus it is served to the weak, therefore it is not given to him, even if he asks for poison. Do not, therefore, become accustomed to the great evil of disobedience. Nor should anyone again say: "What then? Did we ask for poison because we wanted to move the pulpit from place to place?" Disobedience is poison, it first kills a man. Surely, brothers, do we blame this because you asked? Truly we speak to your charity because even if you had asked for a somewhat longer time, still asking you could not displease us, as you did displeasing in being angry and saying: "Let the masses be held." This is what we wish you to grieve. When you ask, if it seems fitting, it is granted to you; if it does not seem fitting, turn from the request to obedience; however, if you wish to break out into anger, into reproach, into lashing out at those who serve you in Christ with such great anxiety, now this is poison, if not death itself. Do not, brothers, we beg you, we beseech you; distinguish the church of God from theaters. Here all those things which are done wrongly in theaters are usually punished, usually healed, usually led to confession and penance, not introduced here. May God avert rising up, roaring, dominating here both from your hearts and from our grief, and may we always rejoice in your obedience.

Sermons - Sermon 36

SERMO 36

OF THAT WHICH IS WRITTEN IN THE PROVERBS "There are those who pretend to be rich though they have nothing." And there are those who humble themselves while being rich. The redemption of a man's soul is his wealth.

"But the poor man does not endure threats" Which riches are to be considered of great value. The Holy Scripture, which has just been read in your hearing, admonished us, or rather through it the Lord who commands us to speak to you, to inquire with you and to discuss what it is and what it means that has been read: There are those who pretend to be rich, having nothing, and there are those who humble themselves, though they are rich. For it should not be thought, nor at all believed, that sacred Scripture has taken care to admonish us about those riches with which the proud are inflated, I speak of these visible and earthly ones, so that we either consider them of great importance, or fear not having them. "For what does it profit a man," says someone, "who affects to appear rich, when he has nothing?" Scripture has marked and rebuked this man. But neither is he much to be desired or imitated and held in high esteem, whom it seems to have placed in praise, if he understood temporal and earthly riches. And there are, it says, those who humble themselves while they are rich. He rightly displeases us, who, having nothing, pretends to be rich. What, does he please us, who, although he is rich, humbles himself? Perhaps he pleases because he humbles himself, yet he does not please because he is rich.

Let us then also take this. It is neither unbecoming, nor dishonorable, nor useless, that the holy Scriptures wished to commend humble rich men to us. For nothing is as greatly to be feared in riches as pride. Finally, the apostle Paul admonishes Timothy thus: "Command," he says, "those who are rich in this world not to be haughty." For he did not dread riches, but the disease of riches. But the disease of riches is great pride. For it is a grand spirit that is not tempted by this disease among riches, a spirit greater than its riches, conquering not by desiring but by despising. Therefore, a rich man is great who does not think himself great because he is rich. But he who thinks himself great because of this is proud and needy. In the flesh he boasts, in the heart he begs; he is inflated, not full. If you see two bags, one full and the other inflated, they seem the same in size, but not in fullness. If you consider this, you are deceived; if you weigh, you will find out. He who is full is difficult to move; he who is inflated is quickly carried away.

Christ assumed poverty, did not despise wealth. So then, he says, command the rich of this world. He did not add: of this world, unless because there are rich and not of this world. Who are rich not of this world? Whose prince and head is he of whom it is said: He became poor for our sake, though he was rich. But if he alone, what profit is there? See what follows: That by his poverty you might be enriched. I think that the poverty of Christ did not bring us money but righteousness. But from where was his poverty? Because he became mortal. Therefore, true riches are immortality. For there is true abundance, where there is no need. Because therefore we could not become immortal unless Christ had become mortal for us, for this reason he became poor, though he was rich. And he did not say: He became poor, though he had been rich, but: He became poor, while he was rich. He assumed poverty and did not lose riches. Rich inside, poor outside. God hidden in riches, appearing as man in poverty. See his riches: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. He was in the beginning with God. All things were made through him. What is richer than he through whom all things were made? One can have gold and be rich, one cannot create. Therefore, since these riches of his were commended, see his poverty: And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us. By this poverty of his we are enriched, because in his blood which flowed from his flesh, which the Word became flesh and dwelt among us, the sack of our sins was torn apart. Through that blood we cast off the rags of iniquity, that we might be clothed in the robe of immortality.

All good faithful ones are wealthy.

All good faithful are therefore rich. Let no one consider themselves lowly, poor in cell, rich in conscience. Indeed, he who is rich in conscience sleeps more securely on the ground than he who is rich in gold and purple. There, no malignant care awakens him, with a heart pricked by guilt. Preserve the riches in your heart, which the poverty of your Lord granted you. Indeed, keep Him as your guard himself. That which He gave should not perish from your heart, let Him who gave it preserve it. All are therefore good and faithful rich, but not rich in this world. Indeed, not even they perceive their own riches; they will perceive them later. The root lives, but in winter time even the green tree is similar to the withered one. For in wintertime both the tree that withers and the tree that thrives are both naked of the honor of leaves, both lacking the dignity of fruits. Summer will come and will distinguish the trees. The living root produces leaves, it is filled with fruits; the withered one, empty, remains barren in summer as in winter. Thus, for the former, a barn is prepared; for the latter, an axe is applied, so that, upon being cut down, it is cast into the fire. So our summer is Christ’s coming. Our winter is Christ’s hiddenness; our summer is Christ’s revelation. Indeed, to good and faithful trees the Apostle gives this address: For you have died, and your life is hidden with Christ in God. Certainly dead, but dead in appearance, living in the root. However, consider the coming summer time, how he follows and says: When Christ, your life, appears, then you also will appear with Him in glory. These are rich, but not of this world. In uncertain riches let us not trust.

Nevertheless, the rich of the world are not despised. He, who became poor for our sake though he was rich, also gained them through his poverty. For if he had despised them and did not wish to count them among his own, the Apostle would not have instructed Timothy, as I was saying, to give this command: "Command those who are rich in this present world." Among those who are rich in faith, there are some who are rich in this world. Command them, because they too have become members of that poor one. Command them about what they should fear from their riches: "Not to be arrogant nor to put their hope in uncertain wealth." For the rich man becomes arrogant because he hopes in uncertain wealth. If he wisely considered the uncertainty of wealth, he would never be arrogant, but always fearful. The richer he is, the more concerned he would become, not just according to this life, but also according to that one. For many in the disturbances of this age have been more secure in their poverty. Many, on account of their riches, have been sought and arrested. Many have mourned having what they could never fully possess. Many have regretted not accepting the counsel of their Lord, who said: "Do not store up for yourselves treasures on earth, where moths and rust destroy, and where thieves break in and steal. But store up for yourselves treasures in heaven." I am not telling you to lose them but to transfer them. Many did not want to do this and later were sorrowful for their disobedience when they not only lost their possessions but also perished because of them. Therefore, command the rich of this world not to be arrogant, and what we have heard in the proverb of Solomon will be fulfilled in them: "There are those who humble themselves though they are rich." This can also apply to these temporal riches. Let the rich be humble. Let them rejoice more in being Christians than being rich. Let them not be puffed up or exalted. Let them attend to their poor brother and not disdain to be called the brother of the poor. However rich he may be, Christ is richer, who wanted to have brothers for whom he shed his blood.

Let us lay up a good foundation for ourselves.

However, so that the rich might not say they have nothing to do with their riches, he advised Timothy to guide them also with counsel, not only to restrain them with a precept. When he said: "Do not hope in the uncertainty of riches," lest they think they have lost hope, he added: "But in the living God, who provides us with all things abundantly to enjoy, temporal things for use, eternal things for enjoyment." But what should the rich do with their riches? "Let them be rich," he said, "in good works, ready to distribute." This is how wealth should benefit; let there be no difficulty in giving. For the poor wish to give, but are unable. The rich wish to give, and can. Let them easily distribute, share, treasure for themselves a good foundation for the future, so that they may lay hold on true life. For this life is false. Deceived by the falsehood of this life, the man in purple and fine linen despised the poor ulcerated man lying at his door. But he, licked by dogs, gathered an eternal treasure for himself in the bosom of Abraham, and if not with abundant means, yet with pious and the best of intentions. However, the rich man, who seemed great to himself in purple and fine linen, died and was buried. And what did he find? Eternal thirst, unceasing flames. Fire followed his purple and fine linen. His tunic burned, which he could not strip off. Instead of feasts, dryness, and the desire for a drop from the finger of the poor man, just as he had desired crumbs from the rich man's table. But that poverty passed away, while this punishment remains. Let the rich of this world take heed of this and not think proudly. Let them easily distribute, share. Let them treasure for themselves a good foundation for the future, where are true riches, but not of this world, so that they may lay hold on true life. The poor and the rich, how they are distinguished.

Therefore, perhaps the Holy Scripture reminded us of this when it said: There are those who pretend to be rich, having nothing, because of proud beggars. For if a rich man who is proud can scarcely be tolerated, who can bear a poor man who is proud? Those who humble themselves, though they are rich, are therefore better. Nevertheless, the Scripture bears witness that it speaks of other riches. For it added subsequently: The redemption of a man's soul is his wealth; but the poor does not endure threats. We must understand that the poor from another poverty and the rich from other riches are being referred to. For they are deeply rich, rich in heart, full of strength, wealthy in piety, abundant in charity, they are rich within themselves, they are inwardly rich. Yet there are those who pretend to be rich, when they are poor. They seem just to themselves, when they are unjust. We must understand those riches since the Scripture has disclosed what it meant: The redemption of a man's soul is his wealth. "Understand," it says, "what riches I recommend to you. Because I said: There are those who pretend to be rich, having nothing; and there are those who humble themselves, being rich, you were thinking of those temporal and earthly and visible riches. But I am not speaking of those, but I admonish you as to which I speak: The redemption of a man's soul is his wealth." Therefore those who do not have the redemption of the soul, because they are unjust and want to seem just, because they are hypocrites, they are those about whom it said: There are those who pretend to be rich, having nothing. They want to seem just, but in the chamber of conscience they do not have the gold of justice. And they are full, the more humble the richer, of whom it was said: Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.

Gold shines, but faith shines more.

Why then do you seek riches which flatter human and fleshly eyes? Gold shines, but faith shines even more. Choose what you should have in your heart. Be full within, where God sees your riches, man does not see. Yet because man does not see, you should not therefore despise what you have within. Do you want to see, because faith shines more than gold even in the eyes of the wicked? How does even the greedy master praise the faithful servant? He says nothing is more valuable than him, indeed he testifies he has no price at all. "I have a servant," he says, "he has no price." What are you expecting from him? Perhaps he dances well, or is the best cook. No. Pay attention to the inner praise: "Nothing," he says, "is more faithful." The faithful servant pleases you, and do you not want to be a faithful servant to God? Consider that you have a servant; consider also that you have a Lord. You could buy a servant, but not create one. Your Lord created you with his word and redeemed you with his blood. If you have become cheap to yourself, recall the price. If you have also forgotten this, read the Gospel, your instrument. You love faith in your servant, and does not your Lord seek it in his? Repay what you demand. What you rejoice to have repaid by an inferior, repay to the superior. You love a servant who keeps your gold faithfully. Do not despise the Lord who mercifully keeps your heart. Therefore, all have eyes to praise faith, but only when they demand it to be repaid to them. For when it is demanded of them, they close their eyes, they do not want to see how beautiful it is. Or perhaps out of foolish madness they do not want to repay lest they lose it, just as anyone fears returning money: once he has returned it, he will not have it. Faith is not repaid in this way. It is both repaid and kept. Amazing to say! Indeed, if it is not repaid, it is not kept.

"The soul must be redeemed by alms." The redemption of a man's soul is his wealth. Deservedly, God insulted that very vain rich man, to admonish us not to imitate such things, as a fruitful region succeeding abundance disturbed the man more than scarcity. For he thought to himself, saying: What shall I do where I may gather my fruits? And when he had been troubled, constrained, at last he thought he had found counsel. But a vain counsel. For this counsel was found not by prudence but by greed. I will destroy, he said, the old smaller barns, and I will build larger new ones, and fill them, and I will say to my soul: Soul, you have many goods, be satisfied, take pleasure. He said to him: Fool, in what you seemed wise to yourself, fool, what did you say? "I say to my soul: You have many goods, be satisfied." This night your soul will be taken away. Whose will these things be that you have prepared? For what does it profit a man if he gains the whole world, but suffers the loss of his soul? Therefore, the redemption of a man's soul is his wealth. That foolish and vain man did not have these riches. For he did not redeem his soul with alms, he stored up perishable fruits. I say, he stored up perishable fruits that would perish, giving nothing to the Lord to whom he was to depart. How will he stand in that judgment, when he begins to hear: I was hungry, and you did not give me to eat? For he desired to satisfy his own soul with superfluous and excessive feasts, arrogantly ignoring the so many empty stomachs of the poor. He did not know that the stomachs of the poor were safer storehouses for his goods. For what he stored in those barns - perhaps was even taken by thieves. But if he stored it in the stomachs of the poor, indeed it would be digested on earth, but it would be more securely kept in heaven. Therefore, the redemption of a man's soul is his wealth.

Threats must be resisted. And what follows? A poor man, however, does not endure threats. A poor man, that is, one void of righteousness, not having within the fullness of the spirit, spiritual ornaments, spiritual furnishings, and all that which is not seen by the eyes but is valued more by the mind. Not having these within, he does not endure threats. When it has been said to him by some powerful person: "Say this word against my enemy, give false testimony, so that I may oppress and subdue him whom I wish." Perhaps he tries: "I do not do it, I do not bring sin upon myself." He only refuses until the rich person begins to threaten. But because he is poor, he does not endure threats. What does it mean, he is poor? He does not have the inner riches which the martyrs had, who despised all the threats of the world for the truth and faith in Christ. Did they lose anything from their heart compared to what they gained in heaven? Therefore, the poor man does not endure threats. He cannot say to the rich man compelling him to wrong someone or give false testimony: "I do not do it." He does not have within him what to respond, he is not solidified and full with an inner treasury; there is no one to say because he does not have what to say, there is no one to say: "What can you do to me who threatens? At most, you will take away what I have. You take what I will leave behind; you take that which, if you do not take it while I live, I may perhaps lose. From the inner vault, I lose nothing. When you threaten to take what I have inside, do you truly wish to take what I have within? But you can take it and have it. If you take away my faith by threatening, both you and I lose. Therefore, I do not do what you urge, I do not care what you threaten. But you can, by raging, even expel me from my country. You have harmed me, if you drive me to where I cannot find my God. Perhaps you will even be able to kill. When the carnal house collapses, the unharmed inhabitant departs, and I will depart secure to Him to whom I keep faith, and I will no longer fear you. See then what you threaten, that I may say false testimony. You threaten death, but of the body. I fear more He who said: A lying mouth kills the soul." Filled and rich with these inner riches, he responds to the one threatening, or better. However, the poor man does not endure threats. Of the Pharisee and the Publican.

Let us therefore be rich and fear to be poor. Let us seek to fill our hearts with riches from Him who is truly rich. And if perhaps each of you enters into his heart and does not find these riches there, let him knock at the door of the rich one, let him become a pious beggar at the door of that rich man, so that he may be filled with riches by his gift. And truly, my brothers, we ought to confess our poverty and need to the Lord our God. This was confessed by the publican, who did not even dare to lift his eyes to heaven. For he, being a sinner, had no substance with which to lift his eyes. He observed his emptiness but recognized the fullness of the Lord. He knew he had come to the fountain thirsty. He showed his dry throat, piously knocked to be filled: "Lord," he said, beating his breast and lowering his eyes to the ground, "be merciful to me, a sinner." I say that he was already rich in some part, thinking and asking these things. For if he was still entirely poor, from where would he bring forth the gems of this confession? Yet he descended from the temple more abundant and fuller, justified. But the Pharisee went up to pray and asked for nothing. "They went up," it says, "to the temple to pray." This man prays, that one does not pray. But that one, where was he from? There are those who think themselves rich, having nothing. "Lord," he said, "I thank you that I am not like other men, unjust, thieves, adulterers, or even like this publican. I fast twice in the week, I give tithes of all I possess." He boasted of himself, but this is inflation, not fullness. He thought himself rich, having nothing. The other recognized himself poor, already having something. To say nothing else, he had the piety of confession itself. And both descended. But the publican, it says, was justified more than the Pharisee. For everyone who exalts himself shall be humbled, and he who humbles himself shall be exalted.

Sermons - Sermon 360

SERMO 360 To the Vigils of Maximian, about a Certain Donatist who Returned to the Church The prayer of one who has been converted. He is compared with Paul.

Thanks be to God, brothers, congratulate your brother who was dead and has come back to life, was lost and is found. Thanks to the patience and mercy of our Lord God: patience, because He bore with the one who delayed; mercy, because He deigned to accept the one returning. This is the vineyard where I did not work, and I expended my strength on another's fields. O vineyard beloved by my Lord, not only did my labor bring you no profit, but I even served your enemy against you. I worked with great sweat when I did not gather for you. Thanks to your planter, with whom no recompense is lost, even for the workers called at the last hour. I arrive late, but I do not despair of the denarius. I who was once a blasphemer, a persecutor, and injurious against you: but I obtained mercy because I did it ignorantly. For I held the words of my parents, not the Patriarchs, not the Prophets, not the Apostles; but the parents of my flesh. I did not acquiesce to flesh and blood; but I acquiesced, having been overcome by the truth, and rested, having been returned to unity. Did I not read the same Scriptures that I now read? But even that Teacher of the Gentiles, a chosen vessel, from Saul to Paul, from haughty to the least, from robber to shepherd, from wolf to lamb, was a Hebrew from Hebrews, a Pharisee according to the law, learned in the law at the feet of Gamaliel: and yet Christ, whom he read about in the Prophets, he neither knew sitting in heaven, nor allowed to be worshipped on earth. Ignorant of the faith of His passion and resurrection, he sang with his mouth, and, raving in error, ravaged. According to the Prophets, in which he was born and grew up, Christ, already risen from the dead, was sitting in heaven; and he was still blinded by the lies of his parents, because his disciples had stolen him from the tomb. So I too was surrounded by the voices of the Sacred Scriptures concerning the Catholic Church spread throughout the world; and I was made deaf by the false accusations of traitors instigated by my parents. I do not compare myself to Paul in merits, but in sins. Even if I did not deserve to be so good, yet I was not so bad without the remedy of correction. Neither did he recognize the bridegroom in the Books he read, nor did I recognize the bride. He who revealed to him what is written about the glorification of Christ: "Be exalted above the heavens, O God;" He revealed to me what follows about the outpouring of the Church: "Let your glory be over all the earth." Both testimonies are open to those who see, but closed to the blind. The baptism of Christ opened his eyes; the peace of Christ opened mine. The washing of holy water made him new; but charity covered the multitude of my sins.

Sermons - Sermon 360A

SERMON 360/A

"Salvator noster, fratres carissimi, non verbo tantum, sed etiam opere nos aedificare voluit, ut non praedicendo solum, sed et operando doceret quid facere deberemus. Nam fere dum aliquid operatur et miraculum facit, quidquid geritur actio, praedicatur mysterium. Ante diem passionis suae discipulorum pedes lavit: qui idcirco non duo, vel tres, sed duodecim discipulorum pedes lavit, et singillatim unusquisque in memoriam faciens istud exemplum, vobis, dilectissimi, debitores caritatis Iesu exhibere debet quod didicit."

Treatise of Saint Augustine the Bishop on the testimonies of the Scriptures against the Donatists and against the Pagans The fathers heard, we see. The promises of God created faith in our parents, the gifts of God have fulfilled faith in us. In them, it was promised to us, in us, it has been rendered to them as well. There are two senses of the body through which faith enters: hearing and sight. They heard, we see. But even in us, they see, and we heard in them. That is why God also speaks to the Church herself: Listen, daughter, and see. Listen, he says, and see, and forget your people and your father's house, for the king desires your beauty. What king? He follows and says: Because he is your God. What then is this and how great is the dignity of the woman to whom the king is God and whom God is the husband? Listen, he says, and see, and forget your people and your father's house. He fixes something in memory, so that he may remove something from memory. For she was under another father and among another people. Indeed, the Lord was saying to the unbelieving and to those still in darkness: You are from your father the devil. The people of the godless are indeed the sons of the devil, and the crowd, belonging as members to the lost head. She is commanded to forget this father's house and this people by hearing and seeing, so that she may also respond to her faithful from another psalm: As we have heard, so we have seen.

God forgave us our sins, granted us all good things.

It was heard from our fathers: In your seed all nations will be blessed. This seems to us, because it is fulfilled in us. It was heard: There will be the root of Jesse, and one who will rise to rule the nations, in him the nations will hope. From Jesse, David; from David, the offspring of Christ. The root of Jesse, Christ reigns among the nations, in him the nations hope. The provincials of the king and the servants of the dominant one and coheirs of the brother hope in their king. This, just as it is woven into the variety of the queen's garment, so it is clear to our eyes and faith. For it was said of this queen: The queen stood at your right hand in gold embroidered clothing, surrounded by variety. What is the variety of the garment? The multitude of languages. The Latins speak differently, the Greeks differently, the Punics differently, the Hebrews differently, the Syrians differently, the Indians differently, the Cappadocians differently, the Egyptians differently. Variety in color, unity in the fabric. For many colors, enclosed in the unity of the fabric, depict, not tear apart. Variety of languages, but not a variety of doctrines. Variety of speech, but unity of charity. And how does the Apostle say: This is our boast, the testimony of our conscience, where the eyes of God are, where his sight is, to whom we have pleased, except that, when we were sinners, by forgiving us what displeased us, he granted us what pleases us? Because this has been done so that we could, by his gift, not by our merit, say with the Apostle and from the Apostle: This is our boast, the testimony of our conscience, therefore it is said of that queen: All the beauty of the king's daughter is within. She is adorned externally with a garment to the face, formed internally by faith for salvation. From where, if not by hearing and seeing, to whom it was said: Hear, daughter, and see, so that she might respond, as we have said, and harmonize and in some way resonate with all her members: As we have heard, so we have seen?

"Gideon sought the present thing, he foretold the future." The world was bare of Christians and dry with the lack of grace. One people worshiping God, born from the seed of Abraham by flesh and a series of generations; in which people there were many saints, prophets, righteous ones, patriarchs, our fathers; there was grace in worshiping God, and merit for deserving, and hope for receiving reward. And this one nation was among all nations, with the whole world lacking this grace. We have come to our times: that one nation remained dry from this grace, and the world was irrigated. How this was prefigured among our fathers, take it. After I state the resolution, I propose that the resolved matter be resolved as it usually is. Therefore, now after this preface, when I speak, excuse me. It is written in the book of Judges that Gideon, going to battle and fighting for the homeland against foreigners, asked for a sign. It seemed he was asking for a sign for the present matter, but that sign did not fit the present matter. He asked for the present thing, he foretold the future. What indeed did he ask? Take it. He asked God to place a fleece of wool on the threshing floor, in which fleece he wanted to find rain, so that the fleece would be wet, and the whole threshing floor dry. He asked for another sign and said to God: “Lord, do not let your anger be kindled against me. I will ask yet another thing and try again on the fleece. This I ask, that the whole threshing floor be wet, and the fleece dry.” He received; the next day he found the fleece dry, the threshing floor irrigated. The threshing floor is the world, in the fleece the Jewish people. The whole world was empty of this grace, therefore the threshing floor was dry. This grace was among the Jewish people, but in the fleece. What is in the fleece? Not in the manifestation of faith, but in the cloud of secrecy, it was in secret, not in the open. It was not to be shown to appear, but to be expressed to flow. The fleece was pressed, and the basin filled with water. Not in vain the basin. Indeed, the basin is called from washing feet, that is from washing feet, as pelvis, which washes feet. Therefore, even the expression of the fleece flowed Christ. For Christ, commending humility, washed the disciples' feet in the basin. Now therefore the fleece is dry; Christ was pressed out of it. Truly he was pressed out because he was cast out through pressures. For the tenants said, “This is the heir; come, let us kill him, and the inheritance will be ours.” And they killed him, it said, and cast him out of the city. The pressed fleece, they sent out the water. Yet from that pressed humility, he took those he wanted, and he went to the nations, to fulfill another sign: with the dry fleece, he irrigated the threshing floor. And this faith is not in the cloud of the fleece, but in open manifestation: it is preached to all, known by all. It has the sacrament in secrecy, the word in public. As these were said, so they are; as promised, so they are given. As we heard, so we saw, for it was said to us in unity: Hear, daughter, and see. The book of Scriptures reveals the crime of heretics. But indeed, heretics, separated from the structure of this world, neither want to hear what they read nor see what they know. We have been invited to the wedding; we have praised the bride and commended her from divine testimonies. We commended ourselves to ourselves, or rather the Lord commends us to all. For He has promised, He has exhibited. Let them open their eyes and see what they have heard. You hear with me, see with me. Or rather, what is worse, you both hear with me and see with me and are not with me. Therefore, brothers, what is there to wonder at if pagans do not want to hold what they scorn, when Donatists do not want to believe what they read? A pagan wanted to throw my codex into the flame, he detested the very Scripture, he persecuted the very Scripture. Why wonder if he grieves to see what he wanted to burn? But you, heretic, you claim to have saved this codex from the flame. Recognize it when it is brought forth, hear it when it is read. Surely it is in this codex: In your seed all nations will be blessed. Surely you did not want these letters to burn. Why then have you burned with the desire for dissension over them? Why, I ask, unless because you lie, unless because you say you saved what you handed over? Let us not inquire into ancient things that were done: let the codex itself be brought forth, let it, saved from the flame, judge between us. Let us see who belongs to the eternal flame, who handed over the codex to the temporal flame. Both he who dared to burn and he who dared to hand over wanted it to perish, but it did not perish. It was saved, it is safe: it is brought forth. You ask by whom it was handed over, you ask by whom it was saved? Let it be brought forth, let it be read. Whoever believed did not hand over. Do you want to see how dear that Scripture is to me? It is read, and I follow. Do you want to see how hateful it is to you? It is read, and you resist, you oppose, you alienate the hearing. Since you have no ears in your heart, you have closed your heart; the Scripture knocks which you say you saved, and you do not open. If you truly saved that codex, your chest is better than your heart. But far be it that I should believe you saved what I see you refuse when read. You want to contrive my crime from the saved codex, I show your crime from the read codex. If the pagan does not believe, he hates what I read; you, who do not want to seem to have been led to impiety by the pagan, have surpassed the pagan in impiety. He hates and rejects, you hold and deny. You say I burned the testament, while you see me holding the inheritance; you say you saved the testament, while you have made yourself disinherited. I bring forth the testament, I read the testament: you do not want me to bring it forth, you bring it forth. Let it be brought forth by you, what is read for me. You bring it forth, you hold it, you open it, see, read. The hands of the holder, the eyes of the seer, the tongue of the utterer fight for me. From you, against you, I conduct my cause. He who recites the codex in your assembly, he is your reader, my witness. But these hear and see, those neither hear nor see. Let us pass from these and leave them, if it is possible without the zeal of animosity, to think about their own impiety. The faith of Christians has rejecters, but it has God as its approver. The remaining pagans, however, remain thus so that our faith still has rejectors, so that God may have a tester. Let them be addressed and know that what is happening was written before it occurred and was foretold that it would happen; let them not be dismayed that what they do not want is happening, but let them believe that what God promised would happen is happening. They would want their will to be done, but God chose to fulfill His promise. Let them not be angry. He is better, I think, He is more powerful. No matter how proud they are, God is greater. Therefore, limited by the constraints of time, we have excerpted a few things from the Holy Scriptures on how the prophets foretold in certain times that idols would be removed, and this has been fulfilled, just as they foretold that the Church would be spread throughout the whole world, and so it has been fulfilled. Therefore, let us not be too angry with the pagans for not wanting to believe about the idols, since heretics do not want to believe about the Church. Both see, yet both do not believe; however, some neglect, others read. It is not as much a crime for the pagans not to believe what they neglect as it is for the heretics not to believe what they read. But even the pagans, by the very fact that what was foretold is fulfilled, ought to recognize the foreteller and the fulfiller. Therefore, receive what has been said about this matter. The worship of idols is condemned in the Book of Wisdom. In the book of Wisdom, it is written thus: Therefore there shall be a regard even for the idols of the nations. For God did not look for a long time on the idols that were worshipped for a long time, and on the sacrifices made to idols. He who always sees, at some point condescends to look. He saw with patience, he regarded with vengeance. He says there shall be a regard for the idols of the nations, because they were made from God's creations to incite hatred. For they provoke God with the creations of God. How do they provoke God with the creations? For a craftsman made a god, but God made wood. A goldsmith made an idol, but God made gold. Why do you make out of his creation something that he would detest; out of God's creation, you shape something that he would detest? You should shape well what he would love. You want to put your own image in wood, take the image of God into yourself. Why do you erase inwardly and carve outwardly? He says, the creations of God were made to provoke hatred, and as trials for the souls of men, and as a snare for the feet of the foolish. For the beginning of fornication is the seeking of idols. If a woman having many husbands is praised, let also the soul worshipping many gods be praised. If a woman is an adulteress through true husbands, how much more is a soul through false gods? For the beginning of fornication is the seeking of idols, and their invention is the corruption of life. Behold how he declared, let us see what he predicted: For they were neither from the beginning nor will they be forever. The prophet Zechariah foretells the end of idols. The holy prophet Zacharias also says: On that day. See what he says, and recognize the day. Indeed, he sets the day for the time, as the Apostle says: Behold, now is the acceptable time, behold, now is the day of salvation. What then does Zacharias say? On that day there shall be an open place for the house of David. This is what I was saying is enclosed in the fleece, open on the threshing floor. There shall be an open place, there shall be a manifest Church. What does it mean there shall be an open place? A city set on a hill cannot be hidden. There shall be an open place for the house of David. And on that day, the Lord will exterminate the names of idols from the earth, and there will be no mention of them at all. Let the pagans hear these things. Let them see what is happening as foretold. If they love divination, let them acknowledge divinity. Why do they go to a deluded astrologer to consult about one man - who says more false than true things by chance, who makes an occasion in falsehoods? Why then does one want to hear an astrologer speak about one man? Let him hear God predicting about humankind. From the earth, the names of idols are erased, the names of Christians are written in heaven. The same is announced in the book of Isaiah.

Isaiah also says: "The arrogance of man shall be humbled and brought down, and the Lord alone shall be exalted on that day, and all the works of their hands shall be hidden, taking refuge in caves and in the fissures of rocks. See if it is not, see if it does not come to pass, see if Scripture lies. As if we sought idols and did not wish to make the worshippers of idols worshippers of God, they hide in the earth, they hide in caves, they hide in the clefts of the rock. Wherever they hide, they shall be found out when their hearts are overturned. How many perverse people have hidden their false gods, and having been corrected have brought them to light. For indeed, we see two kinds of people in the Church, or rather, one kind inside the Church and the other kind close to the Church, those who hide and those who reject and bring forth. God predicted both kinds. You have heard about the kind who hide; listen about the kind who reveal and cast away, in the same chapter, in a single testimony of Isaiah: ‘The Lord alone shall be exalted on that day, and all the works of human hands shall be hidden, in caves and in the clefts of rocks and in the fissures of the earth, from the face of the fear of the Lord, from the splendor of His majesty, when He rises to shake the earth.' What does it mean to shake the earth? To terrify earthly men. Therefore, we say that anyone bold who fears has been shattered by fear. No wonder the earth fears, for heaven thunders. The thunders are in the prophetic Scriptures. Therefore, they will hide. What about the others? They too will hide from fear, but from a better fear. Those hide from fear of the laws, these from fear of the divine law, reveal and cast away. Both have fear, but some progress from fear, others fallback. We heard about those who hide; let us hear about the other kind. For on that day, a man will throw away his silver and gold abominations which they made. It is a wonder to see gold and silver being cast away: piety casts out what impiety loves. They throw away their silver and gold abominations they made to worship. They hide vain and harmful things, those cast them away: the abomination, however, is removed. Let it be removed, and oh that it might be removed from the hearts of earthly men as it is from the places of the earth. By the hand of his servants, God removes these things from places, by his own hand from hearts.

Jeremiah said that the utility of idols was nonexistent.

Let us also listen to Jeremiah. Although I mentioned this yesterday as well, it is so sweet that it should be repeated today—indeed, we cannot grow weary of it—: "Lord, my strength and my help and my refuge in the day of troubles." No longer is my refuge stone and wood, no longer gold and silver, the works of human hands. No, he says, I do not flee to those who cannot flee: for they have feet but do not walk. "Lord, my refuge in the day of troubles," in the day of temptations, in the day of this labor, in the day of frail life, in the day of sighs from the longing for the heavenly Jerusalem. For as long as we are not where we desire to be, it is the day of troubles. We rejoice in hope, not yet in reality. Thus it is also in another psalm: "You have led me for You have become my hope." Our hope is on the way, when he leads. And how is he a refuge? "A tower of strength from the face of the enemy." What then about idols, what was to become of them? "To you," he says, "nations will come from the ends of the earth and say: 'How our fathers possessed lies!' " How great the admiration of the sons for the errors of their fathers, as if they were saying: "How wise were our elders, how did they worship these things, how did they bow their integrity before wood and stones, how did they forsake Him who made them to possess the vain things they made, how our fathers possessed lies?" What are those lies? Idols, and there is no utility in them. For to the avaricious, some lies may sometimes seem useful; and the merchant swears to sell more dearly, swears by profit to acquire, lies by profit to acquire, lies by the idol to perish. There is no utility in those lies if we consider true and healthy benefit. But even that is something that seems to men, that is presumed by the unskilled. Here, what do you expend to hire a craftsman, you expend to feed, you expend to decorate, you expend to place, you expend to sacrifice? You expend everything to gain nothing, lose much to perish.

Let the idols perish from the earth and from under the sky.

Also Jeremiah: Do not walk according to the ways of the nations. Hey, my brothers, let none of you defend idols. Every defender of idols is close to the worshiper. Do not walk according to the ways of the nations, and do not be afraid of the signs of heaven, because their appearance terrifies them. Because it is lawful for the nations to fear the signs of heaven, that is, to choose the days when you set out, when a wife is married, when weapons are set up and when another is cut down, because their laws are vain. And now listen about idols: Wood is cut down from the forest, the work of a craftsman and the casting of silver. He seems to say a familiar thing, but he is too deaf to whom he speaks. He wakes him up as if from sleep, to see with his heart what he sees with his eyes. The work of a craftsman and the casting, adorned with silver and gold, they have set them with hammers and nails, and they will not move. For by themselves they will not move: those mobile in body carry the immobile. Those mobile in body would not carry the immobile if they were immobile in heart. They have set them with hammers and nails, and they will not move. Silver is engraved. And it is added: They shall not walk. Gold from Tharsis and Ophaz will come - precious and great gold -, and the hands of craftsmen, all the work of craftsmen, they shall dress them in blue and purple. Lifted up they shall be taken, because they do not enter. Do not fear them, because they do not harm, and there is no good in them. Thus you shall say to them. What shall we say to them? Gods who did not make heaven and earth shall perish from the earth and from under heaven. What does it mean that you thus say to them? You are Christians, you hear the prophet: thus say to them, do not be silent. Gods who did not make heaven and earth shall perish from the earth and from under this heaven. Will it be from heaven, where they never were? Let those worshipers also heed these predictions, let them heed and believe. Let these perish from under heaven, let those be written in heaven. Certainly thus you say to them; do not be seduced by those who say: “Neither worship nor mock.” Rather, receive, Christian, the prophet; rather hear God through the prophet: You shall say to them: Gods who did not make heaven and earth shall perish from the earth and from under this heaven. And as if he said: “Whom shall I worship when they have perished?” God made heaven and earth by His power. Why do you want to worship the earth, when you are made of earth and on the earth and in the earth? You have God founding the earth. He has not departed from you by works, nor is He alien from heart. He made what you tread, He made what you look up to, He is the one in whom you believe. God made the earth by His power, He founded the world by His wisdom. Surely the one who said: God made the earth by His power, He founded the world by His wisdom — did not speak of Christ? Listen to the Apostle Paul: Christ, the power of God and the wisdom of God. He stretched the heaven and the multitude of waters in the heaven and brought out the clouds from the end of the earth, made lightning into rain, and brought out light from his treasuries. Every man has become foolish by his knowledge, and every craftsman is confounded by his carved images, because they have cast lies, there is no spirit in them. They are vain, a work of illusions, in the time of their visitation they shall perish. False gods perish, but you have not remained without the true God if you are the younger son of Jacob, to whom the elder serves. False gods perish, hold on to the true one. For listen to what follows: Jacob's portion is not like that. These vain, these false gods shall perish, but the portion of Jacob does not perish. The portion of Jacob: the inheritance of Jacob. The inheritance of Jacob that God gives, or is it God Himself? I dare to say it is God Himself. I take a psalm, the sentence is clear: Lord, you are my portion and inheritance. Jacob's portion is not like that, because He who formed all things, He is his inheritance, the Lord is His name.

We fear a jealous God, let us preserve the chastity of the mind.

We have heard the predictions of what will happen to idols; let us hear the commandments concerning what should be done against idols. No one should say: "Surely idols are destined to perish: let Him destroy them. Why do you break them?" But God wished to destroy them through those whom He did not wish to perish. And He will bring you, it is said, to the Amorite, the Hittite, the Perizzite, the Canaanite, the Girgashite, the Hivite, and the Jebusite, and He will cast them out. You shall not worship their gods nor serve them. You shall not act according to their works, but you shall surely overthrow and break their idols. And again: Behold, I will drive out before you the Amorite, the Canaanite, the Hittite, the Perizzite, the Hivite, the Girgashite, and the Jebusite. Do not make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land where you are going, lest they become a snare among you. You shall tear down their altars and break their sacred pillars and cut down their groves. For you shall not worship other gods. For the Lord is a jealous God; His name is Jealous. Hear, brothers, you shudder because it is said: The Lord is jealous. O soul of the Church, O that bride, you fear a jealous husband: keep chastity.

Sermons - Sermon 360B

SERMON 360/B Sermon of Saint Augustine when the pagans were entering The word of God promises and threatens. The word of God does not cease to exhort us and console us with faithful promises and salutary threats. For it is not beneficial for us neither not to love nor not to fear. Just as God, the promiser, is to be loved, so also the intimidator is to be feared. In neither does He deceive the listener, in neither does He trick the believer. Let no one say in his heart: "He promises true things, but threatens false things." Both are true. Love and fear. Without any doubt, the one who has already come will come. He came to teach you patience, he will come to crown patience. He will surely crown what he taught when he came. And what he threatened when he came, he will inflict when he comes. These, however, are two: the promise of God, eternal life; the threat of God, eternal punishment. If you do not yet know how to love what He promises, begin to fear what He threatens. For it is also written: The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. But the apostle John says: There is no fear in love, but perfect love casts out fear. Therefore, when we heard: The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, let us begin to fear. But because fear has torment in the heart, you will not be long in torment if charity has increased and been perfected in you. Yet it cannot even begin in you unless you have offered your heart with fear to plant it. And as charity grows, fear diminishes. And if it diminishes as charity grows, it is consumed when charity is perfected.

What God promises surpasses human thoughts. For what God promises, beloved, exceeds not only our words but also the thoughts of all men. For it is thus also commended: What eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor has it entered into the heart of man, what God has prepared for those who love Him. If there were some color like the light known to bodily eyes, it would not be said: Eye has not seen; if there were some sweet sound with which human ears are accustomed to be delighted, like organs and some kinds of musical instruments, it would not be said: Ear has not heard. And because men cannot conceive of good things with their minds except those they have perceived with their bodily senses, it is added: Nor has entered into the heart of man. For you, man, cannot think of good, except such as you have been accustomed to see or hear or touch with some such sense. Whatever has not entered through the sense of your body cannot be conceived by your mind. To behold the inaccessible light, an eye of the soul is needed.

Therefore, when it is said to us that we will be in paradise, we imagine a pleasant garden. And if we conceive of it as larger than what we are used to seeing, we nonetheless amplify that same kind of things. If, for example, we are accustomed to seeing small trees, we imagine them large; and if we are used to certain fruits or other produce, we think of larger ones. If we are used to seeing meadows of a certain expanse, we imagine them as endlessly immense: yet we still amplify what we know by sight. Again, when we hear: God dwells in unapproachable light, we measure that light by the light we know with our physical eyes and amplify it immensely, yet in doing so we augment what we know, even though that light is of a completely different kind; for that light is not of the eyes but of the mind. And just as the eye of the flesh must be cleansed to bear the physical light which either shines from the sky above or glitters from nocturnal lights, and if the eyes are sore or afflicted by some internal or external influence, they will find painful the same light by which they are accustomed to be nurtured, and will be tortured by what they were accustomed to enjoy, so too the eye of the heart must be cleansed to see that intelligible and immortal light, not the eye of the flesh. For just as the eye of the flesh is disturbed by a discharge which causes inflammation, so the eye of the heart is disturbed by iniquity. It too has its weakness and impurity, not coming from dust, but from sin. Therefore, just as the eye of the body must be cleansed to see its physical light, so must the interior eye be cleansed to see that light which no eye has seen, nor ear heard, nor has entered into the heart of man. A man perceiving carnally cannot grasp the light of God.

Why does it not ascend into the heart of man? For it is perceived by the heart, when it is perceived. But why does it not ascend into the heart of man? Because it pertains to man. What does this mean, because it pertains to man? Those who know the Scriptures understand and anticipate what I am going to say. Our Scripture sometimes calls those who still think carnally "men" with a certain specific meaning. For they are men, that is, they are Adam. But you know that Adam sinned, and hence anyone who is born mortally draws the origin of carnal desire from there. Thus, he bears with him a wound of the eye, and as long as he is a man, as long as there is that which is wounded and disturbed by the first sin. Wherefore someone cries out in the Psalms and says, sighing and groaning to God, "The light of my eyes is not with me." As long as a man is thus feeling carnally, he cannot conceive nor comprehend with the mind that light, and therefore it is said, "What the eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor has it ascended into the heart of man." What is it of man? Of one feeling carnally. What is it of man? Still bearing Adam. Wherefore, what would He have those do who were men, for whom it was a reproach that they were men? For He says to them: "For when one of you says, I am of Paul, and another, I am of Apollos, and another, I am of Cephas." For they had divided among themselves the ministers of God and made factions for themselves in the Church of Christ, with the beginning of the evil of schisms, which were later confirmed by the error of men. These things were said by those feeling carnally and not placing their hope in God, but in man, not singing with their heart what we sang a little before: "In You our fathers have hoped." As the present life flees, let us strive to grasp the future.

Therefore, the Apostle, reproaching those who speak thus, says: "Are you not men, and walk according to human ways?" Again, in the psalm, it is said in the person of God speaking: "I said: You are gods, and all of you are children of the Most High. But you shall die like men and fall like one of the princes." As you know, it speaks of the devil as one of the ancient princes. For although he was an angel, he fell due to pride and became the devil. Thus, he who fell then envied the one standing, and now he envies the one returning.

Men have become mortal for this reason: that they might be taught humility through the greater affliction of punishment, and being as it were scourged by their mortality and thinking that they cannot live here long, and even if they could live longer, they would still not live forever, and this life would eventually come to an end, they might humble themselves to God and strive to grasp the future as the present flees. For that which flees or slips away cannot be held. Or can any of us now, whether we stand and speak or you stand and listen, hold onto our ages, so that children do not grow or the young do not age? You see that since the time we have been speaking, time has passed. And since the time we have been speaking, with the length of time, we tend towards old age; already during the time we have spoken, we have aged somewhat.

These changes of ours can be understood by reason, but they cannot be seen with the eyes. For neither can your hair be seen as it grows, yet if it did not grow continuously, you would not seek a barber after a few days: for what the barber will cut tomorrow does not grow under a single night. Just as hair grows even now but cannot be seen, so too does our age grow old even now, but it cannot be grasped by the eyes.

Short life, certain death: therefore, let us humble ourselves before God.

Therefore, people love the present life, which they cannot hold as it flees, and it slips away as these thrive and those diminish. How much better it is to hold something firm, where these finite things will come to an end. Moreover, since human life is short, it is also uncertain. For if old age were certain for every person, one had to think that life is short, even if it were allowed for all to reach its limits. For what is long that ends? Therefore, it follows that mortality is accompanied by death, and, as it were, walks with you on the path, when it will overtake you, you certainly do not know. Therefore, when life itself is short, and death uncertain for every age, people ought to humble themselves before God, supplicate the Creator, confess, groan in their sins, disclose their illness to the doctor, so that they might be healed from within and change that eye, by which that light can be seen, which is not seen for as long as the inner eye of man belongs to man. Therefore, let them awaken when they hear from God: "I said: You are gods and all of you are sons of the Most High." What is "I said"? I call you to this, I want to make this happen. Hear the Gospel: "He gave them the power to become children of God." Therefore, when I say: You are gods and all of you are sons of the Most High, but you will die like men, and not even mortality itself helps you to correct yourselves, but as if you were immortal, you fall like one of the princes, that is, you are as proud as the angel who dared to be proud. But if pride cast down the angel, what will it do to man? Therefore, you will be gods. And if you do not worship false gods, you will be gods. And how will you be gods? By Him making it who made both men. For He who made us men, wishes to make gods, not to be worshipped instead of Him, but in whom He Himself is worshipped. When the heart is cleansed by faith, we are deemed worthy to see God.

Therefore, as I began to say, beloved, there is an inner eye which sins, carnal desires and earthly longings wound and disturb, such that the very man sinning has heard: "You are dust, and to dust you shall return." If therefore the proud and unjust deserve to hear, "You are dust, and to dust you shall return," why should not the humble and pious hear: "You are heaven, and to heaven you shall go"? For it is by humility and piety that one becomes the seat of God. Now, once one has become the seat of God, is it not heaven? It is said in the Scriptures: "Heaven is my throne, and the earth is my footstool." Therefore, if heaven is the seat of God, be heaven so that you may bear God. When you begin to bear God, you will be heaven. In order to fully bear Him, He Himself will cleanse you when He begins to dwell in you, until He leads that eye of the heart to such purity that it can see His face, in whom having not seen, you believed. Therefore, believe before you see, so that with your heart cleansed by faith you may also merit to see what you believed. For light is promised to you, which no eye has seen, because it is not a color, nor has ear heard, because it is not a sound, nor has it entered into the heart of man, because man who is properly called man, carnal, weak, and animalistic, cannot conceive anything except what he has received through the senses of the body. That light is not such. Let the soul not dare to form any image of God, as if in a fantasy: he who wishes to find Him must first learn not to find Him. The work of God cannot be God.

What is it that I said: first learn not to find? So that when by chance you think of God and what you see begins to occur to you, the beauty of the earth occurs, you reject it from your mind; the appearance of waters occurs, the tranquility of the serene air occurs, you reject also this thought; say to yourself: "This is not my God, it is the work of my God." This, I say, is not my God, it is the work of my God: you are considering what was made. O my soul, seek Him who made it. But when your thought comes even to the heavenly bodies, let not the heavenly light allure you, not even the highest one. For the highest heavenly light is in the sun. The chief brightness of the heavenly bodies is found in the sun, which suffices for the day. Nor should you think of your God as anything like this, nor should you amplify this brightness into something greater and wander off into the spaces of your imagination; nor is God what in your mind is thus figured as what usually shines to the eyes of the body. This is not God. In the mind of man is the image of God.

Come to the soul itself, for it too is not seen. The soul is not seen, and it is a great force of incorporeal nature. The soul is not a body; it is something invisible and something great: it cannot be seen, but marvel at its works which you do not see. What delights you in human affairs? Look around at the order of things, the beauty of cultivated fields, of cleared forests, of planted fruit trees, and those things we see and love in the fields—the order itself of the republic, the grandeur of buildings, the variety of arts, the abundance of languages, the depth of memory, the fertility of eloquence. All these are works of the soul. How many works of the soul do you see, yet do not see the soul itself! When such a nature begins to occur to you, is this your God whom you were seeking? It is not seen, it is already something incorporeal, something spiritual, something great, which enlivens even mortal limbs, which somehow restrains and holds together the flowing decays of the body. But this also can be done by the soul of a beast. Indeed, the soul of a beast is also something great, it too is something invisible. But transcend to the soul of man: consider where man was made in the image of God. Indeed, man was not made in the image of God in his body, but in his mind, in that aspect by which he governs all these things, in that aspect by which he surpasses the beasts. For how many beasts surpass us in the firmness of body and sharpness of carnal senses! In speed and strength, in many physical endowments, we are surpassed by beasts. How are we better than beasts, except that we understand, except that we have reason by which we can also tame a wild animal? By a wild animal, we cannot be tamed. Just as man is suitable to tame a beast, so no one is suitable to tame a man but God. When something of this kind occurs, so that you consider the human mind freed from corporeal bonds, do not dare to think such a thing is God. Indeed, it already seems to you in proximity, but by a long interval. In proximity, so that nothing earthly is closer to God, but still between your mind and God who created your mind, there is a great difference. Not some nature or place intervenes, but it is far away by dissimilarity, since this was made, and He made it, and no way can what is made be compared to the maker. However, some image of your God is in your mind.

"Consider what God is not, so that you may find what He is."

Transcend, if you can, even your own mind, if, however, through understanding you have reached your mind. Observe, brethren, what I am saying. For perhaps even when you think about your mind, you think of something corporeal due to the habit of carnal senses, so that your mind appears to you as either air or fire or this light which you see. You think something similar when you think about your mind. Do not think of something like that. As soon as that which you understand occurs to you, say to yourself, "What is it that I understand?" Indeed, unless there were some light there, you would not understand. For you perceive a certain light inwardly, just as you perceive a certain light outwardly. For the light of your body is your eye. But in the absence of light, what good is it that your eye is open? You indeed have intact light, but you are aided by another light in order to see. Thus, also when you understand, I do not know what kind of thing that can enjoy the internal light, which is not what you see with your eyes. Think of something like this with regard to your mind, if you can; but if you cannot, what is that beyond your mind which terrifies your mind, which urges your mind, which shapes your mind? [What is that beyond] You cannot think worthily of the mind: how can you then think worthily of Him whom you will see with a pure mind? Therefore, if you cannot even do this, [neither] earth, nor heaven, nor air, nor this stellar light, nor the power and nature of the rational soul itself, as marvelous as it is, can rightly be called your God, but everywhere you should say: "This is not my God." [11] Therefore, you cannot know what He is, unless you first learn what He is not. Therefore, first think about what He is not, so that you may find what He is.

"It is better to have ignorance that does not err, than knowledge which is so called and is not." This is what I said a little earlier: Learn to not know God, so that you may deserve to find Him. For you learn to not know Him with a better ignorance than with false knowledge. For better is ignorance that does not err, than knowledge that is called and is not. For you will have said to me: "I know God." I ask what God is. You begin to want to explain, and first by that very thing you do not know what you think you can explain which you cannot conceive. Therefore, you will tell me your thoughts, those thoughts you will tell which have risen in your heart. But see, because you are a man, and what you will tell me has risen in the heart of a man. But He who promises Himself for the delight of His lovers does not at all promise what eye has seen nor what ear has heard nor what has ascended in the heart of man. But how do they love whom they do not see, except because they believe before they see? Therefore, what does He promise to His lovers? What eye has not seen nor ear heard. Perhaps it can be conceived? Do not deceive yourself: it has not ascended in the heart of man.

Since it is changeable, the mind of man is not God.

What then? How do you prepare yourself? Speak. "I want to see my God." Tell him: "I want to see," tell him who said: Ask and you shall receive, knock and it shall be opened to you. Knock at the door placed before you, knock vehemently. He who shuts does not expel: he wants to exercise the knocker. Therefore knock, knock, not with a bodily hand, but with the affection of the heart. Tell the Lord your God what you sing in the psalms: My heart said to you: I sought your face, your face I will seek. Also say what is said in another psalm: One thing I asked from the Lord, this I will seek, that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, that I may contemplate the delight of the Lord. Desire to contemplate and tell him: "I want to see you." But how will I see? If with fleshly eyes, then you are a bodily light. Now my heart already renounces to me, for you are not, my God, a bodily light. What then are you? I have transcended all these things; I have now reached my mind, but it itself is not my God. And yet the nature of the mind transcends all bodily things whether earthly or heavenly, but it is not yet my God. For my mind is mutable: but my God is immutable. I seek something immutable when I seek my God. But how do I recognize the mind as mutable? Now it remembers, now it forgets, now it is wise, now it is foolish, now it wills, now it does not will, now it gets angry, now it is tranquil. I seek something immutable when I seek my God. Thus my God has spoken to me in the Scriptures, so that I may somehow think what I believe, not yet have what I see. I seek something that always remains immutable. The inner eye must be cleansed so that it can see God. But how will I see? The Gospel will answer you: Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. Therefore, if the pure in heart are blessed because they shall see God, and we carry impure hearts burdened by sin, what shall we do? How shall we cleanse our inner eye, that we may see the face of our God? How shall we cleanse it? You also have this in Scripture: Purifying their hearts by faith. Let us then hold these two testimonies: one from the Gospel, the other from the Acts of the Apostles. What is from the Gospel? Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God. You looked at yourself, you found some impurity of your heart; desiring to see God and hearing that He is not seen except by pure hearts, inflamed with the desire of seeing, you surely seek to purify your heart. How then will you cleanse it? Consider what is said in the Acts: Purifying their hearts by faith. Hold these two: one in promise, the other in action. What in promise? Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God. What in action? Purifying their hearts by faith. Therefore, believe before you see, that you may rejoice when you see.

We are sick: let us allow ourselves to be treated by the doctor. Do not let a vain thought ascend to your heart: "What is it that Christians say: Believe, believe?". A doctor says this, who knows what is happening in your eye. Now also resist the doctor's hands and say: "I do not believe unless you show me." The doctor will respond to you: "There is nothing to show you; I want to heal in you that by which you may be able to see what you now wish me to show." Imagine a man blinded by some darkness, and perhaps from the beginning of his life, so that he already does not know what those who see even see, the doctor to say: "There is something I am to show you; behold you know with a certain sense that you are blind, but others see: because you need a guide which they do not need, certainly there is a difference between them and you. Therefore, they see something that you do not see; if you were to see, you would greatly rejoice." He arouses in him a desire to see what he does not know, wanting to heal him to be able to see what he does not see. But if he is so absurd and averted from all reason of truth that he says to the doctor: "You will not heal me unless you show me what I will see," what do you think the doctor will respond? "It is necessary that you be healed to see, not to see to be healed. You are perverse, you are preposterous. First let that be done which you do not want, so that you may be able to reach what you want. If you had eyes with which I could show you what I say, there would be no need for you to be healed." Perhaps he will respond: "And what am I to do? Heal as you wish." And the doctor: "I will apply certain sharper ointments, which will cleanse away the darkness, from which acrimony you will feel some pain. But it is necessary that you bear the salutary pain patiently and not anxiously and impatiently drive away my hands. For I know what I am doing with your eyes, that they may be eyes which now are not even to be called eyes. I know what I am doing, and therefore I tell you beforehand that you will suffer some discomfort with the fruit of illumination." Perhaps frightened lest he be bitten by those medicines which the doctor is about to apply, he returns again to that worn out and excluded notion: "Am I to endure such great pains which you are about to apply to me? Unless I first see what you are to show, I will not bear it." On the contrary, he: "You cannot. This is what I seek; I ask you: heal. You will see, the darkness will be expelled, that light will shine upon you which you hear those seeing name and do not see. For you hear: light, color, brightness; you hear these names. These names are of certain things, the things themselves you do not see. Those who see are happier than you. Therefore bear some pain with the compensation of great joys." If he consents, he will be healed and will see. If he does not consent, wishing to see first before being healed so that there may be a means by which he may see, most absurd and an enemy of his health, he will abandon the doctor. To see God, a clean heart is needed.

Pay attention now, the healing physician, our Lord Jesus Christ, has come to us. He found the blindness of our heart and promised the light which no eye has seen nor ear heard nor has entered into the heart of man. This the angels see, they rejoice in it. For just as healthy men see what the blind man does not see, so the angels see what man does not see. Why does man not see? Because he still wants to be a man. Therefore, let the man himself begin to be healed, so that from being a man he may become one among the sons of God, because He gave them the power to become sons of God. This means: He gave them the power to be healed, so that the darkness of the heart may be wiped away, because blessed are the pure in heart because they shall see God. And hear, for it is also in the Gospel, what is said elsewhere: purifying their hearts by faith. When the Lord said: He gave them the power to become sons of God, He immediately added: to those who believe in His name. Therefore, if He gave the power to those who believe to become sons of God — the sons of God will be able to see what has not entered into the heart of man — He purifies their hearts by faith so they can be pure in heart, because they shall see God.

Under the hands of the heavenly physician, one must persist.

Blessed are you, therefore, brothers, who believe; pray for the unbelievers, that they also may be deemed worthy to see. Blessed are you who believe: you do not see, but you believe; you are not yet healed, but are still being cured. Your salvation is in hope, not yet in reality. Persevere under the hands of the doctor, endure his prescriptions as though they were bitter medicines, abstain from the pernicious pleasures of the world: do not let illicit desires of the gentiles lead you, nor theatrical trifles, nor the luxury of drunkenness, nor the poison of illicit curiosity. Abstain from all these things. But you are accustomed to rejoice in these things, and when you begin to abstain from them, the longing for broken habits will grieve you. But these are the bitter medicines by which the eyes are healed. Accept the prescriptions of the doctor. Whatever he imposes on you to bear, he himself first endured. In him, indeed, there was nothing to be cured, for nothing was sick, but in the duty of healing, he endured what he imposed on the sick. He gave a certain bitter cup to the one swollen and puffed up with pride; he, coming with humility, suffered all humiliations from prideful men.

"The humility of Christ is the remedy for pride." The humility of Christ is the remedy for your pride. Do not ridicule what cures you. Be willing to be humble, for the sake of Him who became humble for you. For He who knows well from where you ail and how you are to be healed has judged that you should be healed by this medicine. Good doctors investigate in all parts of the body the cause of enduring all that is most difficult to bear. And so many unskilled, treating incidental causes and not treating the original cause, seem to provide a temporary cure; but, with the source of the diseases remaining, what persists in the origin again flows into the streams of calamity. Therefore, listen to why man is ailing, why he has not only sick eyes but no healthy limbs. Hear from where he is ailing, take from the Scriptures where the art of the physician is written. For the one who reads a disease to you from Hippocrates is not more certain than the one who shows you from divine Scripture from where you suffer inwardly. Therefore, listen to what Scripture says: The beginning of all sin is pride; and you still rush for your bodily health, you are lazy for your soul. If a speck falls into your eye, it is not put off to remove it. The iniquity presses on the eye of your heart, you do not run to the physician. Yet, when you could not run to the physician, the physician came to you, and, which is more serious, you scoff at the fact that He came to you, you hold His mercy in contempt. He came, wants to help, knows what to administer. Therefore God came humble, lest He not be imitated by man. For how could you imitate the lofty? Without imitating Him, how would you be healed? Therefore He came humble, because He knew what cup to give you. Indeed somewhat bitter, but healing. But you still mock the one who brings the cup and say to yourself: "What kind of God will I have? One who is born, suffers, smeared with spit, crowned with thorns, suspended on the cross?" O wretched soul! You see the humility of the physician, you do not see the swelling of your pride. From this, the humble one displeases you, what displeases you is from your pride, what comes displeases your disease, the medicine given to you by the physician.

"Christ made remedies from his very death."

If you still mock, you are insane. The insane often attack their doctors, and the compassionate not only do not become angry with those attacking them but also seek the well-being of the attackers. They sometimes prevail to the extent that they can kill the doctor. But the doctor vehemently avoids being killed by the insane because he cannot rise again and heal the insane. However, our doctor neither feared being killed by the insane, and from his very death he prepared remedies for the insane. For he died and rose again. And see that the true doctor does not become angry with the insane assaulting him, but rather pities them and wishes to heal the raging ones from what he suffers. Listen to the doctor hanging on the cross; surrounded by a crowd of raging madmen, he says: Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing. And his voice was not in vain. For after he rose again and was glorified in the eyes of his disciples, so much so that he showed them the scars of the same resurrected flesh, not only presenting himself to be seen but also to be touched, he ascended into heaven, sent the Holy Spirit: miracles began to occur in the name of the one killed, in the name of the crucified, and those who killed him were more deeply pierced than when they saw him hanging on the cross. For they thought that such things happened in the name of the one who was believed to have been killed by their hands. They felt the living one, whom they had mocked as he was dying. They were pierced in heart, as it is written in the Acts of the Apostles; many of the Jews who crucified the Lord sought counsel from the apostles; they also received counsel, because that hanging one did not say in vain: Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing. The apostle said to them: Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, and your sins will be forgiven you. It happened: they were baptized and believed in the one whom they crucified. This is what I said, brothers, for he made remedies even from his very death for the insane.

Believing in Christ, we become His body. From there, they went to the nations. The apostles were sent to the nations: they found the entire world given to idols. The disciples of the physician himself, in whom the physician himself presided, because they had become heaven and carried God, began to preach Him who was crucified and died for our sins and rose for our justification. With such signs and miracles testifying, the world began to be filled. And at first, so that it might be filled, the disciples of the physician were killed, just as the physician himself had been killed. But why would they fear to be killed, when they saw even his flesh rise in their head? What would souls, never to die, fear, considering they had already risen in the body in the Lord? However, He made all believers a body as the head, so that He would be their head, and all who believe in Him would be joined as members. From the beginning of the world to the end, it has been believed and

