received a commandment like Adam, which he would be rewarded for keeping and punished for breaking, acting either way by his own free-will, than to be forced by inevitable necessity to admit darkness into his light in spite of himself? Surely it would have been better to have given a precept to human nature, not knowing that it would become sinful, than to have been driven by necessity to sin contrary to his own divine nature. Think for a moment, and say how darkness could be conquered by one who was himself conquered by necessity. Conquered already by this greater enemy, he fought under his conqueror's orders against a less formidable opponent. Would it not have been better not to know where Adam had hid himself, than to have been himself destitute of any means of escape, first from a hard and hateful necessity, and then from a dissimilar and hostile race? Would it not have been better to grudge eternal life to human nature, than to consign to misery the divine nature; to desire the blood and fat of sacrifices, than to be himself slaughtered in so many forms, on account of his mixture with the blood and fat of every victim; to be disturbed by jealousy at these sacrifices being offered to other gods as well as to himself, than to be himself offered on all altars to all devils, as mixed up not only with all fruits, but also with all animals? Would it not have been much better to be affected even with human anger, so as to be enraged against both his friends and his enemies for their sins, than to be himself influenced by fear as well as by anger wherever these passions exist, or than to share in all the sin that is committed, and in all punishment that is suffered? For this is the doom of that part of your god which is in confinement everywhere, condemned to this by himself, not as guilty, but in order to conquer his dreaded enemy. Doomed himself to such a fatal necessity, the part of himself which he has given over to condemnation might pardon him, if he were as humble as he is miserable. But how can you pretend to find fault with God for His anger against both friends and enemies when they sin, when the god of your fancies first under compulsion compels his own members to go to be devoured by sin, and then condemns them to remain in darkness? Though he does this, you say that it will not be in anger. But will he not be ashamed to punish, or to appear to punish, those from whom he should ask pardon in words such as these: "Forgive me, I beseech you. You are my members; could I treat you thus, except from necessity? You know yourselves, that you were sent here because a formidable enemy had arisen; and now you must remain here to prevent his rising again"? Again, is it not better to slay thousands of men for trifling faults, or for nothing, than to cast into the abyss of sin, and to condemn to the punishment of eternal imprisonment, God's own members, his substance-in fact, God himself? It cannot properly be said of the real substance of God that it has the choice of sinning or not sinning, for God's substance is absolutely unchangeable. God cannot sin, as He cannot deny Himself Man, on the contrary, can sin and deny God, or he can choose not to do so. But suppose the members of your god had, like a rational human soul, the choice of sinning or not sinning; they might perhaps be justly punished for heinous offenses by confinement in the mass of darkness. But you cannot attribute to these parts a liberty which you deny to God himself. For if God had not given them up to sin, he would have been forced to sin himself, by the prevalence of the race of darkness. But if there was no danger of being thus forced, it was a sin to send these parts to a place where they incurred this danger. To do so, indeed, from free choice is a crime deserving the torment which your god unnaturally inflicts upon his own parts, more than the conduct of these parts in going by his command to a place where they lost the power of living in righteousness. But if God himself was in danger of being forced to sin by invasion and capture, unless he had secured himself first by the misconduct and then by the punishment of his own parts, there can have been no free-will either in your god or in his parts. Let him not set himself up as judge, but confess himself a criminal. For though he was forced against his own will, he professes to pass a righteous sentence in condemning those whom he knows to have suffered evil rather than done it; making this profession that he may not be thought of as having been conquered; as if it could do a beggar any good to be called prosperous and happy. Surely it would have been better for your god to have spared neither righteous nor wicked in indiscriminate punishment (which is Faustus' last charge against our God), than to have been so cruel to his own members,-first giving them up to incurable contamination, and then, as if that was not enough, accusing them falsely of misconduct. Faustus declares that they justly suffer this severe and eternal punishment, because they allowed themselves to be led astray from their original brightness, and became hostile to sacred light. But the reason of this, as Faustus says, was that they were so greedily devoured in the first assault of the princes of darkness, that they were unable to recover themselves, or to separate themselves from the hostile principle. These souls, therefore, did no evil themselves, but in all this were innocent sufferers. The real agent was he who sent them away from himself into this wretchedness. They suffered more from their father than from their enemy. Their father sent them into all this misery; while their enemy desired them as something good, wishing not to hurt them, but to enjoy them. The one injured them knowingly, the other in ignorance. This god was so weak and helpless that he could not otherwise secure himself first against an enemy threatening attack, and then against the same enemy in confinement. Let him, then, not condemn those parts whose obedience defended him, and whose death secures his safety. If he could not avoid the conflict, why slander his defenders? When these parts allowed themselves to be led astray from their original brightness, and became hostile to sacred light, this must have been from the force of the enemy; and if they were forced against their will, they are innocent; while, if they could have resisted had they chosen, there is no need of the origin of evil in an imaginary evil nature, since it is to be found in free-will. Their not resisting, when they could have done so, is plainly their own fault, and not owing to any force from without. For, supposing them able to do a thing, to do which is right, while not to do it is great and heinous sin, their not doing it is their own choice. So, then, if they choose not to do it, the fault is in their will not in necessity. The origin of sin is in the will; therefore in the will is also the origin of evil, both in the sense of acting against a just precept, and in the sense of suffering under a just sentence. There is thus no reason why, in your search for the origin of evil, you should fall into so great an evil as that of calling a nature so rich in good things the nature of evil, and of attributing the terrible evil of necessity to the nature of perfect good, before any commixture with evil. The cause of this erroneous belief is your pride, which you need not have unless you choose; but in your wish to defend at all hazards the error into which you have fallen, you take away the origin of evil from freewill, and place it in a fabulous nature of evil. And thus you come at last to say, that the souls which are to be doomed to eternal confinement in the mass of darkness became enemies to sacred light not from choice, but by necessity; and to make your god a judge with whom it is of no use to prove, in behalf of your clients. that they were under compulsion, and a king who will make no allowance for your brethren, his own sons and members, whose hostility against you and against himself you ascribe not to choice, but to necessity. What shocking cruelty! unless you proceed in the next place to defend your god, as also acting not from choice, but by necessity. So, if there could be found another judge free from necessity, who could decide the question on the principles of equity, he would sentence your god to be bound to this mass, not by being fastened on the outside, but by being shut up inside along with the formidable enemy. The first in the guilt of necessity ought to be first in the sentence of condemnation. Would it not be much better. then, in comparison with such a god as tills, to choose the god whom we indeed do not worship, but whom you think or pretend to think we worship? Though he spares not his servants, whether righteous or sinful, making no proper separation, and not distinguishing between punishment and discipline, is he not better than the god who spares not his own members though innocent, if necessity is no crime, or guilty from their obedience to him, if necessity itself is criminal; so that they are condemned eternally by him, along with whom they should have been released, if any liberty was recovered by the victory, while he should have bean condemned along with them if the victory reduced the force of necessity even so far as to give this small amount of force to justice? Thus the god whom you represent us as worshipping, though he is not the one true God whom we really worship, is far better than your god. Neither, indeed, has any existence; but both are the creatures of your imaginations. But, according to your own representations, the one whom you call ours, and find fault with, is better than the one whom you call your own, and whom you worship.49

23. So also the patriarchs and prophets whom you cry out against are not the men whom we honor, but men whose characters are drawn from your fancy, prompted by ill-will. And yet even thus as you paint them, I will not be content with showing them to be superior to your elect, who keep all the precepts of Manichaeus, but will prove their superiority to your god himself. Before proving this, however, I must, with the help of God, defend our holy fathers the patriarchs and prophets against your accusations, by a clear exposition of the truth as opposed to the carnality of your hearts. As for you Manichaeans, it would be enough to say that the faults you impute to our fathers are preferable to what you praise in your own, and to complete your shame by adding that your god can be proved far inferior to our fathers as you describe them. This would be a sufficient reply for you. But as, even apart from your perversities, some minds are of themselves disturbed when comparing the life of the prophets in the Old Testament with that of the apostles in the New,-not discerning between the manner of the time when the promise was under a veil, and that of the time when the promise is revealed,-I must first of all reply to those who either have the boldness to pride themselves as superior in temperance to the prophets, or quote the prophets in defence of their own bad conduct.

24. First of all, then, not only the speech of these men, but their life also, was prophetic; and the whole kingdom of the Hebrews was like a great prophet, corresponding to the greatness of the Person prophesied. So, as regards those Hebrews who were made wise in heart by divine instruction, we may discover a prophecy of the coming of Christ and of the Church, both in what they said and in what they did; and the same is true as regards the divine procedure towards the whole nation as a body. For, as the apostle says, "all these things were our examples."

25. Those who find fault with the prophets, accusing them of adultery for instance, in actions which are above their comprehension, are like those Pagans who profanely charge Christ with folly or madness because He looked for fruit from a tree out of the season;50 or with childishness, because He stooped down and wrote on the ground, and, after answering the people who were questioning Him, began writing again.51 Such critics are incapable of understanding that certain virtues in great minds resemble closely the vices of little minds, not in reality, but in appearance. Such criticism of the great is like that of boys at school, whose learning consists in the important rule, that if the nominative is in the singular, the verb must also be in the singular; and so they find fault with the best Latin author, because he says, Pars in frusta secant.52 He should have written, say they, secat. And again, knowing that religio is spelt with one l, they blame him for writing relligio, when he says, Relligione patrum.53 Hence it may with reason be said, that as the poetical usage of words differs from the solecisms and barbarisms of the unlearned, so, in their own way, the figurative actions of the prophets differ from the impure actions of the vicious. Accordingly, as a boy guilty of a barbarism would be whipped if he pled the usage of Virgil; so any one quoting the example of Abraham begetting a son from Hagar, in defence of his own sinful passion for his wife's handmaid, ought to be corrected not by carting only, but by severe scourging, that he may not suffer the doom of adulterers in eternal punishment. This indeed is a comparison of great and important subjects with trifles; and it is not intended that a peculiar usage in speech should be put on a level with a sacrament, or a solecism with adultery. Still, allowing for the difference in the character of the subjects, what is called learning or ignorance in the proprieties and improprieties of speech, resembles wisdom or the want of it in reference to the grand moral distinction between virtue and vice.54

26. Instead of entering on the distinctions between the praiseworthy and the blameworthy, the criminal and the innocent, the dangerous and the harmless, the guilty and the guiltless, the desirable and the undesirable, which are all illustrations of the distinction between sin and righteousness, we must first consider what sin is, and then examine the actions of the saints as recorded in the holy books, that, if we find these saints described as sinning, we may if possible discover the true reason for keeping these sins in memory by putting them on record. Again, if we find things recorded which, though they are not sins, appear so to the foolish and the malevolent, and in fact do not exhibit any virtues, here also we have to see why these things are put into the Scriptures which we believe to contain wholesome doctrine as a guide in the present life, and a title to the inheritance of the future. As regards the examples of righteousness found among the acts of the saints, the propriety of recording these must be plain even to the ignorant. The question is about those actions the mention of which may seem useless if they are neither righteous nor sinful, or even dangerous if the actions are really sinful, as leading people to imitate them, because they are not condemned in these books, and so may be supposed not to be sinful, or because, though they are condemned, men may copy them from the idea that they must be venial if saints did them.

27. Sin, then, is any transgression in deed, or word, or desire, of the eternal law. And the eternal law is the divine order or will of God, which requires the preservation of natural order, and forbids the breach of it. But what is this natural order in man? Man, we know, consists of soul and body; but so does a beast. Again, it is plain that in the order of nature the soul is superior to the body. Moreover, in the soul of man there is reason, which is not in a beast. Therefore, as the soul is superior to the body, so in the soul itself the reason is superior by the law of nature to the other parts which are found also in beasts; and in reason itself, which is partly contemplation and partly action, contemplation is unquestionably the superior part. The object of contemplation is the image of God, by which we are renewed through faith to sight. Rational action ought therefore to be subject to the control of contemplation, which is exercised through faith while we are absent from the Lord, as it will be hereafter through sight, when we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is.55 Then in a spiritual body we shall by His grace be made equal to angels, when we put on the garment of immortality and incorruption, with which this mortal and corruptible shall be clothed, that death may be swallowed up of victory, when righteousness is perfected through grace. For the holy and lofty angels have also their contemplation and action. They require of themselves the performance of the commands of Him whom they contemplate, whose eternal government they freely because sweetly obey. We, on the other hand, whose body is dead because of sin, till God quicken also our mortal bodies by His Spirit dwelling in us, live righteously in our feeble measure, according to the eternal law in which the law of nature is preserved, when we live by that faith unfeigned which works by love, having in a good conscience a hope of immortality and in-corruption laid up in heaven, and of the perfecting of righteousness to the measure of an inexpressible satisfaction, for which in our pilgrimage we must hunger and thirst, while we walk by faith and not by sight.

28. A man, therefore, who acts in obedience to the faith which obeys God, restrains all mortal affections, and keeps them within the natural limit, regulating his desires so as to put the higher before the lower. If there was no pleasure in what is unlawful, no one would sin. To sin is to indulge this pleasure instead of restraining it. And by unlawful is meant what is forbidden by the law in which the order of nature is preserved. It is a great question whether there is any rational creature for which there is no pleasure in what is unlawful. If there is such a class of creatures, it does not include man, nor that angelic nature which abode not in the truth. These rational creatures were so made, that they had the potentiality of restraining their desires from the unlawful; and in not doing this they sinned. Great, then, is the creature man, for he is restored by this potentiality, by which, if he had so chosen, he would not have fallen. And great is the Lord, and greatly to be praised, who created man. For He created also inferior natures which cannot sin, and superior natures which will not sin. Beasts do not sin, for their nature agrees with the eternal law from being subject to it, without being in possession of it. And again, angels do not sin, because their heavenly nature is so in possession of the eternal law that God is the only object of its desire, and they obey His will without any experience of temptation. But man, whose life on this earth is a trial on account of sin, subdues to himself what he has in common with beasts, and subdues to God what he has in common with angels; till, when righteousness is perfected and immortality attained, he shall be raised from among beasts and ranked with angels.

29. The exercise or indulgence of the bodily appetites is intended to secure the continued existence and the invigoration of the individual or of the species. If the appetites go beyond this, and carry the man, no longer master of himself, beyond the limits of temperance, they become unlawful and shameful lusts, which severe discipline must subdue. But if this unbridled course ends in plunging the man into such a depth of evil habits that he supposes that there will be no punishment of his sinful passions, and so refuses the wholesome discipline of confession and repentance by which he might be rescued; or, from a still worse insensibility, justifies his own indulgences in profane opposition to the eternal law of Providence; and if he dies in this state, that unerring law sentences him now not to correction, but to damnation.

30. Referring, then, to the eternal law which enjoins the preservation of natural order and forbids the breach of it, let us see how our father Abraham sinned, that is, how he broke this law, in the things which Faustus has charged him with as highly criminal. In his irrational craving to have children, says Faustus, and not believing God, who promised that his wife Sara should have a son, he defiled himself with a mistress. But here Faustus, in his irrational desire to find fault, both discloses the impiety of his heresy, and in his error and ignorance praises Abraham's intercourse with the handmaid. For as the eternal law-that is, the will of God the Creator of all-for the preservation of the natural order, permits the indulgence of the bodily appetite under the guidance of reason in sexual intercourse, not for the gratification of passion, but for the continuance of the race through the procreation of children; so, on the contrary, the unrighteous law of the Manichaeans, in order to prevent their god, whom they bewail as confined in all seeds, from suffering still closer confinement in the womb, requires married people not on any account to have children, their great desire being to liberate their god. Instead, therefore, of an irrational craving in Abraham to have children, we find in Manichaeus an irrational fancy against having children. So the one preserved the natural order by seeking in marriage only the production of a child; while the other, influenced by his heretical notions, thought no evil could be greater than the confinement of his god.

31. So, again, when Faustus says that the wife's being privy to her husband's conduct made the matter worse, while he is prompted only by the uncharitable wish to reproach Abraham and his wife, he really, without intending it, speaks in praise of both. For Sara did not connive at any criminal action in her husband for the gratification of his unlawful passions; but from the same natural desire for children that he had, and knowing her own barrenness, she warrantably claimed as her own the fertility of her handmaid; not consenting with sinful desires in her husband, but requesting of him what it was proper in him to grant. Nor was it the request of proud assumption; for every one knows that the duty of a wife is to obey her husband. But in reference to the body, we are told by the apostle that the wife has power over her husband's body, as he has over hers;56 so that, while in all other social matters the wife ought to obey her husband, in this one matter of their bodily connection as man and wife their power over one another is mutual,-the man over the woman, and the woman over the man. So, when Sara could not have children of her own, she wished to have them by her handmaid, and of the same seed from which she herself would have had them, if that had been possible. No woman would do this if her love for her husband were merely an animal passion; she would rather be jealous of a mistress than make her a mother. So here the pious desire for the procreation of children was an indication of the absence of criminal indulgence.

32. Abraham, indeed, cannot be defended, if, as Faustus says, he wished to get children by Hagar, because he had no faith in God, who promised that he should have children by Sara. But this is an entire mistake: this promise had not yet been made. Any one who reads the preceding chapters will find that Abraham had already got the promise of the land with a countless number of inhabitants,57 but that it had not yet been made known to him how the seed spoken of was to be produced, whether by generation from his own body, or from his choice in the adoption of a son, or, in the case of its being from his own body, whether it would be by Sara or another. Whoever examines into this will find that Faustus has made either an imprudent mistake or an impudent misrepresentation. Abraham, then, when he saw that he had no children, though the promise was to his seed, thought first of adoption. This appears from his saying of his slave, when speaking to God, "This is mine heir;" as much as to say, As Thou hast not given me a seed of my own, fulfill Thy promise in this man. For the word seed may be applied to what has not come oat of a man's own body, else the apostle could not call us the seed of Abraham: for we certainly are not his descendants in the flesh; but we are his seed in following his faith, by believing in Christ, whose flesh did spring from the flesh of Abraham. Then Abraham was told by the Lord "This shall not be thine heir; but he that cometh out of thine own bowels shall be thine heir."58 The thought of adoption was thus removed; but it still remained uncertain whether the seed which was to come from himself would be by Sara or another. And this God was pleased to keep concealed, till a figure of the Old Testament had been supplied in the handmaid. We may thus easily understand how Abraham, seeing that his wife was barren, and that she desired to obtain from her husband and her handmaid the offspring which she herself could not produce, acted not in compliance with carnal appetite, but in obedience to conjugal authority, believing that Sara had the sanction of God for her wish; because God had already promised him an heir from his own body, but had not foretold who was to be the mother. Thus, when Faustus shows his own infidelity in accusing Abraham of unbelief, his groundless accusation only proves the madness of the assailant. In other cases, Faustus' infidelity has prevented him from understanding; but here, in his love of slander, he has not even taken time to read.

33. Again, when Faustus accuses a righteous and faithful man of a shameless profanation of his marriage from avarice and greed, by selling his wife Sara at different times to the two kings Abimelech and Pharaoh, telling them that she was his sister, because she was very fair, he does not distinguish justly between right and wrong, but unjustly condemns the whole transaction. Those who think that Abraham sold his wife cannot discern in the light of the eternal law the difference between sin and righteousness; and so they call perseverance obstinacy, and confidence presumption, as in these and similar cases men of wrong judgment are wont to blame what they suppose to be wrong actions. Abraham did not become partner in crime with his wife by selling her to others: but as she gave her handmaid to her husband, not to gratify his passion, but for the sake of offspring, in the authority she had consistently with the order of nature, requiring the performance of a duty, not complying with a sinful desire; so in this case, the husband, in perfect assurance of the chaste attachment of his wife to himself, and knowing her mind to be the abode of modest and virtuous affection, called her his sister, without saying that she was his wife, lest he himself should be killed, and his wife fall into the hands of strangers and evil-doers: for he was assured by his God that He would not allow her to suffer violence or disgrace. Nor was he disappointed in his faith and hope; for Pharaoh, terrified by strange occurrences, and after enduring many evils on account of her, when he was informed by God that Sara was Abraham's wife, restored her with honor uninjured. Abimelech also did the same, after learning the truth in a dream.

34. Some people, not scoffers and evil-speakers like Faustus, but men who pay due honor to the Scriptures, which Faustus finds fault with because he does not understand them, or which he fails to understand because of his fault-finding, in commenting on this act of Abraham, are of opinion that he stumbled from weakness of faith, and denied his wife from fear of death, as Peter denied the Lord. If this is the correct view, we must allow that Abraham sinned; but the sin should not cancel or obliterate all his merits, any more than in the case of the apostle. Besides, to deny his wife is not the same as to deny the Saviour. But when there is another explanation, why not abide by it, instead of giving blame without cause, since there is no proof that Abraham told a lie from fear? He did not deny that Sara was his wife in answer to any question on the subject; but when asked who she was, he said she was his sister, without denying her to be his wife: he concealed part of the truth, but said nothing false.

35. It is waste of time to observe Faustus' remark, that Abraham falsely called Sara his sister; as if Faustus had discovered the family of Sara, though it is not mentioned in Scripture. In a matter which Abraham knew, and we do not, it is surely better to believe the patriarch when he says what he knows, than to believe Manichaeus when he finds fault with what he knows nothing about. Since, then, Abraham lived at that period in human history, when, though marriage had become unlawful between children of the same parents, or of the same father or mother, no law or authority interfered with the custom of marriage between the children of brothers, or any less degree of consanguinity, why should he not have had as wife his sister, that is, a woman descended from his father? For he himself told the king, when he restored Sara, that she was his sister by his father, and not by his mother. And on this occasion he could not have been led to tell a falsehood from fear, for the king knew that she was his wife, and was restoring her with honor, because he had been warned by God. We learn from Scripture that, among the ancients, it was customary to call cousins brothers and sisters. Thus Tobias says in his prayer to God, before having intercourse with his wife, "And now, O Lord, Thou knowest that not in wantonness I take to wife my sister;"59 though she was not sprung immediately from the same father or the same mother, but only belonged to the same family. And Lot is called the brother of Abraham, though Abraham was his uncle.60 And, by the same use of the word, those called in the Gospel the Lord's brothers are certainly not children of the Virgin Mary, but all the blood relations of the Lord.61

36. Some may say, Why did not Abraham's confidence in God prevent his being afraid to confess his wife? God could have warded off from him the death which he feared, and could have protected both him and his wife while among strangers, so that Sara, although very fair, should not have been desired by any one, nor Abraham killed on account of her. Of course, God could have done this; it would be absurd to deny it. But if, in reply to the people, Abraham had told them that Sara was his wife, his trust in God would have included both his own life and the chastity of Sara. Now it is part of sound doctrine, that when a man has any means in his power, he should not tempt the Lord his God. So it was not because the Saviour was unable to protect His disciples that He told them, "When ye are persecuted in one city, flee to another."62 And He Himself set the example. For though He had the power of laying down His own life, and did not lay it down till He chose to do so, still when an infant He fled to Egypt, carried by His parents;63 and when He went up to the feast, He went not openly, but secretly, though at other times He spoke openly to the Jews, who in spite of their rage and hostility could not lay hands on Him, because His hour was not come,64 -not the hour when He would be obliged to die, but the hour when He would consider it seasonable to be put to death. Thus He who displayed divine power by teaching and reproving openly, without allowing the rage of his enemies to hurt Him, did also, by escaping and concealing Himself, exhibit the conduct becoming the feebleness of men, that they should not tempt God when they have any means in their power of escaping threatened danger. So also in the apostle, it was not from despair of divine assistance and protection, or from loss of faith, that he was let down over the wall in a basket, in order to escape being taken by his enemies:65 not from want of faith in God did he thus escape, but because not to escape, when this escape was possible, would have been tempting God. Accordingly, when Abraham was among strangers, and when, on account of the remarkable beauty of Sara, both his life and her chastity were in danger, since it was in his power to protect not both of these, but one only,-his life, namely,-to avoid tempting God he did what he could; and in what he could not do, he trusted to God. Unable to conceal his being a man, he concealed his being a husband, test he should be put to death; trusting to God to preserve his wife's purity.

37. There might also be a difference of opinion on the nice point whether Sara's chastity would have been violated even if some one had intercourse with her, since she submitted to this to save her husband's life, both with his knowledge and by his authority. In this there would be no desertion of conjugal fidelity or rebellion against her husband's authority; in the same way as Abraham was not an adulterer, when, in submission to the lawful authority of his wife, he consented to be made a father by his wife's handmaid. But, from the nature of the relationship, for a wife to have two husbands, both in life, is not the same thing as for a man to have two wives: so that we regard the explanation already given of Abraham's conduct as the most correct and unobjectionable; that our father Abraham avoided tempting God by taking what measures he could for the preservation of his own life, and that he showed his hope in God by entrusting to Him the chastity of his wife.

38. But a pleasure which all must feel is obtained from this narrative so faithfully recorded in the Holy Scriptures, when we examine into the prophetic character of the action, and knock with pious faith and diligence at the door of the mystery, that the Lord may open, and show us who was prefigured in the ancient personage, and whose wife this is, who, while in a foreign land and among strangers, is not allowed to be stained or defiled, that she may be brought to her own husband without spot or wrinkle. Thus we find that the righteous life of the Church is for the glory of Christ, that her beauty may bring honor to her husband, as Abraham was honored on account of the beauty of Sara among the inhabitants of that foreign land. To the Church, to whom it is said in the Song of Songs, "O thou fairest among women,"66 kings offer gifts in acknowledgment of her beauty; as king Abimelech offered gifts to Sara, admiring the grace of her appearance; all the more that, while he loved, he was not allowed to profane it. The holy Church, too is in secret the spouse of the Lord Jesus Christ. For it is secretly, and in the hidden depths of the Spirit, that the soul of man is joined to the word of God, so that they two are one flesh; of which the apostle speaks as a great mystery in marriage, as referring to Christ and the Church.67 Again, the earthly kingdom of this world, typified by the kings which were not allowed to defile Sara, had no knowledge or experience of the Church as the spouse of Christ, that is, of how faithfully she maintained her relation to her Husband, till it tried to violate her, and was compelled to yield to the divine testimony borne by the faith of the martyrs, and in the person of later monarchs was brought humbly to honor with gifts the Bride whom their predecessors had not been able to humble by subduing her to themselves. What, in the type, happened in the reign of one and the same king, is fulfilled in the earlier monarchs of this era and their successors.

39. Again, when it is said that the Church is the sister of Christ, not by the mother but by the father, we learn the excellence of the relation, which is not of the temporary nature of earthly descent, but of divine grace, which is everlasting. By this grace we shall no longer be a race of mortals when we receive power to be called and to become sons of God. This grace we obtain not from the synagogue, which is the mother of Christ after the flesh, but from God the Father. And when Christ calls us into another life where there is no death, He teaches us, instead of acknowledging, to deny the earthly relationship, where death soon follows upon birth; for He says to His disciples, "Call no man your father upon earth; for you have one Father, who is in heaven."68 And He set us an example of this when He said, "Who is my mother, and who are my brethren? And stretching forth His hand to His disciples, He said, These are my brethren." And lest any one should think that He referred to an earthly relationship, He added, "Whosoever shall do the will of my Father, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother;"69 as much as to say, I derive this relationship from God my Father, not from the Synagogue my mother; I call you to eternal life, where I have an immortal birth, not to earthly life, for to call you away from this life I have taken mortality.

40. As for the reason why, though it is concealed among strangers whose wife the Church is, it is not hidden whose sister she is, it is plainly because it is obscure and hard to understand how the human soul and the Word of God are united or mingled, or whatever word may be used to express this connection between God and the creature. It is from this connection that Christ and the Church are called bridegroom and bride, or husband and wife. The other relationship, in which Christ and all the saints are brethren by divine grace and not by earthly consanguinity, or by the father and not by the mother, is more easily expressed in words, and more easily understood. For the same grace makes all the saints to be also brethren of one another; while in their society no one is the bridegroom of all the rest. So also, notwithstanding the surpassing justice and wisdom of Christ, His manhood was much more plainly and readily recognized by strangers, who, indeed, were not wrong in believing Him to be man, but they did not understand His being God as well as man. Hence Jeremiah says: "He is both a man, and who shall know Him?"70 He is a man, for it is made manifest that He is a brother. And who shall know Him? for it is concealed that He is a husband. This must suffice as a defense of our father Abraham against Faustus' impudence and ignorance and malice.

41. Lot also, the brother of Abraham, was just and hospitable in Sodom, and was found worthy to escape the conflagration which prefigured the future judgment; for he was free from all participation in the corruption of the people of Sodom. He was a type of the body of Christ, which in the person of all the saints both groans now among the ungodly and wicked, to whose evil deeds it does not consent, and will at the end of the world be rescued from their society, when they are doomed to the punishment of eternal fire Lot's wife was the type of a different class of men,-of those, namely, who, when called by the grace of God, look back, instead of, like Paul, forgetting the things that are behind, and looking forward to the things that are before.71 The Lord Himself says: "No man that putteth his hand to the plough, and looketh back, is fit for the kingdom of Heaven."72 Nor did He omit to mention the case of Lot's wife; for she, for our warning, was turned into a pillar of salt, that being thus seasoned we might not trifle thoughtlessly with this danger, but be on our guard against it. So, when the Lord was admonishing every one to get rid of the things that are behind by the most strenuous endeavor to reach the things that are before, He said, "Remember Lot's wife."73 And, in addition to these, there is still a third type in Lot, when his daughters lay with him. For here Lot seems to prefigure the future law; for those who spring from the law, and are placed under the law, by misunderstanding it, stupefy it, as it were, and bring forth the works of unbelief by an unlawful use of the law. "The law is good" says the apostle, "if a man use it lawfully."74

42. It is no excuse for this action of Lot or of his daughters that it represented the perversity which was afterwards in certain cases to be displayed. The purpose of Lot's daughters is one thing, and the purpose of God is another, in allowing this to happen that He might make some truth manifest; for God both pronounces judgment on the actions of the people of those times, and arranges in His providence for the prefigurement of the future. As a part of Scripture, this action is a prophecy; as part of the history of those concerned, it is a crime.

43. At the same time there is in this transaction no reason for the torrent of abuse which Faustus' blind hostility discharges on it. By the eternal law which requires the preservation of the order of nature and condemns its violation, the judgment in this case is not what it would have been if Lot had been prompted by a criminal passion to commit incest with his daughters, or if they had been inflamed with unnatural desires. In justice, we must ask not only what was done, but with what motive, in order to obtain a fair view of the action as the effect of that motive. The resolution of Lot's daughters to lie with their father was the effect of the natural desire for offspring in order to preserve the race; for they supposed that there were no other men to be found, thinking that the whole world had been consumed in that conflagration, which, for all they knew, had left no one alive but themselves. It would have been better for them never to have been mothers, than to have become mothers by their own father. But still, the fulfillment of a desire like this is very different from the accursed gratification of lust.

44. Knowing that their father would condemn their design, Lot's daughters thought it necessary to fulfill it without his knowledge. We are told that they made him drunk, so that he was unaware of what happened. His guilt therefore is not that of incest, but of drunkenness. This, too, is condemned by the eternal law, which allows meat and drink only as required by nature for the preservation of health. There is, indeed, a great difference between a drunk man and an habitual drunkard; for the drunkard is not always drunk, and a man may be drunk on one occasion without being a drunkard. However, in the case of a righteous man, we require to account for even one instance of drunkenness. What can have made Lot consent to receive from his daughters all the cups of wine which they went on mixing for him, or perhaps giving him unmixed? Did they feign excessive grief, and did he resort to this consolation in their loneliness, and in the loss of their mother, thinking that they were drinking too, while they only pretended to drink? But this does not seem a proper method for a righteous man to take in consoling his friends when in trouble. Had the daughters learned in Sodom some vile art which enabled them to intoxicate their father with a few cups, so that in his ignorance he might sin, or rather be sinned against? But it is not likely that the Scripture would have omitted all notice of this, or that God would have allowed His servant to be thus abused without any fault of his own.

45. But we are defending the sacred Scriptures, not man's sins. Nor are we concerned to justify this action, as if our God had either commanded it or approved of it; or as if, when men are called just in Scripture, it meant that they could not sin if they chose. And as, in the books which those critics find fault with, God nowhere expresses approval of this action, what thoughtless folly it is to bring a charge from this narrative against these writings, when in other places such actions are condemned by express prohibitions! In the story of Lot's daughters the action is related, not commended. And it is proper that the judgment of God should be declared in some cases, and concealed in others, that by its manifestation our ignorance may be enlightened, and that by its concealment our minds may be improved by the exercise of recalling what we already know, or our indolence stimulated to seek for an explanation. Here, then, God, who can bring good out of evil, made nations arise from this origin, as He saw good, but did not bring upon His own Scriptures the guilt of man's sin. It is God's writing, but not His doing; He does not propose these things for our imitation, but holds them up for our warning.

46. Faustus' effrontery appears notably in his accusing Isaac also, the son of Abraham of pretending that his wife Rebecca was his sister.75 For as regards the family of Rebecca Scripture is not silent, and it appears that she was his sister in the well-known sense of the word. His concealing that she was his wife is not surprising, nor is it insignificant, if he did it in imitation of his father, so that he can be justified on the same grounds. We need only refer to the answer already given to Faustus' charge against Abraham, as being equally applicable to Isaac. Perhaps, however some inquirer will ask what typical significance there is in the foreign king discovering Rebecca to be the wife of Isaac by seeing him playing with her; for he would not have known, had he not seen Isaac playing with Rebecca as it would have been improper to do with a woman not his wife. When holy men act thus as husbands, they do it not foolishly, but designedly: for they accommodate themselves to the nature of the weaker sex in words and actions of gentle playfulness; not in effeminacy, but in subdued manliness. But such behavior towards any woman except a wife would be disgraceful. This is a question in good manners, which is referred to only in case some stern advocate of insensibility should find fault with the holy man even for playing with his wife. For if these men without humanity see a sedate man chatting playfully with children that he may adapt himself to the childish understanding with kindly sympathy, they think that he is insane; forgetting that they themselves were once children, or unthankful for their maturity. The typical meaning, as regards Christ and His Church, which is to be found in this great patriarch playing with his wife, and in the conjugal relation being thus discovered, will be seen by every one who, to avoid offending the Church by erroneous doctrine, carefully studies in Scripture the secret of the Church's Bridegroom. He will find that the Husband of the Church concealed for a time in the form of a servant the majesty in which He was equal to the Father, as being in the form of God, that feeble humanity might be capable of union with Him, and that so He might accommodate Himself to His spouse. So far from being absurd, it has a symbolic suitableness that the prophet of God should use a playfulness which is of the flesh to meet the affection of his wife, as the Word of God Himself became flesh that He might dwell among us.

47. Again, Jacob the son of Isaac is charged with having committed a great crime because he had four wives. But here there is no ground for a criminal accusation: for a plurality of wives was no crime when it was the custom; and it is a crime now, because it is no longer the custom. There are sins against nature, and sins against custom, and sins against the laws. In which, then, of these senses did Jacob sin in having a plurality of wives? As regards nature, he used the women not for sensual gratification, but for the procreation of children. For custom, this was the common practice at that time in those countries. And for the laws, no prohibition existed. The only reason of its being a crime now to do this, is because custom and the laws forbid it. Whoever despises these restraints, even though he uses his wives only to get children, still commits sin, and does an injury to human society itself, for the sake of which it is that the procreation of children is required. In the present altered state of customs and laws, men can have no pleasure in a plurality of wives, except from an excess of lust; and so the mistake arises of supposing that no one could ever have had many wives but from sensuality and the vehemence of sinful desires. Unable to form an idea of men whose force of mind is beyond their conception, they compare themselves with themselves, as the apostle says,76 and so make mistakes. Conscious that, in their intercourse though with one wife only, they are often influenced by mere animal passion instead of an intelligent motive, they think it an obvious inference that, if the limits of moderation are not observed where there is only one wife, the infirmity must be aggravated where there are more than one.

48. But those who have not the virtues of temperance must not be allowed to judge of the conduct of holy men, any more than those in fever of the sweetness and wholesomeness of food. Nourishment must be provided not by the dictates of the sickly taste, but rather by the judgment and direction of health, so as to cure the sickness. If our critics, then, wish to attain not a spurious and affected, but a genuine and sound moral health, let them find a cure in believing the Scripture record, that the honorable name of saint is given not without reason to men who had several wives; and that the reason is this, that the mind can exercise such control over the flesh as not to allow the appetite implanted in our nature by Providence to go beyond the limits of deliberate intention. By a similar misunderstanding, this criticism, which consists rather in dishonest slander than in honest judgment, might accuse the holy apostles too of preaching the gospel to so many people, not from the desire of begetting children to eternal life, but from the love of human praise. There was no lack of renown to these our fathers in the gospel, for their praise was spread in numerous tongues through the churches of Christ. In fact, no greater honor and glory could have been paid by men to their fellow-creatures. It was the sinful desire for this glory in the Church which led the reprobate Simon in his blindness to wish to purchase for money what was freely bestowed on the apostles by divine grace.77 There must have been this desire of glory in the man whom the Lord in the Gospel checks in his desire to follow Him, saying, "The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of man hath not where to lay His Head."78 The Lord saw that his mind was darkened by false appearances and elated by sudden emotion, and that there was no ground of faith to afford a lodging to the Teacher of humility; for in Christ's discipleship the man sought not Christ's grace, but his own glory. By this love of glory those were led away whom the Apostle Paul characterizes as preaching Christ not sincerely, but of contention and envy; and yet the apostle rejoices in their preaching, knowing that it might happen that, while the preachers gratified their desire for human praise, believers might be born among their hearers,-not as the result of the envious feeling which made them wish to rival or surpass the fame of the apostles, but by means of the gospel which they preached, though not sincerely; so that God might bring good out of their evil. So a man may be induced to marry by sensual desire, and not to beget children; and yet a child may be born, a good work of God, due to the natural power, not to the misconduct of the parent. As, therefore, the holy apostles were gratified when their doctrine met with acceptance from their hearers, not because they were greedy for praise, but because they desired to spread the truth; so the holy patriarchs in their conjugal intercourse were actuated not by the love of pleasure, but by the intelligent desire for the continuance of their family. Thus the number of their hearers did not make the apostles ambitious; nor did the number of their wives make the patriarchs licentious. But why defend the husbands, to whose character the divine word bears the highest testimony, when it appears that the wives themselves looked upon their connection with their husbands only as a means of getting sons? So, when they found themselves barren, they gave their handmaids to their husbands; so that while the handmaids had the fleshly motherhood, the wives were mothers in intention.

49. Faustus makes a most groundless statement when he accuses the four women of quarreling like abandoned characters for the possession of their husband. Where Faustus read this I know not, unless it was in his own heart, as in a book of impious delusions, in which Faustus himself is seduced by that serpent with regard to whom the apostle feared for the Church, which he desired to present as a chaste virgin to Christ; lest, as the serpent had deceived Eve by his subtlety, so he should also corrupt their minds by turning them away from the simplicity of Christ.79 The Manichaeans are so fond of this serpent, that they assert that he did more good than harm. From him Faustus must have got his mind corrupted with the lies instilled into it, which he now reproduces in these infamous calumnies, and is even bold enough to put down in writing. It is not true that one of the handmaids carried off Jacob from the other, or that they quarreled about possessing him. There was arrangement, because there was no licentious passion; and the law of conjugal authority was all the stronger that there was none of the lawlessness of fleshly desire. His being hired by one of his wives proves what is here said, in plain opposition to the libels of the Manichaeans. Why should one have hired him, unless by the arrangement he was to have gone in to the other? It does not follow that he would never have gone in to Leah unless she had hired him. He must have gone to her always in her turn, for he had many children by her; and in obedience to her he had children by her hand-maid, and afterwards, without any hiring, by herself. On this occasion it was Rachel's turn, so that she had the power so expressly mentioned in the New Testament by the apostle, "The husband hath not power over his own body, but the wife."80 Rachel had a bargain with her sister, and, being in her sister's debt, she referred her to Jacob, her own debtor. For the apostle uses this figure when he says, "Let the husband render unto the wife what is due."81 Rachel gave what was in her power as due from her husband, in return for what she had chosen to take from her sister.

50. If Jacob had been of such a character as Faustus in his incurable blindness supposes, and not a servant of righteousness rather than of concupiscence, would he not have been looking forward eagerly all day to the pleasure of passing the night with the more beautiful of his wives, whom he certainly loved more than the other, and for whom he paid the price of twice seven years of gratuitous service? How, then, at the close of the day, on his way to his beloved, could he have consented to be turned aside, if he had been such as the ignorant Manichaeans represent him? Would he not have disregarded the wish of the women, and insisted upon going to the fair Rachel, who belonged to him that night not only as his lawful wife, but also as coming in regular order? He would thus have used his power as a husband, for the wife also has not power over her own body, but the husband; and having on this occasion the arrangement in their obedience in favor of the gratification of his love of beauty, he might have enforced his authority the more successfully. In that case it would be to the credit of the women, that while he thought of his own pleasure they contended about having a son. As it was, this virtuous man, in manly control of sensual appetite, thought more of what was due from him than to him, and instead of using his power for his own pleasure, consented to be only the debtor in this mutual obligation. So he consented to pay the debt to the person to whom she to whom it was due wished him to pay it. When, by this private bargain of his wives, Jacob was suddenly and unexpectedly forced to turn from the beautiful wife to the plain one, he did not give way either to anger or to disappointment, nor did he try to persuade his wives to let him have his own way; but, like a just husband and an intelligent parent, seeing his wives concerned about the production of children, which was all he himself desired in marriage, he thought it best to yield to their authority, in desiring that each should have a child: for, since all the children were his, his own authority was not impaired. As if he had said to them: Arrange as you please among yourselves which is to be the mother; it matters not to me, since in any case I am the father. This control over the appetites, and simple desire to beget children, Faustus would have been clever enough to see and approve, unless his mind had been corrupted by the shocking tenets of his sect, which lead him to find fault with everything in the Scripture, and, moreover, teach him to condemn as the greatest crime the procreation of children, which is the proper design of marriage.

51. Now, having defended the character of the patriarch, and refuted an accusation arising from these detestable errors, let us avail ourselves of the opportunity of searching out the symbolical meaning, and let us knock with the reverence of faith, that the Lord may open to us the typical significance of the four wives of Jacob, of whom two were free, and two slaves. We see that, in the wife and bond-slaves of Abraham, the apostle understands the two Testaments.82 But there, one represents each; here, the application does not suit so well, as there are two and two. There, also, the son of the bond-slave is disinherited; but here the sons of the slaves receive the land of promise along with the sons of the free women: so that this type must have a different meaning.

52. Supposing that the two free wives point to the New Testament, by which we are called to liberty, what is the meaning of there being two? Perhaps because in Scripture, as the attentive reader will find, we are said to have two lives in the body of Christ,-one temporal, in which we suffer pain, and one eternal, in which we shall behold the blessedness of God. We see the one in the Lord's passion, and the other in His resurrection. The names of the women point to this meaning: It is said that Leah means Suffering, and Rachel the First Principle made visible, or the Word which makes the First Principle visible. The action, then, of our mortal human life, in which we live by faith, doing many painful tasks without knowing what benefit may result from them to those in whom we are interested, is Leah, Jacob's first wife. And thus she is said to have had weak eyes. For the purposes of mortals are timid, and our plans uncertain. Again, the hope of the eternal contemplation of God, accompanied with a sure and delightful perception of truth, is Rachel. And on this account she is described as fair and well-formed. This is the beloved of every pious student, and for this he serves the grace of God, by which our sins, though like scarlet, are made white as snow.83 For Laban means making white; and we read that Jacob served Laban for Rachel.84 No man turns to serve righteousness, in subjection to the grace of forgiveness, but that he may live in peace in the Word which makes visible the First Principle, or God; that is, he serves for Rachel, not for Leah. For what a man loves in the works of righteousness is not the toil of doing and suffering. No one desires this life for its own sake; as Jacob desired not Leah, who yet was brought to him, and became his wife, and the mother of children. Though she could not be loved of herself, the Lord made her be borne with as a step to Rachel; and then she came to be approved of on account of her children. Thus every useful servant of God, brought into His grace by which his sins are made white, has in his mind, and heart, and affection, when he thus turns to God, nothing but the knowledge of wisdom. This we often expect to attain as a reward for practising the seven precepts of the law which concern the love of our neighbor, that we injure no one: namely, Honor thy father and mother; Thou shall not commit adultery; Thou shall not kill; Thou shalt not steal; Thou shall not bear false witness; Thou shalt not desire thy neighbor's wife; Thou shall not covet thy neighbor's property. When a man has obeyed these to the best of his ability, and, instead of the bright joys of truth which he desired and hoped for, finds in the darkness of the manifold trials of this world that he is bound to painful endurance, or has embraced Leah instead of Rachel, if there is perseverance in his love, he bears with the one in order to attain the other; and as if it were said to him, Serve seven other years for Rachel, he hears seven new commands,-to be poor in spirit, to be meek, to be a mourner, to hunger and thirst after righteousness, to be merciful, pure, and a peacemaker.85 A man would desire, if it were possible, to obtain at once the joys of lovely and perfect wisdom, without the endurance of toil in action and suffering; but this is impossible in mortal life. This seems to be meant, when it is said to Jacob: "It is not the custom in our country to marry the younger before the elder."86 The elder may very well mean the first in order of time. So, in the discipline of man, the toil of doing the work of righteousness precedes the delight of understanding the truth.

53. To this purpose it is written: "Thou hast desired wisdom; keep the commandments, and the Lord shall give it thee."87 The commandments are those concerning righteousness, and the righteousness is that which is by faith, surrounded with the uncertainty of temptations; so that understanding is the reward of a pious belief of what is not yet understood. The meaning I have given to these words, "Thou hast desired wisdom; keep the commandments, and the Lord shall give it thee, "I find also in the passage, "Unless ye believe, ye shall not understand;"88 showing that as righteousness is by faith, understanding comes by wisdom. Accordingly, in the case of those who eagerly demand evident truth, we must not condemn the desire, but regulate it, so that beginning with faith it may proceed to the desired end through good works. The life of virtue is one of toil; the end desired is unclouded wisdom. Why should I believe, says one, what is not clearly proved? Let me hear some word which will disclose the first principle of all things. This is the one great craving of the rational soul in the pursuit of truth. And the answer is, What you desire is excellent, and well worthy of your love; but Leah is to be married first, and then Rachel. The proper effect of your eagerness is to lead you to submit to the right method, instead of rebelling against it; for without this method you cannot attain what you so eagerly long for. And when it is attained, the possession of the lovely form of knowledge will be in this world accompanied with the toils of righteousness. For however clear and true our perception in this life may be of the unchangeable good, the mortal body is still a weight on the mind and the earthly tabernacle is a clog on the intellect in its manifold activity. The end then, is one, but many things must be gone through for the sake of it.

54. Thus Jacob has two free wives; for both are daughters of the remission of sins, or of whitening, that is, of Laban. One is loved, the other is borne. But she that is borne is the most and the soonest fruitful, that she may be loved, if not for herself, at least for her children. For the toil of the righteous is specially fruitful in those whom they beget for the kingdom of God, by preaching the gospel amid many trials and temptations; and they call those their joy and crown89 for whom they are in labors more abundantly, in stripes above measure, in deaths often,90 -for whom they have fightings without and fears within.91 Such births result most easily and plentifully from the word of faith, the preaching of Christ crucified, which speaks also of His human nature as far as it can be easily understood, so as not to hurt the weak eyes of Leah. Rachel, again, with clear eye, is beside herself to God,92 and sees in the beginning the Word of God with God, and wishes to bring forth, but cannot; for who shall declare His generation? So the life devoted to contemplation, in order to see with no feeble mental eye things invisible to flesh, but understood by the things that are made, and to discern the ineffable manifestation of the eternal power and divinity of God, seeks leisure from all occupation, and is therefore barren. In this habit of retirement, where the fire of meditation burns bright, there is a want of sympathy with human weakness, and with the need men have of our help in their calamities. This life also burns with the desire for children (for it wishes to teach what it knows, and not to go with the corruption of envy93), and sees its sister-life fully occupied with work and with bringing forth; and it grieves that men run after that virtue which cares for their wants and weaknesses, instead of that which has a divine imperishable lesson to impart. This is what is meant when it is said, "Rachel envied her sister."94 Moreover, as the pure intellectual perception of that which is not matter, and so is not the object of the bodliy sense, cannot be expressed in words which spring from the flesh, the doctrine of wisdom prefers to get some lodging for divine truth in the mind by whatever material figures and illustrations occur, rather than to give up teaching these things; and thus Rachel preferred that her husband should have children by her handmaid, rather than that she should be without any children. Bilhah, the name of her handmaid, is said to mean old; and so, even when we speak of the spiritual and unchangeable nature of God, ideas are suggested relating to the old life of the bodily senses.

55. Leah, too, got children by her handmaid, from the desire of having a numerous family. Zilpah, her handmaid, is, interpreted, an open mouth. So Leah's handmaid represents those who are spoken of in Scripture as engaging in the preaching of the gospel with open mouth, but not with open heart. Thus it is written of some: "This people honor me with their lips, but their heart is far from me."95 To such the apostle says: "Thou that preachest that a man should not steal, dost thou steal? Thou that sayest a man should not commit adultery, dost thou commit adultery?"96 But that even by this arrangement the free wife of Jacob, the type of labor or endurance, might obtain children to be heirs of the kingdom, the Lord says: "What they say, do; but do not after their works."97 And again, the apostolic life, when enduring imprisonment, says: "Whether Christ is preached in pretence or in truth, I therein do rejoice, yea, and will rejoice."98 It is the joy of the mother over her numerous family, though born of her handmaid.

56. In one instance Leah owed her becoming a mother to Rachel, who, in return for some mandrakes, allowed her husband to give her night to her sister. Some, I know, think that eating this fruit has the effect of making barren women productive, and that Rachel, from her desire for children, was thus bent on getting the fruit from her sister. But I should not agree to this, even had Rachel conceived at the time. As Leah then conceived, and, besides, had two other children before God opened Rachel's womb, there is no reason for supposing any such quality in the mandrake, without any experience to prove it. I will give my explanation; those better able than I may give a better. Though this fruit is not often met with, I had once, to my great satisfaction, on account of its connection with this passage of Scripture, an opportunity of seeing it. I examined the fruit as carefully as I could, not with the help of any recondite knowledge of the nature of roots or the virtues of plants, but only as to what I or any one might learn from the sight, and smell, and taste. I thought it a nice-looking fruit, and sweet-smelling, but insipid; and I confess it is hard to say why Rachel desired it so much, unless it was for its rarity and its sweet smell. Why the incident should be narrated in Scripture, in which the fancies of women would not be mentioned as important unless it was intended that we should learn some important lesson from them, the only thing I can think of is the very simple idea that the fruit represents a good character; not the praise given a man by a few just and wise people, but popular report, which bestows greatness and renown on a man, and which is not desirable for its own sake, but is essential to the success of good men in their endeavors to benefit their fellow-men. So the apostle says, that it is proper to have a good report of those that are without;99 for though they are not infallible, the lustre of their praise and the odor of their good opinion are a great help to the efforts of those who seek to benefit them. And this popular renown is not obtained by those that are highest in the Church, unless they expose themselves to the toils and hazards of an active life. Thus the son of Leah found the mandrakes when he went out into the field, that is, when walking honestly towards those that are without. The pursuit of wisdom, on the other hand, retired from the busy crowd, and lost in calm meditation, could never obtain a particle of this public approval, except through those who take the management of public business, not for the sake of being leaders, but in order to be useful. These men of action and business exert themselves for the public benefit, and by a popular use of their influence gain the approval of the people even for the quiet life of the student and inquirer after truth; and thus through Leah the mandrakes come into the hands of Rachel. Leah herself got them from her first-born son, that is, in honor of her fertility, which represents all the useful result of a laborious life exposed to the common vicissitudes; a life which many avoid on account of its troublesome engagements, because, although they might be able to take the lead, they are bent on study, and devote all their powers to the quiet pursuit of knowledge, in love with the beauty of Rachel.

57. But as it is right that this studious life should gain public approval by letting itself be known, while it cannot rightly gain this approval if it keeps its follower in retirement, instead of using his powers for the management of ecclesiastical affairs, and so prevents his being generally useful; to this purpose Leah says to her sister, "Is it a small matter that thou hast taken my husband? and wouldest thou take away my son's mandrakes also?"100 The husband represents all those who, though fit for active life, and able to govern the Church, in administering to believers the mystery of the faith, from their love of learning and of the pursuit of wisdom, desire to relinquish all troublesome occupations, and to bury themselves in the classroom. Thus the words, "Is it a small matter that thou hast taken my husband? and wouldest thou take away my son's mandrakes also?" mean, "Is it a small matter that the life of study keeps in retirement men required for the toils of public life? and does it ask for popular renown as well?"

58. To get this renown justly, Rachel gives her husband to her sister for the night; that is, those who, by a talent for business, are fitted for government, must for the public benefit consent to bear the burden and suffer the hardships of public life; lest the pursuit of wisdom, to which their leisure is devoted, should be evil spoken of, and should not gain from the multitude the good opinion, represented by the fruit, which is necessary for the encouragement of their pupils. But the life of business must be forced upon them. This is clearly shown by Leah's meeting Jacob when coming from the field, and laying hold of him, saying, "Thou shalt come in to me; for I have hired thee with my son's mandrakes."101 As if she said, Dost thou wish the knowledge which thou lovest to be well thought of? Do not shirk the toil of business. The same thing happens constantly in the Church. What we read is explained by what we meet with in our own experience. Do we not everywhere see men coming from secular employments, to seek leisure for the study and contemplation of truth, their beloved Rachel, and intercepted mid-way by ecclesiastical affairs, which require them to be set to work, as if Leah said to them, You must come in to me? When such men minister in sincerity the mystery of God, so as in the night of this world to beget sons in the faith, popular approval is gained also for that life, in love for which they were led to abandon worldly pursuits, and from the adoption of which they were called away to undertake the benevolent task of government. In all their labors they aim chiefly at this, that their chosen way of life may have greater and wider renown, as having supplied the people with such leaders; as Jacob consents to go with Leah, that Rachel may obtain the sweet-smelling and good-looking fruit. Rachel, too, in course of time, by the mercy of God, brings forth a child herself, but not till after some time; for it seldom happens that there is a sound, though only partial, apprehension, without fleshly ideas, of such sacred lessons of wisdom as this: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God."102

59. This must suffice as a reply to the false accusations brought by Faustus against the three fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, from whom the God whom the Catholic Church worship was pleased to take His name. This is not the place to discourse on the merits and piety of these three men, or on the dignity of their prophetic character, which is beyond the comprehension of carnal minds. It is enough in this treatise to defend them against the calumnious attacks of malevolence and falsehood, in case those who read the Scriptures in a carping and hostile spirit should fancy that they have proved anything against the sacredness and the profitableness of these books, by their attempts to blacken the character of men who are there mentioned so honorably.

60. It should be added that Lot, the brother, that is the blood relation, of Abraham, is not to be ranked as equal to those of whom God says, "I am the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob;" nor does he belong to those testified to in Scripture as having continued righteous to the end, although in Sodom he lived a pious and virtuous life, and showed a praiseworthy hospitality, so that he was rescued from the fire, and a land was given by God to his seed to dwell in, for the sake of his uncle Abraham. On these accounts he is commended in Scripture-not for intemperance or incest. But when we find bad and good actions recorded of the same person, we must take warning from the one, and example from the other. As, then, the sin of Lot, of whom we are told that he was righteous previous to this sin, instead of bringing a stain on the character of God, or the truth of Scripture, rather calls on us to approve and admire the record in its resemblance to a faithful mirror, which reflects not only the beauties and perfections, but also the faults and deformities, of those who approach it; still more, in the case of Judah, who lay with his daughter-in-law, we may see how groundless are the reproaches cast on the narrative. The sacred record has an authority which raises it far above not merely the cavils of a handful of Manichaeans, but the determined enmity of the whole Gentile world; for, in confirmation of its claims, we see that already it has brought nearly all people from their idolatrous superstitions to the worship of one God, according to the rule of Christianity. It has conquered the world, not by violence and warfare, but by the resistless force of truth. Where, then, is Judah praised in Scripture? Where is anything good said of him, except that in the blessing pronounced by his father he is distinguished above the rest, because of the prophecy that Christ would come in the flesh from his tribe?103

61. Judah, as Faustus says, committed fornication; and besides that, we can accuse him of selling his brother into Egypt. Is it any disparagement to light, that in revealing all things it discloses what is unsightly? So neither is the character of Scripture affected by the evil deeds of which we are informed by the record itself. Undoubtedly, by the eternal law, which requires the preservation of natural order, and forbids the transgression of it, conjugal intercourse should take place only for the procreation of children, and after the celebration of marriage, so as to maintain the bond of peace. Therefore, the prostitution of women, merely for the gratification of sinful passion, is condemned by the divine and eternal law. To purchase the degradation of another, disgraces the purchaser; so that, though the sin would have been greater if Judah had knowingly lain with his daughter-in-law (for if, as the Lord says, man and wife are no more two, but one flesh,104 a daughter-in-law is the same as a daughter); still, it is plain that, as regards his own intention, he was disgraced by his intercourse with an harlot. The woman, on the other hand, who deceived her father-in-law, sinned not from wantonness, or because she loved the gains of iniquity, but from her desire to have children of this particular family. So, being disappointed in two of the brothers, and not obtaining the third, she succeeded by craft in getting a child by their father; and the reward which she got was kept, not as an ornament, but as a pledge. It would certainly have been better to have remained childless than to become a mother without marriage. Still, her desire to have her father-in-law as the father of her children was very different from having a criminal affection for him. And when, by his order, she was brought out to be killed, on her producing the staff and necklace and ring, saying that the father of the child was the man who had given her those pledges, Judah acknowledged them, and said, "She hath been more righteous than I" -not praising her, but condemning himself. He blamed her desire to have children less than his own unlawful passion, which had led him to one whom he thought to be an harlot. In a similar sense, it is said of some that they justified Sodom;105 that is, their sin was so great, that Sodom seemed righteous in comparison. And even allowing that this woman is not spoken of as comparatively less guilty, but is actually praised by her father-in-law, while, on account of her not observing the established rites of marriage, she is a criminal in the eye of the eternal law of right, which forbids the transgression of natural order, both as regards the body, and first and chiefly as regards the mind, what wonder though one sinner should praise another?

62. The mistake of Faustus and of Manichaeism generally, is in supposing that these objections prove anything against us, as if our reverence for Scripture, and our profession of regard for its authority, bound us to approve of all the evil actions mentioned in it; whereas the greater our homage for the Scripture, the more decided must be our condemnation of what the truth of Scripture itself teaches us to condemn. In Scripture, all fornication and adultery are condemned by the divine law; accordingly, when actions of this kind are narrated, without being expressly condemned, it is intended not that we should praise them, but that we should pass judgment on them ourselves. Every one execrates the cruelty of Herod in the Gospel, when, in his uneasiness on hearing of the birth of Christ, he commanded the slaughter of so many infants.106 But this is merely narrated without being condemned. Or if Manichaean absurdity is bold enough to deny the truth of this narrative, since they do not admit the birth of Christ, which was what troubled Herod, let them read the account of the blind fury of the Jews, which is related without any expression of reproach, although the feeling of abhorrence is the same in all.

63. But, it is said, Judah, who lay with his daughter-in-law, is reckoned as one of the twelve patriarchs. And was not Judas, who betrayed the Lord, reckoned among the twelve apostles? And was not this one of them, who was a devil, sent along with them to preach the gospel?107 In reply to this, it will be said that after his crime Judas hanged himself, and was removed from the number of the apostles; while Judah, after his evil conduct, was not only blessed along with his brethren, but got special honor and approval from his father, who is so highly spoken of in Scripture. But the main lesson to be learned from this is, that this prophecy refers not to Judah, but to Christ, who was foretold as to come in the flesh from his tribe; and the very reason for the mention of this crime of Judah is to be found in the desirableness of teaching us to look for another meaning in the words of his father, which are seen not to be applicable to him in his misconduct, from the praise which they express.

64. Doubtless, the intention of Faustus' calumnies is to damage this very assertion, that Christ was born of the tribe of Judah. Especially, as in the genealogy given by Matthew we find the name of Zara, whom this woman Tamar bore to Judah. Had Faustus wished to reproach Jacob's family merely, and not Christ's birth, he might have taken the case of Reuben the first-born, who committed the unnatural crime of defiling his father's bed, of which fornication the apostle says, that it was not so much as named among the Gentiles.108 Jacob also mentions this in his blessing, charging his son with the infamous deed. Faustus might have brought up this, as Reuben seems to have been guilty of deliberate incest, and there was no harlot's disguise in this case, were it not that Tamar's conduct in desiring nothing but to have children is more odious to Faustus than if she had acted from criminal passion, and did he not wish to discredit the incarnation, by bringing reproach on Christ's progenitors. Faustus unhappily is not aware that the most true and truthful Saviour is a teacher, not only in His words, but also in His birth. In His fleshly origin there is this lesson for those who should believe on Him from all nations, that the sins of their fathers need be no hindrance to them. Besides, the Bridegroom, who was to call good and bad to His marriage,109 was pleased to assimilate Himself to His guests, in being born of good and bad. He thus confirms as typical of Himself the symbol of the Passover, in which it was commanded that the lamb to be eaten should be taken from the sheep or from the goats-that is, from the righteous or the wicked.110 Preserving throughout the indication of divinity and humanity, as man He consented to have both bad and good as His parents, while as God He chose the miraculous birth from a virgin.

65. The impiety, therefore, of Faustus' attacks on Scripture can injure no one but himself; for what he thus assails is now deservedly the object of universal reverence. As has been said already, the sacred record, like a faithful mirror, has no flattery in its portraits, and either itself passes sentence upon human actions as worthy of approval or disapproval, or leaves the reader to do so. And not only does it distinguish men as blameworthy or praiseworthy, but it also takes notice of cases where the blameworthy deserve praise, and the praiseworthy blame. Thus, although Saul was blameworthy, it was not the less praiseworthy in him to examine so carefully who had eaten food during the curse, and to pronounce the stern sentence in obedience to the commandment of God.111 So, too, he was right in banishing those that had familiar spirits and wizards out of the land.112 And although David was praiseworthy, we are not called on to approve or imitate his sins, which God rebukes by the prophet. And so Pontius Pilate was not wrong in pronouncing the Lord innocent, in spite of the accusations of the Jews;113 nor was it praiseworthy in Peter to deny the Lord thrice; nor, again, was he praiseworthy on that occasion when Christ called him Satan because, not understanding the things of God, he wished to withhold Christ from his passion, that is, from our salvation. Here Peter, immediately after being called blessed, is called Satan.114 Which character most truly belonged to him, we may see from his apostleship, and from his crown of martyrdom.

66. In the case of David also, we read of both good and bad actions. But where David's strength lay, and what was the secret of his success, is sufficiently plain, not to the blind malevolence with which Faustus assails holy writings and holy men, but to pious discernment, which bows to the divine authority, and at the same time judges correctly of human conduct. The Manichaeans will find, if they read the Scriptures, that God rebukes David more than Faustus does.115 But they will read also of the sacrifice of his penitence, of his surpassing gentleness to his merciless and bloodthirsty enemy, whom David, pious as he was brave, dismissed unhurt when now and again he fell into his hands.116 They will read of his memorable humility under divine chastisement, when the kingly neck was so bowed under the Master's yoke, that he bore with perfect patience bitter taunts from his enemy, though he was armed, and had armed men with him. And when his companion was enraged at such things being said to the king, and was on the point of requiting the insult on the head of the scoffer, he mildly restrained him, appealing to the fear of God in support of his own royal order, and saying that this bad happened to him as a punishment from God, who had sent the man to curse him.117 They will read how, with the love of a shepherd for the flock entrusted to him, he was willing to die for them, when, after he had numbered the people, God saw good to punish his sinful pride by lessening the number he boasted of. In this destruction, God, with whom there is no iniquity, in His secret judgment, both took away the lives of those whom He knew to be unworthy of life, and by this diminution cured the vainglory which had prided itself on the number of the people. They will read of that scrupulous fear of God in his regard for the emblem of Christ in the sacred anointing, which made David's heart smite him with regret for having secretly cut off a small piece of Saul's garment, that he might prove to him that he had no wish to kill him, when he might have done it. They will read of his judicious behavior as regards his children, and also of his tenderness toward them-how, when one was sick, he entreated the Lord for him with many tears and with much self-abasement, but when he died, an innocent child, he did not mourn for him; and again, how, when his youthful son was carried away with unnatural hostility to an infamous violation of his father's bed, and in a parricidal war, he wished him to live, and wept for him when he was killed; for he thought of the eternal doom of a soul guilty of such crimes, and desired that he should live to escape this doom by being brought to submission and repentance. These, and many other praiseworthy and exemplary things, may be seen in this holy man by a candid examination of the Scripture narrative, especially if in humble piety and unfeigned faith we regard the judgment of God, who knew the secrets of David's heart, and who, in His infallible inspection, so approves of David as to commend him as a pattern to his sons.

67. It must have been on account of this inspection of the depths of David's heart by the Spirit of God that, when on being reproved by the prophet, he said, I have sinned, he was considered worthy to be told, immediately after this brief confession, that he was pardoned-that is, that he was admitted to eternal salvation. For he did not escape the correction of the fatherly rod, of which God spoke in His threatening, that, while by his confession he obtained eternal exemption, he might be tried by temporal chastisement. And it is a remarkable evidence of the strength of David's faith, and of his meek and submissive spirit, that, when he had been told by the prophet that God had forgiven him, although the threatened consequences were still permitted to follow, he did not accuse the prophet of having deluded him, or murmur against God as having mocked him with a declaration of forgiveness. This deeply holy man, whose soul was lifted up unto God, and not against God, knew that had not the Lord mercifully accepted his confession and repentance, his sins would have deserved eternal punishment. So when, instead of this, he was made to smart under temporal correction, he saw that, while the pardon remained good, wholesome discipline was also provided. Saul, too, when he was reproved by Samuel, said, I have sinned.118 Why, then, was he not considered fit to be told, as David was, that the Lord had pardoned his sin? Is there acceptance of persons with God? Far from it. While to the human ear the words were the same, the divine eye saw a difference in the heart. The lesson for us to learn from these things is, that the kingdom of heaven is within us,119 and that we must worship God from our inmost feelings, that out of the abundance of the heart the mouth may speak, instead of honoring Him with our lips, like the people of old, while our hearts are far from Him. We may learn also to judge of men, whose hearts we cannot see, only as God judges, who sees what we cannot, and who cannot be biased or misled. Having, on the high authority of sacred Scripture, the plainest announcement of God's opinion of David, we may regard as absurd or deplorable the rashness of men who hold a different opinion. The authority of Scripture, as regards the character of these men of ancient times, is supported by the evidence from the prophecies which they contain, and which are now receiving their fulfillment.

68. We see the same thing in the Gospel, where the devils confess that Christ is the Son of God in the words used by Peter, but with a very different heart. So, though the words were the same, Peter is praised for his faith, while the impiety of the devils is checked. For Christ, not by human sense, but by divine knowledge, could inspect and infallibly discriminate the sources from which the words came. Besides, there are multitudes who confess that Christ is the Son of the living God, without meriting the same approval as Peter-not only of those who shall say in that day, "Lord, Lord," and shall receive the sentence, "Depart from me," but also of those who shall be placed on the right hand. They may probably never have denied Christ even once; they may never have opposed His suffering for our salvation; they may never have forced the Gentiles to do as the Jews;120 and yet they shall not be honored equally with Peter, who, though he did all these things, will sit on one of the twelve thrones, and judge not only the twelve tribes, but the angels. So, again, many who have never desired another man's wife, or procured the death of the husband, as David did, will never reach the place which David nevertheless held in the divine favor. There is a vast difference between what is in itself so undesirable that it must be utterly rejected, and the rich and plenteous harvest which may afterwards appear. For farmers are best pleased with the fields from which, after weeding them, it may be, of great thistles, they receive an hundred-fold; not with fields which have never had any thistles, and hardly bear thirty-fold.

69. So Moses, too, who was so faithful a servant of God in all his house; the minister of the holy, just, and good law; of whose character the apostle speaks in the words here quoted;121 the minister also of the symbols which, though not conferring salvation, promised the Saviour, as the Saviour Himself shows, when He says, "If ye believed Moses, ye would also believe me, for he wrote of me,"-from which passage we have already sufficiently answered the presumptuous cavils of the Manichaeans;-this Moses, the servant of the living, the true, the most high God, that made heaven and earth, not of a foreign substance, but of nothing-not from the pressure of necessity, but from plenitude of goodness-not by the suffering of His members, but by the power of His word;-this Moses, who humbly put from him this high ministry, but obediently accepted it, and faithfully kept it, and diligently fulfilled it; who ruled the people with vigilance, reproved them with vehemence, loved them with fervor, and bore with them in patience, standing for his subjects before God to receive His counsel, and to appease His wrath;-this great and good man is not to be judged of from Faustus' malicious representations, but from what is said by God, whose word is a true expression of His true opinion of this man, whom He knew because He made him. For the sins of men are also known to God, though He is not their author; but He takes notice of them as a judge in those who refuse to own them, and pardons them as a father in those who make confession. His servant Moses, as thus described, we love and admire and to the best of our power imitate, coming indeed far short of his merits, though we have killed no Egyptian, nor plundered any one, nor carried on any war; which actions of Moses were in one case prompted by the zeal of the future champion of his people, and in the other cases commanded by God.

70. It might be shown that, though Moses slew the Egyptian, without being commanded by God, the action was divinely permitted, as, from the prophetic character of Moses, it prefigured something in the future. Now however, I do not use this argument, but view the action as having no symbolical meaning. In the light, then, of the eternal law, it was wrong for one who had no legal authority to kill the man, even though he was a bad character, besides being the aggressor. But in minds where great virtue is to come, there is often an early crop of vices, in which we may still discern a disposition for some particular virtue, which will come when the mind is duly cultivated. For as farmers, when they see land bringing forth huge crops, though of weeds, pronounce it good for corn; or when they see wild creepers, which have to be rooted out, still consider the land good for useful vines; and when they see a hill covered with wild olives, conclude that with culture it will produce good fruit: so the disposition of mind which led Moses to take the law into his own hands, to prevent the wrong done to his brother, living among strangers, by a wicked citizen of the country from being unrequited, was not unfit for the production of virtue, but from want of culture gave signs of its productiveness in an unjustifiable manner. He who afterwards, by His angel, called Moses on Mount Sinai, with the divine commission to liberate the people of Israel from Egypt, and who trained him to obedience by the miraculous appearance in the bush burning but not consumed, and by instructing him in his ministry, was the same who, by the call addressed from heaven to Saul when persecuting the Church, humbled him, raised him up, and animated him; or in figurative words, by this stroke He cut off the branch, grafted it, and made it fruitful. For the fierce energy of Paul, when in his zeal for hereditary traditions he persecuted the Church, thinking that he was doing God service, was like a crop of weeds showing great signs of productiveness. It was the same in Peter, when he took his sword out of its sheath to defend the Lord, and cut off the right ear of an assailant, when the Lord rebuked him with something like a threat, saying, "Put up thy sword into its sheath; for he that taketh the sword shall perish by the sword."122 To take the sword is to use weapons against a man's life, without the sanction of the constituted authority. The Lord, indeed, had told His disciples to carry a sword; but He did not tell them to use it. But that after this sin Peter should become a pastor of the Church was no more improper than that Moses, after smiting the Egyptian, should become the leader of the congregation. In both cases the trespass originated not in inveterate cruelty, but in a hasty zeal which admitted of correction. In both cases there was resentment against injury, accompanied in one case by love for a brother, and in the other by love, though still carnal, of the Lord. Here was evil to be subdued or rooted out; but the heart with such capacities needed only, like good soil, to be cultivated to make it fruitful in virtue.

71. Then, as for Faustus' objection to the spoiling of the Egyptians, he knows not what he says. In this Moses not only did not sin, but it would have been sin not to do it. It was by the command of God,123 who, from His knowledge both of the actions and of the hearts of men, can decide on what every one should be made to suffer, and through whose agency. The people at that time were still carnal, and engrossed with earthly affections; while the Egyptians were in open rebellion against God, for they used the gold, God's creature, in the service of idols, to the dishonor of the Creator, and they had grievously oppressed strangers by making them work without pay. Thus the Egyptians deserved the punishment, and the Israelites were suitably employed in inflicting it. Perhaps, indeed, it was not so much a command as a permission to the Hebrews to act in the matter according to their own inclinations; and God, in sending the message by Moses, only wished that they should thus be informed of His permission. There may also have been mysterious reasons for what God said to the people on this matter. At any rate, God's commands are to be submissively received, not to be argued against. The apostle says, "Who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been His counsellor?"124 Whether, then, the reason was what I have said, or whether in the secret appointment of God, there was some unknown reason for His telling the people by Moses to borrow things from the Egyptians, and to take them away with them, this remains certain, that this was said for some good reason, and that Moses could not lawfully have done otherwise than God told him, leaving to God the reason of the command, while the servant's duty is to obey.

72. But, says Faustus, it cannot be admitted that the true God, who is also good, ever gave such a command. I answer, such a command can be rightly given by no other than the true and good God, who alone knows the suitable command in every case, and who alone is incapable of inflicting unmerited suffering on any one. This ignorant and spurious goodness of the human heart may as well deny what Christ says, and object to the wicked being made to suffer by the good God, when He shall say to the angels, "Gather first the tares into bundles to burn them." The servants, however, were stopped when they wished to do this prematurely: "Lest by chance, when ye would gather the tares, ye root up the wheat also with them."125 Thus the true and good God alone knows when, to whom, and by whom to order anything, or to permit anything. In the same way, this human goodness, or folly rather, might object to the Lord's permitting the devils to enter the swine, which they asked to be allowed to do with a mischievous intent?126 especially as the Manichaeans believe that not only pigs, but the vilest insects, have human souls. But setting aside these absurd notions, this is undeniable, that our Lord Jesus Christ, the only son of God, and therefore the true and good God, permitted the destruction of swine belonging to strangers, implying loss of life and of a great amount of property, at the request of devils. No one can be so insane as to suppose that Christ could not have driven the devils out of the men without gratifying their malice by the destruction of the swine. If, then, the Creator and Governor of all natures, in His superintendence, which, though mysterious, is ever just, indulged the violent and unjust inclination of those lost spirits already doomed to eternal fire, why should not the Egyptians, who were unrighteous oppressors, be spoiled by the Hebrews, a free people, who would claim payment for their enforced and painful toil, especially as the earthly possessions which they thus lost were used by the Egyptians in their impious rites, to the dishonor of the Creator? Still, if Moses had originated this order, or if the people had done it spontaneously, undoubtedly it would have been sinful; and perhaps the people did sin, not in doing what God commanded or permitted, but in some desire of their own for what they took. The permission given to this action by divine authority was in accordance with the just and good counsel of Him who uses punishments both to restrain the wicked and to educate His own people; who knows also how to give more advanced precepts to those able to bear them, while He begins on a lower scale in the treatment of the feeble. As for Moses, he can be blamed neither for coveting the property, nor for disputing, in any instance, the divine authority.

73. According to the eternal law, which requires the preservation of natural order, and forbids the transgression of it, some actions have an indifferent character, so that men are blamed for presumption if they do them without being called upon, while they are deservedly praised for doing them when required. The act, the agent, and the authority for the action are all of great importance in the order of nature. For Abraham to sacrifice his son of his own accord is shocking madness.

His doing so at the command of God proves him faithful and submissive. This is so loudly proclaimed by the very voice of truth, that Faustus, eagerly rummaging for some fault, and reduced at last to slanderous charges, has not the boldness to attack this action. It is scarcely possible that he can have forgotten a deed so famous, that it recurs to the mind of itself without any study or reflection, and is in fact repeated by so many tongues, and portrayed in so many places, that no one can pretend to shut his eyes or his ears to it. If, therefore, while Abraham's killing his son of his own accord would have been unnatural, his doing it at the command of God shows not only guiltless but praiseworthy compliance, why does Faustus blame Moses for spoiling the Egyptians? Your feeling of disapproval for the mere human action should be restrained by a regard for the divine sanction. Will you venture to blame God Himself for desiring such actions? Then "Get thee behind me, Satan, for thou understandest not the things which be of God, but those which be of men." Would that this rebuke might accomplish in you what it did in Peter, and that you might hereafter preach the truth concerning God, which you now, judging by feeble sense, find fault with! as Peter became a zealous messenger to announce to the Gentiles what he objected to at first, when the Lord spoke of it as His intention.

74. Now, if this explanation suffices to satisfy human obstinacy and perverse misinterpretation of right actions of the vast difference between the indulgence of passion and presumption on the part of men, and obedience to the command of God, who knows what to permit or to order, and also the time and the persons, and the due action or suffering in each case, the account of the wars of Moses will not excite surprise or abhorrence, for in wars carried on by divine command, he showed not ferocity but obedience; and God in giving the command, acted not in cruelty, but in righteous retribution, giving to all what they deserved, and warning those who needed warning. What is the evil in war? Is it the death of some who will soon die in any case, that others may live in peaceful subjection? This is mere cowardly dislike, not any religious feeling. The real evils in war are love of violence, revengeful cruelty, fierce and implacable enmity, wild resistance, and the lust of power, and such like; and it is generally to punish these things, when force is required to inflict the punishment, that, in obedience to God or some lawful authority, good men undertake wars, when they find themselves in such a position as regards the conduct of human affairs, that right conduct requires them to act, or to make others act in this way. Otherwise John, when the soldiers who came to be baptized asked, What shall we do? would have replied, Throw away your arms; give up the service; never strike, or wound, or disable any one. But knowing that such actions in battle were not murderous but authorized by law, and that the soldiers did not thus avenge themselves, but defend the public safety, he replied, "Do violence to no man, accuse no man falsely, and be content with your wages."127 But as the Manichaeans are in the habit of speaking evil of John, let them hear the Lord Jesus Christ Himself ordering this money to be given to Caesar, which John tells the soldiers to be content with. "Give," He says, "to Caesar the things that are Caear's."128 For tribute-money is given on purpose to pay the soldiers for war. Again, in the case of the centurion who said, "I am a man under authority, and have soldiers under me: and I say to one, Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my servant, Do this, and he doeth it," Christ gave due praise to his faith;129 He did not tell him to leave the service. But there is no need here to enter on the long discussion of just and unjust ways.

75. A great deal depends on the causes for which men undertake wars, and on the authority they have for doing so; for the natural order which seeks the peace of mankind, ordains that the monarch should have the power of undertaking war if he thinks it advisable, and that the soldiers should perform their military duties in behalf of the peace and safety of the community. When war is undertaken in obedience to God, who would rebuke, or humble, or crush the pride of man, it must be allowed to be a righteous war; for even the wars which arise from human passion cannot harm the eternal well-being of God, nor even hurt His saints; for in the trial of their patience, and the chastening of their spirit, and in bearing fatherly correction, they are rather benefited than injured. No one can have any power against them but what is given him from above. For there is no power but of God,130 who either orders or permits. Since, therefore, a righteous man, serving it may be under an ungodly king, may do the duty belonging to his position in the State in fighting by the order of his sovereign,-for in some cases it is plainly the will of God that he should fight, and in others, where this is not so plain, it may be an unrighteous command on the part of the king, while the soldier is innocent, because his position makes obedience a duty,-how much more must the man be blameless who carries on war on the authority of God, of whom every one who serves Him knows that He can never require what is wrong?

76. If it is supposed that God could not enjoin warfare, because in after times it was said by the Lord Jesus Christ, "I say unto you, That ye resist not evil: but if any one strike thee on the right cheek, turn to him the left also,"131 the answer is, that what is here required is not a bodily action, but an inward disposition. The sacred seat of virtue is the heart, and such were the hearts of our fathers, the righteous men of old. But order required such a regulation of events, and such a distinction of times, as to show first of all that even earthly blessings (for so temporal kingdoms and victory over enemies are considered to be, and these are the things which the community of the ungodly all over the world are continually begging from idols and devils) are entirely under the control and at the disposal of the one true God. Thus, under the Old Testament, the secret of the kingdom of heaven, which was to be disclosed in due time, was veiled, and so far obscured, in the disguise of earthly promises. But when the fullness of time came for the revelation of the New Testament, which was hidden under the types of the Old, clear testimony was to be borne to the truth, that there is another life for which this life ought to be disregarded, and another kingdom for which the opposition of all earthly kingdoms should be patiently borne. Thus the name martyrs, which means witnesses, was given to those who, by the will of God, bore this testimony, by their confessions, their sufferings, and their death. The number of such witnesses is so great, that if it pleased Christ-who called Saul by a voice from heaven, and having changed him from a wolf to a sheep, sent him into the midst of wolves-to unite them all in one army, and to give them success in battle, as He gave to the Hebrews, what nation could withstand them? what kingdom would remain unsubdued? But as the doctrine of the New Testament is, that we must serve God not for temporal happiness in this life, but for eternal felicity hereafter, this truth was most strikingly confirmed by the patient endurance of what is commonly called adversity for the sake of that felicity. So in fullness of time the Son of God, made of a woman, made under the law, that He might redeem them that were under the law, made of the seed of David according to the flesh sends His disciples as sheep into the midst of wolves, and bids them not fear those that can kill the body, but cannot kill the soul, and promises that even the body will be entirely restored, so that not a hair shall be lost.132 Peter's sword He orders back into its sheath, restoring as it was before the ear of His enemy that had been cut off. He says that He could obtain legions of angels to destroy His enemies, but that He must drink the cup which His Father's will had given Him.133 He sets the example of drinking this cup, then hands it to His followers, manifesting thus, both in word and deed, the grace of patience. Therefore God raised Him from the dead, and has given Him a name which is above every name; that in the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven and of things in earth, and of things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.134 The patriarchs and prophets, then, have a kingdom in this world, to show that these kingdoms, too, are given and taken away by God: the apostles and martyrs had no kingdom here, to show the superior desirableness of the kingdom of heaven. The prophets, however, could even in those times die for the truth, as the Lord Himself says, "From the blood of Abel to the blood of Zacharia;135 and in these days, since the commencement of the fulfillment of what is prophesied in the psalm of Christ, under the figure of Solomon, which means the peacemaker, as Christ is our peace,136 "All kings of the earth shall bow to Him, all nations shall serve Him,"137 we have seen Christian emperors, who have put all their confidence in Christ, gaining splendid victories over ungodly enemies, whose hope was in the rites of idolatry and devil-worship. There are public and undeniable proofs of the fact, that on one side the prognostications of devils were found to be fallacious, and on the other, the predictions of saints were a means of support; and we have now writings in which those facts are recorded.

77. If our foolish opponents are surprised at the difference between the precepts given by God to the ministers of the Old Testament, at a time when the grace of the New was still undisclosed, and those given to the preachers of the New Testament, now that the obscurity of the Old is removed, they will find Christ Himself saying one thing at one time, and another at another. "When I sent you," He says, "without scrip, or purse, or shoes, did ye lack anything? And they said, Nothing. Then saith He to them, But now, he that hath a scrip, let him take it, and also a purse; and he that hath not a sword, let him sell his garment, and buy one." If the Manichaeans found passages in the Old and New Testaments differing in this way, they would proclaim it as a proof that the Testaments are opposed to each other. But here the difference is in the utterances of one and the same person. At one time He says, "I sent you without scrip, or purse, or shoes, and ye lacked nothing;" at another, "Now let him that hath a scrip take it, and also a purse; and he that hath a tunic, let him sell it and buy a sword." Does not this show how, without any inconsistency, precepts and counsels and permissions may be changed, as different times require different arrangements? If it is said that there was a symbolical meaning in the command to take a scrip and purse, and to buy a sword, why may there not be a symbolical meaning in the fact, that one and the same God commanded the prophets in old times to make war, and forbade the apostles? And we find in the passage that we have quoted from the Gospel, that the words spoken by the Lord were carried into effect by His disciples. For, besides going at first without scrip or purse, and yet lacking nothing, as from the Lord's question and their answer it is plain they did, now that He speaks of buying a sword, they say, "Lo, here are two swords;" and He replied, "It is enough." Hence we find Peter with a weapon when he cut off the assailant's ear, on which occasion his spontaneous boldness was checked, because, although he had been told to take a sword, he had not been told to use it.138 Doubtless, it was mysterious that the Lord should require them to carry weapons, and forbid the use of them. But it was His part to give the suitable precepts, and it was their part to obey without reserve.

78. It is therefore mere groundless calumny to charge Moses with making war, for there would have been less harm in making war of his own accord, than in not doing it when God commanded him. And to dare to find fault with God Himself for giving such a command, or not to believe it possible that a just and good God did so, shows, to say the least, an inability to consider that in the view of divine providence, which pervades all things from the highest to the lowest, time can neither add anything nor take away; but all things go, or come, or remain according to the order of nature or desert in each separate case, while in men a right will is in union with the divine law, and ungoverned passion is restrained by the order of divine law; so that a good man wills only what is commanded, and a bad man can do only what he is permitted, at the same time that he is punished for what he wills to do unjustly. Thus, in all the things which appear shocking and terrible to human feebleness, the real evil is the injustice; the rest is only the result of natural properties or of moral demerit. This injustice is seen in every case where a man loves for their own sake things which are desirable only as means to an end, and seeks for the sake of something else things which ought to be loved for themselves. For thus, as far as he can, he disturbs in himself the natural order which the eternal law requires us to observe. Again, a man is just when he seeks to use things only for the end for which God appointed them, and to enjoy God as the end of all, while he enjoys himself and his friend in God and for God. For to love in a friend the love of God is to love the friend for God. Now both justice and injustice, to be acts at all, must be voluntary; otherwise, there can be no just rewards or punishments; which no man in his senses will assert. The ignorance and infirmity which prevent a man from knowing his duty, or from doing all he wishes to do, belong to God's secret penal arrangement, and to His unfathomable judgments, for with Him there is no iniquity. Thus we are informed by the sure word of God of Adam's sin; and Scripture truly declares that in him all die, and that by him sin entered into the world, and death by sin.139 And our experience gives abundant evidence, that in punishment for this sin our body is corrupted, and weighs down the soul, and the clay tabernacle clogs the mind in its manifold activity;140 and we know that we can be freed from this punishment only by gracious interposition. So the apostle cries out in distress, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death? The grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord."141 So much we know; but the reasons for the distribution of divine judgment and mercy, why one is in this condition, and another in that, though just, are unknown. Still, we are sure that all these things are due either to the mercy or the judgment of God, while the measures and numbers and weights by which the Creator of all natural productions arranges all things are concealed from our view. For God is not the author, but He is the controller of sin; so that sinful actions, which are sinful because they are against nature, are judged and controlled, and assigned to their proper place and condition, in order that they may not bring discord and disgrace on universal nature. This being the case, and as the judgments of God and the movements of man's will contain the hidden reason why the same prosperous circumstances which some make a right use of are the ruin of others, and the same afflictions under which some give way are profitable to others, and since the whole mortal life of man upon earth is a trial,142 who can tell whether it may be good or bad in any particular case-in time of peace, to reign or to serve, or to be at ease or to die-or in time of war, to command or to fight, or to conquer or to be killed? At the same time, it remains true, that whatever is good is so by the divine blessing, and whatever is bad is so by the divine judgment.

79. Let no one, then, be so daring as to make rash charges against men, not to say against God. If the service of the ministers of the Old Testament, who were also heralds of the New, consisted in putting sinners to death, and that of the ministers of the New Testament, who are also interpreters of the Old, in being put to death by sinners, the service in both cases is rendered to one God, who, varying the lesson to suit the times, teaches both that temporal blessings are to be sought from Him, and that they are to be forsaken for Him, and that temporal distress is both sent by Him and should be endured for Him. There was, therefore, no cruelty in the command, or in the action of Moses. when, in his holy jealousy for his people, whom he wished to be subject to the one true God, on learning that they had fallen away to the worship of an idol made by their own hands, he impressed their minds at the time with a wholesome fear, and gave them a warning for the future, by using the sword in the punishment of a few, whose just punishment God, against whom they had sinned, appointed in the depth of His secret judgment to be immediately inflicted. That Moses acted as he did, not in cruelty, but in great love, may be seen from the words in which he prayed for the sins of the people: "If Thou wilt forgive their sin, forgive it; and if not, blot me out of Thy book."143 The pious inquirer who compares the slaughter with the prayer will find in this the clearest evidence of the awful nature of the injury done to the soul by prostitution to the images of devils, since such love is roused to such anger. We see the same in the apostle, who, not in cruelty, but in love, delivered a man up to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit might be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.144 Others, too, he delivered up, that they might learn not to blaspheme.145 In the apocryphal books of the Manichaeans there is a collection of fables, published by some unknown authors under the name of the apostles. The books would no doubt have been sanctioned by the Church at the time of their publication, if holy and learned men then in life, and competent to determine the matter, had thought the contents to be true. One of the stories is, that the Apostle Thomas was once at a marriage feast in a country where he was unknown, when one of the servants struck him, and that he forthwith by his curse brought a terrible punishment on this man. For when he went out to the fountain to provide water for the guests, a lion fell on him and killed him, and the hand with which he had given a slight blow to the apostle was torn off, in fulfillment of the imprecation, and brought by a dog to the table at which the apostle was reclining. What could be more cruel than this? And yet, if I mistake not, the story goes on to say, that the apostle made up for the cruelty by obtaining for the man the blessing of pardon in the next world; so that, while the people of this strange country learned to fear the apostle as being so dear to God, the man's eternal welfare was secured in exchange for the loss of this mortal life. It matters not whether the story is true or false. At any rate, the Manichaeans, who regard as genuine and authentic books which the canon of the Church rejects, must allow, as shown in the story, that the virtue of patience, which the Lord enjoins when He says, "If any one smite thee on the right cheek, turn to him thy left also," may be in the inward disposition, though it is not exhibited in bodily action or in words. For when the apostle was struck, instead of turning his other side to the man, or telling him to repeat the blow, he prayed to God to pardon his assailant in the next world, but not to leave the injury unpunished at the time. Inwardly he preserved a kindly feeling, while outwardly he wished the man to be punished as an example. As the Manichaeans believe this, rightly or wrongly, they may also believe that such was the intention of Moses, the servant of God, when he cut down with the sword the makers and worshippers of the idol; for his own words show that he so entreated for pardon for their sin of idolatry as to ask to be blotted out of God's book if his prayer was not heard. There is no comparison between a stranger being struck with the hand, and the dishonor done to God by forsaking Him for an idol, when He had brought the people out of the bondage of Egypt, had led them through the sea, and had covered with the waters the enemy pursuing them. Nor, as regards the punishment, is there any comparison between being killed with the sword and being torn in pieces by wild beasts. For judges in administering the law condemn to exposure to wild beasts worse criminals than are condemned to be put to death by the sword.

80. Another of Faustus' malicious and impious charges which has to be answered, is about the Lord's saying to the prophet Hosea, "Take unto thee a wife of whoredoms and children of whoredoms."146 As regards this passage, the impure mind of our adversaries is so blinded that they do not understand the plain words of the Lord in His gospel, when He says to the Jews, "The publicans and harlots shall go into the kingdom of heaven before you."147 There is nothing contrary to the mercifulness of truth, or inconsistent with Christian faith, in a harlot leaving fornication, and becoming a chaste wife. Indeed, nothing could be more unbecoming in one professing to be a prophet than not to believe that all the sins of the fallen woman were pardoned when she changed for the better. So when the prophet took the harlot as his wife, it was both good for the woman to have her life amended, and the action symbolized a truth of which we shall speak presently. But it is plain what offends the Manichaeans in this case; for their great anxiety is to prevent harlots from being with child. It would have pleased them better that the woman should continue a prostitute, so as not to bring their god into confinement, than that she should become the wife of one man, and have children.

81. As regards Solomon, it need only be said that the condemnation of his conduct in the faithful narrative of holy Scripture is much more serious than the childish vehemence of Faustus' attacks. The Scripture tells us with faithful accuracy both the good that Solomon had at first, and the evil actions by which he lost the good he began with; while Faustus, in his attacks, like a man closing his eyes, or with no eyes at all, seeks no guidance from the light, but is prompted only by violent animosity. To pious and discerning readers of the sacred Scriptures evidence of the chastity of the holy men who are said to have had several wives is found in this, that Solomon, who by his polygamy gratified his passions, instead of seeking for offspring, is expressly noted as chargeable with being a lover of women. This, as we are informed by the truth which accepts no man's person, led him down into the abyss of idolatry.

82. Having now gone over all the cases in which Faustus finds fault with the Old Testament, and having attended to the merit of each, either defending men of God against the calumnies of carnal heretics, or, where the men were at fault, showing the excellence and the majesty of Scripture, let us again take the cases in the order of Faustus' accusations, and see the meaning of the actions recorded, what they typify, and what they foretell. This we have already done in the case of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, of whom God said that He was their God, as if the God of universal nature were the God of none besides them; not honoring them with an unmeaning title, but because He, who could alone have a full and perfect knowledge, knew the sincere and remarkable charity of these men; and because these three patriarchs united formed a notable type of the future people of God, in not only having free children by free women, as by Sarah, and Rebecca, and Leah, and Rachel, but also bond children, as of this same Rebecca was born Esau, to whom it was said, "Thou shalt serve thy brother;"148 and in having by bond women not only bond children, as by Hagar, but also free children, as by Bilhah and Zilphah. Thus also in the people of God, those spiritually free not only have children born into the enjoyment of liberty, like those to whom it is said, "Be ye followers of me, as I also am of Christ"149 but they have also children born into guilty bondage, as Simon was born of Philip.150 Again, from carnal bondmen are born not only children of guilty bondage, who imitate them, but also children of happy liberty, to whom it is said, "What they say, do; but do not after their works."151 Whoever rightly observes the fulfillment of this type in the people of God, keeps the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, by continuing to the end in union with some, and in patient endurance of others. Of Lot, also, we have already spoken, and have shown what the Scripture mentions aspraiseworthy in him, and what as blameworthy and the meaning of the whole narrative.

83. We have next to consider the prophetic significance of the action of Judah in lying with his daughter-in-law. But, for the sake of those whose understanding is feeble, we shall begin with observing, that in sacred Scripture evil actions are sometimes prophetic not of evil, but of good. Divine providence preserves throughout its essential goodness, so that, as in the example given above, from adulterous intercourse a man-child is born, a good work of God from the evil of man, by the power of nature, and not due to the misconduct of the parents; so in the prophetic Scriptures, where both good and evil actions are recorded, the narrative being itself prophetic, foretells something good even by the record of what is evil, the credit being due not to the evil-doer, but to the writer. Judah, when, to gratify his sinful passion, he went in to Tamar, had no intention by his licentious conduct to typify anything connected with the salvation of men, any more than Judas, who betrayed the Lord, intended to produce any result connected with the salvation of men. So then if from the evil deed of Judas the Lord brought the good work of our redemption by His own passion, why should not His prophet, of whom He Himself says "He wrote of me," for the sake of instructing us make the evil action of Judah significant of something good? Under the guidance and inspiration of the Holy Spirit, the prophet has compiled a narrative of actions so as to make a continuous prophecy of the things he designed to foretell. In foretelling good, it is of no consequence whether the typical actions are good or bad. If it is written in red ink that the Ethiopians are black, or in Black ink that the Gauls are white, this circumstance does not affect the information which the writing conveys. No doubt, if it was a painting instead of a writing, the wrong color would be a fault; so when human actions are represented for example or for warning much depends on whether they are good or bad. But when actions are related or recorded as types, the merit or demerit of the agents is a matter of no importance, as long as there is a true typical relation between the action and the thing signified. So in the case of Caiaphas in the Gospel as regards his iniquitous and mischievous intention, and even as regards his words in the sense in which he used them, that a just man should be put to death unjustly, assuredly they were bad; and yet there was a good meaning in his words which he did not know of when he said, "It is expedient that one man should die for the people and that the whole nation perish not." So it is written of Him, "This he spake not of himself; but being the high priest, he prophesied that Jesus should die for the people."152 In the same way the action of Judah was bad as regards his sinful passion, but it typified a great good he knew nothing of. Of himself he did evil while it was not of himself that he typified good. These introductory remarks apply not only to Judah, but also to all the other cases where in the narrative of bad actions is contained a prophecy of good.

84. In Tamar, then, the daughter-in-law of Judah, we see the people of the kingdom of Judah, whose kings, answering to Tamar's husbands, were taken from this tribe. Tamar means bitterness; and the meaning is suitable, for this people gave the cup of gall to the Lord.153 The two sons of Judah represent two classes of kings who governed ill-those who did harm and those who did no good. One of these sons was evil or cruel before the Lord; the other spilled the seed on the ground that Tamar might not become a mother. There are only those two kinds of useless people in the world-the injurious and those who will not give the good they have but lose it or spill it on the ground. And as injury is worse than not doing good, the evil-doer is called the elder and the other the younger. Er, the name of the elder, means a preparer of skins, which were the coats given to our first parents when they were punished with expulsion from paradise.154 Onan, the name of the younger, means, their grief; that is, the grief of those to whom he does no good, wasting the good he has on the earth. The loss of life implied in the name of the elder is a greater evil than the want of help implied in the name of the younger. Both being killed by God typifies the removal of the kingdom from men of this character. The meaning of the third son of Judah not being joined to the woman, is that for a time the kings of Judah were not of that tribe. So this third son did not become the husband of Tamar; as Tamar represents the tribe of Judah, which continued to exist, although the people received no king from it. Hence the name of this son, Selom, means, his dismission. None of those types apply to the holy and righteous men who, like David, though they lived in those times, belong properly to the New Testament, which they served by their enlightened predictions. Again, in the time when Judah ceased to have a king of its own tribe, the elder Herod does not count as one of the kings typified by the husbands of Tamar; for he was a foreigner, and his union with the people was never consecrated with the holy oil. His was the power of a stranger, given him by the Romans and by Caesar. And it was the same with his sons, the tetrarchs, one of whom, called Herod, like his father, agreed with Pilate at the time of the Lord's passion.155 So plainly were these foreigners considered as distinct from the sacred monarchy of Judah, that the Jews themselves, when raging against Christ, exclaimed openly, "We have no king but Caesar."156 Nor was Caesar properly their king, except in the sense that all the world was subject to Rome. The Jews thus condemned themselves, only to express their rejection of Christ, and to flatter Caesar.

85. The time when the kingdom was removed from the tribe of Judah was the time appointed for the coming of Christ our Lord, the true Saviour, who should come not for harm, but for great good. Thus was it prophesied, "A prince shall not fail from Judah, nor a leader from his loins, till He come for whom it is reserved: He is the desire of nations."157 Not only the kingdom, but all government, of the Jews had ceased, and also, as prophesied by Daniel, the sacred anointing from which the name Christ or Anointed is derived. Then came He for whom it was reserved, the desire of nations; and the holy of holies was anointed with the oil of gladness above His fellows.158 Christ was born in the time of the elder Herod, and suffered in the time of Herod the tetrarch. He who thus came to the lost sheep of the house of Israel was typified by Judah when he went to shear his sheep in Thamna, which means, failing. For then the prince had failed from Judah, with all the government and anointing of the Jews, that He might come for whom it was reserved. Judah, we are told, came with his Adullamite shepherd, whose name was Iras; and Adullamite means, a testimony in water. So it was with this testimony that the Lord came, having indeed greater testimony than that of John;159 but for the sake of his feeble sheep he made use of the testimony in water. The name Iras, too, means, vision of my brother. So John saw his brother, a brother in the family of Abraham, and from the relationship of Mary and Elisabeth; and the same person he recognised as his Lord and his God, for, as he himself says, he received of His fullness.160 On account of this vision, among those born of woman, there has arisen no greater than he;161 because, of all who foretold Christ, he alone saw what many righteous men and prophets desired to see and saw not. He saluted Christ from the womb;162 he knew Him more certainly from seeing the dove; and therefore, as the Adullamite, he gave testimony by water. The Lord came to shear His sheep, in releasing them from painful burdens, as it is said in praise of the Church in the Song of Songs, that her teeth are like a flock of sheep after shearing.163

86. Next, we have Tamar changing her dress; for Tamar also means changing. Still, the name of bitterness must be retained-not that bitterness in which gall was given to the Lord, but that in which Peter wept bitterly.164 For Judah means confession; and bitterness is mingled with confession as a type of true repentance. It is this repentance which gives fruitfulness to the Church established among all nations. For "it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead, and that repentance and the remission of sins be preached among all nations in His name, beginning at Jerusalem."165 In the dress Tamar put on there is a confession of sins; and Tamar sitting in this dress at the gate of Aenan or Aenaim, which means fountain, is a type of the Church called from among the nations. She ran as a hart to the springs of water, to meet with the seed of Abraham; and there she is made fruitful by one who knows her not, as it is foretold, "A people whom I have not known shall serve me."166 Tamar received under her disguise a ring, a bracelet, a staff; she is sealed in her calling, adorned in her justification, raised in her glorification. For "whom He predestinated, them He also called: and whom He called, them He also justified: and whom He justified, them He also glorified."167 This was while she was still disguised, as I have said; and in the same state she conceives, and becomes fruitful in holiness. Also the kid promised is sent to her as to a harlot. The kid represents rebuke for sin, and it is sent by the Adullamite already mentioned, who, as it were, uses the reproachful words, "O generation of vipers!"168 But this rebuke for sin does not reach her, for she has been changed by the bitterness of confession. Afterwards, by exhibiting the pledges of the ring and bracelet and staff, she prevails over the Jews, in their hasty judgment of her, who are now represented by Judah himself; as at this day we hear the Jews saying that we are not the people of Christ, and have not the seed of Abraham. But when we exhibit the sure tokens of our calling and justification and glorification, they will immediately be confounded, and will acknowledge that we are justified rather than they. I should enter into this more particularly, taking, as it were, each limb and joint separately, as the Lord might enable me, were it not that such minute inquiry is prevented by the necessity of bringing this work to a close, for it is already longer than is desirable.

87. As regards the prophetic significance of David's sin, a single word must suffice. The names occurring in the narrative show what it typifies. David means, strong of hand, or desirable; and what can be stronger than the Lion of the tribe of Judah, who has conquered the world, or more desirable than He of whom the prophet says, "The desire of all nations shall come?"169 Bersabee means, well of satisfaction, or seventh well: either of these interpretations will suit our purpose. So, in the Song of Songs, the spouse, who is the Church, is called a well of living water;170 or again, the number seven represents the Holy Spirit, as in the number of days in Pentecost, when the Holy Spirit came from heaven. We learn also from the book of Tobit, that Pentecost was the feast of seven weeks.171 To forty-nine, which is seven times seven, one is added to denote unity. To this effect is the saying of the apostle: "Bearing with one another in love, endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace."172 The Church becomes a well of satisfaction by this gift of the Spirit, the number seven denoting its spirituality; for it is in her a fountain of living water springing up unto everlasting life, and he who has it shall never thirst.173 Uriah, Bersabee's husband, must, from the meaning of his name, be understood as representing the devil. It is in union to the devil that all are bound whom the grace of God sets free, that the Church without spot or wrinkle may be married to her true Saviour. Uriah means, my light of God; and Hittite means, cut off, referring either to his not abiding in the truth, when he was cut off on account of his pride from the celestial light which he had of God, or to his transforming himself into an angel of light, because after losing his real strength by his fall, he still dares to say, My light is of God. The literal David, then, was guilty of a heinous crime, which God by the prophet condemned in the rebuke addressed to David, and which David atoned for by his repentance. On the other hand, He who is the desire of all nations loved the Church when washing herself on the roof, that is, when cleansing herself from the pollution of the world, and in spiritual contemplation mounting above her house of clay, and trampling upon it; and after commencing an acquaintance, He puts to death the devil, whom He first entirely removes from her, and joins her to Himself in perpetual union. While we hate the sin, we must not overlook the prophetical significance; and while we love, as is His due, that David who in His mercy has freed us from the devil, we may also love the David who by the humility of his repentance healed the wound made by his transgression.

88. Little need be said of Solomon, who is spoken of in Holy Scripture in terms of the strongest disapproval and condemnation, while nothing is said of his repentance and restoration to the divine favor. Nor can I find in his lamentable fall even a symbolical connection with anything good. Perhaps the strange women he lusted after may be thought to represent the Churches chosen from among the Gentiles. This idea might have been admissible, if the women had left their gods for Solomon's sake to worship his God. But as he for their sakes offended his God and worshipped their gods, it seems impossible to think of any good meaning. Doubtless, something is typified, but it is something bad, as in the case already explained of Lot's wife and daughters. We see in Solomon a notable pre-eminence and a notable fall. Now, this good and evil which we see in him at different periods, first good and then evil, are in our day found together in the Church. What is good in Solomon represents, I think, the good members of the Church; and what was bad in him represents the bad members. Both are in one man, as the bad and the good are in the chaff and grain of one floor, or in the tares and wheat of one field. A closer inquiry into what is said of Solomon in Scripture might disclose, either to me or to others of greater learning and greater worth, some more probable interpretation. But as we are now engaged on a different subject, we must not allow this matter to break the connection of our discourse.

89. As regards the prophet Hosea, it is unnecessary for me to explain the meaning of the command, or of the prophet's conduct, when God said to him, "Go and take unto thee a wife of whoredoms and produce children of whoredoms," for the Scripture itself informs us of the origin and purpose of this direction. It proceeds thus: "For the land hath committed great whoredom, departing from the Lord. So he went and took Gomer the daughter of Diblaim; which conceived, and bare him a son. And the Lord said unto him, Call his name Jezreel; for yet a little while, and I will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Judah, and will cause to cease the kingdom of the house of Israel. And it shall come to pass at that day, that I will break the bow of Israel in the valley of Jezreel. And she conceived again, and bare a daughter. And God said unto him, Call her name No-mercy: for I will no more have mercy upon the house of Israel; but I will utterly take them away. But I will have mercy upon the house of Judah, and will save them by the Lord their God, and will not save them by bow, nor by sword, nor by battle, by horses, nor by horsemen. Now when she had weaned No-mercy, she conceived, and bare a son. Then said God, Call his name Not-my-people: for ye are not my people, and I will not be your God. Yet the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, which cannot be measured for multitude; and it shall come to pass that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people, there it shall be said unto them, Ye are the sons of the living God. Then shall the children of Israel and the children of Judah be gathered together, and appoint themselves one head, and they shall come up out of the land: for great shall be the day of Jezreel. Say ye unto your brethren, My people; and to your sister, She hath found mercy."174 Since the typical meaning of the command and of the prophet's conduct is thus explained in the same book by the Lord Himself, and since the writings of the apostles declare the fulfillment of this prophecy in the preaching of the New Testament, every one must accept the explanation thus given of the command and of the action of the prophet as the true explanation. Thus it is said by the Apostle Paul, "That He might make known the riches of His glory on the vessels of mercy, which He had afore prepared unto glory, even us, whom He hath called, not of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles. As He saith also in Hosea, I will call them my people, which were not my people; and her beloved, which was not beloved. And it shall come to pass, that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people, there shall they be called the children of the living God."175 Here Paul applies the prophecy to the Gentiles. So also Peter, writing to the Gentiles, without naming the prophet, borrows his expressions when he says, "But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people; that ye might show forth the praises of Him who has called you out of darkness into His marvellous light; which in time past were not a people, but are now the people of God: which had not obtained mercy, but now have obtained mercy."176 From this it is plain that the words of the prophet, "And the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, which cannot be measured for multitude," and the words immediately following, "And it shall be that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people, there they shall be called the children of the living God," do not apply to that Israel which is after the flesh, but to that of which the apostle says to the Gentiles, "Ye therefore are the seed of Abraham, and heirs according to the promise."177 But, as many Jews who were of the Israel after the flesh have believed, and will yet believe; for of these were the apostles, and all the thousands in Jerusalem of the company of the apostles, as also the churches of which Paul speaks, when he says to the Galatians, "I was unknown by face to the churches of Judaea which were in Christ;"178 and again, he explains the passage in the Psalms, where the Lord is called the cornerstone,179 as referring to His uniting in Himself the two walls of circumcision and uncircumcision, "that He might make in Himself of twain one new man, so making peace; and that He might reconcile both unto God in one body by the cross, having slain the enmity thereby: and that He might come and preach peace to them that are far off, and to them that are nigh," that is, to the Gentiles and to the Jews; "for He is our peace, who hath made of both one;"180 to the same purpose we find the prophet speaking of the Jews as the children of Judah, and of the Gentiles as children of Israel, where he says, "The children of Judah and the children of Israel shall be gathered together, and shall make to themselves one head, and shall go up from the land." Therefore, to speak against a prophecy thus confirmed by actual events, is to speak against the writings of the apostles as well as those of the prophets; and not only to speak against writings, but to impugn in the most reckless manner the evidence clear as noonday of established facts. In the case of the narrative of Judah, it is perhaps not so easy to recognize, under the disguise of the woman called Tamar, the harlot representing the Church gathered from among the corruption of Gentile superstition; but here, where Scripture explains itself, and where the explanation is confirmed by the writings of the apostles, instead of dwelling longer on this, we may proceed at once to inquire into the meaning of the very things to which Faustus objects in Moses the servant of God.

90. Moses killing the Egyptian in defending one of his brethren reminds us naturally of the destruction of the devil, our assailant in this land of strangers, by our defender the Lord Christ. And as Moses hid the dead body in the sand, even so the devil, though slain, remains concealed in those who are not firmly settled. The Lord, we know, builds the Church on a rock; and those who hear His word and do it, He compares to a wise man who builds his house upon a rock, and who does not yield or give way before temptation; and those who hear and do not, He compares to a foolish man who builds on the sand, and when his house is tried its ruin is great.181

91. Of the prophetic significance of the spoiling of the Egyptians, which was done by Moses at the command of the Lord his God, who commands nothing but what is most just, I remember to have set down what occurred to me at the time in my book entitled On Christian Doctrine;182 to the effect that the gold and silver and garments of the Egyptians typified certain branches of learning which may be profitably learned or taught among the Gentiles. This may be the true explanation; or we may suppose that the vessels of gold and silver represent the precious souls, and the garments the bodies, of those from among the Gentiles who join themselves to the people of God, that along with them they may be freed from the Egypt of this world. Whatever the true interpretation may be, the pious student of the Scriptures will feel certain that in the command, in the action, and in the narrative there is a purpose and a symbolic meaning.

92. It would take too long to go through all the wars of Moses. It is enough to refer to what has already been said, as sufficient for the purpose in this reply to Faustus of the prophetic and symbolic character of the war with Amalek.183 There is also the charge of cruelty made against Moses by the enemies of Scriptures, or by those who have never read anything. Faustus does not make any specific charge, but speaks of Moses as commanding and doing many cruel things. But, knowing the things they are in the habit of bringing forward and of misrepresenting, I have already taken a particular case and have defended it, so that any Manichaeans who are willing to be corrected, and all other ignorant and irreligious people, may see that there is no ground for their accusations. We must now inquire into the prophetic significance of the command, that many of those who, while Moses was absent, made an idol for themselves should be slain without regard to relationship. It is easy to see that the slaughter of these men represents the warfare against the evil principles which led the people into the same idolatry. Against such evil we are commanded to wage war in the words of the psalm, "Be ye angry and sin not.184 And a similar command is given by the apostle, when he says, "Mortify your members which are on earth fornication, uncleanness, luxury, evil concupiscence, and covetousness, which is idolatry."185

93. It requires closer examination to see the meaning of the first action of Moses in burning the calf in fire, and grinding it to powder, and sprinkling it in the water for the people to drink. The tables given to him, written with the finger of God, that is, by the agency of the Holy Spirit, he may have broken, because he judged the people unworthy of having them read to them; and he may have burned the calf, and ground it, and scattered it so as to be carried away by the water, in order to let nothing of it remain among the people. But why should he have made them drink it? Every one must feel anxious to discover the typical significance of this action. Pursuing the inquiry, we may find that in the calf there was an embodiment of the devil, as there is in men of all nations who have the devil as their head or leader in their impious rites. The calf is gold, because there is a semblance of wisdom in the institution of idolatrous worship. Of this the apostle says, "Knowing God, they glorified Him not as God, nor were thankful; but they became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened. Professing themselves to be wise they became foolish, and changed the glory of the incorruptible God into the likeness of corruptible man, and of birds, and of four-footed beasts, and of creeping things."186 From this so-called wisdom came the golden calf, which was one of the forms of idolatry among the chief men and professed sages of Egypt. The calf, then, represents every body or society of Gentile idolaters. This impious society the Lord Christ burns with that fire of which He says in the Gospel, "I am come to send fire on the earth;"187 for, as there is nothing hid from His heat,188 when the Gentiles believe in Him they lose the form of the devil in the fire of divine influence. Then all the body is ground, that is, after the dissolution of the combination in the membership of iniquity comes humiliation under the word of truth. Then the dust is sprinkled in the water, that the Israelites, that is, the preachers of the gospel, may in baptism admit those formerly idolaters into their own body, that is, the body of Christ. To Peter, who was one of those Israelites, it was said of the Gentiles, "Kill, and eat."189 To kill and eat is much the same as to grind and drink. So this calf, by the fire of zeal, and the keen penetration of the word, and the water of baptism, was swallowed up by the people, instead of their being swallowed up by it.

94. Thus, when the very passages on which the heretics found their objections to the Scriptures are studied and examined, the more obscure they are the more wonderful are the secrets which we discover in reply to our questions; so that the mouths of blasphemers are completely stopped, and the evidence of the truth so stifles them that they cannot even utter a sound. The unhappy men who will not receive into their hearts the sweetness of the truth must feel its force as a gag in their mouths. All those passages speak of Christ. The head now ascended into heaven along with the body still suffering on earth is the full development of the whole purpose of the authors of Scripture, which is well called Sacred Scripture. Every part of the narrative in the prophetical books should be viewed as having a figurative meaning, except what serves merely as a framework for the literal or figurative predictions of this king and of his people. For as in harps and other musical instruments the musical sound does not come from all parts of the instrument, but from the strings, and the rest is only for fastening and stretching the strings so as to tune them, that when they are struck by the musician they may give a pleasant sound; so in these prophetical narratives the circumstances selected by the prophetic spirit either predict some future event, or if they have no voice of their own, they serve to connect together other significant utterances.

95. Should the heretics reject our exposition of those allegorical narratives, or even insist on understanding them only in a literal sense, to dispute about such a difference of understanding would be as useless as to dispute about a difference of taste. Only, the fact that the divine precepts have either a moral and religious character or a prophetic meaning must be believed, whether intelligently or not. Moreover, the figurative interpretations must all be in the interest of morality and religion. So, if the Manichaeans or any others disagree with our interpretation, or differ from us in method or in any particular opinion, suffice it that the character of the fathers whom God commends for their conduct and obedience to His precepts is vindicated on a principle which all but those inveterate in their hostility will acknowledge to be true; and that the purity and dignity of the Scriptures are maintained in reference to those passages which the enemies of the truth find fault with, where certain actions are either praised or blamed, or merely narrated for us to form a judgment of them.

96. In fact, nothing could have been devised more likely to instruct and benefit the pious reader of sacred Scripture than that, besides describing praiseworthy characters as examples, and blameworthy characters as warnings, it should also narrate cases where good men have gone back and fallen into evil, whether they are restored to the right path or continue irreclaimable; and also where bad men have changed, and have attained to goodness, whether they persevere in it or relapse into evil; in order that the righteous may be not lifted up in the pride of security, nor the wicked hardened in despair of cure. And even those passages in Scripture which contain no examples or warnings are either required for connection, so as to pass on to essential matters, or, from their very appearance of superfluity, indicate the presence of some secret symbolical meaning. For in the books we speak of, so far from there being a want or a scarcity of prophetical announcements, such announcements are numerous and distinct; and now that the fulfillment has actually taken place, the testimony thus borne to the divine authority of the books is irresistibly strong, so that it is mere madness to suppose that there can be any useless or unmeaning passages in books to which all classes of men and of minds do homage, and which themselves predict what we see thus actually coming to pass.

97. If, then, any one reading of the action of David, of which he repented when the Lord rebuked and threatened him, find in the narrative an encouragement to sin, is Scripture to be blamed for this? Is not the man's own guilt in proportion to the abuse which he makes for his own injury or destruction of what was written for his recovery and release? David is set forth as a great example of repentance, because men who fall into sin either proudly disregard the cure of repentance, or lose themselves in despair of obtaining salvation or of meriting pardon. The example is for the benefit of the sick, not for the injury of those in health. If madmen destroy themselves, or if evil-doers destroy others, with surgical instruments, it is not the fault of surgery.

98. Even supposing that our fathers the patriarchs and prophets, of whose devout and religious habits so good a report is given in that Scripture which every one who knows it, and has not lost entirely the use of his reason, must admit to have been provided by God for the salvation of men, were as lustful and cruel as the Manichaeans falsely and fanatically allege, they might still be shown to be superior not only to those whom the Manichaeans call the Elect, but also to their god himself. Is there in the licentious intercourse of man with woman anything so bad as the self-abasement of unclouded light by mixture with darkness? Here, is a man prompted by avarice and greed to pass off his wife as his sister and sell her to her lover; but worse still and more shocking, that one should disguise his own nature to gratify criminal passion, and submit gratuitously to pollution and degradation. Why, even one who knowingly lies with his own daughters is not equally criminal with one who lets his members share in the defilement of all sensuality as gross as this, or grosser. And is not the Manichaean god a partaker in the contamination of the most atrocious acts of uncleanness? Again, if it were true, as Faustus says, that Jacob went from one to another of his four wives, not desiring offspring, but resembling a he-goat in licentiousness, he would still not be sunk so low as your god, who must not only have shared in this degradation, from his being confined in the bodies of Jacob and his wives so as to be mixed up with all their movements, but also, in union with this very he-goat of Faustus' coarse comparison, must have endured all the pains of animal appetite, incurring fresh defilement at every step, as partaking in the passion of the male, the conception of the female, and the birth of the kid. And, in the same way, supposing Judah to have been guilty not only of fornication, but of incest, a share in the heats and impurities of this incestuous passion would also belong to your god. David repented of his sin in loving the wife of another, and in ordering the death of her husband; but when will your god repent of giving up his members to the wanton passion of the male and female chiefs of the race of darkness, and of putting to death not the husband of his mistress, but his own children, whom he confines in the members of the very demons who were his own lovers? Even if David had not repented, nor been thus restored to righteousness, he would still have been better than your god. David may have been defiled by this one act, or to the extent to which one man is capable of such defilement; but your god suffers the pollution of his members in all such actions by whomsoever committed. The prophet Hosea, too, is accused by Faustus: and, supposing him to have taken the harlot to wife because he had a criminal affection for her, if he is licentious and she a prostitute, their souls, according to your own assertion, are parts and members of your god and of his nature. In plain language, the harlot herself must be your god. You cannot pretend that your god is not confined in the contaminated body, or that he is only present, while preserving entire the purity of his own nature; and you acknowledge that the members of your god are so defiled as to require a special purification. This harlot, then, for whom you venture to find fault with the man of God, even if she had not been changed for the better by becoming a chaste wife, would still have been your god; at least you must admit her soul to have been a part, however small, of your god. But one single harlot is not so bad as your god, for he on account of his mixture with the race of darkness shares in every act of prostitution; and wherever such impurities are perpetrated, he goes through the corresponding experiences of abandonment, of release, and of confinement, and this from generation to generation, till this most corrupt part reaches its final state in the mass of darkness, like an irreclaimable harlot. Such are the evils and such the shameful abominations which your god could not ward off from his members, and to which he was brought irresistibly by his merciless enemy; for only by the sacrifice of his own subjects, or rather his own parts, could he effect the destruction of his formidable assailant. Surely, there was nothing so bad as this in killing an Egyptian so as to preserve uninjured a fellow-countryman. Yet Faustus finds fault with this most absurdly, while with amazing infatuation he overlooks the case of his own god. Would it not have been better for him to have carried off the gold and silver vessels of the Egyptians, than to let his members be carried off by the race of darkness? And yet the worshippers of this unfortunate god find fault with the servant of our God for carrying on wars, in which he with his followers were always victorious, so that, under the leadership of Moses, the children of Israel carried captive their enemies, men and women, as your god would have done too, if he had been able. You profess to accuse Moses of doing wrong, while in fact you envy his success. There was no cruelty in punishing with the sword those who had sinned grievously against God. Indeed, Moses entreated pardon for this sin, even offering to bear himself in their stead the divine anger. But even had he been cruel instead of compassionate, he would still have been better than your god. For if any of his followers had been sent to break the force of the enemy and had been taken captive, he would never, if victorious, have condemned him when he had done no wrong, but acted in obedience to orders. And yet this is what your god is to do with the part of himself which is to be fastened in the mass of darkness, because it obeyed orders, and advanced at the risk of its own life in defence of his kingdom against the body of the enemy. But, says the Manichaean, this part, after mixture and combination with evil during the course of ages, has not been obedient. But why? If the obedience was voluntary, the guilt is real, and the punishment just. But from this it would follow that there is no nature opposed to sin; otherwise it would not sin voluntarily; and so the whole system of Manichaeism falls at once. If, again, this part suffers from the power of this enemy against whom it was sent, and is subdued by a force it was unable to resist, the punishment is unjust, and flagrantly cruel. The god who is defended on the plea of necessity is a fit object of worship to those who refuse to worship the one true God. Still, it must be allowed that, however debasing the worship of this god may be, the worshippers are so far better than their deity, that they have an existence, while he is nothing more than a fabulous invention. Proceed we now to the rest of Faustus' vagaries.190 1: Gen. xvi. 2-4.

Reply to Faustus the Manichaean - Book 23

Book XXIII.

Book XXIII.

Faustus recurs to the genealogical difficulty and insists that even according to Matthew Jesus was not Son of God until His baptism. Augustin sets forth the Catholic view of the relation of the divine and the human in the person of Christ.

1. Faustus said: On one occasion, when addressing a large audience, I was asked by one of the crowd, Do you believe that Jesus was born of Mary? I replied, Which Jesus do you mean? for in the Hebrew it is the name of several people. One was the son of Nun, the follower of Moses;1 another was the son of Josedech the high priest;2 again, another is spoken of as the son of David;3 and another is the Son of God.4 Of which of these do you ask whether I believe him to have been born of Mary? His answer was, The Son of God, of course. On what evidence, said I, oral or written, am I to believe this? He replied, On the authority of Matthew. What, said I, did Matthew write? He replied, "The book of the generation of Jesus Christ, the son of David, the son of Abraham "(Matt. i. 1). Then said I, I was afraid you were going to say, The book of the generation of Jesus Christ, the Son of God; and I was prepared to correct you. Now that you have quoted the verse accurately, you must nevertheless be advised to pay attention to the words. Matthew does not profess to give an account of the generation of the Son of God, but of the son of David.

2. I will, for the present, suppose that this person was right in saying that the son of David was born of Mary. It still remains true, that in this whole passage of the generation no mention is made of the Son of God till we come to the baptism; so that it is an injurious misrepresentation on your part to speak of this writer as making the Son of God the inmate of a womb. The writer, indeed, seems to cry out against such an idea, and in the very title of his book to clear himself of such blasphemy, asserting that the person whose birth he describes is the son of David, not the Son of God. And if you attend to the writer's meaning and purpose, you will see that what he wishes us to believe of Jesus the Son of God is not so much that He was born of Mary, as that He became the Son of God by baptism at the river Jordan. He tells us that the person of whom he spoke at the outset as the son of David was baptized by John, and became the Son of God on this particular occasion, when about thirty years old, according to Luke, when also the voice was heard saying to Him, "Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten Thee."5 It appears from this, that what was born, as is supposed,of Mary thirty years before, was not the Son of God, but what was afterwards made so by baptism at Jordan, that is, the new man, the same as in us when we were converted from Gentile error, and believe in God. This doctrine may or may not agree with what you call the Catholic faith; at all events, it is what Matthew says, if Matthew is the real author. The words, Thou art my Son, this day I have begotten Thee, or, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased, do not occur in connection with the story of Mary's motherhood, but with the putting away of sin at Jordan. This is what is written; and if you believe this doctrine, you must be called a Matthaean, for you will no longer be a Catholic. The Catholic doctrine is well known; and it is as unlike Matthew's representations as it is unlike the truth. In the words of your creed, you declare that you believe in Jesus Christ, the Son of God, who was born of the Virgin Mary. According to you, therefore, the Son of God comes from Mary; according to Matthew, from the Jordan; while we believe Him to come from God. Thus the doctrine of Matthew, if we are right in assigning the authorship to him, is as different from yours as from ours; only we acknowledge that he is more cautious than you in ascribing the being born of a woman to the son of David, and not to the Son of God. As for you, your only alternative is to deny that those statements were made, as they appear to be, by Matthew, or to allow that you have abandoned the faith of the apostles.

3. For our part, while no one can alter our conviction that the Son of God comes from God, we might indulge a credulous disposition, to the extent of admitting the fiction, that Jesus became the Son of God at Jordan, but not that the Son of God was born of a woman. Then, again, the son said to have been born of Mary cannot properly be called the son of David, unless it is ascertained that he was begotten by Joseph. You say he was not, and therefore you must allow him not to have been the son of David, even though he were the son of Mary. The genealogy proceeds in the line of Hebrew fathers from Abraham to David, and from David to Joseph; and as we are told that Joseph was not the real father of Jesus, Jesus cannot be said to be the son of David. To begin with calling Jesus the son of David, and then to go on to tell of his being born of Mary before the consummation of her marriage with Joseph, is pure madness. And if the son of Mary cannot be called the son of David, on account of his not being the son of Joseph, still less can the name be given to the Son of God.

4. Moreover, the Virgin herself appears to have belonged not to the tribe of Judah, to which the Jewish kings belonged, and which all agree was David's tribe, but to the priestly tribe of Levi. This appears from the fact that the Virgin's father Joachim was a priest; and his name does not occur in the genealogy. How, then, can Mary be brought within the pale of relationship to David, when she has neither father nor husband belonging to it? Consequently, Mary's son cannot possibly be the son of David, unless you can bring the mother into some connection with Joseph, so as to be either his wife or his daughter.

5. Augustin replied: The Catholic, which is also the apostolic, doctrine, is, that our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ is both the Son of God in His divine nature, and the Son of David after the flesh. This we prove from the writings of the evangelists and apostles, so that no one can reject our proofs without also rejecting these writings. Faustus' plan is to represent some one as saying a few words, without bringing forward any evidence in answer to Faustus' fertile sophistry. But with all his ingenuity, the proofs I have to give will leave Faustus no reply, but that these passages are spurious interpolations in the sacred record,-a reply which serves as a means of escaping, or of trying to escape, the force of the plainest statements in Holy Scripture. We have already in this treatise sufficiently exposed the irrational absurdity, as well as the daring profanity, of such criticism; and not to exceed all limits, we must avoid repetition. It cannot be necessary that we should bring together all the passages scattered throughout Scripture, which show, in answer to Faustus, that in the books of the highest and most sacred authority He who is called the only-begotten Son of God, even God with God, is also called the Son of David, on account of His taking the form of a servant from the Virgin Mary, the wife of Joseph. To instance only Matthew, since Faustus' argument refers to this Gospel, as the whole book cannot be quoted here, let whoever choose read it, and see how Matthew carries on to the passion and the resurrection the narrative of Him whom He calls the Son of David in the introduction to the genealogy. Of this same Son of David he speaks as being conceived and born of the Virgin Mary by the Holy Ghost. He also applies to this the declaration of the prophet, "Behold, a virgin shall conceive, and shall bear a son, and they shall call His name Emmanuel, which is being interpreted, God with us."6 Again, He who was called, even from the Virgin's womb, God-with-us, is said to have heard, when He was baptized by John, a voice from heaven, saying, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased."7 Will Faustus say that to be called God is less than to be called the Son of God? He seems to think so, for he tries to prove that because this voice came from heaven at the time of the baptism, therefore, according to Matthew, He must then have become the Son of God; whereas the same evangelist, in a previous passage, quotes the sacred announcement made by the prophet, in which the child horn of the Virgin is called God-with-us.

6. It is remarkable how, amid his wild irrelevancies, this wretched trifler loses no available opportunity of darkening the declarations of Scripture by the fabulous creations of his own fancy. Thus he says of Abraham, that when he took his handmaid to wife he disbelieved God's promise that he should have a child by Sarah; whereas, in fact, this promise had not at that time been given. Then he accuses Abraham of falsehood in calling Sarah his sister, not having read what may be learned on the authority of Scripture about the family of Sarah. Abraham's son Isaac also he accuses of falsely calling his wife his sister, though a distinct account is given of her family. Then he accuses Jacob of there being a daily quarrel among his four wives, which should be the first to appropriate him on his return from the field, while nothing of this is said in Scripture. And this is the man who pretends to hate the writers of the sacred books for their falsehood, and who has the effrontery so to misrepresent even the gospel record, though its authority is admitted by all as possessing the most abundant confirmation, as to try to make it appear, not indeed that Matthew himself,-for in that case he would have been forced to yield to apostolic authority,-but that some one under the name of Matthew, has written about Christ what he refuses to believe, and attempts to refute with a contumelious ingenuity!

7. The voice from heaven at the Jordan should be compared with the voice heard on the Mount.8 In neither case do the words, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased," imply that He was not the Son of God before; for He who from the Virgin's womb took the form of a servant "was in the form of God, and thought it no robbery to be equal with God."9 And the same Apostle Paul himself says distinctly elsewhere," "But in the fullness of time, God sent His Son, made of a woman, made under the law;"10 that is, a woman in the Hebrew sense, not a wife, but one of the female sex. The Son of God is both Lord of David in His divine nature, and Son of David as being of the seed of David after the flesh. And if it were not profitable for us to believe this, the same apostle would not have made it so prominent as he does, when he says to Timothy, "Remember that Christ Jesus, of the seed of David, rose from the dead, according to my gospel."11 And he carefully enjoins believers to regard as accursed whoever preaches another gospel contrary to this.

8. This assailant of the holy Gospel need find no difficulty in the fact that Christ is called the Son of David, though He was born of a virgin, and though Joseph was not His real father; while the genealogy is brought down by the evangelist Matthew, not to Mary, but to Joseph. First of all, the husband, as the man, is the more honorable; and Joseph was Mary's husband, though she did not live with him, for Matthew himself mentions that she was called Joseph's wife by the angel; as it is also from Matthew that we learn that Mary conceived not by Joseph, but by the Holy Spirit. But if this, instead of being a true narrative written by Matthew the apostle, was a false narrative written by some one else under his name, is it likely that he would have contradicted himself in such an apparent manner, and in passages so immediately connected, as to speak of the Son of David as born of Mary without conjugal intercourse, and then, in giving His genealogy, to bring it down to the very man with whom the Virgin is expressly said not to have had intercourse, unless he had some reason for doing so? Even supposing there were two writers, one calling Christ the Son of David, and giving an account of Christ's progenitors from David down to Joseph; while the other does not call Christ the Son of David, and says that He was born of the Virgin Mary without intercourse with any man; those statements are not irreconcilable, so as to prove that one or both writers must be false. It will appear on reflection that both accounts might be true; for Joseph might be called the husband of Mary, though she was his wife only in affection, and in the intercourse of the mind, which is more intimate than that of the body. In this way it might be proper that the husband of the virgin-mother of Christ should have a place in the list of Christ's ancestors. It might also be the case that some of David's blood flowed in Mary herself, so that the flesh of Christ, although produced from a virgin, still owed its origin to David's seed. But as, in fact, both statements are made by one and the same writer, who informs us both that Joseph was the husband of Mary and that the mother of Christ was a virgin, and that Christ was of the seed of David, and that Joseph is in the list of Christ's progenitors in the line of David, those who prefer the authority of the sacred Gospel to that of heretical fiction must conclude that Mary was not unconnected with the family of David, and that she was properly called the wife of Joseph, because being a woman she was in spiritual alliance with him, though there was no bodily connection. Joseph, too, it is plain, could not be omitted in the genealogy; for, from the superiority of his sex, such an omission would be equivalent to a denial of his relation to the woman with whom he was inwardly united; and believers in Christ are taught not to think carnal connection the chief thing in marriage, as if without this they could not be man and wife, but to imitate in Christian wedlock as closely as possible the parents of Christ, that so they may have the more intimate union with the members of Christ.

9. We believe that Mary, as well as Joseph, was of the family of David, because we believe the Scriptures, which assert both that Christ was of the seed of David after the flesh, and that His mother was the Virgin Mary, He having no human father. Therefore, whoever denies the relationship of Mary to David, evidently opposes the pre-eminent authority of these passages of Scripture; and to maintain this opposition he must bring evidence in support of his statement from writings acknowledged by the Church as canonical and catholic, not from any writings he pleases. In the matters of which we are now treating, only the canonical writings have any weight with us; for they only are received and acknowledged by the Church spread over all the world, which is itself a fulfillment of the prophecies regarding it contained in these writings. Accordingly, I am not bound to admit the uncanonical account of Mary's birth which Faustus adopts, that her father was a priest of the tribe of Levi, of the name of Joachim. But even were I to admit this account, I should still contend that Joachim must have in some way belonged to the family of David, and had somehow been adopted from the tribe of Judah into that of Levi; or if not he, one of his ancestors; or, at least, that while born in the tribe of Levi, he had still some relation to the line of David; as Faustus himself acknowledges that Mary, though belonging to the tribe of Levi, could be given to a husband of the tribe of Judah; and he expressly says that if Mary were Joseph's daughter, the name Son of David would be applicable to Christ. In this way, by the marriage of Joseph's daughter in the tribe of Levi, her son, though born in the tribe of Levi, might not improperly be called the Son of David. And so, if the mother of that Joachim, who in the passage quoted by Faustus is called the father of Mary, married in the tribe of Levi while she belonged to the tribe of Judah and to the family of David, there would thus be a sufficient reason for speaking of Joachim and Mary and Mary's son as belonging to the seed of David. If I felt obliged to pay any regard to the apocryphal scripture in which Joachim is called the father of Mary, I should adopt some such explanation as the above, rather than admit any falsehood in the Gospel, where it is written both that Jesus Christ, the Son of God, and our Saviour, was of the seed of David after the flesh, and that He was born of the Virgin Mary. It is enough for us that the enemies of these Scriptures, which record these truths and which we believe, cannot prove against them any charge of falsehood.

10. Faustus cannot pretend then I am unable to prove that Mary was of the family of David, as I have shown him unable to prove that she was not. I produce the strongest evidence from Scriptures of established authority, which declare that Christ was of the seed of David, and that He was born without a father of the Virgin Mary. Faustus expresses what he considers a most becoming indignation against impropriety when he says, It is an injurious misrepresentation of the writer to make him speak of the Son of God as the inmate of a womb. Of course, the Catholic doctrine which teaches that Christ the Son of God was born in the flesh of a virgin, does not make the Son of God the inmate of her womb in the sense of having no existence beyond it, as if He had abandoned the government of heaven and earth, or as if He had left the presence of the Father. The mistake is with the Manichaeans, whose understanding is so incapable of forming a conception of anything except what is material, that they cannot comprehend how the Word of God, who is the virtue and wisdom of God, while remaining in Himself and with the Father, and while governing the universe, reaches from end to end in strength, and sweetly orders all things.12 In the faultless procedure of this adorable providence, He appointed for Himself an earthly mother; and to free His servants from the bondage of corruption He took in this mother the form of a servant, that is, a mortal body; and this body which He took He showed openly, and when it had been exposed, even to suffering and death, He raised it again from the dead, and built again the temple which had been destroyed. You who shrink from this doctrine as blasphemous, make the members of your god to be confined not in a virgin's womb, but in the wombs of all female animals, from elephants down to flies. Perhaps you think the less of the true Christ, because the Word is said so to have become incarnate in the Virgin's womb as to provide a temple for Himself in human nature, while His own nature continued unaltered in its integrity; and, on the other hand, you think the more of your god, because in the bonds and pollution of his confinement in flesh, in the part which is to be made fast to the mass of darkness, he seeks for help to no purpose, or is even rendered powerless to ask for help.

Book XXIV.

Book XXIV.

Faustus explains the Manichaean denial that man was made by God as applying to the fleshly man not to the spiritual. Augustin elucidates the Apostle Paul's contrasts between flesh and spirit so as to exclude the Manichaean view.

1. Faustus said: We are asked the reason But we do not assert that man is in no sense for our denial that man is made by God. made by God; we only ask in what sense, and when, and how. For, according to the apostle, there are two men, one of whom he calls sometimes the outer man, generally the earthy, sometimes, too, the old man: the other he calls the inner or heavenly or new man.1 The question is, Which of these is made by God? For there are likewise two times of our nativity; one when nature brought us forth into this light, binding us in the bonds of flesh; and the other, when the truth regenerated us on our conversion from error and our entrance into the faith. It is this second birth of which Jesus speaks in the Gospel, when He says, "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God."2 Nicodemus, not knowing what Christ meant, was at a loss, and inquired how this could be, for an old man could not enter into his mother's womb and be born a second time. Jesus said in reply, "Except a man be born of water and of the Holy Spirit, he cannot see the kingdom of God." Then He adds, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." Hence, as the birth in which our bodies originate is not the only birth, but there is another in which we are born again in spirit, an important question arises from this distinction as to which of those births it is in which God makes us. The manner of birth also is twofold. In the humiliating process of ordinary generation, we spring from the heat of animal passion; but when we are brought into the faith, we are formed under good instruction in honor and purity in Jesus Christ, by the Holy Spirit. For this reason, in all religion, and especially in the Christian religion, young children are invited to membership. This is hinted at in the words of His apostle: "My little children, of whom I travail in birth again until Christ be formed in you."3 The question, then, is not whether God makes man, but what man He makes, and when, and how. For if it is when we are fashioned in the womb that God forms us after His own image, which is the common belief of Gentiles and Jews, and which is also your belief, then God makes the old man, and produces us by means of sensual passion, which does not seem suitable to His divine nature. But if it is when we are converted and brought to a better life that we are formed by God, which is the general doctrine of Christ and His apostles, and which is also our doctrine, in this case God makes us new men, and produces us in honor and purity, which would agree perfectly with His sacred and adorable majesty. If you do not reject Paul's authority, we will prove to you from him what man God makes, and when, and how. He says to the Ephesians, "That ye put off according to your former conversation the old man, which is corrupt through deceitful lusts; and be renewed in the spirit of your mind; and put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and holiness of truth."4 This shows that in the creation of man after the image of God, it is another man that is spoken of, and another birth, and another manner of birth. The putting off and putting on of which he speaks, point to the time of the reception of the truth; and the assertion that the new man is created by God implies that the old man is created neither by God nor after God. And when he adds, that this new man is made in holiness and righteousness and truth, he thus points to another manner of birth of which this is the character, and which, as I have said, differs widely from the manner in which bodily generation is effected. And as he declares that only the former is of God, it follows that the latter is not. Again, writing to the Colossians, he uses words to the same effect: "Put off the old man with his deeds, and put on the new man, which is renewed in the knowledge of God according to the image of Him who created Him in you." Here he not only shows that it is the new man that God makes, but he declares the time and manner of the formation, for the words in the knowledge of God point to the time of believing. Then he adds, according to the image of Him who created him, to make it clear that the old man is not the image of God, nor formed by God. Moreover, the following words, "Where there is neither male nor female, Jew nor Greek, Barbarian nor Scythian,"5 show more plainly still that the birth by which we are made male and female, Greeks and Jews, Scythians and Barbarians, is not the birth in which God effects the formation of man; but that the birth with which God has to do is that in which we lose the difference of nation and sex and condition, and become one like Him who is one, that is, Christ. So the same apostle says again, "As many as have been baptized in Christ have put on Christ: there is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither male nor female, there is neither bond nor free; but all are one in Christ."6 Man, then, is made by God, not when from one he is divided into many, but when from many he becomes one. The division is in the first birth, or that of the body; union comes by the second, which is immaterial and divine. This affords sufficient ground for our opinion, that the birth of the body should be ascribed to nature, and the second birth to the Supernal Majesty. So the same apostle says again to the Corinthians, "I have begotten you in Christ Jesus by the gospel;"7 and, speaking of himself, to the Galatians, "When it pleased Him, who separated me from my mother's womb, to reveal His Son in me, that I might preach Him among the Gentiles, immediately I conferred not with flesh and blood."8 It is plain that everywhere he speaks of the second or spiritual birth as that in which we are made by God, as distinct from the indecency of the first birth, in which we are on a level with other animals as regards dignity and purity, as we are conceived in the maternal womb, and are formed, and brought forth. You may observe that in this matter the dispute between us is not so much about a question of doctrine as of interpretation. For you think that it is the old or outer or earthy man that is said to have been made by God; while we apply this to the heavenly man, giving the superiority to the inner or new man. And our opinion is not rash or groundless, for we have learned it from Christ and His apostles, who are proved to have been the first in the world who thus taught.

2. Augustin replied: The Apostle Paul certainly uses the expression the inner man for the spirit of the mind, and the outer man for the body and for this mortal life; but we nowhere find him making these two different men, but one, which is all made by God, both the inner and the outer. However, it is made in the image of God only as regards the inner, which, besides being immaterial, is rational, and is not possessed by the lower animals. God, then, did not make one man after His own image, and another man not after that image; but the one man, which includes both the inner and the outer, He made after His own image, not as regards the possession of a body and of mortal life, but as regards the rational mind with the power of knowing God, and with the superiority as compared with all irrational creatures which the possession of reason implies.

Faustus allows that the inner man is made by God, when, as he says, it is renewed in the knowledge of God after the image of Him that created him. I readily admit this on the apostle's authority. Why does not Faustus admit on the same authority that "God has placed the members every one in the body, as it has pleased Him"?9 Here we learn from the same apostle that God is the framer of the outer man too. Why does Faustus take only what he thinks to be in his own favor, while he leaves out or rejects what upsets the follies of the Manichaeans? Moreover, in treating of the earthy and the heavenly man, and making the distinction between the mortal and the immortal, between that which we are in Adam and that which we shall be in Christ, the apostle quotes the declaration of the law regarding the earthy or natural body, referring to the very book and the very passage where it is written that God made the earthy man too. Speaking of the manner in which the dead shall rise again, and of the body with which they shall come, after using the similitude of the seeds of corn, that they are sown bare grain, and that God gives them a body as it pleases Him, and to every seed his own body,-thus, by the way, overthrowing the error of the Manichaeans, who say that grains and plants, and all roots and shoots, are created by the race of darkness, and not by God, who, according to them, instead of exerting power in the production of these objects, is Himself subject to confinement in them,-he goes on, after this refutation of Manichaean impieties, to describe the different kinds of flesh. "All flesh," he says, "is not the same flesh." Then he speaks of celestial and terrestrial bodies, and then of the change of our body by which it will become spiritual and heavenly. "It is sown," he says, "in dishonor, it shall rise in glory; it is sown in weakness, it shall rise in power; it is sown a natural body, it shall rise a spiritual body." Then, in order to show the origin of the animal body, he says, "There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body; as it is written, The first man, Adam, was made a living soul."10 Now this is written in Genesis,11 where it is related how God made man, and animated the body which He had formed of the earth. By the old man the apostle simply means the old life, which is a life in sin, and is after the manner of Adam, of whom it is said, "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, in that all have sinned."12 Thus the whole of this man, both the inner and the outer part, has become old because of sin, and liable to the punishment of mortality. There is, however, a restoration of the inner man, when it is renewed after the image of its Creator, in the putting off of unrighteousness-that is, the old man, and putting on righteousness-that is, the new man. But when that which is sown a natural body shall rise a spiritual body, the outer man too shall attain the dignity of a celestial character; so that all that has been created may be created anew, and all that has been made be remade by the Creator and Maker Himself. This is briefly explained in the words: "The body is dead because of sin; but the spirit is life because of righteousness. But if the Spirit of Him who raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, He that raised up Christ from the dead will also quicken your mortal bodies by His Spirit dwelling in you."13 No one instructed in the Catholic doctrine but knows that it is in the body that some are male and some female, not in the spirit of the mind, in which we are renewed after the image of God. But elsewhere the apostle teaches that God is the Maker of both; for he says, "Neither is the woman without the man, nor the man without the woman, in the Lord; for as the woman is of the man, so is the man by the woman; but all things are of God."14 The only reply given to this, by the perverse stupidity of those who are alienated from the life of God by the ignorance which is in them, on account of the blindness of their heart, is, that whatever pleases them in the apostolic writings is true, and whatever displeases them is false. This is the insanity of the Manichaeans, who will be wise if they cease to be Manichaeans. As it is, if they are asked whether it is He that remakes and renews the inner man (which they acknowledge to be renewed after the image of God, and they themselves quote the passage in support of this; and, according to Faustus, God makes man when the inner man is renewed in the image of God), they will answer, yes. And if we then go on to ask when God made what He now renews, they must devise some subterfuge to prevent the exposure of their absurdities. For, according to them, the inner man is not formed or created or originated by God, but is part of His own substance sent against His enemies; and instead of becoming old by sin, it is through necessity captured and damaged by the enemy. Not to repeat all the nonsense they talk, the first man they speak of is not the man of the earth earthy that the apostle speaks of,15 but an invention proceeding from their own magazine of untruths. Faustus, though he chooses man as a subject for discussion, says not a word of this first man; for he is afraid that his opponents in the discussion might come to know something about him.

Reply to Faustus the Manichaean - Book 25

Book XXV.

Book XXV.

Faustus seeks to bring into ridicule the orthodox claim to believe in the infinity of God by caricaturing the anthropomorphic representations of the Old Testament. Augustin expresses his despair of being able to induce the Manichaeans to adopt right views of the infinitude of God so long as they continue to regard the soul and God as extended in space.

1. Faustus said: Is God finite or infinite? He must be finite unless you are mistaken in addressing Him as the God of Abraham and Isaac and Jacob; unless, indeed, the being thus addressed is different from the God you call infinite. In the case of the God of Abraham and Isaac and Jacob, the mark of circumcision, which separated these men from fellowship with other people, marked also the limit of God's power as extending only to them. And a being whose power is finite cannot himself be infinite. Moreover, in this address, you do not mention even the ancients before Abraham, such as Enoch, Noah, and Shem, and others like them, whom you allow to have been righteous though in uncircumcision; but because they lacked this distinguishing mark, you will not call God their God, but only of Abraham and his seed. Now, if God is one and infinite, what need of such careful particularity in addressing Him, as if it was not enough to name God, without adding whose God He is-Abraham's, namely, and Isaac's and Jacob's; as if Abraham were a landmark to steer by in your invocation, to escape shipwreck among a shoal of deities? The Jews, who are circumcised, may very properly address this deity, as having a reason for it, because they call God the God of circumcision, in contrast to the gods of uncircumcision. But why you should do the same, it is difficult to understand; for you do not pretend to have Abraham's sign, though you invoke his God. If we understand the matter rightly, the Jews and their God seem to have set marks upon one another for the purpose of recognition, that they might not lose each ether. So God gave them the disgusting mark of circumcision, that, in whatever land or among whatever people they might be, they might by being circumcised be known to be His. They again marked God by calling Him the God of their fathers, that, wherever He might be, though among a crowd of gods, He might, on hearing the name God of Abraham, God of Isaac, God of Jacob, know at once that He was addressed. So we often see, in a number of people of the same name, that no one answers till called by his surname. In the same way the shepherd or herdsman makes use of a brand to prevent his property being taken by others. In thus marking God by calling Him the God of Abraham and Isaac and Jacob, you show not only that He is finite, but also that you have no connection with Him, because you have not the mark of circumcision by which He recognizes His own. Therefore, if this is the God you worship, there can be no doubt of His being finite. But if you say that God is infinite, you must first of all give up this finite deity, and by altering your invocation, show your penitence for your past errors. We have thus proved God to be finite, taking you on your own ground. But to determine whether the supreme and true God is infinite or not, we need only refer to the opposition between good and evil. If evil does not exist, then certainly God is infinite; otherwise He must be finite. Evil, however, undoubtedly exists; therefore God is not infinite. It is where good stops that evil begins.

2. Augustin replied: No one that knows you would dream of asking you about the infinitude of God, or of discussing the matter with you. For, before there can be any degree of spirituality in any of your conceptions, you must first have your minds cleared by simple faith, and by some elementary knowledge, from the illusions of carnal and material ideas. This your our heresy prevents you from doing, for it invariably represents the body and the soul and God as extended in space, either finite or infinite, while the idea of space is applicable only to the body. As long as this is the case, it will be better for you to leave this matter alone; for you can teach no truth regarding it, any more than in other matters; and in this you are unfit for learning, as you might do in other things, if you were not proud and quarrelsome. For in such questions as how God can be finite, when no space can contain Him; how He can be infinite, when the Son knows Him perfectly; how He can be finite, and yet unbounded; how He can be infinite, and yet perfect; how He can be finite, who is without measure; how He can be infinite, who is the measure of all things-all carnal ideas go for nothing; and if the carnality is to be removed, it must first become ashamed of itself. Accordingly, your best way of ending the matter you have brought forward of God as finite or infinite, is to say no more about it till you cease going so far astray from Christ, who is the end of the law. Of the God of Abraham and Isaac and Jacob we have already said enough to show why He who is the true God of all creatures wished to be familiarly known by His people under this name. On circumcision, too, we have already spoken in several places in answer to ignorant reproaches. The Manichaeans would find nothing to ridicule in this sign if they would view it as appointed by God, to be an appropriate symbol of the putting off of the flesh. They ought thus to consider the rite with a Christian instead of a heretical mind; as it is written, "To the pure all things are pure." But, considering the truth of the following words, "To the unclean and unbelieving nothing is pure, but even their mind and conscience are defiled,"1 we must remind our witty opponents, that if circumcision is indecent, as they say it is, they should rather weep than laugh at it; for their god is exposed to restraint and contamination in conjunction both with the skin which is cut and with the blood which is shed.

Reply to Faustus the Manichaean - Book 26

Book XXVI.

Book XXVI.

Faustus insists that Jesus might have died though not born, by the exercise of divine power, yet he rejects birth and death alike. Augustin maintains that there are some things that even god cannot do, one of which is to die. He refutes the docetism of the Manichaeans.

1. Faustus said: You ask, If Jesus was not born, how did He die? Well this is a probability, such as one makes use of in want of proofs. We will, however, answer the question by examples taken from what you generally believe. If they are true, they will prove our case; if they are false, they will help you no more than they will us. You say then, How could Jesus die, if He were not man? In return, I ask you, How did Elias not die, though he was a man? Could a mortal encroach upon the limits of immortality, and could not Christ add to His immortality whatever experience of death was required? If Elias, contrary to nature, lives for ever, why not allow that Jesus, with no greater contrariety to nature, could remain in death for three days? Besides that, it is not only Elias, but Moses and Enoch you believe to be immortal, and to have been taken up with their bodies to heaven. Accordingly, if it is a good argument that Jesus was a man because He died, it is an equally good argument that Elias was not a man because he did not die. But as it is false that Elias was not a man, notwithstanding his supposed immortality, so it is false that Jesus was a man, though He is considered to have died. The truth is, if you will believe it, that the Hebrews were in a mistake regarding both the death of Jesus and the immortality of Elias. For it is equally untrue that Jesus died and that Elias did not die. But you believe whatever you please; and for the rest, you appeal to nature. And, allowing this appeal, nature is against both the death of the immortal and the immortality of the mortal. And if we refer to the power of effecting their purpose as possessed by God and by man, it seems more possible for Jesus to die than for Elias not to die; for the power of Jesus is greater than that of Elias. But if you exalt the weaker to heaven, though nature is against it, and, forgetting his condition as a mortal, endow him with eternal felicity, why should I not admit that Jesus could die if He pleased, even though I were to grant His death to have been real, and not a mere semblance? For, as from the outset of His taking the likeness of man He underwent in appearance all the experiences of humanity, it was quite consistent that He should complete the system by appearing to die.

2. Moreover, it is to be remembered that this reference to what nature grants as possible, should be made in connection with all the history of Jesus, and not only with His death. According to nature, it is impossible that a man blind from his birth should see the light; and yet Jesus appears to have performed a miracle of this kind, so that the Jews themselves exclaimed that from the beginning of the world it was not seen that one opened the eyes of a man born blind.1 So also healing a withered hand, giving the power of utterance and expression to those born dumb, restoring animation to the dead, with the recovery of their bodily frame after dissolution had begun, produce a feeling of amazement, and must seem utterly incredible in view of what is naturally possible and impossible. And yet, as Christians, we believe all the things to have been done by the same person; for we regard not the law of nature, but the powerful operation of God. There is a story, too, of Jesus having been cast from the brow of a hill, and having escaped unhurt. If, then, when thrown down from a height He did not die, simply because He chose not to die, why should He not have had the power to die when He pleased? We take this way of answering you because you have a fancy for discussion, and affect to use logical weapons not properly belonging to you. As regards our own belief, it is no more true that Jesus died than that Elias is immortal.

3. Augustin replied: As to Enoch and Elias and Moses, our belief is determined not by Faustus' suppositions, but by the declarations of Scripture, resting as they do on foundations of the strongest and surest evidence. People in error, as you are, are unfit to decide what is natural, and what contrary to nature. We admit that what is contrary to the ordinary course of human experience is commonly spoken of as contrary to nature. Thus the apostle uses the words, "If thou art cut out of the wild olive, and engrafted contrary to nature in the good olive."2 Contrary to nature is here used in the sense of contrary to human experience of the course of nature; as that a wild olive engrafted in a good olive should bring forth the fatness of the olive instead of wild berries. But God, the Author and Creator of all natures, does nothing contrary to nature; for whatever is done by Him who appoints all natural order and measure and proportion must be natural in every case. And man himself acts contrary to nature only when he sins; and then by punishment he is brought back to nature again. The natural order of justice requires either that sin should not be committed or that it should not go unpunished. In either case, the natural order is preserved, if not by the soul, at least by God. For sin pains the conscience, and brings grief on the mind of the sinner, by the loss of the light of justice, even should no physical sufferings follow, which are inflicted for correction, or are reserved for the incorrigible. There is, however, no impropriety in saying that God does a thing contrary to nature, when it is contrary to what we know of nature. For we give the name nature to the usual common course of nature; and whatever God does contrary to this, we call a prodigy, or a miracle. But against the supreme law of nature, which is beyond the knowledge both of the ungodly and of weak believers, God never acts, any more than He acts against Himself. As regards spiritual and rational beings, to which class the human soul belongs, the more they partake of this unchangeable law and light, the more clearly they see what is possible, and what impossible; and again, the greater their distance from it, the less their perception of the future, and the more frequent their surprise at strange occurrences.

4. Thus of what happened to Elias we are ignorant; but still we believe the truthful declarations of Scripture regarding him. Of one thing we are certain, that what God willed happened, and that except by God's will nothing can happen to any one. So, if I am told that it is possible that the flesh of a certain man shall be changed into a celestial body, I allow the possibility, but I cannot tell whether it will be done; and the reason of my ignorance is, that I am not acquainted with the will of God in the matter. That it will be done if it is God's will, is perfectly clear and indubitable. Again, if I am told that something would happen if God did not prevent it from happening, I reply confidently that what is to happen is the action of God, not the event which might otherwise have happened. For God knows His own future action, and therefore He knows also the effect of that action in preventing the happening of what would otherwise have happened; and, beyond all question, what God knows is more certain than what man thinks. Hence it is as impossible for what is future not to happen, as for what is past not to have happened; for it can never be God's will that anything should, in the same sense, be both true and false. Therefore all that is properly future cannot but happen; what does not happen never was future; even as all things which are properly in the past did indubitably take place.

5. Accordingly, to say, if God is almighty, let Him make what has been done to be undone, is in fact to say, if God is almighty, let Him make a thing to be in the same sense both true and false. God can put an end to the existence of anything, when the thing to be put an end to has a present existence; as when He puts an end by death to the existence of any one who has been brought into existence in birth; for in this case there is an actual existence which may be put a stop to. But when a thing does not exist, the existence cannot be put a stop to. Now, what is past no longer exists and whatever has an existence which can be put an end to cannot be past. What is truly past is no longer present; and the truth of its past existence is in our judgment, not in the thing itself which no longer exists. The proposition asserting anything to be past is true when the thing no longer exists. God cannot make such a proposition false, because He cannot contradict the truth. The truth in this case, or the true judgment, is first of all in our own mind, when we know and give expression to it. But should it disappear from our minds by our forgetting it, it would still remain as truth. It will always be true that the past thing which is no longer present had an existence; and the truth of its past existence after it has stopped is the same as the truth of its future existence before it began to be. This truth cannot be contradicted by God, in whom abides the supreme and unchangeable truth, and whose illumination is the source of all the truth to be found in any mind or understanding. Now God is not omnipotent in the sense of being able to die; nor does this inability prevent His being omnipotent. True omnipotence belongs to Him who truly exists, and who alone is the source of all existence, both spiritual and corporeal. The Creator makes what use He pleases of all His creatures; and His pleasure is in harmony with true and unchangeable justice, by which, as by His own nature, He, Himself unchangeable, brings to pass the changes of all changeable things according to the desert of their natures or of their actions. No one, therefore, would be so foolish as to deny that Elias being a creature of God could be changed either for the worse or for the better; or that by the will of the omnipotent God he could be changed in a manner unusual among men. So we can have no reason for doubting what on the high authority of Scripture is related of him, unless we limit the power of God to things which we are familiar with.

6. Faustus' argument is, If Elias who was a man could escape death, why might not Christ have the power of dying, since He was more than man? This is the same as to say, If human nature can be changed for the better, why should not the divine nature be changed for the worse?-a weak argument, seeing that human nature is changeable, while the divine nature is not. Such a method of inference would lead to the glaring absurdity, that if God can bestow eternal glory on man, He must also have the power of consigning Himself to eternal misery. Faustus will reply that his argument refers only to three days of death for God, as compared with eternal life for man. Well, if you understood the three days of death in the sense of the death of the flesh which God took as a part of our mortal nature, you would be quite correct; for the truth of the gospel makes known that the death of Christ for three days was for the eternal life of men. But in arguing that there is no impropriety in asserting a death of three days of the divine nature itself, without any assumption of mortality, because human nature can be endowed with immortality, you display the folly of one who knows neither God nor the gifts of God. And indeed, since you make part of your god to be fastened to the mass of darkness for ever, how can you escape the absurd conclusion already mentioned, that God consigns Himself to eternal misery,? You will then require to prove that part of light is light, while part of God is not God. To give you in a word, without argument, the true reason of our faith, as regards Elias having been caught up to heaven from the earth, though only a man, and as regards Christ being truly born of a virgin, and truly dying on the cross, our belief in both cases is grounded on the declaration of Holy Scripture,3 which it is piety to believe, and impiety to disbelieve. What is said of Elias you pretend to deny, for you will pretend anything. Regarding Christ, although even you do not go the length of saying that He could not die, though He could be born, still you deny His birth from a virgin, and assert His death on the cross to have been feigned, which is equivalent to denying it too, except as a mockery for the delusion of men; and you allow so much merely to obtain indulgence for your own falsehoods from the believers in these fictions.

7. The question which Faustus makes it appear that he is asked by a Catholic, If Jesus was not born, how could He die? could be asked only by one who overlooked the fact that Adam died, though he was not born. Who will venture to say that the Son of God could not, if He had pleased, have made for Himself a true human body in the same way as He did for Adam; for all things were made by Him?4 or who will deny that He who is the Almighty Son of the Almighty could, if He had chosen, have taken a body from a heavenly substance, or from air or vapor, and have so changed it into the precise character of a human body, as that He might have lived as a man, and have died in it? Or, once more, if He had chosen to take a body of none of the material substances which He had made, but to create for Himself from nothing real flesh, as all things were created by Him from nothing, none of us will oppose this by saying that He could not have done it. The reason of our believing Him to have been born of the Virgin Mary, is not that He could not otherwise have appeared among men in a true body, but because it is so written in the Scripture, which we must believe in order to be Christians, or to be saved. We believe, then, that Christ was born of the Virgin Mary, because it is so written in the Gospel; we believe that He died on the cross, because it is so written in the Gospel; we believe that both His birth and death were real, because the Gospel is no fiction. Why He chose to suffer all these things in a body taken from a woman is a matter known only to Himself. Perhaps He took this way of giving importance and honor to both the sexes which He had created, taking the form of a man, and being born of a woman; or there may have been some other reason, we cannot tell. But this may be confidently affirmed, that what took place was exactly as we are told in the Gospel narrative, and that what the wisdom of God determined upon was exactly what ought to have happened. We place the authority of the Gospel above all heretical discussions; and we admire the counsel of divine wisdom more than any counsel of any creature.

8. Faustus calls upon us to believe him, and says, The truth is, if you will believe it, that the Hebrews were in a mistake regarding both the death of Jesus and the immortality of Elias. And a little after he adds, As from the outset of His taking the likeness of man He underwent in appearance all the experiences of humanity, it was quite consistent that He should seal the dispensation by appearing to die. How can this infamous liar, who declares that Christ feigned death, expect to be believed? Did Christ utter falsehood when He said, "It behoves the Son of man to be killed, and to rise the third day?"5 And do you tell us to believe what you say, as if you utter no falsehoods? In that case, Peter was more truthful than Christ when he said to Him, "Be it far from Thee, Lord; this shall not be unto Thee;" for which it was said to him, "Get thee behind me, Satan."6 This rebuke was not lost upon Peter, for, after his correction and full preparation, he preached even to his own death the truth of the death of Christ. But if Peter deserved to be called Satan for thinking that Christ would not die, what should you be called, when you not only deny that Christ died, but assert that He reigned death? You give, as a reason for Christ's appearing to die, that He underwent in appearance all the experiences of humanity. But that He reigned all the experiences of humanity is only your opinion in opposition to the Gospel. In reality, when the evangelist says that Jesus slept,7 that He was hungry,8 that He was thirsty,9 that He was sorrowful,10 or glad, and so on,-these things are all true in the senseof not being feigned, but actual experiences; only that they were undergone, not from a mere natural necessity, but in the exercise of a controlling will, and of divine power. In the case of a man, anger, sorrow, sleeping, being hungry and thirst, are often involuntary; in Christ they were acts of His own will. So also men are born without any act of their own will, and suffer against their will; while Christ was born and suffered by His own will. Still, the things are true; and the accurate narrative of them is intended to instruct whoever believes in Christ's gospel in the truth, not to delude him with falsehoods.

Reply to Faustus the Manichaean - Book 27

Book XXVII.

Book XXVII.

Faustus warns against pressing too far the argument, that if Jesus was not born He cannot have suffered. Augustin accepts the birth and death alike on the testimony of the Gospel narrative, which is higher authority than the falsehood of Manichaeus.

1. Faustus said: If Jesus was not born, He cannot have suffered; but since He did suffer, He must have been born. I advise you not to have recourse to logical inference in these matters, or else your whole faith will be shaken. For, even according to you, Jesus was born miraculously of a virgin; which the argument from consequents to antecedents shows to be false. For your argument might thus be turned against you: If Jesus was born of a woman, He must have been begotten by a man; but He was not begotten by a man, therefore He was not born of a woman. If, as you believe, He could be born without being begotten, why could He not also suffer without being brought forth?

2. Augustin replied: The argument which you here reply to is one which could be used only by such ignorant people as you succeed in misleading, not by those who know enough to refute you. Jesus could both be born without being begotten and suffer without being brought forth. His being one and not the other was the effect of His own will. He chose to be born without being begotten, and not to suffer without being brought forth. And if you ask how I know that He was brought forth, and that He suffered, I read this in the faithful Gospel narrative. If I ask how you know what you state, you bring forward the authority of Manichaeus, and charge the Gospel with falsehood. Even if Manichaeus did not set forth falsehood as an excellence in Christ, I should not believe his statements. His praise of falsehood comes from nothing that he found in Christ, but from his own moral character.

Reply to Faustus the Manichaean - Book 28

Book XXVIII.

Book XXVIII.

Faustus recurs to the genealogy and insists upon examining it as regards its consistency with itself. Augustin takes his stand on scripture authority and maintains that Matthew's statements as to the birth of Christ must be accepted as final.

1. Faustus said: Christ, you say, could not have died, had He not been born. I reply, If He was born, He cannot have been God; or if He could both be God and be born, why could He not both be born and die? Plainly, arguments and necessary consequences are not applicable to those matters, where the question is of the account to be given of Jesus. The answer must be obtained from His own statements, or from the statements of His apostles regarding Him. The genealogy must be examined as regards its consistency with itself, instead of arguing from the supposition of Christ's death to the fact of His birth; for He might have suffered without having been born, or He might have been born, and yet never have suffered; for you yourselves acknowledge that with God nothing is impossible, which is inconsistent with the denial that Christ could have suffered without having been born.

2. Augustin replied: You are always answering arguments which no one uses, instead of our real arguments, which you cannot answer. No one says that Christ could not die if He had not been born; for Adam died though he had not been born. What we say is, Christ was born, because this is said not by this or that heretic, but in the holy Gospel; and He died, for this too is written, not in some heretical production, but in the holy Gospel. You set aside argument on the question of the true account to be given of Jesus, and refer to what He says of Himself, and what His apostles say of Him; and yet, when I begin to quote the Gospel of His apostle Matthew, where we have the whole narrative of Christ's birth, you forthwith deny that Matthew wrote the narrative, though this is affirmed by the continuous testimony of the whole Church, from the days of apostolic presidency to the bishops of our own time. What authority will you quote against this? Perhaps some book of Manichaeus, where it is denied that Jesus was born of a virgin. As, then, I believe your book to be the production of Manichaeus, since it has been kept and handed down among the disciples of Manichaeus, from the time when he lived to the present time, by a regular succession of your presidents, so I ask you to believe the book which I quote to have been written by Matthew, since it has been handed down from the days of Matthew in the Church, without any break in the connection between that time and the present. The question then is, whether we are to believe the statements of an apostle who was in the company of Christ while He was on earth, or of a man away in Persia, born long after Christ. But perhaps you will quote some other book bearing the name of an apostle known to have been chosen by Christ; and you will find there that Christ was not born of Mary. Since, then, one of the books must be false, the question in this case is, whether we are to yield our belief to a book acknowledged and approved as handed down from the beginning in the Church founded by Christ Himself, and maintained through the apostles and their successors in an unbroken connection all over the world to the present day; or to a book which this Church condemns as unknown, and which, moreover, is brought forward by men who prove their veracity by praising Christ for falsehood.

3. Here you will say, Examine the genealogy as given in the two Gospels, and see if it is consistent with itself. The answer to this has been given already.1 Your difficulty is how Joseph could have two fathers. But even if you could not have thought of the explanation, that one was his own father, and the other adopted, you should not have been so ready to put yourself in opposition to such high authority. Now that this explanation has been given you, I call upon you to acknowledge the truth of the Gospel, and above all to cease your mischievous and unreasonable attacks upon the truth.

4. Faustus most plausibly refers to what Jesus said of Himself. But how is this to be known except from the narratives of His disciples? And if we do not believe them when they tell us that Christ was born of a virgin, how shall we believe what they record as said by Christ of Himself? For, as regards any writing professing to come immediately from Christ Himself, if it were really His, how is it not read and acknowledged and regarded as of supreme authority in the Church, which, beginning with Christ Himself, and continued by His apostles, who were succeeded by the bishops, has been maintained and extended to our own day, and in which is found the fulfillment of many former predictions. while those concerning the last days are sure to be accomplished in the future? In regard to the appearance of such a writing, it would require to be considered from what quarter it issued. Supposing it to have issued from Christ Himself, those in immediate connection with Him might very well have received it, and have transmitted it to others. In this case, the authority of the writing would be fully established by the traditions of various communities, and of their presidents, as I have already said. Who, then, is so infatuated as in our day to believe that the Epistle of Christ issued by Manichaeus is genuine, or to disbelieve Matthew's narrative of Christ's words and actions? Or, if the question is of Matthew being the real author, who would not, in this also, believe what he finds in the Church, which has a distinct history in unbroken connection from the days of Matthew to the present time, rather than a Persian interloper, who comes more than two hundred years after, and wishes us to believe his account of Christ's words and actions rather than that of Matthew; whereas, even in the case of the Apostle Paul, who was called from heaven after the Lord's ascension, the Church would not have believed him, had there not been apostles in life with whom he might communicate, and compare his gospel with theirs, so as to be recognized as belonging to the same society? When it was ascertained that Paul preached what the apostles preached, and that he lived in fellowship and harmony with them, and when God's testimony was added by Paul's working miracles like those done by the apostles, his authority became so great, that his words are now received in the Church, as if, to use his own appropriate words, Christ were speaking in him.2 Manichaeus, on the other hand, thinks that the Church of Christ should believe what he says in opposition to the Scriptures, which are supported by such strong and continuous evidence, and in which the Church finds an emphatic injunction, that whoever preaches to her differently from what she has received must be anathema.3

5. Faustus tells us that he has good grounds for concluding that these Scriptures are unworthy of credit. And yet he speaks of not using arguments. But the argument too shall be refuted. The end of the whole argument is to bring the soul to believe that the reason of its misery in this world is, that it is the means of preventing God from being deprived of His kingdom, and that God's substance and nature is so exposed to change, corruption, injury, and contamination, that part of it is incurably defiled, and is consigned by Him self to eternal punishment in the mass of darkness, though, when it was in harmless union with Himself, and guilty of no crime, He knowingly sent it where it was to suffer defilement. This is the end of all your arguments and fictions; and would that there were an end of them as regards your heart and your lips, that you might sometime desist from believing and uttering those execrable blasphemies! But, says Faustus, I prove from the writings themselves that they cannot be in all points trustworthy, for they contradict one another. Why not say, then, that they are wholly untrustworthy, if their testimony is inconsistent and self-contradictory? But, says Faustus, I say what I think to be in accordance with truth. With what truth? The truth is only your own fiction, which begins with God's battle, goes on to His contamination, and ends with His damnation. No one, says Faustus, believes writings which contradict themselves. But if you think they do this, it is because you do not understand them; for your ignorance has been manifested in regard to the passages you have quoted in support of your opinion, and the same will appear in regard to any quotations you may still make. So there is no reason for our not believing these writings, supported as they are by such weighty testimony; and this is itself the best reason for pronouncing accursed those whose preaching differs from what is there written.

Reply to Faustus the Manichaean - Book 29

Book XXIX.

Book XXIX.

Faustus seeks to justify the docetism of the Manichaeans. Augustin insists that there is nothing disgraceful in being born.

1. Faustus said: If Christ was visible, and suffered without having been born, this was sorcery. This argument of yours may be turned against you, by replying that it was sorcery if He was conceived or brought forth without being begotten. It is not in accordance with the law of nature that a virgin should bring forth, and still less that she should still be a virgin after bringing forth. Why, then, do you refuse to admit that Christ, in a preternatural manner, suffered without submitting to the condition of birth? Believe me: in substance, both our beliefs are contrary to nature; but our belief is decent, and yours is not. We give an explanation of Christ's passion which is at least probable, while the only explanation you give of His birth is false. In fine, we hold that He suffered in appearance, and did not really die; you believe in an actual birth, and conception in the womb. If it is not so, you have only to acknowledge that the birth too was a delusion, and our whole dispute will be at an end. As to what you frequently allege, that Christ could not have appeared or spoken to men without having been born, it is absurd; for, as our teachers have shown, angels have often appeared and spoken to men.

2. Augustin replied: We do not say that to die without having been born is sorcery; for, as we have said already, this happened in the case of Adam. But, though it had never happened, who will venture to say that Christ could not, if He had so pleased, have come without taking His body from a virgin, and yet appearing in a true body to redeem us by a true death? However, it was better that He should be, as He actually was, born of a virgin, and, by His condescension, do honor to both sexes, for whose deliverance He was to die, by taking a man's body born of a woman. In this He testifies emphatically against you, and refutes your doctrine, which makes the sexes the work of the devil. What we call sorcery in your doctrine is your making Christ's passion and death to have been only in appearance, so that, by a spectral illusion, He seemed to die when He did not. Hence you must also make His resurrection spectral and illusory and false; for if there was no true death, there could not be a real resurrection. Hence also the marks which He showed to His doubting disciples must have been false; and Thomas was not assured by truth, but cheated by a lie, when he exclaimed, "My Lord, and my God."1 And yet you would have us believe that your tongue utters truth, though Christ's whole body was a falsehood. Our argument against you is, that the Christ you make is such that you cannot be His true disciples unless you too practise deceit. The fact that Christ's body was the only one born of a virgin does not prove that there was sorcery in His birth, any more than there is sorcery in its being the only body to rise again on the third day, never to die any more. Will you say that there was sorcery in all the Lord's miracles because they were unusual? They really happened, and their appearance, as seen by men, was true, and not an illusion; and when they are said to be contrary to nature, it is not that they oppose nature, but that they transcend the method of nature to which we are accustomed. May God keep the minds of His people who are still babes in Christ from being influenced by Faustus, when he recommends as a duty that we should acknowledge Christ's birth to have been illusory and not real, that so we may end our dispute! Nay, verily, rather let us continue to contend for the truth against them, than agree with them in falsehood.

3. But if we are to end the controversy by saying this, why do not our opponents themselves say it? While they assert the death of Christ to have been not real but feigned, why do they make out that He had no birth at all, not even of the same kind as His death? If they had so much regard for the authority of the evangelist as to oblige them to admit that Christ suffered, at least in appearance, it is the same authority which testifies to His birth. Two evangelists, indeed, give the story of the birth;2 but in all we read of Jesus having a mother.3 Perhaps Faustus was unwilling to make the birth an illusion, because the difference of the genealogies given in Matthew and Luke causes an apparent discrepancy. But, supposing a man ignorant, there are many things also relating to the passion of Christ in which he will think the evangelists disagree; suppose him instructed, he finds entire agreement. Can it be right to feign death, and wrong to feign birth? And yet Faustus will have us acknowledge the birth to be feigned, in order to put an end to the dispute. It will appear presently in our reply to another objection what we think to be the reason why Faustus will not admit of any birth, even a feigned one.

4. We deny that there is anything disgraceful in the bodies of saints. Some members, indeed, are called uncomely, because they have not so pleasing an appearance as those constantly in view.4 But attend to what the apostle says, when from the unity and harmony of the body he enjoins charity on the Church: "Much more those members of the body, which seem to be feeble, are necessary: and those members of the body, which we think to be less honorable, upon these we bestow more abundant honor; and our uncomely parts have more abundant comeliness. For our comely parts have no need: but God hath tempered the body together, having given more abundant honor to that part which lacked: that there should be no schism in the body."5 The licentious and intemperate use of those members is disgraceful, but not the members themselves; for they are preserved in purity not only by the unmarried, but also by wedded fathers and mothers of holy life, in whose case the natural appetite, as serving not lust, but an intelligent purpose in the production of children, is in no way disgraceful. Still more, in the holy Virgin Mary, who by faith conceived the body of Christ, there was nothing disgraceful in the members which served not for a common natural conception, but for a miraculous birth. In order that we might conceive Christ in sincere hearts, and, as it were, produce Him in confession, it was meet that His body should come from the substance of His mother without injury to her bodily purity. We cannot suppose that the mother of Christ suffered loss by His birth, or that the gift of productiveness displaced the grace of virginity. If these occurrences, which were real and no illusion, are new and strange, and contrary to the common course of nature, the reason is, that they are great, and amazing, and divine; and all the more on this account are they true, and firm, and sure. Angels, says Faustus, appeared and spoke without having been born. As if we held that Christ could not have appeared or spoken without having been born of a woman! He could, but He chose not; and what He chose was best. And that He chose to do what He did is plain, because He acted, not like your god, from necessity, but voluntarily. That He was born we know, because we put faith not in a heretic, but in Christ's gospel.

Reply to Faustus the Manichaean - Book 3

Book III.

Book III.

Faustus objects to the incarnation of God on the ground that the evangelists are at variance with each other, and that incarnation is unsuitable to deity. Augustin attempts to remove the critical and theological difficulties.

1. Faustus said: Do I believe in the incarnation? For my part, this is the very thing I long tried to persuade myself of, that God was born; but the discrepancy in the genealogies of Luke and Matthew stumbled me, as I knew not which to follow. For I thought it might happen that, from not being omniscient, I might take the true for false, and the false for true. So, in despair of settling this dispute, I betook myself to Mark and John, two authorities still, and evangelists as much as the others. I approved with good reason of the beginning of Mark and John, for they have nothing of David, orMary, or Joseph. John says, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God," meaning Christ. Mark says, "The gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God," as if correcting Matthew, who calls him the Son of David. Perhaps, however, the Jesus of Matthew is a different person from the Jesus of Mark. This is my reason for not believing in the birth of Christ.

Remove this difficulty, if you can, by harmonizing the accounts, and I am ready to yield. In any case, however, it is hardly consistent to believe that God, the God of Christians, was born from the womb.

2. Augustin replied: Had you read the Gospel with care, and inquired into those places where you found opposition, instead of rashly condemning them, you would have seen that the recognition of the authority of the evangelists by so many learned men all over the world, in spite of this most obvious discrepancy, proves that there is more in it than appears at first sight. Any one can see, as well as you, that the ancestors of Christ in Matthew and Luke are different; while Joseph appears in both, at the end in Matthew and at the beginning in Luke. Joseph, it is plain, might be called the father of Christ, on account of his being in a certain sense the husband of the mother of Christ; and so his name, as the male representative, appears at the beginning or end of the genealogies. Any one can see as well as you that Joseph has one father in Matthew and another in Luke, and so with the grandfather and with all the rest up to David. Did all the able and learned men, not many Latin writers certainly, but innumerable Greek, who have examined most attentively the sacred Scriptures, overlook this manifest difference? Of course they saw it. No one can help seeing it. But with a due regard to the high authority of Scripture, they believed that there was something here which would be given to those that ask, and denied to those that snarl; would be found by those that seek, and taken away from those that criticise; would be open to those that knock, and shut against those that contradict. They asked, sought, and knocked; they received, found, and entered in.

3. The whole question is how Joseph had two fathers. Supposing this possible, both genealogies may be correct. With two fathers, why not two grandfathers, and two great-grandfathers, and so on, up to David, who was the father both of Solomon, who is mentioned in Matthew's list, and of Nathan, who occurs in Luke? This is the difficulty with many people who think it impossible that two men should have one and the same son, forgetting the very obvious fact that a man may be called the son of the person who adopted him as well as of the person who begot him.

Adoption, we know, was familiar to the ancients; for even women adopted the children of other women, as Sarah adopted Ishmael, and Leah her handmaid's son, and Pharaoh's daughter Moses. Jacob, too, adopted his grandsons, the children of Joseph. Moreover, the word adoption is of great importance in the system of our faith, as is seen from the apostolic writings. For the Apostle Paul, speaking of the advantages of the Jews, says: "Whose are the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law whose are the fathers, and of whom, according to the flesh, Christ came, who is over all, God blessed for ever."1 And again: "We ourselves also groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption of the sons of God, even the redemption of the body."2 Again, elsewhere: "But in the fullness of time, God sent His Son, made of a woman, made under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons."3 These passages show clearly that adoption is a significant symbol. God has an only Son, whom He begot from His own substance, of whom it is said, "Being in the form of God, He thought it not robbery to be equal to God."4 Us He begot not of His own substance, for we belong to the creation which is not begotten, but made; but that He might make us the brothers of Christ, He adopted us. That act, then, by which God, when we were not born of Him, but created and formed, begot us by His word and grace, is called adoption. So John says, "He gave them power to become the sons of God."5

Since, therefore; the practice of adoption is common among our fathers, and in Scripture, is there not irrational profanity in the hasty condemnation of the evangelists as false because the genealogies are different, as if both could not be true, instead of considering calmly the simple fact that frequently in human life one man may have two fathers, one of whose flesh he is born, and another of whose will he is afterwards made a son by adoption? If the second is not rightly called father, neither are we right in saying, "Our Father which art in heaven," to Him of whose substance we were not born, but of whose grace and most merciful will we were adopted, according to apostolic doctrine, and truth most sure. For one is to us God, and Lord, and Father: God, for by Him we are created, though of human parents; Lord, for we are His subjects; Father, for by His adoption we are born again. Careful students of sacred Scripture easily saw, from a little consideration, how, in the different genealogies of the two evangelists, Joseph had two fathers, and consequently two lists of ancestors. You might have seen this too, if you had not been blinded by the love of contradiction. Other things far beyond your understanding have been discovered in the careful investigation of all parts of these narratives. The familiar occurrence of one man begetting a son and another adopting him, so that one man has two fathers, you might, in spite of Manichaean error, have thought of as an explanation, if you had not been reading in a hostile spirit.

4. But why Matthew begins with Abraham and descends to Joseph, while Luke begins with Joseph and ascends, not to Abraham, but to God, who made man, and, by giving a commandment, gave him power to become, by believing, a son of God; and why Matthew records the generations at the commencement of his book, Luke after the baptism of the Saviour by John; and what is the meaning of the number of the generations in Matthew, who divides them into three sections of fourteen each, though in the whole sum there appears to be one wanting; while in Luke the number of generations recorded after the baptism amount to seventy-seven, which number the Lord Himself enjoins in connection with the forgiveness of sins, saying, "Not only seven times, but seventy-seven times;" -these things you will never understand, unless either you are taught by some Catholic of superior stamp, who has studied the sacred Scriptures, and has made all the progress possible, or you yourselves turn from your error, and in a Christian spirit ask that you may receive, seek that you may find, and knock that it may be opened to you.

5. Since, then, this double fatherhood of nature and adoption removes the difficulty arising from the discrepancy of the genealogies, there is no occasion for Faustus to leave the two evangelists and betake himself to the other two, which would be a greater affront to those he betook himself to than to those he left. For the sacred writers do not desire to be favored at the expense of their brethren. For their joy is in union, and they are one in Christ; and if one says one thing, and another another, or one in one way and another in another, still they all speak truth, and in no way contradict one another; only let the reader be reverent and humble, not in an heretical spirit seeking occasion for strife, but with a believing heart desiring edification. Now, in this opinion that the evangelists give the ancestors of different fathers, as it is quite possible for a man to have two fathers, there is nothing inconsistent with truth. So the evangelists are harmonized, and you, by Faustus's promise are bound to yield at once.

6. You may perhaps be troubled by that additional remark which he makes: "In any case, however, it is hardly consistent to believe that God, the God of Christians, was born from the womb." As if we believed that the divine nature came from the womb of a woman. Have I not just quoted the testimony of the apostle, speaking of the Jews: "Whose are the fathers, and of whom, according to the flesh, Christ came, who is God over all, blessed for ever?" Christ, therefore, our Lord and Saviour, true Son of God in His divinity, and true son of man according to the flesh, not as He is God over all was born of a woman, but in that feeble nature which He took of us, that in it He might die for us, and heal it in us: not as in the form of God, in which He thought it not robbery to be equal to God, was He born of a woman, but in the form of a servant, in taking which He emptied Himself. He is therefore said to have emptied Himself because He took the form of a servant, not because He lost the form of God. For in the unchangeable possession of that nature by which in the form of God He is equal to the Father, He took our changeable nature, by which He might be born of a virgin. You, while you protest against putting the flesh of Christ in a virgin's womb, place the very divinity of God in the womb not only of human beings, but of dogs and swine. You refuse to believe that the flesh of Christ was conceived in the Virgin's womb, in which God was not found nor even changed; while you assert that in all men and beasts, in the seed of male and in the womb of female, in all conceptions on land or in water, an actual part of God and the divine nature is continually bound, and shut up, and contaminated, never to be wholly set free.6

Book XXX.

Book XXX.

Faustus repels the insinuation that the prophecy of Paul with reference to those that should forbid to marry, abstain from meats, etc., applies to the Manichaeans more than to the Catholic ascetics, who are held in the highest esteem in the Church. Augustin justifies this application of the prophecy, and shows the difference between Manichaean and Christian asceticism.

1. Faustus said: You apply to us the words of Paul: "Some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to lying spirits, and doctrines of devils; speaking lies in hypocrisy; having their consciences seared as with a hot iron; forbidding to marry, abstaining from meats, which God has created to be received with thanksgiving by believers."1 I refuse to admit that the apostle said this, unless you first acknowledge that Moses and the prophets taught doctrines of devils, and were the interpreters of a lying and malignant spirit; since they enjoin with great emphasis abstinence from swine's flesh and other meats, which they call unclean. This case must first be settled; and you must consider long and carefully how their teaching is to be viewed: whether they said these things from God, or from the devil. As regards these matters, either Moses and the prophets must be condemned along with us; or we must be acquitted along with them. You are unjust in condemning us, as you do now, as followers of the doctrine of devils, because we require the priestly class to abstain from animal food; for we limit the prohibition to the priesthood, while you hold that your prophets, and Moses himself, who forbade all classes of men to eat the flesh of swine, and hares, and conies, besides all varieties of cuttle-fish, and all fish wanting scales, said this not in a lying spirit, nor in the doctrine of devils, but from God, and in the Holy Spirit. Even supposing, then, that Paul said these words, you can convince me only by condemning Moses and the prophets; and so, though you will not do it for reason or truth, you will contradict Moses for the sake of your belly.

2. Besides, you have in your Book of Daniel the account of the three youths, which you will find it difficult to reconcile with the opinion that to abstain from meats is the doctrine of devils. For we are told that they abstained not only from what the law forbade, but even from what it allowed;2 and you are wont to praise them, and count them as martyrs; though they too followed the doctrine of devils, if this is to be taken as the apostle's opinion. And Daniel himself declares that he fasted for three weeks, not eating flesh or drinking wine, while he prayed for his people.3 How is it that he boasts of this doctrine of devils, and glories in the falsehood of a lying spirit?

3. Again, what are we to think of you, or of the better class of Christians among you, some of whom abstain from swine's flesh, some from the flesh of quadrupeds, and some from all animal food, while all the Church admires them for it, and regards them with profound veneration, as only not gods? You obstinately refuse to consider that if the words quoted from the apostle are true and genuine, these people too are misled by doctrines of devils. And there is another observance which no one will venture to explain away or to deny, for it is known to all, and is practised yearly with particular attention in the congregation of Catholics all over the world-I mean the fast of forty days, in the due observance of which a man must abstain from all the things which, according to this verse, were created by God that we might receive them, while at the same time he calls this abstinence a doctrine of devils. So, my dear friends, shall we say that you too, during this fast, while celebrating the mysteries of Christ's passion, live after the manner of devils, and are deluded by a seducing spirit, and speak lies in hypocrisy, and have your conscience seared with a hot iron? If this does not apply to you, neither does it apply to us. What is to be thought of this verse, or its author; or to whom does it apply, since it agrees neither with the traditions of the Old Testament, nor with the institutions of the New? As regards the New Testament, the proof is from your own practice; and though the Old requires abstinence only from certain things, still it requires abstinence. On the other hand, this opinion of yours makes all abstinence from animal food a doctrine of devils. If this is your belief, once more I say it, you must condemn Moses, and reject the prophets, and pass the same sentence on yourselves; for, as they always abstained from certain kinds of food, so you sometimes abstain from all food.

4. But if you think that in making a distinction in food, Moses and the prophets established a divine ordinance, and not a doctrine of devils; if Daniel in the Holy Spirit observed a fast of three weeks; if the youths Ananias, Azarias, and Mishael, under divine guidance, chose to live on cabbage or pulse; if, again, those among you who abstain, do it not at the instigation of devils; if your abstinence from wine and flesh for forty days is not superstitious, but by divine command,-consider, I beseech you, if it is not perfect madness to suppose these words to be Paul's that abstinence from food and forbidding to marry are doctrines of devils. Paul cannot have said that to dedicate virgins to Christ is a doctrine of devils. But you read the words, and inconsiderately, as usual, apply them to us, without seeing that this stamps your virgins too as led away by the doctrine of devils, and that you are the functionaries of the devils in your constant endeavors to induce virgins to make this profession, so that in all your churches the virgins nearly outnumber the married women. Why do you still adhere to such practises? Why do you ensnare wretched young women, if it is the will of devils, and not of Christ, that they fulfill? But, first of all, I wish to know if making virgins is, in all cases, the doctrine of devils, or only the prohibition of marriage. If it is the prohibition, it does not apply to us, for we too hold it equally foolish to prevent one who wishes, as it is criminal and impious to force one who has some reluctance. But if you say that to encourage the proposal, and not to resist such a desire, is all the doctrine of devils, to say nothing of the consequence as regards you, the apostle himself will be thus brought into danger, if he must be considered as having introduced the doctrines of devils into Iconium, when Thecla, after having been betrothed, was by his discourse inflamed with the desire of perpetual virginity.4 And what shall we say of Jesus, the Master Himself, and the source of all sanctity, who is the unwedded spouse of the virgins who make this profession, and who, when specifying in the Gospel three kinds of eunuchs, natural, artificial, and voluntary, gives the palm to those who have "made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven,"5 meaning the youths of both sexes who have extirpated from their hearts the desire of marriage, and who in the Church act as eunuchs of the King's palace? Is this also the doctrine of devils? Are those words, too, spoken in a seducing spirit? And if Paul and Christ are proved to be priests of devils, is not their spirit the same that speaks in God? I do not mention the other apostles of our Lord, Peter, Andrew, Thomas, and the example of celibacy, the blessed John, who in various ways commended to young men and maidens the excellence of this profession, leaving to us, and to you too, the form for making virgins. I do not mention them, because you do not admit them into the canon, and so you will not scruple impiously to impute to them doctrines of devils. But will you say the same of Christ, or of the Apostle Paul, who, we know, everywhere expressed the same preference for unmarried women to the married, and gave an example of it in the case of the saintly Thecla? But if the doctrine preached by Paul to Thecla, and which the other apostles also preached, was not the doctrine of devils, how can we believe that Paul left on record his opinion, that the very exhortation to sanctity is the injunction and the doctrine of devils? To make virgins simply by exhortation, without forbidding to marry, is not peculiar to you. That is our principle too; and he must be not only a fool, but a madman, who thinks that a private law can forbid what the public law allows. As regards marriage, therefore, we too encourage virgins to remain as they are when they are willing to do so; we do not make them virgins against their will. For we know the force of will and of natural appetite when opposed by public law; much more when the law is only private, and every one is at liberty to disobey it. If, then, it is no crime to make virgins in this manner, we are guiltless as well as you. If it is wrong to make virgins in any way, you are guilty as well as we. So that what you mean, or intend, by quoting this verse against us, it is impossible to say.

5. Augustin replied: Listen, and you shall hear what we mean and intend by quoting this verse against you, since you say that you do not know. It is not that you abstain from animal food; for, as you observe, our ancient fathers abstained from some kinds of food, not, however, as condemning them, but with a typical meaning, which you do not understand, and of which I have said already in this work all that appeared necessary. Besides, Christians, not heretics, but Catholics, in order to subdue the body, that the soul may be more humbled in prayer, abstain not only from animal food, but also from some vegetable productions, without, however, believing them to be unclean. A few do this always; and at certain seasons or days, as in Lent, almost all, more or less, according to the choice or ability of individuals. You, on the other hand, deny that the creature is good, and call it unclean, saying that animals are made by the devil of the worst impurities in the substance of evil and so you reject them with horror, as being the most cruel and loathsome places of confinement of your god. You, as a concession, allow your followers, as distinct from the priests, to eat animal food; as the apostle allows, in certain cases, not marriage in the general sense, but the indulgence of passion in marriage.6 It is only sin which is thus made allowance for. This is the feeling you have toward all animal food; you have learned it from your heresy, and you teach it to your followers. You make allowance for your followers, because, as I said before, they supply you with necessaries; but you grant them indulgence without saying that it is not sinful. For yourselves, you shun contact with this evil and impurity; and hence our reason for quoting this verse against you is found in the words of the apostle which follow those with which you end the quotation. Perhaps it was for this reason that you left out the words, and then say that you do not know what we mean or intend by the quotation; for it suited you better to omit the account of our intention than to express it. For, after speaking of abstaining from meats, which God has created to be received with thanksgiving by believers, the apostle goes on, "And by them who know the truth; for every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving: for it is sanctified by the word of God and prayer."7 This you deny; for your idea, and motive, and belief in abstaining from such food is, that they are not typically, but naturally, evil and impure. In this assuredly you blaspheme the Creator; and in this is the doctrine of devils. You need not be surprised that, so long before the event, this prediction regarding you was made by the Holy Spirit.

6. So, again, if your exhortations to virginity resembled the teaching of the apostle, "He who giveth in marriage doeth well, and he who giveth not in marriage doeth better;"8 if you taught that marriage is good, and virginity better, as the Church teaches which is truly Christ's Church, you would not have been described in the Spirit's prediction as forbidding to marry. What a man forbids he makes evil; but a good thing may be placed second to a better thing without being forbidden. Moreover, the only honorable kind of marriage, or marriage entered into for its proper and legitimate purpose, is precisely that you hate most. So, though you may not forbid sexual intercourse, you forbid marriage; for the peculiarity of marriage is, that it is not merely for the gratification of passion, but, as is written in the contract, for the procreation of children. And, though you allow many of your followers to retain their connection with you in spite of their refusal, or their inability, to obey you, you cannot deny that you make the prohibition. The prohibition is part of your false doctrine, while the toleration is only for the interests of the society. And here we see the reason, which I have delayed till now to mention, for your making not the birth but only the death of Christ reigned and illusory. Death being the separation of the soul, that is, of the nature of your god, from the body which belongs to his enemies, for it is the work of the devil, you uphold and approve of it; and thus, according to your creed, it was meet that Christ, though He did not die, should commend death by appearing to die. In birth, again, you believe your god to be bound instead of released; and so you will not allow that Christ was born even in this illusory fashion. You would have thought better of Mary had she ceased to be a virgin without being a mother, than as being a mother without ceasing to be a virgin. You see, then, that there is a great difference between exhorting to virginity as the better of two good things, and forbidding to marry by denouncing the true purpose of marriage; between abstaining from food as a symbolic observance, or for the mortification of the body, and abstaining from food which God has created for the reason that God did not create it. In one case, we have the doctrine of the prophets and apostles; in the other, the doctrine of lying devils.

Reply to Faustus the Manichaean - Book 31

Book XXXI.

Book XXXI. The scripture passage: "To the pure all things are pure, but to the impure and defiled is nothing pure; but even their mind and conscience are defiled," is discussed from both the Manichaean and the Catholic points of view, Faustus objecting to its application to his party and Augustin insisting on its application.

1. Faustus said: "To the pure all things are pure. But to the impure and defiled is nothing pure; but even their mind and conscience are defiled." As regards this verse, too, it is very doubtful whether, for your own sake, you should believe it to have been written by Paul. For it would follow that Moses and the prophets were not only influenced by devils in making so much in their laws of the distinctions in food, but also that they themselves were impure and defiled in their mind and conscience, so that the following words also might properly be applied to them: "They profess to know God, but in works deny Him."1 This is applicable to no one more than to Moses and the prophets, who are known to have lived very differently from what was becoming in men knowing God. Up to this time I have thought only of adulteries and frauds and murders as defiling the conscience of Moses and the prophets; but now, from what this verse says, it is plain that they were also defiled, because they looked upon something as defiled. How, then, can you persist in thinking that the vision of the divine majesty can have been bestowed on such men, when it is written that only the pure in heart can see God? Even supposing that they had been pure from unlawful crimes, this superstitious abstinence from certain kinds of food, if it defiles the mind, is enough to debar them from the sight of deity. Gone for ever, too, is the boast of Daniel, and of the three youths, who, till now that we are told that nothing is unclean, have been regarded among the Jews as persons of great purity and excellence of character, because, in observance of hereditary customs, they carefully avoided defiling themselves with Gentile food, especially that of sacrifices.2 Now it appears that they were defiled in mind and conscience most of all when they were closing their mouth against blood and idol-feasts.

2. But perhaps their ignorance may excuse them; for, as this Christian doctrine of all things being pure to the pure had not then appeared, they may have thought some things impure. But there can be no excuse for you in the face of Paul's announcement, that there is nothing which is not pure, and that abstinence from certain food is the doctrine of devils, and that those who think anything defiled are polluted in their mind, if you not only abstain, as we have said, but make a merit of it, and believe that you become more acceptable to Christ in proportion as you are more abstemious, or, according to this new doctrine, as your minds are defiled and your conscience polluted. It should also be observed that, while there are three religions in the world which, though in a very different manner, appoint chastity and abstinence as the means of purification of the mind, the religions, namely, of the Jews, the Gentiles, and the Christians, the opinion that everything is pure cannot have come from any one of the three. It is certainly not from Judaism, nor from Paganism, which also makes a distinction of food; the only difference being, that the Hebrew classification of animals does not harmonize with the Pagan. Then as to the Christian faith, if you think it peculiar to Christianity to consider nothing defiled, you must first of all confess that there are no Christians among you. For things offered to idols, and what dies of itself, to mention nothing else, are regarded by you all as great defilement. If, again, this is a Christian practice, on your part, the doctrine which is opposed to all abstinence from impurities cannot be traced to Christianity either. How, then, could Paul have said what is not in keeping with any religion? In fact, when the apostle from a Jew became a Christian, it was a change of customs more than of religion. As for the writer of this verse, there seems to be no religion which favors his opinion.

3. Be sure, then, whenever you discover anything else in Scripture to assail our faith with, to see, in the first place, that it is not against you, before you commence your attack on us. For instance, there is the passage you continually quote about Peter, that he once saw a vessel let down from heaven in which were all kinds of animals and serpents, and that, when he was surprised and astonished, a voice was heard, saying to him, Peter, kill and eat whatsoever thou seest in the vessel, and that he replied, Lord I will not touch what is common or unclean. On this the voice spoke again, What I have cleansed, call not unclean.3 This, indeed, seems to have an allegorical meaning, and not to refer to the absence of distinction in food. But as you choose to give it this meaning, you are bound to feed upon all wild animals, and scorpions, and snakes, and reptiles in general, in compliance with this vision of Peter's. In this way, you will show that you are really obedient to the voice which Peter is said to have heard. But you must never forget that you at the same time condemn Moses and the prophets, who considered many things polluted which, according to this utterance, God has sanctified.

4. Augustin replied: When the apostle says, "To the pure all things are pure," he refers to the natures which God had created,-as it is written by Moses in Genesis, "And God made all things; and behold they were very good,"4 -not to the typical meanings, according to which God, by the same Moses, distinguished the clean from the unclean. Of this we have already spoken at length more than once, and need not dwell on it here. It is clear that the apostle called those impure who, after the revelation of the New Testament, still advocated the observance of the shadows of things to come, as if without them the Gentiles could not obtain the salvation which is in Christ, because in this they were carnally minded; and he called them unbelieving, because they did not distinguish between the time of the law and the time of grace. To them, he says, nothing is pure, because they made an erroneous and sinful use both of what they received and of what they rejected; which is true of all unbelievers, but especially of you Manichaeans, for to you nothing whatever is pure. For, although you take great care to keep the food which you use separate from the contamination of flesh, still it is not pure to you, for the only creator of it you allow is the devil. And you hold, that, by eating it, you release your god, who suffers confinement and pollution in it. One would think you might consider yourselves pure, since your stomach is the proper place for purifying your god. But even your own bodies, in your opinion, are of the nature and handiwork of the race of darkness; while your souls are still affected by the pollution of your bodies. What, then, is pure to you? Not the things you eat; not the receptacle of your food; not yourselves, by whom it is purified. Thus you see against whom the words of the apostle are directed; he expresses himself so as to include all who are impure and unbelieving, but first and chiefly to condemn you. To the pure, therefore, all things are pure, in the nature in which they were created; but to the ancient Jewish people all things were not pure in their typical significance; and, as regards bodily health, or the customs of society, all things are not suitable to us. But when things are in their proper places, and the order of nature is preserved, to the pure all things are pure; but to the impure and unbelieving, among whom you stand first, nothing is pure. You might make a wholesome application to yourselves of the following words of the apostle, if you desired a cure for your seared consciences. The words are: "Their very mind and conscience are defiled."

Reply to Faustus the Manichaean - Book 32

Book XXXII.

Book XXXII.

Faustus fails to understand why he should be required either to accept or reject the New Testament as a whole, while the Catholics accept or reject the various parts of the Old Testament at pleasure. Augustin denies that the Catholics treat the Old Testament arbitrarily, and explains their attitude towards it.

1. Faustus said: You say, that if we believe the Gospel, we must believe everything that is written in it. Why, then, since you believe the Old Testament, do you not believe all that is found in any part of it? Instead of that, you cull out only the prophecies telling of a future King of the Jews, for you suppose this to be Jesus, along with a few precepts of common morality, such as, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not commit adultery; and all the rest you pass over, thinking of the other things as Paul thought of the things which he held to be dung.1 Why, then, should it seem strange or singular in me that I select from the New Testament whatever is purest, and helpful for my salvation, while I set aside the interpolations of your predecessors, which impair its dignity and grace?

2. If there are parts of the Testament of the Father which we are not bound to observe (for you attribute the Jewish law to the Father, and it is well known that many things in it shock you, and make you ashamed, so that in heart you no longer regard it as free from corruption, though, as you believe, the Father Himself partly wrote it for you with His own finger while part was written by Moses, who was faithful and trustworthy), the Testament of the Son must be equally liable to corruption, and may equally well contain objectionable things; especially as it is allowed not to have been written by the Son Himself, nor by His apostles, but long after, by some unknown men, who, lest they should be suspected of writing of things they knew nothing of, gave to their books the names of the apostles, or of those who were thought to have followed the apostles, declaring the contents to be according to these originals. In this, I think, they do grievous wrong to the disciples of Christ, by quoting their authority for the discordant and contradictory statements in these writings, saying that it was according to them that they wrote the Gospels, which are so full of errors and discrepancies, both in facts and in opinions, that they can be harmonized neither with themselves nor with one another. This is nothing else than to slander good men, and to bring the charge of dissension on the brotherhood of the disciples. In reading the Gospels, the clear intention of our heart perceives the errors, and, to avoid all injustice, we accept whatever is useful, in the way of building up our faith, and promoting the glory of the Lord Christ, and of the Almighty God, His Father, while we reject the rest as unbecoming the majesty of God and Christ, and inconsistent with our belief.

3. To return to what I said of your not accepting everything in the Old Testament. You do not admit carnal circumcision, though that is what is written;2 nor resting from all occupation on the Sabbath, though that is enjoined;3 and instead of propitiating God, as Moses recommends, by offerings and sacrifices, you cast these things aside as utterly out of keeping with Christian worship, and as having nothing at all to recommend them. In some cases, however, you make a division, and while you accept one part, you reject the other. Thus, in the Passover, which is also the annual feast of the Old Testament, while it is written that in this observance you must slay a lamb to be eaten in the evening, and that you must abstain from leaven for seven days, and be content with unleavened bread and bitter herbs,4 you accept the feast, but pay no attention to the rules for its observance. It is the same with the feast of Pentecost, or seven weeks, and the accompaniment of a certain kind and number of sacrifices which Moses enjoins:5 you observe the feast, but you condemn the propitiatory rites, which are part of it, because they are not in harmony with Christianity. As regards the command to abstain from Gentile food, you are zealous believers in the uncleanness of things offered to idols, and of what has died of itself; but you are not so ready to believe the prohibition of swine's flesh, and hares, and conies, and mullets, and cuttle-fish, and all the fish that you have a relish for, although Moses pronounces them all unclean.

4. I do not suppose. that you will consent, or even listen, to such things as that a father-in-law should lie with his daughter-in-law, as Judah did; or a father with his daughters, like Lot; or prophets with harlots, like Hosea; or that a husband should sell his wife for a night to her lover, like Abraham; or that a man should marry two sisters, like Jacob; or that the rulers of the people and the men you consider as most inspired should keep their mistresses by hundreds and thousands; or, according to the provision made in Deuteronomy about wives, that the wife of one brother, if he dies without children, should marry the surviving brother, and that he should raise up seed from her instead of his brother; and that if the man refuses to do this, the fair plaintiff should bring her case before the elders, that the brother may be called and admonished to perform this religious duty; and that, if he persists in his refusal, he must not go unpunished, but the woman must loose his shoe from his right foot, and strike him in the face, and send him away, spat upon and accursed, to perpetuate the reproach in his family.6 These, and such as these, are the examples and precepts of the Old Testament. If they are good, why do you not practise them? If they are bad, why do you not condemn the Old Testament, in which they are found? But if you think that these are spurious interpolations, that is precisely what we think of the New Testament. You have no right to claim from us an acknowledgment for the New Testament which you yourselves do not make for the Old.

5. Since you hold to the divine authorship of the Old as well as of the New Testament, it would surely be more consistent and more becoming, as you do not obey its precepts, to confess that it has been corrupted by improper additions, than to treat it so contemptuously, if it is genuine and uncorrupted. Accordingly, my explanation of your neglect of the requirements of the Old Testament has always been, and still is, that you are either wise enough to reject them as spurious, or that you have the boldness and irreverence to disregard them if they are true. At any rate, when you would oblige me to believe everything contained in the documents of the New Testament because I receive the Testament itself, you should consider that, though you profess to receive the Old Testament, you in your heart disbelieve many things in it. Thus, you do not admit as true or authoritative the declaration of the Old Testament, that every one that hangeth on a tree is accursed,7 for this would apply to Jesus; or that every man is accursed who does not raise up seed in Israel,8 for that would include all of both sexes devoted to God; or that whoever is not circumcised in the flesh of his foreskin will be cut off from among his people,9 for that would apply to all Christians; or that whoever breaks the Sabbath must be stoned to death;10 or that no mercy should be shown to the man who breaks a single precept of the Old Testament. If you really believe these things as certainly enjoined by God, you would, in the time of Christ, have been the first to assail Him, and you would now have no quarrel with the Jews, who, in persecuting Christ with heart and soul, acted in obedience to their own God.

6. I am aware that instead of boldly pronouncing these passages spurious, you make out that these things were required of the Jews till the coming of Jesus; and that now that He is come, according, as you say, to the predictions of this Old Testament, He Himself teaches what we should receive, and what we should set aside as obsolete. Whether the prophets predicted the coming of Jesus we shall see presently. Meanwhile, I need say no more than that if Jesus, after being predicted in the Old Testament, now subjects it to this sweeping criticism, and teaches us to receive a few things and to throw over many things, in the same way the Paraclete who is promised in the New Testament teaches us what part of it to receive, and what to reject; as Jesus Himself says in the Gospel, when promising the Paraclete, "He shall guide you into all truth, and shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance."11 So then, with the help of the Paraclete, we may take the same liberties with the New Testament as Jesus enables you to take with the Old, unless you suppose that the Testament of the Son is of greater value than that of the Father, if it is really the Father's; so that while many parts of the one are to be condemned, the other must be exempted from all disapproval; and that, too, when we know, as I said before, that it was not written by Christ or by His apostles.

7. Hence, as you receive nothing in the Old Testament except the prophecies and the common precepts of practical morality, which we quoted above, while you set aside circumcision, and sacrifices, and the Sabbath and its observance, and the feast of unleavened bread, why should not we receive nothing in the New Testament but what we find said in honor and praise of the majesty of the Son, either by Himself or by His apostles, with the proviso, in the case of the apostles, that it was said by them after reaching perfection, and when no longer in unbelief; while we take no notice of the rest, which, if said at the time, was the utterance of ignorance or inexperience, or, if not, was added by crafty opponents with a malicious intention, or was stated by the writers without due consideration, and so handed down as authentic? Take as examples, the shameful birth of Jesus from a woman, His being circumcised like the Jews, His offering sacrifice like the Gentiles, His being baptized in a humiliating manner, His being led about by the devil in the wilderness, and His being tempted by him in the most distressing way. With these exceptions, besides whatever has been inserted under the pretence of being a quotation from the Old Testament, we believe the whole, especially the mystic nailing to the cross, emblematic of the wounds of the soul in its passion; as also the sound moral precepts of Jesus, and His parables, and the whole of His immortal discourse, which sets forth especially the distinction of the two natures, and therefore must undoubtedly be His. There is, then, no reason for your thinking it obligatory in me to believe all the contents of the Gospels; for you, as has been proved, take so dainty a sip from the Old Testament, that you hardly, so to speak, wet your lips with it.

8. Augustin replied: We give to the whole Old Testament Scriptures their due praise as true and divine; you impugn the Scriptures of the New Testament as having been tampered with and corrupted. Those things in the Old Testament which we do not observe we hold to have been suitable appointments for the time and the people of that dispensation, besides being symbolical to us of truths in which they have still a spiritual use, though the outward observance is abolished; and this opinion is proved to be the doctrine of the apostolic writings. You, on the other hand, find fault with everything in the New Testament which you do not receive, and assert that these passages were not spoken or written by Christ or His apostles. In these respects there is a manifest difference between us. When, therefore, you are asked why you do not receive all the contents of the New Testament, but, while you approve of some things, reject a great many in the very same books as false and spurious interpolations, you must not pretend to imitate us in the distinction which we make, reverently and in faith, but must give account of your own presumption.

9. If we are asked why we do not worship God as the Hebrew fathers of the Old Testament worshipped Him, we reply that God has taught us differently by the New Testament fathers, and yet in no opposition to the Old Testament, but as that Testament itself predicted. For it is thus foretold by the prophet: "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah; not according to the covenant which I made with their fathers when I took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt."12 Thus it was foretold that that covenant would not continue, but that there would be a new one. And to the objection that we do not belong to the house of Israel or to the house of Judah, we answer according to the teaching of the apostle, who calls Christ the seed of Abraham, and says to us, as belonging to Christ's body, "Therefore ye are Abraham's seed."13 Again, if we are asked why we regard that Testament as authoritative when we do not observe its ordinances, we find the answer to this also in the apostolic writings; for the apostle says, "Let no man judge you in meat or drink, or in respect of a holiday, or a new moon, or of Sabbaths, which are a shadow of things to come."14 Here we learn both that we ought to read of these observances, and ackowledge them to be of divine institution, in order to preserve the memory of the prophecy, for they were shadows of things to come; and also that we need pay no regard to those who would judge us for not continuing the outward observance; as the apostle says elsewhere to the same purpose, "These things happened to them for an example; and they are written for our admonition, on whom the end of the ages are come."15 So, when we read anything in the books of the Old Testament which we are not required to observe in the New Testament, or which is even forbidden, instead of finding fault with it, we should ask what it means; for the very discontinuance of the observance proves it to be, not condemned, but fulfilled. On this head we have already spoken repeatedly.

10. To take, for example, this requirement on which Faustus ignorantly grounds his charge against the Old Testament, that a man should take his brother's wife to raise up seed for his brother, to be called by his name; what does this prefigure, but that every preacher of the gospel should so labor in the Church as to raise up seed to his deceased brother, that is, Christ, who died for us, and that this seed should bear His name? Moreover, the apostle fulfills this requirement not now in the typical observance, but in the spiritual reality, when he reproves those of whom he says that he had begotten them in Christ Jesus by the gospel,16 and points out to them their error in wishing to be of Paul. "Was Paul," he says, "crucified for you? Or were ye baptized in the name of Paul?"17 As if he should say, I have begotten you for my deceased brother; your name is Christian, not Paulian. Then, too, whoever refuses the ministry of the gospel when chosen by the Church, justly deserves the contempt of the Church. So we see that the spitting in the face is accompanied with a sign of reproach in loosing a shoe from one foot, to exclude the man from the company of those to whom the apostle says, "Let your feet be shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace;"18 and of whom the prophet thus speaks "How beautiful are the feet of them who publish peace, who bring good tidings ofgood!"19 The man who holds the faith ofthe gospel so as both to profit himself and to be ready when called to serve the Church, is properly represented as shod on both feet. But the man who thinks it enough to secure his own safety by believing, and shirks the duty of benefiting others, has the reproach of being unshod, not in type, but in reality.

11. Faustus needlessly objects to our observance of the passover, taunting us with differing from the Jewish observance: for in the gospel we have the true Lamb, not in shadow, but in substance; and instead of prefiguring the death, we commemorate it daily, and especially in the yearly festival. Thus also the day of our paschal feast does not correspond with the Jewish observance, for we take in the Lord's day, on which Christ rose. And as to the feast of unleavened bread, all Christians sound in the faith keep it, not in the leaven of the old life, that is, of wickedness, but in the truth and sincerity of the faith;20 not for seven days, but always, as was typified by the number seven, for days are always counted by sevens. And if this observance is somewhat difficult in this world since the way which leads to life is strait and narrow,21 the future reward is sure; and this difficulty is typified in the bitter herbs, which are a little distasteful.

12. The Pentecost, too, we observe, that is, the fiftieth day from the passion and resurrection of the Lord, for on that day He sent to us the Holy Paraclete whom He had promised; as was prefigured in the Jewish passover, for on the fiftieth day after the slaying of the lamb, Moses on the mount received the law written with the finger of God.22 If you read the Gospel, you will see that the Spirit is there called the finger of God.23 Remarkable events which happened on certain days are annually commemorated in the Church, that the recurrence of this festival may preserve the recollection of things so important and salutary. If you ask, then, why we keep the passover, it is because Christ was then sacrificed for us. If you ask why we do not retain the Jewish ceremonies, it is because they prefigured future realities which we commemorate as past; and the difference between the future and the past is seen in the different words we use for them. Of this we have already said enough.

13. Again, if you ask why, of all the kinds of food prohibited in the former typical dispensation, we abstain only from food offered to idols and from what dies of itself, you shall hear, if for once you will prefer the truth to idle calumnies. The reason why it is not expedient for a Christian to eat food offered to idols is given by the apostle: "I would not," he says, "that ye should have fellowship with demons." Not that he finds fault with sacrifice itself, as offered by the fathers to typify the blood of the sacrifice with which Christ has redeemed us. For he first says, "The things which the Gentiles offer, they offer to demons, and not to God;" and then adds these words: "I would not that ye should have fellowship with demons."24 If the uncleanness were in the nature of sacrificial flesh. it would necessarily pollute even when eaten in ignorance. But the reason for not partaking knowingly is not in the nature of the food, but, for conscience sake, not to seem to have fellowship with demons. As regards what dies of itself, I suppose the reason why such food was prohibited was that the flesh of animals which have died of themselves is diseased, and is not likely to be wholesome, which is the chief thing in food. The observance of pouring out the blood which was enjoined in ancient times upon Noah himself after the deluge,25 the meaning of which we have already explained, is thought by many to be what is meant in the Acts of the Apostles, where we read that the Gentiles were required to abstain from fornication, and from things sacrificed, and from blood,26 that is, from flesh of which the blood has not been poured out. Others give a different meaning to the words, and think that to abstain from blood means not to be polluted with the crime of murder. It would take too long to settle this question, and it is not necessary. For, allowing that the apostles did on that occasion require Christians to abstain from the blood of animals, and not to eat of things strangled, they seem to me to have consulted the time in choosing an easy observance that could not be burdensome to any one, and which the Gentiles might have in common with the Israelities, for the sake of the Corner-stone, who makes both one in Himself;27 while at the same time they would be reminded how the Church of all nations was prefigured by the ark of Noah, when God gave this command,-a type which began to be fulfilled in the time of the apostles by the accession of the Gentiles to the faith. But since the close of that period during which the two walls of the circumcision and the uncircumcision, although united in the Corner-stone, still retained some distinctive peculiarities, and now that the Church has become so entirely Gentile that none who are outwardly Israelites are to be found in it, no Christian feels bound to abstain from thrushes or small birds because their blood has not been poured out, or from hares because they are killed by a stroke on the neck without shedding their blood. Any who still are afraid to touch these things are laughed at by the rest: so general is the conviction of the truth, that "not what entereth into the mouth defileth you, but what cometh out of it;"28 that evil lies in the commission of sin, and not in the nature of any food in ordinary use.

14. As regards the deeds of the ancients, both those which seem sinful to foolish and ignorant people, when they are not so, and those which really are sinful, we have already explained why they have been written, and how this rather adds to than impairs the dignity of Scripture. So, too, about the curse on him who hangeth on a tree, and on him who raises not up seed in Israel, our reply has already been given in the proper place, when meeting Faustus' objections.29 And in reply to all objections whatsoever, whether we have already answered them separately, or whether they are contained in the remarks of Faustus which we are now considering, we appeal to our established principles, on which we maintain the authority of sacred Scripture. The principle is this, that all things written in the books of the Old Testament are to be received with approval and admiration, as most true and most profitable to eternal life; and that those precepts which are no longer observed outwardly are to be understood as having been most suitable in those times, and are to be viewed as having been shadows of things to come, of which we may now perceive the fulfillments. Accordingly, whoever in those times neglected the observance of these symbolical precepts was righteously condemned to suffer the punishment required by the divine statute, as any one would be now if he were impiously to profane the sacraments of the New Testament, which differ from the old observances only as this time differs from that. For as praise is due to the righteous men of old who refused not to die for the Old Testament sacraments, so it is due to the martyrs of the New Testament. And as a sick man should not find fault with the medical treatment, because one thing is prescribed to-day and another to-morrow, and what was at first required is afterwards forbidden, since the method of cure depends on this; so the human race, sick and sore as it is from Adam to the end of the world, as long as the corrupted body weighs down the mind,30 should not find fault with the divine prescriptions, if sometimes the same observances are enjoined, and sometimes an old observance is exchanged for one of a different kind; especially as there was a promise of a change in the appointments.

15. Hence there is no force in the analogy which Faustus institutes between Christ's pointing out to us what to believe and what to reject in the Old Testament, in which He Himself is predicted, and the Paraclete's doing the same to you as regards the New Testament, where there is a similar prediction of Him. There might have been some plausibility in this, had there been anything in the Old Testament which we denounced as a mistake, or as not of divine authority, or as untrue. We do nothing of the kind; we receive everything, both what we observe as rules of conduct, and what we no longer observe, but still recognize as having been prophetical observances, once enjoined and now fulfilled. And besides, the promise of the Paraclete is found in those books, all the contents of which you do not accept; and His mission is recorded in the book which you shrink from even naming. For, as is stated above, and has been said repeatedly, there is a distinct narrative in the Acts of the Apostles of the mission of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost, and the effect produced showed who it was. For all who first received Him spoke with tongues;31 and in this sign there was a promise that in all tongues, or in all nations, the Church of after times would faithfully proclaim the doctrine of the Spirit as well as of the Father and of the Son.

16. Why, then, do you not accept everything in the New Testament? Is it because the books have not the authority of Christ's apostles, or because the apostles taught what was wrong? You reply that the books have not the authority of the apostles. That the apostles were wrong in their teaching is what Pagans say. But what can you say to prove that the publication of these books cannot be traced to the apostles? You reply that in many things they contradict themselves and one another. Nothing could be more untrue; the fact is, you do not understand. In every case where Faustus has brought forward what you think a discrepancy, we have shown that there was none; and we will do the same in every other case. It is intolerable that the reader or learner should dare to lay the blame on Scriptures of such high authority, instead of confessing his own stupidity. Did the Paraclete teach you that these writings are not of the apostles' authorship, but written by others under their names? But where is the proof that it was the Paraclete from whom you learned this? If you say that the Paraclete was promised and sent by Christ, we reply that your Paraclete was neither promised nor sent by Christ; and we also show you when He sent the Paraclete whom He promised. What proof have you that Christ sent your Paraclete? Where do you get the evidence in support of your informant, or rather misinformant? You reply that you find the proof in the Gospel. In what Gospel? You do not accept all the Gospel, and you say that it has been tampered with. Will you first accuse your witness of corruption, and then call for his evidence? To believe him when you wish it, and then disbelieve him when you wish it, is to believe nobody but yourself. If we were prepared to believe you, there would be no need of a witness at all. Moreover, in the promise of the Holy Spirit as the Paraclete, it is said, "He shall lead you into all truth;"32 but how can you be led into all truth by one who teaches you that Christ was a deceiver? And again, if you were to prove that all that is said in the Gospel of the promise of the Paraclete could apply to no one but Manichaeus, as the predictions of the prophets are applicable to Christ; and if you quoted passages from those manuscripts which you say are genuine, we might say that on this very point, as proving Manichaeus to be the only person intended, the passages have been altered in the interest of your sect. Your only answer to this would be, that you could not possibly alter documents already in the possession of all Christians; for at the very outset of such an attempt, it would be met by an appeal to older copies. But if this proves that the books could not be corrupted by you, it also proves that they could not be corrupted by any one. The first person who ventured to do such a thing would be convicted by a comparison of older manuscripts; especially as the Scripture is to be found not in one language only, but in many. As it is, false readings are sometimes corrected by comparing older copies or the original language. Hence you must either acknowledge these documents as genuine, and then your heresy cannot stand a moment; or if they are spurious, you cannot use their authority in support of your doctrine of the Paraclete, and so you refute yourselves.

17. Further, what is said in the promise of the Paraclete shows that it cannot possibly refer to Manichaeus, who came so many years after. For it is distinctly said by John, that the Holy Spirit was to come immediately after the resurrection and ascension of the Lord: "For the Spirit was not yet given, because that Jesus was not yet glorified."33 Now, if the reason why the Spirit was not given was, that Jesus was not glorified, He would necessarily be given immediately on the glorification of Jesus. In the same way, the Cataphrygians34 said that they had received the promised Paraclete; and so they fell away from the Catholic faith, forbidding what Paul allowed, and condemning second marriages, which he made lawful. They turned to their own use the words spoken of the Spirit, "He shall lead you into all truth," as if, forsooth, Paul and the other apostles had not taught all the truth, but had left room for the Paraclete of the Cataphrygians. The same meaning they forced from the words of Paul: "We know in part, and we prophesy in part; but when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away;"35 making out that the apostle knew and prophesied in part, when he said, "Let him do what he will; if he marries, he sinneth not,"36 and that this is done away by the perfection of the Phrygian Paraclete.37 And if they are told that they are condemned by the authority of the Church, which is the subject of such ancient promises, and is spread all over the world, they reply that this is in exact fulfillment of what is said of the Paraclete, that the world cannot receive Him.38 And are not those passages, "He shall lead you into all truth," and, "When that which is perfect is come, that which is in part shall be done away," and, "The world cannot receive Him," precisely those in which you find a prediction of Manichaeus? And so every heresy arising under the name of the Paraclete will have the boldness to make an equally plausible application to itself of such texts. For there is no heresy but will call itself the truth; and the prouder it is, the more likely it will be to call itself perfect truth: and so it will profess to lead into all truth; and since that which is perfect has come by it, it will try to do away with the doctrine of the apostles, to which its own errors are opposed. And as the Church holds by the earnest admonition of the apostle, that "whoever preaches another gospel to you than that which ye have received, let him be accursed;"39 when the heretical preacher begins to be pronounced accursed by all the world, will he not forthwith exclaim, This is what is written, "The world cannot receive Him"?

18. Where, then, will you find the proof required to show that it is from the Paraclete that you have learned that the Gospels were not written by the apostles? On the other hand, we have proof that the Holy Spirit, the Paraclete, came immediately after the glorification of Jesus. For "He was not yet given, because that Jesus was not yet glorified." We have proof also that He leads into all truth, for the only way to truth is by love, and "the love of God," says the apostle, "is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost who is given unto us."40 We show, too, that in the words, "when that which is perfect is come," Paul spoke of the perfection in the enjoyment of eternal life. For in the same place he says: "Now we see through a glass darkly, but then face to face."41 You cannot reasonably maintain that we see God face to face here. Therefore that which is perfect has not come to you. It is thus clear what the apostle thought on this subject. This perfection will not come to the saints till the accomplishment of what John speaks of: "Now we are the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when it shall appear we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is."42 Then we shall be led into all truth by the Holy Spirit, of which we have now received the pledge. Again, the words, "The world cannot receive Him," plainly point to those who are usually called the world in Scripture-the lovers of the world, the wicked, or carnal; of whom the apostle says: "The natural man perceiveth not the things which are of the Spirit of God."43 Those are said to be of this world who can understand nothing beyond material things, which are the objects of sense in this world; as is the case with you, when, in your admiration of the sun and moon, you suppose all divine things to resemble them. Deceivers. and being deceived, you call the author of this silly theory the Paraclete. But as you have no proof of his being the Paraclete, you have no reliable ground for the statement that the Gospel writings, which you receive only in part, are not of apostolic authorship. Thus your only remaining argument is, that these writings contain things disparaging to the glory of Christ; such as, that He was born of a virgin, that He was circumcised, that the customary sacrifice was offered for Him, that He was baptized, that He was tempted of the devil.

19. With those exceptions, including also the testimonies quoted from the Old Testament, you profess, to use the words of Faustus, to receive all the rest, especially the mystic nailing to the cross, emblematic of the wounds of the soul in its passion; as also the sound moral precepts of Jesus, and the whole of His immortal discourse, which sets forth especially the distinction of the two natures, and therefore must undoubtedly be His. Your design clearly is to deprive Scripture of all authority, and to make every man's mind the judge what passage of Scripture he is to approve of, and what to disapprove of. This is not to be subject to Scripture in matters of faith, but to make Scripture subject to you. Instead of making the high authority of Scripture the reason of approval, every man makes his approval the reason for thinking a passage correct. If, then, you discard authority, to what, poor feeble soul, darkened by the mists of carnality, to what, I beseech you, will you betake yourself? Set aside authority, and let us hear the reason of your beliefs. Is it by a logical process that your long story about the nature of God concludes necessarily with this startling announcement, that this nature is subject to injury and corruption? And how do you know that there are eight continents and ten heavens, and that Atlas bears up the world, and that it hangs from the great world-holder, and innumerable things of the same kind? Who is your authority? Manichaeus, of course, you will say. But, unhappy being, this is not sight, but faith. If, then, you submit to receive a load of endless fictions at the bidding of an obscure and irrational authority, so that you believe all those things because they are written in the books which your misguided judgment pronounces trustworthy, though there is no evidence of their truth, why not rather submit to the authority of the Gospel, which is so well founded, so confirmed, so generally acknowledged and admired, and which has an unbroken series of testimonies from the apostles down to our own day, that so you may have an intelligent belief, and may come to know that all your objections are the fruit of folly and perversity; and that there is more truth in the opinion that the unchangeable nature of God should take part of mortality, so as, without injury to itself from this union, to do and to suffer not feignedly, but really, whatever it behoved the mortal nature to do and to suffer for the salvation of the human race from which it was taken, than in the belief that the nature of God is subject to injury and corruption, and that, after suffering pollution and captivity, it cannot be wholly freed and purified, but is condemned by a supreme divine necessity to eternal punishment in the mass of darkness?

20. You say, in reply, that you believe in what Manichaeus has not proved, because he has so clearly proved the existence of two natures, good and evil, in this world. But here is the very source of your unhappy delusion; for as in the Gospels, so in the world, your idea of what is evil is derived entirely from the effect on your senses of such disagreeable things as serpents, fire, poison, and so on; and the only good you know of is what has an agreeable effect on your senses, as pleasant flavors, and sweet smells, and sunlight, and whatever else recommends itself strongly to your eyes, or your nostrils, or your palate, or any other organ of sensation. But had you begun with looking on the book of nature as the production of the Creator of all, and had you believed that your own finite understanding might be at fault wherever anything seemed to be amiss, instead of venturing to find fault with the works of God, you would not have been led into these impious follies and blasphemous fancies with which, in your ignorance of what evil really is, you heap all evils upon God.

21. We can now answer the question, how we know that these books were written by the apostles. In a word, we know this in the same way that you know that the books whose authority you are so deluded as to prefer were written by Manichaeus. For, suppose some one should raise a question on this point, and should contend, in arguing with you, that the books which you attribute to Manichaeus are not of his authorship; your only reply would be, to ridicule the absurdity of thus gratuitously calling in question a matter confirmed by successive testimonies of such wide extent. As, then, it is certain that these books are the production of Manichaeus, and as it is ridiculous in one born so many years after to start objections of his own, and so raise a discussion on the point; with equal certainty may we pronounce it absurd, or rather pitiable, in Manichaeus or his followers to bring such objections against writings originally well authenticated, and carefully handed down from the times of the apostles to our own day through a constant succession of custodians.

22. We have now only to compare the authority of Manichaeus with that of the apostles. The genuineness of the writings is equally certain in both cases. But no one will compare Manichaeus to the apostles, unless he ceases to be a follower of Christ, who sent the apostles. Who that did not misunderstand Christ's words ever found in them the doctrine of two natures opposed to one another, and having each its own principle? Again, the apostles, as becomes the disciples of truth, declare the birth and passion of Christ to have been real events; while Manichaeus, who boasts that he leads into all truth, would lead us to a Christ whose very passion he declares to have been an illusion. The apostles say that Christ was circumcised in the flesh which He took of the seed of Abraham; Manichaeus says that God, in his own nature, was cut in pieces by the race of darkness. The apostles say that a sacrifice was offered for Christ as an infant in our nature, according to the institutions of the time; Manichaeus, that a member, not of humanity, but of the divine substance itself, must be sacrificed to the whole host of demons by being introduced into the nature of the hostile race. The apostles say that Christ, to set us an example, was baptized in the Jordan; Manichaeus, that God immersed himself in the pollution of darkness, and that he will never wholly emerge, but that the part which cannot be purified will be condemned to eternal punishment. The apostles say that Christ, in our nature, was tempted by the chief of the demons; Manichaeus, that part of God was taken captive by the race of demons. And in the temptation of Christ He resists the tempter; while in the captivity of God, the part taken captive cannot be restored to its origin even after victory. To conclude, Manichaeus, under the guise of an improvement, preaches another gospel, which is the doctrine of devils; and the apostles, after the doctrine of Christ, enjoin that whoever preaches another gospel shall be accursed.44

Book XXXIII.

Book XXXIII.

Faustus does not think it would be a great honor to sit down with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, whose moral characters as set forth in the Old Testament he detests. He justifies his subjective criticism of scripture. Augustin sums up the argument, claims the victory, and exhorts the Manichaeans to abandon their opposition to the Old Testament notwithstanding the difficulties that it presents, and to recognize the authority of the Catholic Church.

1. Faustus said: You quote from the Gospel the words, "Many shall come from the east and the west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven,"1 and ask why we do not acknowledge the patriarchs. Now, we should be the last to grudge to any human being that God should have compassion on him, and bring him out of perdition to salvation. At the same time, we should acknowledge in such a case the clemency shown in this act of compassion, and not the merit of the person whose life is undeniably blameworthy. Thus, in the case of the Jewish fathers, Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, who are mentioned by Christ in this verse, supposing it to be genuine, although they led wicked lives, as we may learn from their descendant Moses, or whoever was the author of the history called Genesis, which describes their conduct as having been most shocking and detestable we are ready to allow that they may, after all, be in the kingdom of heaven, in the place which they neither believed in, nor hoped for, as is plain enough from their books. But then it must be kept in mind that, as you yourselves confess, if they did attain to what is spoken of in this verse, it was something very different from the nether dungeons of woe to which their own deserts consigned them, and that their deliverance was the work of our Lord Christ, and the result of His mystic passion. Who would grudge to the thief on the cross that deliverance was granted to him by the same Lord, and that Christ said that on that very day he should be with Him in the paradise of His Father?2 Who is so hard-hearted as to disapprove of this act of benevolence? Still, it does not follow that, because Jesus pardoned a thief, we must approve of the habits and practices of thieves; any more than of the publicans and harlots, whose faults Jesus pardoned, declaring that they would go into the kingdom of heaven before those who behaved proudly.3 For, when He acquitted the woman accused by the Jews as sinful, and as having been caught in adultery, He told her to sin no more.4 If, then, He has done something of the same kind in the case of Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, all the praise is His; for such actions towards souls are becoming in Him who maketh His sun to rise upon the evil and upon the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust.5 One thing perplexes me in your doctrine: why you limit your statements to the fathers of the Jews, and are not of opinion that the Gentile patriarchs had also a share in this grace of our Redeemer; especially as the Christian Church consists of their children more than of the seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. You will say that the Gentiles worshipped idols, and the Jews the Almighty God, and that therefore Jesus had regard only to the Jews. It would seem from this that the worship of the Almighty God is the sure way to hell, and that the Son must come to the aid of the worshipper of the Father. That is as you please. For my part, I am ready to join you in the belief that the fathers reached heaven, not by any merit of their own, but by that divine mercy which is stronger than sin.

2. However, there is a difficulty in deciding as regards this verse too, whether the words were really spoken to Christ, for there is a discrepancy in the narratives. For while two evangelists, Matthew and Luke, both alike tell of the centurion whose servant was sick, and to whom these words of Jesus are supposed to have applied, that He had not seen so great faith, no, not in Israel, as in this man, though a Gentile and a Pagan, because he said that he was not worthy that Jesus should come under his roof, but wished Him only to speak the word, and his servant should be healed; Matthew alone adds that Jesus went on to say, "Verily I say unto you, that many shall come from the east and from the west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven; but the children of the kingdom shall be cast into outer darkness." By the many who should come are meant the Pagans, on account of the centurion, in whom, although he was a Gentile, so great faith was found; and the children of the kingdom are the Jews, in whom there was no faith found. Luke, again, though he too mentions the occurrence in his Gospel as part of the narrative of the miracles of Christ, says nothing of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. If it is said that he omitted it because it had been already said by Matthew, why does he tell the story at all of the centurion and his servant, since that, too, has the advantage of being recorded at length in Matthew's ingenious narrative? But the passage is corrupt. For, in describing the centurion's application to Jesus, Matthew says that he came himself to ask for a cure; while Luke says he did not, but sent elders of the Jews, and that they, in case Jesus should despise the centurion as a Gentile (for they will have Jesus to be a thorough Jew), set about persuading Him, by saying that he was worthy for whom He should do this, because he loved their nation, and had built them a synagogue;6 here again taking for granted that the Son of God was concerned in a pagan centurion having thought it proper to build a synagogue for the Jews. The words in question are, indeed, found in Luke also, perhaps because on reflection he thought they might be genuine; but they are found in another place, and in a connection altogether different. The passage is where Jesus says to His disciples, "Strive to enter in at the strait gate; for many shall come seeking to enter in, and shall not be able. When once the Master of the house has entered in, and has shut to the door, ye shall begin to stand without, and to knock, saying Lord, open to us. And He shall answer and say, I know you not. Then ye shall begin to say, We have eaten and drunk in Thy presence, and Thou hast taught in our streets and synagogues; but He shall say unto you, I know not whence ye are; depart from me, all ye workers of iniquity. There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, when ye shall see Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, and all the prophets, entering into the kingdom of God, and you yourselves cast out. And they shall come from the east, and from the west, and from the north, and from the south, and shall sit down in the kingdom of God."7 The part where it is said that many shall be shut out of the kingdom of God, who have only borne the name of Christ, without doing His works, is not left out by Matthew; but he makes no mention here of Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob. In the same way, Luke mentions the centurion and his servant, without alluding in that connection to Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob. Since it is uncertain when the words were spoken, we are at liberty to doubt whether they were spoken at all.

3. It is not without reason that we bring a critical judgment to the study of Scriptures where there are such discrepancies and contradictions. By thus examining everything, and comparing one passage with another, we determine which contains Christ's actual words, and what may or may not be genuine. For your predecessors have made many interpolations in the words of our Lord, which thus appear under His name, while they disagree with His doctrine. Besides, as we have proved again and again, the writings are not the production of Christ or of His apostles, but a compilation of rumors and beliefs, made, long after their departure, by some obscure semi-Jews, not in harmony even with one another, and published by them under the name of the apostles, or of those considered the followers of the apostles, so as to give the appearance of apostolic authority to all these blunders and falsehoods. But whatever you make of that, as regards this verse, I repeat that I do not insist on rejecting it. It is enough for my position, that, as I said before, and as you are obliged to confess, before the coming of our Lord all the patriarchs and prophets of Israel lay in infernal darkness for their sins. Even though they may have been restored to light and liberty by Christ, that has nothing to do with the hateful character of their lives. We hate and eschew not their persons, but their characters; not as they are now, when they are purified, but as they were, when impure. So, whatever you think of this verse, it does not affect us: for if it is genuine, it only illustrates Christ's goodness and compassion; and if it is spurious, those who wrote it are to blame. Our cause is as safe as it always is.

4. Augustin replied: Poor safety, indeed! when you contradict yourself by hating the patriarchs as impure, at the same time that you grieve for your impure god. You allow that, since the advent of the Saviour, the patriarchs have had purity restored, and have enjoyed the rest of the blessed; while your god, even after the Saviour's advent, still lies in darkness, is still sunk in the ocean of iniquity, still wallows in the mire of all uncleanness. These men, therefore, were not only better than your god in their lives, but also happier in their death. Where was the abode of the just who departed from this life before Christ's coming in the flesh, and whether their condition also was improved by the passion of Christ, in whom they had believed as to come, and to suffer, and to rise again, and had, moreover, foretold this in suitable language under the guidance of the Spirit of prophecy, is to be discovered from the Holy Scriptures, if any clear discovery in this matter is possible; we are not called on to adopt the crude notions of all and sundry, still less the heretical opinions of men who have gone astray into such egregious error. There is a vain attempt here on the part of Faustus to introduce by a side-door the idea that we may obtain something after this life besides the due reward of our conduct in this life. It will be better for you to abandon your error while you are still alive, and to embrace and hold the truths of the Catholic faith. Otherwise the expectations of the unrighteous will be sadly disappointed when God begins to fulfill His threatenings to the unrighteous.

5. I have already given what I considered a sufficient answer to Faustus' calumnies of the lives of the patriarchs. That they were punished at their death, or that they were justified after the Lord's passion, is not what we learn from His commendation of them, when He admonished the Jews that, if they were Abraham's children, they should do the works of Abraham, and said that Abraham desired to see His day, and was glad when he saw it;8 and that it was into his bosom, that is, some deep recess of blissful repose, that the angels carried the poor sufferer who was despised by the proud rich man.9 And what are we to make of the Apostle Paul? Is there any idea of justification after death in his praise of Abraham, when he says that before he was circumcised he believed God, and that it was counted to him for righteousness?10 And so much importance does he attach to this, that the single ground which he specifies for our becoming Abraham's children, though not descended from him in the flesh, is, that we follow the footsteps of his faith.

6. You are so hardened in your errors against the testimonies of Scripture, that nothing can be made of you; for whenever anything is quoted against you, you have the boldness to say that it is written not by the apostle, but by some pretender under his name. The doctrine of demons which you preach is so opposed to Christian doctrine, that you could not continue, as professing Christians, to maintain it, unless you denied the truth of the apostolic writings. How can you thus do injury to your own souls? Where will you find any authority, if not in the Gospel and apostolic writings? How can we be sure of the authorship of any book, if we doubt the apostolic origin of those books which are attributed to the apostles by the Church which the apostles themselves rounded, and which occupies so conspicuous a place in all lands, and if at the same time we acknowledge as the undoubted production of the apostles what is brought forward by heretics in opposition to the Church, whose authors, from whom they derive their name, lived long after the apostles? And do we not see in profane literature that there are well-known authors under whose names many things have been published after their time which have been rejected, either from inconsistency with their ascertained writings, or from their not having been known in the lifetime of the authors, so as to be banded down with the confirmatory statement of the authors themselves, or of their friends? To give a single example, were not some books published lately under the name of the distinguished physician Hippocrates, which were not received as authoritative by physicians? And this decision remained unaltered in spite of some similarity in style and matter: for, when compared to the genuine writings of Hippocrates, these books were found to be inferior; besides that they were not recognized as his at the time when his authorship of his genuine productions was ascertained. Those books, again, from a comparison with which the productions of questionable origin were rejected, are with certainty attributed to Hippocrates; and any one who denies their authorship is answered only by ridicule, simply because there is a succession of testimonies to the books from the time of Hippocrates to the present day, which makes it unreasonable either now or hereafter to have any doubt on the subject. How do we know the authorship of the works of Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, Varro, and other similar writers, but by the unbroken chain of evidence? So also with the numerous commentaries on the ecclesiastical books, which have no canonical authority, and yet show a desire of usefulness and a spirit of inquiry. How is the authorship ascertained in each case, except by the author's having brought his work into public notice as much as possible in his own lifetime. and, by the transmission of the information from one to another in continuous order, the belief becoming more certain as it becomes more general, up to our own day; so that, when we are questioned as to the authorship of any book, we have no difficulty in answering? But why speak of old books? Take the books now before us: should any one, after some years, deny that this book was written by me, or that Faustus' was written by him, where is evidence for the fact to be found but in the information possessed by some at the present time, and transmitted by them through successive generations even to distant times? From all this it follows, that no one who has not yielded to the malicious and deceitful suggestions of lying devils, can be so blinded by passion as to deny the ability of the Church of the apostles-a community of brethren as numerous as they were faithful-to transmit their writings unaltered to posterity, as the original seats of the apostles have been occupied by a continuous succession of bishops to the present day, especially when we are accustomed to see this happen in the case of ordinary writings both in the Church and out of it.

7. But Faustus finds contradictions in the Gospels. Say, rather, that Faustus reads the Gospels in a wrong spirit, that he is too foolish to understand, and too blind to see. If you were animated with piety instead of being misled by party spirit, you might easily, by examining these passages, discover a wonderful and most instructive harmony among the writers. Who, in reading two narratives of the same event, would think of charging one or both of the authors with error or falsehood, because one omits what the other mentions, or one tells concisely, but with substantial agreement, what the other relates in detail, so as to indicate not only what was done, but also how it was done? This is what Faustus does in his attempt to impeach the truth of the Gospels; as if Luke's omitting some saying of Christ recorded in Matthew implied a denial on the part of Luke of Matthew's statement. There is no real difficulty in the case; and to make a difficulty shows want of thought, or of the ability to think. There is, indeed, a point in the narrative of the centurion which is discussed among believers, and on which objections are raised by unbelievers ofno great learning, who prove their quarrelsomeness, when, after being instructed, they do not give up their errors. The point is, that Matthew says that the centurion came to Jesus "beseeching Him, and saying;" while Luke says that he sent to Jesus the elders of the Jews with this same request, that He would heal his servant who was sick; and that when He came near the house he sent others, through whom he said that he was not worthy that Jesus should come into his house, and that he was not worthy to come himself to Jesus. How, then, do we read in Matthew, "He came to Him, beseeching Him, and saying, My servant lieth at home sick of the palsy, and grievously tormented?"11 The explanation is, that Matthew's narrative is correct, but brief, mentioning the centurion's coming to Jesus, without saying whether he came himself or by others, or whether the words about his servant were spoken by himself or through others. But is it not common to speak of a person as coming near to a thing, although he may not reach it? And even the word reach, which is the strongest form of expression, is frequently used in cases where the person spoken of acts through others, as when we say he took his case to court, he reached the presence of the judge; or, again, he reached the presence of some man in power, although it may probably have been through his friends, and the person may not have seen him whose presence he is said to have reached. And from the word for to reach we give the name of Perventors to those who by ambitious arts gain access, either personally or through friends, to the, so to speak, inaccessible minds of the great. Are we, then, in reading to forget the common usage of speech? Or must the sacred Scripture have a language of its own? The cavils of forward critics are thus met by a reference to the usual forms of speech.

8. Those who examine this matter not in a disputatious but in a calm believing spirit are invited to come to Jesus, not outwardly but in heart, not in bodily presence but in the power of faith, as the centurion did, and then they will better understand Matthew's narrative. To such it is said in the Psalm "Come unto Him, and be enlightened; and your faces shall not be ashamed."12 Hence we learn that the centurion, whose faith was so highly spoken of, came to Christ more truly than the people who carried his message. We find an analogous case in the woman with the issue of blood, who was healed by touching the hem of Christ's garment. when Christ said, "Some one hath touched me." The disciples wondered what Christ meant by saying, "Who hath touched me?" "Some one hath touched me," when the crowd was thronging Him. In fact, they made this reply: "The crowd throngeth Thee, and sayest Thou, Who hath touched me?"13 Now, as the people thronged Christ while the woman touched Him, so the messengers were sent to Christ, but the centurion really came to Him. In Matthew we have a not infrequent form of expression, and at the same time a symbolical import; while in Luke there is a simple narrative of the whole event, such as to draw our attention to the manner in which Matthew has recorded it. I wish one of those people who found their silly objections to the Gospels on such trifling difficulties would himself tell a story twice over, honestly giving a true account of what happened, and that his words were written down and read over to him. We should then see whether he would not say more or less at one time than at another; and whether the order would not be changed, not only of words, but of things; and whether he would not put some opinion of his own into the mouth of another, because, though he never heard him say it, he knew it perfectly well to be in his mind; and whether he would not sometimes put in a few words what he had before related at length. In these and other ways, which might perhaps be reduced to rule, the narratives of the same thing by two persons, or two narratives by the same person, might differ in many things without being opposed, might be unlike without being contradictory. Thus are undone all the bandages with which poor Manichaeans stifle themselves to keep in the spirit of error, and to keep out all that might lead to their salvation.

9. Now that all Faustus' calumnies have been refuted, those at least on the subjects here treated of at large and explained fully as the Lord has enabled me, I close with a word of counsel to you who are implicated in those shocking and damnable errors, that, if you acknowledge the supreme authority of Scripture, you should recognise that authority which from the time of Christ Himself, through the ministry of His apostles, and through a regular succession of bishops in the seats of the apostles, has been preserved to our own day throughout the whole world, with a reputation known to all. There the Old Testament too has its difficulties solved, and its predictions fulfilled. If you ask for demonstration, consider first what you are, how unfit for comprehending the nature of your own soul, not to speak of God; I mean an intelligent comprehension, such as you profess to desire, or to have once desired, and not the notions of a credulous fancy. Admitting this incompetency, which must continue while you remain as you are, you may at least be referred to the natural conviction of every human mind, unless it is corrupted by error, of the perfect unchangeableness and incorruptibility of the nature and substance of God. Admit this, or believe it, and you will no longer be Manichaeans, so that in course of time you may become Catholics.

Reply to Faustus the Manichaean - Book 4

Book IV.

Book IV.

Faustus's reasons for rejecting the old testament, and Augustin's animadversions thereon.

1. Faustus said: Do I believe the Old Testament? If it bequeaths anything to me, I believe it; if not, I reject it. It would be an excess of forwardness to take the documents of others which pronounce me disinherited. Remember that the promise of Canaan in the Old Testament is made to Jews, that is, to the circumcised, who offer sacrifice, and abstain from swine's flesh, and from the other animals which Moses pronounces unclean, and observe Sabbaths, and the feast of unleavened bread, and other things of the same kind which the author of the Testament enjoined. Christians have not adopted these observances, and no one keeps them; so that if we will not take the inheritance, we should surrender the documents. This is my first reason for rejecting the Old Testament, unless you teach me better. My second reason is, that this inheritance is such a poor fleshly thing, without any spiritual blessings, that after the New Testament, and its glorious promise of the kingdom of heaven and eternal life, I think it not worth the taking.

2. Augustin replied: No one doubts that promises of temporal things are contained in the Old Testament, for which reason it is called the Old Testament; or that the kingdom of heaven and the promise of eternal life belong to the New Testament. But that in these temporal things were figures of future things which should be fulfilled in us upon whom the ends of the ages are come, is not my fancy, but the judgment of the apostle, when he says of such things, "These things were our examples;" and again, "These things happened to them for an example, and they are written for us on whom the ends of the ages are come."1 We receive the Old Testament, therefore, not in order to obtain the fulfillment of these promises, but to see in them predictions of the New Testament; for the Old bears witness to the New. Whence the Lord, after He rose from the dead, and allowed His disciples not only to see but to handle Him, still, lest they should doubt their mortal and fleshly senses, gave them further confirmation from the testimony of the ancient books, saying, "It was necessary that all things should be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets and Psalms, concerning me."2 Our hope, therefore, rests not on the promise of temporal things. Nor do we believe that the holy and spiritual men of these times-the patriarchs and prophets-were taken up with earthly things. For they understood, by the revelation of the Spirit of God, what was suitable for that time, and how God appointed all these sayings and actions as types and predictions of the future. Their great desire was for the New Testament; but they had a personal duty to perform in those predictions, by which the new things of the future were foretold. So the life as well as the tongue of these men was prophetic. The carnal people, indeed, thought only of present blessings, though even in connection with the people there were prophecies of the future.

These things you do not understand, because, as the prophet said, "Unless you believe, you shall not understand."3 For you are not instructed in the kingdom of heaven,-that is, in the true Catholic Church of Christ. If you were, you would bring forth from the treasure of the sacred Scriptures things old as well as new. For the Lord Himself says, "Therefore every scribe instructed in the kingdom of heaven is like an householder who brings forth from his treasure things new and old."4 And so, while you profess to receive only the new promises of God, you have retained the oldness of the flesh, adding only the novelty of error; of which novelty the apostle says, "Shun profane novelties of words, for they increase unto more ungodliness, and their speech eats like a cancer. Of whom is Hymenaeus and Philetus, who concerning the faith have erred, saying that the resurrection is past already, and have overthrown the faith of some."5 Here you see the source of your false doctrine, in teaching that the resurrection is only of souls by the preaching of the truth, and that there will be no resurrection of the body. But how can you understand spiritual things of the inner man, who is renewed in the knowledge of God, when in the oldness of the flesh, if you do not possess temporal things, you concoct fanciful notions about them in those images of carnal things of which the whole of your false doctrine consists? You boast of despising as worthless the land of Canaan, which was an actual thing, and actually given to the Jews; and yet you tell of a land of light cut asunder on one side, as by a narrow wedge, by the land of the race of darkness,-a thing which does not exist, and which you believe from the delusion of your minds; so that your life is not supported by having it, and your mind is wasted in desiring it.6

Book V.

Book V.

Faustus claims that the Manichaeans and not the Catholics are consistent believers in the Gospel, and seeks to establish this claim by comparing Manichaean and Catholic obedience to the precepts of the Gospel. Augustin exposes the hypocrisy of the Manichaeans and praises the asceticism of Catholics.

1. Faustus said: Do I believe the gospel? You ask me if I believe it, though my obedience to its commands shows that I do. I should rather ask you if you believe it, since you give no proof of your belief. I have left my father, mother, wife, and children, and all else that the gospel requires;1 and do you ask if I believe the gospel? Perhaps you do not know what is called the gospel. The gospel is nothing else than the preaching and the precept of Christ. I have parted with all gold and silver, and have left off carrying money in my purse; content with daily food; without anxiety for tomorrow; and without solicitude about how I shall be fed, or where-withal I shall be clothed: and do you ask if I believe the gospel? You see in me the blessings of the gospel;2 and do you ask if I believe the gospel? You see me poor, meek, a peacemaker, pure in heart, mourning, hungering, thirsting, bearing persecutions and enmity for righteousness' sake; and do you doubt my belief in the gospel? One can understand now how John the Baptist, after seeing Jesus, and also hearing of His works, yet asked whether He was Christ. Jesus properly and justly did not deign to reply that He was; but reminded him of the works of which he had already heard: "The blind see, the deaf hear, the dead are raised."3 In the same way, I might very well reply to your question whether I believe the gospel, by saying, I have left all, father, mother, wife, children, gold, silver, eating, drinking, luxuries, pleasures; take this as a sufficient answer to your questions, and believe that you will be blessed if you are not offended in me.4

2. But, according to you, to believe the gospel is not only to obey its commands, but also to believe in all that is written in it; and, first of all, that God was born. But neither is believing the gospel only to believe that Jesus was born, but also to do what He commands. So, if you say that I do not believe the gospel because I disbelieve the incarnation, much more do you not believe because you disregard the commandments. At any rate, we are on a par till these questions are settled. If your disregard of the precepts does not prevent you from professing faith in the gospel, why should my rejection of the genealogy prevent me? And if, as you say, to believe the gospel includes both faith in the genealogies and obedience to the precepts, why do you condemn me, since we both are imperfect? What one wants the other has. But if, as there can be no doubt, belief in the gospel consists solely in obedience to the commands of God, your sin is twofold. As the proverb says, the deserter accuses the soldier. But suppose, since you will have it so, that there are these two parts of perfect faith, one consisting in word, or the confession that Christ was born, the other in deed or the observance of the precepts; it is plain that my part is hard and painful, yours light and easy. It is natural that the multitude should flock to you and away from me, for they know not that the kingdom of God is not in word, but in power. Why, then, do you blame me for taking the harder part, and leaving to you, as to a weak brother, the easy part? You have the idea that your part of faith, or confessing that Christ was born, has more power to save the soul than the other parts.

3. Let us then ask Christ Himself, and learn from His own mouth, what is the chief means of our salvation. Who shall enter, O Christ, into Thy kingdom? He that doeth the will of my Father in heaven,5 is His reply; not, "He that confesses that I was born." And again, He says to His disciples, "Go, teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, teaching them to observe all things which I have commanded you."6 It is not, "teaching them that I was born," but, "to observe my commandments." Again, "Ye are my friends if ye do what I command you;"7 not, "if you believe that I was born." Again, "If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love,"8 and in many other places. Also in the sermon on the mount, when He taught, "Blessed are the poor, blessed are the meek, blessed are the peacemakers, blessed are the pure in heart, blessed are they that mourn, blessed are they that hunger, blessed are they that are persecuted for righteousness' sake,"9 He nowhere says, "Blessed are they that confess that I was born." And in the separation of the sheep from the goats in the judgment, He says that He will say to them on the right hand, "I was hungry, and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink"10 and so on; therefore" inherit the kingdom." Not, "Because ye believe that I was born, inherit the kingdom." Again, to the rich man seeking for eternal life, He says, "Go, sell all that thou hast, and follow me;"11 not, "Believe that I was born, that you may have eternal life." You see, the kingdom, life, happiness, are everywhere promised to the part I have chosen of what you call the two parts of faith, and nowhere to your part. Show, if you can, a place where it is written that whoso confesses that Christ was born of a woman is blessed, or shall inherit the kingdom, or have eternal life. Even supposing, then, that there are two parts of faith, your part has no blessing. But what if we prove that your part is not a part of faith at all? It will follow that you are foolish, which indeed will be proved beyond a doubt. At present, it is enough to have shown that our part is crowned with the beatitudes. Besides, we have also a beatitude for a confession in words: for we confess that Jesus Christ is the Son of the living God; and Jesus declares with His own lips that this confession has a benediction, when He says to Peter, "Blessed art thou, Simon Barjona; for flesh and blood hath not revealed this unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven."12 So that we have not one, but both these parts of faith, and in both alike are we pronounced blessed by Christ; for in one we reduce faith to practice, while in the other our confession is unmixed with blasphemy.

4. Augustin replied: I have already said that the Lord Jesus Christ repeatedly calls Himself the Son of man, and that the Manichaeans have contrived a silly story about some fabulous First Man, who figures in their impious heresy, not earthly, but combined with spurious elements, in opposition to the apostle, who says, "The first man is of the earth, earthy;"13 and that the apostle carefully warns us, "If any one preaches to you differently from what we have preached, let him be accursed,"14 So that we must believe Christ to be the Son of man according to apostolic truth, not according to Manichaean error. And since the evangelists assert that Christ was born of a woman, of the seed of David, and Paul writing to Timothy says, "Remember that Jesus Christ, of the seed of David, was raised from the dead, according to my gospel"15 it is clear what sense we must believe Christ to be the Son of man; for being the Son of God by whom we were made, He also by

His incarnation became the Son of man, that He might die for our sins, and rise again for our justification.16 Accordingly He calls Himself both Son of God and Son of man. To take only one instance out of many, in the Gospel of John it is written. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, The hour cometh, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear shall live. For as the Father hath life in Himself, so He hath given to the Son to have life in Himself; and hath given Him power to execute judgment also, because He is the Son of man."17 He says, "They shall hear the voice of the Son of God;" and He says, "because He is the Son of man." As the Son of man, He has received power to execute judgment, because He will come to judgment in human form, that He may be seen by the good and the wicked. In this form He ascended into heaven, and that voice was heard by His disciples, "He shall so come as ye have seen Him go into heaven."18 As the Son of God, as God equal to and one with the Father, He will not be seen by the wicked; for "blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." Since, then, He promises eternal life to those that believe in Him, and since to believe in Him is to believe in the true Christ, such as He declares Himself and His apostles declare Him to be, true Son of God and true Son of man; you, Manichaeans, who believe on a false and spurious son of a false and spurious man, and teach that God Himself, from fear of the assault of the hostile race, gave up His own members to be tortured, and after all not to be wholly liberated, are plainly far from that eternal life which Christ promises to those who believe in Him. It is true, He said to Peter when he confessed Him to be the Son of God, "Blessed art thou, Simon. Barjona." But does He promise nothing to those who believe Him to be the Son of man, when the Son of God and the Son of man are the same? Besides, eternal life is expressly promised to those who believe in the Son of man. "As Moses," He says, "lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so must the Son of man be lifted up, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have eternal life."19 What more do you wish? Believe then in the Son of man, that you may have eternal life; for He is also the Son of God, who can give eternal life: for He is "the true God and eternal life," as the same John says in his epistle. John also adds, that he is antichrist who denies that Christ has come in the flesh.20

5. There is no need, then that you should extol so much the perfection of Christ's commands, because you obey the precepts of the gospel. For the precepts, supposing you really to fulfill them, would not profit you without true faith. Do you not know that the apostle says, "If I distribute all my goods to the poor, and give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing?"21 Why do you boast of having Christian poverty, when you are destitute of Christian charity? Robbers have a kind of charity to one another, arising from a mutual consciousness of guilt and crime; but this is not the charity commended by the apostle. In another passage he distinguishes true charity from all base and vicious affections, by saying, "Now the end of the commandment is charity out of a pure heart, and a good conscience, and faith unfeigned."22 How then can you have true charity from a fictitious faith?23 You persist in a faith corrupted by falsehood: for your First Man, according to you, used deceit in the conflict by changing his form, while his enemies remained in their own nature; and, besides, you maintain that Christ, who says, "I am the truth," reigned His incarnation, His death on the cross, the wounds of His passion, the marks shown after His resurrection. If you speak the truth, and your Christ speaks falsehood, you must be better than he. But if you really follow your own Christ, your truthfulness may be doubted, and your obedience to the precepts you speak of may be only a pretence. Is it true, as Faustus says, that you have no money in your purses? He means, probably, that your money is in boxes and bags; nor would we blame you for this, if you did not profess one thing and practise another.

Constantius, who is still alive, and is now our brother in Catholic Christianity, once gathered many of your sect into his house at Rome, to keep these precepts of Manichaesus, which you think so much of, though they are very silly and childish. The precepts proved too much for your weakness, and the gathering was entirely broken up. Those who persevered separated from your communion, and are called Mattarians, because they sleep on mats,-a very different bed from the feathers of Faustus and his goatskin coverlets, and all the grandeur that made him despise not only the Mattarians, but also the house of his poor father in Mileum. Away, then, with this accursed hypocrisy from your writing, if not from your conduct; or else your language will conflict with your life by your deceitful words, as your First Man with the race of darkness by his deceitful elements.

6. I am, however, addressing not merely men who fail to do what they are commanded, but the members of a deluded sect. For the precepts of Manichaeus are such that, if you do not keep them, you are deceivers; if you do keep them, you are deceived. Christ never taught you that you should not pluck a vegetable for fear of committing homicide; for when His disciples were hungry when passing through a field of corn, He did not forbid them to pluck the ears on the Sabbath-day; which was a rebuke to the Jews of the time since the action was on Sabbath; and a rebuke in the action itself to the future Manichaeans. The precept of Manichaeus, however, only requires you to do nothing while others commit homicide for you; though the real homicide is that of ruining miserable souls by such doctrines of devils.

7. The language of Faustus has the typhus of heresy in it, and is the language of overweening arrogance. "You see in me" he says, "the beatitudes of the gospel; and do you ask if I believe the gospel? You see me poor, meek, a peacemaker, pure in heart, mourning, hungering, thirsting, bearing persecution and enmity for righteousness' sake; and do you doubt my belief in the gospel?" If to justify oneself were to be just, Faustus would have flown to heaven while uttering these words. I say nothing of the luxurious habits of Faustus, known to all the followers of the Manichaeans, and especially to those at Rome. I shall suppose a Manichaean such as Constantius sought for, when he enforced the observance of these precepts with the sincere desire to see them observed. How can I see him to be poor in spirit, when he is so proud as to believe that his own soul is God, and is not ashamed to speak of God as in bondage? How can I see him meek, when he affronts all the authority of the evangelists rather than believe? How a peacemaker, when he holds that the divine nature itself by which God is whatever is, and is the only true existence, could not remain in lasting peace? How pure in heart, when his heart is filled with so many impious notions? How mourning, unless it is for his God captive and bound till he be freed and escape, with the loss, however, of a part which is to be united by the Father to the mass of darkness, and is not to be mourned for? How hungering and thirsting for righteousness, which Faustus omits in his writings lest, no doubt, he should be thought destitute of righteousness? But how can they hunger and thirst after righteousness, whose perfect righteousness will consist in exulting over their brethren condemned to darkness, not for any fault of their own, but for being irremediably contaminated by the pollution against which they were sent by the Father to contend?

8. How do you suffer persecution and enmity for righteousness' sake, when, according to you, it is righteous to preach and teach these impieties? The wonder is, that the gentleness of Christian times allows such perverse iniquity to pass wholly or almost unpunished. And yet, as if we were blind or silly, you tell us that your suffering reproach and persecution is a great proof of your righteousness. If people are just according to the amount of their suffering, atrocious criminals of all kinds suffer much more than you. But, at any rate, if we are to grant that suffering endured on account of any sort of profession of Christianity proves the sufferer to be in possession of true faith and righteousness, you must admit that any case of greater suffering that we can show proves the possession of truer faith and greater righteousness. Of such cases you know many among our martyrs, and chiefly Cyprian himself, whose writings also bear witness to his belief that Christ was born of the Virgin Mary. For this faith, which you abhor, he suffered and died along with many Christian believers of that day, who suffered as much, or more. Faustus, when shown to be a Manichaean by evidence, or by his own confession, on the intercession of the Christians themselves, who brought him before the proconsul, was, along with some others, only banished to an island, which can hardly be called a punishment at all, for it is what God's servants do of their own accord every day when they wish to retire from the tumult of the world. Besides, earthly sovereigns often by a public decree give release from this banishment as an act of mercy. And in this way all were afterwards released at once. Confess, then, that they were in possession of a truer faith and a more righteous life, who were accounted worthy to suffer for it much more than you ever suffered. Or else, cease boasting of the abhorrence which many feel for you, and learn to distinguish between suffering for blasphemy and suffering for righteousness. What it is you suffer for, your own books will show in a way that deserves your most particular attention.

9. Those evangelical precepts of peculiar sublimity which you make people who know no better believe that you obey, are really obeyed by multitudes in our communion. Are there not among us many of both sexes who have entirely refrained from sexual intercourse, and many formerly married who practise continence? Are there not many others who give largely of their property, or give it up altogether, and many who keep the body in subjection by fasts, either frequent or daily, or protracted beyond belief? Then there are fraternities whose members have no property of their own, but all things common, including only things necessary for food and clothing, living with one soul and one heart towards God, inflamed with a common feeling of charity. In all such professions many turn out to be deceivers and reprobates, while many who are so are never discovered; many, too, who at first walk well, fall away rapidly from willfulness. Many are found in times of trial to have adopted this kind of life with another intention than they professed; and again, many in humility and steadfastness persevere in their course to the end, and are saved. There are apparent diversities in these societies; but one charity unites all who, from some necessity, in obedience to the apostle's injunction, have their wives as if they had them not, and buy as if they bought not, and use this world as if they used it not. With these are joined, in the abundant riches of God's mercy, the inferior class of those to whom it is said, "Defraud not one another, except it be with consent for a time, that ye may give yourselves to prayer; and come together again, that Satan tempt you not for your incontinency. But I speak this by permission, and not of commandment."24 To such the same apostle also says, "Now therefore there is utterly a fault among you, that ye go to law one with another;" while, in consideration of their infirmity, he adds, "If ye have judgments of things pertaining to this life, set them to judge who are least esteemed in the Church."25 For in the kingdom of heaven there are not only those who, that they may be perfect, sell or leave all they have and follow the Lord; but others in the partnership of charity are joined like a mercenary force to the Christian army, to whom it will be said at last, "I was hungry, and ye gave me meat," and so on. Otherwise, there would be no salvation for those to whom the apostle gives so many anxious and particular directions about their families, telling the wives to be obedient to their husbands, and husbands to love their wives; children to obey their parents, and parents to bring up their children in the instruction and admonition of the Lord; servants to obey with fear their masters according to the flesh, and masters to render to their servants what is just and equal. The apostle is far from condemning such people as regardless of gospel precepts, or unworthy of eternal life. For where the Lord exhorts the strong to attain perfection, saying, "If any man take not up his cross and follow me, he cannot be my disciple," He immediately adds, for the consolation of the weak, "Whoso receiveth a just man in the name of a just man shall receive a just man's reward; and whoso receiveth a prophet in the name of a prophet, shall receive a prophet's reward." So that not only he who gives Timothy a little wine for his stomach's sake, and his frequent infirmities, but he who gives to a strong man a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple, shall not lose his reward.26

10. If it is true that a man cannot receive the gospel without giving up everything, why do you delude your followers, by allowing them to keep in your service their wives, and children, and households, and houses, and fields? Indeed, you may well allow them to disregard the precepts of the gospel: for all you promise them is not a resurrection, but a change to another mortal existence, in which they shall live the silly, childish, impious life of those you call the Elect, the life you live yourself, and are so much praised for; or if they possess greater merit, they shall enter into melons or cucumbers, or some eatables which you will masticate, that they may be quickly purified by your digestion. Least of all should you who teach such doctrines profess any regard for the gospel. For if the faith of the gospel had any connection with such nonsense, the Lord should have said, not, "I was hungry, and ye gave me meat;" but, "Ye were hungry, and ye ate me," or, "I was hungry, and I ate you." For, by your absurdities, a man will not be received into the kingdom of God for the service of giving food to the saints, but, because he has eaten them and belched them out, or has himself been eaten and belched into heaven. Instead of saying, "Lord, when saw we Thee hungry, and fed Thee?" the righteous must say, "When saw we Thee hungry, and were eaten by Thee?" And He must answer, not, "When ye gave food to one of the least of these my brethren, you gave to me;" but, "When you were eaten by one of the least of these my brethren, you were eaten by me."

11. Believing and teaching such monstrosities, and living accordingly, you yet have the boldness to say that you obey the precepts of the gospel, and to decry the Catholic Church, which includes many weak as well as strong, both of whom the Lord blesses, because both according to their measure obey the precepts of the gospel and hope in its promises. The blindness of hostility makes you see only the tares in our harvest: for you might easily see wheat too, if you were willing that there should be any. But among you, those who are pretended Manichaeans are wicked, and those who are really Manichaeans are silly. For where the faith itself is false, he who hypocritically professes it acts deceitfully, while he who truly believes is deceived. Such a faith cannot produce a good life, for every man's life is good or bad according as his heart is engaged. If your affections were set upon spiritual and intellectual good, instead of material forms, you would not pay homage to the material sun as a divine substance, and as the light of wisdom, which every one knows you do, though I now only mention it in passing.

Reply to Faustus the Manichaean - Book 6

Book VI.

Book VI.

Faustus avows his disbelief in the Old Testament and his disregard of its precepts, and accuses Catholics of inconsistency in neglecting its ordinances, while claiming to accept it as authoritative. Augustin explains the Catholic view of the relation of the Old Testament to the New.

1. Faustus said: You ask if I believe the Old Testament. Of course not, for I do not keep its precepts. Neither, I imagine, do you. I reject circumcision as disgusting; and if I mistake not, so do you. I reject the observance of Sabbaths as superfluous: I suppose you do the same. I reject sacrifice as idolatry, as doubtless you also do. Swine's flesh is not the only flesh I abstain from; nor is it the only flesh you eat. I think all flesh unclean: you think none unclean. Both alike, in these opinions, throw over the Old Testament. We both look upon the weeks of unleavened bread and the feast of tabernacles as unnecessary and useless. Not to patch linen garments with purple; to count it adultery to make a garment of linen and wool; to call it sacrilege to yoke together an ox and an ass when necessary; not to appoint as priest a bald man, or a man with red hair, or any similar peculiarity, as being unclean in the sight of God, are things which we both despise and laugh at, and rank as of neither first nor second importance; and yet they are all precepts and judgments of the Old Testament. You cannot blame me for rejecting the Old Testament; for whether it is right or wrong to do so, you do it as much as I. As for the difference between your faith and mine, it is this, that while you choose to act deceitfully, and meanly to praise in words what in your heart you hate, I, not having learned the art of deception, frankly declare that I hate both these abominable precepts and their authors.

2. Augustin replied: How and for what purpose the Old Testament is received by the heirs of the New Testament has been already explained.1 But as the remarks of Faustus were then about the promises of the Old Testament, and now he speaks of the precepts, I reply that he displays ignorance of the difference between moral and symbolical precepts. For example, "Thou shalt not covet" is a moral precept; "Thou shalt circumcise every male on the eighth day" is a symbolical precept. From not making this distinction, the Manichaeans, and all who find fault with the writings of the Old Testament, not seeing that whatever observance God appointed for the former dispensation was a shadow of future things, because these observances are now discontinued, condemn them, though no doubt what is unsuitable now was perfectly suitable then as prefiguring the things now revealed. In this they contradict the apostle who says, "All these things happened to them for an example, and they were written for our learning, on whom the end of the world is come."2 The apostle here explains why these writings are to be received, and why it is no longer necessary to continue the symbolical observances. For when he says, "They were written for our learning," he clearly shows that we should be very diligent in reading and in discovering the meaning of the Old Testament Scriptures, and that we should have great veneration for them, since it was for us that they were written. Again, when he says, "They are our examples," and

"these things happened to them for an example," he shows that, now that the things themselves are clearly revealed, the observance of the actions by which these things were prefigured is no longer binding. So he says elsewhere, "Let no man judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holy day, or of the new moon or of the sabbath-days, which are a shadow of things to come."3 Here also, when he says, "Let no one judge you" in these things, he shows that we are no longer bound to observe them. And when he says, "which are a shadow of things to come," he explains how these observances were binding at the time when the things fully disclosed to us were symbolized by these shadows of future things.

3. Assuredly, if the Manichaeans were justified by the resurrection of the Lord,-the day of whose resurrection, the third after His passion, was the eighth day, coming after the Sabbath, that is, after the seventh day,-their carnal minds would be delivered from the darkness of earthly passions which rests on them; and rejoicing in the circumcision of the heart, they would not ridicule it as prefigured in the Old Testament by circumcision in the flesh, although they should not enforce this observance under the New Testament. But, as the apostle says, "To the pure all things are pure. But to the impure and unbelieving nothing is pure, but both their mind and conscience are defiled."4 So these people, who are so pure in their own eyes, that they regard, or pretend to regard, as impure these members of their bodies, are so defiled with unbelief and error, that, while they abhor the circumcision of the flesh,-which the apostle calls a seal of the righteousness of faith,-they believe that the divine members of their God are subjected to restraint and contamination in these very carnal members of theirs. For they say that flesh is unclean; and it follows that God, in the part which is detained by the flesh, is made unclean: for they declare that He must be cleansed, and that till this is done, as far as it can be done, He undergoes all the passions to which flesh is subject, not only in suffering pain and distress, but also in sensual gratification. For it is for His sake, they say, that they abstain from sexual intercourse, that He may not be bound more closely in the bondage of the flesh, nor suffer more defilement. The apostle says, "To the pure all things are pure." And if this is true of men, who may be led into evil by a perverse will, how much more must all things be pure to God, who remains for ever immutable and immaculate! In those books which you defile with your violent reproaches, it is said of the divine wisdom, that "no defiled thing falleth into it, and it goeth everywhere by reason of its pureness."5 It is mere prurient absurdity to find fault with the sign of human regeneration appointed by that God, to whom all things are pure, to be put on the organ of human generation, while you hold that your God, to whom nothing is pure, is in a part of his nature subjected to taint and corruption by the vicious actions in which impure men employ the members of their body. For if you think there is pollution in conjugal intercourse, what must there be in all the practices of the licentious? If you ask, then, as you often do, whether God could not find some other way of sealing the righteousness of faith, the answer is, Why not this way, since all things are pure to the pure, much more to God? And we have the authority of the apostle for saying that circumcision was the seal of the righteousness of the faith of Abraham. As for you, you must try not to blush when you are asked whether your God had nothing better to do than to entangle part of his nature with these members that you revile so much. These are delicate subjects to speak of, on account of the penal corruption attending the propagation of man. They are things which call into exercise the modesty of the chaste, the passions of the impure, and the justice of God.

4. The rest of the Sabbath we consider no longer binding as an observance, now that the hope of our eternal rest has been revealed. But it is a very useful thing to read of, and to reflect on. In prophetic times, when things now manifested were prefigured and predicted by actions as well as words, this sign of which we read was a presage of tim reality which we possess. But I wish to know why you observe a sort of partial rest. The Jews, on their Sabbath, which they still keep in a carnal manner. neither gather any fruit in the field, nor dress and cook it at home. But you, in your rest, wait till one of your followers takes his knife or hook to the garden, to get food for you by murdering the vegetables, and brings back, strange to say, living corpses. For if cutting plants is not murder, why are you afraid to do it? And yet, if the plants are murdered, what becomes of the life which is to obtain release and restoration from your mastication and digestion? Well, you take the living vegetables, and certainly you ought, if it could be done to swallow them whole; so that after the one wound your follower has been guilty of inflicting in pulling them, of which you will no doubt consent to absolve him, they may reach without loss or injury your private laboratory, where your God may be healed of his wound. Instead of this, you not only tear them with your teeth, but, if it pleases your taste, mince them, inflicting a multitude of wounds in the most criminal manner. Plainly it would be a most advantageous thing if you would rest at home too, and not only once a week, like the Jews, but every day of the week. The cucumbers suffer while you are cooking them, without any benefit to the life that is in them: for a boiling pot cannot be compared to a saintly stomach. And yet you ridicule as superfluous the rest of the Sabbath. Would it not be better, not only to refrain from finding fault with the fathers for this observance, in whose case it was not superfluous, but, even now that it is superfluous, to observe this rest yourselves instead of your own, which has no symbolical use, and is condemned as grounded on falsehood? According to your own foolish opinions, you are guilty of a defective observance of your own rest, though the observance itself is foolish in the judgment of truth. You maintain that the fruit suffers when it is pulled from the tree, when it is cut and scraped, and cooked, and eaten. So you are wrong in eating anything that can not be swallowed raw and unhurt, so that the wound inflicted might not be from you, but from your follower in pulling them. You declare that you could not give release to so great a quantity of life, if you were to eat only things which could be swallowed without cooking or mastication. But if this release compensates for all the pains you inflict, why is it unlawful for you to pull the fruit? Fruit may be eaten raw, as some of your sect make a point of eating raw vegetables of all kinds. But before it can be eaten at all, it must be pulled or fall off, or be taken in some way from the ground or from the tree. You might well be pardoned for pulling it, since nothing can be done without that, but not for torturing the members of your God to the extent you do in dressing your food. One of your silly notions is that the tree weeps when the fruit is pulled. Doubtless the life in the tree knows all things, and perceives who it is that comes to it. If the elect were to come and pull the fruit, would not the tree rejoice to escape the misery of having its fruit plucked by others, and to gain felicity by enduring a little momentary pain? And yet, while you multiply the pains and troubles of the fruit after it is plucked, you will not pluck it. Explain that, if you can! Fasting itself is a mistake in your case. There should be no intermission in the task of purging away the dross of the excrements from the spiritual gold, and of releasing the divine members from confinement. The most merciful man among you is he who keeps himself always in good health, takes raw food, and eats a great deal. But you are cruel when you eat, in making your food undergo so much suffering; and you are cruel when you fast, in desisting from the work of liberating the divine members.6

5. With all this, you venture to denounce the sacrifices of the Old Testament, and to call them idolatry, and to attribute to us the same impious notion. To answer for ourselves in the first place, while we consider it no longer a duty to offer sacrifices, we recognize sacrifices as part of the mysteries of Revelation, by which the things prophesied were foreshadowed. For they were our examples, and in many and various ways they all pointed to the one sacrifice which we now commemorate. Now that this sacrifice has been revealed, and has been offered in due time, sacrifice is no longer binding as an act of worship, while it retains its symbolical authority. For these things "were written for our learning, upon whom the end of the world is come."7 What you object to in sacrifice is the slaughter of animals, though the whole animal creation is intended conditionally in some way for the use of man. You are merciful to beasts, believing them to contain the souls of human beings, while you refuse a piece of bread to a hungry beggar. The Lord Jesus, on the other hand, was cruel to the swine when He granted the request of the devils to be allowed to enter into them.8 The same Lord Jesus, before the sacrifice of His passion, said to a leper whom He had cured, "Go, show thyself to the priest, and give the offering, as Moses commanded, for a testimony unto them."9 When God, by the prophets, repeatedly declares that He needs no offering, as indeed reason teaches us that offerings cannot be needed by Him who stands in need of nothing, the human mind is led to inquire what God wished to teach us by these sacrifices. For, assuredly, He would not have required offerings of which He had no need. except to teach us something that it would profit us to know, and which was suitably set forth by means of these symbols. How much better and more honorable it would be for you to be still bound by these sacrifices, which have an instructive meaning, though they are not now necessary, than to require your followers to offer to you as food what you believe to be living victims. The Apostle Paul says most appropriately of some who preached the gospel to gratify their appetite, that their "god was their belly."10 But the arrogance of your impiety goes much beyond this; for, instead of making your belly your god, you do what is far worse in making your belly the purifier of God. Surely it is great madness to make a pretence of piety in not slaughtering animals, while you hold that the souls of animals inhabit all the food you eat, and yet make what you call living creatures suffer such torture from your hands and teeth.

6. If you will not eat flesh why should you not slay animals in sacrifice to your God, in order that their souls, which you hold to be not only human, but so divine as to be members of God Himself, may be released from the confinement of flesh, and be saved from returning by the efficacy of your prayers? Perhaps, however, your stomach gives more effectual aid than your intellect, and that part of divinity which has had the advantage of passing through your bowels is more likely to be saved than that which has only the benefit of your prayers. Your objection to eating flesh will be that you cannot eat animals alive, and so the operation of your stomach will not avail for the liberation of their souls. Happy vegetables, that, torn up with tire hand, cut with knives, tortured in fire, ground by teeth, yet reach alive the altars of your intestines! Unhappy sheep and oxen, that are not so tenacious of life, and therefore are refused entrance into your bodies! Such is the absurdity of your notions. And you persist in making out an opposition in us to the Old Testament, because we consider no flesh unclean: according to the opinion of the apostle, "To the pure all things are pure;"11 and according to the saying of our Lord Himself, "Not that which goeth into your mouth defileth you, but that which cometh out."12 This was not said to the crowd only, as your Adimantus, whom Faustus, in his attack on the Old Testament, praises as second only to Manichaeus, wishes us to understand; but when retired from the crowd, the Lord repeated this still more plainly and pointedly to His disciples. Adimantus quotes this saying of our Lord in opposition to the Old Testament, where the people are prohibited from eating some animals which are pronounced unclean; and doubtless he was afraid that he should be asked why, since he quotes a passage from the Gospel about man not being defiled by what enters into his mouth and passes into his belly, and out into the draft, he yet considers not some only, but all flesh unclean, and abstains from eating it. It is in order to escape from this strait, when the plain truth is too much for his error, that he makes the Lord say this to the crowd; as if the Lord were in the habit of speaking the truth only in small companies, while He blurted out falsehoods in public. To speak of the Lord in this way is blasphemy. And all who read the passage can see that the Lord said the same thing more plainly to His disciples in private. Since Faustus praises Adimantus so much at the beginning of this book of his, placing him next to Manichaeus, let him say in a word whether it is true or false that a man is not defiled by what enters into his mouth. If it is false, why does this great teacher Adimantus quote it against the Old Testament? If it is true, why, in spite of this, do you believe that eating any flesh will defile you? It is true, if you choose this explanation, that the apostle does not say that all things are pure to heretics, but, "to the pure all things are pure." The apostle also goes on to explain why all things are not pure to heretics: "To the impure and unbelieving nothing is pure, but both their mind and conscience are defiled."13 So to the Manichaens there is absolutely nothing pure; for they hold that the very substance or nature of God not only may be, but has actually been defiled, and so defiled that it can never be wholly restored and purified. What do they mean when they call animals unclean, and refrain from eating them, when it is impossible for them to think anything, whether food or whatever it may be, clean? According to them, vegetables too, fruits, all kinds of crops, the earth and sky, are defiled by mixture with the race of darkness. Why do they not act up to their opinions about other things as well as about animals? Why do they not abstain altogether, and starve themselves to death, instead of persisting in their blasphemies? If they will not repent and reform, this is evidently the best thing that they could do.

7. The saying of the apostle, that "to the pure all things are pure," and that "every creature of God is good," is not opposed to the prohibitions of the Old Testament; and the explanation, if they can understand it, is this. The apostle speaks of the natures of the things, while the Old Testament calls some animals unclean, not in their nature, but symbolically, on account of the prefigurative character of that dispensation. For instance, a pig and a lamb are both clean in their nature, for every creature of God is good; but symbolically, a lamb is clean, and a pig unclean. So the words wise and fool are both clean in their nature, as words composed of letters but fool may be called symbolically unclean, because it means an unclean thing. Perhaps a pig is the same among symbols as a fool is among real things. The animal, and the four letters which compose the word, may mean the same thing. No doubt the animal is pronounced unclean by the law, because it does not chew the cud; which is not a fault but its nature. But the men of whom this animal is a symbol are unclean, not by nature, but from their own fault; because, though they gladly hear the words of wisdom, they never reflect on them afterwards. For to recall, in quiet repose, some useful instruction from the stomach of memory to the mouth of reflection, is a kind of spiritual rumination. The animals above mentioned are a symbol of those people who do not do this. And the prohibition of the flesh of these animals is a warning against this fault. Another passage of Scripture speaks of the precious treasure of wisdom, and describes ruminating as clean, and not ruminating as unclean: "A precious treasure resteth in the mouth of a wise man; but a foolish man swallows it up."14 Symbols of this kind, either in words or in things, give useful and pleasant exercise to intelligent minds in the way of inquiry and comparison. But formerly people were required not only to hear, but to practise many such things. For at that time it was necessary that, by deeds as well as by words, those things should be foreshadowed which were in after times to be revealed. After the revelation by Christ and in Christ, the community of believers is not burdened with the practice of the observances, but is admonished to give heed to the prophecy. This is our reason for accounting no animals unclean, in accordance with the saying of the Lord and of the apostle, while we are not opposed to the Old Testament, where some animals are pronounced unclean. Now let us hear why you consider all animal food unclean.

8. One of your false doctrines is, that flesh is unclean on account of mixture with the race of darkness. But this would make not only flesh unclean, but your God himself, in that part which he sent to become subject to absorption and contamination, in order that the enemy might be conquered and taken captive. Besides, on account of this mixture, all that you eat must be unclean. But you say flesh is especially unclean. It requires patience to listen to all their absurd reasons for this peculiar impurity of flesh. I will mention only what will suffice to show the inveterate folly of these critics of the Old Testament, who, while they denounce flesh, savor only fleshly things, and have no sort of spiritual perception. And a lengthy discussion of this question may perhaps enable us to dispense with saying much on some other points. The following, then, is an account of their vain delusions in this matter:-In that battle, when the First Man ensnared the race of darkness by deceitful elements, princes of both sexes belonging to this race were taken. By means of these princes the world was constructed; and among those used in the formation of the heavenly bodies, were some pregnant females. When the sky began to rotate, the rapid circular motion made these females give birth to abortions, which, being of both sexes, fell on the earth, and lived, and grew, and came together, and produced offspring. Hence sprang all animal life in earth, air, and sea.15 Now if the origin of flesh is from heaven, that is no reason for thinking it especially unclean. Indeed, in this construction of the world, they hold that these principles of darkness were arranged higher or lower, according to the greater or less amount of good mixed with them in the construction of the various parts of the world. So flesh ought to be cleaner than vegetables which come out of the earth, for it comes from heaven. And how irrational to suppose that the abortions, before becoming animate, were so lively, though in an abortive state, that after falling from the sky, they could live and multiply; whereas, after becoming animate, they die if brought forth prematurely, and a fall from a very moderate height is enough to kill them! The kingdom of life in contest with the kingdom of death ought to have improved them, by giving them life instead of making them more perishable than before. If the perishableness is a consequence of a change of nature, it is wrong to say that there is a bad nature. The change is the only cause of the perishableness. Both natures are good, though one is better than the other. Whence then comes the peculiar impurity of flesh as it exists in this world, sprung, as they say, from heaven? They tell us, indeed, of the first bodies of these principles of darkness being generated like worms from trees of darkness; and the trees, they say, are produced from the five elements. But supposing that the bodies of animals come in the first place from trees, and afterwards from heaven, why should they be more unclean than the fruit of trees? Perhaps it will be said that what remains after death is unclean, because the life is no longer there. For the same reason fruits and vegetables must be unclean, for they die when they are pulled or cut. As we saw before, the elect get others to bring their food to them, that they may not be guilty of murder. Perhaps, since they say that; every living being has two souls, one of the race of light, and the other of the race of darkness, the good soul leaves at death, and the bad soul remains. But, in that case, the animal would be as much alive as it was in the kingdom of darkness, when it had only the soul of its own race, with which it had rebelled against the kingdom of God. So, since both souls leave at death, why call the flesh unclean, as if only the good soul had left? Any life that remains must be of both kinds; for some remains of the members of God are found, we are told, even in filth. There is therefore no reason for making flesh more unclean than fruits. The truth is, they pretend to great chastity in holding flesh unclean because it is generated. But if the divine body is more grossly shut in by flesh, there is all the more reason that they should liberate it by eating. And there are innumerable kinds of worms not produced from sexual intercourse; some in the neighborhood of Venice come from trees, which they should eat, since there is not the same reason for their being unclean. Besides, there are the frogs produced by the earth after a shower of rain.16 Let them liberate the members of their God from these. Let them rebuke the mistake of mankind in preferring fowls and pigeons produced from males and females to the pure frogs, daughters of heaven and earth. By this theory, the first principles of darkness produced from trees must be purer than Manichaeus, who was produced by generation; and his followers, for the same reason, must be less pure than the lice which spring from the perspiration of their bodies. But if everything that comes from flesh is unclean, because the origin of flesh itself is unclean, fruits and vegetables must also be unclean, because they are manured with dung. After this, what becomes of the notion that fruits are cleaner than flesh? Dung is the most unclean product of flesh, and also the most fertilizing manure. Their doctrine is, that the life escapes in the mastication and digestion of the food, so that only a particle remains in the excrement. How is it, then, that this particle of life has such an effect on the growth and the quality of your favorite food? Flesh is nourished by the productions of the earth, not by its excrements; while the earth is nourished by the excrements of flesh, not by its productions. Let them say which is the cleaner. Or let them turn from being unbelieving and impure to whom nothing is clean, and join with us in embracing the doctrine of the apostle, that to the pure all things are pure; that the earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof; that every creature of God is good. All things in nature are good in their own order; and no one sins in using them, unless, by disobedience to God, he transgresses his own order, and disturbs their order by using them amiss.

9. The elders who pleased God kept their own order by their obedience, in observing, according to God's arrangement, what was appointed as suitable to certain times. So, although all animals intended for food are by nature clean, they abstained from some which had then a symbolical uncleanness, in preparation for the future revelation of the things signified. And so with regard to unleavened bread and all such things, in which the apostle says there was a shadow of future things, neglect of their observance under the old dispensation, when this observance was enjoined, and was employed to prefigure what was afterwards to be revealed, would have been as criminal, as it would now be foolish in us, after the light of the New Testament has arisen, to think that these predictive observances could be of any use to us. On the other hand, since the Old Testament teaches us that the things now revealed were so long ago prefigured, that we may be firm and faithful in our adherence to them, it would be blasphemy and impiety to discard these books, simply because the Lord requires of us now not a literal, but a spiritual and intelligent regard to their contents. They were written, as the apostle says, for our admonition, on whom the end of the world is come.17 "For whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning."18 Not to eat unleavened bread in the appointed seven days was a sin in the time of the Old Testament; in the time of the New Testament it is not a sin. But having the hope of a future world through Christ,who makes us altogether new by clothing our souls with righteousness and our bodies with immortality,to believe that the bondage and infirmity of our original corruption will prevail over us or over our actions, must continue to be a sin, till the seven days of the course of time are accomplished. In the time of the Old Testament, this, under the disguise of a type, was perceived by some saints. In the time of the New Testament it is fully declared and publicly preached.19

What was then a precept of Scripture is now a testimony. Formerly, not to keep the feast of tabernacles was a sin, which is not the case now. But not to form part of the building of God's tabernacle, which is the Church, is always a sin. Formerly this was acted in a figure; now the record serves as testimony. The ancient tabernacle, indeed, would not have been called the tabernacle of the testimony, unless as an appropriate symbol it had borne testimony to some truth which was to be revealed in its own time. To patch linen garments with purple, or to wear a garment of woollen and linen together, is not a sin now. But to live intemperately, and to wish to combine opposite modes of life,-as when a woman devoted to religion wears the ornaments of married women, or when one who has not abstained from marriage dresses like a virgin,-is always sin. So it is sin whenever inconsistent things are combined in any man's life. This, which is now a moral truth, was then symbolized in dress. What was then a type is now revealed truth. So the same Scripture which then required symbolical actions, now testifies to the things signified. The prefigurative observance is now a record for the confirmation of our faith. Formerly it was unlawful to plough with an ox and an ass together; now it is lawful. The apostle explains this when he quotes the text about not muzzling the ox that is treading out the corn. He says, "Does God care for oxen?" What, then, have we to do with an obsolete prohibition? The apostle teaches us in the following words, "For our sakes it is written."20 It must be impiety in us not to read what was written for our sakes; for it is more for our sakes, to whom the revelation belongs, than for theirs who had only the figure. There is no harm in joining an ox with an ass where it is required. But to put a wise man and a fool together, not that one should teach and the other obey, but that both with equal authority should declare the word of God, cannot be done without causing offence. So the same Scripture which was once a command enjoining the shadow in which future things were veiled, is now an authoritative witness to the unveiled truth. In what he says of the uncleanness of a man that is bald or has red hair, Faustus is inaccurate, or the manuscript he has used is incorrect.21 Would that Faustus were not ashamed to bear on his forehead the cross of Christ, the want of which is baldness, instead of maintaining that Christ, who says, "I am the truth," showed unreal marks, after His resurrection, of unreal wounds! Faustus says he has not learned the art of deceiving, and speaks what he thinks. He cannot therefore be a disciple of his Christ, whom he madly declares to have shown false marks of wounds to his disciples when they doubted. Are we to believe Faustus, not only in his other absurdities, but also when he tells us that he does not deceive us in calling Christ a deceiver? Is he better than Christ? Is he not a deceiver, while Christ is? Or does he prove himself to be a disciple not of the truthful Christ, but of the deceiver Manichaeus, by this very falsehood, when he boasts that he has not learned the art of deceiving?

Reply to Faustus the Manichaean - Book 7

Book VII.

Book VII. The genealogical question is again taken up and argued on both sides.

1. Faustus said: You ask why I do not believe in the genealogy of Jesus. There are many reasons; but the principal is, that He never declares with His own lips that He had an earthly father or descent, but on the contrary, that he is not of this world, that He came forth from God the Father, that He descended from heaven, that He has no mother or brethren except those who do the will of His Father in heaven. Besides, the framers of these genealogies do not seem to have known Jesus before His birth or soon after it, so as to have the credibility of eye-witnesses of what they narrate. They became acquainted with Jesus as a young man of about thirty years of age, if it is not blasphemy to speak of the age of a divine being. Now the question regarding a witness is always whether he has seen or heard what he testifies to. But the writers of these genealogies never assert that they heard the account from JesusHimself, nor even the fact of His birth; nor did they see Him till they came to know Him after his baptism, many years after the time of His birth. To me, therefore, and to every sensible man, it appears as foolish to believe this account, as it would be to call into court a blind and deaf witness.

2. Augustin replied: As regards what Faustus calls his principal reason for not receiving the genealogy of Jesus Christ, a complete refutation is found in the passages formerly quoted, where Christ declares Himself to be the Son of man, and in what we have said of the identity of the Son of man with the Son of God: that in His Godhead He has no earthly descent, while after the flesh He is of the seed of David, as the apostle teaches. We are to believe, therefore, that He came forth from the Father, that He descended from heaven, and also that the Word was made flesh and dwelt amongst men. If the words, "Who is my mother, and who are my brethren?"1 are quoted to show that Christ had no earthly mother or descent, it follows that we must believe that His disciples, whom He here teaches by His own example to set no value on earthly relationship, as compared with the kingdom of heaven, had no fathers, because Christ says to them, "Call no man father upon earth; for one is your Father, even God."2 What He taught them to do with reference to their fathers, He Himself first did in reference to His own mother and brethren; as in many other things He condescended to set us an example, and to go before that we might follow in His footsteps. Faustus' principal objection to the genealogy fails completely; and after the defeat of this invincible force, the rest is easily routed. He says that the apostles who declared Christ to be the Son of man as well as the Son of God are not to be believed, because they were not present at the birth of Christ, whom they joined when He had reached manhood, nor heard of it from Christ Himself. Why then do they believe John when he says, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by Him, and without Him was not anything made,"3 and such passages, which they agree to, without understanding them? Where did John see this, or did he ever hear it from the Lord Himself? In whatever way John learned this, those who narrate the nativity may have learned also. Again, how do they know that the Lord said, "Who is my mother, and who are my brethren?" If on the authority of the evangelist, why do they not also believe that the mother and the brethren of Christ were seeking for Him? They believe that Christ said these words, which they misunderstand, while they deny a fact resting on the same authority. Once more, if Matthew could not know that Christ was born, because he knew Him only in His manhood, how could Manichaeus, who lived so long after, know that He was not born? They will say that Manichaeus knew this from the Holy Spirit which was in him. Certainly the Holy Spirit would make him speak the truth. But why not rather believe what Christ's own disciples tell us, who were personally acquainted with Him, and who not only had the gift of inspiration to supply defects in their knowledge, but in a purely natural way obtained information of the birth of Christ, and of His descent, when the event was fresh in memory? And yet he dares to call the apostles deaf and blind. Why were you not deaf and blind, to prevent you from learning such profane nonsense, and dumb too, to prevent you from uttering it?

Reply to Faustus the Manichaean - Book 8

Book VIII.

Book VIII.

Faustus maintains that to hold to the Old Testament after the giving of the New is putting new cloth on an old garment. Augustin further explains the relation of the Old Testament to the New, and reproaches the Manichaeans with carnality.

1. Faustus said: Another reason for not receiving the Old Testament is, that I am provided with the New; and Scripture says that old and new do not agree. For "no one putteth a piece of new cloth unto an old garment, otherwise the rent is made worse."1 To avoid making a worse rent, as you have done, I do not mix Christian newness with Hebrew oldness. Every one accounts it mean, when a man has got a new dress, not to give the old one to his inferiors. So, even if I were a Jew by birth, as the apostles were, it would be proper for me, on receiving the New Testament, to discard the Old, as the apostles did. And having the advantage of being born free from the yoke of bondage, and being early introduced into the full liberty of Christ, what a foolish and ungrateful wretch I should be to put myself again under the yoke! This is what Paul blames the Galatians for; because, going back to circumcision, they turned again to the weak and beggarly elements, whereunto they desired again to be in bondage.2 Why should I do what I see another blamed for doing? My going into bondage would be worse than their returning to it.

2. Augustin replied: We have already shown sufficiently why and how we maintain the authority of the Old Testament, not for the imitation of Jewish bondage, but for the confirmation of Christian liberty. It is not I, but the apostle, who says, "All these things happened to them as an example, and they were written for our admonition, on whom the ends of the world are come."3 We do not therefore, as bondmen, observe what was enjoined as predictive of us; but as free, we read what was written to confirm us. So any one may see that the apostle remonstrates with the Galatians not for devoutly reading what Scripture says of circumcision, but for superstitiously desiring to be circumcised. We do not put a new cloth to an old garment, but we are instructed in the kingdom of heaven, like the householder, whom the Lord describes as bringing out of his treasure things new and old.4 He who puts a new cloth to an old garment is the man who attempts spiritual self-denial before he has renounced fleshly hope. Examine the passage, and you will see that, when the Lord was asked about fasting, He replied, "No man putteth a new cloth to an old garment." The disciples had still a carnal affection for the Lord; for they were afraid that, if He died, they would lose Him. So He calls Peter Satan for dissuading Him from suffering, because he understood not the things of God, but the things of men.5 The fleshly character of your hope is evident from your fancies about the kingdom of God, and from your paying homage and devotion to the light of the sun, which the carnal eye perceives, as if it were an image of heaven. So your carnal mind is the old garment to which you join your fasts. Moreover, if a new cloth and an old garment do not agree, how do the members of your God come to be not only joined or fastened, but to be united far more intimately by mixture and coherence to the principles of darkness? Perhaps both are old, because both are false, and both of the carnal mind. Or perhaps you wish to prove that one was new and the other old, by the rent being made worse, in tearing away the unhappy piece of the kingdom of light, to be doomed to eternal imprisonment in the mass of darkness. So this pretended artist in the fashions of the sacred Scriptures is found stitching together absurdities, and dressing himself in the rags of his own invention.

Reply to Faustus the Manichaean - Book 9

Book IX.

Book IX.

Faustus argues that if the apostles born under the old covenant could lawfully depart from it, much more can he having been born a Gentile. Augustin explains the relation of Jews and Gentiles alike to the Gospel.

1. Faustus said: Another reason for not receiving the Old Testament is, that if it was allowable for the apostles, who were born under it, to abandon it, much more may I, who was not born under it, be excused for not thrusting myself into it. We Gentiles are not born Jews, nor Christians either. Out of the same Gentile world some are induced by the Old Testament to become Jews, and some by the New Testament to become Christians. It is as if two trees, a sweet and a bitter, drew from one soil the sap which each assimilates to its own nature. The apostle passed from the bitter to the sweet; it would be madness in me to change from the sweet to the bitter.

2. Augustin replied: You say that the apostle, in leaving Judaism, passed from the bitter to the sweet. But the apostle himself says that the Jews, who would not believe in Christ, were branches broken off, and that the Gentiles, a wild olive tree, were grafted into the good olive, that is, the holy stock of the Hebrews, that they might partake of the fatness of the olive. For, in warning the Gentiles not to be proud on account of the fall of the Jews, he says: "For I speak to you Gentiles, inasmuch as I am the apostle of the Gentiles. I magnify my office; if by any means I may provoke to emulation them which are my flesh, and might save some of them. For if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead? For if the first fruit be holy, the lump is also holy; and if the root be holy, so are the branches. And if some of the branches are broken off, and thou, being a wild olive tree, were grafted in among them, and with them partakest of the root and fatness of the olive tree; boast not against the branches: but if thou boast, thou bearest not the root, but the root thee. Thou wilt say then, The branches were broken off, that I might be grafted in. Well; because of unbelief they were broken off, and thou standest by faith. Be not high-minded, but fear; for if God spared not the natural branches, take heed lest He also spare not thee. Behold therefore the goodness and severity of God: on them which fell, severity; but toward thee, goodness, if thou continue in His goodness; otherwise thou also shalt be cut off. And they also, if they abide not still in unbelief, shall be grafted in; for God is able to graft them in again. For if thou wert cut out of the olive tree, which is wild by nature, and weft grafted contrary to nature into a good olive tree; how much more shall these, which be the natural branches, be grafted into their own olive tree? For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery (lest ye should be wise in your own conceits), that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fullness of the Gentiles be come in; and so all Israel shall be saved."1 It appears from this, that you, who do not wish to be graffed into this root, though you are not broken off, like the carnal unbelieving Jews, remain still in the bitterness of the wild olive. Your worship of the sun and moon has the true Gentile flavor. You are none the less in the wild olive of the Gentiles, because you have added thorns of a new kind, and worship along with the sun and moon a false Christ, the fabrication not of your hands, but of your perverse heart. Come, then, and be grafted into the root of the olive tree, in his return to which the apostle rejoices, after by unbelief he had been among the broken branches. He speaks of himself as set free, when he made the happy transition from Judaism to Christianity. For Christ was always preached in the olive tree, and those who did not believe on Him when He came were broken off, while those who believed were grafted in. These are thus warned against pride: "Be not high-minded, but fear; for if God spared not the natural branches, neither will He spare thee." And to prevent despair of those broken off, he adds: "And they also, if they abide not still in unbelief, shall be grafted in; for God is able to graft them in again. For if thou weft cut out of the olive tree, which is wild by nature, and wert grafted contrary to nature into a good olive tree, how much more shall these, which be the natural branches, be grafted into their own olive tree." The apostle rejoices in being delivered from the condition of a broken branch, and in being restored to the fatness of the olive tree. So you who have been broken off by error should return and be grafted in again. Those who are still in the wild olive should separate themselves from its barrenness, and become partakers of fertility.

Sermons - Sermon 1

SERMO 1 TREATISE AGAINST THE MANICHAEANS OF WHAT IS WRITTEN:

"In the beginning, God created the heaven and the earth."

"In the beginning was the Word" The calumnies of the Manichaeans.

He who remembers his own debt and the apostolic sentence which says, "Owe nothing to anyone, except to love one another," must compel himself to pay. And in truth, no matter how much the terror of debt collectors weighs upon debtors, charity demands much more vehemently, which removes the weight of fear through exaction and imposes greater reverence. I remember promising Your Charity that a response against the foolish and pernicious slanders of the Manicheans, which attack the Old Testament, would not be absent from us as far as the Lord grants to give. Therefore, heed and see the serpentine snares, and withdrawing from there, submit your necks to the yoke of Christ. For they dare to present such deceits to the unwary as to say that the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments are contrary to each other, so that both cannot be held with one faith. And endeavoring to persuade that the very beginnings of the book of Genesis and the Gospel According to John are opposed, they set them in opposition as if they were meeting from opposite fronts.

Genesis agrees with the Gospel. For Moses says," they claim, "In the beginning God made heaven and earth, and he does not mention the Son through whom all things were made, whereas John says: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. This was in the beginning with God. All things were made through him, and without him nothing was made." Is this contradictory, or rather are they themselves contradictory, who chose to criticize in blindness what they do not understand, rather than seek in piety? For what will they say when I reply that the "beginning" itself is the Son of God, in whom Genesis says God made heaven and earth? Or perhaps I will not be able to prove this, when I know that witnesses are readily available to me from the New Testament itself, to which, whether they like it or not, they bow with the neck of their pride broken? For the Lord says to the unbelieving Jews: If you believed Moses, you would believe me too; for he wrote about me. Therefore, why should I not understand that it is the Lord himself in whom God the Father made heaven and earth in the beginning? For: In the beginning God made heaven and earth, Moses of course wrote, whose having written about the Lord is confirmed by the voice of the Lord himself. Or is he perhaps not also the beginning? Nor should there be any doubt about this, when the Gospel speaks, where the Jews, having asked the Lord who he was, he himself replied: The Beginning, because I even speak to you. Behold, it is in this beginning that God made heaven and earth. Therefore God made heaven and earth in the Son, through whom all things were made and without whom nothing was made, so that, with the Gospel agreeing with Genesis, according to the agreement of both Testaments, we hold the inheritance, leaving to excluded heretics their contentious calumnies.

John, Paul, and Moses. By no means, however, should your wisdom be disturbed because, when the evangelist John did not say: "All things were made in him" but: "All things were made through him," we do not read in Genesis: "Through the beginning God made heaven and earth," but: "In the beginning God made heaven and earth." For the Apostle says: That he might show us the mystery of his will according to his good pleasure which he purposed in him for the dispensation of the fullness of times, to gather together all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth, in him. Just as, therefore, you hear here what he says: in him, that you may understand also "through him," thus in what John says: "All things through him," you are also compelled to understand "in him." And just as my understanding is not taken away here, where I understand all things were made in him, even when I read through him, so in Genesis, when I read that heaven and earth were made in him, who prevents me from understanding also "through him"? Unless perhaps the Manicheans transfer the dispute to the two Testaments, and establish it between the most blessed witnesses of the New Testament, that is, between Paul and John, because one says: in him; the other: through him. But we, just as we do not believe Paul and John to be in contradiction, so we also compel them to confess the harmony between Moses and Paul. And since John agrees with these two as they agree with each other, because he said: through Him, so that he does not prohibit understanding "in Him," all the divine writings remain in peace with each other. But as it usually happens, when we observe clouds passing through the darkness of night, our sight is disturbed by their gloom, so that the stars seem to run in the opposite direction to us: thus these heretics, because they do not find peace in the cloud of their error, it seems to them rather that the divine Scripture is in discord. The Two Testaments are not contrary to each other.

Perhaps they might say that it was not said about the Word of God: "In the beginning, God created heaven and earth." Let it be so: let it be understood that what is written, "In the beginning, God created heaven and earth," is not in the beginning that is the only Son of God, but in the beginning of time. Not that time already existed before there was any creature (for no one would say that time is co-eternal with God, who is the creator of times), but that time began to be with heaven and earth. Therefore, if someone understands thus, recognizing at least the distinction between the creature and the Creator, not saying that what was made is co-eternal with God who made it; indeed, in that word, the number of persons will shine forth, where it is said: "Let us make man to our image and likeness"; and: "God made man to the image of God." Even if it were not apparent, and under the appellation of unity the Trinity would be hinted to those who understand, the beginning of Genesis should not seem contrary to the beginning of the Gospel to the prudent. For it could not appear otherwise to anyone except the imprudent. We have innumerable examples of such expressions in the Scriptures. The Lord himself, speaking, says: "But I say to you, do not swear at all, neither by heaven, because it is God's throne, nor by the earth because it is the footstool of His feet." Will they perhaps deny that Christ sits in heaven because He does not name Himself there? Likewise, the Apostle says: "O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are His judgments, and His ways past finding out! For who has known the mind of the Lord, or who has been His counselor? Or who has first given to Him, and it shall be repaid to him? Because from Him, and through Him, and in Him are all things. To Him be glory forever." Even here the mention of the Son is not made explicitly. The Apostle says there is one God and Lord, from whom are all things, through whom are all things, in whom are all things. Why then did they choose Moses to oppose to John the Evangelist, but did not want to oppose the Apostle Paul to him? Because evidently, they wanted to persuade unskilled people that the two Testaments are contrary, so that they might use one witness and reject the other. This is what their error professes. For if there were another, whose equally foolish rage would try to show that the New Testament itself is contrary in the presence of the unskilled, what else would he do but propose Paul and John, just as these Moses and John, as if they were enemies quarreling? But as the most sincere and true faith commends the concord of Paul and John, and in what blessed Paul says: "From Him, and through Him, and in Him are all things," teaches to understand not only the Father, but also the Son and the Holy Spirit, so looking to the peace of Moses and John, in what Moses said: "In the beginning, God created heaven and earth," if he accepts “beginning” as time, he recognizes nothing else in what was said, God, but the unity of the Trinity; or “beginning” in which God made heaven and earth, he embraces as the Son without hesitation. There are many other things that we can mention according to these rules of expression of the divine Scriptures. But to not burden the memory of Your Holiness, it will be sufficient to have mentioned these. We encourage you to seek the rest yourselves, or to notice as the Scriptures are read, and to consider and discuss them among yourselves harmoniously.

Sermons - Sermon 10

SERMO 10 TRACTATE OF AURELIUS AUGUSTINE, BISHOP On the Judgment of Solomon BETWEEN TWO PROSTITUTE WOMEN The miraculous judgment of Solomon. The Scripture of the Kings proclaims the remarkable judgment of Solomon concerning two women disputing over a newborn child. For it is written: Then two harlots appeared before King Solomon, and they stood in his presence. And one woman said: Consider, my lord, I and this woman dwelled in one house, and I gave birth in the house. And it happened on the third day after I gave birth, this woman also gave birth to a son, and we were together, and there was no one with us in the house except the two of us. And the son of this woman died at night, for she lay on him. And she arose at midnight, and took my son from beside me, and laid him in her bosom, and her dead son in my bosom. And I arose in the morning to nurse my son, and behold, he was dead: but when I examined him in the morning, behold, he was not my son whom I had borne. And the other woman said: No, but my son is the living one, and your son is the dead one. And she said, No, but your son is the dead one, and my son is the living one. And so they spoke before the king. And the king said to them: You say, This is my son who lives, and your son is dead; and you say, No, but my son lives, and your son is dead. And the king said: Bring me a sword. And they brought a sword before the king. And the king said: Divide the living child in two, and give half to one and half to the other. And the woman whose son was the living one answered the king, for her womb yearned upon her son; and she said: Oh, my lord, give her the living child, and in no way slay it. But the other said: Let it be neither mine nor yours, divide it. And the king answered and said: Give the living child to her, and in no way slay it, for she is the mother. The prudence indeed of the king granted by divine gift shines wondrously in this judgment. For it was fitting and proper that no other be judged the mother of the child, except she who in a certain way conceived it again when she knew it had been taken away, and bore it again while defending it from the false mother, and bore it once more by not allowing it to be killed. Nevertheless, as the old Divine Books are accustomed, not only affirming the truth of the deed but also indicating a mystery of what is to come, this Scripture must be considered, to understand whether in these two women something significant and figurative is shown to us.

Two women: Synagogue and Church. And indeed, two women, the Synagogue and the Church, come to mind at first glance. For the Synagogue is convicted of having killed Christ, her son born of the Jews according to the flesh, while sleeping, that is, by following the light of this present life, and not understanding the manifestation of the truth in the words of the Lord; hence it is also written: "Awake, you who sleep, and rise from the dead, and Christ will give you light." Also, the fact that the two of them were living alone in one house not absurdly signifies that besides the circumcised and uncircumcised, no other kind of religion is found in this world, so that in the person of one woman, you might establish one kind of circumcised people under the worship and law of one God, while in the person of the other woman, you might understand the entire gentility of the uncircumcised devoted to the worship of idols. Both were, however, prostitutes. For the Apostle says that Jews and Greeks are all under sin. For every soul, which, forsaking the eternity of truth, delights in earthly filthiness, commits fornication against the Lord. And it is clear that the Church, coming from gentile fornication, has not killed Christ. But how is it that she herself is the mother of Christ? Consider the Gospel, and hear the Lord saying: "Whoever does the will of my Father, he is my mother, and brother, and sister." Where then did this one sleep, not to be suffocated by sleep, but yet that a dead man might be laid before her and a living one taken away? Is it perhaps that the very sacrament of circumcision, which remained dead among the Jews because they perceived it completely carnally, this sacrament of circumcision, which did not live among those Jews who killed Christ, who is the life of all sacraments - since it is understood vitally in Him who is celebrated visibly among the Jews - this sacrament of circumcision, then, as if a lifeless body, certain Jews wanted to persuade the gentiles to accept, who had believed in Christ, as it is written in the Acts of the Apostles, saying that they could not be saved unless they were circumcised. But they persuaded this to those ignorant of the law, as if in the darkness of night, laying a dead son before them. Nor could that persuasion have had any effect without some measure of the sleep of foolishness creeping over the Church of the gentiles. The Apostle seems to awaken her as it were sleeping, exclaiming: "O foolish Galatians, who has bewitched you?" And a little later: "Are you so foolish, having begun in the Spirit, are you now made perfect by the flesh?" As if he were to say: Are you so foolish, that having first had a living spiritual work, you later received it dead, having lost it as something alien to yourselves? For the Apostle himself says elsewhere: "The Spirit is life because of righteousness." And elsewhere: "To be carnally minded is death." By these and similar words, that mother awakens, and it becomes morning for her, as the Word of God, that is, Christ, who was arising, that is, speaking in Paul, illuminates the obscurity of the law. For He illuminated her when He said: "Tell me, you who want to be under the law, do you not hear the law? For it is written that Abraham had two sons, one by the bondwoman, and one by the free woman: but he who was of the bondwoman was born according to the flesh; but he of the free woman was by promise; which things are an allegory. For these are the two covenants, one indeed from Mount Sinai, which gives birth to bondage, which is Hagar. For this Hagar is Mount Sinai in Arabia, and corresponds to Jerusalem which now is, for she is in bondage with her children. But Jerusalem which is above is free." It is not therefore surprising if, because of dead works, she pertains to the one below as dead; and because of spiritual works, she pertains to the Jerusalem above as living. For the infernal regions are below where the dead pertain; but the heavenly regions are above where the living pertain. By this illumination, as if the morning has come, the Church understands the spiritual grace, repelling from herself the carnal work of the law, as though a dead alien, and claiming for herself the living faith, because "the just shall live by faith," which she has attained in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, and therefore knows the three-day-old son as her own, nor does she allow him to be taken away from her. The grace of the Gospel does not pertain to the Jews.

Now, let that one claim that the Gospel is theirs, as if it is owed to them and generated by themselves. For this is what they used to say to the Gentiles in the very contention, those who, thinking carnally, dared to call themselves Christians, though they were from the Jews. For they would say that the Gospel had come as a debt to their own righteousness. But it was not theirs, which they did not know how to hold spiritually. Therefore, although they were called Christians, boasting in a name that was alien to them, as if it were about a son whom they had not begotten, they even dared to contend, since they themselves had ejected the spirit of understanding from the works of the law, as if casting out the soul from their body of works. And by extinguishing the living spirit of prophecy, they remained with carnal works devoid of life, that is, devoid of spiritual understanding. They also wished to impose these upon the Gentiles, and to take away from them the name of Christian as if it were a living son. The Apostle refuted them in such a way that he said that the Christian grace pertained to them so much the less the more they claimed it for themselves as if it were owed to them and gloried in it as if it were theirs by the right of works. For to the one who works, he says, the reward is not counted according to grace but according to debt. But to the one who does not work, but believes in Him who justifies the ungodly, faith is accounted for righteousness. And therefore, he also excludes them from the number of those who rightly believed from among the Jews and retained the living spiritual grace. He speaks of the remnants of the Jewish people being saved, while the multitude went into destruction. So therefore, even at this time, he says, the remnants are saved by the election of grace. But if by grace, then it is no longer on the basis of works; otherwise, grace would no longer be grace, so that those who claim the reward of the Gospel for their works, as if it were owed and given, are excluded from grace, like the Synagogue shouting: My son is mine. But she was lying. For she had received him, but sleeping on him, that is, being arrogant, she had killed him. However, this mother was now awake and understood that it was not by her merits, for she was a harlot, but by the grace of God that the son had been granted to her, namely the work of evangelical faith which she desired to nurture in the bosom of her heart. Therefore, that one sought human glory in an alien son; this one preserved the affection of love in her own.

Let the unity of Christian grace not be divided. That royal judgment between the two women reminds us of nothing else except that we must contend for the truth and expel hypocrisy as a false mother from the spiritual gift of the Church, just as from a living son that does not belong to her, and not allow her to dominate the grace granted to others which she could not keep for herself. But let us do this defending and contending, not to the point of the danger of division. For that sentence of the judge, when he ordered the child to be divided, was not a separation of unity, but a proving of love. For the name of Solomon, as the Latins interpret it, is peaceful. Therefore, the peaceful king does not tear apart the members that contain the vital spirit in unity and concord. But by threatening, he finds the true mother and by judging, he separates the false one. If therefore it comes to such a temptation, lest the unity of Christian grace be divided, we are taught to say, "Give her the child, only let him live." For the true mother does not seek the honor of being a mother, but the safety of the child. Wherever he may be, the sincere affection of the mother will possess him more than the usurpation of the false one. The son of a harlot by the grace of God.

Similarly, I see these two women in one house as signifying two types of people in one Church: one of those in whom deceit rules, the other in whom true charity reigns. So we should consider these two women as representations of love and deceit. For deceit falsely imitates love. Hence the Apostle warns against it, saying: "Love without deceit." Although they inhabit one house as long as that net of the Gospel is in the sea, enclosing together both good and bad fish until brought to shore, each performs their own works. Both were prostitutes, because all are turned from worldliness to the grace of God, and none can truly boast of previous merits of justice. The prostitute's fornication is her own, but having a son of God is another matter. For all men are formed by one God the Creator. It is not surprising that even in human sins, God works well. For from the crime of Judas the traitor, our Lord brought about the salvation of the human race. But the difference is that when God makes something good from someone's sin, often the sinner himself would not have wanted it. Not only because when he sins, he does not sin with the intention by which God in His providence brings about justice through his sin—Judas did not betray Christ with the same intention with which Christ allowed himself to be betrayed—but also because when he realizes the outcome of his sin leads to something better, which he did not want, he grieves rather than rejoices. It is as if someone trying to give poison to a sick enemy, being mistaken in the nature of the medicine, offers something beneficial instead, and the sick man becomes healthy by God’s favor, who willed to convert his enemy's crime into salvation. When the wicked one realizes this, he is tormented by the health brought about through his hands. However, if the prostitute gladly accepts the son she has conceived and does not expel from her womb what she has conceived due to the vile motivation of lust or greed for sordid profit, then the desire that once extended to many is now turned towards the gift of God, and it will no longer be called desire but love. So, the son of a prostitute is rightly understood as the grace of a sinner. From the old disgrace, a new man is born through the forgiveness of sins.

First love, afterwards pretense.

Therefore, the Lord, and in that number of disciples, although He chose them all from among sinners, nonetheless chose the former ones to persevere in love, rather than Judas the pretender. It is indeed not written in what order he was chosen, but it is evident that the good ones were chosen before him, and not without reason is he numbered last. And after the Lord's ascension, the Holy Spirit, as promised by the Lord, was sent from above to all who were in one place and was infused in them. Those from whom the Church began were good and loved without pretense. Later, therefore, pretense began to operate in the Church, and thus prior love bore fruit. The fruit of love is greater by a third day, so that continence, justice, and the expectation of future things can now be recognized. Pretense indeed, even if it gives birth, that is, even if it is gladdened for a brief time by the remission of sins, oppressed as if by the secular sleep of desire, when it is cast down from the hope of heavenly rewards, falls back into earthly rest with a heavy heart, suffocates the forgiveness it had earned by faith, as if while sleeping. Such men prefer to rejoice in the name of justice rather than in its truth, and attempt to transfer good works of others to themselves through obscure deceptions, as if by night they tried to transfer a living son to themselves by lying. Moreover, they not only usurp the good deeds of others, but also cast their own crimes upon others, as if substituting a dead son.

Two times of the Church But when will hypocrisy be allowed so much that it boasts with the false name of justice, with no one prohibiting it, and extinguishes the spiritual, living work, which it did not generate, and which it once generated in itself with the weight of cruelest slumber, applying to itself the deceptive boast of the maternal name, and imputes its crimes to the good and innocent? When, therefore, will hypocrisy reign so, unless when iniquity abounds, that is, the darkness of sins will prevail as in a blind night, and the charity of many will grow cold, that is, the mother of the spiritual work will sleep like a living child? However, because charity will cool so as to fervor less negligently - for it was not said it will be completely extinguished so that it no longer exists at all - so this mother slept not to kill her son, but nevertheless gave place to the frauds of hypocrisy. But having been awakened, when she sees the impiety which she herself did not commit being imputed to her by those who commit it, and sees hypocrisy dare to boast of the spiritual work of grace which she guarded, herself being called the worker of iniquity, and hypocrisy the mother of good work, she implores the help of the peaceful Judge. For Solomonic means peaceful. Whom we see having given two judgments, the first as if ignorant, the final indeed with manifest knowledge of judgment. The first proposes a test of piety, the second gives a reward to the victor. In the first, the mother is tested, in the last, she is suckled. In the first, she weeps and sows her seed, in the second, with exultation, she brings back her sheaves. This pertains to the two eras of the Church which the Lord Christ, the peaceful judge, moderates; one which is now, the other which is to come. In this one we are tested, in that one we are crowned. In the Church of Christ, even honor is scorned for the sake of unity. But there is no greater proof of love in the Church of Christ than when even the honor which appears to be esteemed among men is despised, so that the members of the little one are not divided and the Christian weakness is not torn by the schism of unity. For the Apostle says that he had shown himself as a mother to the little ones in whom he had done the good work of the Gospel, not by himself but by the grace of God with him. For that harlot could not say anything except sins, but the gift of fecundity was from God. However, the grace of the giver is loved so much more as punishment was due. And the Lord rightly says about the harlot: To whom much is forgiven, much is loved. Therefore, the apostle Paul says: I became a little one in the midst of you, as a nurse cherishes her children. But when it comes to the danger where the little one might be divided, when false imitation claims honor for itself and is ready to tear apart unity, let the mother despise her own honor, while she sees the child whole and alive, lest she persistently claims the honor due to her heart, she gives place to imitation to divide the weak members by the sword of schism. Therefore, let the mother of love say: Give her the child. Whether by occasion or by truth Christ is proclaimed. In Moses, love cries out: Lord, either forgive them, or blot me out of your book. But in the Pharisees, imitation speaks: If we let him go, the Romans will come and take away our nation and place. For they did not want the truth, but wanted to have the name of justice and to hold the honor due to the just through deceit. Nevertheless, imitation reigning in them was allowed to sit on the chair of Moses, so that it could be said by the Lord: Do what they say, but do not do what they do; so having false honor, yet they nurture the weak and little ones with the truth of Scriptures. For imitation has its own crime, by which it extinguished the new man whom it had received through the grace of the giver by the weight of its own lethargy, but the milk of faith it has, is not its own. Because even if the little one is killed, which signifies the reborn life, now set in evil habits, imitation retains in memory, as in breasts, the words of faith and Christian doctrine which is handed over to all who come to the Church. From this milk, even the false mother could infuse the little one, who was suckling the juice of true faith. From this, the true mother is secure, when even by those who pretend, in the Church the little one is nourished with the milk of divine Scriptures of the Catholic faith, when division is prohibited and unity is preserved, and by the final judgment of the judge, which figures the last judgment of Christ, love is proven, which for the sake of the child’s salvation and the foundation of unity even ceded honor to imitation, so that holding the love and embrace of life-giving grace, enjoys the eternal reward of a pious mother.

Sermons - Sermon 100

SERMO 100 On the Words of the Gospel, Luke 9:57-62 WHERE IT IS DEALT WITH THREE, OF WHOM ONE SAID:

"Lord, I will follow you wherever you go," and he was rejected.

Another did not dare, and he was aroused; a third delayed, and he was blamed.

Why is he condemned who professes to follow Christ? From the chapter of the Gospel, which the Lord has given, listen. For it has been read that the Lord Jesus acted differently when one offered himself to follow Him and was rejected; another did not dare, and was encouraged; a third delayed, and was blamed. For He said: "Lord, I will follow You wherever You go"; what could be so eager, what so quick, what so ready, and what so fit for such a great good, as to follow the Lord wherever He goes? Are you surprised by this, saying: "What is this, that to the good Teacher, of the Lord Jesus Christ inviting disciples to whom He would give the kingdom of heaven, such readiness was displeasing?" But because He was such a Teacher, who foresaw the future, we understand, brothers, that this man, if he followed Christ, would have sought his own, not what is of Jesus Christ. For He Himself said: "Not everyone who says to Me, 'Lord, Lord,' shall enter the kingdom of heaven." And this man was of those, nor did he know himself as the physician inspected. For if he had already observed himself to be false, if he already knew himself to be deceitful and treacherous, he did not know to whom he spoke. For he is of whom the evangelist said: "He had no need that anyone should testify of man, for He knew what was in man." So what did He answer? "The foxes have holes and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of Man has nowhere to lay His head." But where does He not have? In your faith. For the foxes have holes in your heart, you are deceitful; the birds of the air have nests in your heart, you are arrogant. Deceitful and arrogant, you do not follow Me. How does a deceitful person follow simplicity?

Called by another from Christ. And to another who was immediately silent and said nothing, who promised nothing, he said: Follow me. As much evil as he saw in that one, he saw as much good in this one. You say: Follow me, to one who is unwilling. Behold, you have a man ready. I will follow you wherever you go: and you say to the unwilling: Follow me? He, says, I avoid; for I see pits there, I see nests. Why then are you troubling this one, whom you are calling and who excuses himself? Behold, you even compel, and he does not come; you exhort, and he does not follow. For what does he say? I will first go to bury my father. The faith of his heart was showing itself to the Lord: but piety was delaying. However, when the Lord Christ prepares men for the Gospel, he wants no excuse to be interposed of this carnal and temporal piety. Indeed, this is what the law of God holds, and the Lord himself reproaches the Jews, for they were destroying the very commandment of God. And the Apostle Paul placed and said in his Epistle: This is the first commandment with a promise. What? Honor your father and your mother. Surely God said it. Therefore, this young man wanted to obey God and bury his father: but there is a place, and time, and matter which serves this matter, this time, this place. The father is to be honored, but God is to be obeyed. The begetter is to be loved, but the Creator is to be preferred. I, he says, call you to the Gospel, to another work you are necessary for me: this is greater than what you wish to do. Let the dead bury their dead. Your father is dead: there are others dead who may bury the dead. Who are the dead burying the dead? Can the dead be buried by the dead? How do they wrap, if they are dead? How do they carry, if they are dead? How do they mourn, if they are dead? And they wrap, and they carry, and they mourn, and they are dead: because they are unbelievers.

Charity must be ordered.

He taught us what is written in the Song of Songs, with the Church saying: "Draw me in love." What is "Draw me in love"? Make steps, and give to each what is due. Do not put the last things before the first. Love your parents, but put God before your parents. Consider the mother of the Maccabees: "Children," she said, "I do not know how you appeared in my womb. I was able to conceive you, I was able to give birth to you; I was not able to form you: therefore, listen to Him, put Him before me; do not pay attention, lest I be left without you." She commanded, and they followed. What the mother taught her children, the Lord Jesus Christ was teaching the one to whom He said: "Follow Me." The third is reproached for looking back at his own. The third one looking back at his people is blamed. Election according to grace. For now another disciple placed himself in the midst, to whom no one said anything: I will follow you, Lord, he said, but I go first to announce this to those who are at home. I believe this is the meaning: I will tell my people, lest, as often happens, they ask about me. And the Lord: No one putting his hand to the plow and looking back is fit for the kingdom of heaven. The Orient calls you, and you heed the Occident. In this chapter, we learn this because the Lord chose whom he willed. And he chose, as the Apostle says, according to his grace and according to their righteousness. For such are the words of the Apostle: Consider, he says, what Elijah says: Lord, they have killed your Prophets, they have overthrown your altars, and I alone am left, and they seek my life. But what does the divine response say to him? I have left for myself seven thousand men, who have not bowed the knee to Baal. You think you are the only servant laboring well: there are others fearing me, and not few. For I have seven thousand there. And he added: So also in this time. For some Jews believed, and many were rejected: like the one who bore in mind the dens of foxes. So, then, he says, also in this time, the remnants by grace’s election were saved; that is, the same Christ as then and now, who also then said to Elijah: I left for myself. What does it mean: I left for myself? I chose them because I saw their minds trusting in me, not in themselves, nor in Baal. They have not changed, they are as I made them. And you who speak, if you did not trust in me, where would you be? If you were not filled with my grace, would you not also bend your knee before Baal? But you are filled with my grace; for you presumed nothing of your own virtue, but all from my grace. Therefore, do not boast in this, that you think you have no fellow servants in your service: there are those whom I have chosen, just as I have chosen you, trusting in me: as the Apostle says: And now the remnants by grace’s election were saved. The elect owe everything to the grace of God.

Beware, O Christian, beware of pride. For even if you are an imitator of the saints, always attribute everything to grace: because if any remnant exists, God's grace in you, not your merit, has caused it. Indeed, the prophet Isaiah said about these remnants when he recalled: Unless the Lord of hosts had left us a seed, we should have been as Sodom, and made like unto Gomorrah. So then, he says, even at this present time there is a remnant according to the election of grace. But if by grace, he says, then it is no more of works; that is, do not boast of your merit: otherwise grace is no more grace. For if you presume upon your work; a reward is given to you, not grace conferred.

But if it is of grace, it is given freely. I ask now: Do you believe, O sinner, in Christ? You say: I believe. What do you believe? That all sins can be forgiven to you freely through him? You have what you believed. O grace freely given! What about you, righteous one, do you believe that without God you cannot preserve justice? Then attribute everything to his mercy, that you are righteous: but attribute to your iniquity the fact that you are a sinner. Be your own accuser, and he will be your pardoner. For every crime, felony, or sin, is due to our negligence: and all virtue and holiness, to God's indulgence. Turned to the Lord.

Sermons - Sermon 101

SERMO 101 SERMON TO BE DELIVERED AT CARTHAGE IN THE BASILICA OF FAUSTUS Of the Harvest and the Sower and the Preaching of the Gospel The harvest is among the Jews, the sowing among the Gentiles. In the reading of the Gospel that was just recited, we are admonished to seek what harvest it is about which the Lord said: "The harvest indeed is plentiful, but the laborers are few. Pray therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he would send laborers into his harvest." Then he added to his twelve disciples, whom he also named Apostles, another seventy-two, and sent them all, as it appears from his words, into the prepared harvest. Therefore, what was that harvest? For that harvest was not among the Gentiles, where nothing had been sown. Therefore, it remains for us to understand that this harvest was among the people of the Jews. To that harvest, the Lord of the harvest came; to that harvest he sent reapers: but to the Gentiles, not reapers, but sowers. We should therefore understand that the harvest was made among the Jewish people, the sowing among the peoples of the Gentiles. For from that harvest the Apostles were chosen. There, when it was already being reaped, it was ripe; because there the Prophets had sown. It is pleasing to look at the agriculture of God, and to be delighted by his gifts, and by the laborers in his field. For in this agriculture he was working who said: "I labored more than all of them." But strength was given to him to work by the Lord of the harvest: therefore he added: "Not I, but the grace of God with me." For he sufficiently showed that he was involved in agriculture, where he said: "I planted, Apollos watered." But this Apostle from Saul to Paul, that is from proud to least: for Saul is named after Saul; but Paul is small: whence interpreting his name in a certain way, he said: "I am the least of the Apostles." This Paul, therefore, that is, small and least, sent to the Gentiles, says that he was especially sent to the Gentiles. He writes, we read, we believe, we preach. Therefore, he says in his Epistle which is to the Galatians, that he, called already by the Lord Jesus, had come to Jerusalem, and had conferred the Gospel with the Apostles, had received the right hands from them, and the sign of concord, the sign of agreement, that had learned nothing different from them. Then he says it pleased each other that he should go to the Gentiles, and they to the circumcision; he the sower, they the reapers. Rightly also the Athenians, although not knowing, called him by his name. For hearing the word from him: "Who is this sower of words?" they say. The harvest is twofold: of the Jews and of the Gentiles.

Therefore, pay attention, and delight with me in examining the agriculture of God, and in it two harvests, one past, the other future: the past in the Jewish people, the future among the peoples of the Gentiles. Let us prove this: and from where else but from the Scripture of God, the Lord of the harvest? Behold, we have it said in the present chapter: The harvest is plentiful, but the laborers are few. Pray therefore the Lord of the harvest to send out laborers into his harvest. But because in that harvest there were to be contradictors and persecutors, the Jews: Behold, he says, I send you as lambs in the midst of wolves. Let us show something more evident about this harvest in the Gospel according to John: at the well where the tired Lord sat, there were indeed great mysteries enacted, but there is little time to consider them all. As it pertains to the present matter, listen. We have undertaken to show the harvest among the peoples, among whom the Prophets preached:

for they were the sowers, that the Apostles might be the reapers. The Samarian woman speaks with the Lord Jesus, and among other things, when the Lord had told her how God must be worshiped, she says: We know that the Messiah is coming, who is called Christ, and he will teach us all things. And the Lord to her: I am he who speaks with you. Believe what you hear: why do you seek what you see? I am he who speaks with you. But what she had said: We know that Messiah will come, whom Moses and the Prophets announced, who is called Christ. Then indeed the ear of grain was already formed. It had received the Prophets as sowers, it awaited the Apostles to mature as reapers. As soon as she heard this, she believed, and left her water jar, and hastened to run, she began to announce the Lord. The disciples had then gone to buy bread: returning they found the Lord speaking with the woman, and they were amazed. Yet they did not dare ask him: What or why do you speak with her? They had admiration within themselves, they pressed their daring in their hearts. To this Samaritan woman, the name of Christ was not new, she was already expecting him to come, she already believed he would come. From where had she believed, had not Moses sown? But hear this more expressly. Then the Lord said to his disciples: You say that summer is still far off, lift up your eyes, and see the fields white for harvest. And he adds: Others have labored, and you have entered into their labor. Abraham labored, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, the Prophets; they labored in sowing; in the Lord's advent the harvest was found mature. The reapers sent with the sickle of the Gospel, they brought the sheaves to the Lord’s threshing floor, where Stephen was threshed. The seed of the Gospel transmitted to the nations. But here comes Paul, and he is sent to the Gentiles. And he does not remain silent in commending the grace he especially and appropriately received. For he says in his writings that he was sent to preach the Gospel where Christ was not named. But now that harvest has been made, and all the Jews who have remained, let us consider the harvest, which is us. For it was sown by the Apostles and Prophets. The Lord himself sowed (for he was in the Apostles, as Christ himself reaped. For they did nothing without him: he is perfect without them. For he himself said to them: Because without me, you can do nothing). Therefore, Christ, sowing among the Gentiles, says what? A sower went out to sow. There the reapers are sent to harvest, here the sower went out to sow diligently. For what did he fear, that some fell on the path, some on rocky places, some among thorns? If he feared these difficult soils, he would not reach the good soil. What matters to us, what is there now to dispute about the Jews and talk about the chaff? Let the eye be on us, not on the path, not on the rock, not among thorns, but on the good soil (my heart is prepared, God) from which thirtyfold, sixtyfold, hundredfold will come forth. That is less, and that is more; but it is all wheat. Let it not be the path, where the seed trampled by passersby is taken away by the enemy like a bird. Let it not be the rock, where a little soil makes it germinate quickly, which cannot bear the sun. Let it not be the thorns, the desires of the world, the worries of a vicious life. For what is worse than the worry of life that does not permit one to reach life? What is more miserable than losing life while caring for life? What is more unfortunate than fearing death and falling into death? Let the thorns be uprooted, the field prepared, the seeds received, the harvest reached, the barn desired, and the fire not feared. The roles of a shepherd to explain to the people what benefits them.

Therefore, it pertains to us, whom the Lord has established as whatever kind of workers in His field, to say these things to you, to sow, to plant, to water, even to dig around some trees and apply a basket of manure; it pertains to us to do these things faithfully: to you, to receive faithfully: to the Lord, to assist us working, and you believing, all laborers but conquering the world in Him.

So what pertains to you, I have said: what pertains to us, I want to say. But perhaps it seems to someone among you that I said I want to say something superfluous, and speaking to himself in thought says: Oh if he would dismiss us now! He has already said what pertains to us; what pertains to him, what to us? I think it better that in alternate and mutual love we pertain to you. For indeed, of one family you are now, we are stewards of the same family indeed, we all pertain to one Lord. Nor do I give what is mine; but of Him from whom I also receive. For if I give what is mine, I will give a lie. For he who speaks a lie, speaks from his own. Therefore you ought to hear what pertains to the steward, whether so that in you yourselves, if you find such, you may rejoice, or even in this very thing you may be instructed. For how many future stewards are in this people? And we were there where you are: and we who now seem to distribute food from a higher place to fellow servants, a few years ago, in a lower place, were receiving food with fellow servants. I speak as a bishop to the laity: but hence I know I speak to many future bishops.

Precepts established for preachers should not be understood carnally. So let us see how we ourselves understand what the Lord commanded those whom He sent to preach the Gospel and reap the ready harvest. Let us see. "Carry no purse, no bag, no sandals; and greet no one on the road." And into whatever house you enter, say: Peace to this house. If there is a son of peace there, your peace will rest upon him; if not, it will return to you. We must briefly survey all these things. "Carry no purse," He says. What do we do? We confess, we carry a purse when we travel: we carry money on the road. Neither a bag. Perhaps we do not carry a bag. Nor sandals. What then? Did He command us to walk barefoot? You see it yourselves: we walk wearing sandals. For we do not speak words and hide our feet; before your eyes we walk wearing sandals. And indeed, if anyone greets us on the road and we do not greet them, we will be judged arrogant; we are blasphemed in the name of the Lord. Therefore, we greet people on the road as well. It is now easy, when we enter a house, to say: Peace to this house. But how do we deal with the purse, the sandals (let us look at the Lord Himself, if perhaps He consoles us and grants us the understanding of these words. Because even this very thing that we said is easy, to say when entering a house: Peace to this house, than which nothing is easier), what follows if we take it carnally, and we are in danger even there. For what does He say? “Say: Peace to this house.” Nothing easier. But what follows? "If there is a son of peace there, your peace will rest upon him; if not, it will return to you." What is this? How does peace return to me? I will then have it if it returns; if it rested, did I lose it? Let this be far from the minds of the sane. Therefore, neither should that be taken carnally, and perhaps neither the purse, nor the sandals, nor the bag, and especially that part where, if we simply accept it without discussion, arrogance seems imposed upon us, that we do not greet anyone on the road. The commandment concerning not carrying a purse.

Let us attend to our Lord, the true example and aid. Let us prove that He is our aid: Without me, you can do nothing; let us prove that He is our example: Christ suffered for us, as Peter says, leaving us an example, that we might follow His footsteps. This Lord of ours had a purse on the way, He entrusted the very purse to Judas. Indeed, He endured a thief. But I, with the peace of my Lord, desiring to learn, say to my Lord: Lord, you endured the thief Judas; from where did you have something to be taken away from you? You warned wretched, infirm me not to carry a purse. You carried the purses, and there was a place for you to endure a thief. If you did not carry them, he would not have found something to steal. What remains except that He says to me: Understand what you hear: Do not carry a purse? What is a purse? Enclosed money: hidden wisdom. What is:

Do not carry a purse? Do not become wise in your own estimation. Receive the Spirit: the fountain must be in you, not the purse; from which to distribute, not where to enclose. This is the same as the purse as the wallet. On not putting on shoes.

What are shoes? What are the shoes that we use? They are skins from corpses. The skins of the dead are our footwear. So what are we commanded? To renounce the works of the dead. This is what Moses is warned in the figure to glory when the Lord says to him: "Remove your shoes. For the place on which you stand is holy ground." What is as holy ground as the Church of God? Therefore, standing in it, let us remove our shoes, let us renounce the works of the dead. As for those shoes with which we walk, the same Lord comforts me. If He were not shod, John would not say of Him: "I am not worthy to untie the strap of His sandal." So let there be intelligent obedience; let not proud hardness creep in. "I," He says, "fulfill the Gospel, because I walk barefoot. You can. I cannot. Let us keep what we have received together. Let us burn with love: let us love one another. And thus it will come to pass that I will love your strength and you will bear my weakness."

What does it mean: Greet no one on the way.

What do you think, you who did not want to understand how these things were spoken, and are compelled by a perverse understanding to slander the Lord Himself about the money bags and sandals? What do you think? Does it please you so much that, while traveling, we might meet our dear ones and not greet the elders, not return the greetings of those younger? Do you fulfill the Gospel for this reason because you are healthy and silent? Here indeed, you will not be like a traveler on a journey, but like a milestone pointing the way. Therefore, let us put away foolishness, understand the Lord's words, and greet no one on the road. For we are not commanded this without reason; otherwise, He would not want us to do what He commanded. What then is it: Greet no one on the road? This can indeed be taken simply in this way; because He instructed us to carry out our tasks urgently, and thus He said: Greet no one on the road, as if saying: Overlook everything while you fulfill what is assigned, with that manner of speech which tends to emphasize words by the custom of speaking. Let us not go far afield. In the same speech, He says shortly after: And you, Capernaum, which has been exalted to heaven, will be brought down to hell. What is this: Exalted to heaven? Did the walls of that city touch the clouds, reach the stars? But what is it: Exalted to heaven? You seem exceedingly fortunate to yourself; exceedingly powerful, exceedingly proud. Just as, therefore, this was said for the sake of exaggeration: Exalted to heaven, to that city which indeed neither ascended nor was exalted to heaven, so for the sake of exaggeration concerning urgency it was said: So run, act in such a way that what I have commanded, so that not even the smallest things delay you; but, despising everything, hasten to the proposed end. A deeper meaning. But there is another thing that I think about more here. I do not feign to understand what pertains more to me, to all of us stewards, but also to you listeners. He who greets says health. For even the ancients in their letters used to write thus: "He to him, health." A greeting took its name from health. What then is it: Greet no one on the road? Those who greet on the road greet by chance (I see you quickly understood; yet I should not finish yet. For not all quickly understood. I saw in voice the ones who understood; I see more in silent searching. But because we are talking about the way, let us walk as on the way. Be quick, wait for the slow, and walk together). What then did I say? He who greets on the road greets by chance, he was not going to the one whom he greets. He was doing something else, something else occurred. He was seeking something else, he found something else laterally to do. What then is it to greet by chance? To announce health by chance. But what is it to announce health other than to preach the Gospel? If then you preach, do this by love, not by chance. For there are men who, while seeking something else, announce the Gospel: about whom the Apostle says with lament: For all seek their own, not the things which are of Jesus Christ. And these were greeting, that is announcing health, preaching the Gospel, but they sought something else, and therefore they were greeting by chance. And what is this? If you were such, whoever you are, you do. Rather (not such whoever does, but perhaps such someone) who does, if you were such, you do not do, but it is done about you.

How preachers seeking their own things are to be heard. For even the Apostle admitted such; yet he did not command that they should be such. And they do something, and profit comes from them. They seek something else and proclaim Christ. Concern yourself not with what the proclaimer seeks; hold onto what he proclaims. Pay no attention to what he wants; it is not your concern. Hear salvation from his mouth; hold onto salvation from his mouth. Do not be a judge of his heart. But you see him seeking other things. What is that to you? Hear salvation. Do what they say. He made you secure. What? Do what they say. They do evil: Do not do what they do. They do good; they do not greet on the way, they do not preach the Gospel by occasion; be imitators of them, as they are of Christ. A good man preaches to you: seize the grape from the vine. A bad man preaches to you: seize the grape hanging on the hedge. The cluster grew with an entwined tendril among the thorns and did not sprout from the thorns. Clearly, when you see such a thing and are hungry, carefully seize it, lest, when you reach for the grape, you be torn by the thorns. This is what I mean: thus hear what is good, so that you do not imitate bad manners. He preaches from occasion, he greets on the way; it will harm him that he did not hear Christ's command: Greet no one on the way; it will not harm you, who either from a passerby or from a coming person hear salvation, you hold onto salvation. Hear the Apostle, as I promised, admitting these things: What then? So long as in every way, whether in pretense or in truth, Christ is proclaimed; and in this I rejoice, and will rejoice. For I know that this will turn out for my salvation through your supplication.

Preachers were commanded to bring peace.

Such, therefore, are the Apostles of Christ, preachers of the Gospel, not greeting in the street; that is, not seeking something else, but announcing the Gospel with genuine charity, they come to the house and say: Peace to this house. They do not only say this with their mouths; what they are full of, they pour out. They preach peace and they have peace. They are not like those of whom it is said: Peace, peace, and there is no peace. What is: Peace, peace, and there is no peace? They preach it and do not have it; they praise it and do not love it; they say it and do not do it. But still, you receive peace, whether in pretense or in truth Christ is announced. Therefore, the one who is full of peace and greets: Peace to this house, if there is there a son of peace, his peace shall rest upon him; if not, perhaps there is no son of peace there, he who greeted has lost nothing: to you, he says, it shall return. What did not depart from you returns to you. For this is what he meant to say: It benefits you that you announced it; it did not benefit him who did not receive it. Not because he remained empty, therefore you lost your reward. It is returned to you for your will; it is returned to you for the charity you expended. He will return to you who assured you with the angelic voice: Peace on earth to men of good will.

Sermons - Sermon 102

SERMO 102 ON THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL LUKE 10, 16 "He who rejects you, rejects me."

Due reverence to shepherds. Our Lord Jesus Christ spoke to His disciples at that time, and it was written down for us to hear. Therefore, we heard His words. For what good would it do us if He were seen and not heard? Nor does it harm now that He is not seen, yet He is still heard. Therefore, He says: "He who rejects you rejects me." If He said: "He who rejects you rejects me" only to the Apostles, then reject us. But if His word reached us, and called us, and placed us in their position; see that you do not reject us, lest the injury you do to us reach Him. For if you do not fear us, fear Him who said: "He who rejects you rejects me." But what do we speak to you, who do not wish to be rejected by you, other than that we may rejoice in your good morals? Let your good works be the consolation of our perils. Live well, so that you may not die badly.

Death, what is it that is truly good, truly bad. Nor in these words which I said: Live well, lest you die badly, should you consider those who perhaps lived badly, and died in their beds; and their funeral was conducted with pomp, and they were placed in precious sarcophagi, in graves beautifully and elaborately constructed: and because perhaps each one of you says to himself, I would like to die thus, you would think that I wished to say a vain thing; since I said I want you to live well so that you do not die badly.

Perhaps someone arises who has both lived well and, according to the opinion of men, has died badly: perhaps he died from a fall, died from a shipwreck, died from beasts; and each carnal person says in his heart, "What good is living well? Behold, he lived well and died thus." Return, therefore, to your heart; and if you are faithful, you will find Christ there; He speaks to you there. For I cry out: He, however, teaches more in silence. I speak through the sound of speech: He speaks within through the fear of thought. Therefore let Him implant my word in your heart: for I have dared to say, "Live well, lest you die badly." Behold, since faith is in your hearts, and Christ is there, and He has to teach what I desire to proclaim. The opposite fate of the rich man and Lazarus after death.

Remember in the Gospel that rich man and that poor man: the rich man clothed in purple and fine linen, and faring sumptuously every day; the poor man lying at the rich man's gate, hungry and seeking to be fed with the crumbs that fell from his table, full of sores, and licked by dogs. Remember, therefore: why do you remember, except that Christ is in your hearts? Tell me what you have asked Him inwardly, and what He has answered you. For it continues and says: It happened that the poor man died and was carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom. The rich man also died and was buried in hell. And being in torments, he lifted up his eyes and saw Lazarus resting in Abraham's bosom. Then he cried out, saying: Father Abraham, have mercy on me, and send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue, for I am tormented in this flame. Proud in life, a beggar in hell. For that poor man could get to the crumbs, but the rich man could not reach the drop. So of these two, tell me, who died well, and who died badly? Do not ask your eyes, return to your heart. For if you ask your eyes, they will give you false answers. For those things that could be exhibited to the dying rich man were very splendid and secularly adorned. What troops of weeping servants and handmaidens could there have been? What pomp of clients? What splendor of the funeral? What price of the burial? I believe he was buried in perfumes. What then, brothers, shall we say, that he died well or badly? If you ask your eyes, he died excellently; if you ask your inner master, he died very badly.

Death from where ought it to be considered evil.

If, therefore, such is the death of the proud guardians of their possessions, and giving nothing out of it to the poor: how do those die who seize others' property? Indeed, I spoke truly: Live well, lest you die badly, lest you die as that rich man did. A bad death is proven only by the time after death. On the contrary, consider that poor man: do not look with your eyes, for you will err; let faith observe, let the heart see. Imagine him lying on the ground before your eyes, covered in sores, with dogs coming and licking his sores. But when you recall him thus before your eyes, you immediately spit, turn away your face, and cover your noses. See with the eyes of the heart. He died, and was carried by the Angels to Abraham's bosom. The rich man’s household seemed to be weeping: the Angels were not seen rejoicing. What then did Abraham answer the rich man? Remember, son, that you received good things in your life. You considered nothing good except what you had in this life. You received: but the days passed, and you lost everything, and you remained to be tormented in hell.

He encourages good works.

It is therefore fitting, brothers, that these things be said to you. Pay attention to the poor, whether lying down or walking: pay attention to the poor, do good works. Those who are accustomed to do so, do so: and those who are not accustomed to do so, do so. Let the number of those doing good increase: for the number of the faithful also increases. What you do, how good it is you do not yet see: for the farmer too, when he sows, does not see the crop, but trusts the soil. Why do you not trust God? Our harvest will come. Think that we are now laboring, laboring to receive, as it is written: They went forth and wept, casting their seeds; but they will come with exultation, bringing their sheaves.

Sermons - Sermon 103

SERMO 103 ON THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL, LUKE 10:38-42:

"And a certain woman named Martha welcomed him."

"That one into his house" and the rest It must be directed towards one thing. The words of our Lord Jesus Christ, which have just been recited from the Gospel, remind us that there is one thing to which we should strive, while we labor in the multitude of this world. Yet we strive as pilgrims, not yet settled; still on the road, not yet in our homeland; still desiring, not yet enjoying. Nevertheless, let us strive, and without sloth and without ceasing let us strive, so that we may eventually be able to reach it.

Christ is pleased to offer himself to be fed upon.

Martha and Mary were two sisters, both united not only in the flesh but also in their devotion; both clung to the Lord, both served the present Lord in the flesh harmoniously. Martha received Him as guests customarily are received. Yet, the servant received the Lord, the sick received the Savior, the creation received the Creator. However, she received the one to be fed by the Spirit, not needing to be fed in the flesh. For the Lord wished to take the form of a servant, and having taken the form of a servant, He chose to be fed by servants, by dignity, not by necessity. For even this was a dignity, to present Himself to be fed. He had flesh, in which He indeed hungered and thirsted: but do you not know that Angels ministered to Him when He was hungry in the wilderness? Therefore, what He willed to be fed, He granted to the one who fed Him. And what is surprising if He also granted a blessing to the widow through the holy Elijah, whom previously a raven ministered to? Did he fail to be fed when he was sent to the widow? By no means, but He chose to bless the religious widow through the service rendered to His servant. Thus the Lord was received as a guest, who came to His own, and His own did not receive Him: but to all who did receive Him, He gave the power to become children of God; adopting servants and making them brothers; redeeming captives and making them co-heirs. However, lest any of you perhaps say: O blessed are those who deserved to receive Christ into their own home! Do not be sorrowful, do not murmur because you were born in times when you no longer see the Lord in the flesh: He has not taken away this dignity from you. When you did it to one of the least of these, my brothers, you did it to me. The duty of Martha and Mary is both good, but better is that of Mary.

These things about the Lord feeding in the flesh, but feeding in the spirit, we have spoken briefly for the time: let us come to the matter I proposed about unity. Martha, arranging and preparing to feed the Lord, was occupied with much ministry: her sister Mary chose rather to be fed by the Lord. In a certain way, she abandoned her sister laboring in much ministry, and she herself sat at the Lord’s feet, and being free, listened to His word. The most faithful ear had heard: “Be still, and know that I am the Lord.” Martha was troubled, Mary feasted: Martha managed many things, Mary looked at one. Both services were good: but yet, what is better, what shall we say? We have whom to ask, let us hear together. What is better, we have already heard when it was read, and let us hear again by my reminding. Martha appeals to the guest, places before the judge her petition of pious complaints, that her sister had left her, and thus laboring in ministry neglected to help her. Mary, not responding but being present, the Lord judges. Mary preferred to entrust her case to the judge as if idle, nor did she wish to labor in answering. For if she prepared a speech in response, she would remit the attention of hearing. Therefore the Lord answered, who in speech did not labor, because He was the Word. What did He say then? "Martha, Martha," the repetition of a name is an indication of affection, or perhaps of arousing attention: to listen more attentively, she was called twice: "Martha, Martha, listen: You are troubled about many things, but one thing is necessary:" that is, one thing is needed. Not one work as a singular work: but it is necessary, it is expedient, it is needed; which this one thing Mary has chosen.

One thing is necessary.

Consider one thing, my brothers, and see if in this multitude anything delights but the one. Behold, by the grace of God, how many of you there are: who could bear you if you did not think as one? Whence in the many is this peace? Give one, and it is a people: take away one, and it is a crowd. For what is a crowd, but a disturbed multitude? But hear the Apostle: I beseech you, brothers. He was speaking to the multitude, but he wished to make all one. But I beseech you, brothers, that you all speak the same thing, and that there be no schisms among you; but be perfect in the same mind and in the same judgment. And in another place: Be of one mind, having the same love, being in full accord and of one mind. And the Lord to the Father concerning his own: That they may be one, even as we are one. And in the Acts of the Apostles: Now the multitude of those who believed were of one heart and soul. Therefore magnify the Lord with me, and let us exalt his name together. For one thing is necessary, that one thing which is above, where the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are one. See that unity is commended to us. Certainly, our God is Trinity. The Father is not the Son, the Son is not the Father, the Holy Spirit is neither the Father nor the Son, but the Spirit of both: and yet these three are not three gods, nor three almighties, but one almighty God, the Trinity itself one God: because one thing is necessary. To this one thing we are led, unless many of us have one heart. The good part of Martha is her service, but Mary's part is better.

Good are the ministries to the poor, and especially to the saints of God, the due services, the religious duties. For they are given back, not given, as the Apostle says: If we have sown spiritual things for you, is it a great thing if we reap your material things? These are good, we exhort you to these, and build you up in the word of the Lord, do not be lazy to receive the saints. Sometimes unknowingly, by receiving those they did not know, they received angels. These things are good: however, it is better what Mary chose. For that entails necessary occupation; but this involves sweetness from charity. A man wishes to assist when he ministers; and sometimes he cannot: what is lacking is sought, what is present is prepared; the mind is stretched. For if Martha were sufficient for those things, she would not ask for her sister's aid. They are many, they are diverse because they are carnal, because they are temporal: and even if they are good, they are transitory. But what did the Lord say to Martha? Mary has chosen the better part. Not that you chose a bad, but she a better. Hear why it is better: Because it will not be taken away from her. The burden of necessity will be taken away from you at times: the sweetness of truth is eternal. What she chose will not be taken away from her. It will not be taken away, but it will be increased. In this life, it is increased, in the other life, it will be perfected, it will never be taken away. The ministry of Martha aims at the rest of Mary.

However, you, Martha, I would say with your permission, blessed in good service, seek a reward for your labor, rest. Now you are occupied with much ministry, you wish to feed mortal bodies, albeit of saints: when you come to that homeland, will you find a stranger to welcome with hospitality? Will you find a hungry person to whom you can break bread? A thirsty person to whom you can offer drink? A sick person to visit? A disputing person to reconcile? A dead person to bury? All these things will not be there: but what will be there? What Mary chose: there we will be fed, not feed. Therefore, what Mary chose here will be full and perfect there: from that opulent table, she was gathering crumbs from the word of the Lord. For do you want to know what will be there? The Lord himself says of his servants: Truly I say to you, he will make them recline, and he will come and serve them. What does it mean to recline, except to rest? What does it mean to recline, except to be at leisure? What does it mean: He will come and serve them? First, he comes and so serves. But where? In that heavenly banquet, of which he says: Truly, I say to you, many will come from the east and the west and will recline with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven. There, the Lord feeds, but first he comes from here. For as you must know, Passover is interpreted as Passage. The Lord came, did divine things, suffered human things. Is he still spat upon? Is he still struck? Is he still crowned with thorns? Is he still scourged? Is he still crucified? Is he still wounded with a spear? He has passed. Therefore, even the Gospel speaks thus when he made Passover with his disciples. What does the Gospel say? When the time had come for Jesus to pass from this world to the Father. Therefore, he passed, to feed: we follow, to be fed.

Sermons - Sermon 104

SERMO 104 TREATISE ON MARTHA AND MARY SIGNIFYING TWO LIVES The duties of Martha and Mary are compared. When the Holy Gospel was being read, we heard that the Lord was received with hospitality by a religious woman, and she was called Martha. And while she was busy with the care of serving, her sister Mary was sitting at the feet of the Lord and listening to His word. That one was laboring, this one was relaxing; that one was giving out, this one was being filled. However, Martha, laboring much in that occupation and business of serving, interrupted the Lord and complained about her sister, that she was not helping her labor. But the Lord responded to Martha on behalf of Mary; and He became an advocate for her, who had been summoned as a judge. "Martha," He said, "you are busy with many things, when only one is necessary. Mary has chosen the better part, which will not be taken away from her." We heard both the petition of the judge and the sentence; which sentence responded to the petitioner and defended the one who had been received. For Mary was intent on the sweetness of the Lord's word. Martha was intent on how to feed the Lord; Mary was intent on how to be fed by the Lord. A feast was being prepared by Martha for the Lord, at which feast Mary was already rejoicing. Therefore, while Mary was sweetly listening to the very sweet word and was being fed with her most attentive heart, when the Lord was interrupted by her sister, how do we think she feared, lest the Lord might say to her: "Get up, help your sister"? For she was held by a remarkable sweetness, which is certainly greater for the mind than for the stomach. She was excused, and she sat more securely. And how was she excused? Let us attend, examine, and scrutinize as much as we can; let us also be fed.

Martha's service was not criticized by the Lord.

What then? Do we think the ministry of Martha was rebuked, who was occupied with the care of hospitality, who received the Lord himself as a guest? How could she rightly be rebuked, who was rejoicing with such a guest? If this is true, let people abandon what they minister to the needy; let them choose for themselves the better part, which will not be taken away from them. Let them be free for the word, let them thirst for the sweetness of doctrine, let them be engaged in saving knowledge; let them not be concerned about who is a stranger in the village, who needs bread, who needs clothing, who should be visited, who should be redeemed, who should be buried; let them be free from works of mercy, let them pursue only knowledge. If the better part is really better, why do we not all grab it, especially since we have the Lord himself as our advocate in this cause? For in this matter do we not fear to offend his justice, since we hold his sentence as patron. The better part of Mary. And yet it is not so; but as the Lord said, so it is. How you understand it, it is not; but it is, how you ought to understand. Behold, observe. You are occupied with many things, while one thing is necessary. Mary has chosen the better part; not that yours is bad, but hers is better. Why better? Because you are occupied with many things, she with one. One is preferred to many. For it is not from many that one comes, but many from one. Many things are, which were made; one, whom made them. Heaven, earth, sea, and all things in them, how many they are! Who can count them? Who can contemplate their multitude? Who made these things? And God made all these, and behold, they are very good. Very good are the things He made: how much better is He who made them? Let us then consider our occupations with many things. Ministry is necessary for the refreshment of bodies. Why is this? Because there is hunger, because there is thirst. Mercy is necessary for misery. You break bread for the hungry, because you found one hungry. Remove hunger, if you can: whom do you break bread for? Remove wandering: whom do you host? Remove nakedness: for whom do you prepare clothing? Let there be no sickness: whom do you visit? Let there be no captivity: whom do you redeem? Let there be no discord: whom do you reconcile? Let there be no death: whom do you bury? In that future age, there will not be these evils: therefore neither will these ministries. Therefore, Martha indeed was serving the bodily, what shall I call it, need, or will, or voluntary need? She was serving the mortal flesh. But who was in mortal flesh? In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. Behold what Mary was hearing. The Word became flesh, and dwelled among us. Behold whom Martha was serving. Therefore Mary has chosen the better part, and it will not be taken away from her; for she chose what will always endure: therefore it will not be taken away from her. She desired to be occupied with the One; now she held it: But for me it is good to cling to God. She sat at the feet of our head; the lower she sat, the more she received. For water flows to the lowliness of the valley; it drifts away from the swelling of the hill. The Lord did not therefore rebuke the work, but distinguished the duty. You are occupied with many things, he said; but one thing is necessary. Now Mary has chosen this for herself; the labor of many will pass, but the love of unity will remain. Therefore what she chose will not be taken away from her; but from you, what you chose – certainly this follows, this is understood – from you, what you chose will be taken away. However, it will be taken away for your good, so that what is better may be given. For labor will be taken away from you, so that rest may be given. You are sailing, she is already in the port.

Two lives are figured in Martha and Mary.

You see, therefore, my beloved, and as much as I think you already understand, in these two women, who were both dear to the Lord, both lovable, both disciples; you see, therefore, and understand something great, whoever understands, which you ought to hear and know, even those who do not understand; in these two women are figured two lives, the present and the future, the laborious and the restful, the sorrowful and the blessed, the temporal and the eternal. There are two lives, which I have briefly described as I could: now think more abundantly about them yourselves. What does this life have—I do not say evil, not unjust, not nefarious, not luxurious, not impious; but laborious, full of troubles, chastened by fears, anxious with temptations; I speak of this innocent life itself, such as it was proper for Martha to have—therefore, as much as you can, examine it, and concerning this, as I have said, think more abundantly than we speak. Truly, there was no unjust life in that house, and it was not with Martha, nor with Mary; and if it ever was, it fled upon the entrance of the Lord. Therefore, there remained in that house, which had received the Lord, in the two women two lives; both innocent, both praiseworthy; one laborious, the other at rest; none criminal, none lazy. Both innocent, both, I say, praiseworthy; but one laborious, as I said, the other at rest; none criminal, which the laborious one should avoid; none lazy, which the one at rest should avoid. Therefore, in that house were these two lives, and the fountain of life itself. In Martha was the image of the present, in Mary of the future. What Martha did, we are; what Mary did, this we hope for; let us act well in this, so that we may have that fully. For what do we have from it, as much as we have, while we are here? How much is it, what do we have from it? For indeed now something is done from it. Removed from business, set apart from household cares, you have gathered, you stand, you listen; in as much as you do this, you are like Mary. And you do more easily what Mary does, than I what Christ does. If, however, I say something of Christ, therefore it feeds you, because it is of Christ, because it is the common bread, from which I also live, if I live. Now, however, we live, if you stand in the Lord; not in us, but in the Lord; for neither he who plants is anything, nor he who waters, but God who gives the increase.

How Mary is a figure of the life to come.

Nonetheless, how much is it that you take and grasp from hearing and understanding about that life, the image of which Mary bore—how much is this? Let this night of the world pass. At dawn, I will stand by you and behold. You will give joy and gladness to my ears, and the humbled bones will exult. Humbled bones, as though the members clinging. This is what Mary was doing: she was humbled, and she was filled. She was sitting; what then is it that I said: At dawn, I will stand and behold? How does she sit like one who stands, if dawn signifies the future age? After the night of this present world is past: "I will stand," he says, "and I will see, I will stand and behold." He did not say: "I will sit." How does Mary sitting bear the image of this great matter, if: "I will stand and behold"? Do not let these things disturb you, it is a want of the flesh; the body cannot be required to both stand and sit at the same time. For if it sits, it does not stand; if it stands, it does not sit; the body cannot do both at the same time. But if I prove that the soul can, would there be any doubt? For if it can do something like this now, much more easily will man be able to do it then, with all difficulty ended. Behold where you may take an example. Paul himself says: "Now we live if you stand firm in the Lord." Such a great Apostle, nay, Christ through the Apostle, ordered us to stand firm. Likewise, how does the same Apostle, nay, Christ through the Apostle himself, say to us: "Nevertheless, to what we have attained, let us walk by the same rule?" Here to stand, here to walk; it is not enough to walk, "so run that you may obtain." Therefore, beloved, heed and understand; he commands us both to walk and to stand; not that when we stand, we cease to walk, or when we walk, we cease to stand; but both together, we both stand and run. What does it mean to both stand and run? Both to remain and to progress. "Make known to me your ways, O Lord." Surely, by the ways of the Lord made known, what are we commanded but to walk? "Lead me, O Lord, in Your way," what do we wish but to walk? And again, as if to be fixed in one place: "Do not let my feet be moved." And rejoicing and giving thanks: "And He has not let my feet be moved." If he were asked: How did you desire the ways of the Lord to be made known to you, how did you want to be led by Him in His way, and you wish not to have your feet moved, and you give thanks that your feet were not given to move? How did you walk, who did not move your feet? He would answer you: And I walked, because I did; and I stood, because I did not depart. Therefore, do not be astonished, brothers; behold, what the body cannot do, the soul can do. According to the body, when you walk, you do not stand; when you stand, you do not walk; according to the soul, according to faith, according to the intention of the mind, stand and walk, remain and progress, because "Now we live if you stand firm in the Lord," and "so run that you may obtain." Thus, beloved, you will both sit and stand. We will sit, because we will humbly behold the Creator; we will stand, because we will remain forever.

How the Lord passing will minister to us. For I add more: we shall recline, which indeed is neither to sit nor to stand. We shall recline. I would not dare to say this unless the Lord promised it: He will make them recline. Promising a great reward to His servants: He will make them recline, He said, and passing by He will serve them. This life is promised to us, because the Lord will make us recline, and passing by He will serve us. This is also said when the faith of the centurion's son was admired and praised: Truly I say to you, that many will come from the east and the west and will recline with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven. A great promise, a blessed reward. Let us act so that we may be worthy, let us be helped so that we may reach there, where the Lord will serve us as we recline. For what will it be to recline, if not to rest? And what will it be to serve, if not to nourish? What is that food? What is that drink? Surely it is the truth itself. That food refreshes and does not diminish: it nourishes, and by nourishing it makes whole; it is not consumed by the one who eats, but remaining whole, it makes whole. Do you not believe that God can nourish in this way, when even now your eye is nourished by light? Your eye is nourished by light. Many see, and it remains; few see, and it remains; and those eyes are refreshed, and it does not diminish. It takes from it, nor does it lessen; it seizes it, nor does it cut off. If this light can nourish the eye, and cannot God nourish man who has been changed? He can, surely He can; why do you not understand? Because you are occupied with many things; the business of Martha occupies you, indeed all of us. For who is free from this ministry of helping? Who breathes free from this care? Let us do this innocently, let us do it with charity; that time will also come when we shall recline, and He will pass by and serve us. For then He would not serve us unless He had passed over to the Father from here; for He was here when He promised. And lest we think He will display something like the form of a servant we contemplated: Passing by, He said, He will serve them. And the Evangelist speaks of this passing over: Now when the hour came for Jesus to pass from this world to the Father. Have I been with you so long, and you do not know me? If he knew what he was hearing, he would respond: I did not know because you have not yet passed over. Hence it is also said to Mary after the resurrection: Do not touch Me, for I have not yet ascended to the Father. To rest only through work.

Therefore, beloved, I beseech you, I urge you, I advise you, I instruct you, I ask you, let us desire that life together, let us run together to it by coming to it, so that in persevering we may stand firm in it. The hour comes, and that hour will be endless, when the Lord will make us recline, and minister to us. What, but himself? Why do you seek what to eat? You have the Lord himself. For what will be what we are fed with, what else but In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God? What will it mean to recline, but to rest? What will it mean to be fed, but to be delighted ineffably by the contemplation of him? Delight at your right hand. One thing I have asked from the Lord, this I shall seek; not many things that I am occupied with: but one thing I have asked from the Lord, this I shall seek, that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, that I may contemplate the delight of the Lord. This is not the blessedness of the laboring. Be still and see: what? that I am the Lord. Great vision, happy contemplation. And what else is it: Recline and eat, but: Be still and see? Therefore, let us not be carnally minded, nor think of, so to speak, sensual feasts. These will pass away: they must be endured, not loved. If you wish to fulfill the duty of Martha in them, let there be modesty, let there be mercy; modesty in temperance, mercy in dispensing. Labor passes, and rest will come; but rest only through labor. The ship passes, and arrives at the homeland; but to the homeland only by the ship. For we are sailing, if we consider the waves and tempests of this age. Nor do I doubt that we are not submerged because we are carried by the wood of the cross.

Sermons - Sermon 105

SERMO 105 ON THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL LUKE 11: 5-13:

"And he said to them, 'Which of you who has a friend will go to him at midnight and say to him, 'Friend, lend me three loaves, for a friend of mine has arrived on a journey, and I have nothing to set before him'; and he will answer from within, 'Do not bother me; the door is now shut, and my children are with me in bed; I cannot get up and give you anything'? I tell you, though he will not get up and give him anything because he is his friend, yet because of his impudence he will rise and give him whatever he needs. And I tell you, ask, and it will be given to you; seek, and you will find; knock, and it will be opened to you. For everyone who asks receives, and the one who seeks finds, and to the one who knocks it will be opened. What father among you, if his son asks for a fish, will instead of a fish give him a serpent; or if he asks for an egg, will give him a scorpion? If you then, who are evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more will the heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to those who ask him!'"

"Which of you shall have a friend, and shall go to" In the middle of the night, etc.

To ask from God, Christ encourages by similitudes.

We have heard our Lord exhorting us, the heavenly teacher and most faithful counselor, the same exhorter, to ask, and the giver when we ask. We have heard him in the Gospel urging us to ask insistently, and to knock even to the point of shamelessness. For he showed us, for example: If one of you had a friend, from whom he asked for three loaves at night, because a friend had come to him from a journey, and he had nothing to set before him, but he answered that he had already gone to bed, with his servants, and should not be disturbed by his pleas, but the other insisted by knocking and persevering, and not deterred by shame, but forced by necessity to persist: he would rise, if not for friendship's sake, certainly for his shameless persistence, and give him as many as he wanted. How many did he want? He wanted no more than three. In this manner, the Lord added an exhortation and entirely urged us to ask, to seek, to knock, until we receive what we ask, what we seek, what we knock for, employing an example in reverse: just as that judge who neither feared God nor respected men, and yet when a certain widow kept petitioning him every day, being overcome by annoyance, gave what he couldn't give benevolently against his will. But our Lord Jesus Christ, the petitioner among us, with God as the giver, certainly would not so urge us to ask unless he wished to give. Let human sloth be abashed: he wishes to give more than we wish to receive; he wishes to have mercy more than we wish to be delivered from misery; and certainly, if we are not delivered, we will remain miserable. For he exhorts for our sake. A friend coming from the road must be refreshed.

Let us stay awake, and believe the one urging us, obey the one promising, and rejoice in the one giving. For perhaps a friend may sometimes come to us from the journey, and we do not find anything to set before him; and we have suffered need, and we have received both for ourselves and for him. For it cannot happen that someone has not at some time suffered a friend asking something which he could not answer: and then he finds that he does not have, when he is forced to give. A friend comes to you from the journey, that is, from the life of this world, in which all pass through as if strangers, and no one remains as if an owner; but it is said to every man: Refreshed, pass on; continue your journey, give place to the one coming after. Or perhaps from the evil way, that is, from the evil life, some friend of yours, weary and not finding the truth, which he would be blessed to hear and perceive, but tired with every desire and poverty of the world, comes to you, as to a Christian, and says: Give me the reason, make me a Christian. And he asks something which perhaps you, in the simplicity of faith, did not know: and there is nothing from which you can refresh the hungry, and being reminded, you find yourself lacking; and when you wish to teach, you are forced to learn: and while you are ashamed that the one who asked did not find in you what he was seeking, you are compelled to seek, so that you may deserve to find. A friend is interrupted at midnight in order to give three loaves of bread. And where might you seek? Where, if not in the Lord's Books? Perhaps what he asked is placed in the book, but it is obscure. Perhaps the Apostle said this in his Epistle. He spoke in such a way that you can read it, but you cannot understand it: you are not permitted to pass by. For the questioner presses on; you are not allowed to ask Paul himself, or Peter, or any Prophet. For that family already rests with their Lord, and the ignorance of this world is strong, that is, it is the middle of the night, and a hungry friend presses on. Perhaps simple faith sufficed for you, but it does not suffice for him. Should he be deserted? Should he be cast out of the house? To the willing, one must knock to give to God.

Therefore to the Lord Himself, to Him with whom the household rests, knock by praying, ask, insist. Not as that friend in the parable, beaten by weariness, will he rise and give. He wants to give: you who are knocking have not yet received; knock, he wants to give. And what He wants to give, He delays, so that you may desire more what is delayed, lest what is given too quickly becomes cheap.

What the three loaves given are. But when you have reached the three loaves, that is, the food and understanding of the Trinity, you have both what to live by and what to nourish by. Do not be afraid of the stranger coming from the road, but by receiving, make the citizen into a kinsman: and do not fear lest you run out. That bread will not be exhausted, but it will end your need. It is bread, and bread, and bread: God the Father, God the Son, God the Holy Spirit. Eternal Father, co-eternal Son, co-eternal Holy Spirit. Unchangeable Father, unchangeable Son, unchangeable Holy Spirit. Creator and Father, and Son, and Holy Spirit. Shepherd and giver of life, and Father, and Son, and Holy Spirit. Eternal food and bread, and Father, and Son, and Holy Spirit. Learn, and teach; live, and nourish. The God who gives to you gives nothing better than Himself to you. Greedy one, what else were you seeking? Or if you ask for something else, what will suffice for you, for whom God does not suffice?

Faith, hope, charity, gifts of God. But it is necessary for you to have charity, to have faith, to have hope: so that what is given to you can be sweet. And these three things are themselves, faith, hope, charity. And these same are the gifts of God. For we received faith from Him: As God, he says, has allotted to each a measure of faith. And we received hope from Him, to whom it is said: In whom you gave me hope. And we received charity from Him, of whom it is said: The charity of God is poured into our hearts through the Holy Spirit, who has been given to us. But these same three are somewhat different; yet they are all gifts of God. For these three remain, faith, hope, charity: but the greatest of these is charity. In those loaves, no bread is said to be greater than the others: but simply three loaves were asked for and given.

Three things signified again in the same way.

Behold, another three: Who among you, if his son asks for bread, will give him a stone? Or who among you, if he asks for a fish, will give him a serpent? Or if he asks for an egg, will give him a scorpion? If then you, being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more will your Father who is in heaven give good gifts to those who ask Him? Let us then again consider these three things, lest there be faith, hope, and love: but the greatest of these is love. So place the three: bread, fish, egg: the greatest of these is bread. Therefore, we correctly understand bread in these three as love. Therefore, he opposed a stone to bread, because hardness is contrary to love. We understand fish as faith. A certain saint has said, and we like to say: A good fish is pious faith. It lives among the waves, and is not broken or dissolved by the waves. It lives among the temptations and storms of this world, pious faith: the world rages, and it remains whole. Observe only the serpent as contrary to faith. For faith is pledged to her, to whom it is said in the Song of Songs: Come from Lebanon, my bride, coming and passing through from the beginning of faith. Therefore, faith is the beginning of espousal. Something is promised by the groom, and it is held by faith in the promise. The Lord, however, opposed the serpent to the fish, the devil to faith. Therefore, the Apostle says to the one espoused: I have espoused you to one husband, to present you as a chaste virgin to Christ: and: I fear lest as the serpent deceived Eve by his craftiness, so also your minds may be corrupted from the chastity that is in Christ; that is, in the faith of Christ. For it is said, that Christ may dwell in your hearts through faith. Let not the devil then corrupt faith, let him not devour the fish.

Egg, hope.

Hope remains, which, as it seems to me, is compared to an egg. For hope has not yet reached the thing: and the egg is something, but it is not yet a chick. Therefore, quadrupeds give birth to their offspring, while birds give birth to the hope of their offspring. Therefore, hope urges us to despise the present, to expect the future; forgetting what is behind, with the Apostle we extend towards what is ahead. For thus he says: "But one thing, forgetting what lies behind and straining forward to what lies ahead, I press on toward the goal for the prize of the upward call of God in Christ Jesus." Therefore, nothing is so inimical to hope as looking back, that is, putting hope in those things which slip by and pass away: but in those which are not yet given, but shall someday be given and shall never pass away. But when the world is teeming with temptations, like the sulfurous rain of Sodom, the example of Lot's wife must be feared. For she looked back; and where she looked back, there she remained. She was turned into salt, to season the wise with her example. The Apostle Paul speaks of this hope in this way: "For in hope we were saved. Now hope that is seen is not hope. For who hopes for what he sees? But if we hope for what we do not see, we wait for it with patience." For who hopes for what he sees? It is an egg. It is an egg, and not yet a chick. And it is covered with a shell: it is not seen, because it is covered: let it be awaited with patience; let it warm, that it may become alive. Pay attention, stretch towards what is ahead, forget what is past. For the things which are seen are temporal. "Not looking at the things which are seen," he says, "but at the things which are not seen. For the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal." Therefore, stretch your hope to those things which are not seen: wait, endure. Do not look back. Fear the scorpion for your egg. See, because it strikes from the tail, which it has at the back. Therefore, do not let the scorpion kill your egg, this world your hope, so to speak, with its venom, which is contrary, which is of the rear. How much the world speaks to you, how much it makes noise behind your back, so that you look back: that is, so that you put your hope in present things (not even present things; for those which never remain are not to be called present); and that you turn your mind away from what Christ has promised and has not yet given, but will give because he is faithful, and wish to rest in the perishing world.

Disasters and devastations are useful to Christians.

Therefore, God mixes bitterness with earthly happiness, so that another happiness, whose sweetness is not deceptive, may be sought: and from these very bitternesses the world tries to turn you away from what you intend and convert you to the past. From these very bitternesses, from these very tribulations, you murmur, and say: Behold, everything perishes in Christian times. Why do you make noise? God did not promise me that these things would not perish: Christ did not promise me this. The eternal promised the eternal: if I believe, from mortal I shall become eternal. Why do you make noise, O unclean world? Why do you make noise? What are you trying to turn away? You want to hold on to what is perishing: what would you do if it remained? Whom would you not deceive when you are sweet, if you lie about sustenance when you are bitter? If I have hope, if I hold hope, my egg is not struck by the scorpion. I will bless the Lord at all times; his praise shall continually be in my mouth. Let the world be happy, let the world be overturned: I will bless the Lord who made the world. I will indeed bless. Whether it is well according to the flesh, or ill according to the flesh: I will bless the Lord at all times; his praise shall continually be in my mouth. For if I bless when it is well, and blaspheme when it is ill; I have received the sting of the scorpion, stung I have looked back; which may be far from us. The Lord gave, the Lord has taken away; as it pleased the Lord, so it has been done: blessed be the name of the Lord. The city and kingdom in the heavens await them eternally. The city which bore us carnally remains. Thanks be to God. May it also be born spiritually, and may it pass with us to eternity. If the city which bore us carnally does not remain, the one that bore us spiritually remains. The Lord is building Jerusalem. Did He lose His building by sleeping, or did He admit enemies by not guarding it? Unless the Lord guards the city, in vain does the guard keep watch. And which city? He who keeps Israel neither slumbers nor sleeps. What is Israel, if not the seed of Abraham? What is the seed of Abraham, if not Christ? And He says to your seed, which is Christ. And what to us? But you belong to Christ, therefore you are the seed of Abraham, heirs according to the promise. In your seed, He says, all nations will be blessed. The holy city, the faithful city, a city in a foreign land, is founded in heaven. O faithful one, do not corrupt hope, do not lose charity, gird your loins, ascend, light your lamps, wait for the Lord when He comes from the wedding. Why are you afraid, because earthly kingdoms perish? Therefore, a heavenly promise is made to you, so that you do not perish with earthly things. For these things destined to perish have been foretold, entirely foretold. For we cannot deny what has been foretold. The Lord, whom you are waiting for, said to you: Nation will rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom. Earthly kingdoms undergo changes: He will come of whom it has been said: And of His kingdom there will be no end.

Flatteringly, Vergil predicted an eternal empire for Rome.

Those who have promised this to earthly kingdoms were not led by truth, but lied with flattery. One of their poets introduced Jupiter speaking, and said about the Romans:

I set neither limits to things nor times;

I have given an empire without end.

Truth does not entirely respond in this way. This kingdom, which you have given without end, O you who have given nothing, is it on earth or in heaven? Certainly on earth. And if it were in heaven: Heaven and earth will pass away. Those things which God Himself made will pass away; how much sooner what Romulus established? Perhaps if we wanted to criticize Virgil from here and mock why he said this; partly he would lift us up and say to us: And I know; but what was I to do, who sold words to the Romans, if not by promising something with this flattery that was false? And yet in this I was cautious, when I said: I have given an empire without end, I introduced their Jupiter, who would say this. I did not say the false thing in my own person, but I attributed the false person to Jupiter: just as there was a false god, so there was a lying prophet. For do you wish to know that I knew these things? Elsewhere, when I did not introduce Jupiter the stone speaking, but spoke from my own person, I said: The Roman affairs and kingdoms doomed to perish.

See that I said kingdoms will perish. I said kingdoms will perish, I did not keep silent. They will perish, the truth has not kept silent: they will promise to last forever, with flattery.

Constancy in bearing adverse things.

Therefore, let us not lose heart, brothers: there will be an end to all earthly kingdoms. Now, if it is the end, God sees. Perhaps it has not yet come, and because of some weakness, or mercy, or misery we wish that it has not yet come: but will it therefore not come? Set your hope in God, desire the eternal, wait for the eternal. You are Christians, brothers, we are Christians. Christ did not descend into the flesh for pleasures: let us rather endure the present than love it: adversity is manifest destruction, the flatteries of prosperity are false. Fear the sea even when it is calm. Let us by no means hear in vain: Lift up your hearts. Why do we set our hearts on the earth when we see that the earth is being overturned? We can only exhort you so that you have something to say, and something to answer for your hope to those who insult and blaspheme the name of Christ. Let no one turn you away from the expectation of things to come by their murmuring. All who blaspheme our Christ because of these adversities are like the tail of a scorpion. Let us place our egg under the wings of that evangelical hen, which cries: Jerusalem, Jerusalem, false and lost, how often have I wanted to gather your children, as a hen gathers her chicks, and you would not? Let it not be said to us: How often have I wanted, and you would not? For that hen is Divine Wisdom: but it took on flesh to be suitable for the chicks. See the hen with rough feathers, wings down, voice broken, and thus fitting its little ones. Therefore, let us place our egg, that is, our hope, under the wings of that hen. The devastation of Rome was falsely attributed either to the Christian religion or to the extinction of idolatry.

Perhaps you have noticed how a hen crushes a scorpion. May that hen also crush and devour those blasphemers crawling on the ground, coming out of their holes, and stinging maliciously; may she take them into her body and turn them into an egg. Let them not be angry: we seem stirred, but we do not return curses for curses. We are cursed and we bless, we are reviled and we pray. But let no one say of Rome, as they say of me: "Oh, if he would only be silent about Rome," as if I were an insulter and not rather an intercessor for the Lord and your humble exhorter. May it be far from me to insult. May God avert it from my heart and from the pain of my conscience. Did we not have many brothers there? Do we not still have them? Does not a large portion of the pilgrim city of Jerusalem live there? Did they not suffer temporal things there but did not lose eternal ones? Why then do I speak of her, if not to say that it is false what they say about our Christ, that He destroyed Rome, that stone gods and wooden gods protected Rome? Add the price, bronze. Add more, silver and gold: The idols of the nations are silver and gold. It did not say: Stone; it did not say: Wood; it did not say: Pottery; but what they held as great, silver and gold. Yet, even silver and gold have eyes and do not see. Golden gods and wooden gods differ in value: in having eyes and not seeing, they are alike. Behold what kind of guardians learned men entrusted Rome to, having eyes and not seeing. Or if they were able to save Rome, why did they perish first? They say: Rome perished then. Yet they perished. They say, not they themselves perished, but their images. How therefore could those who could not save their own images save your roofs? Alexandria lost such gods long ago. Constantinople, since its founding as a great city by a Christian emperor, lost those false gods long ago: yet it grew, and grows, and remains. It remains as long as God wills. For we do not promise eternity to that city either, because we say this. Carthage remains in the name of Christ, and the heavenly city that was destroyed long ago, because it was not heavenly but earthly. The overthrow of the idols did not cause the Roman disaster from that point on. And that which they say is not true, because with the gods having been destroyed, Rome was taken, afflicted. Absolutely it is not true: before the idols themselves were overthrown; and thus the Goths were defeated with Rhadagausus. Remember, brothers, remember: it has not been long, a few years it has been, recall. When all the idols in the city of Rome had been overthrown, Rhadagausus, the king of the Goths, with a huge army, much larger than that of Alaric, came. Rhadagausus was a pagan man: he sacrificed to Jupiter daily. It was being reported everywhere that Rhadagausus would not cease from sacrifices. Then all these [people said]: Behold, we do not sacrifice, he sacrifices, we have to be defeated by the sacrificing one, to whom it is not permitted to sacrifice. God showing that temporal salvation, and the earthly kingdoms are not in these sacrifices, Rhadagausus was defeated in a marvelous way, with the Lord helping. Afterwards the Goths, who did not sacrifice, even if they were not Catholics in Christian faith, yet were enemies of idols; came adverse to idols, and they who took: conquered those presuming upon idols, and still seeking destroyed idols, and still desiring to sacrifice to the lost. But there also were ours, and they were afflicted: but they knew to say: I will bless the Lord at all times. They were afflicted in the earthly kingdom: but they did not lose the kingdom of heaven: rather they became better for that to be achieved through the exercise of tribulations. And if they did not blaspheme in tribulations, as if they came out of the furnace intact vessels, and were filled with the Lord's blessing. But these blasphemers, seeking earthly things, desiring earthly things, placing hope in earthly things, when they lost whether they wanted or not, what will they hold? Where will they remain? Nothing outside, nothing inside: an empty chest, a more empty conscience. Where is the rest? Where is the safety? Where is the hope? Therefore let them come, let them cease to blaspheme, let them learn to worship: scorpions, stinging, are eaten by the hen, turned into the body of the one ingesting; they are exercised on earth, they are crowned in heaven.

Sermons - Sermon 105A

SERMON 105/A ABOUT THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL IN LUKE 11:5-13:

"Which of you has a friend" and so on. ON PRAYER Christ gave great hope of obtaining when he encouraged to pray. God does not regard abilities but wills. The Holy Gospel, which we heard being read just now, exhorts us to prayer. It gives great hope because he who asks, seeks, and knocks does not return empty from the Lord. For he did not say that some ask and do not receive, but said, "Everyone who asks will receive, and he who seeks will find, and to him who knocks it will be opened." He also put forth a parable to the contrary: if a friend comes to a friend and asks for three loaves because a guest has come to him and he asks at an hour when it is already inconvenient to rise and give; he replies that he cannot give because he is already resting and his children are with him in the room; yet the friend does not stop asking: “I tell you,” he says, “not because of friendship but because of the inconvenience he experiences, he will rise and give him as many as he needs.” If he does not refuse who is overcome by inconvenience, how much less will He refuse who encourages you to ask? That parable was put there for this reason. If the friend does not refuse him who asks for three loaves because he is a friend and gives not because of friendship but to avoid inconvenience, will not God, who is Trinity, give Himself to us who ask? But I think that friend did not give his friend three loaves so that one might be white, another common, and another barley. Therefore, because God Jesus Christ, the Only Begotten Son of God, gave great hope of obtaining when He encouraged us to pray, we must know what we ought to pray for. Who does not ask God? But it must be considered what one asks for. The giver is ready to give, but the petitioner needs to be corrected. You rise and ask God for riches. Do the sons of God ask for this as something great from God? Therefore, God Himself wanted to give riches to wicked men so that sons should not ask for them as something great from their Father. For by his actions, God somehow speaks to us, saying to us: Why do you ask riches of me? Is this the greatest thing I will give you? Look at whom I have given them to and be ashamed to ask for it. The faithful ask for what a player has. The Christian matron asks for what a prostitute has. Do not ask for these things in your prayers. Let her give them if she wishes; let her not give if she does not wish. For we must believe Him who says: “For the life of a man does not consist in the abundance of his possessions.” Why? Riches have harmed many. I do not know if it can be found that they have benefited anyone. Perhaps we find someone to whom they have not been harmful, but I do not know if it can be found that they have been beneficial. Perhaps someone says: Did not riches benefit him who used them well by feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, receiving the strangers, redeeming the captives? Whoever does this, does it so that riches may not harm him. For if he did not have the riches from which he does these things, and yet he would still be such that he would do them if he had them? God regards not the most opulent possessions but the most pious wills. Were the Apostles rich? They left their nets and boat and followed the Lord. He who leaves the hope of the world leaves much, just as that widow who gave from two mites. “No one,” He says, “gave more;” and many who were rich gave much, but they did not give more than that widow in the gifts of God, that is, into the treasury. Many who were rich gave much, and He observed it, not because they gave much. But she went in with two mites. Who deigned to notice her? He who does not regard a full hand but a pure heart, He both observed and showed her; and showing her, He said that no one had given so much. For no one gave so much as she who left nothing for herself. Therefore, if you have little, you will give little; if you have more, you will give more. Nevertheless, when you give little from little, will you have less, or will you receive less because you gave less? If the gifts are considered, some are great, some small, some many, some few. But if the hearts of those who give are considered, you will sometimes find a needy heart in the rich and a wealthy heart in the poor. You observe much given, but do not observe how much he who gave much left for himself, how much finally he distributed, how much he took from others who gave something to the poor as if corrupting God's judgment. Therefore you act so that riches do not harm you by giving, not that they benefit you. For even if you are poor and give little from little, it would be imputed to you as much as to the rich giving much, or even more as to that widow. Let us consider that the kingdom of heaven is for sale as it were with the price of alms. A certain rich and exceedingly fertile possession is set before us to acquire, which, when we have gained it, when we reach it, we will not leave it to successors as we depart, but we will always possess it, never to leave it, never to migrate from it at all. Great possession, possession to be bought! It remains for you to ask its price, lest you cannot pay what it costs and so fail to purchase it, although you desire to have it. I tell you, in case you think you will not attain it; its price is as much as you have. I add something else for your joy, if you are not envious. When God has made you the possessor of this possession, you do not exclude another buyer. The Patriarchs purchased; did they exclude the most blessed Prophets? The Prophets purchased; did they not admit the Apostles to buy? The Apostles purchased, yet other buyers, the martyrs, followed them. Finally, many bought and it is still for sale. Let’s see if the rich could purchase it and the poor could not. Let’s see more recent buyers, passing over the ancient ones of this possession. By giving half of his possessions to the poor, when he was very rich, Zacchaeus bought it, the chief publican, who acquired much. The publicans were not called populists but those who contracted for public revenues. The Holy Gospel explains this to you when a certain apostle was called of whom it is written: “He saw a man named Matthew sitting at the receipt of custom." This one whom He called from the receipt of custom was also called Matthew the publican in another place. Therefore, Zacchaeus, after the Lord entered into him whom he received unexpectedly—he greatly desired to see him; because he was short, he could not see in the crowd; he climbed a tree and saw him passing by; so that he might see Him who was to hang on the tree for him, he suspended himself on wood—therefore, when the Lord entered into him, he was filled with joy, because He had already entered his heart: “I give half of my possessions". But he kept much for himself. Notice why he kept the other half: “And if I have defrauded anyone of anything, I restore it fourfold." Much was kept, not to be possessed, but to pay back the stolen goods. A great buyer gave much. A little earlier rich, suddenly poor. Does Peter not buy the kingdom though he was poor with nets and a boat? To both, as much was worth as anyone had. After them, even that widow bought it. She gave two mites and bought it. Is there anything cheaper? Yes, something cheaper. I find a cheaper price for this great possession than those two mites. Listen to the seller, the Lord Jesus. “If anyone gives a cup of cold water to one of the least of these, I tell you the truth he will certainly not lose his reward." What is cheaper than a cup of water, and that cold, so that even wood might not be needed to buy? I do not know if you consider anything cheaper than this small price. And yet, it exists. He does not have what Peter had, much less what Zacchaeus had, he does not find even two mites. Is a cup of cold water lacking for a moment? “Peace on earth to people of good will." Let there no longer be that diversity of prices disputed. If we understand, if we truly think, good will is the price of that possession. It was bought by Peter, bought by Zacchaeus, bought by that widow, bought by him who offers a cup of cold water. It alone buys, if it has nothing except itself.

We should know what we ought to ask for. To ask for a good will.

Why have we said these things? What had we proposed? Because we must learn what to ask for from the chapter of the Gospel where the Lord gave us great hope, saying: "Ask and you will receive, seek and you will find, knock and it will be opened to you. For everyone who asks receives, and he who seeks finds, and to him who knocks it will be opened." Since He gave us great hope, we must know what to ask for. Hence it happens that I warn you not to seek, ask, and knock for great wealth when you pray. He who knocks wants to enter. The entrance is narrow. Why carry much? Therefore, you should first send ahead what you carry so that you may enter easily without burden through the narrow way. Do not, therefore, ask for great wealth from the Lord God. Do you fear to lack possessions and not purchase them? Have I not told you that you are worth as much as you have? And if you have nothing, you will be its price, because even if you have much, you will not purchase unless you give yourself. Perhaps you will answer me: What then should we ask of God? Do not ask even for the death of your enemies. These are malevolent prayers. I do not know whether you will be heard for your benefit when you rejoice in the death of an enemy. For who is not going to die? Who knows when they might die? You rejoice that another is dead. How do you know whether while you rejoice, you may expire? Learn to pray that your enemy; the enmities themselves die. Your enemy is a man. There are two names: man and enemy. Let the man live; let the enemy die. Do you not recall how Christ the Lord struck Saul, His enemy, a most ardent persecutor of His members, with a single voice from heaven, laid him prostrate, and killed him? He absolutely killed him, for the persecutor died, and a preacher rose. If you do not believe me that he died, interrogate him; let him be heard, let him be read. Hear his voice in his epistle: "I live, yet not I." "I live," he says, "not I." Therefore, he himself died. And how did he speak? "But Christ lives in me." Therefore, pray as much as you can that your enemy may die, and behold how he may die. For if he dies and does not depart from the body, you have only lost an enemy and gained a friend. Do not pray and ask God even for the visible deaths of your enemies. "What," you will say, "are we to ask for?" Honors of this world? They are passing smoke. You were safer in humility. Do you want to be in danger in exaltation? Indeed, honors are given only by God, just as wealth is; but He advised you to despise wealth, also teaching to whom He gives it; it is given to the good so that you do not think it is some evil; it is given to the wicked so that you do not consider it great good. Thus also with honors: worthy men receive them; unworthy men receive them too, so that the worthy do not regard them as great. Now, therefore, say, you ask, what should we ask for? I do not send you through many exclamations when I recalled the gospel testimony: "Peace on earth to men of good will." Ask for that good will itself. Riches, honors, and such things, do they make you good? Even if they are good, they are the smallest goods, used well by the good, and badly by the bad. Good will makes you good. Are you not ashamed to want to have good things while being bad? You have many goods: gold, silver, gems, estates, households, herds, flocks. Be ashamed before your goods. Be good yourself. For what is more miserable for you if your house is good, but your tunic, your sheep, finally your gallic, and your soul are bad? Therefore, learn to ask for the good, to put it this way, the good that makes good, that is: the good that makes people good. If you have goods used by the good, ask for the good from which you may be good. Good will makes you good. For those are also good, but they do not make you good. To know those goods are good, among them are those which the Lord mentioned: bread, fish, egg; to know they are good, He Himself said: "If you then, being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children." You are evil and give good things. Ask to be good. Therefore, He warned and said: "If you, being evil," to warn what to ask, that is, not to be evil but to be good. Therefore, let Him teach us what we ought to ask. There, in the same chapter of the Gospel, hear His subsequent words: "If you, being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, and yet you remain evil; therefore, to not remain evil, hear what follows: 'How much more will your Father who is in heaven give the good Spirit to those who ask Him.'" Behold, the good from which you will be good! The good Spirit of God makes good will in men. The price of that possession, which is called eternal life, is God Himself. What will be richer for us than eternal life? What, I say, will be richer for us when our possession will be God? Or perhaps I have done an injury because I said God will be our possession? I did not. I learned what I said. I found a holy man praying and saying: "Lord, the portion of my inheritance." Extend the purse of your greed, O greedy one, and find something greater than God, find something more valuable than God, find something better than God. What will you not have when you have Him? But gather gold and silver, as much as you can. Expel your neighbors; possess the expanded domain; reach the ends of the earth. Acquiring lands, add seas. Let what you see be yours; let what you do not see under the waters be yours. When you have all these things, what will you have if you do not have God? If, therefore, by having God the poor man is wealthy, and by not having God the rich man is a beggar, do not ask from Him anything besides Himself. What will He not give when He gives Himself? What will He give if He does not give Himself? Therefore, ask for the good Spirit; let Him inhabit you, and you will be good. For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, these are sons of God. And what follows? "If children, then heirs, heirs of God and joint-heirs with Christ." What did you desire riches for? Therefore, will the heir of God be poor? If you were the heir of a very wealthy senator, you would be rich; but will the heir of God be poor? A joint-heir with Christ, will you be poor? When your inheritance will be the Father Himself, will you be poor? Ask for the good Spirit, for now from Him you are asking for the good Spirit. For you already have something of His Spirit, that you may ask for His Spirit. For if you had nothing of it, you would ask for nothing. But because you do not have enough, both you have and you ask, until it is done as it is written: "He fills your desire with good things," until it is done as it is written elsewhere: "I shall be satisfied when Your glory is revealed." Blessed, therefore, are they who hunger and thirst for righteousness, not this earthly bread, not this earthly water, not this earthly wine but righteousness, for they shall be satisfied.

Sermons - Sermon 106

SERMO 106 On the Words of the Gospel of Luke 11:39-42:

"Now you, Pharisees, cleanse the outside of the cup and the dish"

"You are washed," and so forth.

Only the external cleanliness of the Pharisees.

You have heard the holy Gospel, how the Lord Jesus, in what he said to the Pharisees, was certainly warning his disciples, not to think that justice lies in bodily purification. For every day the Pharisees, before they dined, would wash themselves with water: as if daily washing could be the cleansing of the heart. Finally, he showed what sort they were. He who saw was the one speaking: for he could see not only their faces but also their innermost parts. Finally, to let you know this, that Pharisee to whom Christ responded thought within himself, he did not speak aloud, and yet the Lord heard. For he criticized the Lord Christ within himself, because he came to his meal unwashed. He was thinking, and the Lord heard, thus he responded. So what did he respond? Now you, Pharisees, you clean the outside of the cup: but inside you are full of deceit and robbery. Oh, come to the meal! How did he not spare the man by whom he was invited? He spared more by rebuking, so that by correcting in judgment he might spare him. Then what did he show us? That Baptism, which is administered once, cleanses through faith. But faith is within, not outside. Hence it is said and read in the Acts of the Apostles: Purifying their hearts by faith. And the apostle Peter speaks thus in his Epistle: So, he says, he gave you the likeness of Noah’s ark, how eight souls were saved through water. And he adds: So also Baptism will save you in the same form; not the removal of the filth of the flesh, but the inquiry of a good conscience. This inquiry of a good conscience the Pharisees despised, and they washed what was outside: within they remained most defiled.

Almsgiving without faith cannot cleanse. And what did he say to them afterward? Nevertheless, give alms, and behold, all things are clean for you. Almsgiving is praised; do it and test it. But pay attention for a moment: it was said to the Pharisees. These Pharisees were Jews, like the distinguished ones among the Jews. For those who were more noble and learned were called Pharisees at that time. They had not been washed by the baptism of Christ: they had not yet believed in Christ, the only begotten Son of God, who walked among them and was not recognized by them. How then does he say to them: Give alms, and behold, all things are clean for you? If those Pharisees listened to him and gave alms, according to his word all things would be clean for them; what need was there for them to believe in him? But if they could not be cleansed except by believing in him who cleanses the heart by faith; what does it mean: Give alms, and behold, all things are clean for you? Let us pay attention, and perhaps he himself explains it? The alms of the Pharisees are insufficient. When he had said this, without a doubt they thought that they were giving alms. And how did they give? They tithed all their possessions, taking a tenth part from all their produce, and giving that. It is not easy for any Christian to do this. Behold what the Jews did. Not only the wheat, but also the wine and oil: and not only this, but even the contemptible things because of the command of God, cumin, rue, mint and dill, they completely tithed: that is, they took a tenth part and gave it as alms. Therefore, I believe that they recalled to themselves and thought that the Lord Christ was speaking in vain, as if to those who did not give alms: though they knew their works, that they tithed even the smallest and most contemptible of their produce, and gave alms. They mocked him among themselves for saying such things, as if to people who did not give alms. The Lord knowing this, immediately added: Nevertheless, woe to you, Scribes and Pharisees, who tithe mint, cumin, and rue, and every herb. Know that I am aware of your alms. Certainly, these are your alms, these are the tithes: you even tithe the smallest and most insignificant of your fruits: And you neglect the weightier matters of the Law, judgment, and charity. Pay attention. You have neglected judgment and charity, and you tithe herbs. This is not doing alms. And he says, these are what you ought to have done, and not to leave the others undone. Which things to do? Judgment and charity, justice and mercy; and not to leave the others undone. Do those things: but prioritize these. The true alms which are commanded to be done.

If these things are so, what did he say to them: Give alms, and behold, everything is clean for you? What does it mean: Give alms? Do mercy. What does it mean, Do mercy? If you understand, start with yourself. For how can you be merciful to another, if you are cruel to yourself? Give alms, and everything is clean for you. Do true alms. What is alms? Mercy. Hear the Scripture: Have mercy on your soul, pleasing God. Do alms, have mercy on your soul, pleasing God. Your soul begs before you, return to your conscience. Whoever lives badly, whoever lives unfaithfully, return to your conscience: and there you will find your begging soul, you will find it needy, you will find it poor, you will find it miserable, you will find it perhaps not only needy but mute with beggary. For if it begs, it hungers for righteousness. When you have found such a soul of yours (those things are within your heart), first do alms, give it bread. What bread? If a Pharisee were to ask, the Lord would tell him: Do alms with your soul. For this is what He said to him; but he did not understand, when He explained to them the alms they were doing, and they thought to hide it from Christ; and He said to them: I know that you do them; you tithe mint and dill, cumin and rue: but I speak of other alms: you neglect justice and love. In justice and love do alms with your soul. What is in justice? Look and find; displease yourself, pronounce judgment on yourself. And what is love? Love the Lord God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind; love your neighbor as yourself; and you have done mercy first with your soul, in your conscience. But if you neglect this alms, give what you want, donate as much as you want; take from your fruits, not tithes, but halves; give nine parts, and keep one for yourself: you do nothing, when you do not do with yourself, and you are poor with yourself. Let your soul be nourished, lest it perish from hunger. Give it bread. What bread, he says? He speaks to you himself. If you would hear, and understand, and believe the Lord, He Himself would say to you: I am the living bread that came down from heaven. Would you not first give this bread to your soul, and do alms with it? If therefore you believe, you ought to do, that you may first feed your soul. Believe in Christ; and the things that are within will be cleansed, and the things that are outside will be clean. Turned to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 107

SERMO 107 CONCERNING THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL LUKE 12:13-21 "I tell you, abstain from all greed."

Commandment about guarding against all greed.

You who fear God, I do not doubt that you hear His word with fear, and do it with joy; so that you might hope now for what He promised, and later receive it. We have just heard the Lord giving us commandments, Christ Jesus the Son of God. The Truth commanded us, which neither deceives, nor is deceived: let us listen, fear, and beware. What then did He command? He said, "I tell you, abstain from all greed." What is meant by "from all greed"? What is meant by "from all"? Why did He add "from all"? For He could indeed say, "Beware of greed." It mattered to Him to add "from all," and say, "Beware of all greed." On which occasion the commandment was given by Christ.

Why he said this, as the occasion itself from which the speech arose, appears to us in the holy Gospel. For a certain man entreated him against his brother, who had taken away the whole inheritance and did not give his brother his part. Therefore, you observe what a good cause this petitioner had. He was not seeking to seize what belonged to another, but was seeking his own property that had been left to him by his parents: he sought it after appealing to the Lord and with the Lord judging. He had an unjust brother: but he had found a just judge against an unjust brother. Should he therefore lose that opportunity in such a good cause? Or who would say to his brother, "Give your brother his part," if Christ were not to say it? Would that judge say this, whom perhaps the wealthier and rapacious brother might bribe with a reward? Therefore the wretched man, deprived of his paternal wealth, having come upon such a distinguished judge, approached, entreated, pleaded, and very briefly stated his case. For what need was there to argue the case, when he was speaking to one who could see the heart? "Lord," he said, "tell my brother to divide the inheritance with me." The Lord did not say to him, "Let your brother come." Nor did he send for him to be present, or when he was present, say to the petitioner, "Prove what you said." He asked for half of the inheritance, he asked for half of it on earth: in heaven the Lord was offering the whole. The Lord gave more than he was asking for.

Christ, not willing to be the divider of inheritance, what does he teach.

Tell my brother to divide the inheritance with me. A just cause, a brief cause. But let us hear both the judge and the teacher. Man, he said: Man: for you who regard that inheritance as great, what are you but a man? He wanted to make him something more than a man. What more did he want to make him, from whom he wanted to take away greed? What more did he want to make him? I tell you: I said, you are gods, and all of you are children of the Most High. Behold, what he wanted to make him, to number him among the gods who do not possess greed. Man, who made me a divider over you? And the Apostle Paul, his servant, when he said: I beseech you, brethren, that you all speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions among you, he did not want to be a divider. Finally, he admonished those who ran to his name and divided Christ: Every one of you says: I am of Paul, I am of Apollos, I am of Cephas, I am of Christ. Is Christ divided? Was Paul crucified for you? Or were you baptized in the name of Paul? Therefore, see how bad are the men who want to be divided, who did not want to be a divider. Who, he says, made me a divider over you?

Condemned to greed is he who jealously guards what is his.

You asked for a benefit: hear advice. I say to you, beware of all greed. Perhaps, he says, you would call someone greedy and covetous if he sought what belonged to another; but I say, do not greedily and avariciously crave even your own. That is, avoid all greed. He says, beware of all avarice. A grave burden. If perhaps this burden is placed on the weak; let him who places it be asked to deign to give strength. For it should not be taken lightly, my brothers, when our Lord, our Redeemer, our Savior, who died for us, who gave his blood as a price to redeem us, our advocate and judge; it is not a light thing when he says: Beware. He knows how much evil it is: we do not know; let us believe him. He says, beware. Of what? From where? Of all avarice. I keep what is mine, I do not take what belongs to another. Beware of all avarice. Not only is the one who seizes what belongs to another greedy; but he is also greedy who voraciously keeps his own. But if he who voraciously keeps his own is thus blamed; how is he condemned who seizes what belongs to another? He says, beware of all greed: because a man's life is not in the abundance of what he possesses. Who hoards much, how much of that does he take to live? When he has taken from it, and in a way has thoughtfully separated what is sufficient to live, let him see to whom the rest remains: lest perhaps while you are keeping from which you live, you are gathering from which you die. Behold Christ, behold the truth, behold severity. Truth says beware: severity says beware. If you do not love the truth, fear severity. A man's life is not in the abundance of what he possesses. Believe him, he does not deceive you. Do you say otherwise? Indeed, a man's life is in the abundance of what he possesses. He does not deceive you: you deceive yourself. The imprudent rich man who intends to reserve, not to distribute. From this occasion, therefore, because that interloper was seeking his own share, not desiring to invade another's, this statement of the Lord was born, so that He did not say: Beware of greed, but added, of all greed. This was not enough: He gives another example of a certain rich man, to whom the land had yielded plentifully. He said, there was a rich man, to whom the land had yielded plentifully. What does it mean, yielded plentifully? The land he possessed had brought forth great crops. How great were the crops? So much that he did not find where to store them: suddenly he became narrow through abundance, an ancient miser. For how many years had already passed and yet those storehouses had sufficed? So this alone was born, that the places which used to be sufficient were now not enough. And the poor man sought counsel, not how to dispense what had grown too much, but how to reserve it: and by thinking he found counsel. He seemed to himself as if wise, by finding counsel. He thought prudently, he saw wisely. What did he see wisely? I will tear down, he says, the old storehouses, and I will build larger ones, and fill them: and I will say to my soul. What do you say to your soul? Soul, you have many goods laid up for many years, rest, eat, drink, enjoy yourself. This said the wise inventor of counsel to his soul. The soul is to be cared for, not in order for it to have goods, but in order for it to be good itself. And God said to him: for He does not disdain to speak even with fools. One of you may perhaps say: And how did God speak with a fool? O my brothers, with how many fools does He speak here, when the Gospel is read? When it is read, those who hear and do not act, are they not fools? What then does the Lord say? Because that man, seeming wise to himself in seeking counsel again: Fool, He said; Fool, who seem wise to yourself: Fool, who said to your soul: You have many goods laid up for many years: today your soul is required of you. To whom you said: You have many goods; today it is required, and it has not one good. Let it despise these goods and be itself good; so that when it is required, it may leave secure. For what is more unjust than a man who wants to have many goods, yet does not want to be good himself? You are unworthy to have, who do not want to be what you want to have. Do you perhaps want to have a bad estate? Surely not, but a good one. Do you want a bad wife? No, but a good one. Do you want finally a bad little house, or even a bad shoe? Why then only a bad soul? He did not say here to this fool, thinking vain things, building barns, and not seeing the bellies of the poor; He did not say to him: Today your soul will be snatched to hell: He said none of these things; but, it is required of you. I do not tell you where your soul will go: but at the place where you are keeping so many things, whether you will or not, it is migrating. Behold, fool, you thought to fill new larger barns, as if nothing were to come of it.

Those bearing the sign of Christ on their foreheads within are secure among the wicked. But perhaps he was not yet a Christian. Let us listen, brothers, to those who, being believers, the Gospel is recited, by whom He who said those things is worshiped, whose sign is carried by us on the forehead, and is held in the heart. For it matters greatly where a man bears the sign of Christ, whether on the forehead only, or on both the forehead and in the heart. You have heard what the holy prophet Ezekiel spoke today, how before God sent the destroyer to the wicked people, He first sent the signer and said to him: "Go and put a sign on the foreheads of those who sigh and mourn over the sins of my people which are committed in their midst." He did not say, "which are committed outside them," but, "in their midst." Yet they sigh and mourn: and therefore they are signed on the forehead; on the forehead of the inner man, not the outer. For there is a forehead on the face, and there is a forehead in the conscience. Indeed, sometimes when the inner forehead is struck, the outer one blushes: it either blushes out of shame, or turns pale out of fear. Therefore, there is a forehead of the inner man. They are signed there, so that they are not destroyed: because although they did not correct the sins that were committed in their midst, nevertheless they grieved, and by that very grief they were set apart; and being set apart for God, they were mixed in the sight of men. They are secretly signed, they are not openly harmed. Then the destroyer is sent, and it is said to him: "Go, destroy, do not spare the young, the old, the males, the females: but do not approach those who have the sign on their forehead." How great security has been given to you, my brothers, who are in this people sighing and mourning over the iniquities that are committed in your midst, and not committing them? In order that sin may not occur, all greed must be cut off. But so that you may not commit iniquities: Be wary of all greed. I tell you more extensively, what it means to guard against all greed. In lust, a man is greedy, for whom his own wife is not enough. And greed itself is said to be idolatry; because in this very idolatry, a man is greedy, for whom one true God is not enough. What soul makes many gods for itself, unless it is a greedy soul? What soul makes false martyrs for itself, unless it is a greedy soul? Beware of all greed. Behold, you love your own things, and you boast yourself, because you do not seek what belongs to others: see what evil you do by not listening to Christ saying: Beware of all greed. Behold, you love your own things, you do not take what belongs to others: you have from labor, you have from justice: you have inherited, someone you merited has given to you: you have sailed, you have been endangered, you have not committed fraud, you have not sworn falsely, what God willed you have acquired: and you keep it covetously as if with a good conscience, because you have not obtained from evil, and you are not seeking what belongs to others. If you do not listen to Him who said: Beware of all greed, hear how much evil you will do because of your own possession. Behold, it happened, for the sake of argument, that you became a judge. You are not corrupt, because you do not seek what belongs to others: no one gives you a reward, and says: Judge against my adversary. Far be it; a man who does not seek what belongs to others, when can this be persuaded to you? See what evil you will commit because of your own possession. That man who wants you to judge unjustly, and pass a sentence against his adversary for him, perhaps he is a powerful man, and can bring a false accusation against you, so that you lose what belongs to you. You consider his power, you think of it, you think of your own possessions which you keep, which you love: not those you have possessed, but to which you have wickedly clung. You consider your snare, because of which you do not have the wings of free virtue: and you say to yourself, I offend this man, he has much power for a time; he will suggest evil of me, and I will be proscribed, and I will lose what I have. You will judge unjustly, not when you seek what belongs to others, but when you keep your own.

Again about the danger to the greedy or those eagerly keeping their own.

Give me a man who has heard Christ, give me a man who has listened with fear: Beware of all covetousness: and do not say to me, I am a poor man, a commoner, of middling status, an ordinary soldier; when do I hope to be a judge? I do not fear that temptation, the danger of which you have set before my eyes. Behold, I also say what the poor should fear. A rich and powerful person calls you to bear false witness for him. What will you do now? Tell me. You have a good amount of money: you have worked, acquired, and saved. He demands: Bear false witness for me, and I will give you this and that. You who do not seek what belongs to others: Far be it from me, you say: I do not seek what God did not want to give me, I do not accept it; leave me. Do you not want to accept what I give? I will take away what you have. Now test yourself, now question yourself. Why do you pay attention to me? Pay attention to yourself inwardly, see yourself inwardly, examine yourself inwardly; sit down with yourself, and place yourself before yourself, and extend yourself on the rack of God's commandment, and torture yourself with fear, and do not caress yourself: answer yourself. Behold, if anyone should threaten this, what will you do? I will take away from you what you acquired with so much labor, unless you bear false witness for me. Give him this: Beware of all avarice. O my servant, he will say to you, whom I have redeemed and made free, whom I have adopted as a brother from being a slave, whom I have placed as a member in my body, listen to me: Let him take away what you have acquired, but he will not take me away from you. Why do you perish, preserving your own possessions? Did I not say to you: Beware of all covetousness?

Avarice itself must also be avoided in life.

Behold you are troubled, behold you are tossed: your heart is shaken like a ship in storms. Christ sleeps: awaken the sleeping one, and you will not suffer the raging storm. Awaken Him who willed to have nothing here, and you will have everything, He who reached even to the cross for you, whose bones could be counted by those who insulted Him as He hung naked: and beware of all avarice. It is not only avarice for money: beware the avarice for life. A horrendous avarice, a fearful avarice. Sometimes a man despises what he has and says: I do not bear false witness. I do not say, you tell me? I take what you have. Take what I have: you do not take what I have inside. For he who said: The Lord gave, the Lord took away; as it pleased the Lord, so it was done; therefore let the name of the Lord be blessed, did not remain poor. Naked I came from my mother's womb, naked shall I return to the earth. Naked outside, clothed inside. Naked outside by rags, and perishable rags; clothed inside. Whence? Let your priests be clothed with righteousness. But what if he says, when you have scorned what you possess, what if he says: I kill you? Answer him, if you have listened to Christ: You kill me? Better you kill my flesh, than I kill my soul with a false tongue. What will you do to me? You will kill the flesh: the soul departs free, in the end of the age to receive again the very flesh it despised. What then will you do to me? But if I bear false witness for you, I kill myself with my tongue; and I do not kill myself in the flesh: For the mouth that lies, kills the soul. Perhaps you do not say this. Why do you not say it? You want to live: do you want to live more than God has appointed? Surely you beware of all avarice? This far God willed you to live, until this one came to you. Perhaps he will kill you, to make you a martyr. Do not have a desire to live; and do you not have the eternity of dying? Do you see how that avarice, when we desire more than is needed, makes us sin? Let us beware of all avarice, if we wish to enjoy eternal wisdom.

Sermons - Sermon 107A

SERMON 107/A TREATISE ON THE GOSPEL OF THE TWO BROTHERS What the Lord replied to him who interrupted about the inheritance The Lord Jesus, the giver of charity, is the accuser of greed. For he wishes to uproot the bad tree and plant the good tree. From the love of the world no good fruit arises. From the love of God, none bad. These are the two trees about which the Lord himself spoke, saying: A good tree does not produce bad fruits. But a bad tree produces bad fruits. Therefore, our speech, when it is from the Lord God, is an ax to the root of the bad tree. The very word of the holy Gospel that sounded out struck down the bad trees. It prunes but does not cut down. For what your Maker did not want you to have, know that it is advantageous for you. The Lord does not want us to have worldly greed. No one, therefore, should say: I am seeking mine, not another's. Beware of all greed. If you love too much what can perish, you will lose truly what cannot perish. You say, I neither want to lose mine nor take another's. This is an excuse of a kind of greed, not the glory of charity. It has been said of charity: It does not seek what is its own, but what is of others. It does not seek its own advantages, but the salvation of the brothers. For even he who appealed to the Lord, if you have paid attention, was seeking his own, not another's. For his brother had taken everything and had not given him his due share. He saw the Lord as just, for he could not find a better judge, and made an appeal to him and said: Lord, tell my brother to divide the inheritance with me. What could be more just? Let him take his share, give mine to me. Neither I all, nor he all, because we are brothers. And the very thing they sought to divide they would always have whole if they lived in harmony. Everything that is divided is diminished. If they were in harmony in their house as they were when their father was alive, each would possess the whole. By analogy: if they had two estates, both would be of both, and when asked about each, they would call it their own. Whose estate is this? if you asked either one of them, he would respond: Ours. Likewise, if you asked whose the other was, similarly: Ours. But if each took one, the possession would be diminished, the response would change. Then if asked whose estate this was, he would answer: Mine. Whose is that? My brother's. You did not acquire one, but lost one because you divided. Therefore, because it appeared he had just greed since he sought his share, not coveting another's, presuming on the justice of his cause, he appealed to a just judge. But what did the just judge say to him? Speak, man - for you do not understand the things of God but those of men - who made me a divider between you of the inheritance? He denied what was asked, but he gave more than he denied. He asked for a judgment about possessing the inheritance. He gave advice about not having greed. Why do you seek the estate? Why do you seek the land? Why do you seek the share? If you do not have greed, you will have everything. Consider the non-greedy who said: As having nothing and yet possessing everything. Therefore, he says: You seek from me that your brother give you part of your inheritance. I say to you: Beware of all greed. You think you are guarding against greed for another's property. I say to you: Beware of all greed. And you want to love your things excessively, and because of your property, to lower your heart from heaven, and wanting to store up on earth, you seek to upend your soul; for the soul has its riches just as a chest has its own.

Example of the rich man who succeeded in the kingdom.

Finally, some rich man is offered as an example to beware of all greed. What does "all" mean? Even those things which are said to be yours. A certain rich man is proposed, to whom a region succeeded, that is, his possessions in the region; abundant fruits have grown: success indeed is called prosperity. And he thought to himself, saying what you heard when the Gospel was read: What shall I do, where shall I gather my fruits? He had nowhere to put them. He was too abundant. He was distressed by plenty, not by scarcity. How miserable he was, whom not lack but abundance disturbed! As if he truly had nowhere to put without losing anything! And he thought he had found a great plan: I have found, he said, what I will do. I will destroy the old barns and make new larger ones, and I will fill them, and I will say to my soul: Soul, you have many goods for many years. Rest, eat, drink, be merry. But God said to him: Fool, you seem wise to yourself because you have found a plan for pulling down the small barns and making larger ones. You are foolish where you seem wise to yourself. Why have you done this to tell your soul: You have many goods for many years? This night your soul will be demanded from you. Where is the long time? This night your soul is being demanded from you. The things you have prepared, whose will they be? Are you not troubled in vain? You hoard up wealth and do not know for whom you gather these things. He had nowhere to put them! And where were the poor? What your narrow barns no longer held, would your brother take, would your Lord take who said: When you did it to one of these least of mine, you did it to me. Are you storing in barns and will not lose it? Are you migrating to heaven and will lose it? Do you have nowhere to put it? Give out, and expect it to be returned to you. You place in the hand of the poor, you receive from the hand of the rich. What you do not have where to put, who gave it to you? He who gave it to you wants to take something from what he gave. He who made you needs you. If he needs it for your good, give from what you have. You have earthly fruits, do you have eternal life? How great a possession it is! How cheaply valued! Do you want to know how cheaply valued? Such is the possession, such is the possession of eternal life, to which when you arrive (O fool who counts on earth and will lose heaven!), such is that possession, where when you arrive, you cannot migrate from it, but will also possess it forever and without any end. How great it is, you see. How cheaply valued, attend. It is valued for what your barns do not hold, what they cannot hold, what overflows, for which you want to make larger ones. But what is this? What is the price of the possession? If given to the poor laborers? You know and see that whom you give to walk on earth. What you give, they carry to heaven, and when they have brought it to heaven, you do not receive what you gave. For you will receive heavenly for earthly, immortal for mortal, eternal for temporal. If you gave at interest and for so much silver you received so much gold, for example, for a pound of silver, a pound of gold, how much richer would you be? You would be overjoyed when you were able to reach such usury, wouldn’t you? What kind of interest is this? See what you give, what you receive. You give what melts away here, you receive what you will never lose. For you give what you do not live on (for the Lord said, if you noticed, in the very reading of the Gospel: Not in the abundance of what a man has is his life), so that you may receive what you will always live on. The riches of the flesh are gold, silver, grain, wine and oil, fields, possessions; these are the riches of the flesh. The flesh itself, how much does it have from them, when the belly is filled? You see the rest lies superfluous. If you were compelled to eat as much as you have, would you not be compelled to expire?

If you despise earthly things, you will possess the Creator himself as your inheritance.

Beware, therefore, brothers, of all greed. Life on this earth is lived with very little, and the great eternal life is compared to the very little. Does it seem that Zacchaeus bought it at a higher price? For he was very rich, greater than the tax collectors. And when the Lord entered his house, thus salvation was made there: "Half," he says, "of my goods I give to the poor." He bought greatness with greatness. What about the other half? "If I have taken anything from anyone by false accusation, I restore it fourfold." Behold why the other half was preserved, not to be possessed greedily, but to be returned as a debt. He bought greatness with greatness who had many riches and gave half to the poor. Whatever he gave, what is it? What are the riches of any powerful person? What is the whole earth? What is earth and sea? Look at the sky, look at the stars, look at the whole creation. If you despise a few things, you will possess the Creator himself as an inheritance. Your Lord says this to you: Beware of all greed. Be careful in acquiring earthly things, and I will fill you. You respond and say: How will you fill me? For this is what you were seeking, when you despised a few things, to be filled with greater things. Because you gave something of your fruits and heard from your Lord: I will fill you, you will say: Will he fill my house with gold, with silver? I will fill you. You seek that I may fill your house. I will fill you if you will be my house. Recognize and love the one who made you, and he will fill you, not from what is his, but from himself. You will have God, you will be full of God. These are the great riches of the soul. The riches of the body are superfluous, because our body seeks little from which it may live. The riches of the soul are not superfluous. Whatever God has given you, whatever God has granted you of piety, whatever he has granted you of charity, whatever he has granted you of justice, whatever he has granted you of chastity, whatever he has granted you of himself, cannot be superfluous. Your inner riches are great. What are they called? God. O poor man, do you then have nothing if you have God? O rich man, do you then have something if you do not have God?

He who is greedy for money is a slave to it.

Therefore, let us return to the words of the Lord: beware of all greed. Of all? you will say. It is my property. He will say: Of all. For has it been said to you that you should not have your property? Have it, but without greed. Thus you will have it. But if you desire it, you will be possessed by it, not possess it. Do not love money if you wish to possess money. For if you do not love it, you will have money. If you love it, money will possess you. For you will not be master of money, but a servant, and because you are a servant, you will follow where it drags you. Are you not a servant when you are dragged by its desire? Does not its love wake you from sleep? If you were a servant of a man, perhaps he would allow you to sleep. If you do not have money and are avaricious, you stay awake from that very desire to have it. If you have it, you stay awake out of fear that you will lose it. You also fear that through it you will be lost yourself: I think, when you had less, you slept more securely. The rich man and the poor man meet each other on the way: let the rich man give to the poor man from his own and both will reach their homeland.

Beware of all greed. It benefits you, brothers, because you are poor. Do not wish to be rich. Let God suffice for you, because He does not forsake you. He thought of you before you existed, and will He not think that you should live? You have already believed in Him, praised Him, hoped in Him, and will He withhold from you what He knows to be necessary for us? What He gives to others, will He deny to His own? Will He refuse those who praise Him, who gives to those who blaspheme Him? When you have Him, consider that you have everything. For your Father knows, the Lord Himself says in the Gospel, what you need before you ask Him. And about bodily matters

He thus spoke: Seek first the kingdom of God and the justice of God, and all these things will be added unto you. But sometimes the righteous suffer hunger and see the wicked belching without restraint. Do not be surprised. The righteous one is being tested, the wicked one is being condemned. That one is tested who praises God in the very poverty. That one is condemned who offends God through the very abundance. Scripture says: The rich and the poor meet together; the Lord made them both. Where did they meet? On a certain road. What is that road? This life. Here the rich and the poor met because the rich is born, the poor is born. They met each other. They saw each other on the road. Both walk the road, one burdened, the other lightened. But the one who is lightened is hungry, the one who is burdened groans. Let the burdened one lighten his load. Let him give something to him who meets him, neither will starve, neither will groan, both will arrive. Where does your groaning come from, O rich man? Because you have no place to put [your wealth]? There is where to place it. I do not want you to groan. Consider the hungry, and you have where to place [your wealth]. Do you fear losing it? Then more you do not lose it. The example of a certain mediocre religious man.

Something occurred that is both very delightful and worthy of being related to your Love. A certain moderately religious man sold a solidus for the needs of his household. And because he was religious, he took a hundred coins from the top of the price and gave them to the poor, intending to send the remainder to his house for his own use. To test him, a thief was sent to him, and he lost the entire price of the solidus. The devil did this to make him regret having given anything to the poor and to say: "O Lord, only those who do evil are pleasing to you. Men do evil and they acquire wealth. I did good and lost everything." But he did not say this; for he was steadfast, and he stood even when facing adversity. Therefore, when he had lost the entire price of the solidus from which he had given a hundred coins to the poor, he said: "Woe is me, for I did not give everything! What I gave, I did not lose; what I could lose was what I did not give." It came to his mind what he had heard from the Gospel or what he had read, and he believed. For this is indeed the advice of our Lord. Recollect and see. Do not store up for yourselves treasures on earth, where moth and rust destroy, and where thieves break in and steal. But store up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither thief approaches nor moth destroys. For where your treasure is, there your heart will be also. The thief could take his money, but he could not remove his heart from heaven.

It is more to have God in the mind than gold in the bag.

Therefore, keep what you have, so that you may give to the needy. For when the Lord Christ said: "Fool, this night your soul will be required of you. And the things you have prepared, whose will they be?" It was not of a man who takes what is not his but of one who loves his own goods immoderately, he added and said: "So it is for everyone who treasures up for himself and is not rich towards God." Do you want to be rich towards God? Give to God. Give not out of great wealth, but out of your own will. For even if you give a little from what little you have, what you give is greatly received. God does not weigh the wealth but the will. Remember that widow, brothers. You heard Zacchaeus: "I give half of my possessions to the poor." He gave much from much, and he as if bought that kingdom of heaven at a great price. Whatever is considered how great it is, is worthless to Him. However, it seems much that he gave because he was very rich. Remember that poor widow who brought two small coins, and many rich people were casting gifts into the treasury and those who were present looked at what was being put in that was great. She entered and put in two small coins. Who even considered seeing her? But the Lord, He saw her in such a way that He saw only her and commended her to those not seeing, that is, He made them attend to what was not seen. "You see this widow," He said, and then they noticed her, "she put in more than all the rich," they said, large out of great. They were admiring the large gifts of the wealthy. When they saw those two coins, did they even see that widow afterwards? "She put in more," He said, "than all those rich people." For they put in out of their abundance, but she out of her poverty put in everything she had. She had much because she had God in her heart. It is more to have God in the soul than gold in the purse. Who put in more than she who left nothing for herself? The price of heavenly possession.

However, beloved, pay attention because we were speaking about acquiring that heavenly possession. Did it cost as much as what Zacchaeus paid, and did it not cost as much as what that widow had? The price of it was what Zacchaeus gave, the price of it was also two small coins. Compare half of Zacchaeus' wealth with the two small coins; there is no comparison. Compare the will of Zacchaeus and the will of the widow. You will find the unequal in the former, the equal in the latter. Therefore, do not let your heart be saddened when you give a little from your little. What is little to a poor man is much to Him who knows the poor and the rich. For God knows with what spirit you give, with what will you give. Then, beware of all greed and give whatever you can from charity. Have we found anything cheaper than two small coins? A cup of cold water. Whoever gives, he says, a cup of cold water to one of these little ones, truly I say to you, he will not lose his reward. Now, how much is a cup of cold water worth, for which no wood was used to heat it? Therefore, he did not just say a cup of water but added of cold water. You see how much it is and how much it is that it compares. Is there anything cheaper than a cup of cold water? What? Nothing. If there is thus nothing, how can it be nothing? It is nothing and it is a thing. It is what you give: but peace on earth to men of good will. This was bought at this price from the Patriarchs and remained for sale to the Prophets. Why was it not preserved for others? The Prophets bought it, they left it to be purchased by the Apostles. The Apostles bought it, they preserved it for the martyrs to buy. The martyrs bought it, and we have it whole to buy. Let us love and buy it. It is not that you say: It is worth so much and I do not have. I will take so much on loan and from that I will pay it back, as men are accustomed to say, when they set a certain price either for a house or for a possession on sale. Do not revolve your chests, return to your conscience, where you find the price of the possession. If there is faith, hope, charity there, give and you buy, and when you give you do not lose. For if you have given faith, you do not lose faith, or if you have expended hope, you do not lose hope, or when you have given charity, you will not remain without charity. They are fountains: they abundantly flow. Be you the house of God and the bodily church has been made.

Behold, you are poor and you build the Church. How is this, if you are poor, unless because you are rich in spirit? Act therefore, with the Lord helping, that you may accomplish it. For God loves a cheerful giver. When you give cheerfully, it is counted to you. However, when you give with sadness, and outwardly you have nothing, and inwardly, where there is sadness, there is anguish. The coin perishes, it is not bought, because a good will buys it. Give little, give much, a good will be there and you buy it. And that which you build the church, with God propitiating, you build for yourselves. It is different what you give to the poor: they pass and come. This you build for yourselves. It is the house of your prayers where you gather, where you perform what is divine, where you sing hymns and praises to God, where you pour out prayers, where you receive the sacraments. You see that it is the house of your prayers. Do you wish to make it? You be the house of God and that house is made. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 108

SERMO 108 OF THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL LUKE 12: 35-36:

"Let your loins be girded, and your lamps burning." And so forth OF THE WORDS OF PSALM 33, 12-15:

"WHO IS THE MAN WHO DESIRES LIFE", AND OTHER THINGS On awaiting the coming of the Lord. Our Lord Jesus Christ both came to humans, and departed from humans, and is going to come to humans. And yet He was here when He came, nor did He depart when He left, and He is going to those to whom He said, "Behold, I am with you even to the end of the age." Therefore, according to the form of a servant, which He took on for us, He was born at a certain time and was killed and rose again, and now He no longer dies, nor does death have dominion over Him any longer. However, according to divinity, by which He is equal to the Father, He was in this world, and the world was made through Him, and the world did not know Him. From this, you heard the Gospel just now, what He warned us about, making us cautious, and wanting us to be ready and prepared to await the final things, so that after the last things, which are to be feared in this age, rest succeeds, which does not have an end. Blessed are those who will have been made participants. However, those who are not secure now will be secure then, and again, those who do not want to fear now will fear then. We have become Christians for this expectation and because of this hope. Is not our hope based on this world? Let us not love the world. We have been called from love of this world so that we may hope for and love another world. In this, we must abstain from all illicit cravings, that is, we must have our loins girded, and be fervent and shine in good deeds, that is, we must have burning lamps. For the Lord Himself said to His disciples in another place in the Gospel, "No one lights a lamp and puts it under a bushel, but on a lampstand, so that it may shine for all who are in the house." And to show where He spoke from, He added and said, "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good deeds and glorify your Father who is in heaven."

Three things commended in the Gospel.

Therefore, he wanted our loins to be girded and our lamps burning. What does it mean, to have girded loins? Turn away from evil. What does it mean to shine? What does it mean to have burning lamps? It means: And do good. What is added and said: And be like men waiting for their lord when he returns from the wedding; if not what follows in that psalm: Seek peace and pursue it? These three things, that is, abstaining from evil, doing good acts, and the hope of eternal reward, are mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, where it is written that Paul taught them concerning self-discipline, righteousness, and the hope of eternal life. Concerning self-discipline: Let your loins be girded. Concerning righteousness: And your lamps burning. Concerning the Lord's expectation, which is the hope of eternal life. Therefore: Turn away from evil, this is self-discipline, these are the girded loins: And do good, this is righteousness, these are the burning lamps: Seek peace and pursue it, this is the expectation of the future age: therefore: Be like men waiting for their lord when he returns from the wedding.

Good days are sought in vain here.

Having these commandments and promises, why do we seek good days on earth where we cannot find them? For I know that you seek them when you are either sick or in tribulations, which abound in this age. For when age leans towards its end, and the old man is full of complaints, and without any joys. Amidst all the tribulations by which the human race is worn down, men seek nothing but good days and desire a long life, which they cannot have here. For even the long life of a man is compressed into such brevity compared to the breadth of that entire age, as if one drop were compared to the entire sea. What then is the life of man, even that which is called long? They call it a long life, which in this age is short: and, as I have said, groans abound until decrepit old age. All this is little and brief: and yet how is it sought by men? With how much diligence, how much labor, how much care, how much vigilance, how much effort do men seek to live long here and grow old? But what is it to live long but to run towards the end? You had yesterday, and you wish to have tomorrow. But when today and tomorrow have passed, you have less of it. Therefore you wish the day to dawn, so that it may bring you closer to what you do not want to reach. You present some ceremony to your friends, you hear there those wishing you well saying, "May you live many years": you wish for what they have said to come. What? That the years and years may come, and do you not wish for the end of the years to come? Your efforts are contradictory: you wish to walk, but not to arrive.

Life and good days where to be sought.

Nevertheless, as I have said, if so much care is inherent in humans that they desire with daily, great, and persistent labors to die more slowly; how much care must be taken that they may never die? No one wants to think about that. Every day people search for good days in this age, where they are not found: and no one wants to live in such a way that they may reach that place where they are found. Therefore, the same Scripture admonishes and says: Who is the man who desires life and loves to see good days? Scripture asked in this way to know what answer would be given: knowing that all men seek life and good days. It asked for the desire of them as if it were answered from the heart of all, "I do." Thus it said: Who is the man who desires life and loves to see good days? Just as at this hour, when I speak to you, when you heard me say: Who is the man who desires life and loves to see good days? you all answered in your heart, "I." For I, too, who speak with you, desire life and good days: what you seek, I seek also.

Here, least of all, is there a need to seek a good life and days.

Just as if gold were necessary for all of us, and I, wishing to reach the gold along with you, and it were somewhere in your field, in a place subject to your control, and I saw you searching for gold, and I said to you, "What are you seeking?" You would answer me, "Gold." And I would say to you, "You seek gold, and I seek gold; what you seek, I also seek; but you are not seeking it where we may find it. Therefore, listen to me about where we may find it: I do not take it from you, I show you the place: indeed, let us all follow him who knows where what we seek is." Likewise now, because you desire life and good days, we cannot say to you, "Do not desire life and good days," but we say this: "Do not seek life and good days here in this world, where they cannot be." Is not this life itself similar to death? The days themselves hasten and pass by; for today's day has excluded yesterday; tomorrow is therefore born to exclude today. The days themselves do not stand still: why do you want to stand still with them? Therefore, your desire, by which you want life and good days, not only do I not suppress, but I also urge even more intensely. Indeed, seek life, seek good days: but let them be sought where they can be found.

What must be done to obtain good days? Do you want to hear with me the counsel of him who knows where good days are, and where life is? Listen not from me, but with me together. For a certain one says to us: Come, children, listen to me. And let us hurry, and stand, and prick up our ears, and understand with our hearts the Father who said: Come, children, listen to me; the fear of the Lord, he says: I will teach you. And what thing does he wish to teach, and to what thing is the fear of the Lord useful, he continues: Who is the man who desires life, and loves to see good days? We all respond, We do. Let us hear what follows. Keep your tongue from evil, and your lips from speaking deceit. Say now, I. A moment ago when I said: Who is the man who desires life, and loves to see good days? we all were responding, I. Now let someone respond to me, I. Therefore: Keep your tongue from evil, and your lips from speaking deceit. Say now, I. Therefore you wish for good days and life; you do not wish to keep your tongue from evil, and your lips from speaking deceit? Eager for the reward, lazy for the work. And to whom is a reward given if not to the one working? If only in your own house you would give a reward to one working. For I know that to one not working you do not give. Why? Because you owe nothing to one doing nothing. And God has promised a reward. What reward? Life and good days, which we all desire, and to which days we all strive to come. He will give the promised reward. What reward? Life and good days. And what are the good days? Life without end, rest without labor. The tongue must be restrained. A great reward has been proposed: with such a great reward proposed, let us see what he commanded. For now, kindled by the promise of such a reward and the love of that reward, let us prepare our strength, our sides, our arms, for his command. Is he perhaps about to command us to carry heavy burdens, to perhaps dig something, to perhaps erect some kind of machine? He did not command you a laborious task, but the member among all the members which you quickly move, he commanded you to restrain: Restrain your tongue from evil. It is not a labor to erect a structure; and is it labor to hold the tongue? Restrain your tongue from evil. Do not speak lies, do not speak accusations, do not speak slanders, do not speak false testimonies, do not speak blasphemies: Restrain your tongue from evil. See how you get angry if someone speaks ill of you. Just as you get angry at another when he speaks ill of you, so get angry at yourself when you speak ill of another. Let your lips not speak deceit. Let what is in your heart be said outwardly. Let not your breast conceal one thing and your tongue bring forth another. Turn away from evil, and do good. For how shall I say to him, Clothe the naked, who still wishes to strip the clothed? For he who oppresses his fellow citizen, how can he receive a stranger? Therefore, in order, first turn away from evil, and do good: first gird your loins, and then light the lamp. And when you have done this, securely await life and good days. Seek peace, and pursue it: and then with a good conscience you will say to the Lord: I have done what you commanded, render what you promised.

SERMO 109 From the words of the Gospel of Luke 12:56-59:

"56 Hypocrites, you know how to interpret the appearance of earth and sky; but why do you not know how to interpret the present time? 57 And why do you not judge for yourselves what is right? 58 As you go with your accuser before the magistrate, make an effort to settle with him on the way, lest he drag you to the judge, and the judge hand you over to the officer, and the officer put you in prison. 59 I tell you, you will never get out until you have paid the very last penny."

"You know how to discern the face of the sky and earth," and so forth. AND CONCERNING THESE:

"If you go with your adversary to the prince, make an effort"

"On the way to be freed from it" and so forth The time of mercy is to be used for repentance.

We have heard the Gospel, and in it the Lord rebuking those who know how to interpret the appearance of the sky, but do not know how to discern the time of the faith of the approaching kingdom of heaven. He said this to the Jews, but the message has also reached us. The Lord Jesus Christ Himself began the preaching of His Gospel in this way: Do penance; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. Similarly, John the Baptist, His precursor, also began in this way: Do penance; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. And now the Lord reproves those who do not wish to do penance, with the kingdom of heaven approaching. The kingdom of heaven, as He Himself said, will not come with observation. And again He said: The kingdom of heaven is within you. Therefore, let each one prudently receive the admonitions of the teacher, so as not to waste the time of the Savior’s mercy, which is now being extended, as long as humanity is spared. It is for this reason that man is spared, so that he may repent, and there may be none who will be condemned. God sees when the end of the world will come: nevertheless now is the time of faith. Whether the end of the world will find any of us here, I do not know, and perhaps it will not find us. Each of our times is near, because we are mortal. We walk amidst dangers. If we were made of glass, we would fear danger less. What is more fragile than a glass vessel? Yet it is preserved and lasts for ages. For though dangers are feared for a glass vessel, old age and fever are not feared for it. Therefore, we are more fragile and weaker: because we dread every danger that does not cease in human affairs due to our frailty daily; and if these dangers do not approach, time marches on: does a man avoid a blow, does he avoid the end? Does he avoid what comes from outside, does he expel what arises within? Indeed, now our insides generate worms, now any disease suddenly seizes us: finally, however much man is spared, when old age comes, there is no way to defer it. Who is that adversary whom we are commanded to agree with?

Therefore let us listen to the Lord, let us do in ourselves what He has commanded. Let us see who is that adversary, of whom He warned us, saying: "When you go with your adversary to the prince, give diligence on the way to be delivered from him; lest he deliver you to the judge, and the judge deliver you to the officer, and you be cast into prison, from which you shall not go out until you have paid the very last farthing." Who is this adversary? If it is the devil, we have already been freed from him. What price was given for us, that we might be redeemed from him? The Apostle speaks of this redemption of ours, saying: "Who has delivered us from the power of darkness, and has translated us into the kingdom of the Son of His love." We have been redeemed, we have renounced the devil: how will we give diligence to be delivered from him, lest he again make us captive sinners? But he is not the adversary about whom the Lord warns us. For in another place another evangelist has expressed it in such a way that if we join both words, and compare the words of the two Gospels, we quickly understand this adversary. Behold, what did he say here? "When you go with your adversary to the prince, give diligence on the way to be delivered from him." However, another evangelist placed it thus: "Be agreeable with your adversary quickly while you are with him on the way." The rest is similar: "Lest the adversary deliver you to the judge, and the judge deliver you to the officer, and you be cast into prison." Both evangelists have explained this similarly. One said: "Give diligence on the way to be delivered from him"; the other said: "Be agreeable with him." For you cannot be delivered from him, unless you agree with him. Do you wish to be delivered from him? Agree with him. Is it then the devil, to whom a Christian ought to agree? Our adversary, the word of God.

Let us therefore seek this adversary, to whom we should consent, so that he will not hand us over to the judge, and the judge to the officer: let us seek him and agree with him. If you sin, your adversary is the word of God. For example, perhaps you enjoy getting drunk: it says to you, Do not. You enjoy watching and idling: it says to you, Do not. You enjoy committing adultery: the word of God says to you, Do not. In whatever sins you wish to do your own will, it says to you, Do not. He is an adversary to your will until he becomes the author of your salvation. Oh, how good an adversary, how useful an adversary! He does not seek our will, but our benefit. He is our adversary as long as we are also enemies to ourselves. As long as you are an enemy to yourself, the word of God is your enemy: be a friend to yourself, and you will agree with it. You shall not commit murder: listen, and you have agreed. You shall not steal: listen, and you have agreed. You shall not commit adultery: listen, and you have agreed. You shall not bear false witness: listen, and you have agreed. You shall not covet your neighbor's wife: listen, and you have agreed. You shall not covet your neighbor's goods: listen, and you have agreed. In all these things you have agreed with this adversary of yours: and what have you lost for yourself? Not only have you lost nothing, but you have also found yourself, who was lost. This way is life: if we agree with it, if we consent to it; when the way is finished, we will not fear the judge, the officer, the prison. The years depart from man more than they approach. When does the way end? It does not end at the same hour for everyone. Each one has an hour when he finishes the way. The way, this life is called: you finished this life, you finished the way. We walk; and living itself is advancing. Do you perhaps think that time advances and we stand still? It cannot be so. Just as time advances, we too advance: and the years do not add to us, but rather decrease. People are very mistaken when they say: This child is still less wise, years will add to him, and he will be wise. Pay attention to what you say. You said add: I show that they subtract when you say add. And listen how easily I prove it. Let us think we know his years from when he was born: for example, to wish him well, he is to live eighty years, reaching old age. Write eighty years. He lived one year: how many do you have in total? how many did you have? Eighty. Subtract one. He lived ten: seventy remain. He lived twenty: sixty remain. Surely they were adding: what is this? Our years come to go: they come, I say, to go. For they do not come to stand with us: but as they pass through us, they wear us down, and make us less and less strong. Such is the way in which we have come. What shall we do with that adversary, that is, with the word of God? Make peace with him. For you do not know when the way will end. When the way is finished, the judge remains, and a minister, and prison. But if you keep good will towards your adversary, and agree with him; you will find a father in place of a judge, an angel carrying you to the bosom of Abraham in place of a cruel minister, and paradise in place of prison. How quickly you change everything on the way, because you agreed with your adversary!

Sermons - Sermon 11

SERMO 11 TREATISE OF SAINT AUGUSTINE Of Saint Elijah and on the patience of Job This is a time of doing good works. The Lord our God, not wanting any of us to perish, cultivating His Church as His field, seeking fruit from His trees before the time of the axe arrives, when it will be necessary to cut down the fruitless trees, ceases not to admonish us so that, while there is time and with God's help it is in our power, we may do good works. For when the time of doing well has passed, there remains only the receiving. No one will tell you after the resurrection of the dead in the kingdom of God: "Break bread for the hungry," because you will not find anyone hungry. No one will say: "Clothe the naked," where the tunic of all will be immortality. No one will say: "Welcome the stranger," where all will live in their own homeland, for now we are strangers from there. No one will say: "Visit the sick," where there is eternal health. No one will say: "Bury the dead," where death will die. All these acts of piety will not be necessary in eternal life, where there will be only peace and everlasting joy. However, in this present time, in order for us to know how much God commends the works of mercy to us, He has even allowed His holy ones to be in need, so that when friends are made here from the mammon of iniquity, they also may receive their friends into the eternal tabernacles. That is, when God's devout servants, while constantly serving God, occasionally find themselves in need, those who have the world's riches give alms. Just as they make them partake in earthly substance, so too will they deserve to share a part with them in eternal life.

God commands in wondrous ways.

I said this because of the reading of the Books of Kings, which we first heard. Did God fail to feed His servant Elijah? Were birds not ministering to him because men were lacking? Did not the raven bring him bread in the morning and meat in the evening? Thus, God shows that He can feed His servants from wherever and however He wants. Yet, so that a devout widow could feed him, He made him needful. The need of the holy soul was turned into the abundance of a devout soul. Could Elijah not have provided for himself what he gave to the widow from God's mercy? You clearly see, and it is evident that sometimes God's servants do not have so that those who have may be tested. And yet that widow had nothing. What remained for her was finished, and she was going to die with her children. She then proceeded to make bread for herself, gathering two sticks, and then Elijah saw her. Then the man of God saw her when she was seeking the two sticks. That woman bore the type of the Church. And because two sticks make a cross, she, destined to die, sought from where she would live forever. With the mystery thus foreshadowed, Elijah spoke to her what he had heard. She narrates her situation, saying she was going to die once she finished what remained. Where then is what the Lord had said to Elijah: Go to Zarephath of Sidon; for there I have commanded a widow to feed you? You see how God commands, not by ear but by heart. Do we read that any Prophet was sent to that woman and told her: "Behold," says the Lord, "my servant comes to you hungry, from what you have, minister to him; do not fear poverty; I will supply what you give"? We do not read that this was said to her. Nor do we read that an angel was sent to her in dreams and foretold that Elijah, hungry, would come, and the woman was admonished to feed him. But God commands in wonderful ways, speaking through thought. We say God commanded by speaking in the heart, suggesting what was needed, persuading what was useful for a rational soul, the widow. Thus we also read in the Prophets that the Lord commanded a worm to eat the root of the gourd. What does it mean: "He commanded," if not "He prepared the heart"? By the inspiration of the Lord, that widow had a heart prepared to obey. Such she came, such she spoke with Elijah. He who was in Elijah to command was the same who was in the widow to obey. "Go," he said, "make for me first out of your need, and your wealth will not fail." The patrimony of the widow was a little flour and a little oil. This little did not fail. Who has such a villa? Willingly the widow fed the hungry servant of God, for her patrimony hung on a nail. What is happier than this poverty? If in this way she receives such things, what will she hope for at the end? Our flour will be God, who will not fail forever.

Therefore, I said this so that we do not expect the reward of our sowing in this time when we have sown. Here indeed we sow the harvest of good works with labor, but in the future, we will gather its fruits with joy, according to what is written: "Going, they went and wept, casting their seeds; but coming, they will come with exultation, bearing their sheaves." For that was done as a sign, not as a gift. For that widow who fed the man of God, she received here. It is not great what she sowed, because she did not reap a great harvest. What she received is temporal, not the flour that did not fail nor the oil that did not diminish until God gave rain upon the earth, as if she then began to lack more when God deigned to rain. For then she was to labor, expect the fruits of the field, and collect them. However, when it did not rain, her sustenance came easily. This sign which God granted her for a few days was a sign of future life, where our reward knows no end. Our flour will be God. Just as those provisions did not fail over those days, so He will not fail for eternity. Let us hope for such a reward when we do good, lest any of you be tempted by such a thought and say: "I will feed some hungry servant of God so that my jug may not fail, or I may always find wine in my cup." Do not seek this here. Sow confidently; your harvest will come later, it will come more slowly, but when it comes, it will have no end.

Sermons - Sermon 110

SERMO 110 On the Fig Tree in Which the Lord Found Only Leaves AND ABOUT THE WOMAN WHO HAD BEEN BENT FOR EIGHTEEN YEARS IN INFIRMITY The fig tree signifies the human race.

Hear what the Lord has given concerning the fig tree, which for three years had not borne fruit, and concerning the woman who had been in infirmity for eighteen years. The fig tree is the human race; the three years are three periods: one before the law, another under the law, the third under grace. It is not inappropriate for the fig tree to be understood as the human race. For the first man, when he sinned, covered his shame with fig leaves; he covered where we were born; the members that before sin were to be gloried in, after sin became shameful. Finally: They were naked, and they were not ashamed; there was nothing to shame them, since sin had not preceded; nor could they be ashamed of the works of their Creator, because no evil mixed with the good works of their Creator. Thus, the human race was born from this: man from man, the vulnerable from the debtor, the mortal from the mortal, the sinner from the sinner. Therefore, he calls in this tree those who did not wish to give fruit at any time; and the axe was lying at the root of the fruitless tree. The vinedresser intervenes: the punishment is deferred that assistance may be applied. But what does the vinedresser intervene for? Every saint within the Church prays for those who are outside the Church. And what does he pray for? Lord, forgive him this year also. That is, during this time under grace spare sinners, spare the unfaithful, spare the barren, spare the fruitless. I will dig around it and apply a basket of manure; if it bears fruit, well; if not, you will cut it down when you come. When will he come? At the judgment. When will he come? From there He will come to judge the living and the dead. In the meantime, mercy is granted. But what is it to dig a trench around it, except to teach the humility of repentance? For the trench is humble earth. Understand the basket of manure in a good sense. Dirt it is, but it gives fruit. The dirt of the vinedresser is the sorrow of the sinner; those who act in repentance act in dirt, if they understand truly and act sincerely. Therefore, it is said to this tree: Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.

What about that woman having eighteen years in infirmity.

What about that woman, having eighteen years? Recall. In six days, God completed His works. Three times six, eighteen. Therefore, what the three years on the tree signified, this eighteen years in that woman. She was bent, she could not look upward, because she heard upwards in her heart without reason. But the Lord raised her up. There is hope, but for the children. Until the day of judgment comes, man gives himself much. And what is man? Not even a just man is anything, as far as pertains to the man himself. For a just man is something great, but still a just man is a just man by the grace of God. For: What is man, except that You are mindful of him? Do you want to see what man is? Every man is a liar. We sang: Arise, O Lord, let not man prevail. What does it mean: Let not man prevail? Were the Apostles not men? Were the martyrs not men? Jesus Himself deigned to be man. So what does it mean: Arise, O Lord, let not man prevail, if every man is a liar? Arise, truth, let not falsehood prevail. Therefore, if man wishes to be something, he should not be of his own; if he wishes to be of his own, he will be a liar; if he wishes to be truthful, he will be of God, not of his own.

What it means: Arise, Lord; let not man prevail.

Therefore: Arise, O Lord, let not man prevail. So powerful was the lie before the flood; after the flood, eight men remained; through them, the earth was filled with deceitful men. The people of God were chosen; so many miracles were done, divine benefits bestowed. They were led to the promised land, delivered from the servitude of the Egyptians; prophets were sent to them, they received the temple, they received the priesthood, they received the anointing, they received the law; but: "Strangers have lied to me." At the last, he who was promised was sent. Let not man prevail, either because God was already made man. But even he, performing divine acts, was despised, providing so many benefits he was seized, scourged, and hanged. Until this point, man prevailed, seizing the Son of God, scourging the Son of God, crowning the Son of God with thorns, and hanging the Son of God on a tree. Man prevailed only so far: but as long as he was taken down from the cross, placed in the tomb. If he had remained there, man would have prevailed. But this prophecy even addresses him: "Lord, you deigned to come in the flesh, the Word made flesh, the Word above us, the flesh before us, the Word made flesh between God and man; you chose the Virgin through whom you would be born according to the flesh, you were found conceived by the Virgin, born you left the Virgin." But you were not recognized: you appeared, and you were hidden; weakness appeared, power was hidden. All this, so that you would shed your blood as our price. You performed so many wonders, bestowed benefits on the illnesses of the sick; you received evil for good, you were insulted; you hung on the wood, your head was shaken by the wicked before you, and it was said: "If you are the Son of God, come down from the cross." Did you then lose power, or rather show patience? And yet they insulted, they mocked, they left as victors as if you had been killed. And behold, you lie in the tomb. Arise, O Lord, let not man prevail; let not the wicked enemy prevail, let not the blind Jews prevail. For when you are crucified, the blind Jew seems to have prevailed over you: but you rose again and made him guilty. Arise, O Lord, let not man prevail. And it has been done. And what remains, but: "Let the nations be judged in your sight"? For he rose again, as you know, he ascended into heaven, from there he will come to judge the living and the dead. The certainty of the coming judgment is proven by the fulfillment of so many other predictions.

Behold, barren tree, do not mock because you are spared; the axe is delayed, do not be secure: it will come, you will be cut down. Believe, it will come. All these things that you see did not exist. The Christian people once did not exist throughout the world; it was read in prophecy, it was not seen on earth; but now it is both read and seen. Thus the Church itself is addressed; it was not said to it: See, daughter, and hear, but: Hear, and see; hear the prophecies, see the fulfillments. Therefore, beloved, was not Christ born from the Virgin: he was promised and born; he had not worked miracles: they were promised, and he did; he had not yet suffered: it was promised, and it was done; he had not risen: it was foretold, and it was fulfilled; he had not ascended into heaven: it was said beforehand, and it was fulfilled; his name was not throughout the whole world: it was foretold, and it was fulfilled; idols were not destroyed and broken: and it was done; heretics attacking the Church did not exist: it was predicted, and it was fulfilled; thus the day of judgment is not yet, but because it was predicted, it will be fulfilled. He who appeared so truthful in so many matters, will he be a liar on the day of judgment? He made the document of his promises for us; for by promising himself God made himself a debtor, not by receiving a loan. Can we say to him: Return what you received? Who gave to him first, and it will be repaid to him? We cannot say: Return what you received; but we plainly say: Return what you promised.

Let the one who is barren do penance.

He promised our fathers: but he made a caution, which we also might read. If he should make an account with us, who deigned to make a caution, and say: Read my debts, that is, of my promises, and compute what I have rendered; compute, see what I owe: how much I have rendered! It is a little that I owe: of the little, which remains, do you think me an unfaithful promiser? Therefore, let whoever is barren do penance, and make the fruit worthy of penance. Whoever is bent and looks at the earth, rejoices in earthly happiness, thinks this alone is life, where he can be blessed, does not believe in another; whoever is thus bent, let him be raised; if he cannot by himself, let him call upon God. For was that woman raised by herself? Woe to her if He had not extended His hand.

Sermons - Sermon 110A

SERMON 110/A Sermon from the Gospel about the woman who had been bent for eighteen years and about those upon whom the tower fell > Let us understand what the miracles of Christ signify.

We have often admonished your charity and, according to the measure of our abilities, with the Lord bestowing, have taught that the marvelous deeds of our Lord Jesus Christ in the holy gospel are not only great works and deeds - for what else can they be but all the more marvelous the more divine they are? - but also as though they are visible words, admonishing us to also understand what they signify. If we do not understand these, they delight us only by the miracle itself and elevate the heart in God's praise. Hence, just as someone admires and praises a writer beautifully writing by merely looking at what he writes, even if he does not know letters and is ignorant of the meaning, delights in the beauty of the strokes—unaware of the sense, praises the craft; but he who also knows how to read, reaps abundant fruit—so when we hear of the marvelous things the Lord did, even if we do not understand what they signify, we, as those who cannot read and only gaze at those letters, admire the work of the Maker, even if we do not know the purpose of the Signifier. What is more marvelous than this? A woman bent over for eighteen years by infirmity: in one moment by the word of the Lord, she stood erect, and the long-standing condition yielded to the command, because it obeyed the Sovereign. He loosened the bond of the entangler, accomplished the work of the Creator. She who was bent was straightened, she who was bound was freed, and this by one word, for He who made the word—and all things were made through Him—came to seek what was lost. Let us marvel, praise, and love. Yet after admiring the beautiful composition, let us seek the meaning of this writing a bit more attentively. The composition of the evangelical narrative. In that very same Gospel passage, in the same context where it is mentioned about the eighteen people upon whom the Tower of Siloam fell and they died, and the woman infirm for eighteen years was healed and raised up. Both are there: they are narrated consecutively. In that same context, the Lord also speaks about that tree to which He came and found unfruitful for three years already. When He ordered it to be cut down, the vine-dresser interceded: let him put some manure around it and, if it bore fruit, well and good; but if not, it would be cut down. This was said about the tree in a figure, not done as a miracle. However, what was noted about the people upon whom the tower fell was neither said by the Lord in a figure, nor was it an event endorsed by any miracle: the people were crushed by the collapse. It may almost be ascribed to chance, except that the impious do not understand that not even a sparrow falls without the will of the Creator. Now, the Lord voluntarily recalled those eighteen individuals whom the tower’s collapse crushed, it had been reported to Him that some had been killed by King Herod in a shocking incident, such that their blood was mixed with their sacrifices. When people horrified by this reported it, the Lord said: Do you think they were sinners above all other men because this happened to them? Truly, I tell you: unless you repent, you will all likewise perish. Then He added on His own accord, recalling and saying: Or those eighteen people upon whom the tower in Siloam fell and they died, do you think they were debtors above all other men—that is, sinners? Truly, I tell you, unless you repent, you will all likewise perish. Then He speaks about that fig tree, and raises up the woman. I beseech you, help our weakness with your attention; first, I think we must inquire with no negligence what this means.

"All the evil... likewise die."

Amen, I say to you: unless you repent, you will all perish similarly. Similarly how? Like those whose blood Herod mingled with their sacrifices. Again, unless you repent, you will all perish similarly. Similarly how? Like those upon whom the tower fell. Since they died dissimilarly – in one way, those whose blood was mingled with their sacrifices, in another, those who were crushed by the collapse – how will all perish similarly unless they repent? Those who are to die in that manner will not die in this manner, and those in this manner, not in that; and yet, by merits, they die similarly. Divine Scripture cannot lie, the mouth of truth cannot lie. Indeed, if we understand, it is true. All the wicked, unjust, all the lost, criminals, flagitious, lovers of the world, lascivious and abject, unless they repent, perish similarly. How similarly? And in what manner are they, and in what manner are those? Not bodily and visibly, therefore similarly. For if bodily, they cannot die in both ways. But if we understand and compare spiritual things with spiritual, and take certain signs from bodily similarities for intelligible matters, all perish similarly. For all the wicked seek evil from God, and what they think good for themselves is evil, because they think wrongly. Why? Because of evil lust, from the work of flesh and blood, from the work of corruption, which certainly will not possess the kingdom of God. Therefore, their sacrifices, that is, prayers, mix with their blood, because they seek according to the flesh and blood. This is indicated and rebuked by a certain Scripture, saying: You ask and do not receive, because you ask amiss, that you may consume it upon your lusts. You, therefore, offer your sacrifice: let it not be mixed with your blood; for you think carnally and, according to your carnal mind, ask God. For you are of flesh and blood; you want to incline God to your fleshly desires, while you ought to lift your heart to God, nor consider what the Apostle tells you: If you have risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sits on the right hand of God; set your affection on things above, not on things on the earth, lest your prayers, coming from flesh and blood, penalize you with such punishment as those whose blood the angry king mingled with their sacrifices. Separate your sacrifice from your blood, say to your God: I will pay my vows which my lips have uttered. For the spiritual man judges all things. Yet he himself is judged by no one. Judging all things, he does not mix the sacrifice with blood.

"Recognize the crucified one... do penance."

How then do those who do not repent die similarly as those upon whom the tower of Siloam fell? Siloam is interpreted as "Sent." Who is sent, if not our Lord? The tower in Siloam, the cross of Christ. Therefore, if you have not been put to death, with evil desires of the flesh and blood nailed to His cross, the crucified one falls upon you. What is your sign? If you do not act, you do not sign. This is ruin, not grace. Recognize the crucified one, recognize the sufferer, recognize the one praying for his enemies, recognize the one loving and wishing to heal those from whom he suffered such things. If you recognize, repent and, if you ever desired evil, make sure you will good. Wipe away the guilt, that you may not fear the punishment. But if you do not do this, will Christ benefit you at all? He who eats unworthily, eats and drinks judgment to himself. If by eating unworthily he eats and drinks judgment to himself, what else but the tower falls upon him? For you will all likewise perish, he says – and he speaks the truth – unless you repent of your evil deeds.

Moreover, if you act, you will be lifted up and be like that woman. Moreover, if you act, the filth of repentance, like a heap of dung, you will receive not fruitlessly, lest you be cut off.

"The number six signifies time."

It remains to inquire about the number why there are eighteen people and eighteen years, and how they correspond to the three years of that tree. The angry leader of the synagogue prompted us to solve such a question, because the Lord Jesus healed that bent woman on the Sabbath. He said to the crowds: There are six days on which one ought to work; come then and be healed, not on the Sabbath day. He is indeed convicted by the accusation regarding livestock. Hypocrites, he said, does not each one of you untie his ox or donkey on the Sabbath and lead it to water? He must indeed be convicted of something else since he is like a horse and mule without understanding. And he seemed to speak from Scripture, saying: There are six days on which one ought to work. From Scripture indeed, but he mingled sacrifice with blood, since what is said spiritually, he understood carnally. We, however, take occasion from this to understand and remember that for six days God worked on all things we see, the sky and the earth and all that is in them; but on the seventh day, God rested. And all those six days have an evening, because heaven and earth shall pass away; but that seventh day of rest does not have an evening, for when we too have rested after good works, we shall have no end in that rest. Therefore we find that all things were made in six days: by the number six time is signified. Moreover, if time is signified for you by the number six, look to the three years of the tree, because there a threefold time is signified: one before the law, another under the law, the third which we now have, indeed under grace. Whoever is not corrected even in this time, let him expect the axe, not safety. Because therefore that tree, at least in the third time, should be corrected and changed from sterility to fruitfulness, that it might heed him baptizing unto repentance: Bring forth fruits worthy of repentance, and the six-number signifies time, undoubtedly those eighteen whom the tower oppressed were not corrected in that entire three-part time. For if six signifies time, three times six is eighteen.

"If you have your heart above, you are not bent." But that woman in the time of grace is raised up in eighteen years, as she who had said: "They have bowed down my soul." For the soul is bowed down which is oppressed by earthly things, the soul is bowed down which is weighed down by the desires for things [it lies], the soul is bowed down which lies in having its heart lifted up to the Lord. For if you have a "heart lifted up," you are not curved. If you always seek earthly things, if you desire to be happy about earthly things, if you think you do not worship God fruitfully unless earthly happiness abounds for you, you are curved: your heart is not with the Lord. But this punishment comes from the dominion of the devil. The whole human race was held curved under the devil, the whole human race was weighed down by desires for earthly things; one came who would promise the kingdom of heaven. There is another life, there is the fellowship of angels; there is a homeland where no violent one, no enemy is feared; there is a homeland walled by the will of God, surrounded by the shield of God's good will, where the enemy is not allowed, where no friend perishes; there is a homeland where no one departs, no one succeeds. That homeland is called Jerusalem, Jerusalem is interpreted as "vision of peace." Straighten up from your curve, do not taste of the earth. You have risen with Christ, he is in heaven: stretch towards him and you will not be curved.

Christ accepted death for us. But this you have not done, o malevolent human race, you did not do this before the law, you did not do this under the law: act under grace. In eighteen years He found you bent over who came upright, who came to be crucified for you, to free you from the bond of the devil. Bent over, the caution of the creditor kept you. For the devil had bound his debtors and had, in a way, placed them in shackles. He came, not a debtor, paid what he did not owe, and erased our handwritten bond. Where was the handwritten bond of our debt erased? By the blood of the just one. Why would he hold men in death, one appointed over death? He had them clearly by the condition of sin as his own tree: he conquered and held, he conquered and possessed. He rightfully held those he had deceived with evil persuasion. He came persuading good, having nothing evil, born of a virgin, not bearing the lineage of sin, but clothed in the penalty of death, having the likeness of sinful flesh, to free from the flesh of sin. Hear him going to his passion and saying: Behold, the ruler of the world is coming, and in me he will find nothing. Not as the world finds in you, not as in all mankind, in me he will find nothing. Therefore, if he finds nothing in you, why will you die? What follows? After he said: He will find nothing in me, as if it were said to him: "Why then will you die?" But that all may know, he says, that I do the will of my Father: arise, let us go from here. He rises and goes to his passion, to fulfill the will of the Father, as if sent by Siloam, not because he owed, but to repay for debtors, as it is said of him in prophecy: What I did not steal, then I restored. He alone therefore was undeserving of death. We all, however, are deserving, because we have equally drawn the merit of death. He did not draw any merit of death, and yet he underwent death for us. Therefore, he paid what he did not owe, freed the debtors, erased the old handwritten bonds, instituted new documents. What need do we now have to account for the old documents? He burned them in the fire of the Holy Spirit.

Forgive your debtor, so that your debts may be forgiven by God.

Recognize the redeemer, do not further make yourself a debtor. But for certain daily sins, even if minor, he has given a daily remedy. Say from faith, say from the heart, say from goodwill: Forgive us our sins. For, add not only by saying it but also by doing what follows: As we also forgive our debtors. Therefore God, to whom you are a debtor, willed to have you as a debtor. Your debtor is the one who commits injustice against you, who unjustly oppresses you, who wrongfully takes something from you. Your debtor owes you a penalty. Do you want to know who your debtor is? Consider, read. An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, etc. The law has decreed that each one should suffer what he has done. On the contrary, the Gospel says: I say to you: love your enemies, not contrary to the law, as some wrongly understand, thinking that the gentleness of the Gospel is opposed to the harshness of the law. It is not so. The law shows you what is owed to you. The Gospel would not have made you a forgiver, except that the law showed you the debtor.

Sermons - Sermon 111

SERMO 111 ABOUT THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL LUKE 13:21-23 Where the Kingdom of God is said "like leaven," Which a woman took and hid in three measures of flour, etc.

...whom pride had taken hold of there. But now, he says, knowing God, rather being known by God. Therefore knowing because being known. For how does God now know? He predestined before the foundation of the world. But what does it mean: Now he has known? Now he has made you know. The crop of the Church was born from Christ, as from a grain of wheat.

Let the Church of Christ say, let the mother Catholic Church say, let the body of that head which ascended into heaven, the holy body, the great body, the body spread throughout the whole world, say, let that crop which the grain that fell to the ground made— for as you know, that grain approaching its passion said: Unless a grain falls to the earth, it remains alone; but when it falls to the earth, it brings forth much fruit; one grain fell to the earth, and it produced a most abundant fruit; this crop is the whole world— say, and not arrogantly say, recognize from whom it receives what it says, what it says. What then does it say? I have known that the Lord is great. I have known. I was a little flock when my head was crucified. In a few, I was scared. When Christ was speaking, Peter presumed; when Christ was captured, Peter denied. Because the rock was seized, the feet wavered, and in Peter the others fled. He alone denied because he alone remained with the one he denied. How much easier it was for those to deny who fled before being asked, nor were they held. The crop did not yet boast, because the grain was being sown. He is held, afflicted with insults, suspended on wood, jeered at by those around him as if by victors. Where are the strengths of the Apostles? Where are the rams, future leaders of the flock? Where is finally that great multitude, preceding and following the beast of the Lord with branches of trees, and saying: Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord? Then all many in love tepid, compressed by fear. The Church does not yet say, with Christ hanging: I have known that the Lord is great. Where do we find this? There in those two to whom he joined himself traveling after the resurrection, and as a third wayfarer began to speak with them. They were going along the way, and the way was going with them, yet they did not recognize the way. The way was questioning them in the way: What is it that you are speaking among yourselves? And they: Are you alone a stranger in Jerusalem? Do you not know what things have taken place concerning Jesus the Nazarene, who was a great prophet in words and deeds, and our leaders captured and crucified him? But we had hoped that he was the one to redeem Israel. You hoped, but now you do not hope. Where is what you were? But behold, among the crowd of those contradicting, raging, and muting the flock of Christ and waiting to see what would happen, behold, from across someone hangs with Christ and believes in Christ. I say that thief, brothers, the one who recognized the giver of grace and did not scorn a partaker in punishment. He denies who followed, he recognizes who is fixed. The others are silent, all despair, and that one says: Lord, remember me when you come into your kingdom. He who sees him fixed assumed he would be reigning. Behold there was at least one who would say: I have known that the Lord is great. Great grace. Then he recognized greatness when the Jews thought he was defeated. What greatness, my brothers, what greatness in the hanging, in the crucified? Hanging with the hanging, fixed in the remaining he recognized because it was a mustard grain. The tree itself he did not yet see, but the seed itself he already recognized. But behold, let what follows happen. Let him lay down his life because he has the power to take it again. Let him be taken down from the wood, placed in the sepulcher. Let him sit in heaven, send the Holy Spirit. Let the few gathered be filled, speak in every tongue, signify nations everywhere to believe. Let this be done. Let this be fulfilled. Let it be preached in Jerusalem. Let Stephen be kindled with the fire of charity and the crowds of Jews... Rage, foolish ones, kill the doctor madly because they have already killed his master. Let him forgive the raging, pray for those stoning him, sleep. Let the others come and confess Christ, be killed for Christ. Even Peter, just recently a great denier, become a confessor by love. Let so many thousands of people of Jews believe, place all the prices of their goods at the apostles' feet. Let the Church grow from Jerusalem into all Judea and Samaria, by growing come to us, to briefly summarize. Let martyrs be killed everywhere, sown with the grain from which the fertility of the crop springs forth. Let the nations be converted, the temples of demons be overthrown, idols be broken, the worshippers of idols believe. Let the three measures of leavened flour shout: I have known that the Lord is great. He recognized through leaven. - The three measures are the whole human race; recall the flood from where the rest would be restored; three remained; Noah had three sons, from them the human race was restored; that woman who hid the leaven is wisdom -. Behold the whole world shouts in the Church of God: I have known that the Lord is great.

Many are to be saved among themselves, but few in comparison with others.

Surely few are saved. You recall the question from the Gospel just read to us. The Lord was asked: Are there few who are saved? What did the Lord respond to this? He did not say: Not few, but many are saved. He did not say this. But what did He say when He heard: Are there few who are saved? Strive to enter through the narrow gate. Therefore, when He heard: Are there few who are saved? The Lord confirmed what He heard. Few enter through the narrow gate. In another place, He Himself said: Narrow is the way and constricted that leads to life, and few are those who find it. But wide and broad is the way that leads to destruction, and many are those who walk through it. Why do we rejoice in crowds? Listen to me, few. I know that many hear, and few obey. I see the threshing floor, I seek the grains. And grains are scarcely visible when the threshing floor is being threshed, but it will be winnowed. Therefore, few are saved in comparison to the many lost. For indeed, these few will form a great mass. When the winnower comes, carrying his winnowing fork in his hand, he will cleanse his threshing floor; he will gather the wheat into his barn, but the chaff he will burn with unquenchable fire. Let not the chaff mock the grain. This speaks truth, it deceives no one. Therefore be among many, many, but in comparison to certain many, few. Such a mass will come forth from this threshing floor to fill the barn of heaven. For it is not contradictory to say: Few enter through the narrow gate, many perish through the wide way. It would be contradictory if it had once been said: Many will come from the East and the West? Many will come, certainly few. Both few and many. Therefore, some are few, others many? No, but these few who are many: few in comparison to the lost, many in the company of angels. Listen, beloved, listen to what is written: After this I saw a multitude coming from every language, people, and tribe, clothed in white robes and holding palm branches, a multitude that no one could count. This is the mass of the saints. How loudly the winnowed threshing floor will speak, from the crowd of false Christians who are like shipwrecked people, separated from the chaff destined for eternal fire—those who press but do not touch— for a woman touched the hem of his garment, but the crowd pressed upon Christ. Therefore, with all the damned separated, the purified mass standing on the right, fearing no mixture with the evil ones, fearing no loss among the good, reigning with Christ, with what confidence will it say: I know that the Lord is great.

Here we are all guests; therefore let us extend care to the guests. So then, my brothers, if I speak with grains, if those predestined to eternal life recognize what I say, let them speak by works, not voices. We are compelled to speak to you what we ought not to have. For we ought to have found in you what we would praise, not to seek what we would admonish. Behold, however, I speak briefly, I do not linger. Recognize hospitality; through this, one has come to God. You receive a guest, whose companion you also are on the way, because we are all strangers. He is a Christian who recognizes that he is a stranger both in his own house and in his own homeland. Our homeland is above, there we will not be guests. For each one of us here and in his own house is a guest. If he is not a guest, he will not pass away from there; if he is going to pass away, he is a guest. Do not deceive yourself, you are a guest. Whether you will or not, you are a guest. But you leave that house to your children, a guest to guests. Wouldn't you, even if you were in a stable, leave when another comes? This you do in your own house. Your father gave up space for you, so you will give up space for your children. You do not remain staying, nor will you leave it to those who will remain. If we all pass, let us do something that cannot pass so that when we have passed and have come to that place from where we do not pass, we may find our good works there. Christ the Lord is the keeper. Why do you fear to lose what you spend? Turned to the Lord, etc.

[And after the sermon]

What your Charity knows, we suggest. The anniversary day of the ordination of the lord senior Aurelius dawns tomorrow. Through my humility, he asks and admonishes your Charity to deign most devoutly to gather at the basilica of Faustus. Thanks be to God.

Sermons - Sermon 112

SERMO 112 Dressed in a Restored Basilica On Those Invited to the Dinner The Jews were invited to the supper, not led and compelled.

Holy readings were proposed, both those which we hear and about which we may speak something, with the Lord’s help. In the apostolic reading, thanks are given to God for the faith of the nations, surely because He Himself made it happen. In the psalm, we said: God of hosts, convert us, and show Your face, and we shall be saved. In the Gospel, we are called to the banquet. Indeed, others were called, we were not called but led; not only led but also compelled. For thus we have heard, because a certain Man made a great banquet. Who is this man, if not the Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus? He sent that the invited might come; for now the hour had come that they might come. Who are the invited, if not those called by the preceding Prophets? How long it has been that the Prophets were sent and invited to the banquet of Christ! But they were sent to the people of Israel. Often they were sent, often they called that the hour of the banquet might come. But those invited received the invitation and rejected the banquet. What does it mean: They received the invitation and rejected the banquet? They read the Prophets, and killed Christ. But when they killed Christ, then unaware they prepared the banquet for us. The banquet being now prepared, Christ having been sacrificed, after the resurrection of Christ, as it is known to the faithful, the banquet of the Lord was confirmed by His hands and mouth, the Apostles were sent, to whom the Prophets had been sent before. Come to the banquet - for thus it had been ordained that Christ would be sacrificed - the Apostles said: Come to the banquet.

Three excuses for not wanting to come to the dinner.

They excused themselves, those who did not want to come. How did they excuse themselves, brothers? There were three excuses. One said: I have bought a farm, I am going to see it: consider me excused. Another said: I have bought five yoke of oxen, I want to try them: consider me excused. A third said: I have married a wife: consider me excused, I cannot come. Do we think these are not the excuses that hinder all people who refuse to come to that dinner? Let us seek them out, examine them, find them: but so that we may beware of them. In the purchased farm, dominion is noted. Therefore pride is reprimanded. For to have a farm, to hold, to possess it, to have men under oneself in it, to dominate, is delightful. A bad vice, the first vice; for the first man wanted to dominate, who did not want to have the Lord. What does "to dominate" mean, if not to rejoice in one's own power? There is a greater power: let us submit to it, so that we may be able to be safe. I have bought a farm: consider me excused. Invited pride did not want to come.

Five yokes of oxen: the curiosity of the five senses.

Another said: I have bought five yoke of oxen. Would it not suffice to say, "I have bought oxen"? There is something, without doubt, that beckons us to inquire and understand due to its obscurity and, since it is closed, encourages us to knock. "Five yoke of oxen"; the senses of this flesh. The five senses of this flesh are numbered, as is known to all; and those who perhaps have not noticed will undoubtedly recognize when informed. Truly, the five senses of this flesh are found; vision in the eyes, hearing in the ears, smell in the nostrils, taste in the mouth, touch in all the limbs. White and black and colored in any way, bright and dark, we perceive by seeing; hoarse and melodious, we perceive by hearing; sweet-smelling and foul-smelling, we perceive by smelling; sweet and bitter, we perceive by tasting; hard and soft, smooth and rough, hot and cold, heavy and light, we perceive by touching. There are five of them, and they are yokes. But because they are yokes, it is easily apparent in the first three senses; there are two eyes, two ears, twin nostrils: behold the three yokes. In the mouth, that is, the sense of taste, a certain duplicity is found; because nothing tastes by eating unless it is touched by the tongue and palate. The pleasure of the flesh, which pertains to touch, is more secretly doubled; it is external and internal: therefore, it too is twin. Why are yokes of oxen said? Because through these senses of the flesh, earthly things are sought; oxen turn the earth. But there are men distant from faith, devoted to earthly things, occupied with carnal matters; they do not wish to believe anything, except what they perceive with these fivefold senses of the body. In their senses, they set the rules of all truth for themselves. He says, I do not believe unless I see; behold what I know, behold what I understand. It is white, it is black, it is round, it is square, it is colored thus or so; I know, I understand, I hold; nature itself teaches me. I am not compelled to believe what cannot be shown to me. It is a sound: I feel it is a sound; it sings well, sings poorly, is pleasant, is hoarse; I know, I understand, it reaches me. It smells good, it smells bad: I feel it, I know it. This is sweet, this is bitter; this is salty, this is tasteless; what more are you to tell me, I do not know. By touching, I know what is hard, what is soft, what is smooth, what is rough, what is hot, what is cold; what more are you to show me?

Obstacle of faith.

Such an impediment held our apostle Thomas, who did not wish to believe in the Lord Christ, that is, in the resurrection of Christ, with only his eyes. Unless, he said, I place my fingers in the marks of the nails and the places of the wounds, in his side, I will not believe. And the Lord, who could rise again without any trace of a wound, preserved the scars, which could be touched by the doubter, and the wounds of the heart could be healed. Nevertheless, when calling to the supper, against the excuses of the five yoke of oxen: Blessed, he said, are those who do not see and believe. We, my brothers, called to the supper, are not impeded by these five yokes. For we have not longed to see the face of the Lord's flesh at this time, nor have we desired to admit into our ears the voice proceeding from the mouth of his flesh; we have sought no temporal fragrance in him; some woman poured over him very costly ointment, the house was filled with the fragrance; but we were not there; behold, we did not smell it, and we believed. He gave the supper consecrated by his hands to the disciples; but we did not recline at that meal, and yet we daily eat that same supper in faith. Nor should you think it a great thing to have been present at that supper, which he gave with his own hands, without faith. Faith after was better than at that time unfaithfulness. Paul, who believed, was not there; Judas, who betrayed, was there. How many even now at the very supper, though they have not seen that table then, nor have they seen with their eyes or tasted with their throats what the Lord carried in his hands, yet because it is the same that is now prepared, how many even now eat and drink judgment upon themselves at the very supper!

How one must approach the table of the Eucharist. Where then did the occasion arise for the Lord to speak about this supper? One of those reclining at the table said—for He was at a banquet to which He had been invited: "Blessed is he who eats bread in the kingdom of God." As if yearning for something far away, and the bread itself was reclining before him. For who is the bread from the kingdom of God, except He who says: "I am the living bread which came down from heaven"? Prepare not your throats but your heart. Hence this supper is commended: behold we have believed in Christ, with faith we receive. In receiving, we know what to think. We take a little and are satiated in the heart. Therefore, it is not what is seen but what is believed that nourishes. Hence also not that utmost sense—we searched, we did not say: If those who saw the Lord Himself risen—if what is said is true—saw with their eyes, touched with their hands; we did not touch: why do we believe? If we thought such things, we would be hindered from the supper by those five yoke of oxen. And to let you know, brethren, it was not the delight of those five senses that charms and brings pleasure, but a certain curiosity that had to be noted. He did not say: "I have bought five yoke of oxen, I am going to feed them," but: "I am going to test them." He who wants to test them does not want to doubt through the yoke of oxen, just as Saint Thomas did not want to doubt through those very yokes. Let me see, let me touch, let me put my fingers in. Behold, He says, put your fingers into my side, and be not faithless. I was slain for you: through the place you wish to touch, I shed my blood to redeem you; and do you still doubt me, unless you touch me? Behold, I offer even this, behold, I exhibit this: touch and believe. Find the place of the wound: heal the wound of doubt.

Wife, pleasure of the flesh. The third said: I have taken a wife. That is the pleasure of the flesh; how many it hinders! If only it were outside and not inside. There are people who say: It is not well for a man unless he has carnal delights. They are the ones whom the Apostle notes, saying: Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die. Such things the arrogant rich man said at his feast: Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die. Who rose from here and there? Who told us what happens there? We take with us what is good for us in this time. He who says this has taken a wife: he embraces the flesh, rejoices in the pleasures of the flesh, excuses himself from the supper; let him beware, lest he die of inner hunger. Consider John, the holy apostle, the evangelist: Do not love the world, nor the things that are in the world. O you who come to the Lord’s supper: do not love the world, nor the things that are in the world. He did not say: Do not have them, but: Do not love them. You have had, possessed, loved: you have clung. The love of earthly things is birdlime to spiritual wings. Behold you have desired: you have clung. Who will give you wings like a dove? When will you fly to where you may truly rest, when here, where you have clung badly, you want to rest perversely? Do not love the world; it is a divine trumpet. The exhortation of this trumpet is to the whole world. It is said to the entire world: Do not love the world, nor the things that are in the world. Whoever loves the world, the love of the Father is not in him: because all that is in the world is the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life. He began from the bottom: where the Gospel ended, from there he began; and from where the Gospel began, there he placed his end. Lust of the flesh: I have taken a wife. Lust of the eyes: I have bought five yoke of oxen. Pride of life: I have bought a field. The preeminence of the eyes among the five senses.

Therefore, those senses are particularly commended to us through the eyes because the eyes hold the primacy among the five senses. Consequently, although sight is specifically related to the eyes, we often use the term "to see" for all five senses. How? Firstly, concerning the eyes themselves, you say: See how white it is, pay attention and see how white it is; this pertains to the eyes. Hear and see how melodious it is; but can you say in reverse: Hear and see how white it is? The term "see" extends to the functions of all senses, while the specific properties of the other senses do not extend to themselves. Pay attention and see how white it is; hear and see how melodious it is; smell and see how pleasant it is; taste and see how sweet it is; touch and see how soft it is. Undoubtedly, considering there are five senses, it would be more proper to say: Hear and sense how melodious it is, or: Smell and sense how pleasant it is; taste and sense how sweet it is; touch and sense how warm it is; feel and sense how smooth it is; feel and sense how soft it is. None of these expressions are commonly used. Even the Lord Himself, when He appeared to His disciples after the resurrection, and they, seeing Him, were still uncertain in faith, thinking they saw a spirit, said: Why do doubts arise in your hearts? See My hands and My feet. And it was not enough to just "see": He said, Touch and handle and see. Pay attention and see: handle and see. With the eyes alone, see; with all the senses, see. Because He was seeking the inner sense of faith, He also made use of the external senses. We perceived nothing from these external senses from the Lord; we heard through hearing, and we believed with the heart; and this hearing did not come from His mouth, but from the mouths of His preachers, those who were already dining and invited us through their proclamation.

Let no one hesitate to come to the dinner.

Let us therefore remove vain and evil excuses from our midst: let us come to the supper, where we may be inwardly filled. Let not the exaltation of pride hinder us, nor let illicit curiosity raise us up or distract us from God; let not the pleasure of the flesh impede us from the will of the heart. Let us come, and be filled. And who came, if not the beggars, the lame, the blind? But the rich, the healthy, who seemingly walk well and see keenly, that is, those who presume much of themselves, did not come and are therefore more desperate the more they are proud. Let the beggars come: because He who invites became poor for our sake, though He was rich, so that by His poverty we might be enriched. Let the weak come: because the physician is not needed by the healthy, but by the sick. Let the lame come, who say to Him: Direct my steps according to Your word. Let the blind come, who say to Him: Illuminate my eyes, lest I sleep unto death. Such came at the hour, as those previously invited were rejected by their own excuse. They came at the hour, they entered from the streets and lanes of the city. And the servant who was sent replied: Lord, what you commanded has been done, and yet there is room. Go out, He said, into the highways and hedges; and compel those you find to come in. Those you find, do not wait for them to deem themselves worthy: compel them to come in. I have prepared a great supper, a great house; I will not allow any place to be vacant. They came from the streets and lanes, let the gentiles come from the highways and the hedges - the heretics and schismatics. Compel them to come in. Here they find peace, for those who build hedges seek divisions. Draw them from the hedges, detach them from the thorns. They are caught in hedges, and do not want to be compelled: Let us enter by our own will, they say. The Lord did not command this: Compel them, He said, to come in. Necessity is found outside, inwardly will is born.

Sermons - Sermon 112A

SERMON 112/A The Lord has risen and has appeared to Simon. Alleluia. On the Two Sons from the Gospel A sermon about this same Gospel was begun on the previous Lord's day.

It is not fitting for us to dwell on matters already discussed, but just as it is not fitting to dwell on them, so it is fitting to remember them. Your prudence remembers that on the previous Lord's Day we undertook to speak about the two sons, who were also mentioned in today's Gospel reading, a discussion which could not be brought to completion. But the Lord our God wished us to speak with you again today after that tribulation. The debt of the sermon must be repaid, the debt of love must always be maintained; the Lord will be present so that our humility may suffice for your expectation.

What the two sons and the prostitutes mean. A man having two sons, God is having two peoples; the older son is the people of the Jews; the younger is the people of the Gentiles. The substance received from the Father, the mind, intellect, memory, ingenuity, and whatever else God has given us to understand and worship Him. Having received this inheritance, the younger son went off into a distant country; distant, that is, even to the forgetfulness of his Creator. He squandered his substance by living prodigally; spending, and not acquiring; expending what he had, and not receiving what he did not have; that is, consuming all his ingenuity in luxuries, in idols, in all depraved desires, which Truth called harlots.

Illicit curiosity is a lack of truth. Nor is it surprising that famine followed that excess. There was, however, a famine in that region; not a famine of visible bread, but a famine of invisible Truth. From the famine, he fell into the possession of a certain ruler of that region. It is understood that this ruler of demons is the devil, into whom all the curious fall; for all illicit curiosity is a pernicious lack of truth. Indeed, he, driven by hunger of intellect away from God, was reduced to servitude, and was assigned the task of feeding swine; that is, in whose servitude the extreme and impure demons are accustomed to rejoice; for not without reason did the Lord allow the demons to enter into a herd of swine. This man, however, fed on husks, from which he himself was not satisfied; we understand secular teachings as husks, sounding, but not nourishing, fit for the food of swine, not for men; that is, from which the demons rejoice, not from which the faithful are justified.

What it means to return to oneself and the bread of the hired servants At last he saw where he was, what he had lost, whom he had offended, and whom he had rushed against; and he returned to himself; first to himself, and thus to the father. For he had perhaps said: My heart has abandoned me; whence it was necessary that he first return to himself, and thus recognize that he was far from the father. Scripture rebukes some for this, saying: Return, you transgressors, to the heart. Having returned to himself, he found himself miserable: I found trouble and sorrow, he said, and I called upon the name of the Lord. How many of my father's hired servants have bread in abundance! But here I am perishing with hunger. From where did this thought come to him, unless the name of God had already been proclaimed? There was bread among some, though not held well and seeking other things, about whom it is said: Truly I tell you, they have received their reward. For such hired servants are to be regarded, not as children, as Paul indicates when he says: Whether by pretense or by truth Christ is proclaimed. For some are to be understood as hired servants who seek their own gain, but by proclaiming Christ they have abundance of bread. The prodigal son thinks about returning to the father.

He rises and returns; for by lying down and falling, he had remained. The father sees him from afar and runs to him; for his voice is in the psalm: "You understand my thoughts from afar." What thoughts? Those by which he said to himself: "I will say to my Father: I have sinned against heaven and before you, I am no longer worthy to be called your son; make me like one of your hired servants." For he was not yet saying this, but was thinking of saying it; yet the father already heard it as if he were saying it. Sometimes, when someone is placed in a certain tribulation and temptation, he thinks of praying, and in this very thought, he meditates on what he will say to God in his prayer, as a son justly demanding his father's mercy. And he says to himself: "I will say this and that to my God; for I am not afraid, when I have said this, when I have wept thus, that my God will not hear me." Often He already hears him saying these things; for when he thought of these things, he did not hide his thought from God's eyes. He was there when he planned to pray, who would be there when he began to pray; thus it is said in another psalm: "I said, I will confess my transgression to the Lord." See how he still said to himself what he would plan; and immediately he added: "And you forgave the iniquity of my heart." How close is God's mercy to the one confessing! For God is not far from the broken-hearted; for it is written: "The Lord is near to those who have a broken heart." Therefore, this one had already broken his heart in the region of want; for he had returned to his heart to break it; he had left his heart in pride, he had returned to his heart in wrath. He was angry at himself to punish himself, but his own evil; deserving his father's good, he had returned. He said in his anger, as it is said: "Be angry, and do not sin." For every penitent is angry with himself; because he is angry, he punishes himself. Hence all those moves in the penitent, who truly repents, who truly grieves; hence the tearing of hair, hence the wearing of sackcloth, hence the beating of the breast. Surely all these are signs of a man raging against himself and being angry at himself. What the hand does outwardly, the conscience does inwardly; in thoughts it strikes itself, beats itself, and, to say it more truly, kills itself. For by killing himself, he offers a sacrifice to God, a contrite spirit; "a broken and contrite heart, O God, you will not despise." Therefore, breaking his heart, humbling, striking, killing his heart. The burden of Christ is light.

Although he was still thinking of saying to the father, and said to himself: I will arise, and go, and say, when he knew his thoughts from afar, the father ran to meet him. What does it mean to meet, if not to show mercy in advance? While he was yet a long way off, he says, his father saw him and was moved with compassion. Why was he moved with compassion? Because the son was already weakened by wretchedness. He threw himself upon him as he ran to meet him; that is, he placed his arm over his neck. The arm of the Father is the Son: He gave as Christ to carry; a burden which does not weigh down, but lifts up. My yoke is easy, he says, and my burden is light. He leaned upon the one who stood upright; he did not allow the one he leaned upon to fall again. The burden of Christ is so light that it not only does not weigh down, but also lifts up. For the burden of Christ is not like burdens which, though said to be light, have some weight; it is one thing to carry a heavy burden, another to carry a light burden, another to carry no burden. He who carries a heavy burden seems to be pressed down; he who carries a light burden is less pressed down, but still pressed; clearly, he who carries no burden seems to walk with unencumbered shoulders. The burden of Christ is not like this: for it is expedient to carry it, so that you are lifted up; if you lay it down, you are more pressed down. And do not think this is impossible, brothers. Perhaps some example can be found where you can see bodily what I am saying, and it is indeed a wonder and altogether incredible. Notice this in birds. Every bird carries its own feathers: observe how they fold their wings when they come down to the earth, to rest, and in a way place them on their sides. Do you think they are burdened? If you take away their load, they will fall; the less the bird carried that load, the less it flew. Therefore, you take away that load from them as if you were merciful; if you want to be merciful, spare them; or, if their feathers are already taken away, nurture them, so that the load grows, and they can fly from the ground. For the one who said: Who will give me wings like a dove, and I will fly and rest, desired such a load. Therefore, when the father placed his arm over the son’s neck, he lifted him up, not weighed him down; he honored, not burdened him. For how is man capable of bearing God, unless it is because God is borne by him? The ministers of the Church give sacraments from the treasury of God. The father therefore orders the first robe to be brought to him, which Adam had lost by sinning. Now having received peace, now having been kissed, he orders the robe to be brought forth, the hope of immortality in baptism. He orders a ring to be given, a pledge of the Holy Spirit, and sandals for the feet in preparation for the Gospel of peace, so that the feet of the one announcing good news might be beautiful. Therefore, God does this through His servants, that is, through the ministers of the Church. Do they give the robe from their own? The ring or the sandals from their own? They owe the ministry, they provide the service; He gives, from whose abundance and from whose treasury these things are brought forth. He ordered the fattened calf to be killed, that is, that he may be admitted to the table at which Christ is fed upon, having been killed; for the one coming from afar and rushing to the Church then the calf is killed, when it is preached that He was killed, when he is admitted to His body. The fattened calf is killed because he who was lost is found.

Why Jews, even if rarely, convert. And the older brother, returning from the field, became angry and refused to go in. He represents the people of the Jews, whose attitude was evident even among those who had already believed in Christ. For the Jews were frustrated that the Gentiles were coming with such great speed, without the burdens of the law imposed upon them, without the pain of carnal circumcision, to receive the saving baptism in their sins; they were annoyed by the feast of the fattened calf. Indeed, those Jews had already believed: and an account was given to them, and they were pacified. But even now, perhaps some Jew, who kept God's law in his heart and lived blamelessly with it, as Saul claimed to have done there, who became Paul among us, the greater he was, the lesser he became, the higher he was exalted, the smaller he was made—for Paul is the least; hence we say: I speak to you shortly, a little before. See what it is, a little before: a short time before. What then is Paul? For I am the least of the Apostles, he said himself—therefore any Jew of that kind, who knows and has it in his conscience, having worshipped the one God from early age, the God of Abraham and Isaac and Jacob, the God proclaimed through the Law and Prophets, and observed the proclamations of the Law, begins to think about the Church, seeing the human race rushing in the name of Christ; as he thinks of the Church, he approaches the house from the field. For it is written: When the older brother came in from the field and approached the house. Just as the younger son grows daily among the believing pagans, so the older son, though rarely, nevertheless returns among the Jews. They think of the Church, marvel at what it is; they see the law among themselves, the law among us: the Prophets among themselves, the Prophets among us: among themselves no longer any sacrifice, among us the daily sacrifice; they see themselves in the Father's field, yet do not partake of the calf.

What a symphony is.

There is also heard from the house a symphony sounding, and a chorus. What is a symphony? A harmony of voices; they who are discordant, are dissonant; they who are in accord, consonant. The Apostle was teaching this very symphony, saying: But I beseech you, brethren, that you all speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions among you. Who would not be delighted by this holy symphony, that is, the agreement of voices not differing, not in any way absurd and dissonant, which would offend the hearing of a good listener? And the chorus pertains to this harmony itself; in a chorus, nothing delights but one voice of many tempered together, having unity from all, not dissonant in any discordant variety.

It is not enough for the Jews to be convinced from the Scriptures by the ministers of the Church. When he heard this sound coming from the house, he was angry and did not want to enter. How did it truly happen that the Jew of good merit among his own people would say that Christians could accomplish so much? We hold to the laws of our fathers; God spoke to Abraham, from whom we are born. Moses received the Law, who, delivering us from the land of Egypt, led us through the Red Sea. Behold, those holding our Scriptures sing our psalms throughout the whole world, and they have a daily sacrifice; but we have lost both the sacrifice and the temple. He also asks the servant what is happening here? Let the Jew ask any servant; let him open the Prophets, let him open the Apostle, let him ask anyone; neither the Old Testament nor the New kept silent about the calling of the Gentiles. Let us understand the questioned servant as the examined Book; you will find the Scripture there saying to you: Your brother has returned, and your father has killed the fattened calf for him, because he has received him safe. Let the servant say this: whom did the father receive safely? The one who was dead and has come back to life, he received to be saved. And the killing of the fattened calf was due to him who had gone far away; for by going far away from God, he was impious. The servant, the apostle Paul, answered: For Christ indeed died for the ungodly. Angrily, he did not enter when he was enraged, but when the father spoke to him, he entered; he did not want to enter at the servant's response. And indeed, my brothers, this happens; we often convince the Jews from the Scriptures of God, but the servant still speaks, and the son is angry; thus, although they are conquered, they do not want to enter. What is this? The voices of the symphonies moved you, the chorus moved you, the celebration and festivity of the house, the banquet of the killed fattened calf, these moved you. No one excludes you. To whom do you say this? As long as the servant speaks, he is angry, he does not want to enter. The superior employs greater force in requesting than in commanding.

Return to the Lord saying: No one comes to me, unless the Father draws him. Therefore the Father goes out and asks the son: this is to draw; the superior applies greater force by asking than by commanding. But this is what happens, dearest, when such men occupied with Scriptures and having some conscience in good works hear, so that they can say to their father: Father, I did not neglect your commandment. Then, therefore, when they are conquered by the Scriptures, and they do not find what to answer, they get angry, they resist, as if wanting to overcome. Afterwards, you leave him with his thought, and God begins to speak internally; this is the Father going out and speaking to the son: Enter and feast. The inner thoughts of the Jews, where the Father now speaks in hidden ways. And he answered: Behold, I have served you for so many years, and I have never transgressed your command; and you have never given me a young goat, that I might feast with my friends. Behold, this son of yours has come, who has consumed his inheritance with prostitutes, and you have killed the fattened calf for him. Thoughts are inward, where the Father speaks in hidden ways; for he acts and responds within himself, not with the servant replying, but with the father in some way asking, gently admonishing: What is this? We hold the Scriptures of God, and we have not departed from the one God; we have not extended our hands to a foreign god: we know that one God, always worshipping him, who made heaven and earth; and we have not received a young goat. Where do we find the young goat? Among sinners. Why does this elder son complain that a young goat was not given to him? He was seeking to sin, from which he would feast; clearly, he was vexed about this. This is what the Jews now grieve over, this is what they realize and understand—that Christ was not given to them because they considered him a young goat. For they recognize their voice in the Gospel, in those former Jews saying: We know that this man is a sinner. He was the calf, but since you considered him a young goat, you remained without this feast. You never gave me a young goat; because the Father did not have a young goat whom he knew as the calf. You are outside: because you did not receive the young goat, now come in to the calf.

Jews who are serious and observe the law must be distinguished from Jews who are corrupt and seditious.

What then does the father respond? Son, you are always with me. The father testified that the Jews were near, who always worshiped one God. We have the testimony of the Apostle saying that they were near, but the Gentiles were far away. Speaking to the Gentiles, he said: Christ indeed came preaching peace to you who were far off, and peace to those who were near. Far off, like the younger son; showing that the Jews did not go far away to feed pigs, did not forsake the one God, did not worship idols, did not serve demons. I do not speak of all: lest you think of the lost and seditious Jews; let those come to mind, by whom these are reproved, grave, keeping the mandates of the Law, not yet entering the fatted calf, but already able to say: I have not transgressed your command; who, when he begins to enter, his Father says to him: You are always with me. Indeed, you are with me, because you have not gone far, but you are still badly outside the house; I do not want you to be away from our banquets. Do not envy the younger brother: You are always with me. Indeed, God did not attest to that which was perhaps less cautiously and boastfully said: I have never transgressed your command; but he said: You are always with me; he did not say: You have never transgressed my command. This is true, which God said, not what he perhaps rashly boasted of, although perhaps a transgressor in some things, but not departing from the one God; so that the father might truly say: You are always with me, and all that is mine is yours. Is it because they are yours that they are not your brother's? How are they yours? In common holding, not separate disputing. All, he says, that is mine is yours. What he says is his, he gives as if in possession. Did he subject heaven and earth, or the heights of the angels? It is not to be understood in this way; for indeed the angels will not truly be subject to us, to whose equality the Lord promises we will come in great reward: They will, he says, be equal to the angels of God. But there are other angels, about whom the saints will judge: Do you not know, says the Apostle, that we will judge angels? For there are always holy angels, there are transgressing angels; we will be made equal to good angels, we will judge bad angels. How then are all that is mine yours? Truly all of God's are ours, yet not all are subjected; for you say differently: My servant, differently: My brother. Whatever you say is mine, truly you say, when you speak the truth, it is yours; but is it with the same right a brother, as a servant? You say differently: My house, differently: My wife; differently you say: My children, differently you say: My father, my mother; apart from me, I hear, all are yours. You say: My God; but yet, my God, is He like my servant? Rather my God, like my Lord. Therefore, we have a superior, our Lord, whom we enjoy; we have all other inferior things, over which we rule. Therefore all ours, if we are His. By what condition all things of the Father are ours.

All that is mine is yours, he says. If you are peaceful, if you are pleasing, if you rejoice at your brother's return, if our feast does not make you sad, if you do not remain apart from the house, even though you have already come from the field, all that is mine is yours. But we must feast and rejoice, because Christ died for the ungodly and has risen. For this is what was said: Because your brother was dead, and has come to life again; he was lost, and has been found.

Sermons - Sermon 113

SERMO 113 OF THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL, LUKE 16:9 "Make friends for yourselves with unrighteous mammon" and so forth Friends about to welcome their benefactors into heaven: Christ's smallest.

What we are admonished, we ought to admonish others. The recent Gospel lesson admonished us to make friends from the mammon of iniquity, so that they who do so may receive themselves into eternal tabernacles. Who are they who will have eternal tabernacles but the saints of God? And who are they who are to be received by them into the eternal tabernacles, but those who serve their need, and cheerfully supply what they require? Therefore, let us remember that at the last judgment the Lord will say to those who stand at His right hand: I was hungry, and you gave Me food: and the rest which you know. And when they asked when they had done these services to Him, He replied: When you did it to one of the least of these my brethren, you did it to Me. These "least ones" are those who are received into eternal tabernacles. This He said to those on the right because they did it, and He also said this to those on the left because they refused to do it. But what did those on the right who did it receive, or rather what will they receive? Come, He says, you blessed of My Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. For I was hungry, and you gave Me food. When you did it to one of the least of these, you did it to Me. Therefore, who are the least of Christ? They are those who left all their possessions and followed Him, and distributed whatever they had to the poor, so that they might serve God unencumbered by worldly chains, and be lifted up, free from world’s burdens, like those who have wings carrying them upwards, for they are the least. Why the least? Because humble, because not exalted, not proud. Weigh these least, and you will find a heavy weight.

Mammon of iniquity. But what is it that he says they are friends of the mammon of iniquity? What is mammon of iniquity? First, what is mammon? For it is a word that is not Latin. It is a Hebrew word, related to the Punic language. For these languages are associated with each other by a certain proximity of meaning. What the Punics call "mammon", in Latin is called "gain". What the Hebrews call mammon, in Latin is called riches. So, to say the whole thing in Latin, this is what our Lord Jesus Christ says: Make friends for yourselves by means of unrighteous mammon. Some, by a misunderstanding, seize others' possessions, and from that give something to the poor, and think they are fulfilling this command. For they say: Seizing others' possessions is unrighteous mammon; distributing from that, especially to the needy saints, this is making friends by means of unrighteous mammon. This understanding must be corrected, or rather completely erased from the tablets of your hearts. I do not want you to understand it this way. Make alms from just labor: give from what you rightly possess. For you will not corrupt Christ the judge, so that he would not hear you with the poor, from whom you take. For if you were to plunder someone weak, you stronger and more powerful, and he came with you to any human judge on this earth, having some power of judgment, and he wished to plead the case with you, if you gave something to the judge from that plunder and spoil of the poor, so that he would judge for you, would that judge be pleasing to you? Surely he judged for you, and yet such is the power of justice, that it would displease even you. Do not imagine such a God for yourself, do not place such an idol in the temple of your heart. Your God is not such, nor should you be such. If you should not judge thus, but judge justly; even so better than you is your God: he is not inferior; he is more just, the source of justice. Whatever good you have done, you have derived from there; and whatever good you have poured out, you have drunk from there. Do you praise the vessel because it contains something from there, and reproach the fountain? Do not want to make alms from gain and usury. I say to the faithful, to those to whom we distribute the Body of Christ. Fear, correct yourselves: lest I later say, You do this and you do that. And I think, if I do this, you should not be angry with me, but with yourselves, to correct yourselves. For this is worth what is said in the Psalm: Be angry, and sin not. I want you to be angry, but not to sin. But so that you do not sin, to whom should you be angry, if not to yourselves? For what is a repentant man, but a man angry with himself? So that he may receive pardon, he exacts punishment from himself; and rightly says to God: Turn your eyes away from my sins, because I recognize my sin. If you recognize, he forgives. Those who did, do not do it: it is not allowed.

Zacchaeus to be imitated. But now, if you have done this, and have such wealth, and your bags are filled with it, and you have stored it up: what you have is of evil, do not add more evil, and make friends for yourselves with the mammon of iniquity. Did Zacchaeus have it from good? Read and see. He was the chief of the publicans, that is, to whom public taxes were entrusted: from there he had wealth. He had oppressed many, taken from many, accumulated much. Christ entered his house, and salvation came to his house: for thus said the Lord himself: "Today salvation has come to this house." But look at that salvation. First, he desired to see the Lord because he was short in stature: but, hindered by the crowd, he climbed a sycamore tree and saw Him passing by. But He looked up at him and said: "Zacchaeus, come down; for today I must stay at your house." You hang, but I do not suspend you, that is, I do not delay you. You wanted to see me passing by, today you will find me living with you. The Lord entered his house: filled with joy, he said: "I give half of my goods to the poor." See how he runs, who runs to make friends with the mammon of iniquity. And so that he might not be held guilty from any other cause: "If I have taken anything from anyone, I will repay it fourfold." He inflicted condemnation on himself, so that he might not incur damnation. Therefore, those of you who have from evil, make good from it. Those of you who do not have from evil, do not acquire from evil. Be good, you who make good from evil: and when you begin to do some good from evil, do not remain in evil yourself. Your money is turned to good, and you remain evil?

Mammon of iniquity: why are riches called so?

There is indeed another interpretation; I will not keep it silent. The mammon of unrighteousness includes all the riches of the world, from wherever they come. For wherever they are gathered, it is the mammon of unrighteousness, that is to say, they are the riches of unrighteousness. What does it mean, they are the riches of unrighteousness? It is money, which unrighteousness calls by the name of riches. For if you seek true riches, they are something else. Job abounded with such riches while he was naked, when he had a heart full of God and offered praises to God for all lost things as if they were most precious gems. From which treasure, if he had nothing? Those are the true riches. However, these are called riches by unrighteousness. You have them, I do not criticize you: an inheritance has come, your father was wealthy, and he left it to you. You acquired them honestly: from just labors, you have a full house, I do not criticize you. Yet even so, do not call them riches. For if you call them riches, you will love them: and if you love them, you will perish with them. Lose them, lest you perish: give them, that you may acquire: sow, that you may reap. Do not call these riches; for they are not true. They are full of poverty and always subject to accidents. What kind of riches are those, on account of which you fear a robber, on account of which you fear your servant, lest he kills you and steals them and flees? If they were true riches, they would give you security.

Riches that are true and those that are false.

Therefore, those are the true riches, which, once we have them, we cannot lose. And lest perhaps you fear a thief because of them, they will be there where no one may take them away. Listen to your Lord: "Store up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where no thief approaches." They will be riches then, when you have departed. As long as they are on earth, they are not riches. But the world calls those riches, iniquity calls them. Therefore, God calls them the mammon of iniquity, because iniquity calls those riches. Listen to the Psalm: "Lord, deliver me from the hand of foreign children, whose mouth has spoken vanity, and their right hand is the right hand of iniquity. Their sons are like new plants established from their youth. Their daughters are composed, adorned like the likeness of a temple. Their storehouses are full, overflowing from one to another. Their cattle are fat, their sheep fertile, multiplied in their paths. There is no breach of wall, nor passing, nor crying out in their streets." You have seen the Psalm, what kind of happiness it describes: but listen to what it means, whom it set forth as sons of iniquity. "Whose mouth has spoken vanity, and their right hand is the right hand of iniquity." It set forth them, and described their happiness only on earth. And what did it add? "They called the people blessed who have these things." But who said this? Foreign children, foreigners, and not pertaining to the seed of Abraham: they called the people blessed who have these things. Who said it? "Whose mouth has spoken vanity." Therefore it is vain to say those are blessed who have these things. And yet it is said by those whose mouth has spoken vanity. By them are called those riches which are termed the mammon of iniquity. But what do you say? Because those foreign children, whose mouth spoke vanity, said that the people who have these things are blessed; what do you say? These riches are false, give me true ones. You criticize these, show what you praise. You want me to disdain this, show what I should prefer. Let the Psalm itself speak. For he who said: They said the people who have these things are blessed; gives us such an answer, as if we were saying to him, that is, to the Psalm itself, Behold, you have taken this from us, and given us nothing: behold these things, we despise these things, from whence shall we live? from whence shall we be blessed? Because those who spoke, they themselves will receive from themselves. For men having riches said they are blessed. What do you say?

True riches.

He responds as if thus questioned, and says: They call the rich blessed: I say: Blessed is the people whose God is the Lord. You have heard of true riches, make friends of the mammon of unrighteousness, and you will be a blessed people, whose God is the Lord. Sometimes we pass along the way, and we see the most delightful and fertile lands, and we say: Whose land is that? It is asserted that it is his: and we say, Blessed is the man: we speak vanity. Blessed is he whose house that is, blessed is he whose land that is, blessed is he whose livestock that is, blessed is he whose servant that is, blessed is he whose family that is. Remove vanity if you wish to hear the truth. Blessed is he whose God is the Lord. For it is not the one whose land this is who is blessed: but the one whose God is that. But to declare the blessedness of things most plainly, you say that your land has made you blessed. Why? Because you live from it. For when you praise your land greatly, you say this: It feeds me, I live from it. Consider from what you live. That is from what you live, to whom you say: With you is the fountain of life. Blessed is the people whose God is the Lord. O Lord my God, O Lord our God, that we may come to you, make us blessed from you. We do not want from gold, nor from silver, nor from lands: we do not want from these earthly, most vain, and transitory matters of fleeting life. Let not our mouth speak vanity. Make us blessed from you, for we will not lose you. When we have held you, neither will we lose you, nor will we perish. Make us blessed from you, because Blessed is the people whose God is the Lord. Nor does he get angry if we say of God, our Land. For we read that the Lord is the portion of my inheritance. A great thing, brothers, both we are his inheritance, and he is ours: because both we worship him, and he cultivates us. There is no injury to him because he cultivates us. For if we worship him as our God, he cultivates us as his field. And to know that he cultivates us, listen to him whom he sent to us: I am, he says, the vine, you are the branches, my Father is the vinedresser. Therefore, he cultivates us. But if we yield fruit, he prepares the granary. But if under such a great cultivator we choose to be barren, and instead of wheat bring forth thorns: I do not wish to say what follows, let us end on joy. Turning to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 113A

SERMON 113/A The custom of Hippo Diarrhytus In the Basilica of Saint Martyr Quadratus, The Lord's Day, the seventh day before the Kalends of October.

ABOUT THE GOSPEL WHERE IT SPEAKS OF THE RICH MAN AND THE BEGGAR LAZARUS The Jews do not yet believe in the prophetic oracles concerning Christ and His Church. The faith of the Christians, which is mocked by the impious and the unbelievers, is this: because we say there is another life after this life, and that there is a resurrection of the dead, and that after the passage of the ages there is a judgment at the end. Although this was not believed among human affairs, it was preached and announced by the Prophets, the servants of God, and by the law given through Moses, and it still seemed incredible to people, the Lord and our Savior Jesus Christ came to persuade people of this. He, being the Son of God, born of the Father invisibly and ineffably, co-eternal with the Father, and equal to the Father, and with the Father one God, being the Word of the Father, through whom all things were made, and the counsel of the Father, by which all things are governed, so humbled His great and incomprehensible majesty and power, which could not be known by humans, by coming to earth, taking on flesh, and appearing to the eyes of humans. Therefore, when God, that is, divinity itself, was not seen in Christ, His flesh was despised; but He demonstrated His inner divinity by miracles; and although He appeared in such a way that He could be despised by human eyes, He did so much that through His works He appeared as the Son of God. Therefore, when He performed great works, gave useful precepts, corrected vices, chastised, taught virtues, worked bodily healings to heal the minds of unbelievers, the angry people killed Him in the place where He was born and raised and did all these great things. But He, who had come to be born, had certainly also come to die; nor did He wish His death in the flesh, which He had taken on to demonstrate the example of resurrection, to be in vain, but rather allowed it to happen at the hands of the impious, so that, although they did not want to do what He commanded, He would suffer what He willed. It came to pass; Christ was killed, buried, and rose again, as we know, as the Gospel testifies, as is now proclaimed throughout the world; and even now you see that the Jews do not want to believe in Christ, even after He rose from the dead, and glorified in the sight of His disciples ascended into heaven, while the proclamations of the Prophets are now being fulfilled throughout the whole world. Indeed, all the Prophets who foretold that Christ would be born, die, rise again, and ascend into heaven, also foretold that His Church would be among all nations. However, if the Jews did not see Christ rising and going to heaven, they could at least see the Church spread throughout the whole world, which, when fulfilled, would fulfill the words of the Prophets. The unbelief of the Jews is refuted by the example of the rich man who feasted sumptuously.

It happens in them what we have just heard from the Gospel; for they do not hear Christ, who rose from the dead, because they did not hear Christ placed on the earth. For Abraham said this to that rich man who was tormented in hell and wanted someone to be sent to the living, to announce to his brothers what happens in hell, and to live well before they come to those places of torment, doing penance for their sins, so that they might deserve to go rather to the bosom of Abraham, and not to those torments where that rich man arrived. Therefore, when that rich man, belatedly merciful, who had despised the poor man lying before his door, and hence, perhaps, because he was proud over him, his very tongue was burning, and there he desired a drop of water. Therefore, when he did not do what he should have done among the living to avoid coming there, belatedly he began to be merciful even for others. But what did Abraham say? If they do not hear Moses and the Prophets, neither will they be persuaded if someone rises from the dead. It is entirely true, brothers, because the Jews today are not persuaded to believe in Him who rose from the dead, because they did not hear Moses and the Prophets: for if they were willing to hear them, they would find that it was foretold there what is now fulfilled, and they still do not want to believe. Therefore, what we said about the Jews, let us act upon ourselves, lest, when we attend to others, we also fall into the same impiety. Beloved, the Gospel is not read to the Jews, Moses and the Prophets are read, whom they do not want to hear; but if they were willing to hear, they would believe in Christ, because Moses and the Prophets predicted the coming of Christ. Therefore, let us not be such as they, when the Gospel is read to us, as they are when the Prophets are read to them; for among them, as I said, the Gospel is not recited, but among us, it is recited. The rich man feasting is a salutary example for us.

Behold, you have just heard from the Gospel about two lives, one present, the other future: we have the present, we believe in the future; we are in the present, we have not yet reached the future. While we are in the present, let us acquire the merit for the future; for we are not yet dead. Is the Gospel recited among the dead? If it were indeed recited there, it would be useless for the rich man to hear it, because repentance can no longer be fruitful there. It is read to us here, and here it is heard by us, where we can be corrected while we live, so that we do not come to those torments. Do we believe what is read, or do we not believe? Far be it from us to think this of your Charity, for you do believe; for you are Christians, and you would in no way be Christians if you did not believe in the Gospel of God; therefore, because you are Christians, it is clear that you believe in the Gospel. We have heard it, it has just been recited: There was a rich man, surely proud, surely exalting himself in wealth, who was clothed in purple and fine linen, and feasted luxuriously every day. But a certain poor man named Lazarus, covered with sores, lay at his gate, whose sores even the dogs licked; and he longed to be filled with the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table, and could not. Behold the crime of the rich man, for he longed to be filled with the crumbs, and could not, to whom humanity should have been shared. Therefore, if that rich man had had compassion on the poor man lying at his gate, and had wished to be merciful with his wealth, he would have come to the place where that poor man went. For Lazarus was not led to rest by his poverty, but by his humility; nor was that rich man drawn away from that great rest by wealth, but by pride and unbelief. For to let you know, brothers, that this rich man was unbelieving even while he was alive, let us prove from his words, which he spoke while in hell. Pay attention. He wished for someone to go from the dead to tell his brothers what happens in hell; and when this was not granted to him, Abraham said: They have Moses and the Prophets, let them hear them; no, father Abraham, he said, but if someone goes to them from the dead, they will be persuaded, showing that he himself, when he was alive, did not believe Moses and the Prophets, but wished for someone to rise from the dead for him. Consider such people now, and see where they will be; by the example of this rich man we are warned, if you have faith. How many are there who say now: Let it be well for us while we live; let us eat and drink, and enjoy these pleasures. What is it that we are told will come afterward? Who has returned from there? Who has risen from there? These things are said; this is what that rich man said, and what he did not believe while alive, he found out when dead. It would have been better for him to be corrected fruitfully while alive, than to be tortured fruitlessly when dead.

Having been sufficiently warned about the future, we have no excuse.

Now let us therefore change these very words, if perhaps there is anyone among us who is accustomed to saying these things. For God does not show now what He commands us to believe; therefore He did not show it so that it might be a reward of faith. For if He shows you, what merit do you have because you believe? It is no longer believing, but seeing; rather, God does not show it to you so that you may believe. He commands you to believe, He keeps for you that you may see. But if you do not believe when He commands faith, He does not keep His appearance for you; but that thing is kept for you, from which the rich man was tormented in hell. And when our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ comes, who is now announced to have come, so that He may also be hoped to come, He will come with the rewards for the faithful and the unbelievers: He will give rewards to the faithful, and will send the unbelievers into eternal fire. And He said this in the Gospel about how He will judge at the end: He will place some on the right hand, others on the left, and will separate all nations, just as a shepherd separates sheep from goats; the just will be on the right, the wicked on the left; He will say to the just: Come, blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the beginning of the world; but to the wicked and the unbelievers: Go into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels. What more could the judge have benefited you than to have told you his definitive sentence, so that you might not fall into it? Brothers, everyone who threatens does not want to strike; for if he were suddenly to strike, he would strike. He who says: Watch out, does not wish to find whom to strike. Men bring about wounds for themselves, men acquire punishments for themselves, who for so long, when God says: Watch out, do not wish to believe. And indeed, what is the punishment for one who errs here? Perhaps some affliction, and some scourge either probationary or corrective. For either someone is corrected because of his sins, so he does not fall into greater uncorrected punishments; or the faith of each one is tested, by what endurance or what patience he remains under the scourge of the Father, not murmuring against the chastising Father, and rejoicing at the flattering one, but rejoicing at the flatterer in such a way that he also gives thanks to the chastiser: for He scourges every son whom He receives. How much the martyrs suffered, how much they tolerated! What chains, what squalor, what prisons, what torments, what flames, what beasts, what kinds of deaths! They trampled all these things underfoot. For they saw something in spirit, so that what they saw with the body they did not care about; the eye of faith was in them, the eye was directed toward the future, they disdained present things. But whose eye is extinguished from the future, is terrified at present things, and does not reach the future. Our faith must be confirmed by what has already been fulfilled and by the promises from God.

Therefore, faith is built in us. Now, whoever does not want to believe that Christ was born of the Virgin Mary, that He suffered, that He was crucified, let them believe the Jews because He existed and was killed, let them believe the Gospel because He was born of a Virgin and resurrected; for there is reason to believe. And the hostile Jews do not dare to say: Christ was not among our people; or: This man whom Christians worship did not exist. They say He was, and our ancestors killed Him, and He died as a man. If we find that those things that followed His death were spoken by the Prophets, because the whole world would run in His name, because all nations and all regions of the peoples would worship Him, because all kings would be subjected to His yoke, and we see fulfilled after the death of Christ what was once predicted before the birth of Christ, how do we deceive ourselves, if we do not want to believe the rest, when we see many things fulfilled in us? For we ourselves, brothers, are not only we who are here Christians, we are the whole world now. A few years ago, we were not; and it is astonishing how it happened, that what did not exist for so many ages now exists. We read that in the Prophets; lest we think it happened by chance, we find it was predicted. Therefore, our faith is strengthened, built up, and fortified from this. There is no one who can say: It happened suddenly. How? Behold, this which never was on earth. Sometimes in the Scriptures God was held as a debtor in these matters, but at His own time He was to pay the debt. But from where did God owe? or had He taken a loan from anyone, He who freely gives all things, who made those to whom He would give? For even the men themselves, to whom some things would be granted, did not exist. Can anyone say: My merits earned these goods from God? Suppose He granted these goods due to your merits. That you exist, to whom He granted? Before you were, what did He give you? That you exist freely; you did not earn it before you existed. Believe Him, because He also deigned to grant you the rest freely. Therefore, we have the grace of God, and the whole world in some way held God as a debtor; rather it did not, because it did not know the promissory note He made. By promising, He made Himself a debtor, not by taking a loan. For a debtor is mentioned in two ways: Repay what you received, or what you promised. Because what God promised, He cannot be told: Repay - for He received nothing from man, who gave everything to man - it remains that He is a debtor only because He deigned to promise. The promises of God in the people of the Jews from Abraham, whose faith is commended. This promise was in the Scriptures: these Scriptures were in one Judean nation, which He chose to be born from the flesh of His servant, His faithful one, who believed in Him. And how was that nation born? From the old Abraham, and from the sterile Sarah: so that she might conceive, so that Isaac himself might be born, from whom the Jewish nation came, a miracle occurred. The old man hoped for nothing from his own members, dared to hope for nothing from the sterility of his wife; what he did not count on at all, God offered to him, and he believed God offering, who did not dare to ask from God. And when he had believed and a son was born to him, from whom he believed an innumerable offspring would be born, God asked him to sacrifice that very son to Himself. However, Abraham was of such great faith that he did not hesitate to sacrifice the only one, of whom he had received the promise. Did he hesitate and say to God: Lord, you have granted me a son in old age as a great favor; for great wishes, for great joy, a son was born to me unexpectedly; do you demand that I kill this one? was it not better that you did not give, than to take away what was given? He did not say these things, but believed that it was useful, whatever he saw God wish. This is faith, brothers. Surely that poor man was taken up into the bosom of Abraham, and that rich man to the torments of hell. So that you may know that riches are not at fault, Abraham was rich, in whose bosom Lazarus rested. He was rich on earth, as we have the Scriptures teaching; he had much gold, silver, livestock, family; he was rich, but he was not proud. So that you may know that in the rich man only pride was tortured, only vices were tortured. They alone deserved punishment, not the substance of God; for the substance of God is good, to whomever it may have been given; but a reward is acquired by one using it well, punishment is repaid to one using it badly. But take heed, how Abraham had riches. Did he keep them for his sons? If he offered even his son at God's command, how did he despise riches? The faithfulness of God in fulfilling promises, and the madness of idolaters.

Therefore this Scripture, where God had made Himself a debtor by promising, was hidden among the Jews. Our Lord Jesus Christ came, born according to this Scripture, because He was rendered according to it; suffered according to this Scripture, because He was foretold to suffer in it; rising according to this Scripture, because He was foretold to rise in it; ascending into heaven according to this Scripture, because He was foretold to ascend in it. After He ascended, unknown by the Jews, He began to send His Apostles to the Gentiles, and in a way to awaken those who were asleep, and say: Arise, receive the debt which was promised to you long ago. Who is it that arouses his creditor, and offers him that which he owes? For it was not the Gentiles, since they had God as their debtor, who arose; they were called, they began to pay attention to the Scripture, and there to find that what they were receiving had already long ago been promised to them. They received Christ promised and given; they received the grace of God, the Holy Spirit promised and given; they received the Church itself spread among all nations, promised and given. The idols which the Gentiles worshiped, God had promised to overthrow; it is read in the Scriptures, there you find it. You see how God did this in our times, which He had promised so many thousands of years ago. For men had turned away from Him by whom they were made, to that which they had made themselves; and since he who makes is always better than what he makes, therefore God is better, not only than the man whom He made, but than all angels, powers, dominions, thrones, and authorities, because He created all these; so that whatever man makes is inferior to the man himself. Men had been led into such madness that they worshiped an idol; they ought to be condemned if they worshiped the craftsman who made the idol. It is clear, brothers, that the craftsman is better than the idol he made; and, although men would be detestable if they worshiped the craftsman, they worship the idol itself, which was made by the craftsman. Men would be detestable for worshiping the craftsman; but they would be better than those who worship the idol. If therefore the better are condemned, how do I bewail the worse? If indeed, I said that the worshiper of the craftsman should be condemned, he who leaves the craftsman and worships the idol, surely having forsaken the better, and turned himself to the inferior, how is he to be condemned? But whom did he desert first, the better? God, by whom he himself was made. Is he seeking the image of God? He has it in himself; for the craftsman could not make the image of God, but God could make an image of Himself. However, He did not make something else for you, but made you yourself in His own image. But by worshiping the image of man, which the craftsman made, you destroy the image of God, which God impressed upon you. Therefore, when He calls you to return, He wishes to restore to you that image which you yourself, by earthly desire, in a manner rubbed away and obliterated.

God seeks His image in the soul, as Caesar in a coin.

Hence, brothers, it is because God seeks His image from us; He reminded the Jews of this when they presented a coin to Him. For first they wanted to test Him by saying: Lord, is it lawful to give tribute to Caesar? So that, if He said: It is lawful, they would malign Him because He wanted Israel, whom He wished to be free, to be under tribute, subject to the king in giving tribute. But if He said: It is not lawful to give tribute, they would malign Him because He commanded against Caesar and was advocating not to give the tribute that was owed, since they were subject to Caesar. He saw their temptation, truth as falsehood, and briefly overturned the lie from the mouths of liars. He did not pronounce judgment from His own mouth, but made them pronounce judgment on themselves, because it is written: By your own mouth, you shall be justified, and by your own mouth, you shall be condemned. He said: Why do you test me, hypocrites? Show me the coin. They showed Him. Whose image and inscription is this, He asked? They replied: Caesar’s. And He said: Render therefore unto Caesar the things that are Caesar’s, and unto God the things that are God’s. Just as Caesar seeks his image on your coin, so God seeks His image in your soul. Render unto Caesar, He said, what are Caesar’s. What does Caesar seek from you? His image. What does God seek from you? His image. But Caesar's image is on the coin; God's image is in you. If ever you lose the coin, you lament because you have lost Caesar’s image; when you worship an idol, you do not lament because you are dishonoring God’s image in yourself.

How many promises of God have already been fulfilled.

Therefore, brothers, hold fast to the promise of the Lord our God and already count from that number of His promises how many He has fulfilled. Christ was not yet born, He was promised in the Scriptures; He fulfilled it, He was born. He had not yet suffered, He had not yet risen; He fulfilled this too; He suffered, was crucified, and rose again. His passion is our reward; His blood is our redemption. He ascended into heaven, as He had promised; He fulfilled this too. He sent the Gospel to all lands; He therefore wanted there to be four Gospels, so that the whole world might be signified by the number four, from the East and the West, from the North and the South. For this reason, He wanted to have twelve disciples, to be somewhat distributed by fours; because the world was called in the Trinity, in the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit. He fulfilled this; He sent the Gospel, as He foretold: "How beautiful are the feet of those who bring good news of peace, who bring good news of good things!" as He foretold: "There are no words or languages where their voices are not heard; their sound has gone out into all the earth, and their words to the ends of the world." As He said, so He sent; the Gospel is written in all lands. Likewise, the Church suffered persecution at first; He fulfilled it, because He had also promised martyrs. Recite the sure evidence: "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints." He also fulfilled the promise of the martyrs, because He had promised them as well. What was yet to be fulfilled afterwards? "All the kings of the earth shall worship before Him." Kings also believed, who at first had made martyrs by persecuting them; we see, therefore, that kings now believe. He also fulfilled what He had promised, that idols would be shattered by the command of kings, by whose command Christians were first killed. He also removed idols, as He had promised: "And there will be a regard for the idols of the nations." Therefore, with so many promises fulfilled, brothers, why do we not believe Him? Is God a less capable debtor? If He had not yet fulfilled anything for us, we would still hold a reliable debtor, who made heaven and earth; for He would not be poor, lacking the means to repay; nor does He deceive, being the truth Himself. Or is God such a powerful being that He can be succeeded, lacking time to repay? The faith of Abraham is an example to us.

It is right, brothers, to believe in God before He gives anything, because He cannot lie, He cannot deceive: He is God. Thus our fathers believed in Him. Abraham believed in Him thus. Behold truly praiseworthy and proclaimed faith. He had received nothing from Him and believed the one promising; we do not yet believe, who have already received so much. Could Abraham say to Him: I will believe because you promised and returned that to me? From the first command he believed, he had received nothing else like it. Go forth from your land, it was said to him, and from your kin, and go to the land that I will give to you. And he believed immediately, and He did not give him the land itself, but reserved it for his seed. And He promised his seed, what? In your seed all nations will be blessed. His seed is Christ: because from Abraham Isaac, from Isaac Jacob, from Jacob the twelve, from the twelve the people of the Jews, from the people of the Jews the virgin Mary, from the virgin Mary our Lord Jesus Christ. And our Lord Jesus Christ became the seed of Abraham; and what was promised to Abraham we find fulfilled in us. In your seed, He says, all nations will be blessed. He believed this before he had seen anything; he believed, and he did not see what was promised. But we see what was promised to him; and whatever was promised to him was in the future. For what has God not yet returned? He warned of labors to come in this world, and that His saints and faithful ones would be in labors and would bear fruit with endurance; He foretold this, and we see it; we are crushed by these labors. What labors were not yet foretold? Don't think, brothers, that what you see human affairs being crushed now is not written in the Scripture of God. Everything is written, and endurance is commanded to Christians, and greater good is to come, because the evils that were foretold have come. For if what was said did not come, it would also take away from us faith in the good things; but the evils came first so that we may believe in the good things to come. On enduring adversities, a double comparison. The world is just like a winepress; it is under pressure; but, if you are dregs, you go through the gutters; if you are oil, you remain in the vat. For it is necessary that pressures exist. Look at the dregs, look at the oil. Sometimes pressure happens in the world: for example, famine, war, scarcity, dearness, poverty, mortality, theft, greed; the pressures of the poor, the toils of cities: we see these. And they have been predicted to come, and we see that they are. We find people murmuring among these pressures, and saying: Behold, how many evils there are in Christian times! How abundant the good things were before Christian times! There were not so many evils. This escapes as dregs under pressure and runs through the gutters; its mouth is black because it blasphemes: it does not shine. Oil glistens. But you find another person under the same pressure, and the same crushing which squeezed him; is it not the same crushing that squeezed him? You have heard the voice of the dregs, hear the voice of the oil: Thanks be to God! Blessed be your name! All these evils wherewith you crush us were predicted; we are secure because we know that good things will also come. When both we and the wicked are corrected together, your will is being done. We know you as the Father who makes promises, we know you as the Father who chastises; instruct us and grant the inheritance which you have promised at the end. We bless your holy name because you have never been a liar; all things, just as you predicted, you have delivered. From these praises emanating from the same pressure the oil runs into the vat. However, as the whole world is a winepress, another comparison is also made: Just as gold and silver are tested in the furnace, so the righteous are tested by the temptation of tribulation, and a comparison is made with the furnace of the goldsmith. In a narrow pot, there are three things: fire, gold, and straw. And there you see an image of the whole world; there is straw, there is gold, there is fire; straw is burned, fire blazes, gold is tested. Likewise, in this whole world there are the righteous, there are the wicked, there is tribulation; the world is like the goldsmith’s furnace, the just like gold, the wicked like straw, tribulation like fire. Would gold be purified if the straw were not burned? It happens that the wicked are reduced to ashes; for when they blaspheme and murmur against God, they become ashes. There, purified gold – that is, the righteous who bear all the vexations of this world tolerably and praise God in their tribulations – are gathered into God’s treasures; for God has treasures where he sends the purified gold; he also has sordid places where he sends the ashes of the straw. All this comes out of the world. You, see what you are. For the fire must come; if it finds you as gold, it will remove impurities; if it finds you as straw, it will burn you and reduce you to ashes. Choose what you will be. For you cannot say: I will be without fire; you are already in the goldsmith’s furnace, where the fire must come. It is more necessary for you to be there, for without fire you can by no means exist. The patience of God must be used by us, and it must be imitated.

Why then do we not believe, brothers, that the end of the world and the day of judgment will come, so that there each one of us receives what he has done in the body, whether good or bad, when we see so many promised things fulfilled and given? Why do we not choose for ourselves, while we live, that where we shall always live? Suppose that because we have been negligent, today let us be diligent. We ought not to be negligent; you do not know what tomorrow will be. The patience of God admonishes us to amend our life if it has been bad, and to choose better things while there is time. Do you think that God sleeps and does not see those doing evil? But perhaps he teaches us patience by showing patience first. He finds a man perhaps having made progress, and not doing what he did before, that is, evil. This one endures some malicious person and wishes that God would remove him; and murmurs against God, because he retains his enemy perhaps doing harm and does not remove him. He has forgotten that God has dealt patiently with him, and, if he had wanted to act severely earlier, there would not have been anyone speaking now. Do you demand the severity of God? Since you have crossed over, let another also cross; for neither because you have already crossed over have you destroyed the bridge of God's mercy; there is still one who will cross. He made you good, when you were evil; he also wishes another to be good from evil, just as you were made good from evil. Thus all come in their own time; but some do not wish to come, others do come. To such the Apostle says: But by your hard and unrepentant heart you are storing up wrath for yourself on the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God, who will repay each one according to his works. Then if the evil one wishes to persist in evil, he is not your companion, but he will test you; for if he is evil, and you are good, you are proven good by enduring the evil; you will receive the crown of your perseverance, but he will have punishment for his persistence in evil. Let us patiently wait for God's good patience, his fatherly discipline. He is a father, he is kind, he is merciful; more so if he lets us flow, then he is truly angry with us.

We ought to commit ourselves to God in adversities without complaint.

"Attend, brothers, and see these amphitheaters, which now are falling. Luxury built them; do you think piety built them? It was not built by anything other than the luxury of impious men. Do you not want what luxury built to eventually fall, and what piety builds to rise? God permitted these to be built so that men might at some time become aware of the evils they were committing. But because they did not want to recognize it, the Lord Jesus Christ came; He began to proclaim their evils to them, began to overturn what they held in high regard; and they say: The Christian times are bad. Why? Because that which was killing you is being overthrown. But, they say, all good things were abundant when these were happening. Indeed, so these good things might be made from them. If therefore you know that God once gave you abundance, and you used it badly and to your destruction, see that this abundance made you abound and lose your soul. Does not a strict father come and start to say: This child is undisciplined; I entrusted him with this or that, how did he lose it? If we do not give the seed of the earth unless it is good, lest the seed perish, how do you want that God gives His abundance to us undisciplined and neglectful of our life to use badly, and you do not want God to cut off the overflow of men? My brothers, a physician knows how to cut off a rotten member so that other parts may not rot. He says, one finger is cut off; because it is better for one finger to be less than for the whole body to rot. If a human physician does this by his art, if the art of medicine removes a part of the members so that all do not rot, why should God not cut off whatever He knows to be rotten in men, so that they may reach salvation?"

Exhortation to Patience.

Therefore, brothers, do not be weary when God chastises, lest He abandon you and you perish forever; but rather, let us ask Him to moderate the very scourges and temper them so that we do not fail under them; and let us ask that He corrects with salvation, measures, and afterwards grants what He promised to His saints. See what Scripture says: "The sinner provoked the Lord; for the greatness of His wrath, He will not seek out." What does "for the greatness of His wrath, He will not seek out" mean? Because He is greatly angry, He will not seek out, that is, He will let them perish. Therefore, if He is greatly angry when He does not seek out, He is also greatly merciful when He chastises. He chastises when He binds our heart to Himself. Therefore, let us hold on to His salvation and not flee from His scourge; this is what He teaches us, admonishes us, and builds us up in. His own Son, who came to comfort us, what good did He endure here? Tell me. Certainly, He is the Son of God, the Word of God, through whom all things were made; what good did He endure here? Is He not the one, who, when He cast out demons, heard such insults as to be told: "You have a demon"? The Son of God, who cast out demons, was told by the Jews: "You have a demon." Now the demons were better, who confessed the Son of God, than those men; for both the demons confessed and those men did not confess. But such was His power, and such His greatness, and such His patience, that He endured all. He was scourged, heard insults, received blows, was spit upon in the face, crowned with thorns, crucified, at last hung on the cross, mocked, deceived, killed, buried. The Son of God endured so much here; if the Lord, how much more the servant? If the Master, how much more the disciple? If He who created us, how much more we His creatures? Who gave us an example, imparted patience to us. Why do we fail in that very patience, as if we had lost our head, who went before us to heaven? For this reason, our head went before us to heaven, as if saying: "Behold, this is the way, come: through troubles, through patience; this is the way I handed down to you." But where does the way lead, by which you see me ascend? To heaven. Whoever does not want to go this way, does not want to reach that destination; whoever wants to reach me, let them come by the way I showed. And you cannot reach except by the way of troubles, pains, tribulations, distress. Thus, you will reach the rest that cannot be taken from you. Do you want this temporary rest and to turn away from the way of Christ? Observe the torments of that rich man who was tortured in hell; for he also desired present rest and found eternal punishments. Beloved brothers, choose rather the harsher things, which will have eternal rest without end. Turn to the Lord.

Sermons - Sermon 113B

Sermon 113/B TRACT ON LAZARUS THE POOR MAN AND THE RICH MAN He was clothed in purple and fine linen. The Gospel terrifies many, but few are changed.

If the holy reading in this life healthily terrifies us, after this life, no one terrifies us; the fruit of fear is correction: for I did not say merely, if the divine reading terrifies us, but if it healthily terrifies us; for many know how to fear, but do not know how to change. But what is more sterile than unfruitful fear? How all our hearts tremble and quake when we hear that proud rich man, the despiser of the poor lying at his door, being so tormented in the underworld that even beseeching prayers could not avail him anything; and he received an answer, not cruelly but justly, that he could not be helped! At that time, when the mercy of God would have helped him if he had turned, he neglected impunity and deserved punishment. He was spared when he was proud and rejoiced in the boastings of his wealth, not thinking of the torments to come, which in that pride he neither knew how to believe nor fear. Yet, they came to him eventually. And what is: eventually? For how long was the delay of his dignity and pride? How long is the life of the flower of the grass, as you have just heard, when the epistle of the Apostle Peter was read, verified by the testimony of prophecy: All flesh is grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass: the grass withers, and the flower falls; but the Word of the Lord endures forever.

"Our hay taken up by the Word of God."

However much this flesh is clothed in purple and fine linen, what is it more than flesh and blood, and grass that withers? And however much dignity and honor people may bestow upon this flesh, it is indeed a flower, but a flower of the grass; for when the grass withers, the flower of the grass cannot remain, but as the grass withers, so the flower falls. We therefore have something to hold on to so that we do not fall, because the Word of the Lord remains forever. Did the Word of God, brothers, despise us? Did it scorn our frailty and mortality, and say: It is flesh, it is grass; let the grass wither, and the flower of the grass fall, without offering it any help? On the contrary, it took on our grass to make us gold: For the Word of the Lord, which remains forever, did not disdain to be grass for a while, not to change the Word itself, but to bestow a better change upon the grass. For the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us; and the Lord suffered for us, was buried, and rose again, and ascended into heaven, and sits at the right hand of the Father, no longer grass, but gold, incorrupt and incorruptible. Thus, a change is promised to us, beloved brothers; yet while we come to that change, this grass will pass away, that is, all the dignity of the flesh passes away with the age, all this frailty grows old. In that rich man, the grass had passed away, and the flower of the grass had passed away; but if at the time of his grass, and at the time of his flower of the grass, he had understood the Word of the Lord which remains forever, and having laid aside all the arrogance, he had humbled himself before God, and if he did not wish to cast away his riches, yet gave something of them to the lying poor, he would be refreshed after the time of this grass; he would not seek mercy in vain, who when he could have, did not show mercy. In the arena of this life, either we conquer or we are conquered.

Therefore, my brothers, when it was read, and we heard the voice in the Gospel: Father Abraham, send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue, for I am tormented in this flame; how we were all struck to the heart, lest something like this should happen to us after this life, and we should beg in vain! For there is no place of correction once this life has passed. This life is like a stadium; either we conquer here, or we are conquered. Does the one who is defeated in the stadium seek to wrestle outside the stadium, in order to reclaim the crown he lost? What then? If we were fearful, if we shuddered, if our innermost parts trembled, let us change ourselves while there is time; this is the fruitful fear. For, my brothers, no one can change without fear, without tribulation, without trepidation. We beat our breasts when our conscience is pricked by our sins; what we beat is something inside, some evil conception; let it burst forth in confession, and perhaps there will no longer be anything to prick; let all sins burst forth in confession. For that rich man, swollen in fine linen, had something inside that would have burst forth when he lived; perhaps perpetual flame would not have been applied to him; but because he was then proud, that moisture caused swelling, not eruption. But poor Lazarus lay at the gate full of sores. Therefore, let no one be ashamed, brothers, to confess their sins; lying down pertains to humility. However, see how their fortunes change. When the tribulation of confessions has passed, the refreshment of merits comes; for the angels will come, will carry this sore-covered one, and place him in the bosom of Abraham, that is, in eternal rest, in the secret of the great Father; for "bosom" signifies a secret place where the weary rest. When you give to the needy, you give to Christ.

He lay, therefore, at the door full of sores, but the rich man despised him; he longed to be satisfied with the crumbs that fell from his table, and he fed the dogs with his sores, but he was not fed by the rich man. Attend, brothers, for the poor man is in need: "Blessed," he says, "is he who understands the poor and needy"; attend, and do not despise him who lies at the door as full of sores. Give to the poor, for He receives, who also willed to be in need on earth and to enrich from heaven. For the Lord says: "I was hungry, and you gave me to eat; I was thirsty, and you gave me to drink; I was a stranger, and you took me in," etc. And they: "When did we see you hungry, or thirsty, or naked, or a stranger?" And He: "When you did it to one of the least of these my brethren, you did it to me." In his least servants laboring on earth, He wished mercifully to represent His own person, aiding from heaven all who labor. Therefore, you give to Christ when you give to the needy; do you fear that such a keeper might lose something, or that such a rich one might not repay? God is almighty; Christ is almighty; you cannot lose anything: entrust to Him, and you lose nothing. When do you commend? When you give to the poor. Such riches do not pass away, though the flesh passes away like grass, and the glory of man like the flower of grass. Therefore, brothers, if we are frightened lest we suffer such punishments and the torments of burning flame after this life as the proud and unmerciful rich man endured, let us now correct ourselves while there is time; for then there is no place for relief, because there is no place for correction; each one is helped then when he is corrected. This life is for correction, this life is for help and aid. Turned to the Lord.

Sermons - Sermon 114

SERMO 114 OF THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL LUKE 17:3-4 "If your brother sins against you, rebuke him", and so on. On the Forgiveness of Sins To a brother, as often as he sins against us and repents, it must be forgiven. The Holy Gospel, which we just heard being recited, reminded us of the forgiveness of sins. From this, you are to be admonished by our word. For we are ministers of the word, not of ourselves, but indeed of God and our Lord, to whom no one serves without glory, whom no one disregards without penalty. Thus, our Lord Jesus Christ, who remaining with the Father made us, and being made for us remade us; our Lord and God said to us as we heard: If your brother sins against you, rebuke him; and if he repents, forgive him: and if he sins against you seven times in a day, and comes and says: I repent, forgive him. Seven times in a day should only be understood as often as necessary; lest he sins eight times, and you are unwilling to forgive. What then does seven times mean? Always, whenever he sins and repents. For this reason: I will praise you seven times a day; which is in another psalm: His praise will always be in my mouth. And as to why seven times is placed for what is always, there is a very definite reason; for with the coming and returning of seven days, all time is encompassed.

Pardon must be given to a brother, so that it may be received from God.

Whoever therefore thinks of Christ, and desires to receive what He promised, do not be lazy to do what He commanded. For what did He promise? Eternal life. And what did He command? Give your brother forgiveness. As if He were saying to you: You are a man, give a man forgiveness, so that I, God, may come to you. But to omit, or rather to set aside for now, those higher divine promises, in which our Creator will make us equal to His angels, so that we may live with Him and in Him and from Him without end: not mentioning this for now, do you not want to receive this very thing which you are ordered to give to your brother, from your God? This very thing, I say, which you are ordered to give to your brother, do you not want to receive from your Lord? Tell me if you do not want it, and do not give it. What is this, except to forgive the one who asks, if you ask to be forgiven? Or if you do not have anything to be forgiven, I dare say: Do not forgive. Although, I ought not to have said this. And if you do not have anything to be forgiven, you ought to forgive; because even God forgives, who does not have anything to be forgiven.

Debts are to be forgiven by the example of God.

You will say: But I am not God, I am a sinful man. Thanks be to God, that you confess there are sins. Therefore forgive, so that it may be forgiven you. Yet our very God urges us to imitate Him. First, the Lord Christ Himself, of whom the apostle Peter said: Christ suffered for us, leaving us an example, that you should follow His steps. And certainly, He had no sin, and died for our sins, and shed His blood for the remission of sins. He took upon Himself for us what He did not owe, that He might free us from our debt. He did not have to die, nor did we have to live. Why? Because we were sinners. Neither was death owed to Him, nor life to us: He accepted what was not owed to Him, and gave what was not owed to us. But since it is a question of the remission of sins, do not think it too much to imitate Christ, hear the Apostle saying: Forgiving one another, even as God in Christ forgave you. Therefore, be (these are the words of the Apostle, his own, not mine) therefore be imitators of God. Certainly, it is arrogant to imitate God? Imitators of God. Certainly, it is arrogant. As dear children. You are called a son: if you scorn imitation, why do you seek inheritance?

Let the sinner forgive the sinner.

I would say this if you had no sin, which you desire to be forgiven. But now, whoever you are, you are human: you may be just, but you are human; you may be a layperson, but you are human; you may be a monk, but you are human; you may be a cleric, but you are human; you may be a bishop, but you are human; you may be an apostle, but you are human. Hear the voice of the apostle: If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves. Who said this? He, he, he, John the evangelist, whom the Lord Christ loved above others, who reclined on His chest, he said: If we say: he did not say: If you say that you have no sin; but: If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. He joined himself in fault, so that he might join in pardon. If we say: see who says it: If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. But if we confess our sins, He is faithful and just, to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all iniquity. How does He cleanse? By forgiving, not as if not finding what to punish, but finding what to forgive. Therefore, if we have sins, brothers, let us forgive the penitent. Let us not retain enmity in our hearts. For retaining enmity more corrupts our very heart.

Forgiveness is sought from God in prayer with the agreement of giving forgiveness to others.

I will, therefore, you to be forgiving, because I hold one asking for forgiveness. You are asked, forgive: you are asked, and you will ask; you are asked, forgive; just as you ask that it be forgiven. Behold, the time of prayer will come: I will hold you to the words you will say. You will say: Our Father who art in heaven. For you will not be among the sons, if you do not say: Our Father. So you will say: Our Father who art in heaven. Continue: Hallowed be thy name. Still say: Thy kingdom come. Still continue: Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven. See what you add: Give us this day our daily bread. Where are your riches? Behold, you beg. Nevertheless, say still after: Give us this day our daily bread. Still say what follows: Forgive us our debts. You have come to my words: Forgive us our debts. Therefore do what follows. Forgive us our debts. By what right? by what agreement? by what covenant? by what declared bond? As we also forgive our debtors. It is little that you do not forgive: you also lie to God. The condition is set, the law is fixed: Forgive, as I forgive. Therefore, He does not forgive unless you forgive. Forgive, as I forgive. You want to be forgiven, forgive the one asking you. These prayers the heavenly Jurist has dictated: He does not deceive you; ask according to heavenly law: say: Forgive, as we also forgive; and do what you say. He who lies in prayers lacks the benefit: he who lies in prayers both loses the cause and finds punishment. And if someone lies to the Emperor, when he comes, he is convicted because he lies; but when you lie in prayer, you are convicted in the very prayer. For God does not seek witnesses from you to convict you. He who dictated the prayers to you is your advocate: if you lie, He is your witness; if you do not correct yourself, He will be your judge: Therefore both say, and do. Because if you do not say, you do not obtain by requesting against the law: but if you say and do not do, you will also be guilty of lying. This verse cannot be passed over unless what you say is fulfilled. Can we delete this verse from our prayer? Or do you want it to be there: Forgive us our debts: and delete what follows: As we also forgive our debtors? You will not delete it, lest you are first deleted.

In prayer, therefore, you say: Give; you say: Forgive: to receive what you do not have, and to be released from what you have transgressed. You want to receive, give; you want to be forgiven, forgive. It is a brief summary. Hear Christ Himself elsewhere: Forgive, and you will be forgiven; give, and it will be given to you. Forgive, and you will be forgiven. What will you forgive? What others have sinned against you. What will be forgiven to you? What you have sinned. And you: Give, and it will be given to you. Those who desire eternal life, support the temporal life of the poor, sustain the temporal life of the poor, and for this very small and earthly seed, you will receive the harvest of eternal life. Amen.

SERMON 114/A On the Words of the Gospel, Luke 17:34 "Forgive, and you will be forgiven" That it is "seven times." The beginning of faith is from God.

We have heard a most health-giving commandment from the holy Gospel, that we should forgive the sin of the brother who has sinned against us. Let it not suffice to have done this once, but whenever he sins, it must be forgiven, if he asks for pardon. Therefore, he says: If he sins against you seven times in a day, and seven times in a day he turns back to you saying: I repent, forgive him. If you understand "seven times in a day," therefore, it means whenever; for indeed the number seven is often used to represent completeness. Hence that: A righteous man will fall seven times and rise again; that is, whenever he is humbled by some tribulation, he is not abandoned, but is delivered from all his troubles. Hence it is also written: I will praise you seven times a day; for "seven times a day" means always. Therefore, "seven times a day" is the same as what is said elsewhere: His praise shall continually be in my mouth. For we do not only praise the Lord with our tongue, and when we are silent, we do not praise Him; indeed, in all our good thoughts, in all our actions and good manners, we praise Him from whom we are glad to have received these. For we also see the Apostles requesting that their faith be increased. Did they give themselves the first fruits of faith, and then ask the Lord for its increase? By no means. Therefore, they requested that He who began it may Himself perfect it, according to the Apostle who says: For he who began a good work in you will perfect it until the end. And what we have just sung, beloved, what does it show? Lead me, O Lord, in Your way, and I will walk in Your truth. He does not say: Lead me to Your way; for He also does this; but not, when He has led to the way, does He abandon. It is therefore less to have led to the way, unless it is followed by leading in the way, and culminates in leading to the homeland. Therefore, since we have all good things from God, in all our good works, when we think of the giver of all good things, we praise God endlessly: and when, if we live well, we praise God endlessly, let us bless the Lord at all times, and let His praise be continually in our mouth for this reason. He says: I will praise you seven times a day: signifying completeness by the number seven. The parable of the merciless debtor towards his debtor.

Therefore, if your brother sins against you seven times in a day and comes and says, "I repent," forgive him. Do not grow weary of always forgiving the penitent. If you were not a debtor, you could be a harsh creditor without consequence; but because you are a debtor who has a debtor, and furthermore you are a debtor to Him who has no debt, consider what you will do with your debtor: for this is what God will do with His. Listen and be afraid: "Let my heart rejoice, so that I may fear Your name." If you rejoice when you are forgiven, fear to forgive. For the same Savior shows what you should fear when He presents the servant in the Gospel with whom the lord reckoned and found him a debtor of ten thousand talents. He ordered him to be sold and all that he had, and to be repaid. He, falling at the feet of his lord, began to plead for an extension, and deserved remission. But he, going out from the presence of his lord, with all his debt forgiven, found his fellow servant who owed him a hundred denarii and began to violently demand payment. When his heart rejoiced at being forgiven, he did not fear the name of his Lord God. The servant said to his fellow servant what the servant had said to the Lord: "Have patience with me, and I will repay you." But he replied, "No, you will repay today." It was reported to the master of the house; and, as you know, he not only threatened that he would not forgive him in the future if he found a debtor, but he also reinstated the entire debt he had forgiven and ordered him to repay all that he had given. Therefore, how much we must fear, my brothers, if we have faith, if we believe the Gospel, if we do not think the Lord is a liar? Let us fear, let us watch, let us beware, let us forgive. For what do you lose by forgiving? You grant pardon, not money.

You use money well if you do not love it.

Although even in distributing money, you should not be dry trees. In distributing money, you give to the needy; in granting pardon, you forgive the sinner; the Lord sees both, rewards both, and commended both in one place: "Forgive, and you will be forgiven; give, and it will be given to you." But you neither forgive nor distribute: you hold onto anger, you keep your money. Observe, anger, where you cannot be freed by money: "Treasures will not profit the wicked." This is not my judgment, but divine judgment: those who have read know. I read to speak, I believed to express: treasures will not profit the wicked. They seem to profit, but they will not. Perhaps in the present: perhaps, if they profit somewhat; but on that day, they will not profit. They may be held and will not profit; they may be despised and will profit. You will use righteousness well if you love it: because if you do not love it, you will not have it. You will use strength, temperance, chastity, charity, and other virtues of the mind well if you love them: you will use money well if you do not love it. Finally, if money is loved, let it be stored in heaven; if it is feared to be lost, let it be kept in a safer place. For your servant does not keep faith with you in guarding money, and your Lord deceives you. Do you not hear Him saying: "Store up for yourselves treasure in heaven?" Behold, He did not command you to lose, but to migrate: "Store up for yourselves treasure in heaven, where a thief does not approach, nor does a moth corrupt; for where your treasure is, there your heart will be also." You store up treasure on earth, you place your heart on earth. What will happen to your heart on earth? It decays, it rots, it turns to ashes. Lift up what you love, and love it there. And do not think that you will receive what you place: for you place mortal things, you will receive immortal things; you place temporal things, you will receive eternal things; you place earthly things, you will receive heavenly things; finally, you distribute what your Lord has given you, and you will receive a reward from your Lord Himself. The poor porters carried money into heaven. But you will say: How will I be placed in heaven? By what machines am I going to ascend into heaven with my gold and silver? Why do you seek machines? Migrate. Your carriers are the poor, and through the contrition of the world, they have become carriers. Finally, you are making a transfer: here you give, and there you receive. Certainly, if you give here, you will receive there, and from whom you give, from that one you will receive. Let not only a ragged beggar come to your mind; but let this come to your mind: "When you did it to one of the least of these my brothers, you did it to me." In the poor, He receives, who made the poor: from the rich, He receives, who made the rich; for what He gave, from that He receives; you give from His, not from yours, to Christ. Why do you boast, because you have found much here? Reflect on how you came. You have found everything here; and if you use the many things found poorly, pride has swelled in you. Did you not come forth naked from your mother's womb? Therefore, give, give, lest you lose what you have. If you give, you will find there: if you do not give, you will leave it here; however, whether you give or do not give, you are going to migrate. But sometimes, even if it is ridiculous and to be condemned and rejected from the ears of the faithful, nevertheless avarice unwilling to distribute to the poor from its abundance has some excuse. For it says to itself: If I give, I will not have; and by giving much, I will be in need: and later I will seek from whom I myself may receive. It must abound for me, not only for sustenance and covering, and for my house and family, but also for good cases, so that I may have what to spend on detractors, so that I may have from where to redeem: human affairs are full of cases; I ought to keep for myself, from where I can liberate myself. The precept of granting forgiveness does not hinder discipline.

You say these things when you wish to save money; what will you say when you do not wish to grant forgiveness to the sinner? If you are reluctant to give money to the needy, give forgiveness to the penitent. What do you lose if you give? I know what you lose, I know what you miss; I see, but you lose for your own good: you lose anger, you lose indignation, you lose hatred of your brother from your heart. Let these remain there, where will you be? Anger, lasting indignation, hatred, what does it make of you? What evil does it not do to you? Listen to Scripture: He who hates his brother is a murderer. Therefore, even if he sins against me seven times in a day, shall I forgive him? Forgive. Christ said this, the truth said this, to whom you sang: Lead me, Lord, in your way, and I will walk in your truth. Do not fear, he does not deceive you. But you will say, there will be no discipline; all sins will always be unpunished; for it is always pleasing to sin, when he who sins thinks you will always forgive. It is not so. Both discipline should be vigilant, and kindness should not slumber. For do you think you are returning evil for evil when you give discipline to the sinner? God forbid: you return good for evil; and then you do not do well, if you do not give it. Sometimes even discipline itself is tempered with gentleness: it has been given. But is it another thing to extinguish it by negligence, and another to temper it with gentleness? Let discipline be vigilant: forgive, and strike. Look at the Lord himself, listen to the Lord himself, think to whom we, daily beggars, say: Forgive us our debts. And do you suffer tedium when your brother continually says to you: Forgive me, penitent? How often do you say this to God? Do you cease from this supplication in every prayer? Do you want God to say to you: Behold, I forgave yesterday, I forgave the day before yesterday, I forgave through so many days; how often do I still forgive? Do you not want him to say to you: You always come with those words, you always say: Forgive us our debts, you always beat your chest; and like hard iron, you do not amend. But because we were discussing discipline, does not the Lord our God forgive us because we say with faith: Forgive us our debts? And yet, although he forgives us, what is said of him? what is written of him? For whom the Lord loves, he corrects. But perhaps with words? He scourges every son he receives. Let the sinner son not be angry when scourged and corrected, and the only-begotten without sin was worthy to be scourged. Therefore give discipline, but from the heart dismiss anger. For thus the Lord himself said, when he dealt with the debtor, to whom he returned all the debt, because he was inhumane to his fellow servant: So also will your heavenly Father do to you, if you do not forgive each one his brother from your hearts. Where God sees, there forgive; do not lose charity from there, exercise healthy severity; love and strike, love and beat. For sometimes you flatter, and sometimes you are harsh. How do you flatter and are harsh? Because you do not reprove sins; and those sins will destroy him, whom you love perversely by sparing. Consider what your sometimes harsh, sometimes hard word, which will harm, is going to do. Sin devastates the heart, demolishes the inner parts, suffocates the soul, destroys the soul: have mercy, strike.

Sometimes one who is harsh acts more mercifully than one who spares.

Set before yourselves, beloved, in order to understand more clearly what I speak of, two men. A careless little boy wanted to sit where they knew a serpent was hidden in the grass. If he sat, he would be bitten and would die; two men knew this. One said: Do not sit there. He was ignored; he would go to sit, he would go to perish. Another said: He does not want to listen to us; he must be reprimanded, seized, torn away, struck with a blow: let us do whatever we can to save him. Another said: Let him go, do not strike, do not offend, do not harm. Which of these is merciful? The one who spares, so that the man dies by the serpent; or the one who rages, so that the man is saved? And so understand, those who are under your authority, even if you correct them; impose discipline with morals, maintain kindness. Forgive from the heart, let there be no anger within; because recent anger is a thin and seemingly contemptible splinter; recent anger disturbs the eye, like a splinter in the eye: My eye was troubled in anger; but that splinter is nourished by suspicions, strengthened by the passage of time; that splinter will turn into a beam. Old anger becomes hatred; when there is hatred, there will be homicide: Whoever hates his brother is a murderer, it says. And sometimes people with hatred in their hearts rebuke those who are angry. You hold hatred, do you reprimand the angry? You see the splinter in your brother's eye, you do not see the beam in your own. The sermon is concluded. Let the Lord be invoked, that He may deign to grant what He commands: Forgive, and you will be forgiven; give, and it will be given to you.

Sermons - Sermon 114B

Sermon 114/B Sermon of Saint Augustine on the chapter of the Gospel where the coming of the Lord is proclaimed on the last day About the latest coming of the Lord. The Gospel reading, most beloved, which we have now heard, not indeed prepared by us - as is usually done - but nevertheless by the ordination of the Lord, who governs our actions, strongly resonates with this psalm about which we have decided to speak to your charity. For the Lord was speaking about His final advent and the end of the world, and He had already recalled many terrible things that human affairs must endure insofar as the end approaches. Next, accusing those who wish to live securely, not in the realm of security, He frightfully terrified them; saying that the coming of the Son of Man to that judgment - dreadful for all, but yet also desired by the pious faithful - saying therefore that His advent would be as it was in the days of Noah, gravely troubled every heart, if faith is there: For just as, He says, in the days of Noah, they were eating and drinking, marrying and being given in marriage, buying and selling, while the ark was being built by Noah, and the flood came and destroyed them all. For they pursued a harmful security, all secular joys, and were delighted in these things, until Noah entered the ark, and the flood found them naked and destitute. Thus saying this, He now terrified every soul, but we have time for awakening. The day of judgment is not yet, the flood is not yet; still the incorruptible wood is being cut down from the forest, still the ark is being built. The construction of the ark in the days of Noah was a proclamation of salvation. For if they were foolish, and perished deservedly by their own madness and contempt, who did not say in their heart: "Not without cause does this servant of God, just, acceptable to God and wise, construct so great an ark with such effort, with such works, unless he recognized that something was impending for the world. In a way, the construction of this ark is a herald proclaiming: Convert to God." For if they thought this and changed their life, and turning from impiety to God, made enough amends for their sins, groaning for His mercy, they would not perish. For God was merciful to Nineveh and would not be cruel to the whole human race, if they turned to Him. “In three days Nineveh will be overturned,” said Jonah because of their great sins. What is as brief as three days? Yet they did not despair of God's mercy in such a brief period: they believed that even three days of mourning and tears were enough to move His mercy. If then, in three days, that great city had the space to move the mercy of God, in the space of a hundred years during which the ark was being built, if those people changed their ways and habits, offering to God the sacrifice of a contrite heart to appease Him, wouldn't they without any doubt escape that destruction, unharmed from His mercy which they had invoked? Thus, a hundred years of constructing the ark condemns the three days of the Ninevites. But another one greater than Noah: see how long the time is, see from when He has been building this ark. I think, brothers, if the years are counted from when Christ began, cutting down incorruptible wood from the forest of the nations, to build and frame this ark - that is, the Church - they are found to be more than a hundred, more than two hundred, more than three hundred. And behold, so many years have passed, and still it is being built, still Noah cries out, still the construction itself cries out. It will not destroy people, except by unbelief. Let them change their ways; let them believe in God who promises so much, threatens so much, never deceiving in anything.

"Count so many past events that happened, and believe few that remain."

It would take too long to say many things from here, and due to the constraints of time and our common fragility, we hasten to the exposition of this psalm. But I would like someone to briefly tell me why they do not change their bad ways and make them good. What do they lose from it? If they believe, let them do it, because it will be true; if they doubt, let them do it, lest it be true. To those who believe, it is firm; to those who doubt, it is doubtful. I enumerate so many things from the beginning of the world until this day, which according to the Scriptures have happened, so that we read absolutely nothing in the Scriptures of God which we do not now see completed for the most part. Very few things remain: are only the false ones left? Are the few things that remain for the faithful to think about false? Brothers, what is great in this? We desire the work of a mediocre heart. Count so many past things that have happened, and believe the few that remain. The faithful person considers, because it is most firmly true; or at least they ought to consider this, lest perhaps it be true. Of the pleasant way and the narrow way. For example, you had a journey through a shortcut, and you intended to take a better road. Someone, just anyone, informed you that that road was beset by robbers. This road, which was reported to you as beset by robbers, is smooth, easy, pleasant, accommodating, and delightful; but someone informed you that it is infested by robbers and so beset that it can either not be traveled or can be traveled only with great difficulty and extreme danger. There is another road: it involves much labor, difficulty, hardness, and narrowness; delights are not only not found there, but barely adequate human kindness is shown. Doesn't your heart immediately tell you, wanting to gain a few days of this life and looking forward to the life eventually ending: "It is better to go this way; although with labor and difficulty and want, although with the grinding down of either ourselves or our animals, still it is better to go this way"? Why is it better? Because it is safer. Now someone, wishing to lead you through that delightful road, says to you: "And did you so quickly believe the one who said this road is beset by robbers?" If you know a trustworthy person - and perhaps someone known to you so well that he has never deceived you - what will you reply? "That man cannot deceive me; I know the man, I have experienced him as a serious person, I have many instances of his reliability: he has always told me the truth, he has never lied." But if you knew the man was like that: let's consider a different case, where someone did not know him. Wouldn't this person also say: "Indeed, I do not know the man and I do not know how truthful he might be: he may be telling the truth, he may be lying; nevertheless, because of the doubt itself, lest perhaps what he says is true, why do I not rather endure the laborious hardship, than undertake the delightful road with danger?" The Word of God shows us the way of salvation.

Alas, my brothers, we are Christians; we all wish to make a journey; even if we do not wish it, we are making a journey: no one is permitted to remain here, all who come into this life are compelled to pass through the transient nature of time. There is no place for idleness: walk, lest you be dragged. We are met in our journey and as if at a certain road junction by a certain man, not just a man, but God-made-man for the sake of men; he said to us: "Do not go this way; it indeed seems easy and light and delightful, this well-worn and broad path, but the end of this way brings destruction. Since you neither are allowed nor is it beneficial for you to stand and dwell here, you must go, but go this way: you will walk through certain difficulties, but once those difficulties are quickly ended, you will come to a great expanse of joys, and you will escape those traps from which no one who willingly walks that other way escapes." This was said by the one – I believe known to us, if faith is within us. Or is it still pleasing to test the faith of this one? Let us recall past times and the ancient Scriptures. Is not this man the Word of God? Was not this Word later made flesh and dwelt among us? But before being made flesh and dwelling among us, did it not speak through patriarchs and prophets? See what they have foretold to humankind.

We see that the things which God promised have been fulfilled.

God certainly spoke with His word to Abraham, that his offspring would first be - although he, to whom it was spoken, was already old - that offspring would first come from aged Abraham and old, barren Sarah: it was believed, it happened; that this offspring, that is, the people born from him according to the flesh, would be in servitude in Egypt and for how many years: it happened; that they would be freed from that captivity: they were freed; that they would receive the promised land: they received it. Many things were spoken through the prophets; it was said to Abraham himself not only to attend to that people, but, "In your seed," he said, "all nations shall be blessed." Near prophecies were spoken; distant ones were spoken: near prophecies were fulfilled; what was prophesied for the distant future is now happening. The word of God spoke through the prophets that nation would sin, be handed over to the hands of their enemies, because they had offended the Lord: all these things happened; that they would enter into Babylonian captivity: and this too happened; that from there the Christ King would come: Christ came, Christ was born; because he himself foretold that he would come, Christ came. It was said that the Jews would crucify him: they crucified him. It was foretold that he would resurrect and be glorified: it happened; he resurrected, he ascended into heaven. It was foretold that in his name the whole earth would believe, it was foretold that kings would persecute his Church: these things happened. It was foretold that kings would believe in him: we already hold the faith of kings, and do we doubt the faith of Christ? The dissensions of heresies were also foretold: do we not see them too, and groan surrounded by them on all sides? It was foretold that pagans would press the Church for idols: and it happened; it was foretold that the idols themselves would be destroyed through the Church and the name of Christ: and we see this being fulfilled. Scandals were foretold in the very Church, tares were foretold, husks were foretold: we see all these things with our eyes and endure them with whatever strength is given by the Lord. In what did this one who told you, "Go this way," deceive you? Say confidently, if you are faithful, taking so many experiences of this one who speaks to you - test him by deeds, because he has condescended to be tested in this way. Say: "He certainly tells me the truth, I hold all his words true, in nothing has he lied. I know him as such, he is the word of God. He spoke through the mouths of servants, and he did not deceive; can he lie in what he says through his own mouth?" But he who is not yet known to him, who still doubts about Christ, let him also say: "I will go this way, lest perhaps he who the whole world has already believed tells the truth"; and yet it will happen as he himself foretold. The gifts of Christ are to be desired.

Brothers, many unbelievers will be found on the last day just as that multitude was found in the days of Noah. None escaped except those who were in the ark. Therefore, make yourselves like this: the hands of the craftsman are here, Christ is building the ark. Fit yourselves to him, give yourselves to his hands, be shaped, be joined together; let no one reject the fingers of this artisan. His grace knows how to shape you; just do not be rotten wood of perverse pride. So it will be; however, my brothers, many mock these things.

I see the constraints of time withdrawing the exposition of the psalm from me. For I do not wish to neglect the entrusted passage of the Gospel, as much as the Lord suggests. Therefore, for now, if it pleases your charity, let us defer the psalm. It is not drawn out; soon will come the task they call for. We also have an editor, to whom we may convene. If the people from that broad way, mocking and scoffing at that faithful guide of the journey, run to see the task they are not receiving - and whoever should receive it, deceives themselves; yet to that which they are not receiving, they run thus, and thus they converge - how much more eagerly ought we to convene, to receive what we shall witness! If from me, to prevent you from convening, nothing is poorer; but if from Him from whom I also, nothing is richer, that poor one for us is nothing richer. Let us all receive from Him, let us all rejoice in Him. And if perhaps what He graciously deigns to give He shows through me to you, love even the servant of the editor, but for the sake of the editor, for I also, brothers, in Him and for Him, love you. For outside of Him we all are nothing. May the day of the Lord find us prepared.

Therefore, I will briefly not remain silent about what from the Gospel reading might perhaps be obscure to someone, with the Lord's help. Let people be afraid, lest they be found in such a condition on that last day. Let us be afraid, my brothers. We are exulting now, we are rejoicing, we are acclaiming. I ask you: let that day find us prepared. He who says that does not lie, he has never lied; if you still doubt, be mindful that it might indeed be true. But one of you might say to me: "Then it is necessary for it to enter into the heart of the faithful"; for in saying these things now I am not making all like those the Lord spoke of: If anyone does not take up his cross and follow me, or I am not making all like those the Lord spoke of: If you wish to be perfect, go, sell all you have, give to the poor, and you shall have treasure in heaven, and come, follow me. Brothers, must we indeed fear that path, where the guide says: Follow me? I know that not all, or certainly many whom I address, will suddenly become such. Therefore, now because it has been heard from the thunder of the Gospel - if there are faithful hearts that tremble -, because it was said: In the days of Noah it was so, they were eating, drinking, marrying, giving in marriage, buying, selling, until Noah entered the ark, and the flood came and destroyed them all, many say to themselves: "We are commanded to wait for that day, and not to be found like those who were found outside the ark and perished in the flood. Certainly, the word of God terrifies us, the trumpet of the Gospel terrifies us. What do we do, if a wife must not be taken?" - a young man, some youth says this -, "must we not eat, must we not drink, must we always fast?" Many say such things. And someone who perhaps wanted to buy something says to himself: "Now nothing should be purchased, lest I be found among those who perished?"

One must not despair about the salvation of the rich.

What then do we do if it is so? We must weep, just as the apostles were saddened for the human race, when they heard the Lord saying what perfection is: Sell all your possessions and come, follow me, for the one to whom it was said went away sorrowful. And when he called Him a good master, from whom he sought advice on eternal life, the master seemed good until he said what was asked of him. He spoke, and saddened. As he went away sad, the Lord followed and said: How difficult it is for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven! Difficult, but still difficult. The Lord added an example, and what he called difficult he pronounced impossible. He said, It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven. As if he closed the door against the rich. What will happen, what will happen? It is closed: Knock, and it shall be opened to you. "From where, he says, shall we knock?" From where, but with hands? "What does it mean: from where, but with hands?" From where, but with deeds? Let us see, brothers, if the Lord has provided a place for the rich through such deeds. Let us speak from the Scriptures, lest we be found not as announcers but as flatterers. First, the same Lord in that very place: . For the disciples were saddened because the Lord said this. And they were certainly not saddened for themselves, for they had left everything and were following the Lord. And saddened, what did they say? Who then can be saved? Now here I ask the apostles: O chief members of Christ, o pillars of that resurrection to be established, why thus, why who then can be saved? Is there despair about the rich? The rich are few, thousands of the poor can be saved. What did the Lord say? It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven. Did he say: "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a man to enter the kingdom of heaven"? He said: rich man. I will quickly say, brothers – indeed we all wish well, for this is commanded and this is hoped for, but nevertheless I notice in the Scriptures a future heap of chaff to be consumed by fire, and I can say: Would that as few were destined for the fire as there are rich people! Behold, brothers, in this whole populace who hears these words, how many are rich? I did not say this so that they would go into the fire; but as many as are going and those who are going, would that they could be so few as the rich are few in the human race! But now both from the number of the rich many will enter the kingdom of heaven, and from the number of the poor many will go into eternal fire. Until I open this to a few, heed. In the camel a certain figure of Christ is recognized. The Lord said it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven. And the disciples were saddened and said: Who then can be saved? As they considered the multitudes of the poor and so few rich in the human race. But what? They wisely considered not who was wealthy in resources, but who burned with greed. I do not know anyone called rich with all abundance who appears so. But he who holds all that for nothing, despising these things and truly possessing holds them, not being held by them, just as it is written: His hope is in the Lord his God; not arrogant, not boastful, not overpowering to oppress the poor, not greedy, not yearning for others' possessions, not wrongly guarding and hoarding his own, but truly rich towards God and not counting the riches themselves unless the giver of riches. Such a one is both rich and enters the kingdom of heaven. For the disciples having been saddened, the Lord said: "What is difficult for men, is easy for God. You were troubled by the difficulty, because I mentioned a camel through the eye of a needle, and truly difficult and impossible for men, (but) very easy for God. If he wishes, he can also pass that very large beast, which is called a camel, through the eye of a needle." And he deigned to do this himself, and therefore even a rich man can enter the kingdom of heaven, because for his sake the camel went through the eye of a needle. What does this mean? Let us see, if it is apparent. For not without reason John the Baptist, the herald of the Lord, had a garment of camel's hair, because, he who came after the judge to whom he preceded, almost had a cloak from it. I plainly recognize with the mention of the camel a certain figure of my Lord; I recognize greatness, and yet with a humble neck, I recognize greatness, whom no one would burden with sufferings unless he himself laid down on the ground. I also see the eye of the needle, through which so great a one entered. In the needle, I understand puncture, in the puncture suffering, in the eye constriction. Therefore now the camel has entered through the eye of a needle: let the rich not despair, about to follow into the kingdom of heaven.

"God does not regard capability but willingness." But what kind of rich men? Behold, I do not know whether someone from the sidelines, clothed in rags, rejoiced and smiled when it was said that a rich man does not enter the kingdom of heaven. "I," he said, "will enter. These rags will serve me; those who harm us, who oppress us, will not enter." Indeed, such people will not enter, but see whether you will enter. What if you are poor and greedy, what if you are oppressed by poverty and burn with avarice? Therefore, if you are such, whoever you are, poor man, you did not want to be rich, but you could not. "Peace," he says, "on earth to men of goodwill." Therefore, God does not look at your wealth, but at your will. Consider what your heart is full of, not what your chest is empty of. So if you are of a bad life, with a bad desire, withdraw from the number of God's poor; you will not be among those of whom it is said: "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." Behold, I find such a rich man—from whose comparison you boasted and dared to aspire to the kingdom of heaven—I find a poor man in spirit, that is, humble, pious, following the will of God, and, if he has perhaps lost some of that abundance, immediately saying: "The Lord gave, the Lord has taken away: blessed be the name of the Lord." O gentle rich man, not resisting the will of God, truly rejoicing from that land of the living! For "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." But you may be insolent, having nothing in your storeroom, yet in the fantasy of desires you dream of vain treasures. Rather, this man, this rich man will enter; against you, the kingdom of heaven will be closed, because it will be closed against the greedy, against the proud and covetous. "But indeed the widow who put two mites into the treasury was poor!" Yes indeed: that widow was poor, but Zacchaeus was rich. Did the widow enter, and Zacchaeus was excluded? Rather, the kingdom is truly of the liberated, because it is given equally to both the poor and the rich. In that kingdom, Zacchaeus will not be richer than that widow, even if he gave more here than she did. For he gave half of his goods to the poor, she gave two mites. They had different means, but they had equal charity.

Paul teaches the rich the way by which entry is made into the kingdom of heaven. So the rich man enters the kingdom of heaven. Listen to how he is described; how the way is made for him, how he is called to enter, listen those of you who possess worldly wealth, listen and do something before the flood, listen to the apostle writing to Timothy: Command the rich of this age. And as if he had asked what [or what] the Lord commanded: "Sell all you have, give to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven, and come with me, follow the Lord" - the Lord had already commanded this: let him hold Christ as the commander, who holds Him as the promise-giver. Whoever wishes, let him do it; let him undertake what was heard from the Lord. To others the apostle says - and through the apostle the Lord: Or do you seek proof of the Christ who speaks in me? What then? Command, he says, the rich of this age, what is the head of evil, what is feared in riches, not to be arrogant. Let us briefly describe this. The rich man easily says, "Bad servant"; he speaks arrogantly and, unless he says so, perhaps does not rule his house. Often he rules more with a terrible word than with a cruel blow. He says this, perhaps the necessity of ruling the house compels him to say it: let him not say it inwardly, let him not say it in his heart, let him not say it in the eyes and ears of God; let him not think himself better because he is rich; let him consider the frailty of his flesh, with garments laid aside. What shall I say, brothers, what shall I say? Let him consider, if all those external ornaments were removed, what kind of rich man he could be, because he is flesh and blood, because he came from the same lump from Adam and Eve, but the rich man cannot consider this: it is difficult to take away all those ornaments from him. It is not to be desired that they be taken away, it was to be desired that they be cast off. Therefore, it is difficult to persuade him what he is, surrounded by all these things. Let him consider himself in his mother's womb, once naked and needy, just like that poor man; he received other clothing upon being born; what he received will remain here, as it was not brought here. Thinking this, the rich man is poor in spirit within, that is, he breathes out pride, he humbles himself. And if he has a terrible face towards those whom it is necessary for him to rule, yet within he has a humble heart before the eyes of God, and he knows with what conscience he strikes his breast. But see if what follows appears in them. For he did not say this: Do not be arrogant, and then stopped; for every rich man would respond to you: "God knows that I am not arrogant; and if I shout, and if I say something harsh, God knows my conscience, that I say these things out of necessity of ruling, not to exalt myself over others" - as if therefore more powerful, because richer. God sees these things within. Let us see what follows. He says, Do not be arrogant, nor hope in the uncertainty of riches. Even here he may still be allowed to speak; and whether he speaks the truth, God alone can see, whether he does not trust in what he has, whether he does not place his hope there; for it follows: But in the living God, who richly provides us with everything for our enjoyment.

Since the time is short, let us be rich in good works.

"And then what?" he says. Let them be rich in good works. This already emerges and is visible to the eyes of men; it cannot be hidden. Either it is done and appears, or it is not done and there is no way to lie. Let them be rich in good works, generous, and willing to share. Humility is apparent there. You have: let it be shared with him who does not have. Share. And for what good? Let them store up a good foundation for themselves for the future, so that they may obtain true life. If they are such rich people, let them be secure: when the last day comes, they will be found in the ark, they will be in the building, they will not belong to the perdition of the flood; let them not fear because they are rich. And if he is young and cannot control himself, he is allowed to marry. Will the last day find him among those of whom it was said: "They were marrying"? It will not find him so, if it finds him as the apostle says. Behold how he joins them in the ark who feared. For the apostle says: "From now on, brothers, the time is short." And what follows? "It remains that those who have wives be as though they had none, and those who buy as though they did not possess, and those who weep as though they did not weep, and those who rejoice as though they did not rejoice, and those who use this world as though they did not use it: for the form of this world is passing away." I want you to be without anxiety. Brothers, if you want to be secure, do not base your happiness on these things. And if some duty or necessity of weakness compels you to make use of these things, do not trust in them, do not cling to them, reckon them among transitory and temporal things. For all these things pass away like a river of things. You see that all those adversities that press upon human matters cut down all these superfluous things.

Bad times run!

Brothers, every day there is grumbling against God: "Bad times and hard times." Nonsense is being punished, as we were saying: "Bad times, hard times, troublesome times"; and yet gifts are being given. They are bad, they are hard: let them correct them. You call the time hard? How much harder are you, who are not corrected by hard times! Such insanity of pomp still thrives, such superfluities are still coveted! Greed has no end, not even when it is cut. I ask, with what things, with what actions do they wish for prosperity, for what security do they desire? Let some security be given: we will see how many diseases will emerge, how much luxury will overflow, greater than now. Security and peace, for the sake of theaters and organs and flutes and pantomimes! You wish to misuse what you desire, therefore you do not receive it. Listen, listen to the apostolic voice, much freer than mine is - for I know how many I offend; consider me more timid: I do not dare to harm. ■flictum Listen to what you do not want to hear from the apostle: You desire and do not have - these are apostolic words -; you kill and covet, and you cannot obtain; you quarrel and fight, and you do not have; you ask, and you do not receive, because you ask wrongly, that you may spend it on your passions. Certainly, he did not flatter anyone; in many rotting parts, the iron reached to the living flesh. Let us be healed, brothers, let us correct ourselves, let us correct ourselves: he who came and was mocked is coming back, and he is still mocked because he came; he is coming again, and there will be no time for mocking. My brothers, let us correct ourselves: behold, better times will come, and behold, they will come now. What do you hope for here? Change your place, change your dwelling: "Lift up your hearts." What do you hope for here? The human race has arisen, it has reached a certain youth - these things flourished in the world -, it is declining into old age, it is now near decrepitude. What do you hope for here? Seek something else. Are you seeking rest? You seek a good thing: seek it in its own land. One place is where he descended to you, another is where he commands you to ascend. Do not hope for times other than those read in the Gospel; I do not say this or that: the books of the Lord are on sale every day, the reader reads; buy for yourself and read when you have time, or rather make time: for it is better to make time for this than for trifles. Read what has been foretold up to the end of the world, and believe yourself, do not flatter yourself. Things are not bad because Christ has come, but because they were harsh and bad, he came who would console.

Christ our physician.

Listen, my brothers: it was necessary that such times should come, distressing and harsh. What would we have done if such a great comforter had not been present? The human race was bound to suffer gravely. Like a physician taking charge of one great patient, from Adam until the end, that is, taking charge of the entire wounded human race - since from the time we were born, from the time we were cast out of paradise, indeed illness has existed, but at the end it was bound to be greater, and perhaps near to health for some, near to death for others. Therefore, when the human race was suffering illness, that great physician taking charge of the patient, lying in a certain great bed, the entire world, just like a most skilled physician, observed the times of the ill one, and saw and foresaw what was to come, since he himself managed that same illness on account of his justice to avenge our sin. Therefore, during the milder times of our illness, the physician himself first sent his servants to inspect us, he sent the prophets. They spoke, they preached; he cured some through them and healed them. They predicted a certain great fever to come in the final stages of the illness, and a certain great agitation of this patient, which would require the presence of the physician himself. Therefore, our physician said this: "In the last time, the sick will be more strongly and vigorously agitated, for whose treatment I must come at that time; I will restore, I will comfort, I will exhort, I will promise, I will heal the believer." Thus it was. He came, he became man, sharing in our mortality, so that we might be able to share in his immortality. And still the patient is agitated. And when he breathes heavily in fever and greatly burns, he says to himself: "Since this physician came, I suffer harsher fevers, I am more severely agitated. Oh tremendous burns, from where did they come to me? I think he entered the house with an unlucky step." Thus say all those who still suffer from vanity. Why do they still suffer from vanity? Because they do not want to receive the potion of sobriety from him. You see those miserable ones being agitated by their cares and various tribulations and terrors of the world, and saying: "Since Christ came, we suffer these times; since there are Christians, the world fails in everything." Oh foolish patient, not because the physician came has your illness become graver, but the physician came because your illness was bound to become graver: he foresaw it, he did not cause it; he came, however, to comfort you and make you truly healthy.

Let us be cured willingly so that we are not tormented unwillingly. For what is taken from you, what is removed but the superfluous? For you were craving harmful things; the things you craved were not beneficial for your fever. Is the physician harsh because he snatches harmful fruits from the patient's hand? What does he take from you but the dangerous indulgence which you desired to indulge to the destruction of your innards? And this, that you groan and murmur, pertains to his medicine. He wishes to cure you, lest you suffer unwillingly. The times must be harsh. Why? So that earthly happiness is not loved. It is entirely necessary - it is medicinal - that this life be disturbed, so that another life is loved. Behold, if there is so much lethargy still clinging to earthly things, still madness in the theaters, what if everything smiled upon vanity, what if your trivialities were struck nowhere? Behold, so many bitterness mixed in, and the world is still sweet. Come on, my most beloved brothers, I beseech you by the Lord, by his cross, by his blood, by his love, by his humility, by his majesty, I beseech and adjure you, not to hear these things in vain, not to think we stand in this place truly as if for a spectacle. His mercy knows, under whose eyes we thus tremble, that we are led by the duty of love, to say these things to you, and compelled by that fear by which we know we ourselves shall give an account to the Lord for all things.

Sermons - Sermon 115

SERMO 115 ABOUT THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO LUKE 18:1-17 "One must always pray, and not lose heart," etc.

CONCERNING THE TWO WHO WENT UP TO THE TEMPLE That they might pray; concerning the little children brought to Christ Faith is necessary for praying and vice versa. The reading of the holy Gospel edifies us to pray and to believe, and not to presume of ourselves, but of the Lord. What greater encouragement to pray is there than that the likeness of the unjust judge should be set before us? For the unjust judge, neither fearing God nor respecting man, yet heard the widow who appealed to him, conquered by weariness, not inclined by piety. If therefore he who hated what he was asked heard, how much more does He hear who encourages us to ask? Therefore, when the Lord persuaded us by this comparison from contrary: that it is necessary to always pray and not to lose heart, He added and said: Nevertheless, when the Son of Man comes, will He find faith on earth? If faith fails, prayer perishes. For who prays for what one does not believe? Hence also the blessed Apostle, when he exhorted to prayer, said: Whoever calls on the name of the Lord will be saved. And to show that faith is the source of prayer, and that the stream cannot go where the head of the water is dried up, he added and said: But how will they call on Him in whom they have not believed? Therefore, to pray, let us believe; and to ensure that the faith by which we pray does not fail, let us pray. Faith pours out prayer, prayer poured out obtains the firmness of faith. Faith, I say, pours out prayer, prayer poured out also obtains firmness even to faith itself. Indeed, lest faith fail in temptations, for this reason the Lord said: Watch and pray, lest you enter into temptation. Watch, He says, and pray, lest you enter into temptation. What is it to enter into temptation, but to depart from faith? For temptation prevails to the extent that faith fails; and temptation fails to the extent that faith prevails. For that your Charity may know more openly, that the Lord said: Watch and pray, lest you enter into temptation, concerning faith that it might not fail and perish: In that place in the Gospel He says: This night Satan has asked to sift you as wheat; but I have prayed for you, Peter, that your faith may not fail. Does He who protects pray, and not rather he who is in peril? But what the Lord said: When the Son of Man comes, do you think He will find faith on the earth? He spoke concerning faith which is perfect. For this is scarcely found on earth. Behold, the Church of God is full: who would approach here if there were no faith? Who would not transfer mountains if faith were full? Consider the very Apostles: having forsaken all their own, having trampled on the hope of the world, they would not follow the Lord unless they had great faith; and yet, if they had full faith, they would not say to the Lord: Increase our faith. See also that one confessing both about himself (see faith, and not full faith), who, having offered his son to the Lord to be healed from an evil demon, and being asked whether he believed, responded and said: I believe, Lord; help my unbelief. I believe, he says: I believe, Lord; therefore, there is faith. But help my unbelief: therefore, faith is not full. The Parable of the Pharisee and the Publican. But because faith is not of the proud, but of the humble: He spoke this parable to some who trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others: Two men went up into the temple to pray; the one a Pharisee, and the other a publican. The Pharisee said: I thank you,

God, that I am not as other men. He might have said at least, As many men. What does "as other men" mean, if not all except himself? I, he says, am righteous; the others sinners. I am not as other men, unjust, extortioners, adulterers. And behold, from the proximity of the publican there arises a greater opportunity for arrogance. As, he says, this publican. I, he says, am alone; this one is of the rest. I am not, he says, like this one, by my justices, by which I am not unrighteous. I fast twice in the week; I give tithes of all that I possess. Seek what he petitioned from God in his words, you will find nothing. He went up to pray: he did not wish to ask God, but to praise himself. It is not enough to not ask God, but to praise himself; additionally, he insults the one who asks. But the publican, standing afar off: yet he was approaching God. The consciousness of his heart kept him away, piety drew him near. The publican stood afar off: but the Lord was attentively regarding him from nearby. For the Lord is high, and regards the lowly. But the proud, such as this Pharisee, he knows from afar. He indeed knows the proud from afar, but does not forgive them. Hear further the humility of the publican. It is not enough that he stood afar off: he did not even lift his eyes up to heaven? He did not look up to be seen. He did not dare to look up: his conscience pressed him down, hope lifted him up. Hear further: He struck his breast. He exacted punishment from himself: therefore the Lord spared the one who confessed: He struck his breast, saying: Lord, be merciful to me a sinner. Behold the one who prays. Do you wonder that God forgives, when he himself acknowledges? You have heard the dispute between the Pharisee and the Publican; hear the sentence: you have heard the proud accuser, you have heard the humble accused; now hear the judge. Truly I tell you. The Truth says: God says, the judge says: Truly I tell you, that publican went down to his house justified rather than the Pharisee. Tell, Lord, the reason. Behold I see the publican descending justified from the temple rather than the Pharisee. I ask why. Do you ask why? Hear why. Because everyone who exalts himself will be humbled; and whoever humbles himself will be exalted. You have heard the sentence, beware of the evil cause: I say another thing, You have heard the sentence, beware of pride.

Against the Pelagians.

Let them see now, let those hear, who speak impiously and presume upon their own strength, let them hear who say: God made me a man, I make myself righteous. O one worse and more detestable than the Pharisee! That Pharisee indeed arrogantly called himself righteous, but nevertheless he gave thanks to God for it. He called himself righteous; but still he gave thanks to God. Thank you, God, because I am not like other men. Thank you, God: he gives thanks to God because he is not like other men: and yet he is criticized as proud and puffed up; not because he gave thanks to God, but because he desired to add nothing to himself. Thank you, because I am not like other men, unjust. Therefore you are righteous; therefore you ask for nothing; therefore you are already full; therefore human life on earth is not a temptation; therefore you are already full; therefore you already abound; therefore there is no longer a reason to say: Forgive us our debts. What then of the one who impiously opposes grace, if even the one who proudly gives thanks is criticized? The baptism of Christ is necessary for little ones. And behold, after the said controversy and the pronounced sentence, even the infants proceed, or rather are brought and offered to be touched. To be touched by whom, if not by the doctor? Certainly the healthy: to whom are infants offered to be touched? To whom? To the Savior. If to the Savior, then certainly to be saved. To whom, if not to Him who came to seek and to save what was lost? Where were they lost? As it pertains to them specifically, I see innocence, I seek the guilt. From where? I hear the Apostle: Through one man sin entered the world. Through one man, he says, sin entered the world, and through sin death; and so death passed unto all men, in whom all have sinned. Let the infants come, therefore, let them come: let the Lord be heard: "Let the little children come to me." Let the infants come, the sick to the doctor, let the lost come to the redeemer: let them come, let no one forbid them. They have committed nothing on the branch: but they were lost in the root. May the Lord bless the small with the great: let the doctor touch both the small and the great. We commend the cause of the infants to the elders. Speak for the silent, pray for the weeping. If you are not elders in vain, be their protectors: defend those who still cannot plead their own cause. The loss was common, let the discovery be common: we perished together, let us be found together in Christ. The merit is different, but the grace is common. They have nothing evil except what they drew from the fountain: they have nothing evil except what they drew from the origin. Let not those who have added much to what they drew hinder them from salvation. The older in age, the greater in iniquity. But the grace of God erases what you drew, it erases also what you added. For where sin abounded, grace abounded much more.

SERMO 116 OF THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL LUKE 24, 36-47:

"Jesus stood in the midst of them, and said to them, Peace be with you," and so forth Christ appeared in the flesh after the resurrection. The Lord appeared to His disciples after the resurrection, as you have heard, and greeted them, saying: Peace be with you. This is peace, and the greeting of salvation: for the greeting itself derives its name from salvation. But what is better than for salvation itself to greet man? For our salvation is Christ. Indeed, He is our salvation, who was wounded for us, and nailed with nails to the wood; and taken down from the wood, placed in the sepulcher. From the sepulcher, however, He rose, with His wounds healed, and His scars preserved. For He judged it beneficial for His disciples that His scars should be preserved, from which the wounds of their hearts might be healed. Which wounds? The wounds of unbelief. For He appeared to them showing His true flesh to their eyes: and they thought they saw a spirit. This is no small wound of the heart. Finally, they made a malignant heresy, those who remained in this wound. But do we not think that the disciples were wounded, because they were quickly healed? Let your Charity consider, if they had remained in this wound, believing that the buried body had not risen, but that a spirit had deceived human eyes with the image of a body: if they had remained in this faith, or rather in this perfidy, it would not be their wounds, but their death that should be mourned. The doubt of the disciples. But what does the Lord Jesus say? Why are you troubled, and why do thoughts arise in your heart? If thoughts arise in your heart, thoughts come from the earth. It is good for a man, not that a thought ascends into his heart, but that his very heart ascends upward: where the Apostle wanted to place the hearts of believers, to whom he said: If you have risen with Christ, seek the things that are above, where Christ is seated at the right hand of God; seek the things that are above, not the things on earth. For you have died, and your life is hidden with Christ in God: when Christ, who is your life, appears, then you also will appear with him in glory. In what glory? Resurrection. In what glory? Hear the Apostle speaking of this body: It is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory. This glory the Apostles would not dare to give to their Master, their Christ, their Lord: they did not believe he could raise his body from the tomb; they thought he was a spirit, and they saw the flesh, yet they did not believe their own eyes. And we believe them announcing and not showing. Behold, they did not believe Christ himself showing himself. A bad wound: let the remedies of scars come forth. Why are you troubled, and why do thoughts arise in your heart? See my hands and my feet, where I was fixed with nails. Touch and see. But you see, and do not see. Touch and see. What? Because a spirit does not have flesh and bones, as you see I have. Saying this (thus it was recited) he showed them his hands and feet.

How Christ convinced the Apostles that He had risen. And while they were still trembling and marveling with joy. There was already joy, and yet trembling remained. For indeed an incredible thing had been done, but nonetheless done. Now, is it incredible because the flesh of the Lord has risen from the tomb? The whole world has believed this: whoever has not believed, has remained unclean. Then, however, it was incredible: and it was being persuaded not only by sight, but also by touch, so that through the sense of the body faith might descend into the heart, and faith descending into the heart might be preached throughout the world, not by those seeing or touching, and yet believed without doubt. Do you have here, he said, anything to eat? How much does the good builder add to the structure of faith? He was not hungry, and he sought to eat. And he ate by power, not by necessity. Therefore, let the disciples recognize the true body, which the world recognized by their preaching.

Against the Manichaeans who deny that Christ has risen.

If by chance there are some heretics who still hold in their heart that what Christ showed to the eyes was not His true flesh; let them now set that aside, let the Gospel persuade them. We reprove them because they think this: He will condemn them if they persist in thinking this. Who are you, who does not believe that a body laid in a tomb could rise again? Are you a Manichaean? Who does not even believe He was crucified, because you do not believe He was born; you proclaim that all things He showed were false. He showed false things, and you speak the truth? You do not lie with your mouth; but He lied with His body? Behold, you think what appeared to the eyes was not real; it was a spirit, not flesh. Hear Him: He loves you, lest He condemn you. Hear Him saying: behold, He speaks to you, unhappy one; He speaks to you: Why are you troubled, and why do thoughts arise in your heart? See, He says, My hands and My feet. Handle and see, for a spirit does not have bones and flesh as you see I have. This was truth speaking, and was it deceiving? It was a body, it was flesh; what had been buried appeared. Let doubt perish, let worthy praise follow.

Christ was showing Himself as the head, He was promising His body.

He therefore shows himself to the disciples. What is "himself"? The head of his Church. The Church that was to be throughout the world was foreseen by him, not yet seen by the disciples. He was showing the head, promising the body. For what did he add following this? These are the words that I spoke to you while I was still with you. What is this, "while I was still with you"? Was he not then with them, was he not speaking with them? What is "while I was still with you"? With you as a mortal, which I am no longer. I was with you when I was about to die. What is "with you"? With those who were to die, I was to die. Now, no longer with you: because I am never again going to die with those who are to die. So this is what I was saying to you. What?

Because it was necessary that all things which are written about me in the Law and the Prophets and the Psalms be fulfilled. I told you, because it was necessary that all things be fulfilled. Then he opened their understanding. Come then, Lord, make the keys, open, so that we may understand. Behold, you say all things, and you are not believed. You are thought to be a spirit; you are touched, you are handled, and still those who touch you tremble. You admonish from the Scriptures, and still they do not understand. Hearts are closed, open, and enter. He did it: Then he opened their understanding. Open, Lord, and open the heart of him who doubts about Christ. Open the understanding of him who believes that Christ was a phantom. Then he opened their understanding, so that they might understand the Scriptures. The Church is promised to all nations. And he said to them. What? Because thus it was necessary. Because thus it is written, and thus it was necessary. What? For Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead on the third day. They saw this; they saw him suffering, they saw him hanging, they saw him present after the resurrection, living. What then did they not see? The body, that is, the Church. They saw him, but they did not see it. They saw the bridegroom, the bride was still hidden. Let him promise her also.

Thus it is written, and thus it was necessary for Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead on the third day. This is the bridegroom. The Church is promised to be among all peoples.

What of the bride? And it was preached in his name repentance and remission of sins among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. This the disciples did not yet see: the Church among all nations, starting from Jerusalem, they did not yet see. They saw the Head: and they believed about the body connected to the Head. Through what they saw, they believed what they did not see. We also are like them: we see something that they did not see; and we do not see something that they saw. What do we see that they did not see? The Church among all nations. What do we not see that they saw? Christ in the flesh. Just as they saw Him and believed in the body: so we see the body, and let us believe in the Head. Let our visions help each other. Their vision of Christ helps them to believe in the future Church: the vision of the Church helps us to believe that Christ has risen. Their faith has been fulfilled, and ours is being fulfilled: their faith was fulfilled regarding the Head, ours is being fulfilled regarding the body. The whole Christ has been revealed to them, and to us: but the whole is not seen by them, nor is the whole seen by us. The Head was seen by them, the body believed: the body is seen by us, the Head believed. Yet Christ is missing from no one: He is full in all, and the body still remains to Him. They believed, many in Jerusalem believed through them; Judea believed, Samaria believed. Let the members come, let the building approach the foundation. For no one can lay another foundation, says the Apostle, except that which is laid, which is Christ Jesus. Let the Jews rage, let them be filled with zeal: let Stephen be stoned, let Saul watch over the garments of those who stone him, let Saul become the future Apostle Paul. Let Stephen be killed, let the Jerusalem Church be disturbed: let the burning logs go forth from there, let them come and set on fire. For in a manner of speaking, the logs were burning in the Jerusalem Church with the Holy Spirit, when they had one soul and one heart in God. When Stephen was stoned, that heap endured persecution: the logs were scattered, and the world was ignited.

Saul transformed into a preacher of the Gospel.

Finally, following these things in a rage, Saul received letters from the chief priests and began to go about raging, breathing murders, thirsting for blood, dragging whomsoever he could, and wherever he could, to punishment, to satisfy himself with their blood. But where is God, where is Christ, where is the crowner of Stephen? Where, if not in heaven? He sees Saul and mocks his rage, cries out from heaven: "Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me? I am in heaven, you are on earth; yet you persecute me. You do not touch the head, but you tread on my members. But what are you doing? What do you gain? It is hard for you to kick against the goad. No matter how many kicks you deliver, you harm yourself. Therefore, abandon your rage, take up health. Abandon your evil plan, seek good help." He was struck down by that voice. Who was struck down? The persecutor. See, he was conquered by a single voice. Where were you going? Why were you raging? Whom were you seeking, now you follow; those whom you were persecuting, now for them you suffer persecution. The preacher rises up, who was struck down a persecutor. He heard the voice of the Lord. He was blinded, but in the body, so that he might be enlightened in heart. Led to Ananias, instructed in many things, baptized, he proceeded as an apostle. Speak, preach: preach Christ, disseminate, good ram, formerly a wolf. Look at him, observe him, who was raging: "But far be it from me to glory except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom the world has been crucified to me, and I to the world." Spread the Gospel: what you conceived in your heart, spread with your mouth. Let the nations hear, let the nations believe: let the nations blossom, let the bride adorned in the blood of the martyrs be born unto the Lord. And how many have approached from her? How many members have adhered and now adhere to the head and believe? These were baptized, others will be baptized, and others will come after us. Then, I say, at the end of the age, stones will join the foundation, living stones, holy stones, so that at the end the whole building may be constructed from that Church; indeed, from this very Church, which now sings a new song, while the house is being built. For thus the Psalm itself says: "When the house was being built after the captivity." And what? "Sing to the Lord a new song; sing to the Lord, all the earth." What a great house! But when does it sing the new song? When it is being built. When is it dedicated? At the end of the age. Its foundation has already been dedicated because it ascended to heaven and does not die. When we too shall have risen, that we may never die, then we shall be dedicated.

Sermons - Sermon 117

SERMO 117 On the Words of the Gospel of John (1, 1-3):

"In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God," And the Word was God, etc.

AGAINST THE ARIANS The word of God should be valued so that it may be understood. The chapter of the Gospel which was read, dearest brothers, seeks the pure eye of the heart. For we understand that our Lord Jesus Christ, according to his divinity, created the whole universe, and according to his humanity, restored the fallen creation, with John as the evangelist. However, in this Gospel, we find what kind of man John was and how great he was, so that from the dignity of the dispenser it might be understood how valuable is the Word which could be spoken by someone like him; indeed, how invaluable it is that surpasses all things. For a thing for sale is either equal to, subject to, or exceeds its price. When someone buys something at its value, the price is equal to the thing purchased; when for less, it is subject to it; when for more, it exceeds it. But nothing can be equal to the Word of God, nor subjected to change, nor surpassed by anything. For all things can be subjected to the Word of God, because: All things were made through Him; yet they are not subjected as if they were the price of the Word, so that one might give something to receive it. However, if it can be said and if some reason or custom of speaking permits this name, the price of acquiring the Word is the acquirer himself, who has given himself for himself to this Word. Therefore, when we buy something, we look for something to give, so that we may have the thing for which we give the price. And what we give is outside ourselves; and if it was with us, what we give becomes external to us, so that what we acquire may be with us. Whatever price someone finds when buying something, it is necessary to find something such as to give what one has and receive what one does not have; yet the one who gives the price remains, and that comes to him for which he gives the price. But he who wants to acquire this Word, who wants to have it, should not seek outside himself what he may give, he should give himself. When he does this, he does not lose himself, as he loses the price when he buys something. The price of the Word Himself is man. The Word of God, therefore, is offered to all: let those who can, obtain it; but they can who wish devoutly. For in that Word there is peace: And on earth peace among men of goodwill. Therefore, whoever wishes to obtain it, let them give themselves. This is the price of the Word, if it can be called such in any way, since he who gives himself does not lose himself, and acquires the Word for which he gives himself, and acquires himself in the Word to whom he gives himself. And what does he give to the Word? Not something alien to him, but what was made through this Word; this is returned to him so that it may be restored. All things were made through him. If all things, certainly man as well. If the heaven, if the earth, if the sea, if all things that are in them, if every creature; certainly him more clearly, who was made man through the Word, made in the image of God. The Word of God is a certain unformed form. A form without time and place. Not only, brothers, do we discuss how it can be understood what is said: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. It can be understood ineffably; it is not by human words that it is understood. We discuss the Word of God and explain why it is not understood. We do not now explain so that it may be understood, but explain what hinders it from being understood. For there is indeed a certain form, a form not formed, but the form of all things formed; an unchangeable form, without lapse, without defect, without time, without place, surpassing all, existing in all things, and a certain foundation in which all things exist, and a summit under which all things exist. If you say that all things are in it, you do not lie. For it has been said that the Word itself is the Wisdom of God; we have it written: In Wisdom you have made all things. Therefore, all things are in it; and yet because it is God, all things are under it. We say how incomprehensible is what has been read; nevertheless, it has been read, not so that it may be comprehended by man, but so that man might grieve because he does not comprehend, and might find out what impedes him from comprehension, and remove these things, and yearn for the perception of the unchangeable Word, he himself changed from worse to better. For the Word does not improve or grow with the approach of the knower; but remains whole if you persist; remains whole if you withdraw; remains whole when you return; abiding in itself, and renewing all things. Therefore, it is the form of all things, the unmade form, without time, as we said, and without the extents of places. For anything that is contained in place is circumscribed. The form is circumscribed by boundaries, it has limits from where and to where it exists. Furthermore, that which is contained in place is extended by some quantity and space, lesser in part than in whole. May God make you understand. Not less in part than in whole.

Daily, however, regarding the bodies that are before our eyes, which we see, which we touch, among which we are, we can judge any body to have form in a place. But everything that occupies space is lesser in part than in whole. A part of the human body, for example, the arm; certainly the arm is lesser than the whole body. And if the arm is lesser, it occupies a shorter space. Likewise the head, because it is a part of the body, is in a smaller place, and it is lesser than the whole body, which is the head. Thus all things that are in a place are lesser in part than in whole. Let us think nothing like this about that Word, let us imagine nothing like this. Let us not imagine spiritual things from the suggestion of flesh. That Word, that God is not lesser in part than in whole. In divine matters, pious ignorance is better than presumed knowledge. With the eye of the heart, God is incomprehensible. By knowledge of God, man becomes blessed. God does not increase from our knowledge. But you cannot conceive of such a thing. Such ignorance is more pious than presumed knowledge. For we speak of God. It has been said: And the Word was God. We speak of God; what wonder is it if you do not comprehend? For if you comprehend, it is not God. Let there be a pious confession of ignorance rather than a rash profession of knowledge. To reach God somewhat with the mind is a great blessing; but to comprehend Him is utterly impossible. God pertains to the mind, He is to be understood; a body pertains to the eyes, it is to be seen. But do you think you comprehend the body with the eye? You absolutely cannot. For whatever you look at, you do not see the whole. You see the face of a man, but you do not see the back at the time you see the face; and when you see the back, at that time you do not see the face. Thus, you do not see so as to comprehend; but when you look at another part you had not seen, unless memory helps you to remember that you saw where you have turned away, you never say that you have even superficially comprehended anything. You handle what you see, you turn it this way and that, or you yourself move around to see the whole. Thus, you cannot see the whole at one glance. And while you turn to see, you see parts; and by combining the parts you saw, you seem to inspect the whole. However, this is not the vision of the eyes, but the vivacity of memory that is understood. What then can be said of that Word, brothers? Behold, we speak of bodies subject to our eyes, we cannot comprehend them with sight; who then can comprehend God with the eye of the heart? It is enough to reach out if the eye is pure. If it touches, it touches with a certain incorporeal and spiritual touch, yet it does not comprehend; and this, if it is pure. And a man becomes blessed by reaching with the heart what always remains blessed; and that is perpetual blessedness itself, and from which a man becomes alive, it is perpetual life; from which a man becomes wise, it is perfect wisdom; from which a man becomes illuminated, it is eternal light. And see how you become by reaching that which you were not, you do not make what you reach become what it was not. I say this: God does not grow from the knower, but the knower from the knowledge of God.

Let us not think, dearest brothers, that we are bestowing a benefit upon God, because we have said that we are giving a price in a certain way. For we do not give to him that from which he may be increased, who remains whole even when you have fallen, and remains whole when you have returned, ready to bless those who are converted and to punish those who are averse with blindness. For he first vindicates the soul turned away from him with the beginning of punishment, with blindness itself. For he who turns away from the true light, that is, from God, already becomes blind. He does not yet feel the punishment, but he already has it. The Word is affirmed as co-eternal with the Father against the Arians.

Therefore, let us understand, dearest brothers, that the Word of God was born incorporeally, inviolably, unchangeably, without temporal birth, yet born from God. Do we think that we can in any way persuade certain unbelievers not to shun the truth, which we proclaim by the Catholic faith, which is contrary to the Arians, by whom the Church of God has often been tempted, since carnal men more easily accept what they have been accustomed to see? For some have dared to say: The Father is greater than the Son and precedes Him in time; that is, the Father is greater than the Son, and the Son is lesser than the Father, and the Father precedes Him in time. And so they argue: If He is born, certainly the Father existed before the Son was born to Him. Attend; may He Himself be present with us, with your prayers assisting, and with a holy intention of those desiring to receive what He has given and suggested; may He be present with us, so that we may be able to explain in some manner what we have begun. However, brothers, I say beforehand, if I am unable to explain it, do not think that reason has failed but that the man has failed. Therefore, I urge and beseech you to pray; may the mercy of God be present, and thus may He cause this matter to be spoken by us as you ought to hear and as we ought to say. Therefore, they say this: If He is the Son of God, He is born. We confess this. For indeed, He would not be the Son if He were not born. It is manifest, faith admits this, the Catholic Church approves it, it is true. Then they add: If the Son was born to the Father, the Father existed before the Son was born to Him. This faith rejects, Catholic ears refuse, it is anathematized, he who thinks thus is outside, does not belong to the participation and society of the saints. Therefore, he says, give me a reason how the Son could be born to the Father and be coeternal with Him from whom He was born.

It is difficult to convey divine things to the carnal. And what do we do, brothers, when we introduce spiritual things to the carnal; if, however, we ourselves are not carnal, when we intimate these spiritual things to the carnal, to a man accustomed to earthly birth, and seeing the order of this creation, where there are successions and departures, where those who generate and those who are generated are distinguished by age? For the son is born after the father, and will succeed the father who is destined to die. This we find among humans, this we find among other living beings: parents are prior in time, children are later in time. By this custom of seeing, they wish to transfer carnal things to spiritual matters, and by the intention of carnal things they are more easily deceived. For the reason of the listeners does not follow those preaching such things, but custom, which even loosens them, that they might preach such things. And what do we do? Shall we remain silent? If only it were permitted! For perhaps in silence, something worthy might be thought about the ineffable matter. For whatever can be spoken is not ineffable. But God is ineffable. For if the apostle Paul says he was caught up to the third heaven, and says he heard ineffable words; how much more is He Himself ineffable, who showed such things that cannot be spoken by the one to whom they were shown? Therefore, brothers, it would be better if we could be silent, and say: This is what faith holds, so we believe; you cannot grasp it, you are a child; it must be patiently endured until you grow your wings; and if you wish to fly while you are still featherless, let it not be the air of freedom, but the fall of recklessness. What do they say in response? Oh, if he had something to say, he would say it to me! For one who cannot respond has this excuse. He who does not wish to respond, has been conquered by the truth. To him to whom this is said, if he does not respond, even if he is not conquered within himself, he is nevertheless conquered in the wavering brothers. For the weak brothers hear, and think there is indeed nothing to be said; and perhaps they truly think there is nothing to be said, yet not that there is nothing to be felt. For man can say nothing that he cannot also feel; he can also feel something that he cannot express.

Similitudes to be used to refute the Arians.

Nevertheless, preserving the ineffability of that majesty, lest anyone should think that we have already reached through these similarities to that which cannot be said or thought by the immature (certainly, even if it is possible for some who are more advanced, it is possible in part, it is possible in a riddle, it is possible through a mirror; but not yet face to face); let us also give some similarities against them, from which they are refuted, not from which that may be grasped. Indeed, when we say it can be very much understood, very much conceived, that he is both born and coeternal with the one from whom he is born, they refute this and demonstrate it as if it were false, giving us similarities. From where? From the creature, and they say to us: Surely a man existed before he begot a son, he is greater than his son; and a horse existed before it begot a foal, and a sheep, and other animals. They employ similarities from creatures. Our faith in the Word, however, does not rely on analogies.

What, must we labor so that we also find likenesses of those things we assert? What? If I did not find them, could I not rightly say: the Birth of the Creator perhaps does not have a likeness in the creature? For the more He surpasses those things that are here in what is there, the more He surpasses those things that are born here in what is born there. All things here are through God; and yet, what can be compared to God? Thus, all things that are born here are born by His doing. And thus perhaps no likeness of His birth is found, just as no likeness of His substance, immutability, divinity, and majesty is found. For what similar thing can be found here? If therefore perhaps no likeness of birth is found, am I oppressed because of that, because I have not found likenesses of the Creator of all things, desiring to find in the creature what is similar to the Creator?

Analogies of the birth of the Son of God are imperfect in creatures. Coeval and coeternal with the Father. And truly, brothers, I am not going to find temporal likenesses which I can compare to eternity. But what have you found? For what have you found? That the father is greater in time than the son; and therefore you want the Son of God to be lesser in time than the eternal Father, because you found a son lesser than his temporal father. Give me an eternal father here, and you have found a likeness. You find a son lesser than the father in time, a temporal son lesser than a temporal father. Have you found me a temporal son lesser than an eternal father?

Therefore, since stability is in eternity, but variety is in time; in eternity all things stand, while in time some things come and others succeed; you may find a younger son succeeding the father in the variety of time because he also succeeded his own father, not an eternal father but a temporal one. So what can we, my brothers, find in creation that is coeternal when we do not find anything eternal in creation? If I find an eternal father in creation, then I find a coeternal son. But if you do not find something eternal and they overcome each other in time; it is enough to find a coeval similarity. For coeternal is one thing, coeval is another. We daily call those coeval who have the same measure of time; one is not preceded by time from the other, although both began to exist, whom we call coevals. If we could find a coeval birth of one thing from another; if we can find two coevals, the one generating and the one generated; here we find coevals, there we understand coeternal. If here I find something born from another thing beginning to be from the same time as that from which it is born. That from which it began, that from which it did not begin. Therefore, this is coeval, that is coeternal. In contemporaries, there is a certain likeness of the Word coeternal with God. Fire and light are contemporaneous.

I think Your Holiness already understands what I say, that temporal things cannot be compared to eternal ones; but those things which are contemporary can be compared by some slight and small resemblance to those which are coeternal. Let us therefore find things that are contemporary and be admonished by the Scriptures for these resemblances. We read in the Scriptures about Wisdom itself: "For it is the brightness of eternal light." Again we read: "The spotless mirror of the majesty of God." This Wisdom is called the brightness of eternal light, it is called the image of the Father; from this let us take a resemblance, so that we may find things contemporary, from which we understand things coeternal. O Arian, if I find that the begetter does not precede in time that which he begot, if the begotten is not lesser in time than that from which it was generated; it is just that you concede to me that these things can be found coeternal in the Creator, when those contemporary things were able to be found in creation. Now indeed I think this occurs to some brethren. For some anticipated from the moment I said: "For it is the brightness of eternal light." Indeed, fire emits light, light is emitted by fire. If we ask what exists from what, every day when we light a lamp, we are reminded of a certain invisible and inexpressible matter, so that some lamp of our understanding may be lit in this night of the world. Consider him who lights a lamp. Before the lamp is lit, there is neither fire, nor is there the brightness which proceeds from the fire. But I ask and say: Does the brightness exist from the fire, or does the fire exist from the brightness? Every soul responds to me: For God has wished to sow the beginnings of understanding, the beginnings of wisdom in every soul; every soul responds to me, and no one doubts, that that brightness proceeds from the fire, not the fire from the brightness. Let us therefore place the fire as the father of that brightness; because we have already stated that we seek things contemporary, not coeternal. If I wish to light a lamp, the fire is not yet there, nor is that brightness; but as soon as I have lit it, the brightness exists together with the fire. Give me here fire without brightness, and I will believe that the Father existed without the Son.

Another of the same age, an image and a thing from which it is born.

Listen: such a great matter has been expressed by me as well as possible with the Lord aiding the intention of your prayer and the preparation of your heart, and you have taken in as much as you could. However, these things are ineffable. Consider nothing worthy as said, especially since coeval things are compared to coeternal ones, temporal things to everlasting ones, and perishable things to the immortal. But because the Son and the image of the Father are spoken of, let us also accept from here some likeness in things that are far different, as we prefaced. An image arises from a mirror of a man looking into the mirror. This cannot aid us for the clarity of this matter, which we are endeavoring to explain in some way. For it is said to me: He who looks into the mirror was already, and was already born. The image arises as soon as the observer appears. For he who looks existed even before he approached the mirror. What then shall we find whereby we can extract such a likeness, as we have drawn from the fire and light? Let us make use of something simple. You easily know how often water of bodies renders images. This we say: When anyone either passes over the water or stands, he sees there his image. Therefore, let us suppose something born over water, such as a plant or an herb, does it not come forth with its image? As soon as it begins to exist, its image begins to exist with it; it does not precede, in being born, its own image; it is not shown to me that something was born upon the water, and later its image appeared, while it first appeared without an image; but it is born with its image; and yet the image is from it, not it from the image. Therefore, it is born with its image, and the plant and its image begin to exist together. Do you not admit that the image originates from that plant, not the plant from the image? Therefore, concerning that plant, you confess the image. And so, both the one who generates and that which is generated began to exist together. Therefore, they are coeval. If always a plant, always also the image from the plant. But what is from another is indeed born. Therefore, there can always be one generating, and always with it what is born from it. For there we were tossed back and forth, there we labored, as we tried to understand eternal birth. Therefore, the Son of God is thus said to be in regard that the Father exists from whom he is; not in the way that the Father was prior, and afterward the Son. Always the Father, always the Son from the Father. And because whatever is from something is born; therefore, always the Son born. Always the Father, always from him the image; just as the image of the plant is born from the plant, and if always the plant, always the image would be born from the plant. You could not find coeternal generated beings to eternal generators, and you found coeval generated beings to temporal begetters. I understand the coeternal Son born of the eternal begetter. For what is coeval to the temporal, this is coeternal to the eternal. In the comparisons made, there is inequality.

Here there is now a little that you should mind, brothers, because of blasphemies. For it is always said: Behold you have given likenesses; but the radiance that pours forth from the fire shines less than the fire itself; and the image of a bush has indeed less propriety than the bush from which the image is. These have likeness, but they do not have complete equality; therefore they do not seem to be of the same substance. What shall we therefore say, if someone says: So then is the Son to the Father, as the radiance is to the fire, and the image to the bush? Behold I understood the eternal Father, I understood the co-eternal Son: yet do we say like a spread-out radiance shining less than the fire, or like an image existing less than the bush? No: but there is complete equality. I do not believe, he says, because you have not found a likeness. But believe the Apostle, because he was able to see what I said. For he says: He did not consider it robbery to be equal to God. Equality is joined in every way. And what did he say? Not robbery. Why? Because that is robbery which is alien. The co-eternity and equality of the Son of God from two compared types of similarities.

Yet out of these two kinds of comparisons and from the two types, perhaps we find a likeness in the creature, in such a way that we understand the Son as coeternal with the Father and by no means lesser. But we cannot find that in one kind of similarity; let us join both kinds. How both kinds? One from which they give similarities, and the other from which we have given. They have given similarities from those things which are born in time, and are preceded in time by those from which they are born, such as a man from a man. That man is greater in time, born earlier; but still a man and a man, that is, of the same substance. For a man begets a man, and a horse a horse, and cattle cattle. These beget to the same substance, but not to the same time. They differ in time, but not in nature. Therefore, what do we praise in this birth? Certainly equality of nature. But what is lacking? Equality of time. Let's hold onto what is praised here, that is, equality of nature. In that other kind of similarities, which we gave from the brightness of the fire and from the image of the bush, you do not find equality of nature, you find coeternity. What do we praise here? Coeternity. What is lacking? Equality of nature. Combine what you praise. For in creatures something is lacking that you praise, in the Creator nothing can be lacking; because what you find in the creature proceeded from the Creator the artificer. Therefore what in coequals? Is it not to be given to God what you praise there? But what is lacking should not be attributed to the majesty, in which there is no defect. Behold, I offer you coeval begotten beings; you praise coeternity there, but you criticize disparity. What you criticize, do not attribute to God; what you praise, attribute; and from this type of similarities you attribute to Him coeternity for coeternity, that the begotten be coeternal with Him from whom He was begotten. From the other type of similarities, which is also God's creation, and ought to praise the Creator, what do you praise there? Equality of nature. Now for that distinction you gave coeternity; give for this, equality; and the perfect birth of the same substance is complete. For what could be more foolish, my brothers, than to praise in some creature what is not in the Creator? I praise in man the equality of nature, and do I not believe it in Him who made man? What is born of man is man; and what is born of God, will it not be that which is of Him from whom it was born? I do not dwell in works that God did not make. Therefore, let all His works praise the Creator. Here I find a coequal, there I recognize a coeternal. Here I find equality of nature, there I understand equality of substance. Therefore all that is there is what is found in individual parts and things here. Therefore, everything there at once, and not just what is in creatures; I find everything there, but as in the Creator, so much more, because these visible things, those invisible; these temporal, those eternal; these changeable, those unchangeable; these corruptible, those incorruptible. Finally, even in man what we find, man and man, are two men; there the Father and the Son are one God. The eye of the heart must be cleansed so that God may be seen.

I give thanks to our Lord God ineffably, because He has deigned to liberate my weakness from this most burdensome and laborious place, at your petition. Above all, however, keep this in mind: whatever we have been able to collect about the creature, either through the senses of the body or the thoughts of the mind, the Creator transcends it ineffably. But do you wish to touch Him with your mind? Purify your mind, purify your heart. Make the eye pure, from which that whatever it is may be reached. Make pure the eye of the heart: For the pure in heart are blessed, for they shall see God. What could be more mercifully granted or given by Him than that the Word, of which we have said so many and so great things, and yet have said nothing worthy; unless that the Word, through which all things were made, became what we are, so that we might reach what we are not? For we are not God; but we can see God with the inner sight of the mind or heart. Our sight, dulled by sins, blunted, and thrown down by weakness, desires to see; but we are in hope, we are not yet in reality. We are children of God. This is what John says, who said: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God; who reclined on the Lord's breast, who drew these secrets from the bosom of His heart; he himself says: Beloved, we are children of God; and it has not yet appeared what we shall be; we know that when He appears, we shall be like Him because we shall see Him as He is. This is promised to us. The Word made flesh like milk, so that it could be taken by us. But so that we may reach, if we cannot yet see the Word of God, let us hear the Word made flesh; since we have become carnal, let us hear the Word made flesh. For this reason He came, for this reason He took on our weakness, so you might grasp the firm speech of God bearing your weakness. And it was truly said, "milk." For indeed He gives milk to the little ones, so that He might give the food of wisdom to the greater ones. Bear nursing patiently, so that you might eagerly be fed. For how is milk made, which infants are nursed with? Wasn't there food on the table? But the infant is too weak to eat the food that is on the table; what does the mother do? She makes food incarnate, and makes milk from it. She prepares for us what we can take. Thus the Word was made flesh, so that as infants we might be nourished with milk, who indeed were infants in regard to food. However, this is the difference, because when the mother makes food into milk, the food is converted into milk; but the Word, remaining unchangeable, assumed flesh, so that it would be in some way blended. That is, it did not corrupt, it did not change, so it would speak to you through your condition, not transformed and converted into a human. For remaining unchangeable, immutable, and completely inviolable, He became to you what you are to Him, what He is to the Father.

Humility must be learned from the incarnate Word.

He himself, to the weak, what does he say, so that they can recover that sight and reach the Word from some part, through which all things were made? "Come to me, all you who labor and are burdened, and I will refresh you. Take my yoke upon you, and learn from me, for I am gentle and humble in heart." What does the Teacher, the Son of God, the Wisdom of God, through whom all things were made, preach? He calls the human race, and says: "Come to me, all you who labor, and learn from me." Perhaps you would have thought the Wisdom of God to say: "Learn how I made the heavens and the stars; all things were also numbered in me before they were made; how in the constancy of immutable reasons even your hairs are numbered." Did you think such things would be said? No. But first this: "For I am gentle and humble in heart." Behold what you can grasp, see, brothers, surely it is small. We aim at great things, let us grasp the small, and we will be great. Do you want to grasp the loftiness of God? First, grasp the humility of God. Deign to be humble for yourself, because God deigned to be humble for the same you; not for himself. Therefore, grasp the humility of Christ, learn to be humble, do not be proud. Confess your weakness, lie patiently before the physician. When you have grasped his humility, you rise with him; not as if he too rises according to the Word; but rather you, so that you may be more and more grasped by him. At first, you understood hesitantly and uncertainly; afterwards, you understand more certainly and clearly. He does not grow, but you advance, and he seems to rise as if with you. Thus it is, brothers. Believe the precepts of God, and do them, and he will grant you the strength of understanding. Do not presume, and as if to prefer knowledge to the precept of God, lest you remain lower rather than more solid. Look at a tree; it first seeks the lowest before it grows upwards; it fixes its root in the humble, to extend its top to the sky. Does it strive except from humility? Do you, however, without love, want to comprehend the heights? Do you seek the sky without a root? That is ruin, not growth. With Christ dwelling in your hearts through faith, be rooted and grounded in love, that you may be filled to all the fullness of God.

Sermons - Sermon 118

SERMO 118 ABOUT THE SAME WORDS OF THE GOSPEL OF JOHN (1, 1-3):

"In the beginning was the Word," etc. The eternal Word of God, begotten, not made.

All you who seek many words from man, understand the one Word of God: In the beginning was the Word. But in the beginning God made heaven and earth. But the Word was there, when we heard: In the beginning God made. Let us acknowledge the Creator; for it is the Creator who made. But the creature is what was made. For the creature was not always as the Word was always God, through whom it was made. But when we heard: The Word was, with whom was it? We understand the Father, who did not make, nor create the same Word, but begot it. For in the beginning God made heaven and earth. Through what did He make? The Word was there, and the Word was with God; but what kind of Word? Did it sound and pass away? Was it thought upon and revolved? No. Was it remembered and spoken forth? No. Therefore, what kind of Word? Why do you ask me many things? The Word was God. When we hear: The Word was God, we do not double God; but we understand the Son. For the Word of God is the Son. Behold the Son, and what unless God? For the Word was God. What of the Father? Certainly God. If the Father is God, and the Son is God, do we double God? Far from it! The Father is God, the Son is God; but the Father and the Son are one God. For the only Son was not made, but born. In the beginning God made heaven and earth; but the Word was from the Father. Therefore, was the Word made by the Father? No. All things were made through Him. If all things were made through Him, was He also made through Himself? Through whom you hear all things were made, do not think He was made among all things. For if He also was made, all things were not made through Him, but He was made among other things. You say: He was made; was it through Himself? Who is he that makes himself? Therefore, if He was made, how were all things made through Him? Behold, He was made also, as you say, not I, for I do not deny He was begotten. Therefore, if you say He was made, I ask through what, I ask through whom. Through Himself? Therefore, He was before He was made, to make Himself. But if all things were made through Him, understand that He was not made Himself. If you cannot understand, believe so that you may understand. Faith precedes, understanding follows; for the Prophet says: Unless you believe, you will not understand. The Word was. Therefore, do not seek time for Him, through whom times were made. The Word was. But you say: There was a time when the Word was not. You lie, you read nowhere. But I read to you: In the beginning was the Word. What do you seek before the beginning? If you can find something before the beginning, it will be the beginning. He is insane who seeks something before the beginning. What then does he say that existed before the beginning? In the beginning was the Word. By analogy, it is shown that the Son is coeternal with God the Father. But you say: And was there a Father; and before the Word? What are you asking? In the beginning was the Word. Understand what you find; do not seek what you cannot find. Nothing is before the beginning. In the beginning was the Word. The Son is the radiance of the Father. Of the wisdom of the Father, which is the Son, it is said: For he is the brightness of eternal light. Do you seek the Son without the Father? Give me light without brightness. If ever the Son did not exist, the Father was dim light. For how was the light not dim, if it did not have brightness? Therefore always the Father, always the Son. If always the Father, always the Son. Do you ask me whether the Son was born? I answer: Born. For he would not be the Son if not born. But when I say: Always the Son; this I say: Always is born. And who understands: Always is born? Give me eternal fire, and I give you eternal brightness. We bless God, who gave us the Sacred Scriptures. Do not be blind in the radiance of light. Brightness is born from light, and yet the brightness is co-eternal with the light-giver. Always light, always its brightness. He begets his brightness; but was he ever without his brightness? Let God be allowed to generate eternally. I ask, hear about what we speak; hear, notice, believe, understand. We speak of God. We confess and believe the Son to be co-eternal with the Father. But man, he says, when he begets a son, the one who begets is greater, and the one who is begotten is lesser. See, it is true; among humans the one who begets is greater, and the one who is begotten is lesser, and he arrives at the strength of his father. But why, unless because as the one grows, the other ages? Let the father stand in time, and with growth the son follows him, and you will see the equal. But see, I give you from which to understand. Fire generates coeval brightness. You do not find among humans except lesser sons, greater fathers; you do not find coevals; but I give you, as I said, brightness coeval with its paternal fire. For fire generates brightness, but never without brightness. Therefore, when you see brightness to be coeval with fire, allow God to generate the co-eternal. He who understands, let him rejoice; but he who does not understand, let him believe. For the word of the Prophet cannot be voided: Unless you believe, you will not understand.

SERMO 119 CONCERNING THE SAME WORDS OF JOHN (1, 1-4):

"In the beginning was the Word," etc. The eternal Word with God. Our Lord Jesus Christ became man to seek the lost man, our preaching has never been silent about this, and your faith has always held this; but this our Lord, who became man for us, has always been God with the Father, and will always be, indeed always is; because where time does not pass, there is no: Was, and: Will be. For what is said: Was, is no longer; what is said: Will be, is not yet; but always is, because truly is, that is, is immutable. Recently the evangelical chapter reminded us of a great and divine secret. For this the holy John proclaimed at the beginning of the Gospel, because he drank from the breast of the Lord. For you remember, and it was read to you very recently, how the holy John the Evangelist was reclining in the bosom of the Lord. Wishing to explain this clearly, he said: On the breast of the Lord; so that we might understand what he said, in the bosom of the Lord. For he who was reclining on the breast of the Lord, what do we suppose he was drinking? Let us not suppose, but let us drink; for now we too have heard what we shall drink. The Word of God is not made. In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. O proclaim! O breathe forth the fullness of the Lord's heart! In the beginning was the Word. What do you seek that was before? In the beginning was the Word. If the Word had been made (for it was not made through which all things were made); if the Word had been made, Scripture would say: In the beginning God made the Word; just as it said in Genesis: In the beginning God made the heaven and the earth. Therefore, God did not make the Word in the beginning, because: In the beginning was the Word. This Word which was in the beginning, where was it? Follow: And the Word was with God. But we are accustomed, hearing human words daily, to hold this name of the Word in disdain. Here do not hold the name of the Word in disdain: The Word was God. This, that is, the Word, was in the beginning with God. All things were made through Him; and without Him was nothing made. The Word of God is incomprehensible.

Extend your hearts, assist the poverty of our speech. What I will be able to say, listen to; what I will not be able to say, think about. Who has comprehended the abiding Word? All our words sound and pass away. Who comprehends the abiding Word, except the one who abides in it? Do you want to comprehend the abiding Word? Do not follow the stream of flesh. For this flesh is indeed a river; it does not remain. Like from a certain secret source of nature, humans are born, humans live, humans die; we do not know where they come from, nor do we know where they go. The water is hidden until it progresses from the source; it runs and appears in the river; but again it is hidden in the sea. Let us contemn that flowing, running, and ending river, let us contemn it. All flesh is grass, and all the glory of flesh is like the flower of grass. The grass withered, the flower fell. Do you want to remain? But the Word of the Lord remains forever. The Word was made flesh. But that he might help us: the Word was made flesh, and dwelled among us. What is: the Word was made flesh? Gold was made hay. Hay was made to be burned; hay was burned, but gold remained; and in the hay it did not perish, and transformed the hay. How did it transform? It resurrected, vivified, was lifted to heaven, and was seated at the right hand of the Father. But that it might be said: And the Word was made flesh, and dwelled among us, let us recall what preceded a little. He came unto his own, and his own received him not. But as many as received him, he gave them power to become the sons of God. To become, because they were not; he, however, was in the beginning. Therefore, he gave them power to become the sons of God, to those believing in his name; who were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of a man, but of God. Behold, they are, in whatever age of flesh they may be; you see infants; see and rejoice. Behold, they are: but they were born of God. The womb of the mother, the water of Baptism. The mystery of the Incarnation is urged. No one should feel poor in spirit and dwell upon the most wretched thoughts, and say to himself: "How was it that in the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God; all things were made through Him; and behold, the Word became flesh and dwelt among us?" Hear how it was done. Surely, to those who believed in His name, He gave the power to become children of God. Nor should those to whom He gave the power to become children of God think it impossible to become children of God. The Word became flesh and dwelt among us. Do not think it is too much for you to become children of God; for your sake, the Son of Man became what He who was the Son of God already was. If He, who was greater, became lesser so that He could become more than He was; can He not make us, who were lesser, become greater than we were? He descended to us, and will we not ascend to Him? He took upon Himself our death, and will He not give us His life? He suffered for your evils, and will He not give you His goods? The Incarnation is the work of the omnipotent Word. But how, he says, could it have been possible that the Word of God, by which the world is governed, through which all things were created and are created, could confine itself in the flesh of a Virgin; leave the world, and forsake the angels, be enclosed in the womb of one woman? You do not understand divine reasoning. The Word of God (I speak to you, O man, of the omnipotence of the Word of God) indeed could do all this, because the Word of God is omnipotent, and could remain with the Father, and come to us; and come to us in the flesh and remain hidden within himself. For if he had not been born of flesh, he would still have existed. He existed before his flesh; he himself created his mother. He chose in whom he would be conceived, he created the one from whom he would be created. Why do you marvel? I speak to you of God: the Word was God. The incarnation of the Word is explained by a comparison.

I speak of the Word, and the human word may possibly be somewhat similar; although vastly unequal, vastly distinct, comparable by no particle, yet to be introduced to you by some likeness. Behold, the word I speak to you, I first had in my heart; it proceeded to you, yet did not leave me; it began to exist in you, which was not in you; it remained with me, even as it went out to you. Therefore, just as my word is spoken to your sense, yet did not leave my heart; so that Word was spoken to our sense, yet did not depart from His Father. My word was with me, and it proceeded into a voice: the Word of God was with the Father, and it proceeded into flesh. But can I do with my voice what He could with His flesh? For I cannot hold my spoken voice; but He not only retained His flesh, that He might be born, live, act; but even resurrected it when dead, and raised it as a vehicle by which He came to us, to the Father. You may call the flesh of Christ a garment, a vehicle, and as He perhaps deigned to signify Himself, you may call it His beast of burden; for on that beast He lifted him who had been wounded by robbers; finally, as He Himself more openly said, you may call it a temple; this temple has already known death, it sits at the right hand of the Father; in this temple, He will come to judge the living and the dead. What He admonished us by commandment, He demonstrated by example. What He showed in His flesh, that you should hope for in your own flesh. This is faith, hold on to what you do not yet see. It is necessary that you remain believing in what you do not see; lest when you see, you be ashamed.

Sermons - Sermon 12

SERMO 12 TREATISE AGAINST THE MANICHAEANS CONCISUM EST IN IRA SUA CORNU MEUM "And behold, angels came into the presence of God" And the devil in their midst" and so on.

"And that which is in the Gospel:"

"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." In the divine and holy ancient Books, the most deceitful trickery of the Manichaeans lies in wait, as your prudence, dearest Brothers, has sufficiently proven. Yet we continue to offer their deceits for the inspection of your hearts, so that you may not only avoid them as much as lies in your power, but also teach others who are weak and unlearned in the divine readings, to avoid and despise them as each of you is able.

"It is written in Job," they say, "Behold, the angels came into the presence of God, and Satan came among them. And God said to Satan: Whence do you come? He answered and said: I come from going around the whole earth." Here, they say, it is shown that Satan not only saw God but also spoke with Him.

Yet in the Gospel it says: Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. And again, it says: I am the door, no one can come to the Father except through me. Then they add reasoning, saying: If therefore those only who are pure in heart see God, in what way could Satan, with the most filthy and impure heart, see God? Or how could he enter through the door, that is, through Christ? Again, the Apostle, they say, testifies and confirms, saying that neither Princes, nor Powers, nor Virtues knew God." The accusation of those is proposed.

Indeed, their calumny is presented up to this point with these words, and truly, the question must be discussed by a Christian. But the intention of those propounding this calumny is to similarly draw the unlearned from the most wholesome authority of the Scriptures to believing in them. But first, I would like to ask them where Adimantus has read this from the Apostle – for he is the author of such calumnies – I would therefore want him to say where he has read the Apostle testifying and confirming, as he says, that neither the Princes nor the Powers nor the Virtues knew God, when the Lord also says that the angels of those believing in Him see the face of the Father daily. Unless perhaps what the Apostle Paul said: “We speak wisdom among the perfect, but wisdom not of this age, nor of the princes of this age, who come to naught. But we speak the wisdom of God in a mystery, which is hidden, which God predestined before the ages unto our glory, which none of the princes of this age knew. If they had known, they would never have crucified the Lord of Glory.” If he was thinking to write this passage, why did he add Powers and Virtures, which is not said there, and omit “of this age,” which is said there? But if he did this more out of error than malice, I wish it were so. Nevertheless, even if the Apostle had said this way, could not the devil hear the voice of God for this reason? For it is written that he came into the sight of God; it is not written that he himself saw God. For the princes of this age are understood either as proud men elevated by the vain pomp of boastfulness or the devil himself and his angels. For the Lord most openly calls him the prince or magistrate of this age, because by the name of this age sinners are understood, whose hope is only in this world. For as it is said a bad house when the inhabitants are signified, so we say this bad age when we signify those who dwell in this age with their heart, that is, whose conversation is not in heaven. For ours, says the Apostle, is a conversation in heaven. But all sins serve the devil, who by free will wanted to be the prince of sin: therefore he is called the prince of this age. I advise you to impress this rule of understanding in your hearts. With this the Lord will aid in discussing and solving many of the Scriptures, from which they bait traps of their error. A very brief response to their proposition.

Since it is not written that the devil saw God, but only that he came with the angels into the sight of the Lord and heard His voice, why do these wretched ones strive to calumniate the Scriptures on the vision of God and to pervert the ignorant? Therefore, this proposition of theirs is overcome by the shortest response. For however much they might seek to explain how the devil saw God, we answer: The devil did not see God. They will say: "Then how did he speak with Him?". Here indeed, their blindness of heart must be convicted, not by us, but by blind men. For those who are blind with carnal eyes can daily speak with those whom they cannot see. They ask: "Then how did he come into His presence?". In the same way a blind man is in the presence of one who sees, whom he himself does not see. And indeed, these comparisons, dearest brothers, are spoken so that the wickedness of carnal men may be refuted, so that if possible being thus repelled they might turn their pious hearts to the meekness of learning. For is God contained in a place, whom every angelic and human conscience has present, not only of the good but also of the evil? Yet this is the difference: to good consciences, He is present as a Father, to evil ones as a Judge, for it is written: The Lord examines the righteous and the wicked. Also, it is written: In the thoughts of the wicked is questioning. Nor does God question more vehemently in the ears of the body than in the secret of thought, where He alone hears, He alone is heard. Do not even wicked men, when they speak the truth and are not believed, swear and say: "God is my witness," and say it most truly? Where, I ask, is He a witness? In the tongue, or in the heart? In the sound of the voice, or in the silence of conscience? Why else do they often get angry because they are not believed when they know they speak the truth, except because they cannot open their heart to us where God is a witness?

Many are the ways in which God speaks.

There are many ways in which God speaks to us. He sometimes speaks through some instrument, such as through the codex of the divine Scriptures. He speaks through some element of the world, as He spoke to the Magi through a star. For what is speech, if not the signification of will? He speaks through lot, as He spoke when appointing Matthias to the place of Judas. He speaks through the human soul, as through the Prophet. He speaks through an angel, as we accept He spoke to some of the Patriarchs, Prophets, and Apostles. He speaks through some vocal and sounding creature, as we read and hold that voices were made from heaven, though none saw with their eyes. Finally, to man himself, not externally through his ears or eyes, but inwardly in the soul, God speaks in not just one way, but either in dreams, as He spoke to Laban the Syrian so that he would not harm his servant Jacob in any way, and to Pharaoh regarding the seven years of abundance and the same number of barren years. Or with the spirit of man taken up, which the Greeks call "ecstasy," as it was shown to Peter while praying that a vessel filled with symbols of the future gentiles was descended from heaven. Or in the mind itself, when one understands the Majesty or will, as Peter himself realized what the Lord wanted him to do through that very vision, by pondering it within himself. For none can recognize this unless a certain silent cry of truth sounds within them. God also speaks in the conscience of the good and the wicked. For no one can rightly approve what is done well or condemn what is sinful unless in the silence of the heart, a voice of truth either praises or rebukes. But truth is God: who, when speaking to humans in so many ways, both to the good and the bad—although not all to whom He speaks in such ways can perceive His substance and nature—who among men can, by supposing or pondering, gather in how many and which ways the same Truth speaks to angels, whether to the good who, contemplating and enjoying Him through wonderful love, delight in His ineffable form and beauty, or to the wicked who, corrupted by their pride and placed by Truth in lower realms, can hear His voice in certain hidden ways, though they are not worthy to see His face? The devil was able to hear the voice of God speaking.

Wherefore, most beloved Brothers, faithful children of God and true-born sons of the catholic mother, let no one deceive you with poisoned foods, even if you still need to be nourished with milk. Now walk perseveringly by the faith of truth, so that at the certain and appropriate time you may be able to come to the vision of its Truth. For as the Apostle says: While we remain in the body, we are away from the Lord; for we walk by faith, not by sight. But the Christian faith leads to the vision of the Father. Hence the Lord says: No one comes to the Father except through me. Therefore, it is vain for these people to ask how the devil could come to God through Christ. For the devil cannot reach that happiness of contemplation, to which the Christian faith leads those who are pure in heart. Nevertheless, this does not mean that the devil could not hear the voice of God speaking, just as many men who did not believe in Christ could hear the voice of God speaking from heaven: I have both glorified it and will glorify it again, when the Lord had said: Father, glorify your Son.

What the sight of God is. But that which is written, that the devil came into the presence of God, is not written because anyone can ever flee from the sight of God, to whose eyes all things are subjected, and to whom the depth of any heart is open, but because these events happened in the secrecy of creation, which the Scripture has narrated. Therefore, it is written: "And behold, the angels came into the presence of God," although they never depart from the sight of God. For wherever they are sent, there also is present the sight of God. But that is properly called the sight of God, which human sight cannot penetrate, such as the secrets of the conscience. Therefore, when we reproach a liar, we do not say he spoke in the sight of God, because he did not speak that which God sees in his mind, where human sight cannot direct itself. Because these things were conducted so secretly that they could not be indicated to men through the Holy Scriptures unless revealed by the Holy Spirit, it is narrated that they came into the presence of God and were conducted there. The devil could hear the voice of God, but he could not see Him.

However, that the devil was in the midst of the angels, if you understand good angels, understand the devil in their midst as the accused stands in the midst of guards to be heard by the judge. For the scripture does not declare what kind of angels those were. But if it was in the midst of evil angels, what is surprising about the leader and guide being surrounded by the crowd of his servants? But if you accept that which is said in the sight of God, so that those come into the sight of God, who are not only seen by Him but also see Him, then it is to be understood that the devil was in their midst, but that nevertheless he did not see God whom they saw, so that God would have spoken to the devil through one of the holy angels. Yet it is not written in the book except: God said. Just as even in public matters, although the judge speaks many things through a herald, the judge's name is inserted when the records are written, but not the herald's. However, just as some man unworthy of prophetic vision can nevertheless stand in the midst of Prophets, so that he only hears what the Lord says through them, but does not see what they see, so could the devil be in the midst of the holy angels who see God, through whom he would hear the voice of God, whom he himself could not see. The impudence of the Manichaeans. And indeed you perceive that the machinations of the Manicheans, as far as this question is concerned, have been resolved in many ways, so that you no longer think, dearest Brothers, that the devil truly has spoken with God in such a way that he could have seen the face of truth, which pure hearts gaze upon, or that he could have come to that contemplation of blessedness to which no one is permitted to come except through the Lord Jesus Christ. However, I am greatly astonished at the impudence of these people who wish to accuse us regarding the vision of the divine substance, and they lie about what is not written in our Scriptures, claiming that the devil has seen God. They attempt to create so much envy from this that anyone who shudders and judges it unworthy that the devil has seen God may be turned away from the authority of the divine Scriptures by suspicious ignorance, not understanding what is written, while they themselves do not deny that our Lord Jesus Christ is God, and they falsely claim that He has appeared to men without the assumption of a human body.

Certain angels had real bodies.

When, therefore, the devil dared to tempt the Lord, when he saw him, what did he see? If he saw his body, therefore the Lord had a body, which the lost do not want to confess. But if he did not have a body, then the divine substance itself was subject to the eyes of the devil. Which only those who are pure in heart see, as they themselves commemorate to us from the Gospel, O impertinent blindness of heretics! Why do you falsely accuse our Scriptures, that the devil saw God, and by denying the body of Christ, you are convicted of wanting to reveal the divine substance of him to the eyes of the devil? Or perhaps, as they are accustomed to say, he did not have a human body, but yet showed himself as if he had one? Who then thinks more truly and rightly, you insane ones, who believe that God spoke with the devil, or who believe that God not only spoke with the devil but also lied to the devil? For Scripture remembers that certain angels appeared to human eyes. But surely the Lord subjected bodily creation to their power in such a way that he adapted it to them according to their will. Whence, although they were not born of a woman, they had a true body, which they converted from any form into any form according to the reason of their ministry and duty, yet from true into true. For not even the Lord himself, when he converted water into wine, can we say that the water was false or the wine was false. Our Lord assumed a true body.

Therefore, every body, whose nature and order are changeable, according to the will of the most omnipotent Creator, whatever species it may have been changed into, still does not depart from its truth in its own kind, because with whatever variety it is changed, it does not cease to be a body and a true body. But since they [the heretics] imagine that all corporeal nature is not from the omnipotent Creator God, but from some sort of darkness, we ask them, from where did our Lord Jesus Christ assume a body? For if they say that he did not assume any body, what was that which appeared to human and bodily eyes? Either it was the lie of a phantom, which is execrable to believe; or if they contend that his own divine substance presented himself to human eyes without an assumption of a body, and even the devil saw this, then what of the proclamations in this contentious question: “Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God”? But if they perhaps say that the divine and proper substance of the Lord is not such as it is with the Father, as he wished to show himself on earth by assuming no body, what else did they wretchedly believe but that it is changeable with respect to places and times? For they do not wish to read or easily understand what is said through the Prophet: “You will change them, and they will be changed; but you are the same, and your years will not fail.” And what is written of divine Wisdom in the letters of Wisdom concerning itself: “Remaining in itself, it renews all things.” The Manichaeans worship the sun as if it were a god.

According to their sense, if anyone says to them: "Why do you marvel if God also changed the form of His divinity, so that he who is the devil with the most sordid heart could see Him, just as it appears to you about Christ God?" I do not know what they would respond. For they never dared to say that the Father and the Son are not of one substance. And if they were to say that the Son is of another substance, it could be replied to them: "From where then do you know whether the old Scripture mentions the devil speaking with the Father or with the Son?" Then we ask: "Does the devil see this sun, or does he not? If he sees, how then is the sun God, whom the devil sees? If he does not see, yet evil men see him, how then is God whom those see who are not pure of heart? Or if he too was changed so that he might be seen and is not what he appears to be, what if you then show one thing but are another, so you could imitate the sun not only worship it?" And yet if you ask them whether the divine substance is changeable or unchangeable, they cannot but say unchangeable, not taught by reason but confused by shame. Therefore, it remains that they are forced to confess that our Lord Jesus Christ took on a body from elsewhere so that He might appear to human eyes. And if they confess this, I ask from where He took it. If they say from this world, I ask from what part of the world is the body? Immediately they respond to me: "From the people of darkness." O wondrous madness! Why then, wretched ones, do you fear the womb of the Virgin in the body of the Savior but do not fear the people of demons? The Lord preferred to take a body from a woman.

We indeed profess that the entire nature of the body comes from God the omnipotent Creator. And therefore, wherever our Lord assumed the body, He would take it from His creation. But He preferred from a woman. Truly, He came to liberate human creation, which had fallen through a woman. Hence, wishing to bring both sexes into hope of renewal and restoration, He chose the male sex from which He would be born, and the female sex through which He would be born. But you who shudder at the chaste womb of the virgin, choose, I pray you, from where the Lord should have assumed a body. You say that every body is the substance of the race of darkness. Therefore, as I said, choose from where the Son of God ought to assume a body. Or have you lost the light of response, because darkness meets you wherever you turn your eyes? "But," they say, "mortal flesh seems more impure.” Recite to them the Apostle: “All things are pure to the pure." And recite to them the Apostle: "To the impure and unbelieving, nothing is pure, but both their mind and conscience are polluted." If, however, they do not say "more impure" but "weaker," we plainly agree. And therefore Christ is our strength, because He was not changed by our weakness. Here I recognize the voice of the Prophet: "You will change them, and they will be changed; but you are the same, and your years will not fail." Not only did the weakness of the flesh not change Him for the worse, but it was itself changed for the better by Him. This bodily sun, which they think not to be a body - to the point that those who falsely boast about spiritual discussions do not understand what a body is - this bodily sun, simply because it is a heavenly body, illuminates the earth and is not darkened by it; dries up water and is not wetted by it; dissolves ice, and is not chilled by it; hardens mud, and is not softened by it. And our Lord Jesus Christ, the Word of the Father, through whom all things were made, the Power and Wisdom of God, present everywhere, hidden everywhere, whole everywhere, enclosed nowhere, reaching from end to end mightily and disposing all things sweetly, do the unfortunate fear that He could not assume a man in such a way as to give life to mortals and not be destroyed by them, to sanctify the flesh and not be polluted by it, to dissolve death and not be bound by it, to change man in Himself and not be changed into man? Compelled to dispute one thing from another, on account of some wavering and dangerous weakness of faith. But regarding the proposed question, although that Scripture, from which they preferred to plot rather than to be enlightened, does not prove that God was seen by the devil, still let them see how the race of darkness could have seen the divine substance, when before the battle which they say mixed good and evil, the divine substance had not yet assumed any body so as to be seen by its enemy. Therefore, let them recognize that they vainly wish to overthrow the foundations of the Catholic faith, when they cannot prop up their ruinous fables with any response strong enough to withstand.

SERMO 120 ABOUT THE SAME WORDS OF JOHN (1, 1-3):

"In the beginning was the Word," etc. The Word of God incomprehensible revealed in the Gospel. The beginning of the Gospel of John: In the beginning was the Word. Thus it began, he saw this, and transcending the whole creation, mountains, air, heavens, stars, Thrones, Dominions, Principalities, Powers, all Angels, all Archangels, transcending all things, in the beginning he saw the Word, and drank. He saw above all creation, he drank from the breast of the Lord. For he is John the holy evangelist, who Jesus especially loved; so that he would lean on his breast. There was this secret, that it would be drunk from there, which would be belched out in the Gospel. Happy are those who hear and understand. Those who, and even if they do not understand, believe are of the subsequent happiness. For how great it is to see the Word of God, who could explain it with human words? The Word of God is everywhere whole.

Lift up your hearts, my brothers; as much as you can, lift them up; whatever occurs to you through the imagination of any body, reject it. If the Word of God occurs to you, however you think about the light of this sun, no matter how much you spread it, no matter how much you extend it, set no boundaries for its light in your thought; compared to the Word of God, it is nothing. Whatever the soul thinks that is such, is less in part than in whole. Think of the Word as whole everywhere. Understand what I say; as much as I can, I confine myself through my limitations for you. Understand what I say. Behold this light from heaven, which is called by the name of the sun, when it proceeds, it illuminates the lands, unfolds the day, makes forms, and distinguishes colors. A great good, a great gift of God to all mortals; its works magnify Him. If the sun is so beautiful, what is more beautiful than the Maker of the sun? And yet see, brothers; behold it spreads its rays through the entire earth; it penetrates open places, closed ones resist; it sends its light through windows, can it also through walls? Everything is open to the Word of God, nothing is hidden from the Word of God. See another difference, how far the creature, especially the corporeal, is from the Creator. When the sun is in the East, it is not in the West. Indeed, its light poured out from that great body extends to the West; but it itself is not there. When it begins to set, then it is there. When it rises, it is in the East; when it sets, it is in the West. Through these two works of its own, it gave names to places. Because when it rises in the East towards the East, it made the East to be called; because when it sets in the West towards the West, it made the West to be called. It appears nowhere at night. Is the Word of God like this? Is it that when it is in the East, it is not in the West, or when it is in the West, it is not in the East? Or does it sometimes leave the lands and goes under the lands, or behind the lands? It is whole everywhere. Who explains this with words? Who sees this? With what proof will I prove to you what I say? I speak as a man, I speak to men; I speak as a weak one to weaker ones. And yet, my brothers, I dare to say what I say to you, either through a glass darkly, or in a riddle, somehow I see, somehow I understand and in my heart I have a word about this matter. But it seeks to come out to you, and it does not find a worthy vehicle. The vehicle of the word is the sound of the voice. What I say within myself, I seek to say to you, and words fail. For I wish to speak of the Word of God. What kind of Word, what great Word?

All things were made through it. Look at the works, and be in awe of the Worker. All things were made through it. The excellence of the divine word is to be understood from the property of the human word. Newly baptized in white garments.

Return with me, human frailty, therefore return. Let us comprehend human understanding itself, if we can. We are humans, and we who speak, speak to humans, and emit the sound of our voice. We convey the sound of our voice to the ears of humans, and through the sound of our voice and somehow the understanding is put into the heart through the ear. Thus, let us express what we can, as we can, and comprehend this. But if we are not able to comprehend this either, what are we to speak of? Behold, you hear me: I make a word. If someone were to go out from here and be questioned outside about what is happening here, he would respond: The Bishop is making a word. I make a word about the Word. But what kind of word, and about what kind of Word? A mortal word, about an immortal Word; a mutable word, about an immutable Word; a transient word, about an eternal Word. Yet consider my word. For I had said to you: The Word of God is wholly everywhere. Behold, I make a word for you; what I say reaches everyone. For what I say to reach everyone, did you have to divide what I say? If I were to feed you, desiring to fill not your mind but your belly, and I placed bread before you so you could be filled; wouldn't you divide my bread among yourselves? Could my bread reach each one of you? If it reached one, the others would have nothing. Behold, I speak, and you all have it. It is little because you all have it; and you all have it entirely. The whole reaches everyone, the whole to individuals. O miracles of my word! What then is the Word of God? Listen to another thing. I said: What I said proceeded to you and did not depart from me. It reached you, yet it wasn't separated from me. Before I said it, I had it, and you did not have it; I said it, and you began to have it and I lost nothing. O miracle of my word! What then is the Word of God? From small things, infer great things. Consider earthly things, praise heavenly things. I am a creature, you are creatures; and so many miracles happen from my word in my heart, in my mouth, in my voice, in your ears, in your hearts. What is the Creator? O Lord, hear us. Make us, for you have made us. Make us good, for you made us enlightened humans. Those who are washed, enlightened, hear your word through me. For those who are enlightened by your grace stand before you. This is the day the Lord has made. But let them labor for this, let them pray for this, so that when these days have passed, they do not become darkness, but remain the light of God's miracles and blessings.

Sermons - Sermon 121

SERMO 121 On the words of the Gospel of John (1, 10-14):

"The world was made through Him." The world: a double meaning of the word.

Therefore Christ was in the world, and the world was made through Him, and the world did not know Him. Which world was made through Him, which world did not know Him? For the world that was made through Him did not itself not know Him. Who is the world that was made through Him? Heaven and earth. How did heaven not know Him when at His passion the sun was darkened, how did the earth not know Him when it trembled while He was hanging there? But the world did not know Him whose prince is he of whom it was said: Behold, the prince of this world comes, and he has nothing in me. Evil men are called "the world," unfaithful men are called "the world." They received their name from what they love. By loving God, we become gods. Therefore by loving the world, we are called "the world." But God was in Christ reconciling the world to Himself. Therefore the world did not know Him, but does that mean all? The world is evil.

He came to his own, and his own did not receive him. To his own... All things are his, but his own are called those from whom his mother was, from whom he took flesh, to whom he had previously sent the heralds of his coming, to whom he had given the law, whom he had freed from the servitude of Egypt, whose carnal father he chose, Abraham. For he truly said: Before Abraham was, I am. He did not say: Before Abraham existed, I am, or: Before Abraham was created, I am, or: Before Abraham was, I am. For in the beginning was the Word, not made. Therefore: He came to his own, and his own did not receive him. Who are the sons of Abraham? But as many as received him... Indeed, there the Apostles who received him, there those who carried branches before his beast, went ahead and followed and spread their garments and with a loud voice said: Hosanna, son of David, blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord! Then the Pharisees said to him: Restrain the boys, they should not cry these things to you. And he: If these will be silent, the stones will cry out. He saw us when he said these things: If these will be silent, the stones will cry out. Who are the stones if not those who worship stones? If the little Jews will be silent, the greater and lesser nations will cry out. Who are the stones if not those of whom that John speaks who came to bear witness to the light? For when he saw the Jews boasting of being the offspring of Abraham, he said to them: Generation of vipers. They called themselves sons of Abraham and he called them: Generation of vipers. Was he injuring Abraham? Far from it! He gave them a name from their deeds, for if they were sons of Abraham, they would imitate Abraham. As he himself also said to those who said to him: We are free and have never served anyone, we have Abraham as our father. And he: If you were Abraham's children, you would do the deeds of Abraham. You want to kill me because I tell you the truth, this Abraham did not do. Therefore, you are born from him, but you have become degenerate. So what did John say? Generation of vipers, who has warned you to flee from the coming wrath? Because they were coming to be baptized in John's baptism for repentance. Who has warned you to flee from the coming wrath? Therefore produce fruit worthy of repentance and do not say in your hearts: We have Abraham as our father. God is able from these stones to raise up children for Abraham. God is able from these stones, those whom he saw in spirit; he was speaking to them and foresaw us. For God is able from these stones to raise up children for Abraham. Of what stones: if these will be silent, the stones will cry out. Now you have heard them and cried out. It has been fulfilled: the stones will cry out. For we have come from the nations. In our ancestors, we worshipped stones, therefore we were called dogs. Remember what that woman heard who cried after the Lord because she was a Canaanite, a worshipper of idols, a slave of demons. What did Jesus say? It is not right to take the children’s bread and cast it to the dogs. Have you never noticed how dogs lick the anointed stones? So are all worshippers of idols. But grace has come to you. But as many as received him, to them he gave power to become the children of God. Behold, you now have the born: He gave them power to become the children of God. To whom did he give this? To those who believe in his name.

Twofold birth. And how do they become sons of God? Those who are not born of bloods, nor of the will of man, nor of the will of the flesh, but of God. Attend therefore; these are born of God, having received power to become sons of God. They are born of God, not of bloods. What kind of birth is the first? What kind of birth is miserable, coming from the miserable? But those who are born of God, what was it from which they were first born? They were mixed from bloods, from the bloods of male and female, from the commixture of the flesh of male and female, from there they were born. Now from where are they born of God? The first birth from male and female, the second birth from God and the Church. The same argument is treated.

Behold, they are born of God. How has it come to pass that those who were first born of men are now born of God? How has it come to pass that He dwelled among us? A great change: He was made flesh, they were made spirit. What is this? What kind of dignity, my brothers! Raise your mind to hope for and receive better things. Do not enslave yourselves to worldly desires. You were bought at a price; for your sake the Word was made flesh, for your sake He who was the Son of God was made the Son of Man so that you, who were sons of men, might be made sons of God. What was He? What has He become? What were you? What have you become? He was the Son of God who became the Son of Man. You were sons of men who have become sons of God. He shared in our evils and will give us His goods. Yet He, by becoming the Son of Man, differs from us. We are sons of men through carnal desire. He is the Son of Man through the faith of a Virgin. The mother of any human being has conceived by lying with a man. Each one born from a human father and a human mother. Christ however was born of the Holy Spirit and the virgin Mary. He approached us but did not greatly depart from Himself. Indeed, He never ceased to be what He was as God but added to Himself the nature of our being. For He took on what He was not, without losing what He was, made the Son of Man, but did not cease to be the Son of God. Thus, the Mediator in the middle. What does 'in the middle' mean? Neither above nor below. How is He neither above nor below? Neither above because He is flesh, nor below because He is not a sinner, but insofar as He is God, always above. For He did not come to us in such a way as to abandon the Father; He came from us, came and did not abandon us; He will come to us and never abandon Him.

Sermons - Sermon 122

SERMO 122 ABOUT THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL OF JOHN (1, 48-51):

"When you were under the fig tree, I saw you," etc.

Nathanael under the fig tree, the human race under sin.

What we heard spoken by the Lord Jesus Christ to Nathanael, if we understand it well, does not pertain only to him himself. For indeed, the Lord Jesus saw the whole human race under the fig tree. In this context, by the fig tree, it is understood to signify sin. It does not signify this everywhere, but in this place, as I said, with the congruence of signification whereby you know that the first man, when he sinned, was covered with fig leaves. For they covered their shameful parts with these leaves when they were ashamed of their sin; and what God made for them, they made shameful for themselves. For there is no need to be ashamed of the work of God: but the cause of sin preceded confusion. If iniquity had not preceded, nakedness would never have caused shame. For they were naked and were not ashamed. They had not committed anything of which to be ashamed. Why did I mention this? So that through the fig, we might understand that sin was signified. What then does: When you were under the fig tree, I saw you mean? When you were under sin, I saw you. And indeed, referring to the actual event, Nathanael remembered being under the fig tree, where Christ was not present. But he was not there bodily; where, however, is he not present with spiritual knowledge? And because he knew he had been alone under the fig tree, where the Lord Christ was not when he said to him: When you were under the fig tree, I saw you; he recognized the divinity in him and exclaimed: You are the King of Israel. The dream of Jacob was a figure. The Lord said: Because I told you: I saw you when you were under the fig tree, from there you wonder; you will see greater things than these. What are these greater things? And He said: You will see heaven opened, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of Man. Let us recall the old story written in the Holy Book, that is in Genesis. When Jacob slept in a place, he placed a stone at his head; and in a dream he saw a ladder reaching from the earth up to heaven; and the Lord leaned upon it; and the angels went up and down on it. This Jacob saw. A man's dream would not be written unless some great mystery was symbolized in it, and something great prophesied in that vision was understood. Finally, as Jacob himself understood what he had seen, he placed the stone there, and poured oil on it. For you recognize the chrism: recognize also Christ. For he is the stone which the builders rejected; he became the head of the corner. He is the stone, of which he himself said: Whoever stumbles upon that stone will be shattered; upon whom, however, that stone falls, it will crush him. One stumbles upon it lying down: but it will fall upon him when He comes from above to judge the living and the dead. Woe to the Jews, because when Christ lay humbly, they stumbled over him. They say, This man is not from God, who breaks the Sabbath. If he is the Son of God, let him come down from the cross. Fool, the stone lies there, and so you mock. But while you mock, you are blind; while you are blind, you stumble; while you stumble, you are shattered; once shattered while it lies thus, afterwards falling from above, you will be crushed. Therefore Jacob anointed the stone. Did he make an idol?

He signified it, he did not worship it. Therefore now listen, consider that Nathanael, on whose occasion the Lord Jesus wished to explain to us the vision of Jacob. On the dual name and the struggle of Jacob.

You who have been educated in the school of Christ know that Jacob is also Israel. They are two names for one man. The first name was Jacob, given at his birth, which means "Supplanter." When those twins were born, the brother Esau was born first, and the hand of the younger one was found on the heel of the older one. He held onto his brother's heel as he was preceded in birth, and he himself followed. Because of this act, because he held his brother’s heel, he was called Jacob, that is, Supplanter. Later, as he was returning from Mesopotamia, an angel wrestled with him on the way. What strength can be compared to that of an angel and a man? Therefore, it is a mystery, a sacrament, a prophecy, a figure; let us understand. For see also the manner of wrestling. While he wrestled, Jacob prevailed over the angel. Great significance. And when he had prevailed over the angel, he held him; nevertheless, the man held the one whom he had defeated. And he said to him: "I will not let you go unless you bless me." When the victor was blessed by the vanquished, Christ was foreshadowed. Therefore, that angel, who is understood to be the Lord Jesus, said to Jacob: "You shall no longer be called Jacob, but your name shall be Israel," which means "Seeing God." Then he touched the nerve of his thigh, that is, the breadth of Jacob's thigh, and it dried up; and Jacob became lame. He is the one who was defeated. The one who was defeated had so much power that he also touched his thigh and made him lame. Therefore, he was willingly defeated. For he had the power to lay down his strength and the power to take it up again. The defeated does not get angry, because the crucified does not get angry. For he also blessed him, saying: “You shall no longer be called Jacob, but Israel.” Then "supplanter" became "seeing God." And he touched, as I said, his thigh and made him lame. Pay attention to Jacob, the Jewish people, those thousands who followed and preceded the Lord's beast, those who joined the Apostles in worshipping the Lord, crying out: "Hosanna to the Son of David; blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord." Behold Jacob, blessed. Now, lameness remained in those who are now Jews. The breadth of the thigh signifies the multitude of the people. About whom the Psalm, when it prophesied about the Gentiles believing, said: "The people whom I did not know served me, they obeyed me by the hearing of the ear." I was not there, yet I was heard; I was here, and I was killed. "The people whom I did not know served me, they obeyed me by the hearing of the ear. So faith comes from hearing, and hearing through the word of Christ." And it continues: "Foreign children lied to me," referring to the Jews. "Foreign children lied to me; foreign children grew old, and they limped away from their paths." I have assigned to you Jacob, both blessed and lame.

Why does Abraham not retain his first name along with the latter, while Jacob, on the contrary, does?

However, from this occasion, it must not be overlooked what might perhaps spontaneously disturb some of you; what does it mean that, when the name of Abraham, the grandfather of this Jacob, was changed (for he was previously called Abram, and God changed his name, and said: "You will not be called Abram but Abraham"), he was not thereafter called Abram. Search the Scriptures and you will see that before he received another name, he was called only Abram; after he received it, he was called only Abraham. However, this Jacob, when he received another name, heard the same words: "You will not be called Jacob, but you will be called Israel." Search the Scriptures and you will see that he was always called both Jacob and Israel. Having received another name, Abram was called only Abraham; having received another name, Jacob was called both Jacob and Israel. The name of Abraham needed to be explained in this age; for here he was made the father of many nations, from which he received his name. But the name Israel pertains to the other age, where we will see God. Therefore, the people of God, the Christian people, at this time are both Jacob and Israel; Jacob in reality, Israel in hope. For the smaller people of the greater people are called the supplanter of the brother. Have we not supplanted the Jews? But we are called their supplanters because they were supplanted for our sake. If they had not been blinded, Christ would not have been crucified; if Christ had not been crucified, that precious blood would not have been shed; if that blood had not been shed, the world would not have been redeemed. Because their blindness benefited us, therefore the greater was supplanted by the lesser brother, and the lesser was called “Supplanter.” But for how long? To the faithful Israelite, the vision of God is promised. A time will come, the end of the age will come, and all of Israel will believe; not those who are now, but their children who will then be. For now, those walking in their own ways will go to their places, they will pass into perpetual damnation. However, when the whole people are made one, what we sing will come true: "I shall be satisfied, when your glory is manifested." When the promise comes, which is promised to us, that we may see face to face. Now we see through a glass, darkly, and in part; but when both people are purified, resurrected, crowned, changed into an immortal form and perpetual incorruption, they will see God face to face, and Jacob will no longer exist, but only Israel; then the Lord will see him in the person of this holy Nathanael and say: "Behold, a true Israelite, in whom there is no deceit." When you hear: "Behold, a true Israelite," let Israel come to your mind; when Israel comes to your mind, let the dream come to your mind, in which he saw a ladder set up from earth to heaven, the Lord above it, and Angels of God ascending and descending. Jacob saw this dream. After this, he was called Israel: that is, after a little while coming from Mesopotamia and making his journey. If therefore Jacob saw the ladder, who was also called Israel; and this Nathanael is indeed a true Israelite, in whom there is no deceit; therefore, when the Lord said to him in amazement, "I saw you under the fig tree," he said to him: "You will see greater things than these." And again he mentioned Jacob's dream. To whom did he say this? To him whom he called an Israelite, in whom there was no deceit. As if saying: "The dream of the one whose name I called you by will appear in you; do not hasten to marvel, you will see greater things than these." You will see heaven opened and the Angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of Man. Behold what Jacob saw: behold why Jacob anointed the stone with oil; behold why Jacob prefigured and symbolized Christ. For that deed was a prophecy.

Christ is both here and above.

Now I know what you are waiting for: I understand what you want to hear from me. I will say this briefly too, as the Lord grants: Angels ascending and descending to the Son of Man. How is it that if they descend to him, he is here; if they ascend to him, he is above? But if they ascend to him, they descend to him, and he is above and here. It cannot be that they ascend to him and descend to him unless he is both where they ascend and here where they descend. How do we prove that he is both there and here? Let Paul answer us, who was first Saul. He himself experienced this when he was first a persecutor and later became a preacher: first Jacob, later Israel; he too was from the stock of Israel, from the tribe of Benjamin. In him, let us see Christ above, Christ below.

First, the voice of the Lord himself from heaven showed this: Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me? Had Paul ascended to heaven? Had Paul at least thrown a stone into heaven? He was persecuting Christians, binding them, dragging them off to be killed, searching for them wherever they were hiding, sparing none once he found them. The Lord Christ said to him: Saul, Saul. From where does he call? From heaven. Therefore, he is above. Why do you persecute me? Therefore, he is below. I have explained everything, as briefly as I could, to your Charity. I have dispensed what pertains to me: as for what pertains to you, think of the poor. Turn to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 123

SERMO 123 OF THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL OF JOHN (2, 1-11):

"JESUS ALSO WAS INVITED, AND HIS DISCIPLES, TO THE MARRIAGE," ETC. The humility of Christ is the medicine for our pride.

You know, brothers, for having believed in Christ, you have learned, and we also continuously commend to you through our ministry, that the remedy for the swelling of man is the humility of Christ. For man would not have perished unless he had swollen with pride. For the beginning of all sin, as Scripture says, is pride. Against the beginning of sin, the beginning of justice was necessary. If, therefore, the beginning of all sin is pride, by what means would the swelling of pride be healed unless God deigned to become humble? Let man be ashamed to be proud; for God became humble. For when it is said to man to humble himself, he disdains it; and men desire to be avenged when they are harmed, which pride causes. When they disdain to be humble, they want to be avenged; as if another's punishment could benefit each one. The injured and wronged person wants to be avenged; he seeks a remedy for himself from another's punishment and acquires great torment. Therefore, in all things, the Lord Christ deigned to be humble, providing us the way: if indeed we deign to walk through it.

Why did Christ, when hungry, not make bread from a stone, as He made wine from water at the wedding?

Behold among other things, the Son of the Virgin came to a wedding; He who was with the Father instituted marriages. Just as the first woman was made, through whom sin came, from a man without a woman; thus the man, by whom sin was erased, from a woman without a man. Through the former we fell, through the latter we rise. And what did He do at those weddings? He made wine from water. What is more powerful? He who could do such things deigned to suffer need. He who made wine from water was also able to make bread from stones. It was the same power: but then the devil tempted, so Christ did not do it. For you know that when the Lord Christ was tempted, the devil suggested this to Him. For He was hungry, because He also deigned to be, because this too pertained to humility. The bread was hungry, just as the Way was tired, just as Health was wounded, just as Life was dead. Therefore, when He was hungry, as you know, the tempter said to Him: If You are the Son of God, tell these stones to become bread. And He answered the tempter, teaching you to respond to the tempter. For the commander fights for this purpose, that soldiers may learn. What did He reply? Man does not live by bread alone, but by every word of God. And He did not make bread from stones, who certainly could make it, just as He made wine from water. For it is of the same power to make bread from stone; but He did not do it, so as to scorn the will of the tempter. For otherwise the tempter is not conquered unless he is scorned. And when He had conquered the devil the tempter, the angels came and ministered to Him. Therefore, He who could do so much, why did He not do that, and did this? Read, or rather recall, what you have just heard, when He did this, that is, made wine from water; what did the Evangelist add? And His disciples believed in Him. Was the devil then about to believe?

Christ, humble, is the way to the homeland.

Therefore, He who could do so much was hungry, thirsty, tired, slept, was apprehended, beaten, crucified, killed. This is the way: walk through humility to come to eternity. God Christ is the homeland to which we go; man Christ is the way by which we go. We go to Him, we go through Him; what do we fear that we might stray? He did not depart from the Father, and came to us. He sucked at the breast and held the world. He lay in a manger and fed the Angels. God and man, the same God who is man, the same man who is God. But not from where He is man, from there is He God. He is God because He is the Word; He is man because the Word was made flesh; and remaining God, He took on human flesh; by adding what He was not, not losing what He was. Therefore, He who already suffered through that humility, already died, already was buried, already rose again, already ascended into heaven, is there and sits at the right hand of the Father: and He is here in need in His poor. I also commended this to your Love yesterday [in the previous sermon] because of what He said to Nathanael: You will see greater things than these. For truly I say to you, you will see heaven opened, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of Man. We have inquired what this is, and spoke at length; should we today also repeat the same? Those who were present may remember: yet briefly, I will recall.

Christ both above and below. Christ both rich and poor.

He would not say: Ascending to the Son of Man, unless he were above; he would not say: descending to the Son of Man, unless he were also below. He himself is above, he himself is below; above in himself, below in his own; above with the Father, below among us. Hence also that voice to Saul: Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me? He would not say: Saul, Saul, unless he were above. Saul did not persecute him above; he would not say: Why do you persecute me? who was above, unless he was also below. Fear Christ above, recognize him below. Have Christ above as the giver, recognize him here as needy. Here he is poor, there he is rich. Because Christ is poor here, he himself says for us: I was hungry, I was thirsty, I was naked, I was a stranger, I was in prison. And to some he said: You ministered to me; to some he said: You did not minister to me. Behold, we have proved Christ to be poor: who does not know Christ to be rich? And here it pertained to those riches that he turned water into wine. If he is rich who has wine, what kind of rich is he who makes wine? Therefore, Christ is rich and poor: rich as God, poor as man. And now he himself, the man, ascended rich into heaven, and sits at the right hand of the Father: yet still here he is poor, hungry, thirsty, naked.

Every man is a pauper and beggar of God.

What are you? Rich or poor? Many say to me: I am poor; and they speak the truth. I recognize someone who has something poor, I also recognize someone who is in need. But someone has much gold and silver. Oh, if only he would recognize himself as poor! He recognizes himself as poor if he recognizes the poor beside him. For what? No matter how much you have, whoever you are rich, you are a beggar of God. The time of prayer comes, and I test you there. You ask. How are you not poor, when you ask? I add more: You ask for bread. Are you not going to say: Give us this day our daily bread? Who asks for daily bread, are you poor or rich? And yet Christ says to you: Give me from that which I have given to you. For what did you bring when you came here? All that I created, you found here created: you brought nothing, and you will take nothing from here. Why do you not give me from my own? Because you are full, and the poor one is empty. Consider your beginnings: both were born naked. And so you were born naked. You found many things here: did you bring anything with you? I ask from my own: give, and I will repay. You had me as a giver, make me quickly a debtor. It is little that I said: You had me as a giver, make me a debtor; have me as a borrower. You give me a little, I will repay more. You give me earthly things, I will repay heavenly things. You give me temporal things, I will repay eternal things. I will give you yourself in return when I will have given myself to you.

Sermons - Sermon 124

SERMO 124 OF THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL OF JOHN (5:2-4):

"There is in Jerusalem by the Sheep Gate a pool called Bethesda in Hebrew." The healing of the sick at the pool was a foreshadowing.

Most recently, the reading from the Gospel sounded in our ears, and made us attentive to understand what was read. I think this is expected of me, this I promise to explain with all my strength, with the Lord's help. For without a doubt, those miracles did not happen in vain and they symbolized something for our eternal salvation. For the health of the body that was restored to the man, how long did it last? What is your life, says the holy Scripture? It is a vapor that appears for a little while; then it will be banished. Therefore, the health that was restored to that man's body for a time, was a certain prolonging of vapor. Therefore, it is not to be considered a great thing: the health of man is vain. And recall that, brothers, that prophetic and evangelical statement, which is read in the Gospel: All flesh is grass, and all the glory of flesh is as the flower of grass; the grass withers, the flower falls; but the Word of the Lord remains forever. The Word of the Lord also gives honor to the grass, and not transient honor: it even grants immortality to the flesh. This whole life is tribulation. The torturers of the soul are fear and pain. But first the tribulation of this life passes, from which He grants us help, to whom we said: Give us help from tribulation. For this whole life is indeed a tribulation to those who understand. There are two tormentors of the soul, not tormenting at the same time, but alternating their torment. The names of these two tormentors are fear and pain. When it is well with you, you fear; when it is ill with you, you grieve. Who, in this age, is not deceived by prosperity, is not broken by adversity? In this hay and in the days of hay it is necessary to hold on to the safer path, the Word of God. For when it was said: All flesh is hay, and all the glory of flesh as the flower of hay; the hay withered, the flower fell; as though we should ask: What hope is there for hay? What stability for the flower of hay? But the Word, he says, of the Lord remains forever. And from where, you ask, is the Word of the Lord for me? The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us. For the Word of the Lord says to you: Do not reject my promise, because I did not reject your hay. Therefore what the Word of the Lord has granted us, so that we may hold on to Him, lest we pass away with the flower of hay; therefore what it has granted us, that the Word might be made flesh, assuming flesh, not being changed into flesh; remaining and assuming, remaining what it was, assuming what it was not; therefore what it has granted us, that pool also signifies. The significance of the Probatic Pool. The humility of Christ is not to be refused through pride.

Briefly I say: that water was the Jewish people; the five porticoes, the Law. For Moses wrote five books. Therefore, the water was surrounded by five porticoes, just as that people was constrained by the law. The stirring of the water, in that people, is the passion of the Lord. Whoever descended was healed, but only one: because that is unity. To those who are displeased by the passion of Christ, they are proud; they do not wish to descend, they are not healed. And I, he says, am going to believe in a God in the flesh, a God born of a woman, a God crucified, scourged, dead, wounded, buried? Far be it that I would believe this about God; it is unworthy. Let the heart speak, not the neck. The humility of the Lord seems unworthy to the proud, therefore healing is far from such as these. Do not exalt yourself: if you wish to be healed, descend. Piety should have stood in awe, if Christ were said to be changeable in the flesh. But now the truth commends to you the unchangeable Christ, as far as the Word is concerned. For in the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God; not that it sounded and passed away; because the Word was God. Therefore, your God remains unchangeable. O truthful piety: your God remains; do not be afraid, he does not perish; and through him, neither do you perish. He remains, born of a woman; but in the flesh. But the Word also created the mother. He who was before being made, made for himself one in whom to be made. He was an infant; but in the flesh. He sucked, grew, took nourishment, passed through ages, reached youth; but in the flesh. Weary, he slept, but in the flesh. He suffered hunger and thirst; but in the flesh. Captured, bound, scourged, insulted, finally crucified, killed; but in the flesh. Why are you afraid? The Word of the Lord remains forever. Whoever rejects this humility of God does not wish for themselves the healing from the deadly swelling of pride.

Christ assumed mortality to give immortality. The brevity of this life.

Then indeed, the Lord Jesus Christ provided hope for our flesh through His flesh. For He took on what we knew in this earth, what abounded here: to be born and to die. To be born and to die, this abounded here; to rise again and to live forever, this was not here. He found here worthless earthly goods; He brought foreign heavenly ones. If you fear death, love the resurrection. He provided you help from His tribulation: for your salvation had remained in vain. Therefore, brothers, let us recognize and love salvation in this world, which is foreign, that is, eternal, and let us live in this world as foreigners. Let us think of passing through, and we will sin less. Rather, let us give thanks to the Lord our God, because He wanted the last day of this life to be both brief and uncertain. From first infancy to decrepit old age, it is a brief span. What would it have profited him if Adam were to die today, having lived so long? What is long where there is an end? No one recalls yesterday: today is hastening to be overtaken by tomorrow, so that it may pass away. Let us live well in that brief span, so that we may go to where we will not pass away. And now, while we speak, we certainly pass. Words run, and hours fly; thus our age, thus our deeds, thus our honors, thus our misery, thus this our happiness. Everything passes, but let us not fear: the Word of the Lord remains forever. Turned to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 125

SERMO 125 AGAINST JOHN (CHAP. 5; 9):

"About the five porticoes, where a multitude of the sick lay;" AND ABOUT THE POOL OF SILOAM The same things are not repeated in vain by the expounder of the Scriptures.

Neither crude things are repeated for your ears nor for your hearts; however, they renew the affection of the listener and in a certain way, by being recalled, they renew us; nor do we tire of hearing the things that are known, because the things of the Lord are always sweet. The explanation of the divine Scriptures is like the divine Scriptures themselves; even if they are known, they are read nonetheless for the purpose of remembrance. Thus, their explanation, even if known, must still be repeated, so that those who have forgotten may be reminded, or those who perhaps have not heard may hear; and those who retain what they are accustomed to hearing, by repetition, may ensure they cannot forget. For we remember that we have already spoken about this chapter of the Gospel to your Charity. Nor is it wearisome, however, to recall the same things to you, just as it was not wearisome to repeat the same reading to you. The Apostle Paul says in one of his Epistles: "To write the same things to you is indeed not tedious for me, but for you it is necessary." Thus, for us also to say the same things to you is not tedious for us, but for you it is safe. The five porches symbolized the law of Moses. The impotence of the law to heal. Why the law was given.

Five porticoes, in which the sick lay, signify the law, which was first given to the Jews and the people of Israel through God's servant Moses. For indeed, Moses himself, the minister of the law, made five books. Therefore, because of the number of books that he wrote, the five porticoes symbolized the law. But since the law was not given to heal the sick, but to reveal and show; for thus the Apostle says: "If there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law; but the Scripture has concluded all under sin, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to those who believe"; therefore, in those porticoes the sick lay, they were not healed. For what does he say? "If there had been a law given which could have given life." Therefore those porticoes, which symbolized the law, could not heal the sick. Someone says to me: Why then was it given? The Apostle Paul himself expounded it: "The scripture has concluded all under sin, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to those who believe." For those who were sick thought themselves to be well. They received the law, which they could not fulfill; they learned in which sickness they were, and they implored the doctor's hands; they wanted to be healed, because they realized they were ill; which they would not realize unless they could not fulfill the given law. For an innocent man seemed to himself, and out of the same pride of false innocence, he became more insane. Therefore, to crush pride, and to expose it, the law was given; not to free the sick, but to convict the proud. Therefore, let Your Charity attend: the law was given to reveal illnesses, not to remove them. Therefore those sick ones, who could secretly be sick in their own homes, if those five porticoes did not exist, were exposed to the eyes of all in those porticoes, but they were not healed by the porticoes. Therefore, the law was useful to reveal sins, because a man, having become more guilty through the transgression of the law, could, with pride subdued, implore the help of the merciful one. Attend to the Apostle: "The law entered that the offense might abound; but where sin abounded, grace did much more abound." What is: "the law entered that the offense might abound"? As he says elsewhere: "For where there is no law, there is no transgression." A man can be called a sinner before the law, but cannot be called a transgressor. But when he has received the law and then sinned, he is found not only a sinner but also a transgressor. Therefore, when transgression is added to sin, the offense abounds. When the offense abounds, human pride finally learns to submit and confess to God, and say: "I am infirm." Also to say those words of the Psalm, which only a humbled soul says: "I said, Lord, be merciful unto me; heal my soul, for I have sinned against Thee." Therefore, let the infirm soul say this, at least convinced through transgression; and not healed, but shown by the law. Listen also to Paul himself showing you that the law is good, and yet without the grace of Christ it does not free from sin. For the law can prohibit and command; it cannot bring the medicine to heal what prevents man from fulfilling the law, but grace does that. For the Apostle says: "For I delight in the law of God after the inward man." That is, I now see that what the law reproves is evil, and what the law commands is good. "For I delight in the law of God after the inward man. But I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin." This is from the punishment of sin, from the inheritance of death, from the condemnation of Adam, it opposes the law of the mind and captivates to the law of sin, which is in the members. He has been convicted; he received the law to be convicted; see how it profited him that he was convicted. Hear the following words: "O wretched man that I am! Who shall deliver me from the body of this death? I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord."

One sick person healed by the stirred water, what does it signify?

Pay attention therefore. Those porticoes symbolized the law, carrying the sick, not healing them; exposing, not curing. But who cured the sick? He who descended into the pool. When did the sick descend into the pool? When the Angel gave a sign by the stirring of the water. For that pool was sanctified in such a way that an Angel would come and stir the water. People saw the water; but from the stirring of the troubled water, they understood the presence of the Angel. If anyone then descended, he would be cured. Why then was that sick man not cured? Let us consider his words: "I have no man," he said, "to put me into the pool when the water is stirred; for while I am coming, another descends before me." Therefore, could you not descend afterward if another descends before you? It was signified here that only one was cured at the stirring of the water. Whoever descended first would alone be cured; whoever descended afterward at that movement of the water would not be healed; but would wait until it was stirred again. What does this sacrament mean then? For it is not without cause. Pay attention, beloved. The waters are set in the Apocalypse as a figure of peoples. For when John saw many waters, he inquired in the Apocalypse what it meant, and it was said to him that they were peoples. Therefore, that water signified the people of the Jews. For as that people was held by the five books of Moses in the law, so that water was also surrounded by five porticoes. When was the water stirred? When the people of the Jews were disturbed. And when was the people of the Jews disturbed, unless when the Lord Jesus Christ came? The passion of the Lord, the stirring of the water. For the Jews were disturbed when the Lord suffered. Behold, what was read just now pertains to this very disturbance. The Jews wanted to kill him, not only because he did these things on the Sabbath, but because he called himself the Son of God, making himself equal to God. For Christ called himself the Son of God in a different way than it was said to men: "I said: you are gods, and all of you are sons of the Most High." For if he made himself the Son of God in the same way as any man can be called a son of God (for by the grace of God men are called sons of God), the Jews would not be angry. But because they understood him to say he was the Son of God in a different way, according to that: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God"; and according to what the Apostle says: "Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God"; they saw a man and were angry because he made himself equal to God. But he knew he was equal, yet where they could not see. What they saw, they wanted to crucify; what they did not see, they were judged by it. What did the Jews see? What the apostles also saw when Philip said, "Show us the Father, and it is enough for us." But what did the Jews not see? What the apostles themselves did not see when the Lord replied, "Have I been so long with you, and you do not know me? Whoever has seen me has seen the Father." Therefore, what the Jews could not see in him, they considered him a proud and impious man, making himself equal to God. There was disturbance, the water was stirred, and the Angel had come. For the Lord was also called the Angel of great counsel, because he was the messenger of the Father's will. For "Angel" in Greek is "Messenger" in Latin. And you have the Lord saying that he announces to us the kingdom of heaven. Therefore, the Angel of great counsel had come, but the Lord of all angels. And because of this, he was called an Angel because he took on flesh; but he is the Lord of angels because all things were made by him, and without him, nothing was made. For if all things, then also the angels. And therefore, he himself was not made because all things were made by him. What was made was made by the operation of the Word. The flesh that was made, the mother of Christ, could not have been born except by the Word, which was afterward born of her, being created.

God's rest on the seventh day. The six ages of the world. How God rested, and always works. The Jews were therefore troubled. What is this? Why is he doing these things on the Sabbaths? And especially at the very words of the Lord: My Father works even until now, and I work. It troubled them because they understood carnally, because God rested on the seventh day from all His works. For it is written in Genesis, and it is very well written, and it is reasonable why it is written. But they, thinking as if God had become tired and rested on the seventh day after everything, and therefore blessed it because He was refreshed from weariness, did not understand, being foolish, that He who made all things by the word could not be fatigued. Let them read and tell me how God could be made weary by saying: Let it be done; and it was done. Today, if a man were to do in this way as God did, who would be wearied? He said: Let there be light; and there was light. Again: Let there be a firmament; and it was so. Or if He said and it was not done, then He was fatigued. Elsewhere briefly: He said, and they were made; He commanded, and they were created. He therefore who makes thus, how does He labor? If He does not labor, how does He rest? But on that Sabbath, where it is said that God rested from all His works, in the rest of God, our rest was signified; because there will be a Sabbath of this world when the six ages have passed. The ages of the world pass like six days. One day passed from Adam to Noah; another passed from the flood to Abraham; a third from Abraham to David; a fourth from David to the Babylonian captivity; a fifth from the Babylonian captivity to the advent of our Lord Jesus Christ. Now the sixth day is being carried out. We are in the sixth age, in the sixth day. Therefore, let us be reformed to the image of God, because man was made in the image of God on the sixth day. What formation made there, reformation makes in us; and what creation made there, recreation makes in us. After this day in which we are now, after this age, rest is coming which is promised to the saints, which was prefigured in those days. Because indeed, after all that He made in the world, He made nothing new in creation afterwards. Those creations themselves will be converted and changed. For since creatures were established, nothing else has been added. Nevertheless, unless He who made it governs the world, what has been made would fall; He cannot but manage what He made. Because nothing was added to creation, He is said to have rested from all His works; because indeed He does not cease to govern what He made, the Lord rightly said: My Father works even until now. Let your Charity pay attention. He completed, He is said to have rested; for He completed works and added nothing. He governs what He made: therefore, He does not cease. But with as much ease as He made, with such ease He governs. Do not think, brothers, that He did not labor when creating, but He labors when governing; just as they labor on a ship who build the ship, and labor those who steer; for they are men. But He, with as much ease as He said, and they were done, with such ease and judgment, He governs all things through the Word.

God's providence in the ordination of evils. Not because human affairs seem perverse to us should it appear that there is no governance of human affairs. For all men are ordered in their places: but it seems to each that they do not have order. You only see what you want to be: for how you want to be, the artist knows where to place you. Consider the painter. Various colors are placed before him, and he knows where to place each color. Certainly the sinner wished to be a black color; does the artist not know the order where to place him? How much order does he arrange out of the black color? How many ornaments does the painter make from it? He makes hair, he makes a beard, he makes eyebrows from it; he does not make a forehead except from white. You see what you want to be: do not worry where he will place you, who does not know how to err, he knows where to place you. For we see this happening in the world through these laws. Someone wanted to be a burglar: the law of the judge knows that he acted against the law; the law of the judge knows where to place him: it orders him very well. He indeed lived badly: but the law did not order badly. From a burglar he will be a miner: how much work is constructed from the labor of a miner? His punishment as a condemned man is the ornament of the city. So therefore, God knows where to place you. Do not think that you disturb God's plan if you want to be perverse. He who knew to create you does not know how to order you? It is good to strive so that you are placed in a good place. What was said about Judas by the Apostle? He went to his own place. Certainly working by divine providence, because through an evil will he wanted to be evil, God did not make evil by ordering. But since he himself wanted to be an evil sinner, he did what he wanted, but suffered what he did not want. In that he did what he wanted, his sin is found; in that he suffered what he did not want, God's order is praised. The disturbance of the Jews from a twofold cause. The sick man cured by descending into the pool. Only one healed.

Why did I say this? So that you might understand, brothers, what was excellently said by the Lord Jesus Christ: My Father works even until now. Because He does not abandon the creature which He made. And He said: As He works, so do I work. There He already signified Himself as equal to God. My Father, He said, works even until now, and I work. That carnal sense was disturbed about the Sabbath. For they thought that the Lord, being tired, had rested and did not work. They hear: My Father works even until now, and are disturbed. And I work: He makes Himself equal to God, they are disturbed. But do not be dismayed now. The water is troubled, the sick person is about to be healed. What is this? Therefore they are disturbed so that the Lord may suffer. The Lord suffers, His precious blood is shed, the sinner is redeemed, grace is given to the one who sins and says: Wretched man that I am, who will deliver me from the body of this death? The grace of God through our Lord Jesus Christ. But how is he cured? If he descends. For so was that pool, where one descended, not ascended. For there could be such pools, so constructed, that one ascended to them. But why was that one made so, where one descended? Because the Lord’s passion seeks the humble. Let the humble descend, and let him not be proud, if he wishes to be healed. But why one? Because the Church is unique throughout the whole world, unity is saved. Therefore where one is saved, unity is signified. Through the "one" understand unity. Therefore do not depart from unity, if you do not wish to be excluded from this salvation.

Weakness of thirty years. The perfection of justice is signified by the number forty. Love of the world is not compatible with the love of God.

What does it mean that he had been infirm for thirty-eight years? I know, brothers, that I have already said these things; but those who read forget, how much more those who hear rarely? Therefore, let your Charity attend a little. In the number forty the completion of justice is figured. The completion of justice, because here we live in labor, in hardships, in continence, in fastings, in vigils, in tribulations; that is the exercise of justice, to endure this time, and to fast in a certain way from this age; not from the food of flesh, which we rarely do; but from the love of the world, which we must always do. He, therefore, fulfills the law, who abstains from this world. For he cannot love what is eternal, unless he ceases to love what is temporal. Consider the love of a man: think of it as the hand of the soul. If it holds something, it cannot hold another. But so that it can hold what is given, let it release what it holds. This I say, see that I say it openly: He who loves the world cannot love God; his hand is occupied. God says to him: Hold what I give. He does not want to release what he held: he cannot receive what is offered. Did I say: Let no one possess anything? If he can, if perfection demands this of him, let him possess nothing. If he cannot, hindered by some necessity, let him possess, but not be possessed; let him hold, but not be held; let him be lord of his belongings, not a servant; as the Apostle says: Furthermore, brothers, the time is short; it remains that those who have wives be as though they had none; and those who buy, as though they possessed not; and those who rejoice, as though they rejoiced not; and those who weep, as though they wept not; and those who use this world, as though they used it not: for the fashion of this world passes away. I want you to be without anxiety. What does it mean: Do not love what you possess in this world? Do not let your hand be held, where God is to be held. Let your love not be occupied, by which you can tend to God, and adhere to Him who created you. The possession of temporal things whereby the innocent is recognized.

You say, and answer me: And God knows that I possess innocently. Temptation proves. What you possess is disturbed, and you blaspheme. We used to suffer such things now. What you possess is disturbed, and you are not found as you were, and you show different things in your voice now, and different things the day before in your voice. And would that you at least defend your own with a cry, and not try to usurp another's with audacity; and what is worse, to avoid blame, you say that what is another's is yours. But what is the need? I advise, I say this, brothers, and I advise brotherly; God commands, and I remind because I am reminded. He terrifies me, who does not allow me to be silent. He requires from me what he gave. For he gave to be distributed, not to be kept. But if I keep and hide it, he says to me: Wicked and lazy servant, why did you not give the money to the exchangers, and I coming would have collected it with interest? And what would it benefit me because I lost nothing from what I received? It is little to my Lord, he is greedy: but the greed of God is our salvation. He is greedy, he seeks his coins, he gathers his image. You would have given, he says, the money to the exchangers, and I coming would have collected it with interest. And if perhaps forgetfulness would make me not to remind you; or the trials and tribulations we suffer, would remind you. Certainly, you heard the word of God. Blessed be the Lord and his glory. For you are gathered, and are suspended on the word of God's steward. Do not look to our flesh, through which it is offered to you; because the hungry do not pay attention to the cheapness of the vessel, but to the dearness of the food. God proves you. You are gathered, praise the word of God; temptation will prove how you hear: you will have dealings in which it will be shown what you are like. For even he who shouts offensively today, listened gladly yesterday. Therefore, I warn, therefore I say, therefore I do not keep silent, my brothers, because the time of questioning will come. For the Lord questions the just and the unjust. Certainly, you sang this, certainly we sang together: The Lord questions the just and the unjust. And what follows? But he who loves iniquity hates his own soul. And in another place: In the thoughts of the wicked there will be interrogation. Not where I question you, there God questions. I question your tongue, God questions your thought. He knows how you hear, and he knows how to demand, who commands to give. He wanted me to be a distributor, he reserved the demand for himself. To admonish, to teach, to correct is ours; truly to save and to crown, or to condemn and to send into hell, is not ours. The judge will deliver to the minister, the minister into prison. Truly I say to you, you will not come out from there, until you pay the last penny. The number forty in the fasting of Moses, Elijah, and Christ. Lent before Easter. Fifty days after Easter.

Let us return therefore to the matter. The perfection of righteousness is demonstrated by the number forty. What is it to fulfill the number forty? To abstain from the love of this world. Abstinence from temporal things, so they are not perniciously loved, is almost like fasting from this world. Therefore, the Lord fasted for forty days, and Moses, and Elijah. He who gave his servants the ability to fast for forty days, could he not have fasted for eighty or a hundred days? Why did he not wish to do more than he granted to his servants, unless because in that number forty there is the mystery of fasting, abstaining from this world? What does this mean? What the Apostle said: The world is crucified to me, and I to the world. He, therefore, fulfills the number forty. And what did the Lord show? Because Moses did this, Elijah did this, Christ did this, and the law, the Prophets, and the Gospel teach this; so that you might not think there is something different in the law, something different in the Prophets, and something different in the Gospel. All Scriptures teach you nothing else but abstinence from the love of the world, so that your love may run to God. It is signified that the law teaches this, for Moses fasted for forty days. It is signified that the Prophets teach this, for Elijah fasted for forty days. It is signified that the Gospel teaches this, for the Lord fasted for forty days. Therefore, those three appeared on the mountain, the Lord in the middle, Moses and Elijah on the sides. Why? Because the Gospel itself has testimony from the law and the Prophets. But why is the perfection of righteousness in the number forty? It is said in the Psalter: O God, I will sing a new song to you; on a psaltery of ten strings I will sing praises to you. Which signifies the ten commandments of the law, which the Lord did not come to destroy, but to fulfill. Now the law is understood to extend throughout the world, having four corners: East, West, South, and North, as Scripture says. Hence also the vessel which carried all depicted animals, which was shown to Peter when it was said: Kill and eat, so that the Gentiles who would believe and enter the body of the Church might be shown, just as what we eat enters our body, it being let down by four lines from heaven (these being the four parts of the world) shows that the whole world would believe. So, in the number forty is abstinence from the world. This is the fullness of the law: but the fullness of the law is love. Therefore, we fast for forty days before Easter. For it is a sign before our laborious life in this world, where in labors and hardships, and in abstinence, we fulfill the law. After Easter, that is, we celebrate the days of the Lord's Resurrection, signifying our resurrection. Therefore, fifty days are celebrated: for the denarius reward is added to forty, and it makes fifty. How is the denarius a reward? Have you not read that those who were hired for the vineyard, whether those who came at the first hour, or the sixth, or the last hour, could receive nothing but a denarius? When the reward is added to our righteousness, we will be in fifty. Then we will have nothing to do but to praise God. Therefore, during those days we say Alleluia. For Alleluia is the praise of God. In this fragility of mortality, in this number forty here, as before the resurrection, let us groan in prayers, so that then we may praise. Now is the time of longing, then will be the time of embracing and enjoying. Let us not fail in the time of forty, so that we may rejoice in the time of fifty. The law is not fulfilled without love. Who is it that fulfills the law, if not the one who has charity? Ask the Apostle: "Charity is the fulfillment of the law." For the whole law is fulfilled in one word, in that it is written: "Love your neighbor as yourself." But the commandment of charity is dual: "You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind." This is the great commandment. The second is like it: "You shall love your neighbor as yourself." These are the words of the Lord in the Gospel: "On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets." Without this twofold love, the law cannot be fulfilled. As long as the law is not fulfilled, there is infirmity. Therefore, he who was sick for thirty-eight years lacked two things. What does it mean: "He lacked two things"? He did not fulfill those two commandments. What is the use of fulfilling other things if those are not fulfilled? Do you have thirty-eight? If you do not have those two, the rest will profit you nothing. You lack the two without which the others are worthless if you do not have the two commandments that lead to salvation. If I speak in the tongues of men and angels but do not have charity, I am a sounding brass or a clanging cymbal. And if I know all mysteries and all knowledge, and if I have all faith so as to move mountains, but do not have charity, I am nothing. And if I distribute all my goods to feed the poor, and if I give my body to be burned, but do not have charity, it profits me nothing. These are the words of the Apostle. Therefore, all the things he mentioned are like the thirty-eight years, but because charity was not there, there was infirmity. Who then will heal from this infirmity, if not the one who came to give charity? "I give you a new commandment, that you love one another." And because he came to give charity, and charity fulfills the law; rightly he said: "I did not come to destroy the law, but to fulfill it." He healed the sick man and told him to carry his bed and go to his house. This he also told to the paralytic whom he healed. What does it mean to carry our bed? The desire of our flesh. Where we lie sick is like our bed. But those who have been healed contain and carry it, not being restrained by the flesh. Therefore, the healthy one contains the weakness of his flesh, that with the sign of the forty-day fast from this world, he may complete the number forty, who healed that sick man who came not to destroy the law but to fulfill it.

Temporal things must be dismissed from the mind. Temptation often does not make a sinner, but reveals one.

Having heard this, direct your heart to God. Do not deceive yourselves. Then ask yourselves, when it is well in the world; then ask yourselves, if you love this world, or if you do not love it; learn to let go, before you are let go. What does it mean: to let go? To not love in the heart. While you still have what you are going to lose, either alive or dying you let it go, it cannot be with you forever; therefore, while it is still with you, release your love; be ready in the will of God, suspend in God. Hold on to Him whom you do not lose against your will; so that if it happens that you lose these temporal things, you may say: The Lord gave, the Lord took away; as it pleased the Lord, so it was done; blessed be the name of the Lord. But if it happens, and God wills it, that those things you have remain with you until the end; released from this life, you receive the denarius of fifty, and in you is made the perfection of blessedness when you sing Alleluia. Keeping these things in memory which I have recalled, may they be strong so that you do not love the world. Its friendship is bad, it is deceitful, it makes God an enemy. Quickly in one temptation a man offends God, and becomes an enemy. Nay, he does not then become an enemy, but is then revealed to have been an enemy. For when he loved and praised, he was an enemy; but neither he knew it himself, nor others. Temptation comes, a vein is touched, and fever is revealed. Therefore, brothers, the love of the world, and the friendship of the world makes enemies of God. And it does not provide what it promised, it is deceitful, and it deceives. Therefore men do not cease to hope in this world, and who attains all that he hopes for? But to whatever he attains, immediately that to which he has attained becomes worthless to him. Other things begin to be desired, other dear things are hoped for; while they come, whatever comes to you, becomes worthless. Therefore hold on to God, because He never becomes worthless, because nothing is more beautiful. For this reason these things become worthless, because they cannot remain, because they are not what He is. For you, O soul, nothing else suffices, except He who created you. Whatever else you seize is wretched; because only He who made you in His likeness can suffice for you. This is said from that very voice: Lord, show us the Father, and it is enough for us. Only there can there be security, and where there can be security, there in a certain way will be an insatiable satisfaction. For neither will you be sated, so that you wish to depart; nor will anything be lacking, so that you suffer any want.

Sermons - Sermon 125A

SERMON 125/A Tractate of Saint Augustine from the Chapter of the Gospel About the sick man lying by the pool. On the Sabbath day. The day of the Sabbath.

It is often asked how it is written in the book of law that is called Genesis, where the beginning of the holy Scriptures is, why God completed all His works on the sixth day, and on the seventh day, that is, the Sabbath day, He rested from all His works, while His Son says, through whom all things were made: "My Father works until now, and I work." For in saying this He rebuked the Jews, who were accusing Him, because on the Sabbath day He had said to a man: "Rise, take up your bed, and walk"; for the Jews were not permitted to carry burdens on the Sabbath. So then, what does this mean? Is the Son contrary to the Word of the Father, when He Himself is the Word of the Father? We must therefore understand, so that we do not remain like the Jews; for they so carnally accepted the Sabbath that they thought God was inactive from that Sabbath day. Or if they did not think this, perhaps they believed that He was working in His creation for six days, and resting and being inactive on the Sabbath, and like children rejoicing in a holiday.

Thus, this question is resolved, because it is true that God fulfilled and completed His works by creating creatures in six days, and rested on the Sabbath, not from administering His creatures, but from creating them. For this vast world mass, that is the heaven and the earth and all that is in them, if they were not ruled by Him, would fall. However, He governs the world without labor, not as that man bore his bed. And if it is rightly understood, God both rests and acts at the same time; for anyone who acts without labor also rests in the very act itself. If you ask me whether God is inactive, would we live if He were inactive? Again, if you ask me whether God has rest, I will answer you: And what is it that He would give to us if He Himself does not have it?

Therefore, I will answer: He both has rest, and works even now. This you cannot do; but He is God, which you are not. Therefore, the time had already come when the shadows would pass away, and the day would breathe, as it is written in the Song of Songs: "Until the day breathes, and the shadows flee away."

Christ removes shadows. When therefore the Lord Jesus commanded the sick man, whom He had made well, to take up his bed, He was removing the old shadows. Now therefore the time had come when what the Apostle says would happen: "Therefore let no one judge you in food and drink, or regarding a festival, or a new moon, or sabbaths, which are a shadow of things to come." Therefore, those Jewish observances commanded by God were shadows of things to come; and Christ Himself, who was the future, coming, began to make present; what was expected, had arrived; what was signified, was seen. Therefore, let not the shadows hinder, let them be removed, let us see the light. Where? In Christ. For this reason, He says: "In Your light we shall see light"; and: "To those who sat in the shadow of death, a light has arisen." The man is healed, and you accuse about the bed? He commanded the sick man to carry the wood, who was about to be hung on the wood for him. Foolish impiety of the Jews! Whom you saw lying down, you see walking; and you accuse him of carrying? He who gave the health to the walking, gave the strength to the carrying. Be a Christian, O Jew, and understand the sabbath; as long as you are a Jew, you can observe the sabbath, but you cannot understand it. Unless you pass over to the truth, you cannot have what you celebrate.

We have the law in our hearts.

What is it that I said: You cannot have what you celebrate? For you can celebrate rest through the sabbath's reprieve; but unless you pass over to Christ, you cannot attain eternal rest; you will remain in the shadow, without light. Pass over therefore to Christ, that the veil may be removed. For the Apostle says this: To this day, whenever Moses is read, a veil lies over their hearts; which is not unveiled, because it is abolished in Christ. The veil, not Moses, is abolished; the veil, not the law. Observe how the Lord has come and the veil is abolished; when He hung on the tree, the veil was torn. O great mystery! O ineffable sacrament! The transgressors of the law crucified the author of the law, and the secrets of the law were revealed. Was not that cross a key? It held the Lord, and unlocked what was closed. But the Jews, even with the veil torn, have their face covered: But we, says the Apostle, with unveiled face, beholding the glory of the Lord, are being transformed into the same image, from glory to glory, as by the Spirit of the Lord. They could have had the law on stone; oh, if they had it in their heart, they would be with us. But we, brothers, let us have the law in our hearts; not by praises of the word, but by good works let us show it. Alms must be given, it is time; let your fruits be seen; let me rejoice in my labors. You cannot say to the weak one: Rise up and walk; you can say: While you arise, lie down and eat. You cannot heal the sick, you can clothe the naked. Do what you can; God does not require of you what you cannot do.

Tobias, although blind, still saw.

You have heard what holy Tobis advised his son Tobias about showing mercy: As is your substance, son, so you should act; if you have much, do much; if little, share from that little. The widow, who brought two small coins, how little she had! And the Lord saw her. Indeed, if they neglected her because she brought no more than two small coins, they could see the heart of the wise woman who gave. Who gave more to God's gifts than the one who left nothing for herself? Tobit did not advise his son: From what you have, he said, share; he did not say: Give everything. Do what Tobit advised. Many have done so; they left all their possessions, gave everything to the poor, and kept nothing for themselves. Do we think nothing? And where is God? For what does a poor person lack if he has God? Or what does a rich person have if he does not have God? Therefore, do this and marvel at the words of Scripture. A blind father spoke to a seeing son, advising him to give alms; among other things, he said: For alms deliver from death. This is not surprising; even if a blind man spoke to a seeing one, yet a living one spoke to a living one. What follows is surprising. For when he had spoken of alms: They deliver from death, he added, and do not permit to go into darkness. O father, you always gave alms; why then did you come to this darkness of blindness? Therefore, the son could say this to his father; but he knew what he was saying, and he understood what he heard. There are other darknesses into which alms do not allow those who love to give them to enter. What are those darknesses? About which the Lord Himself says: Bind his hands and feet and cast him into the outer darkness; there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth. These are called outer darkness. Why? Because they are outside of God; whoever comes to them and enters them, goes far from God. Finally, the evil servant is sent into the outer darkness; but to the good one, He says: Enter into the joy of your Lord. It is evil to go out to the darkness; it is good to enter into the light, where there are no darknesses at all, neither of the heart nor of the flesh.

We worship God, and God worships us.

There was therefore in that Tobias blindness of the flesh, but great light of the heart. The son held the father's hand so that he would not stumble over a place, the father showed the way of life to the son so that he would not stumble over God. The son held the hand; the father showed the way, where it is truly dangerous to stumble. In what light was he, when he said these things? Surely his eyes were closed, and yet he said: Son, give alms; alms deliver from death. Did he who said this see nothing? Rather he saw, not black and white, but just and unjust; he discerned not colors, but morals. Blessed is the son who listened to the blind seeing one, blind in the flesh, seeing in the heart! His blindness indeed passes, God healed him, he received his eyes; but even if he had not received his eyes in this flesh, were not those eyes someday destined to be closed in death? For all the saints, when they depart from here, come to the light; light of this sun is worthless to those who see God. The father exhorted his discerning son, and reminded him about alms; he said much about alms, he almost only admonished his dearest and only son this. How much power there is in them, how much virtue! What is given, and what is received? What is expended, and what is bought? Is it not said to us: Did your fathers buy the kingdom of heaven with alms? And they bought it, and left it for us to be bought. Let all buy, let all possess; no one will suffer want; we shall be the possession of God, God will be our possession. For we worship God, and God worships us. But what I said: We worship God, everyone accepts; what I said: God worships us, perhaps some are offended. Do we worship him, and not he us? It is good for us that he worships us; for unless he cultivates this field, it will be filled with thorns. Who is the farmer, if not the one who cultivates the field? Listen therefore to the Lord Christ, and do not be alarmed when it is said to you, God worships you: I am the vine, he says, you are the branches, and my Father is the farmer. Therefore we worship God so that we may have fruit, and he worships us; both are done for our fruit. For we are made fertile and fruitful from being barren; we, dry and thirsty, are filled by him; the fountain does not know how to dry up. Therefore, all is done for us. Let us give thanks to him who created us, and called us to reign with him.

Sermons - Sermon 126

SERMO 126 ON THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL OF JOHN (5:19):

"The Son can do nothing by Himself,"

"UNLESS HE SEES THE FATHER DOING"

Faith must precede understanding. The mysteries and secrets of the kingdom of God are first sought by believers, who are made understanding. For faith is the step of understanding; understanding, however, is the merit of faith. The prophet expressly says this to all who hastily and prematurely seek understanding and neglect faith. For he says: Unless you have believed, you will not understand. Therefore, faith itself also has a certain light in the Scriptures, in Prophecy, in the Gospel, and in the Apostolic readings. For all these things which are recited to us for a time, are lamps in a dark place, so that we may be nourished until the day. The apostle Peter says: We have a more certain prophetic word, to which you do well to take heed, as to a lamp in a dark place, until the day dawns, and the morning star arises in your hearts.

It is perverse to be unwilling to believe except what you see.

You see, therefore, brothers, how perverse and hurriedly flawed they are, who, like immature conceptions, seek abortion before birth; who say to us: Why do you order me to believe what I do not see? Let me see something, so that I may believe. You order to believe, while I do not see. I want to see, and by seeing to believe, not by hearing. The Prophet says: Unless you believe, you will not understand. You wish to ascend, and you forget the steps. Certainly perverse. O man, if I could already show you what you would see, I would not urge you to believe. From the creatures that are seen, one must rise to the Creator who is not seen.

Therefore: Faith is, as defined elsewhere, the substance of things hoped for, the conviction of things not seen. If they are not seen, how are they convinced to be? Where indeed are those things which you see, unless from that which you do not see? Surely you see something, to believe something, and from what you see, you believe what you do not see. Do not be ungrateful to Him who made you see, so that you may believe what you cannot yet see. God gave you eyes in the body, reason in the heart. Awaken the reason of the heart, erect the inner inhabitant of your inner eyes, let him take up his windows, let him look at the creation of God. For there is someone inside who sees through the eyes. For when you think deeply about something, with the inner inhabitant turned away, the things before your eyes you do not see. For the windows are open in vain, when the one who looks through them is absent. Therefore, it is not the eyes that see, but someone sees through the eyes. Lift him up, awaken him. For he has not been denied to you. God made you a rational animal, set you above the beasts, formed you in His image. Should you use your eyes just like beasts, only to see what you add to the stomach, not the mind? Therefore, lift up your rational sight, use your eyes as a man, contemplate heaven and earth, the ornaments of the sky, the fertility of the earth, the flight of birds, the swimming of fish, the power of seeds, the order of times. Contemplate the deeds, and seek the Maker. Look at what you see, and seek what you do not see. Believe in Him whom you do not see, on account of those things which you see. And lest you think I am exhorting you with my word, listen to the Apostle saying: For the invisible things of God, since the creation of the world, are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made.

Christ performed unusual miracles so that He might be recognized as the maker even in everyday things which had become banal.

You postponed those things, and did not perceive as a man, but as an irrational animal. The Prophet cried to you, and cried in vain: "Do not be like the horse and the mule, which have no understanding." Therefore, you saw these things and postponed them. The daily miracles of God had become worthless not by their ease but by their frequency. For what is more difficult to understand than that a man who was not should be born, should depart into the hidden by dying, and should proceed into the public by being born who was not? What is so marvelous, what is so difficult to understand, yet easy for God to do? Be amazed at these things, wake up. You are accustomed to marvel at unusual things. Are they greater than what you are used to seeing? People marveled that our Lord Jesus Christ fed so many thousands with five loaves, and they do not marvel that the earth is filled with crops from a few grains. They saw water made into wine and were astonished. What else becomes wine from rain through the vine's root? He made both those things and these. Those so that you might be fed, these so that you might marvel. But both are to be marveled at because they are works of God. A man sees unusual things and marvels. But from where is the man himself who marvels? Where was he? From where did he proceed? From where the form of the body? From where the distinct arrangement of the members? From where this beautiful appearance? From what beginnings? From such contemptible ones? And he marvels at other things, while being himself a great miracle. So from where are these things you see, if not from that which you do not see? But, as I began to say, because these things had become worthless to you, he himself came to do unusual things so that in those usual ones you might recognize your craftsman. He came to whom it is said, "Renew signs," to whom it is said, "Make your mercies wonderful." For he was bestowing them. He was bestowing them, and no one marveled. Therefore, he came small to the small, the doctor came to the sick, who could come whenever he wanted, return whenever he wanted, do whatever he wanted, judge as he wanted. And what he wanted, that was justice itself. And what he wants, I say, that is justice itself. For what he wants is not unjust, nor can what he does not want be just. He came to raise the dead, to restore to the light a man who was in the light, who daily brings forth to the light those who did not exist. The miracle of the birth from a virgin exhibited in Christ.

He did these things, and he was despised by many, paying more attention not to how great things he did, but how small he was, as if saying to themselves: These things are divine, but this man is human. Therefore, you see two things, the divine and the human. If divine things can only be done by God, see if God dwells hidden within the man. Attend, I say, to what you see, believe what you do not see. He who called you to believe has not deserted you. Although he commanded you to believe something you cannot see, he did not leave you seeing nothing, from which you might believe what you do not see. Are the signs small, are the indications of the Creator small in the very creation? He also came, did miracles. You could not see God, but you could see a man. God was made man, so that in one you might have both what you see and what you believe. In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. You hear, and you do not yet see. Behold, he comes, behold he is born, behold he takes on a body, behold he proceeds from a woman, who made male and female. He who made male and female was not made through male and female. For you might indeed have despised the one who was born, you do not despise how he was born, because he always existed before he was born. Behold, I say, he took on a body; he was clothed in flesh, he proceeded from the womb. Do you now see? Now, I say, you see the flesh? I ask, but I show the flesh. You see something, and you do not see something. Behold in the very birth, behold now there are two, both what you may see and what you may not see. But that through what you see, you may believe what you do not see. You began to despise, because you see who was born. Believe what you do not see, because he was born from a virgin. How small, he says, is the one who was born. But how great is the one who was born of a virgin! And he who was born of a virgin brought you a temporal miracle. He was not born of a father, namely of a human father, and he was born of a mother. But do not consider it impossible, because he was born through only a mother, who made man before father and mother.

We are moved by the miracle of Christ's birth to believe in God the Word.

Therefore, He brought you a temporal miracle, so that you might seek and marvel at the eternal. Indeed, He, who emerged like a bridegroom from his chamber, namely from the virginal womb where the holy nuptials took place, word and flesh, brought, I say, a temporal miracle, but He Himself is eternal, He is coeternal with the Father, He is who in the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. But you could not see this. He made for you a means by which you might be healed, so that you could see what you could not see. What you scorn in Christ is not yet the contemplation of the healed, but the medicine of the sick. Do not hurry to the vision of the healthy. Angels see, angels rejoice, angels are fed and live, nor is what they feed upon diminished, nor is their food decreased. On sublime thrones, in the parts of heavens, in those things above the heavens, the Word is seen by angels, and is rejoiced in, and is consumed, and remains. But so that man might consume the bread of angels, the Lord of angels became man. This is our salvation; the medicine of the sick, the food of the healthy.

It must be explained how the Son does what He has seen the Father doing. And he spoke to men, and said what you heard: The Son can do nothing by himself, except what he sees the Father doing. Now then, do we think there is anyone who understands? Now then, do we think there is anyone in whom the collyrium of the flesh is effective to behold somewhat the splendor of divinity? He has spoken, let us also speak. He, because he is the Word; we, because [we speak] of the Word. But why do we speak somewhat of the Word? Because we are made in the likeness of the Word through the Word. Therefore, as much as we can grasp, as much as we can partake in that ineffability, let us also speak, and let us not be contradicted. Our faith has preceded, so that we say: I believed, therefore I have spoken. I speak, therefore, what I believe. Whether also what I somewhat see, he sees more; you cannot see this. But when I have said it, whether one who sees what I say either believes that I also see what I said or does not believe, what is that to me? Let him see sincerely, and believe of me what he wills. The error of the Arians in the words of the Lord. The Son cannot do anything by himself, except what he sees the Father doing. Here arises the error of the Arians, but it arises to fall, because it does not humble itself to rise. What is it that moved you? You wish to say that the Son is lesser. For you have heard: The Son cannot do anything by himself, except what he sees the Father doing. You wish to call the Son lesser based on this. I know this, I know. This moved you. Believe that the Son is not lesser. You cannot see it yet, believe. This is what I was just now saying. But how, you ask, should I believe against his own words? He himself says: The Son cannot do anything by himself, except what he sees the Father doing. Pay attention also to what follows: For whatever the Father does, the same the Son also does. He did not say: "such things." Let your Charity pay attention a little, so that you do not make noise to yourselves. A tranquil heart is needed, with pious and devout faith, with religious intention, not in me the small vessel, but in Him who puts bread in the small vessel. So, pay attention a little. In the things we said above, encouraging to faith, so that the mind imbued with faith may be capable of understanding, the things that were said sounded festive, joyful, easy, they cheered your minds, you followed, you understood what I said. But of the things I am about to say, I do not indeed despair that some will understand, but I do not hope that all will understand. And because God proposed to us through the reading of the gospel whence we speak, nor can we avoid what the teacher proposed, I perhaps fear that those who do not understand, who will perhaps be more, may think that I have spoken to them in vain. But nevertheless, for those who will understand, I do not speak in vain. Let him who understands rejoice, let him who does not understand patiently bear what he does not understand; what he does not understand let him bear, and let him defer so that he may understand.

He refutes the Arians. He rejects their carnal sense. What the Father did, He did only through the Son.

Therefore, he does not say: Whatever the Father does, the Son also does, as if the Father does some things, and the Son does others. It seemed as though he had said this, when earlier he stated: The Son can do nothing by Himself, but only what He sees the Father doing. Pay attention. Nor does he say there, but what He hears the Father commanding, but: He sees the Father doing, he says. If, therefore, we inquire of a carnal understanding, or rather sense, it is as if he proposed two craftsmen to himself, the Father and the Son, the Father doing things without seeing, the Son doing things having seen the Father. It is still a carnal view. Nevertheless, in order to understand the higher things, let us not despise these lower and abject ones. First, let us set before our eyes something, let us assume there are two craftsmen, a father and a son. The father made a box, which the son could not make, unless he saw the father making it. He observed the box which the father made and made a similar box, not the same one. I defer briefly the words that follow, and now I ask an Arian: Do you understand thus, as I have set forth? The Father made something, which when the Son saw the Father making it, He also made something similar. For this indeed the words by which you were moved seem to imply. For he does not say: The Son can do nothing of Himself, but what He hears the Father commanding; but he says: The Son can do nothing of Himself, but what He sees the Father doing. Behold if you understand thus, the Father made it, and the Son observed, so that He Himself might see what to make, and He thus made something similar, such as the Father had made. By whom did the Father make this which He made? If not through the Son, if not through the Word, you fall into blasphemy against the Gospel. For all things were made through Him. Therefore, what the Father had made, He had made through the Word. If He had made it through the Word, He had made it through the Son. Who else observes, to make something else that he has seen the Father making? You are not accustomed to say the Father has two Sons. He is the only begotten from Him. By His mercy, He alone is divine, and not alone in receiving inheritance. The Father made coheirs with His only Son, not those He begat from His substance like Him, but those He adopted through Him from His household. For we are called to the adoption of sons, as the Holy Scripture bears witness. The Father does not do other works, the Son does not do other works, but the Trinity does the same works.

What, then, do you say? The only one himself speaks, the only begotten Son speaks in the Gospel, the Word itself made words for us, we heard him saying: The Son can do nothing by himself except what he sees the Father doing. The Father has already enabled the Son to see what he does, and yet the Father does nothing except through the Son. Certainly, you are troubled, heretic, certainly you are troubled; but you are troubled as if having taken hellebore, to be healed. Now you do not find yourself, and your sentence and your carnal perception, as I believe, you also condemn. Place the eyes of the flesh behind you, raise up if you have anything in your heart, observe the divine. Indeed, you hear human words through man, through the Evangelist. Through the Gospel, you hear human words, as a man. But you hear about the Word of God, so that you may hear human things and understand divine things. The teacher aroused, to instruct; he sowed a question, to move intention. The Son can do nothing by himself, except what he sees the Father doing. It was expected that he would say: For whatever the Father does, the Son does likewise. He did not say this, but: Whatever the Father does, the Son does the same things. The Father does not do some things and the Son others because all that the Father does, he does through the Son. The Son raised Lazarus; did not the Father raise him? The Son gave sight to the blind man; did not the Father give sight? The Father gave sight through the Son in the Holy Spirit. It is the Trinity, but one operation, one majesty, one eternity, one co-eternity, and the same works of the Trinity. The Father does not create some men, the Son others, the Holy Spirit others. The Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit create one and the same man. And the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit, one God creates. The Trinity of persons and the unity of divinity.

Consider the plurality of persons but recognize the unity of divinity. For on account of the plurality of persons it is said: Let us make man in our image and likeness. He did not say: I will make man, and pay attention while I make, so that you too can make another. He says, Let us make. I hear plurality. In our image. Again, I hear plurality. Where then is the singularity of divinity? Read the following: And God made man. It is said: Let us make man, and it is not said: The gods made man. The unity is understood in that it is said: God made man. The meaning of the words of Christ must be sought with true faith. Where then is that carnal intention? Let it be confounded, hidden, destroyed. Let the Word of God speak to us. Now, being devout, now believing, now imbued with faith and having acquired some merit of understanding, let us turn to the Word itself, to the fountain of light, and say together: Lord, the Father did the same things as you; for whatever the Father does, he does through you. We heard you, the Word, in the beginning: We did not see, but we believe. There, consequently, we heard that everything was made through you. Therefore, everything that the Father does, he does through you. Therefore, you do the same things as the Father. What does this mean? Why did you want to say: The Son can do nothing of himself? For I see a certain equality with the Father in you, in that I hear: Whatever the Father does, the Son does likewise. I recognize equality, I understand this here, I grasp it as I can: I and the Father are one. What is this: That you cannot do anything, unless you see the Father doing it? What does this mean? The difficulty of understanding arises from not being able to see the Word.

Perhaps he says to me, or rather says to all of us: For this that I said: The Son can do nothing of himself, but what he seeth the Father do, how do you understand my seeing? What is my seeing?

Disregard for a moment the form of a servant, which he took on for your sake. For indeed, in that form of a servant, our Lord had eyes and ears in the flesh, and in that human form which we also bear, he had the same figure of body, the same features of limbs. That flesh came from Adam, but he was not Adam. Therefore, the Lord, walking either on land or on sea, as it pleased him, as he willed, because whatever he willed he could do, looked at what he willed. He cast his eyes, he saw. He turned his eyes away, and did not see. He was followed by someone from behind, seen by someone from the front. He saw with the bodily eyes what was in front. However, divinity was hidden from nothing. Set aside, set aside, I say, for a moment the form of a servant. See the form of God, in which he was before the world was made, in which he was equal to the Father. From him, accept and understand what he says to you: Who, being in the form of God, did not consider it robbery to be equal with God. See him there, if you can, so that you can understand what his seeing is. In the beginning was the Word. How does the Word see? Does the Word have eyes, or do our eyes find themselves in him, and not bodily eyes, but the eyes of pious hearts? For blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. In Christ, the form of a servant was shown to mortals, the form of God was preserved for the blessed.

You see Christ as man and God. He shows you the man, preserves for you the God. And see that he preserves for you the God, who shows himself to you as man. He who loves me, he says, keeps my commandments. He who loves me will be loved by my Father, and I will love him. And as if it were said: What will you give him whom you love? And I will show myself to him, he says. What is this, brothers? He whom they already saw, he promised to show himself to them. To whom? To those by whom he was seen, or to those by whom he was not seen? Thus speaking to a certain Apostle, he said, asking to see the Father so that it would suffice him, and saying: Show us the Father, and it suffices us. And he, standing before the eyes of the servant, in the form of a servant, preserving for the deified eyes the form of God, said to him: Have I been with you for so long a time, and you do not know me? He who sees me sees also the Father. You seek to see the Father, see me. You see me, and you do not see me. You see what I have assumed for you, you do not see what I have preserved for you. Hear the commandments, cleanse your eyes. Because: He who loves me, keeps my commandments, and I will love him. As if keeping my commandments, and as if cured through my commandments, I will show myself to him. To see the Word is not different from the Word. Love makes capable of receiving divine things.

Therefore, brothers, if we cannot see what it is to see the Word, where are we going? What vision do we perhaps seek too hastily? What do we want to be shown that we cannot see? Therefore, these things are said which we desire to see, not because we can now comprehend them. For if you see the seeing of the Word, perhaps in what you see as the seeing of the Word, you will see the Word itself, so that the Word is not something else, and seeing of the Word is not something else, so that nothing is compounded, joined, or doubled there. For it is something simple with ineffable simplicity. It is not like a man, for a man is one thing, and the seeing of the man is another. For sometimes the seeing of the man extinguishes, and the man remains. This is what I was saying I would speak something which not all could understand, even the Lord grants that some may understand. My brothers, I exhort you to see the seeing of the Word. Is this beyond your strength because it is small? Let it be nourished, let it be completed. From where? From the commandments. Which commandments? He who loves me keeps my commandments. Which commandments? For now, we want to grow, to be strengthened, to be completed, so that we may see the seeing of the Word. Tell now, Lord, which commandments? I give you a new commandment, that you love one another. Therefore, brothers, let us draw this love from the abundance of the fountain, let us take hold of it, let us be nourished by it. Hold on to that by which you may be capable. Let love generate you, let love nourish you, let love complete you, let love strengthen you, so that you see the seeing of the Word, that the Word is not one thing and the seeing of it another; but that which is the seeing of the Word is the Word. And perhaps you will quickly understand, because that which was said: The Son can do nothing of himself, but what he sees the Father doing, is such as if he were to say: The Son would not be, unless he were born of the Father. That is enough, brothers. I know I said something which perhaps is revealed by reflection, often is obscured by many words.

Sermons - Sermon 127

SERMO 127 OF THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL OF JOHN (5, 24-29):

"Truly, truly, I say to you, the hour is coming, and is now here," When the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and those who hear shall live, etc. AND ALSO CONCERNING THE WORDS OF THE APOSTLE (1 COR 2, 9):

"Which eye has not seen", etc. The hope of Christians is for things that are not seen. A fitting simile. Our hope, brothers, is not in this time, nor in this world, nor in the happiness which blinds people who forget God. This we must primarily know and hold in the Christian heart, that we were not made Christians for the good things of the present time; but for something else that God already promises, and which man does not yet comprehend. For it is said of this good thing: "What eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor has it entered into the heart of man, the things which God has prepared for those who love Him." Therefore, because this good is so great, so splendid, so ineffable, it did not find man as a perceiver, but God as a promiser. For now, what is promised to him, man having a blind heart does not perceive; nor can it be shown to him in the present what he himself will be in the future, to whom it is promised. For even a newborn infant, if he could understand the words of someone speaking, while he could neither speak, nor walk, nor do anything, but as we see him weak, lying there, needing the help of another, if he could only understand him who spoke to him and said to him: "Behold, as you see me walking, working, speaking, after a few years you will be like this"; contemplating himself and that person, although he would see what was promised; yet, considering his own weakness, he would not believe, and would nonetheless see what was promised. However, for us, lying like infants in this flesh and weakness, both the promise is great, and it is not seen; and faith, by which we believe what we do not see, is raised up, so that we may deserve to see what we believe. Whoever mocks this faith, thinking that it is not to be believed because it is not seen, when what he did not believe comes, he blushes; he is separated in confusion, separated he is condemned. But whoever has believed, is set apart to the right, and will stand with great confidence and joy among those to whom it will be said: "Come, blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." The Lord concluded, when he spoke these words, thus: "And these will go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into eternal life." This is the eternal life which is promised to us.

Eternal life promised to us is so lovable.

Because humans love to live on this earth, life has been promised to them; and because they greatly fear dying, eternal life has been promised to them. What do you love? Living. You will have this. What do you fear? Dying. You will not suffer this. This appeared to suffice for human frailty, so that it might be said: You will have eternal life. The human mind grasps this, in one way or another, from what it does, it grasps what is to come. But how much does it grasp from this small portion of what it does? Because it lives and does not want to die; it loves eternal life, wants to live forever, never to die. But even those who will be tortured in punishments want to die, and cannot.

Therefore, it is not great to live long or to live always; but it is great to live blessedly.

Let us love eternal life, and from that, let us understand how much we should labor for eternal life, when we see people, lovers of the present, temporal, and transient life, laboring for it in such a way that, when the fear of death comes, they do whatever they can not to remove, but to delay death. How much man labors when death is imminent, fleeing, hiding, giving whatever he has, and redeeming himself, laboring, enduring torments and troubles, employing doctors, and whatever else man can do? You see that, having exhausted his labors and resources, whatever he can do so that he may live a little longer, he can do; but that he may live forever, he cannot. If therefore with so much labor, effort, expenses, insistence, vigilance, and care it is done so that he may live a little longer, how should it be done so that he may live forever? And if those are called prudent who in every way act to delay death and live a few days, lest they lose a few days, how foolish are those who live in such a way that they lose the eternal day?

What eternal life is, and how much it is worth to be bought. The value of eternal life. Eternal life cannot be described in human words. This alone, therefore, can be promised to us: that the gift of God may somehow become sweet to us from what we presently have; because from His gift we have life, we are safe. Let us then place such a life before our eyes, when eternal life is promised, removing from it whatever distress we endure here. For it is easier to find what is not there, than what is there. Behold, here we live, we shall live there too. We are safe when we are not sick here, nor does anything in the body hurt; we shall also be safe there. And when it is well with us in this life, we suffer no punishments; we shall suffer none there either. Therefore, imagine here a man living, safe, enduring no punishments; if someone could give him always to be so, and this good would never cease, how much he would rejoice! How much he would be uplifted! How he would be beside himself with joy, without penalty, without torment, without end of life! If God only promised us this, as I have said, described and recommended in whatever words I could now use, how much would it be worth buying, if it were for sale? How much would be given, to purchase it?

Whatever you have would suffice, even if you possessed the whole world. And yet it is for sale: buy it if you wish. And do not be overly distressed about such a great thing because of the expense. It is worth as much as you have. To obtain something so great and valuable, you would gather gold, or silver, or money, or some fruits of cattle or crops, which would be born in your possession, in order to buy something of such great and eminent worth, so that you might live happily on this earth. And buy this, if you wish. Do not consider what you have, but who you are. This thing values you. It is worth as much as you are. Give yourself, and you will have it. Why are you troubled? Why do you fret? Will you search for yourself, or buy yourself? Behold, you who are as you are, give yourself to that thing, and you will have it. But I am bad, you might say, and perhaps it will not accept me. By giving yourself to it, you will be good. To give yourself to this faith and promise is to be good. When you are good, you will be the price of that thing, and you will have not only what I said, safety, well-being, life, and life without end; not only will you have this, I add more. There will be no getting tired and sleeping there: there will be no hunger and thirst there; there will be no growing and aging; for there will be no birth, where perfect numbers remain intact. The number that is, remains; there is no need to increase it, for it does not decrease. Behold how many things I have said, and still I have not said what will be there. Behold, there is already life, already well-being, already no punishment, no hunger, no thirst, no deficiency, none of these; and yet I have not yet said: What no eye has seen, nor ear heard, nor has entered into the heart of man. For if I had said it, it would be false that it is written: What eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor entered into the heart of man. How would it ascend into my heart, to say: What has not entered into the heart of man? It is believed, not seen: not only not seen, but not even spoken. How then is it believed, if not spoken? Who believes what they do not hear? If heard to believe, it is spoken; if spoken, it is thought; if thought and spoken, it enters into the ears of men. And because it would not be said unless thought, it has entered into the heart of man. Behold, this question of such a great thing disturbs us, so that we cannot explain the question in words. Who explains the matter? The Son is always begotten by the Father.

Let us attend therefore to the Gospel, just as the Lord was speaking, and let us do what he said: Whoever believes in me, he said, passes from death to life, and does not come into judgment. Truly I say to you, an hour is coming and is now here when the dead will hear the voice of the Son of God; and those who hear will live. For just as the Father has life in himself, so he has granted the Son also to have life in himself. He granted it by begetting; because he begot, he granted. For the Son is from the Father, the Father is not from the Son, but the Father is the Father of the Son, and the Son is the Son of the Father. Nevertheless, the Son is begotten from the Father, not the Father from the Son, and always the Son; therefore always begotten. Who can grasp this always begotten? For every man, when he hears begotten, it occurs to him: therefore there was a time when he who was begotten did not exist. So what do we say? Not so: there was no time before the Son, because all things were made through him. If all things were made through him, and time was made through him, how could there be time before the Son, through whom time was made? Therefore take away all time, the Son is always with the Father. If the Son is always with the Father, and yet the Son, always begotten; if always begotten, he was always with the begetter who begot him. The eternal generation of the Son of God cannot be explained.

I never saw this, you say, someone generating, and always with him whom he generated; but he who generated preceded in time, and he who was generated followed in time. You speak well: I never saw this, because it pertains to what the eye has not seen. You ask how it is said? It cannot be said: because neither ear has heard, nor has it entered into the heart of man. Let it be believed and worshipped. When it is believed, it is worshipped; when it is worshipped, it grows; when it grows, it is comprehended. For still in this flesh; as long as we are away from the Lord, to the holy angels, who see these things, we are infants, to be nourished by faith, to be fed by vision. For thus says the Apostle: As long as we are in the body, we are away from the Lord. For we walk by faith, not by sight. We are going to come to the vision, which is thus promised to us through John in his Epistle: Beloved, we are children of God, and it has not yet been revealed what we shall be. We are already children of God by grace, by faith, by the sacrament, by the blood of Christ, by the redemption of the Savior: We are children of God, and it has not yet been revealed what we shall be. We know that when it is revealed, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is.

God is the food of the blessed mind.

Behold for what we are nourished to be taken, behold for what we are nourished to be received, to be eaten; so that what is eaten is not diminished, and he who eats, is invigorated. For now, food invigorates by being eaten; but the food that is eaten is diminished, yet when we begin to eat righteousness, to eat wisdom, to eat that immortal food; both we are invigorated, and that food is not diminished. For indeed the eye knows to be fed by light, yet it does not diminish the light; for light will not be less because it is seen by many; it feeds the eyes of many, and yet it is as great as it was; and they are fed, and it is not diminished; if God gave this to the light, which He made for the eyes of the flesh, what is He Himself, the light for the eyes of the heart? If then some great food were praised to you, which you were going to eat, you would prepare your stomach; God is praised to you, prepare your mind. The resurrection of the soul through faith.

Behold what your Lord says to you: The hour is coming, and now is. The hour is coming, and the hour is now, when: what? When the dead will hear the voice of the Son of God, and those who hear will live. Therefore, those who do not hear will not live. What is: those who hear? Those who obey. What is: those who hear? Those who believe and comply, they will live. Therefore, before they believed and obeyed, they were lying dead; and they walked, and they were dead. What did it matter that they walked as dead? And yet if anyone among them died bodily, they would run, prepare a tomb, wrap, carry, and bury the dead one, of whom it is said: Let the dead bury their dead. Such dead are thus raised by the word of God to live in faith. Those who were dead in unbelief are raised by the word. Of this hour the Lord said: The hour is coming, and now is. For by His word He was raising the dead unbelievers; of whom the Apostle says: Arise, sleeper, and rise from the dead, and Christ will shine on you. This is the resurrection of minds, this is the resurrection of the inner man, this is the resurrection of the soul. The resurrection of the body [is] for some unto good, for others unto evil. But this is not the only thing, the resurrection of the body remains as well. He who rises again in the soul, rises again in the body with his good. For not all rise again in the soul: all will rise again in the body. In the soul, I say, not all rise again, but those who believe and obey; because: Those who hear will live. As the Apostle says: Not everyone has faith. Therefore, if not everyone has faith, not all rise again in the soul. When the hour of the resurrection of the body comes, everyone will rise; whether they are good or evil: all will rise. But he who rises again in the soul rises in the body with his good; he who does not rise again in the soul rises in the body with his evil. He who rises again in the soul, rises again in the body to life; he who does not rise again in the soul, rises again in the body to punishment. Therefore, because the Lord has entrusted us with the resurrection of souls, to which we must all hasten, in which we must labor that we may live, and by living we may persevere to the end; it remained for Him to entrust us also with the resurrection of bodies, which will take place at the end of the age. But listen to how He also entrusted that to us. The cause and reason of the Incarnation of the Son of God. The Son of God in himself is life. How he died. When he had said, "Amen, I say to you, that the hour is coming, and now is, when the dead, that is, the unbelievers, will hear the voice of the Son of God, that is, the Gospel, and those who hear, that is, those who obey, will live, that is, they will be justified, and will no longer be unbelievers"; therefore, when he had said this, because he saw that we should also be taught about the resurrection of the flesh, not to be left thus, he followed and said: "For just as the Father has life in himself, so he has given to the Son to have life in himself." This is for the raising of minds, this is for the quickening of minds. Then he added: "And he has given him authority to execute judgment, because he is the son of man." This Son of God is the son of man. For if the Son of God had remained the Son of God and had not become the son of man, he would not have freed the sons of men. He who had made man, was made what he made, so that what he made might not perish. Thus he was made man in such a way that he remained the Son of God. For he was made man by taking on what he was not, without losing what he was; remaining God, he was made man. He took you on, he was not consumed in you. Thus, therefore, he came to us, the Son of God, the son of man, making and made, the creator and created; the creator of the mother, created from the mother: thus he came to us. According to what the Son of God is, he said: "The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead will hear the voice of the Son of God." He did not say: "the son of man"; for he was commending the truth, in which he is equal to the Father. And those who hear will live. For as the Father has life in himself, so he has given to the Son to have life in himself; not by participation, but: in himself. For we do not have life in ourselves, but in our God. However, the Father has life in himself; and he begot such a Son, who would have life in himself; he would not be a participant of life, but he himself would be life, of which we would be participants; clearly that he would have life in himself, and he himself would be life. But to become the son of man, he received from us. The Son of God in himself; to be the son of man, he received from us. From his own, the Son of God; from our own, the son of man. He received from us what is lesser; he gave to us what is greater. For he died from what he is as the son of man, not according to what he is as the Son of God. Yet the Son of God died: but according to the flesh he died, not according to the Word which was made flesh, and dwelt among us. Therefore, what he died from, he died from our own; what we live from, we live from his own. Neither could he die from his own, nor could we live from our own. Therefore, as God, as the Only Begotten, as equal to the begetter, our Lord Jesus commended to us that if we hear, we shall live.

Christ the judge in the form of a servant.

But: And he has granted him power to execute judgment, because he is the Son of Man. Therefore, that form will come for judgment. The form of a man will come for judgment; hence he says: He has granted him power to execute judgment, because he is the Son of Man. The judge here will be the Son of Man; that form will judge here which has been judged. Listen, and understand, this the Prophet had already said: They will look on the one they have pierced. They will see that very form, which they pierced with a lance. The judge will sit, who stood before the judge. He will condemn the true guilty, who was made a false guilty one. He himself will come, that form will come. You have this also in the Gospel: when, before the eyes of his disciples, he went into heaven, they were standing and watching, and an angelic voice sounded: Men of Galilee, why do you stand looking? etc. This same Jesus will come in the same way as you saw him going into heaven. What does it mean: he will come in the same way? He will come in the same form: For he has granted him power to execute judgment, because he is the Son of Man. See, however, in what way this was necessary, and it was right, that those to be judged should see the judge. For both the good and the bad were to be judged. But blessed are the pure in heart, for they will see God. It remains, then, that in judgment the form of a servant should be shown to both the good and the bad, the form of God should be reserved for the good alone. To see God, the highest happiness. For what will the good receive? Behold, I now say: what I did not say a little before; and yet in saying I do not say. For I said that we will be there saved, we will be unharmed, we will be living, we will be without punishments, we will be without hunger and thirst, we will be without deficiency, we will be without the loss of our eyes. I said all this; and what we will have more, I did not say.

We shall see God. But this alone will be, and such a great thing it will be, that in comparison with it everything will be nothing. I have said that we will be alive, that we will be safe and sound, that we will not suffer hunger and thirst, that we will not fall into weariness, that sleep will not press upon us. What is all this in comparison to that happiness by which we shall see God? Because God Himself, as He is, cannot be shown now, but whom we shall see; therefore what eye has not seen, nor ear heard, this the good will see, this the pious will see, this the merciful will see, this the faithful will see, this those who will have a good fate in the resurrection of the body will see, because they had good obedience in the resurrection of the heart. The form of a servant will be seen by all, the form of God only by the pious.

Therefore, will the wicked also see God? Of whom Isaiah says: Let the wicked be taken away, lest he see the glory of God. Therefore, both the wicked and the righteous will see that form; and when the judgment is pronounced: Let the wicked be taken away, lest he see the glory of God, it remains that among the righteous and good is fulfilled what the Lord himself promised, when he was here in the flesh, and was seen not only by the good, but also by the wicked. He spoke among the good and the wicked, and was visible to all, God hidden, man manifest; God ruling men, man appearing among men; he spoke, therefore, among them, and said: He who loves me will keep my commands; and he who loves me will be loved by my Father, and I will love him. And as if it were said to him: And what will you give him? And I will show, he said, myself to him. When did he say this? When he was seen by men. When did he say this? When he was seen even by those by whom he was not loved. How then would he show himself to his lovers, unless as he was seen by them? Therefore, because the form of God was preserved, the form of man was shown; speaking to men through the form of man, visible and seen by all, to the good and the wicked he showed himself, to his lovers he reserved himself.

After the resurrection, eternal life in the vision of God. When will He be shown to His beloved? After the resurrection of the body, when the impious will be taken away, lest he see the glory of God. Then indeed: When He appears, we shall be like Him; because we will see Him as He is. This is eternal life. For everything we were saying is nothing compared to that life. Because we live, what is it? Because we are saved, what is it? Because we will see God: great. This is eternal life; He Himself said this: And this is eternal life, that they may know You, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom You have sent. This is eternal life, that they may know, see, grasp, know what they had believed, receive what they could not yet grasp. Now the mind will see what the eye had not seen, nor had the ear heard, nor had it ascended into the heart of man; this will be said to them in the end: Come, blessed of My Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. Therefore those wicked ones will go into eternal burning. But the righteous, where? Into eternal life. What is "eternal life"? This is eternal life, that they may know You, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom You have sent. The resurrection of the flesh shall come.

Therefore, speaking about the future resurrection of the body, and not leaving us in doubt, he says: He gave him the power to execute judgment, because he is the Son of Man. Do not marvel at this, for the hour is coming. There he did not add: and now is; because that hour will be later, because that hour will be at the end of the world, because that hour will be the last, at the last trumpet. Do not marvel, because I said this: He gave him the power to execute judgment, because he is the Son of Man. Do not marvel. I said this because it is necessary for man to be judged by men. Which men are to be judged? Those who are found alive? Not only them. But what? The hour is coming, when those who are in the graves. How did he express the dead in the flesh? Those who are in the graves, whose buried bodies lie there, whose ashes are covered, whose bones are scattered, whose flesh is no longer there, and yet it is whole to God. The hour is coming, when all who are in the graves will hear his voice, and all will come forth. Whether they are good or bad, they will hear the voice, and they will come out. All the bonds of the underworld will be broken: everything that perished, or rather is thought to have perished, will be restored. For if God made man who did not exist, can he not restore what did exist? The resurrection of the dead by God is no less credible than creation.

I think that when it is said: God will raise the dead, no incredible thing is said, because it is said of God, not of man. It is a great thing that will happen, and an incredible thing that will happen. But it should not be incredible, because consider who will do it. He who is said to raise you is the one who created you. You were not, and you are; and having been made, will you not be? Far be it, do not believe such. God did something more miraculous when He made what did not exist: and yet He made what did not exist; and is it not believed that He will restore what existed, by those whom He made out of nothing? Is this what we repay to God, to whom we owe our existence from non-existence? Is this what we repay to Him, that we believe He cannot resurrect what He made? Is this the reward that His creature gives back to Him? Therefore, God says to you, O man, I made you before you were, so that you would not believe you will be what you were, since you could be what you were not? But behold, he says, in the tomb what I see is ashes, dust, bones; and this, again, will take on life, skin, flesh, and rise again? What, is this ashes, these bones, which I see in the tomb? Even if you see ashes, see bones in the tomb; in your mother's womb there was nothing. What you see now, whether ashes or bones, are still something; you, before you existed, were neither ashes nor bones; yet you were made when you did not exist at all: and you do not believe that these bones (whatever form they may be, however they may be, they still are bones) will receive the form they had, when you received what you did not have? Believe: because if you believe this, then your soul will be resurrected. And if your soul is now resurrected: The hour is coming, and now is; then your flesh will rise for your good, when the hour comes, when all who are in the graves will hear His voice, and come forth. For not simply because you hear and come forth should you rejoice: hear what follows: Those who have done good, to the resurrection of life; but those who have done evil, to the resurrection of judgment. Turned to the Lord...

Sermons - Sermon 128

SERMO 128 OF THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL OF JOHN (5, 31-35):

"If I bear witness concerning myself," etc.

CONCERNING THE WORDS OF THE APOSTLE (GAL 5, 14-17):

"Walk by the Spirit, and you will not fulfil the desires of the flesh."

"For the flesh desires," etc. The testimony of Christ, even about himself, how true it is.

We have heard the words of the Holy Gospel: and this may move someone, what the Lord Jesus says: If I bear witness of myself, my witness is not true. How then is the witness of truth not true? Is he not the one who said: I am the way, and the truth, and the life? Who then should be believed, if truth is not to be believed? Surely, he does not wish to believe anything but falsehood, who does not choose to believe in the truth. Therefore, this was said according to them, so that you may understand it this way, and from these words derive this sense: If I bear witness of myself, my witness is not true, that is, as you think. For he knew that his witness about himself was true; but on account of the weak, on account of the unbelievers, on account of those who do not understand, the sun was seeking lamps. For the frailness of their eyesight could not bear the brightness of the sun.

Why was the testimony of John sought?

Therefore, John was sought, who might bear witness to the truth; and you heard what he said: You came to John. He was a burning and shining lamp, and you wished to rejoice for a while in his light. This lamp was prepared for their confusion, because it was said long ago in the Psalms: I have prepared a lamp for my Christ. Why a lamp for the sun? I will clothe his enemies with confusion: but upon him my sanctification will flourish. Indeed, they are confounded in some place by John himself, when the Jews said to the Lord: By what authority do you do these things? Tell us. To whom he answered: Tell me also: Was the baptism of John from heaven or from men? They heard, and were silent. For they quickly thought among themselves: If we say: From men, the people will stone us; because they regard John as a prophet. If we say: From heaven, he will say to us: Why then did you not believe him? Because John bore witness to Christ. Confined in their hearts by their own questions, and entangled in their own snares, they answered: We do not know. What other voice could there be of darkness? It is indeed proper for a man, when he does not know, to say: I do not know. But when he knows, and says: I do not know, he is a witness against himself. Surely they knew John's excellence, and that his baptism was from heaven; but they did not want to yield to the one to whom John bore witness. But when they said: We do not know, Jesus responded to them: Neither will I tell you by what authority I do these things. And they were confounded, and it was fulfilled: I have prepared a lamp for my Christ; I will clothe his enemies with confusion. In the martyrs Christ himself bears witness to himself. Are not the martyrs witnesses of Christ and do they not bear testimony to the truth? But if we think more diligently, when those martyrs bear testimony, He Himself bears testimony to Himself. For He dwells in the martyrs, so that they may bear testimony to the truth. Hear one of the martyrs, the apostle Paul himself: Do you wish to receive proof of Christ, who speaks in me? Therefore, when John bears testimony, Christ bears testimony to Himself, who dwells in John. Let Peter bear testimony, let Paul bear testimony, let the other Apostles bear testimony, let Stephen bear testimony; He Himself bears testimony to Himself, who dwells in all. For He is God without them, what are they without Him?

Love from the Holy Spirit.

It is said of him: He ascended on high, he led captivity captive, he gave gifts to men. What does it mean: he led captivity captive? He conquered death. What does it mean: he led captivity captive? The devil orchestrated death, and the devil himself is captivated by the death of Christ. He ascended on high. What higher than heaven do we know? Clearly and in the sight of his disciples, he ascended into heaven. This we know, this we believe, this we confess. He gave gifts to men. What gifts? The Holy Spirit. What kind of gift does he give, who is like himself? For the mercy of God is great; he gives a gift equal to himself, since his gift is the Holy Spirit, and the whole Trinity is one God: the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit. What has the Holy Spirit bestowed upon us? Listen to the Apostle: The love of God, he says, has been poured into our hearts. Whence to you, O beggar, is the love of God poured into your heart? How, or in whom, is the love of God poured into the human heart? We have, he says, this treasure in earthen vessels. Why in earthen vessels? So that the excellence of power may be of God. Finally, when he said: The love of God has been poured into our hearts, lest anyone think that what he loves God with is from himself, he immediately added: through the Holy Spirit who has been given to us. Therefore, so that you may love God, may God dwell in you, and love himself through you; that is, may he move you to his love, kindle you, enlighten you, and stir you up.

Struggle of the soul and flesh. The soul must be subjected to God, the flesh to the soul. For there is a struggle in this body: as long as we live, we fight; as long as we fight, we are in danger; but in all these things we conquer, through Him who loved us. You have heard of our struggle, as the Apostle was just read: "The whole Law is fulfilled in one statement, in this: You shall love your neighbor as yourself." This love is from the Holy Spirit. You shall love your neighbor as yourself. First, see if you already know how to love yourself; and I commend to you your neighbor, whom you should love as yourself. But if you do not yet know how to love yourself; I fear that you might deceive your neighbor as yourself. For if you love iniquity, you do not love yourself. The Psalm bears witness: "But whoever loves iniquity, hates his own soul." But if you hate your soul, what good is it that you love your flesh? If you hate your soul, and love your flesh, your flesh will rise; but so that your soul may be tormented. Therefore the soul must first be loved, which must be subjected to God, so that this service keeps its order: the soul to God, the flesh to the soul. Do you want your flesh to serve your soul? Let your soul serve God. You must be ruled, in order to be able to rule. For this struggle is so dangerous, that if the ruler abandons it, a fall will follow. The Apostle on the struggle between flesh and spirit.

What struggle? But if you bite and devour each other, beware lest you be consumed by one another. But I say, walk by the Spirit. I speak the words of the Apostle, which were just read from his Epistle: But I say, walk by the Spirit and do not fulfill the desires of the flesh. But I say, walk by the Spirit, and the desires of the flesh; he did not say: Do not have them; nor did he say: Do not do them; but: do not fulfill them. What this means, assisted by the Lord, I will say as I can; be present, that you may understand, if you walk by the Spirit. But I say, walk by the Spirit, and do not fulfill the desires of the flesh. Let it follow: lest by any chance something, so that what is obscure here, can be more easily understood in his following words. For I said, it was not in vain that the Apostle avoided saying: Do not have the desires of the flesh; nor even wished to say: Do not do the desires of the flesh; but said: Do not fulfill the desires of the flesh. He proposed to us the very struggle. We are engaged in this conflict if we serve God. What then follows? For the flesh desires against the spirit, but the spirit against the flesh. For thesea n q f If this is not understood, it is most dangerously heard. Therefore, being anxious that people should not perish through misunderstanding, I have undertaken to explain these words of the Apostle, with the Lord helping, to your Charity. We have free time, we began in the morning, the hour of lunch does not press; on this day, that is the Sabbath, those who hunger for the Word of God are especially accustomed to gather. Listen and attend; I will speak as carefully as I can. The apostle poorly understood. It is the duty of the shepherd to explain the difficult passages of Scripture.

What then is this that I said: It is dangerously heard if it is not understood? Many, overcome by carnal and damnable desires, commit various crimes and scandals, and wallow in such wicked impurities, which are shameful even to speak of; and they say to themselves these words of the Apostle. See what the Apostle said: So that you do not do the things that you want. I do not want to do it, I am forced, compelled, conquered, I do the things I do not want, just as the Apostle says: Because the flesh lusts against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh, so that you do not do the things that you want. You see how dangerously it is heard if it is not understood. You see how it pertains to the duty of the shepherd, to open covered springs and to provide pure, harmless water to the thirsty sheep. The inner battle must be waged in such a way that the spirit is not conquered by the flesh.

Therefore, do not be overcome when you fight. See what kind of war he proposed, what kind of battle, what kind of strife, within, within yourself. The flesh lusts against the spirit. If the spirit does not lust against the flesh, commit adultery. But if the spirit lusts against the flesh, I see a struggle, I do not see a victor, it is a fight. The flesh lusts against the spirit: adultery delights. I confess that it delights. But the spirit lusts against the flesh: chastity also delights. Therefore, let the spirit conquer the flesh: or at least not be conquered by the flesh. Adultery seeks darkness, chastity desires light. Live as you wish to be known; just as you wish to be known by men, live even beyond the eyes of men; because he who made you, also sees you in darkness. Why is chastity praised publicly by men? Why do they not praise adultery, not even adulterers? Therefore, he who seeks the truth comes to the light. But adultery is pleasing. Let it be opposed, resisted, combated. For you indeed have the means by which to fight. Your God is within you, a good Spirit has been given to you. And yet the flesh itself is allowed to desire against the spirit, with perverse suggestions and genuine delights. Let what the Apostle says be done: Let not sin reign in your mortal body. He did not say: Let it not be. It is already there. Because it is called sin, it has happened by the merit of sin. For in paradise the flesh did not desire against the spirit, and there was no such struggle where there was only peace; but transgression having been committed, after man did not want to serve God, and was given over to himself; neither thus given over to himself that he could at least possess himself; but possessed by him who deceived him; the flesh began to desire against the spirit. And this too desires against the spirit in good people: for in wicked people it has no one against whom to desire. For there it desires against the spirit, where the spirit is. To fight against the concupiscences of the flesh is the task of the Holy Spirit in us. He acts well who is led by the Spirit of God. For what he says, "The flesh desires against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh," do not think it only refers to the human spirit. It is the Spirit of God who fights within you against yourself, against that which is within you opposing you. For you did not wish to remain with the Lord; you fell, you were broken; like a vessel when it falls from a man's hand to the ground, you were broken. And because you are broken, therefore you are against yourself, therefore you are opposed to yourself. Let there be nothing within you that is against you, and you will stand whole. For you to know that this duty pertains to the Holy Spirit, the Apostle says in another place: For if you live according to the flesh, you will die; but if by the spirit you put to death the deeds of the flesh, you will live. In these words already man would exalt himself, as if by his own spirit he could put to death the deeds of the flesh. If you live according to the flesh, you will die; but if by the spirit you put to death the deeds of the flesh, you will live. Explain to us, Apostle, by which spirit. For man too has a spirit pertaining to his own nature, by which he is man. For man consists of body and spirit. And it is said of the spirit of man itself: No one knows what is in man, except the spirit of man which is in him. Therefore I see that man himself has his own spirit pertaining to his nature, and I hear you saying: But if by the spirit you put to death the deeds of the flesh, you will live. I ask by which spirit: mine, or God’s? For I hear your words, and am still moved by uncertainty. For when spirit is mentioned, it sometimes refers to the human spirit, and sometimes the spirit of a beast is spoken of; as it is written, during the flood, all flesh died, which had in it the breath of life. And thus the spirit of a beast is spoken of, and the spirit of man is spoken of. Sometimes even the wind is called the spirit; as it is held in the Psalm: Fire, hail, snow, ice, violent winds. Therefore, since the spirit is mentioned in many ways, by which spirit did you, Apostle, say the deeds of the flesh must be put to death? mine, or God’s? Hear what follows, and understand. The question is resolved by the following words. For when he had said: But if by the spirit you put to death the deeds of the flesh, you will live; he immediately added: For all who are led by the Spirit of God are sons of God. You act, if you are led; and you act well, if you are led by what is good. Therefore, what he said to you: But if by the spirit you put to death the deeds of the flesh, you will live; and it was ambiguous to you which spirit he meant, understand it by the following words, recognize the Redeemer. For indeed the Redeemer gave you the Spirit, by which you put to death the deeds of the flesh. For all who are led by the Spirit of God are sons of God. They are not sons of God, if they are not led by the Spirit of God. But if they are led by the Spirit of God, they fight; because they have a great helper. For God does not watch us fighting thus, as people watch hunters. People can favor the hunter, but cannot help him in danger.

Saints here do not do what they want, how.

Thus it is here also: The flesh desires against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh. And what does it mean: So that you do not do what you want? Here indeed is the danger of a poor understanding. Let it now be the duty of any kind of expositor. So that you do not do what you want. Pay attention, you saints who fight. I speak to those who are battling. Those who battle understand: he who does not battle does not understand me. For he who battles, I do not say understands me, but anticipates me. What does a chaste man want? That no desire at all arises in his members against chastity. He wants peace, but he does not yet have it. For when it comes to that point where no desire arises at all against chastity, there will be no enemy with whom we struggle; nor is victory awaited there, because we triumph over an already vanquished enemy. Listen to this victory, as the Apostle himself says: This corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. When this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality; then the saying that is written will come true: Death is swallowed up in victory. Listen to the voices of the triumphant: Where, O death, is your contempt? Where, O death, is your sting? You struck, you wounded, you cast down; but for me was wounded He who made me. O death, O death! He who made me was wounded for me, and with His death He conquered you. And then the triumphant will say: Where, O death, is your contempt? Where, O death, is your sting? A man wishes not to have desires, yet he does not do what he wishes. But now, when the flesh lusts against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh, it is a contempt of death: for what we would, that we do not. Why? Because we would have no desires, but we cannot. Whether we will or not, we have them; whether we will or not, they tingle, they allure, they stimulate, they infest, they want to rise. They are suppressed, not yet extinguished; as long as the flesh lusts against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh. Does this happen even when a man has died? Far from it. You put off the flesh, how do you drag along with you the desires of the flesh? But if you have fought well, you are received into rest. From which rest you are to be crowned, not condemned; so that afterwards you are brought to the kingdom. Therefore, as long as we live here, brothers, it is so; so even we who have grown old in this warfare, indeed have lesser enemies: but nevertheless we have them. Our enemies are somewhat fatigued now even through age; but nevertheless, though fatigued, they do not cease to infest the quiet of old age with whatever movements. The battle of the young is fiercer: we know it, we have gone through it. Therefore the flesh lusts against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh; so that you do not do what you would. For what do you wish, oh saints, oh good warriors, oh brave soldiers of Christ? What do you wish? That there may be no evil desires at all. But you cannot. Wage war, hope for triumph. For now, in the meantime, the fight is on. The flesh lusts against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh; so that you do not do what you would; that is, that there should be no desires of the flesh at all.

We must fight so that sin does not reign. Our weapons. Power given to us. But do what you can; as the Apostle himself says in another place, which I had already begun to mention: Let not sin reign in your mortal body, to obey its desires. Look at what I do not want; evil desires arise, but do not obey. Arm yourself, take up the instruments of war. The commandments of God are your weapons. If you listen to me well, and arm yourself from what I say. He says, Let not sin reign in your mortal body. For as long as you carry the mortal body, sin fights against you; but let it not reign. What does it mean: Let it not reign? That is, unto obeying its desires. If you begin to obey, it reigns. And what is to obey, except to present your members as instruments of unrighteousness to sin? There is no teacher clearer than this. What do you now want me to explain to you? Do what you have heard. Do not present your members as instruments of unrighteousness to sin. God has given you the power through His Spirit to control your members. Lust arises, you hold your members; what will it do since it has arisen? You hold your members: do not present your members as instruments of unrighteousness to sin; do not arm your adversary against you. Hold your feet, so they do not go to illicit things. Lust has arisen, you hold your members; hold your hands from all crime; hold your eyes, that they may not look wrongly; hold your ears, that they may not gladly hear words of lust; hold your whole body, hold your sides, hold the top, hold the bottom.

What does lust do? It knows how to rise, it does not know how to conquer. By rising constantly without cause, it learns not to rise.

What it is to hear and to fulfill desires.

Let us return therefore to the words which I had proposed as obscure from the Apostle, and now we shall see them to be plain. For this is what I proposed: the Apostle did not say, "Walk by the Spirit, and do not have the desires of the flesh;" for it is necessary that we have them. Why then did he not say: "Do not act on the desires of the flesh?" Because we do them; for we desire. Desire itself is to act. But the Apostle said: "It is no longer I who do it, but sin which dwells in me." Therefore, what must you beware of? This, without doubt: do not complete it. Damnable desire has arisen, it has arisen, it has suggested: let it not be heard. It burns, it does not restrain itself, and you would wish that it did not burn. And where is it: "That you may not do the things you wish?" Do not give your members. Let it burn without cause, and it consumes itself. Therefore, these desires happen in you. It must be admitted, they happen. Thus he said: "Do not complete them." But let them not be completed. You have resolved to act, you have completed. You have indeed completed, if you decide that adultery must be done, and therefore do not do it because a place is not found, because the opportunity is not given, because perhaps she who you seem to be moved by is chaste; behold, she is chaste, and you are an adulterer. Why? Because you have completed the desires. What does it mean: you have completed? In your mind, you have decided that adultery must be done. Already, heaven forbid, if even the members have worked, you have been cast down into death. In the three dead raised by Christ, three degrees of sinners.

Christ raised a dead girl in the house, the daughter of the synagogue ruler. She was in the house, she had not yet been carried out. Such is a man who has resolved in his heart to commit a sin; he is dead, but he lies within. If, however, he has reached the stage of carrying out the act with his limbs, he is carried out. But the Lord also raised the young son of a widow when he was being carried out dead beyond the city's gate. Therefore, I dare to say something: If you have decided in your heart and you retract yourself from your act, you will be healed before you consummate it. For if you repent in your heart because you had resolved an evil, wicked, and condemnable sin; where you lay dead within, there within you have risen. But if you have completed it, you have already been carried outside, but you have someone who says to you: "Young man, I say to you, arise!" Even if you have committed it, let it bring you to repentance, return from it promptly; do not come to the grave. But here too I have a third dead person, who is also brought to the grave. He now has the weight of habit upon him, the earthly mass presses him greatly. For he has been much practiced in sins, burdened heavily by his excessive habit. Christ also cries out: "Lazarus, come forth!" For a man of the worst habit now stinks. Rightly did Christ cry out there; and not only did He cry out, but He cried out with a loud voice. For at Christ's cry, even such as these, though dead, though buried, though stinking, will still rise, and they themselves too will rise; they will rise. For none lying down should be despaired of under such a resurrector. Turned to the Lord...

Sermons - Sermon 129

SERMO 129 OF THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL OF JOHN (5:39-47):

"Search the Scriptures, in which you think you have eternal life."

AGAINST THE DONATISTS Exposition of the Gospel reading.

Let your Charity attend to the gospel reading, which has recently sounded in our ears, while we speak a few things which the Lord grants. The Lord Jesus was speaking to the Jews, and was saying to them: "Search the Scriptures, in which you think you have eternal life; they bear witness about me." Then after a little while: "I," he says, "have come in my Father's name, and you did not receive me; if another comes in his own name, you will receive him." Then after a little while: "How can you believe, who accept glory from one another, and do not seek the glory that comes from the only God?" At the end he says: "It is not I who accuse you before the Father; there is one who accuses you, Moses, in whom you hope. For if you believed Moses, you would perhaps believe me as well; for he wrote about me. But if you do not believe his words, how can you believe mine?" To these things set before us by divine providence, from the mouth of the reader, but through the ministry of the Savior, hear a few things, not to be counted, but to be weighed. The words of Christ to the disciples also pertain to us. For all these things are easy to understand concerning the Jews. But we must take care not to remove our eyes from ourselves while attending too much to them. For the Lord was speaking to his disciples; and surely what He spoke to them, He spoke also to us, their descendants. For it does not pertain solely to them when He said, "Behold, I am with you always, to the end of the age," but to all Christians who are to come afterward, even to the end of the age. So, while speaking to them, He said, "Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees." Then they thought that the Lord said this because they had not brought any bread; they did not understand that "Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees" was said to mean "Beware of the doctrine of the Pharisees." What was the doctrine of the Pharisees, if not what you have just heard? Seeking glory from one another, expecting glory from one another, and not seeking the glory which is from God alone. Concerning these, the apostle Paul says thus: "I bear them witness that they have a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge." He says, "They have a zeal for God; I know, I understand, I was among them, I was like them. They have a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge." What is this, Apostle, not according to knowledge? Explain to us what knowledge you commend, what you grieve is lacking in them, and what you desire to be in us. Following this, he added and revealed what he had closed off. What is "They have a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge"? For, being ignorant of the righteousness of God, and seeking to establish their own, they did not submit to the righteousness of God. Therefore, to be ignorant of the righteousness of God and to seek to establish one's own is to expect glory from one another and not to seek the glory which is from God alone; this is the leaven of the Pharisees. The Lord commands us to beware of this. If He commands His servants, and the Lord commands it, let us beware; lest we hear, "Why do you call me 'Lord, Lord,' and do not do what I say?" The unbelief of the Jews.

Let us therefore leave aside for a while the Jews, to whom the Lord was then speaking. They are outside, they do not wish to listen to us. They hate the Gospel itself, they procured false testimonies against the Lord to condemn the living one; they bought other testimonies with money against the dead one. When we say to them: Believe in Jesus, they reply to us: Shall we believe in a dead man? But when we add: But he has risen, they respond: Far be it; his disciples stole him from the sepulcher. The Jews, buyers of falsehood, love falsehood and scorn the truth of the Lord Redeemer. What you say, Jew, your parents bought with money; and that has remained in you, which they bought. Attend rather to him who bought you, not to him who bought a lie for you. The words of Christ against the Jews apply to the Donatists in the Church. But let us leave those, as we said, let us attend to these brothers of ours with whom we are engaged. For Christ is both the head and the body. The head is in heaven, the body is on earth; the head is the Lord, the body is his Church. But you remember the saying: They shall be two in one flesh. This is a great mystery, says the Apostle, but I speak in Christ and in the Church. If therefore they are two in one flesh, they are two in one voice. Our head, the Lord Christ, spoke to the Jews the things we have heard, when the Gospel was read, the head to its enemies; let also the body, that is, the Church, speak to its enemies. You know to whom it speaks. What does it have to say? I did not speak of my own, so that there may be one voice; because one flesh, one voice. Therefore let us say this to them: I speak with the voice of the Church. O brothers, dispersed children, wandering sheep, cut-off branches, why do you calumniate me? Why do you not recognize me? Search the Scriptures, in which you think you have eternal life; these bear witness about me; Our head says to the Jews, what the body says to you: You will seek me, and you will not find me. Why? Because you do not search the Scriptures, which bear witness about me.

Testimonies of the Old Testament concerning Christ and the Church.

Testimony for the head: The promises were spoken to Abraham and to his seed. He does not say: And to seeds, as of many; but as of one: And to your seed, which is Christ. Testimony for the body to Abraham, which the Apostle mentioned. The promises were spoken to Abraham. As I live, says the Lord; by myself I swear, because you listened to my voice, and did not spare your beloved son because of me, unless blessing I will bless you, and filling I will fill your seed like the stars of the sky, and like the sand of the sea; and in your seed all the nations of the earth shall be blessed. You have testimony for the head, you have for the body. Listen to another brief one, and almost encompassing one sentence for the head and for the body. About the resurrection of Christ the Psalm was speaking: Be exalted above the heavens, O God. Immediately for the body: And your glory above all the earth. Listen to the testimony for the head: They have pierced my hands and my feet, they have numbered all my bones; they themselves looked and gazed upon me, they divided my garments among them, and cast lots for my vesture. Listen immediately for the body, after a few words: All the ends of the earth will remember and turn to the Lord; and all the families of the nations will worship in his presence; for the kingdom is the Lord's, and he rules over the nations. Listen for the head: And he himself as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber. And in that same Psalm listen for the body: Their sound has gone out into all the earth, and their words to the ends of the world.

N. T. testimony for Christ and the Church.

These words are for the Jews, and for those of ours. Why? Because both the Jews and our own accept the Scriptures of the Old Testament. But Christ Himself, whom they do not accept, let us see if those of ours accept Him. Let Him speak, let Him speak both for Himself, who is the head, and for His body, which is the Church, because the head speaks for the body, which is in us. Hear Him for the head: He rose from the dead, found the disciples hesitant, doubting, not believing out of joy; He opened their minds to understand the Scriptures and said to them: Thus it is written, and thus it was necessary for the Christ to suffer and to rise from the dead on the third day. You have Him for the head; let Him also speak for the body: That repentance and forgiveness of sins be preached in His name to all nations, beginning from Jerusalem. Therefore, let the Church speak to its enemies, let it speak. It speaks plainly, it is not silent: but let them listen. Brothers, you have heard the testimonies, now recognize me. Search the Scriptures, in which you hope to have eternal life; these testify about me. What I have said is not from me, but from my Lord, and yet you still turn away, you still evade. How can you believe me, seeking glory from one another, and not seeking the glory that comes from the only God? Because, being ignorant of the righteousness of God, you have zeal for God, but not according to knowledge. For being ignorant of the righteousness of God, and wanting to establish your own, you have not submitted to the righteousness of God. What does it mean to be ignorant of the righteousness of God and to want to establish your own, if not to say: I sanctify, I justify; what I give is holy? Leave to God what belongs to God: recognize, O man, what belongs to man. You are ignorant of the righteousness of God, and you want to establish your own. You want to justify me; it is enough for you to be justified with me. The Donatists imitate the crime of the Antichrist.

It has been said about the Antichrist, and everyone understands thus what the Lord said: I have come in the name of my Father, and you did not receive me; if another comes in his own name, you will receive him. But let us also hear John: You have heard that the Antichrist is coming, and now many antichrists have arisen. But why do we fear the Antichrist, except because he is going to honor his own name and despise the name of the Lord? What else does someone who says: I justify, do? He is answered: I came to Christ, not with feet but with heart; where I heard the Gospel, there I believed, there I was baptized; because I believed in Christ, I believed in God. And he (the antichrist) says: You are not clean. Why? Because I was not there. Say why I am not cleansed, man who was baptized in Jerusalem, man who was baptized, for instance, among the Ephesians, to whom you read the given Epistle, and whose peace you despise? Behold, the Apostle wrote to the Ephesians: the Church was founded, it endures until now; it endures more abundantly, it endures more multiple, it holds what it received from the Apostle: If anyone announces to you other than what you have received, let him be accursed. So what then? What do you say to me? I am not clean? Baptized there, I am not clean? Indeed you are not. Why? Because I was not there. But he who is everywhere was there. He who is everywhere was there, in whose name I believed. You came from I know not where, or rather you did not come, but you want me to come to you, here placed you say to me: You are not rightly baptized, because I was not there. See who was there. What was said to John? Upon whom you see the Spirit descending like a dove, this is he who baptizes. You have him seeking you; rather, because you envied me having been baptized by him, you lost him.

What is the doctrine of the Catholics, what is the doctrine of the Donatists.

Therefore, understand, my brothers, our voice and theirs, and see what you choose. We say this: Let us be holy — God knows; let us be wicked, and He knows even more; do not place your hope in us, no matter what we are. If we are good, do what is written: "Be imitators of me, as I am of Christ." But if we are bad, even then you are not deserted, nor left without counsel; listen to the one who says: "Do what they say, but do not do what they do." However, they say: "Unless we are good, you will perish." Behold, another comes in his own name. Therefore, does my life depend on you, and is my salvation bound to you? Have I indeed forgotten my foundation? Was not Christ the rock? Was not the one who builds upon the rock not cast down by the wind, rain, or floods? Therefore, come with me if you will, upon the rock, and do not desire to be as a rock for me. The Donatists believe neither in Moses nor in the rising Christ. The Donatists are injurious to Christ. So let the Church also say the most recent statement: If you believed Moses, you would believe me as well; for he wrote about me; because I am his body, about whom he wrote. And Moses wrote about the Church. For I said the words of Moses: In your seed all nations will be blessed. Moses wrote this in the first book. If you believed Moses, you would believe Christ also. Because you disdain the words of Moses, it is necessary that you disdain the words of Christ. There they have, he says, Moses and the Prophets, let them hear them. No, father Abraham; but if someone comes from the dead, they will listen to him. And he said: If they do not listen to Moses and the Prophets, neither will they believe if someone rises from the dead. This was said about the Jews; was it not also said about the heretics?

He had risen from the dead who said: It was necessary for Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead on the third day. I believe this. I believe, he said. Do you believe? Why do you not believe what follows? Because you believe: It was necessary for Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead on the third day; this was said of the head; believe also what follows about the Church: That repentance and the forgiveness of sins should be proclaimed in his name to all nations. Why do you believe about the head, and do not believe about the body? What has the Church done to you, that you would wish in some way to behead it? You wish to take away the head of the Church, and believe in the head, leaving the body, as if the body were lifeless. In vain do you flatter the head, as if a devoted servant. Whoever wishes to behead, tries to kill both the head and the body. They are ashamed to deny Christ, and are not ashamed to deny the words of Christ. Neither we have seen Christ with our eyes, nor did you. The Jews saw, and killed. We have not seen, and believe; his words are with us. Compare yourselves to the Jews; they despised him hanging on the wood, you despise him sitting in heaven; with their urging, the title of Christ stood, with you standing, the Baptism of Christ is erased. But what remains, brothers, except that we pray for the proud, let us pray for the arrogant, who so exalt themselves? Let us say to God for them: Let them know that your name is the Lord; and not men, but you alone are the most high over all the earth. Turned towards the Lord...

SERMO 13

Sermon Delivered at the Table of Saint Cyprian Sixth day before the Kalends of June. FROM THE PSALM WHERE IT SAYS:

"Be instructed, all you who judge the earth" To judge what the earth is. Be instructed, all you who judge the earth. To judge the earth is to subdue the body. Let us listen to the Apostle judging the earth: I do not fight, he says, as one beating the air, but I discipline my body and bring it into subjection, lest, when I have preached to others, I myself should become disqualified. Therefore, hear the one judging the earth and judge the earth so that you may not be earth. For if you judge the earth, you will be heaven, and you will declare the glory of the Lord made in you. For the heavens declare the glory of God. But if you do not judge the earth, you will be earth. And if you are earth, you will belong to him to whom it was said: You shall eat the dust (earth). Therefore let the judges of the earth listen. Discipline the body, restrain desires, love wisdom, conquer lust. And to do this, let them be instructed.

Rejoice in the Lord, not in oneself.

This, however, is the essence of learning: Serve the Lord with fear and rejoice with trembling, rejoice in Him, not in yourself: in Him from whom is what you are, and that you are a human, and that you are righteous, if indeed you are now righteous. But if you think that you are human indeed from Him, but righteous by yourself, you do not serve the Lord with fear, nor do you rejoice with trembling, but with presumption in yourself. And what will happen to you, if not what follows? Lest the Lord be angry and you perish, he says, from the just way. For he did not say: "Lest the Lord be angry, and you do not enter the just way," but: you perish from the just way. For you already seem righteous to yourself, by not seizing what belongs to others, not committing adultery, not committing murder, not giving false testimony against your neighbor, honoring your father and mother, worshipping one God, not serving idols and demons. You will perish from this way, if you presume these for yourself, if you think these are from yourself. For the unbelievers do not enter the just way; the proud perish from the just way. For what does it say? Be instructed, you judges of the earth. And lest you attribute the strength and power by which you judge the earth to yourselves, believe it is from yourselves, do not do so: Serve the Lord with fear; rejoice, not in presumption of yourselves, but with fear in Him, lest the Lord be angry, and you perish from the just way, when His wrath is quickly kindled. Therefore, what must be done so that we do not perish from the just way? Blessed are all who trust in Him. If blessed are they who trust in Him, miserable are those who trust in themselves. For cursed is every man who puts his hope in man, therefore not even in yourself, because you are a man too. For if you put your hope in another man, you will be irregularly humble. But if you put your hope in yourself, you will be dangerously proud. What is the difference? Both are pernicious, neither should be chosen. The irregularly humble is not exalted, the dangerously proud falls precipitously.

Thus God works in us so that we also work.

Finally, let Your Holiness know, that these words are said to rebuke and destroy that sense by which each person trusts in themselves: Serve the Lord with fear and exult with trembling. Listen to the Apostle saying these very words and explaining why they were said. Here are the words of the Apostle: Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling. "Why then do I work out my salvation with fear and trembling, when it is in my power to work out my own salvation?" Do you want to hear why with fear and trembling? For it is God who works in you. Therefore, with fear and trembling. Because what the humble obtain, the proud lose. If therefore it is God who works in us, why was it said: Work out your own salvation? Because he works in us in such a way that we also work. Be my helper. He names himself also as a worker, who calls upon a helper. "But," he says, "my will is good." I admit, yours. But from whom is it given, from whom aroused? Do not listen to me, ask the Apostle: For it is God, he says, who works in you both to will - who works in you both to will - and to work for His good pleasure. What then is that which you arrogated to yourself? What is it that you, proud, went forth and perished? Return to your heart, find yourself to be evil, and to be good invoke the good. For nothing in you pleases God except what you have from God; but what you have from yourself displeases God. If you consider your good things, what do you have that you did not receive? But if you received it, why do you boast as if you had not received it? He alone knows only how to give. He does not have a giver, who does not have one better. Since you are inferior to him, indeed because you are inferior, rejoice that you were made in his image, so that you might be found in him in whom you perished. For you could not in yourself do anything but lose yourself; you do not know how to find yourself unless he who made you seeks you. The earth judging the earth ought to fear the One who is in heaven.

Let us speak also to those who judge the earth according to this visible and common understanding. For kings, leaders, princes, and judges judge the earth. Each one judges the earth according to the office he has received. But what is meant by "judges the earth," if not that he judges the people who are on the earth? For if you do not take the earth to mean only that which you tread upon, then it is said to farmers: You who judge the earth. But furthermore, if kings judge the earth, and all who receive power from kings under them, let them also be educated, because the earth judges the earth and should fear Him who is in heaven judging the earth. For he judges his equal, man judges man, mortal judges mortal, sinner judges sinner. For if that divine sentence proceeds in the midst: Let him who is without sin cast the first stone, does not every judge of the earth suffer an earthquake? Let us recall the Gospel episode. The Pharisees, testing the Lord, brought before Him a woman caught in adultery, for which sin a punishment had been definitively prescribed by the law, that is, the law given by Moses, the servant of God. Thus, with this cunning and fraudulent conjunction, the Pharisees approached the Lord to see if He would command the defamed woman to be stoned to destroy His gentleness. But if He forbade what the law commanded, He would be held guilty of violating the law. Just as when they questioned Him about paying tribute to Caesar, He caught them by their own words, asking in turn whose image and inscription was on the coin. They who had asked responded that the coin bore Caesar’s image, He answered them according to their own words: Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar’s, and to God the things that are God’s, to remind them thus that the image of God should be rendered to God in man, as Caesar’s image is rendered to Caesar on the coin. And so, He questioned the questioners regarding this adulteress, and thus judged the judges; “I do not forbid,” He said, “the stoning of her whom the law commanded to be stoned, but I ask by whom. For I do not resist, but I require a minister of the law.” Finally, hear this: “You wish to stone according to the law? Let him who is without sin cast the first stone at her.” The Lord's mercy towards the sinner. When he heard these things, he wrote with his finger on the ground, to instruct the earth. When he said this to the Pharisees, he lifted up his eyes and looked at the earth and made it tremble. So when he had said this, he again began to write on the ground. But they, being convicted and trembling, went out one by one. Oh, the movement of the earth, where the ground was moved so much that it even changed its place! Therefore, with them leaving, the sinner remained with the Savior. The sick remained with the doctor. The miserable remained with mercy. And looking at the woman, he said: Has no one condemned you? And she said: No one, Lord. But still she was anxious. For sinners dared not condemn, they dared not stone the sinner who, looking at themselves, found themselves alike. But the woman was still in great danger, because even he who was without sin remained as her judge. No one, he said, has condemned you? And she replied: No one, Lord; if not even you, I am secure. To which silent anxiety the Lord responded with a voice: Neither do I condemn you. Neither I, though I am without sin, will I condemn you. Their conscience restrained them from vengeance, my mercy inclines me to help.

Doing good, and even if not from authority, nevertheless, you will have praise from it.

Attend to these things, and be taught all you who judge the earth. All indeed, for thus it is to be understood of whom the Apostle says: Every soul should be subject to higher authorities. For there is no authority except from God. The authorities that exist have been instituted by God. Therefore, whoever resists the authority resists what God has appointed. For princes are not a terror to good conduct, but to bad. Do you wish to have no fear of authority? Do what is good, and you will receive approval from it. And if not from it, yet from God. For if you act justly, a just authority will praise you; or if you act justly, even if an unjust authority condemns you, the just God will crown you. Therefore, hold to justice and live rightly; and whether you are condemned or absolved, you will receive praise from Him. Blessed is he whose blood was shed, did he not find praise from that very authority, even from which he was seen to be judged? He promised confession, remained steadfast in faith, did not fear death, shed his blood, and conquered the devil.

First judge within.

Therefore, that you may not be of unjust power, whoever desires to have power over men, be taught not to judge perversely, and do not perish in spirit before you destroy anyone in the flesh. You wish to be a judge, you cannot by merit, or money. I do not yet reproach. Perhaps, indeed, you wish to benefit human affairs, and you buy to benefit. To serve justice, you do not spare money. First, be a judge in yourself for yourself. First, judge yourself, so that you may proceed to another with a secure conscience. Return to yourself, attend to yourself, examine yourself, listen to yourself. There I want you to prove yourself an upright judge, where you do not seek a witness. You wish to proceed with power so that another may tell you about another which you do not know. First judge within. Has your conscience said nothing to you about yourself? If you do not wish to deny, surely it has said. I do not wish to hear what it has said, you who have listened should judge. It has told you what you have done, what you have received, what you have sinned. I would like to know what kind of sentence you have pronounced. If you have listened well, if you have listened rightly, if you have been just in hearing yourself, if you have ascended the tribunal of your mind, if you have suspended yourself before yourself in the rack of the heart, if you have applied the harsh torturers of fear, you have listened well if you have listened thus, and undoubtedly you have punished the sin by repenting. Behold, you have examined, and have listened, and have punished. And yet you have spared yourself. Thus, listen to your neighbor, if you are instructed as the psalm admonished: Be instructed, you who judge the earth.

Love to terrify, but cherish.

If you listen to your neighbor in the same way you listen to yourself, you pursue sins, not the sinner. And if someone is perhaps obstinate in correcting sins, turning away from the fear of God, you pursue in him this very thing, you try to correct this very thing, you work to destroy and remove this, so that the man is saved from being condemned by sin. For there are two names, man and sinner. God made man, but man made himself a sinner. Let what man made perish, let what God made be freed. Do not therefore pursue until death, lest in pursuing sin, you lose the man. Do not pursue until death, that there may be someone who repents, do not kill the man so that there may be someone who repents; do not kill the man so that there may be someone who amends. Retaining this love for mankind in your heart, be a judge of the earth. And love to frighten, but with affection. If you are proud, be proud for sins, not for the man. Rage against what displeases you also in yourself, not against him who was made like you. You came from the same workshop, you had one craftsman, you have the same clay as your material. What do you lose by not loving whom you judge? For you lose justice by not loving whom you judge. But let punishments be applied. I do not object, I do not forbid, but with a loving mind, with an affectionate mind, with a corrective mind.

He who does not give discipline is cruel. For you do not fail to educate your son. And you first seek that, if it is possible, he may be educated by shame and courtesy, that he might blush to offend his father, rather than fear him as a severe judge. You rejoice in such a son. But if he happens to disregard these things, you apply also the rod, inflict punishment, cause pain, but you seek his salvation. Many have been corrected by love, many by fear, but through the trembling of fear they reached love. Be instructed, you who judge the earth. Love and judge. Innocence is not so sought that discipline perishes. It is written: "He who rejects discipline is unhappy." To this sentence well could be added: just as he who rejects discipline is unhappy, so he who denies discipline is cruel. I have dared to say something, my brothers, which I am compelled to explain to you in somewhat greater detail due to the obscurity of the matter. I repeat what I said: he who rejects discipline is unhappy. This is evident. He who does not give discipline is cruel. I hold firmly, I hold and show that striking lovingly is righteous, sparing is cruel. I place an example before you. Where do I find the righteousness in striking? I do not go to others; I consider the father and the son. A father loves even when he strikes. And a child does not wish to be beaten. He disregards the will, considers the benefit. Why? Because he is a father, because he prepares an inheritance, because he nurtures a successor. Behold, the father is righteous in striking, merciful in striking. Give me a man who is cruel in sparing. I do not depart from the persons, I place them before your eyes. But if an inexperienced and undisciplined boy lives in such a way that he perishes, and the father pretends not to see, spares, and fears to offend his wayward son's discipline with severity, is he not cruel in sparing? Therefore be instructed, you who judge the earth, and in judging well, expect the reward not from the earth but from Him who made heaven and earth.

Sermons - Sermon 130

SERMO 130 On the words of the Gospel of John (5, 5-14): Where it is narrated the miracle of the five loaves and the two fishes The meaning of the miracle. A great miracle has been done, beloved ones, that from five loaves and two fish five thousand men were fed, and the remaining fragments filled twelve baskets. A great miracle: but we will not marvel much at the deed if we consider the doer. He who multiplied five loaves in the hands of those breaking them, is the same who multiplies the seeds germinating in the earth, so that a few grains are sown and granaries are filled. But because he does this every year, no one marvels. It is not the commonness of the act that takes away the wonder, but its regularity. When the Lord did these things, he spoke to those understanding not only by words but also through the miracles themselves. The five loaves signify the five books of the Law of Moses. The old law is like barley compared to the wheat of the gospel. Great mysteries concerning Christ are contained in those books. Whence he himself said: If you believed Moses, you would believe me; for he wrote of me. But just as in barley the kernel is hidden under the husk; so in the veil of the mysteries of the law, Christ is hidden. When those mysteries are opened and expanded, they are like bread; so those loaves grew when they were broken. And what I have explained to you, I have broken bread for you. The five thousand men signify the people under the five books of the law. The twelve baskets are the twelve Apostles, who themselves are filled from the fragments of the law. The two fish are either the two commandments of the love of God and neighbor, or the two peoples from circumcision and uncircumcision, or those two sacred persons of king and priest. When these are explained, they are broken; when understood, they are eaten.

Christ became bread by incarnation. Christ the merchant. Our Redeemer, how.

Let us turn to him who made these things. He is the bread which came down from heaven; but the bread that refreshes and does not fail; bread that can be taken, but cannot be consumed. This bread was also signified by manna. Therefore it is said: He gave them bread from heaven; man ate the bread of angels. Who is the bread of heaven, except Christ? But that man might eat the bread of angels, the Lord of angels was made man. For if he had not been made this, we would not have his flesh; if we did not have his flesh, we would not eat the bread of the altar. Let us hasten to the inheritance, because we have received a great pledge from it. My brothers, let us desire the life of Christ, because we hold the pledge of Christ's death. How will he not give us his good things, who suffered our evils? In these lands, in this evil age, what abounds, except being born, laboring, and dying? Examine human affairs, convince me if I lie; observe all men, whether they are in this world for anything other than to be born, labor, and die. These are the wares of our region, these abound here. To such wares that Merchant descended. And since every merchant gives and receives; he gives what he has and receives what he does not have; when he buys something, he gives money and receives what he bought; Christ also in this trade gave and received. But what did he receive? What abounds here: being born, laboring, and dying. And what did he give? To be reborn, to rise again, and to reign forever. O good Merchant, buy us. What shall I say, buy us, since we should be giving thanks, because you have bought us? You dispense our price to us, we drink your blood; you dispense therefore our price to us. And we read the Gospel, our instrument. We are your servants, we are your creatures; you made us, you redeemed us. A master can buy his servant, he cannot create him; but the Lord both created and redeemed his servants; he created us so we might exist, he redeemed us so that we would not always be captives. For we fell into the power of the prince of this age, who seduced Adam and made him a servant, and began to possess us as his own household slaves. But the Redeemer came, and the deceiver was defeated. And what did our Redeemer do to our captor? He stretched out his snare for our price, his cross; he set there as bait his own blood. But the captor could shed this blood, he was not worthy to drink it. And by shedding the blood of one who was not his debtor, he was commanded to release the debtors; by shedding the blood of an innocent man, he was ordered to relinquish his hold on the guilty. For he shed his blood to obliterate our sins. Therefore, from what he held us, it was erased by the blood of our Redeemer. For he held us only by the chains of our sins. These were the chains of captives. He came, he bound the strong one with the chains of his passion; he entered his house, that is, into the hearts where he himself dwelt, and seized his vessels. We are the vessels. He had filled us with his bitterness. He even offered this bitterness to our Redeemer in gall. Therefore, he had filled us as his own vessels; but our Lord, seizing his vessels and making them his own, poured out the bitterness and filled them with sweetness.

Christ must be loved. From what God has done, it becomes believable what He has promised.

Let us therefore love Him, because He is sweet. Taste and see that the Lord is sweet. He is to be feared, but is to be loved even more. He is man and God: one Christ who is man and God; just as one man is soul and body; yet God and man are not two persons. In Christ, indeed, there are two substances: God and man; but one person, so that while the Trinity remains, a quaternity is not formed with the addition of man. How then can it be that God would not have mercy on us, for whom He was made man? It is a great thing that He has done: what He did is more marvelous than what He promised; and from what He did, we must believe what He promised. For what He did, we would hardly believe unless we also saw it. Where do we see it? In the people who believe, in the multitude brought to Him. Because what was promised to Abraham is fulfilled; and from what we see, we believe what we do not see. Abraham was one man, and it was said to him: In your seed all nations shall be blessed. If he looked at himself, when would he believe? He was one man, and he was already old, and he had a barren wife, and already so advanced in age that she could not conceive, even if she had not been barren. There was absolutely no reason for hope. But he looked to the Promiser, and believed what he did not see. Behold, what he believed, we see. Therefore, from what we see, we must believe what we do not see. He begot Isaac, we did not see this; and Isaac begot Jacob, and we did not see this; and Jacob begot twelve sons, and we did not see them either; and his twelve sons begot the people of Israel; we see a great people. Now I begin to speak of what we see. From the people of Israel a virgin Mary was born, and she gave birth to Christ; and behold, in Christ all nations are blessed. What is more true? What is more certain? What is more clear? Desire with me the future age, you who are gathered from the Gentiles. In this age, God fulfilled His promise concerning the seed of Abraham. How then will He not give us His eternal promises, whom He has made to be the seed of Abraham? For this the Apostle says: If you are Christ's — these are the words of the Apostle — then you are Abraham’s seed.

What Christ has accomplished is more miraculous than what he promises.

We have begun to be something great; let no one despise himself: we were nothing, but we are something. We told the Lord: Remember that we are dust; but He made man from dust, and gave life to dust, and in Christ our Lord, He has already led that very dust to the kingdoms of heaven. Because He took flesh from here, He took earth from here, and lifted the earth to heaven, who made earth and heaven. Therefore, if two new things yet not made were proposed to us, and it were asked of us: What is more marvelous, that He who is God should become man, or that He who is man should become a man of God? What is more marvelous, what is more difficult? What did Christ promise us? What we do not yet see: that is, to be His men, and to reign with Him, and not die forever. It is as if this is difficult to believe, that a man born should reach that life where he will never die. This is what we believe with a heart freed from dust, I say freed from the dust of the world, lest that very dust should close the eyes of our faith. This is what we are commanded to believe, that when we have died, even with our dead bodies we shall be in life, where we will never die. This is marvelous: but more marvelous is what Christ did. For what is more incredible, that man should live forever, or that God should die at some time? Is it more credible that men receive life from God? I think it is more incredible that God receives death from men. And this has already happened: let us believe also what is to come. If what is more incredible has happened, will He not give us what is more credible? For God is able to make angels from men, who made men from earthly and horrible seeds. What will we be? Angels. What were we? I am ashamed to recall; I am compelled to consider, and I blush to say. What were we? From what did God make men? What were we before we were anything at all? We were nothing. When we were in the wombs of our mothers, what were we? It is sufficient that you recall. Lift your minds from what you were made from, and consider what you are. You live: but plants and trees also live. You feel: animals also feel. You are humans: you have surpassed animals, you are superior to animals; because you understand how much He has bestowed upon us. You live, you feel, you understand, you are humans. But with this benefit, what could be compared? You are Christians. For if we had not received this, what good would it do us to be humans? Therefore, we are Christians, we belong to Christ. Let the world rage, it does not break us; because we belong to Christ. Let the world flatter, it does not seduce us; we belong to Christ.

Security of Christians under the patronage of Christ.

We have found a great protector, brothers. You know that people rely on their protectors. To someone threatening, a client of a greater man responds: "With the life of my lord safe, you do nothing to me." How much more strongly and surely can we say: "With our head safe, you do nothing to us?" For our protector is our head. Whoever relies on any human protector is a client of that person; we are members of our protector. May he hold us to him, and no one will tear us away from him. For whatever hardships we have suffered in this world, all that passes is nothing. Good things will come which will not pass away; we reach them through hardships. But once we have reached them, no one can tear us away from there. The gates of Jerusalem are closed, they even have bars, so that it may be said to that city: "Praise the Lord, Jerusalem; praise your God, Zion. For he has strengthened the bars of your gates, he has blessed your children within you. He has set your borders with peace." With the gates closed, bars in place, no friend leaves, no enemy enters. There we have true and certain security, if we have not abandoned the truth here.

Sermon 130

> The living bread, Christ seeks the hungry people. Our Lord Jesus Christ, who called himself the bread, seeks those who hunger. However, this bread is not hungered for except by the health of the mind, that is, the interior stomach. From this visible bread, take the likeness. For ailing men, who have contracted a distaste through illness, can praise the best bread but cannot eat it; likewise, the sickness of the inner man does not move the inner man to eat this heavenly bread, because he is oppressed by distaste, and, although he praises it, he does not delight in taking it. But the Lord himself says, as we have heard: Work for the food which does not perish, but which remains unto eternal life, distinguishing it from this visible and bodily food, of which elsewhere: Whatever enters the mouth, goes into the stomach, and is cast out into the privy- thus it perishes. Therefore, he says, work for the food which does not perish, but which remains unto eternal life. He called this food bread and showed that he himself is the bread. What does it mean to work for this food, except to eat this food? If this food is bread, moreover Christ is bread. Who of us works for Christ, who of us makes Christ, unless he does what Christ commanded? You are, says the apostle, the body of Christ and members. Let us work for Christ, that is, let us work for this food. The work of God, to believe in Christ.

Those who asked and listened well, heard us and asked us. What should we do, they ask, to perform the work of God? And in that wondrous and great brevity, He said: This is the work of God, that you believe in Him whom He has sent. This is short: if you weigh it, it is great. It is quickly said, but not easily done. Someone from the great multitude surrounding me says, "Which of us has not believed in Christ?" If therefore we have all believed in Christ, we no longer find what to be admonished. Why? Because this is the work of God. Do you seek to do anything other than the work of God and expect the reward of God? Why then do you trouble yourself, why do you busy yourself over the great pages of Scripture and labor by running through them seeking to find out how you should do the work of God? Behold, you have it, from your Lord speaking to you, truth and brevity: do not stretch yourself out, do not sweat, do not labor, do not be agitated. This is the work of God, He says, that you believe in Him whom He has sent. Where then is that which James admonishes saying: Do you believe that there is one God? You do well. Even the demons believe and tremble. Do not think, he said, that you are doing something great by believing that there is one God: Even the demons believe and tremble. But perhaps the demons do not have faith in the Son of God? Why then do they say to Him: We know who you are? Are they perhaps lying? Do they say what they do not know? Behold, in another place, more plainly: They say, You are the holy one of God, also You are the Son of God. When Peter said this, he heard from the Lord: Blessed are you, Simon Bar-Jonah, for flesh and blood has not revealed this to you, but My Father who is in heaven. And I say to you, Simon Bar-Jonah, that you are Peter, and on this rock I will build My Church. Why all this? Because he said: You are the Christ, the Son of the living God. The demons also said this, to whom it was said: Be silent. Who easily discerns these matters, why the same voice is not praised, except because the heart is different? Understand therefore, beloved, that we admonish, what you read and say daily. The demons also believed that Christ is and believe that He is the Son of God. They believed Christ, but did not believe in Christ. Now, all the intent of our discourse depends, as much as possible, if we are able with the Lord's help, to explain what it is to believe in Christ.

Let us believe in him who justifies the ungodly. For this is the work of God, that you believe in him whom he has sent. He did not say "believe him" or "believe that he", but believe in him. We have heard the words of the prophets: we believe them, but we do not believe in them. We have heard the preaching apostles: we believe their preaching, but we do not believe in them. We do not believe in Paul, but we believe Paul. For he repels certain people wanting to place their hope in him and believe in him as if to say, "Paul was crucified for you, or were you baptized in his name?" Finally, not only the apostles and holy teachers, but even we ourselves, who are not to be compared to their least footsteps, daily say: "Believe me," but never dare to say: "Believe in me." "Believe me": who does not say this? "Believe in me": who says this or who is not insane that says it? In whom, then, is one to believe? About whom did Paul himself say: "To the one who believes in him who justifies the ungodly, his faith is counted as righteousness." Therefore, it is not Paul who justifies the ungodly, for you would believe in him, and your faith would be credited as righteousness; for, indeed, you would believe in him who justifies the ungodly. For, when you do not believe in him - for Paul does not justify the ungodly, nor Elijah, nor anyone angel, but the just of the just, the holy of the holy, of whom it is said: "That he might be just and the justifier of the one who has faith." It can be said about you that you are just, but never is it heard that you are also justifying. What does it mean to justify, if not to make just? Just as vivifying makes alive, just as saving makes safe, so too does justifying make just. Who makes just? He who came just without sin. Who makes just? He who was not made just here, but came just. Behold in whom we should believe, so that we may do the work of God, because this very thing is the work of God, to believe in him who justifies the ungodly.

Let us be inflamed with love for the reward promised to us.

It is enough for me, someone says; I have believed in Christ: why do you admonish me further? This is the work of God: let Him who promised a reward require nothing else from me. For He who promises a reward commands me what to do and promises what I shall receive. Therefore, He sets the limit of work when I am inflamed by the love of reward. He says to me: "Do you wish to live forever?" because of him who asked: What shall I do to have eternal life? "Do you wish to live forever? Do this, and you will live." When I ask: What shall I do? He responds very briefly: "This is the work of God, that you believe in Him whom He has sent." Why then did He say to the rich man: If you want to enter life, keep the commandments, and when he said: "Which commandments?" the precepts of the law were enumerated: You shall not commit adultery, you shall not kill, you shall not steal, you shall not bear false witness, honor your father and mother, and love your neighbor as yourself? Could He not also respond to him in that very brief summary, answering, What shall I do to have eternal life? "Believe in Me"? For this is the work of God, which nothing else can surpass. This is the work of God—what more do you seek?—that you believe in Him whom He

He sent him. He is given instructions and many things, but it is said to us: This is the work of God, that you believe in him whom he has sent. Has the Lord perhaps dealt graciously with us; did he want to burden him, not relieve him? God forbid! Let us understand, therefore, if we can—as we have promised to explain as much as we can—what it means to believe in Christ, and let us do this, let us work at this, let us advance daily in this, let us approach this day by day, until by approaching we arrive. For this is also what we promised at the beginning of our faith, that we began in some part, and when we have perfected it, nothing more will be demanded from us. For this is the work of God, nor is there anything else that is the work of God, except that we believe in him whom he has sent. To believe in Christ is to love Christ. And because some time ago we distinguished that it is one thing to believe him, to believe him and to believe in him - to believe him is to believe that what he speaks is true, to believe him is to believe that he himself is Christ, to believe in him is to love him - now consider your own: to believe that what he speaks is true, to believe that he himself is Christ, to love Christ. To believe that what he speaks is true, many wicked people can do. For they believe these things to be true and do not want to do them: they are lazy in performing. However, to believe that he himself is Christ, this even demons could do. Therefore Peter said: You are the Christ, the Son of the Living God, with love; the demons said this with fear. But not everyone who fears loves, everyone who loves fears. But perhaps - rather not perhaps, but certainly -, everyone who loves fears, but with chaste fear - for the fear of the Lord is chaste, enduring forever -, not with servile fear. For perfect love casts out fear. It is one thing to fear that he may come, another thing to fear that he may depart. For to fear that he may come was in those who said: We know who you are. Have you come to destroy us before the time? However, the fear that he may depart was in him who said: I will be with you until death. When therefore you hear: "Believe in Christ", it is little for you to believe Christ, that is, to believe that what Christ speaks is true, it is little for you to believe Christ, that is, that he himself is the one whom God proclaimed through the prophets, but believe in Christ, that is, love Christ. When you have filled this, nothing more will be required of you, since the fullness of the law is love. When you believe in Christ in such a way that you love Christ with that ardor, see if these words will not be yours: Who shall separate us from the love of God? Therefore, do not long seek to do what Christ commands: you cannot fail to do it, if you love Christ. Love, and you accomplish. To the extent that you love, to that extent you accomplish; to the extent that you accomplish less, you love less. Fulfill love, and you perfect action. See how true is the saying: This is the work of God, that you believe in him whom he sent, that is, that by loving you go to him, that is, you become incorporated to him.

Let us love Christ, God made man for us. For someone might respond to me and advise me to speak more cautiously: "You said that to believe in Christ is to love Christ, and you said we ought to believe in Christ, but not to believe in Paul; are we therefore not supposed to love Paul?" Thus, just as we distinguished between believing and believing, so must we distinguish the very act of loving. I love Paul, and I do not believe in Paul. I do not love Christ unless I believe in Christ. For I love Paul, but not by loving Paul do I go into Paul: I will be with Paul, I will not be in Paul. For what is Apollo, what is Paul? Servants through whom you believed, not in whom you believed. Therefore, brothers, to believe in God is necessary, by believing and loving to go into Christ. "Believe in God," says Christ himself, "and believe in me." Which prophet dared to say this, which patriarch, which apostle, which martyr, which angel? Therefore let us believe in him, let us love him, but by loving be incorporated into him. Let us understand our God and the man made for us, and from that because God became man to justify us. For if he were only a man, he would need to be justified with us, he would not be the justifier. But now, because he is our God and became a man because of nature that he was not, he remained what he was by possession, so that in him we might at the same time have the way to go and the destination. Let us believe in him, that is, let us love him as God, so that by loving we may go into him, from whom by neglecting we had departed.

"As much as illnesses are healed, so much does the heavenly food delight." But if it is present in us, the bread delights us: there is no longer disgust; we do not praise it and abhor it, but eat it silently, praised, because we love it, contrary to disgust, because the illness has been healed. For what will our soul give back to Him who says: What shall I render to the Lord?, who says: Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all His benefits, who forgives all your iniquities? This was done when we were washed. But what follows is: Who heals all your diseases. As much as the diseases heal, so much the heavenly food delights; so much the bread of life that came down from heaven delights, as much as our diseases heal. But by whom are they healed, except by Him to whom we have said: Turn us, O God of our salvation? Turn us: You turn us, because before You heal us, we resist and do not want to touch the praised bread with disgust. We resist while sick, we are turned when healed. Therefore, turn us, O God of our salvation, and turn away your wrath from us. For sickness itself is the wrath of God. Whoever believes in the Son has eternal life. Why? Because he has accomplished the work of God. This is indeed the work of God, that you believe in Him whom He has sent. But whoever does not believe in the Son will not have life, but the wrath of God remains on him. It does not come upon him, but remains on him. He is abandoned, not healed. Therefore, mindful is he who said: Turn us, O God, because we cannot be turned except as much as we are healed, added: our salvations. For this bread does not delight the unhealthy. Thus, he almost introduced a reason why we should be turned. What does it mean: Turn us? Heal us. Indeed, because we are not healthy, we turn less to the bread of salvation. We praise it, but do not delight in it. Who does not approve, who does not say: "It is true," when I say: What you do not want to be done to you, do not do to another? "It is true": you cry out, and nothing more true do you cry out. Eat what you praise. You want to deceive a man, yet you do not want to be deceived by anyone. You want to gain from another's misfortune, yet you do not want anyone to gain from yours. Do you not set a law against yourself, and is your heart not prescribed by which you are punished? Why do you not want it to be done to you, if it is good? Why do you do it, if it is bad? What will you answer, what will you say? "It delights me to do it and it delights me to do it," "this delights and that delights": these are the words of the sick. Cry out: Turn us, O God of our salvations, and turn away your wrath from us.

God crowns us with the shield of His good will. For it is also said in the same psalm: "The Lord will give sweetness, and our land will yield its fruit." But the fruit of the Spirit is charity. Whence comes this fruit unless the Lord gives the sweetness by which the love of God is poured into our hearts? Not from ourselves, but through the Holy Spirit who has been given to us. You see that the Lord will give sweetness, so that our land may yield its fruit. You see that our land, that is, our heart, our soul, our land does not yield its fruit unless God rains. The earth was moved. It was moved to give birth and to bear. But why was it moved? For the heavens dripped, not from themselves, but from the face of God. For what is Apollo, what is Paul? Ministers of God through whom you believed. They are clouds of God: unless they are filled, they do not pour out. Therefore the earth was moved—God converting our sicknesses—the earth was moved, for the heavens dripped from the face of God. It was moved by God, for it would not have been moved, unless by the voluntary rain that follows. After it is said: "The earth was moved, for the heavens dripped from the face of God," lest you think that the rain of the heavens is not from God, it says, "voluntary rain," not owed—for what did He owe us, if not punishment? Therefore, voluntary rain—because, he says, with the shield of Your goodwill, You crowned us—not with the brightness of our merits, but with the shield of Your goodwill—therefore, God appointing voluntary rain to His inheritance, and it was weakened. Even that which gives birth is weakened. For the earth was moved to give birth, and it would not have given birth unless preceded by weakness. But You have perfected it.

All good things are to be hoped for from God.

What does it mean to be weakened? It did not presume upon itself. What does it mean to be weakened? It hoped entirely on you. What does it mean to be weakened? When I am weak, then I am strong. Therefore it was weakened because it understood that it was by the grace of God, not by its own merits, not by its own strength; it understood, it was weakened, and it lost presumption in order to receive a blessing. It was weakened. Therefore, let it not presume upon itself, let it cry to the Lord in its weakness: "Turn us back, O God of our salvation." Therefore it follows: "And it was weakened, but you have perfected it." Why have you perfected it? Because it was weakened, because it understood that it could not perfect itself by itself. Therefore, because it was weakened, you have perfected it. The very earth cries out in Paul: "On this account, I asked the Lord that he might remove from me the sting, namely the corrective prick of my flesh." For why did he say it was added to him except to curb his own presumption and strength? Because, he says, "By reason of the vastness of the revelations, lest I be exalted, a messenger of Satan was given to me to buffet me." Therefore to be weakened. The voluntary rain is reserved for you, not owed. Cry out from weakness, because I am not worthy to be called an apostle. Therefore to be weakened to make you perfect. For he said to you in prayer: "My grace is sufficient for you; power is made perfect in weakness."

We do not have righteousness from ourselves.

Thus the same apostle, in the reading we have heard, concluded in this way: So that I may be found in Him. How in Him? Not having my own righteousness. For if it is yours, not in Him. What is not having my own? As if acquired from myself, because fulfilled by my own powers. Not having my righteousness is from the law, but that which is through faith. How is it mine if it is from the law? A troubling question, but we are already fatigued. Hence, if I say something incomplete, let him to whom we belong complete it. And be found in Him not having my own righteousness. If he did not add: which is from the law, who would not think he was saying this: Not having my righteousness, as if it comes from human teaching? Hence the Lord Christ said in another place: My doctrine is not mine, that is, not human, not of this visible substance which you see. For how is it not His, when the doctrine of the Father is His Word? And who, except Christ, is His Word? Therefore, would people think that the apostle said this, when he said: I may be found in Him not having my own righteousness, unless he added: which is from the law, but the righteousness which is from the faith of Jesus Christ? Why? And did not Christ give the law? If you had the righteousness which is from the law, how would you have it as yours, when you did not give yourself the law, but received it from Christ, from the Son of God? For Christ did not begin to exist from the virgin, but from the Father before He created the mother from whom He would be made, as He made that from which He would be made. For the man said with reference to Zion, Mother, and a man is made in her. And—who was made a man in her—He founded her, the Most High Himself. Hence, He made that in which He would be made. Therefore, He existed in the time of Moses, who gave the law, because Moses, through many interposed generations, was from Abraham; but Christ said: Before Abraham, I am. Less even is it that He was before Abraham, before all the angels, before heaven and earth, before the entire creation: For all things were made through Him. The fear of damnation, the love of justice.

What is it then so that I am found in him not having my own righteousness, and he added: which is from the law? I will say, if I can briefly; the giver of grace will perfect it in your hearts. What is it, unless because the Jews have even the law itself in such a way that they perform the works of the law out of fear of condemnation, not out of the fire of love? Therefore, what they did out of servile fear, they were slaves. But if you begin to do out of love what is written in the law: You shall not covet, where does this come from for you, unless the love of God is poured out in your heart, not from yourself, but through the Holy Spirit who has been given to you? Since God, separating a voluntary rain for his inheritance, and it was weakened, would hope for nothing from itself. For it was said to it: "Do," and it did; "Do not kill," and it did not kill; "Do not commit adultery with another's wife," and it did not commit adultery. It was said: "Do," and it did. It was said: "Love what you do," and it was weakened. You do not kill your enemy out of fear: if impunity were given, would you spare? Would you do what David did, to whom the Lord gave his enemy into his hands in such a way that he could do what he wanted with him? He chose to spare, he chose to spare, to whom it was allowed to kill with impunity. Therefore if impunity were granted to you for killing your enemy, would you spare? How would you spare him from dying, about whom you say: "Oh, if he would die"? Therefore the law imposed upon the servant fearing forbade the evil act, but did not eradicate the evil desire. You restrain yourself from the deed, but you have the desire to do it. Why do you have the desire to do it? Because you do not have the love of righteousness. Therefore what more is prohibited to you, is not. Love. What do I do, to love? Therefore out of love, because if you act out of fear, you do not love. Your righteousness will be your own, even if from the law, because you do not do what the law prohibits, yet it is your own: for you do it out of fear, not out of love. When will your righteousness not be your own? If it is from faith in Christ. For by believing in him you have obtained what he commands.

Faith asks that what is commanded be done.

Scripture of the present psalm attends to this. Does not God say: Turn to me? The Scriptures are full. Turn to me, turn to me. For the languor has begun to move. For what is meant by: Turn to me? It is not, - what is done easily -, that you were facing the west, now face the east. If only you do this inwardly, because this is not easy! You turn your body from one pivot to another, turn your heart from love to love. Turn to me: God shouts. The earth feared, lest it be condemned for not turning; it moved, so that it might be converted: languor did not follow, bread did not please the sick. Turn to me. The languor saw that it could not do what was ordered, and cried out through the prophet: Turn us, O God; faith entered the heart; it asked that what was commanded be done, it said: Turn us, O God. Because it was weakened, truly you perfected it, that I might be found in Him not having my own righteousness which is from the law, but the righteousness of Christ which is from faith. What is from faith? That which is obtained by asking, so much as could not be under the one commanding. For everyone who calls on the name of the Lord will be saved. This is the righteousness of faith which we preach; this is the living bread that came down from heaven, healing so that it may be eaten, strengthening because it is eaten, nourishing because it is desired, since it is said of Him to our soul, because He satisfies your desire with good things. Etc.

Sermons - Sermon 131

SERMO 131 On the Words of the Gospel of John (6:54-66):

"Unless you eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, you have no life in you. Whoever feeds on my flesh and drinks my blood has eternal life, and I will raise him up on the last day. For my flesh is true food, and my blood is true drink. Whoever feeds on my flesh and drinks my blood abides in me, and I in him. As the living Father sent me, and I live because of the Father, so whoever feeds on me, he also will live because of me. This is the bread that came down from heaven, not like the bread the fathers ate and died. Whoever feeds on this bread will live forever."

Jesus said these things in the synagogue, as he taught at Capernaum. When many of his disciples heard it, they said, "This is a hard saying; who can listen to it?" But Jesus, knowing in himself that his disciples were grumbling about this, said to them, "Do you take offense at this? Then what if you were to see the Son of Man ascending to where he was before? It is the Spirit who gives life; the flesh is of no avail. The words that I have spoken to you are spirit and life. But there are some of you who do not believe." For Jesus knew from the beginning who those were who did not believe, and who it was who would betray him. And he said, "This is why I told you that no one can come to me unless it is granted him by the Father."

After this many of his disciples turned back and no longer walked with him.

"Unless you eat the flesh," etc.

CONCERNING THE WORDS OF THE APOSTLE AND THE PSALMS, AGAINST THE PELAGIANS Attitude at the Table of Saint Martyr Cyprian on the ninth Kalends of October on the Lord's Day. The sacrament of the body and blood of Christ.

We have heard the truthful Teacher, the divine Redeemer, the human Savior, recommending to us our price, His own blood. For He spoke to us about His body and blood; He called His body food, and His blood drink. Believers recognize the sacrament of the faithful. But what else do those who listen hear? Therefore, when He was recommending such food and such drink, He said: Unless you eat my flesh and drink my blood, you will not have life in you (and He said this about life—who else but life itself would say this? But it will be death, not life, for that man who considers life a liar); His disciples were scandalized, not indeed all, but many, saying among themselves: This is a hard saying, who can listen to it? But when the Lord had perceived this within Himself, and had heard the murmuring of their thoughts, He responded to those thinking, without them speaking aloud, so they might recognize that they had been heard, and cease to think such things. What then did He respond? Does this offend you? What then if you see the Son of Man ascending where He was before? What does He mean by: Does this offend you? Do you think that I will divide parts of this body of mine which you see, and cut my members to pieces, and give them to you? What: what then if you see the Son of Man ascending where He was before? Surely He who could ascend whole, could not be consumed. Therefore, He also gave us healthy refreshment from His body and blood, and solved such a great question of His integrity briefly. Let those who eat, eat, and those who drink, drink; let them hunger and thirst: let them eat life, let them drink life. Eating that is to be refreshed; but you are refreshed in such a way that the source of your refreshment never diminishes. What is drinking that, if not living? Eat life, drink life: you will have life, and life is whole. But then this will be—that is, life will be for each person the body and blood of Christ; if what is taken visibly in the Sacrament is consumed in very truth spiritually, it is consumed spiritually. For we have heard the Lord Himself saying: It is the spirit that gives life, the flesh counts for nothing. The words that I have spoken to you, they are spirit and they are life. But, He says, there are some who do not believe. They themselves were saying: This is a hard saying, who can listen to it? It is hard, but for the hard; that is, unbelievable, but for the unbelieving.

Faith is a gift of God. The force of grace is gentle. But in order to teach us that even believing itself is a gift, not a merit: "As I said to you, no one comes to me unless it has been given to him by my Father." But where the Lord said this, if we recall the earlier words of the Gospel, we find him saying: "No one comes to me unless the Father who sent me draws him." He did not say "leads," but "draws." This drawing is a force exerted on the heart, not on the flesh. Why then do you marvel? Believe, and you come; love, and you are drawn. Do not think of this as a harsh and troublesome force: it is sweet, it is gentle; it is sweetness itself that draws you. Is not the sheep drawn when the hungry one [sheep] is shown the grass? And I believe it is not pushed bodily but bound by desire. Thus also come to Christ: do not contemplate long journeys; where you believe, there you come. For to him who is everywhere, one comes by loving, not by sailing. But since even on such a journey the waves and storms of various temptations abound; believe in the crucified, so that your faith may climb the wood [the cross]. You will not sink, but you will be carried by the wood. Thus, thus in the waves of this world did he navigate who said: "But far be it from me to glory except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ."

Neither faith nor a good life should be claimed by one's own strength.

It is remarkable that upon the preaching of Christ crucified, two hear, one despises, the other ascends. Let the one who despises, blame himself; the one who ascends, let him not ascribe it to himself. For he has heard from the truthful Teacher: No one comes to me unless it has been granted to him by my Father. Let him rejoice because it has been granted; let him give thanks to the one who gives with a humble heart, not with an arrogant one; lest what the humble has deserved, the proud may lose. For even those who already walk in the righteous path, if they attribute it to themselves and their strengths, they perish from it. Therefore, the holy Scripture teaching us humility through the Apostle says: Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling. And lest they ascribe anything of it to themselves, because he said: work out, he immediately added: For it is God who works in you both to will and to act according to his good purpose. It is God who works in you; therefore: with fear and trembling, make a valley, receive the rain. The low places are filled, the high places are dried up. Grace is rain. Why then do you wonder if God resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble? Therefore: with fear and trembling; that is: "with humility". Do not be wise in your own conceits, but fear. Fear, that you may be filled; do not be wise in your own conceits, lest you dry up.

Grace is necessary for the justified person to walk in the right path. But now, you say, I walk this way; it was necessary to learn, it was necessary to know through the teaching of the Law what I should do: I have free will; who will separate me from this path? If you read diligently, you will find someone who, from a certain abundance he had received, began to exalt himself; but the merciful Lord, to teach humility, took away what He had given; and he suddenly remained in need and confessed with the memory of God's mercy, saying: I said in my abundance, I shall never be moved. I said in my abundance. But I said; a man said: Every man is a liar. I said. Thus: I said in my abundance; such was the abundance that I dared to say this: I shall never be moved. What then? O Lord, by Your will, You granted strength to my beauty. But when You hid Your face, I was troubled. He showed me, he said, that what I abounded in was from You. You showed me where to seek, to whom to attribute what I had received, to whom I should give thanks, to whom I should run when thirsty, where I could be filled, and once filled, by whom to be kept. For I will keep my strength for You, so that, being filled by You as the giver, I may not lose it by You the keeper. I will keep my strength for You. This to show me: You hid Your face from me, and I was troubled. Troubled, because dried up; dried up, because exalted. Therefore say, dried and withered, so that you may be filled again: My soul is like a land without water unto You. Say: My soul is like a land without water unto You. For you said, not the Lord: I shall never be moved. You said this presuming upon yourself; but not of your own, and as if thinking it was of your own.

Walking in the just way, if he ascribes this to himself, he perishes from the just way.

What then does the Lord say? Serve the Lord with fear and rejoice with trembling. Thus also the Apostle: Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God who works in you. Therefore: Rejoice with trembling. Lest the Lord be angry at any time. I see that you anticipate by shouting. For you know what I am about to say, you anticipate by shouting. And where do you get this from, except that he taught you in whom you have believed? Therefore, he says this: Hear what you know; I do not teach, but remind by preaching: indeed, I do not teach, because you know; nor do I remind, because you remember; but let us say together what you hold with us. The Lord says this: Seize discipline, and rejoice, but with trembling, so that you may always humbly hold what you have received. Lest the Lord be angry at any time, surely with the proud, attributing to themselves what they have, not giving thanks to him from whom they have it. Lest the Lord be angry at any time, and you perish from the just way. Did he say: Lest the Lord be angry at any time, and you do not come to the just way? Did he say: Lest the Lord be angry at any time, and he does not lead you to the just way, or does not admit you to the just way? Now that you walk in it, do not be proud, lest you also perish from it. And he says, perish from the just way. When his wrath is kindled in a short time over you. Not for long. Where you are proud, there you lose what you had received. Frightened by these things, a man would almost say: What then shall I do? It follows: Blessed are all who trust in him; not in themselves, but in him. By grace we are saved, not of ourselves, it is the gift of God.

Against the Pelagians. Forgiveness of sins in baptism. Weakness after baptism.

Perhaps you may say: What does it mean that he often says this? Again this, and a third time this: and he almost never speaks, unless when he says this. I hope I am not speaking in vain. For there are men ungrateful for grace, attributing much to impoverished and wounded nature. Truly, man received great powers of free will when he was created; but he lost them by sinning. He fell into death, became weak, was left half-dead by robbers on the way; the passing Samaritan, which means "Guardian," lifted him onto his own animal and brought him to an inn. Why is he exalted? He is still being treated. But it suffices for me, he says, that I received the remission of all sins in Baptism. Just because iniquity was erased, does it mean that weakness is ended? I received, he says, the remission of all sins. Indeed, it is true. All sins were erased in the sacrament of Baptism, all indeed, words, deeds, thoughts, all were erased. But this is what was poured on the way, oil and wine. You remember, dearest ones, how the half-dead man on the way, wounded by robbers, was comforted by receiving oil and wine for his wounds. Certainly, his error was forgiven, and yet his ailment is treated in the inn. If you recognize the inn, it is the Church. It is an inn now, because we pass through it by living: it will be a home from which we will never depart, when we have reached the kingdom of heaven healed. Meanwhile, let us willingly be treated in the inn, not still ailing in health boasting; lest, boasting, we do nothing else but fail to ever be healed by not being treated. The gifts of grace are four: the remission of sins, the healing of infirmity, the redemption from all corruption and desire.

Bless the Lord, O my soul. Say to your soul, say: You are still in this life, you still bear the fragile flesh, the body that corrupts still burdens the soul; you have received the remedy of prayer after the fullness of remission; you still indeed say, until your weaknesses are healed: Forgive us our debts. Therefore, say to your soul, humble valley, not lofty hill; say to your soul: Bless the Lord, O my soul, and do not forget all His benefits. What benefits? Say, enumerate, give thanks. What benefits? Who forgives all your iniquities. This was done in Baptism. What is happening now? Who heals all your diseases. This is happening now: I acknowledge. But as long as I am here, the body that corrupts burdens the soul. Therefore, also say what follows: Who redeems your life from corruption. What remains after redemption from corruption? When this corruptible has put on incorruption, and this mortal has put on immortality, then the saying that is written will come to pass: Death is swallowed up in victory. Where, O death, is your contention? There truly: Where, O death, is your sting? You seek its place, and do not find it. What is the sting of death? What is: Where, O death, is your sting? Where is sin? You seek, and it is nowhere. For the sting of death is sin. The words are those of the Apostle, not mine. Then it will be said: Where, O death, is your sting? Sin will be nowhere, neither to capture you, nor to assail you, nor to tickle your conscience. Then it will not be said: Forgive us our debts. But what will be said? Lord our God, give us peace: for you have repaid all to us. The final benefit of grace, the crown of righteousness.

Finally, after redemption from all corruption, what remains except the crown of righteousness? Certainly, it remains, but even in it or under it, let there not be a swollen head, so that it may receive the crown. Listen, attend to the Psalm, how that crown does not want a swollen head. When it said: Who redeems your life from corruption; who crowns you, it says. And here you would have said: It crowns you, my merits confess, my virtue has done this: it is rendered as due, not given as a gift. Rather, listen to the Psalm. For you also say this: Every man is a liar. Listen to what God says: Who crowns you with compassion and mercy. He crowns you from His mercy, He crowns you from His compassion. For you were not worthy to be called, and when called to be justified, and when justified to be glorified. The remnants have been saved by the election of grace. But if by grace, it is no longer out of works: otherwise grace is no longer grace. For to him who works, the reward is not reckoned according to grace, but according to debt. The Apostle speaks: Not according to grace, but according to debt. However, He crowns you in compassion and mercy: and if your merits have preceded, God says to you: Examine your merits well, and you will see that they are my gifts. The justice of God, which is unknown to Jews and Pelagians. Grace hidden in the Old Testament, revealed in the New Testament. This is the righteousness of God. As it is said: The salvation of the Lord, not by which the Lord is saved, but which He gives to those whom He saves: so also the grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord is called the righteousness of God, not by which the Lord is righteous, but by which He justifies those whom He makes righteous out of the ungodly. But certain people, like the Jews at times, wanting to be called Christians, still ignoring God's righteousness, want to establish their own, even in our times, the times of revealed grace, the times now evident, grace once hidden, now evident in the area, which once lay hidden in the fleece. I see few have understood this, many have not understood, whom I will not defraud by remaining silent. One of the ancient righteous, Gideon, asked for a sign from the Lord, and said: I ask, Lord, that this fleece which I place in the area be wet, and the area be dry. It happened: the fleece was wet, the entire area was dry. He squeezed the fleece in the morning into a bowl; for grace is given to the humble: and you know what the Lord did with the bowl for His disciples. He again asked for another sign: I wish, he said, Lord, that the fleece be dry and the area be wet. And this also happened. Recall the time of the Old Testament, grace was hidden in the cloud, like rain in the fleece. Now attend to the time of the New Testament, examine the Jewish nation, you will find it as dry fleece: but the whole world is like that area full of grace, not hidden, but evident. Hence we are compelled to mourn greatly for our brothers, who contend not against hidden grace but against revealed and manifest grace. It is excused for the Jews. But Christians? Why are you enemies of the grace of Christ? Why are you presumptuous? Why are you ungrateful? For why did Christ come? Was nature not here? Was the law not here? But the Apostle says: If righteousness is through the Law, then Christ died in vain. What the Apostle says about the law, we say to these people about nature: If righteousness is through nature, then Christ died in vain.

Councils against the Pelagians.

What therefore was said about the Jews, we absolutely see in these. They have a zeal for God. I bear witness to them, for they have a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge. What does it mean: Not according to knowledge? For being ignorant of the righteousness of God, and seeking to establish their own, they did not submit to the righteousness of God. My brothers, sympathize with me. Where you find such people, do not hide it, do not let there be a perverse mercy in you: absolutely where you find such people, do not hide it. Rebuke those who contradict, and lead those who resist to us. For already on this cause two councils have been sent to the Apostolic See: thence also responses have come. The case is closed: would that the error may sometime end! Therefore, we advise that they pay attention, we teach that they be instructed, we pray that they be changed. Turned to the Lord...

Sermons - Sermon 132

SERMO 132 ON THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL OF JOHN (6:56-57):

"My flesh is true food, and my blood is true drink."

"He who eats my flesh," etc.

Catechumens are invited to the grace of regeneration. As we have heard, when the holy Gospel was read, the Lord Jesus Christ exhorted with the promise of eternal life to eat his flesh and drink his blood. Those of you who heard this have not all understood it yet. For those of you who have been baptized and are faithful, you know what he said. But those of you who are still called Catechumens, or Hearers, could have been listeners when it was read, but did you understand? Therefore, our speech is directed to both groups. Those who already eat the flesh of the Lord and drink his blood, consider what you are eating and drinking: lest, as the Apostle says, you eat and drink judgment upon yourselves. But those who do not yet eat and do not yet drink, hurry to these feasts to which you have been invited. During these days, the masters feed, Christ feeds daily, that table of his is set in the midst. What is the cause, O Hearers, that you see the table and do not approach the feasts? And perhaps now, when the Gospel was read, you said in your hearts: We wonder what he means when he says: My flesh is true food, and my blood is true drink? How is the flesh of the Lord eaten and the blood of the Lord drunk? We wonder what he means? Who has closed against you that you should not know this? It is veiled: but if you wish, it will be revealed. Come to the profession, and you have solved the question. For what the Lord Jesus said, the faithful already know. But you are called "Catechumen," you are called "Hearer," and you are deaf. For you have open ears of the body, because you hear the words that are spoken: but you have as yet closed ears of the heart, because you do not understand what is said. I speak, I do not analyze. Behold, it is Easter, give your name for Baptism. If the feast does not arouse you, curiosity itself should lead you: that you may know what it is that was said: He who eats my flesh and drinks my blood abides in me, and I in him. That you may know with me what was said, knock, and it will be opened to you. And as I say to you: Knock, and it will be opened to you; so also I knock, open to me. Sounding with my ears, I knock at your chest.

Married faithful, now eating the body of Christ, are admonished to keep chastity. But if catechumens are to be encouraged, my brothers, so that they do not delay to approach the great grace of regeneration; how much care should we have in building up the faithful, so that it benefits them to approach; that they do not eat and drink such feasts to their own judgment? And so, to not eat and drink to judgment, let them live well. Be encouragers not by words, but by your conduct: so that those who are not baptized may hasten to follow you, to not perish by imitating you. You who are married, keep the faith of the marriage bed with your wives. Return what you demand. Husband, you demand chastity from your wife, give her the example, not just the word. You are the head, where are you looking. Indeed you should go where it is not dangerous for her to follow: rather, you yourself should walk where you want her to follow. You demand strength from the weaker sex: both have the desire of the flesh; he who is stronger should conquer first. And yet what is regrettable, many men are conquered by women. Women keep chastity, which men do not wish to keep: and in what they do not keep, they wish to appear as men; as if the reason for the stronger sex is that the enemy may subdue him more easily. It is a struggle, a battle, a fight. Man is stronger than woman, man is the head of woman. Woman fights and conquers: do you yield to the enemy? The body stands, and the head lies low? But those who do not yet have wives, and yet already approach the Lord's table, and eat the flesh of Christ, and drink His blood, if you are going to marry, keep yourselves for your wives. How you want them to come to you, you should let them find you the same. Which young man is there, who does not wish to marry a chaste wife? And if he will take a virgin, who does not desire her to be untouched? Seek one untouched, be untouched yourself. Seek one pure, do not be impure. For she can, and you cannot? If it were not possible, neither she would be able. Because she can, let her teach you that it is possible. And that she may be able, God directs her. But you will be more glorious if you do so. Why more glorious? She is restrained by the guardianship of her parents, restrained by the same modesty of the weaker sex: finally she fears laws, which you do not. Therefore you will be more glorious if you do so; because if you do so, you fear God. She has many things to fear besides God: you only fear God. But He whom you fear, is greater than all. He is to be feared in public, He is in secret. You go out, you are seen; you enter, you are seen; a lamp is burning, it sees you; the lamp is out, it sees you; you enter a room, it sees you; you dwell in your heart, it sees you. Fear Him, to whom it is a care to see you; and be chaste at least from fear. Or if you want to sin, seek where He does not see you, and do what you want.

Bound by a vow of continence. But as for you who have already vowed, chastise the body more strictly, and do not allow the reins of desire to be loosened even for what is permitted; so that you not only turn away from illicit intercourse but even disdain the sight of the licit. Remember, in whatever sex you are, whether male or female, you lead the life of Angels on earth. For Angels neither marry nor are given in marriage. This is what we shall be when we have risen again. How much better are you, who begin to be what men will be after the resurrection before death? Keep your ranks; for God preserves your honors. The resurrection of the dead has been compared to the stars established in the sky. For one star differs from another in glory, as the Apostle says: So also is the resurrection of the dead. For virginity will shine differently there, conjugal chastity differently there, holy widowhood differently there. They will shine differently, but all will be there. Unequal splendor, a common heaven.

Each person must keep their rank.

Thinking therefore about your steps, keeping and your professions, approach the flesh of the Lord, approach the blood of the Lord. Whoever knows himself to be otherwise, let him not approach. Be pricked more by my word. For those who know how to keep themselves for their spouses, just as they demand it from their spouses, who know how to keep continence in every way, if they have vowed it to God; but those who hear me saying: "Whoever of you does not keep chastity, do not approach that bread," are saddened. And I would not wish to say this: but what do I do? Shall I fear man, that I might be silent about the truth? Therefore if those servants do not fear the Lord, should I also not fear? As if I did not know it was said: "You wicked and slothful servant, you should have given, and I would demand." Behold, I have given, Lord my God; behold, before you and your angels and before your very people, I have distributed your money: for I fear your judgment. I have given, you demand. Even if I do not say it, you will do it. Therefore I rather say this: I have given, you convert, you spare. Make chaste those who were unchaste, so that together in your sight, when the judgment comes, we may rejoice, both the one who distributed and he to whom it was distributed. Does this please? Let it please. Whoever of you are unchaste, correct yourselves while you live. For I can speak the word of God, but I cannot free unchaste people persisting in wickedness from the judgment and damnation of God.

Sermons - Sermon 132A

SERMON 132 FROM THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO JOHN. ABOUT THE EUCHARIST To eat Christ, what it is.

What kind of voice of the Lord did you hear inviting us? Who invited, whom did he invite, and what did he prepare? The Lord invited the servants and prepared food for them, himself. Who would dare to eat his Lord? And yet he says: "Whoever eats me will live because of me." When Christ is eaten, life is eaten. He is not killed to be eaten, but he gives life to the dead. When he is eaten, he refreshes, but he does not diminish. Therefore, brothers, let us not fear to eat this bread, lest we finish it, and afterwards we do not find what to eat. Let Christ be eaten: he lives being eaten because he has resurrected after being killed. Nor when we eat, do we make parts of him. And indeed in the sacrament it is so, and the faithful know how they eat the flesh of Christ; each one receives his part, whence even the grace itself is called parts. He is eaten in parts, and he remains whole; he is eaten in parts in the sacrament, and he remains whole in heaven, he remains whole in your heart. For he was entirely with the Father when he came into the virgin; he filled her, and did not depart from him. He was coming into flesh so that men might eat him; and he remained whole with the Father, to feed the angels. Because, brothers, you should know (and those who know, and those who do not know, ought to know), when Christ became man, man ate the bread of angels. How, from where, by what way, by what merits, with what dignity would man eat the bread of angels, unless the creator of angels became man? Therefore let us eat confidently: what we eat is not finished; and let us eat, lest we be finished. What does it mean to eat Christ? It is not only this, to receive his body in the sacrament; for many receive unworthily, of whom the Apostle says: "Whoever eats the bread or drinks the cup of the Lord in an unworthy manner will be guilty of sinning against the body and blood of the Lord."

How Christ is to be eaten. But how is Christ to be eaten? As He Himself says: "He who eats my flesh, and drinks my blood, abides in me, and I in him." Therefore, if He abides in me, and I in Him, then he eats, then he drinks; but he who does not abide in me, nor I in him, even if he receives the sacrament, he acquires great torment. Therefore, He who abides in me, as He says elsewhere: "He who keeps my commandments abides in me, and I in him." Therefore, see, brothers, because if you, who are faithful, are separated from the body of the Lord, it must be feared that you may die of famine. For He Himself said: "He who does not eat my flesh, nor drink my blood, will not have life in him." Therefore, if you are separated, so that you do not eat the body and blood of the Lord, it must be feared that you may die; but if you receive unworthily and drink unworthily, it must be feared that you may eat and drink judgment. Great are your afflictions. Live well, and your afflictions will be alleviated. Do not promise life to yourselves while living badly: what God does not promise, man deceives himself when he promises it to himself. You promise yourself what the truth denies you. The truth says: "If you live badly, you will die forever;" and you say to yourself: "And I live badly, and I live forever with Christ?" How can it be that the truth lies, and you speak the truth? Every man is a liar. Therefore, you cannot live well unless He helps, unless He gives, unless He grants. Thus, pray and eat. Pray, and you will be freed from these afflictions. For He will fill you, both in doing good and in living well. Let your conscience be examined. Your mouth will be filled with the praise of God and exultation; and you will say to Him, freed from great afflictions: "You have freed my steps under me, and my footsteps have not faltered."

Sermons - Sermon 133

SERMO 133 OF THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL OF JOHN (7, 2-10), Where Jesus said He would not go up to the feast, And yet he ascended.

Explanation of the Gospel reading.

We have set out, with the help of the Lord, to discuss this most recent chapter of the Gospel. It is no small matter, lest the truth be endangered and falsehood boast. However, the truth cannot perish, nor can falsehood prevail. But what question this reading contains, receive briefly; and being attentive through the proposed question, pray that we may be sufficient for the solution.

It was the festival of the Jews called the Feast of Tabernacles: these are the days, as it appears, which they observe even today, when they call them booths. For this feast is about the making of tabernacles; because the tabernacle is called σχην■, the making of the tabernacle is scenopegia. These festive days were celebrated among the Jews: and one day was called a festival not because it took place on one day, but because it was performed in continuous celebration; like the feast day of Passover, like the feast day of Unleavened Bread, and yet, as is evident, that feast day is celebrated over several days.

Therefore, this festivity was in Judaea; the Lord Jesus was in Galilee, where he was also brought up, where he also had relatives and kinfolk, whom the Scripture calls brothers. Thus, they said to him, as we heard read: his brothers: "Depart from here and go to Judaea, so that your disciples also may see the works you are doing. For no one does anything in secret while he himself seeks to be known openly. If you do these things, show yourself to the world." The Evangelist then adds: "For neither did his brothers believe in him." So if they did not believe in him, they spoke enviously. Jesus responded to them: "My time has not yet come; your time is always ready. The world cannot hate you, but it hates me because I testify about it that its works are evil. You go up to this feast. I am not going up to this feast because my time has not yet fully come." Then the Evangelist follows: “When he had said these things, he remained in Galilee. But when his brothers had gone up, then he also went up to the feast, not openly, but as it were in secret." The question extends up to this point, the rest is clear.

Christ did not lie in that place.

What then is being sought? What is moving? What is at risk? Lest the Lord, or rather to speak more openly, lest Truth itself be believed to have lied. For if we are willing to think it lied, the authority of lying will be received as weak. We have heard it said that it lied. For those who think it lied, say this: He said he would not go up to the feast, and he did go up. First, therefore, as far as we can in a short time, let us see whether he lies, who says something and does not do it. For example, I said to a friend: I will see you tomorrow; a greater necessity occurs, which prevents; I did not therefore speak falsely. For when I promised, I felt what I was saying. But when something greater occurs, which hindered the fulfillment of my promise, I did not wish to lie, but I was not able to fulfill the promise. Behold, as far as I think, I have not labored to persuade, but only reminded your prudence, that he who promises something and does not do it is not lying, if something else occurs to prevent him from doing so, which impedes his promise, not what proves falsehood. To lie is worse than to be deceived. But he who listens to me says: Can you say this about Christ, that he was either unable to fulfill what he wanted or did not know the future? You act well, you suggest well, you rightly remind: but, O man, share the concern with me. Do we dare to call him less powerful, we dare to call him a liar? As for me, as far as I can judge according to my weakness, I choose that a man is deceived in something rather than that he lies in something. For to be deceived pertains to weakness, to lie pertains to iniquity. "You hate, O Lord," he says, "all who work iniquity." And immediately, "You will destroy all who speak lies." Either iniquity and lying are equally strong; or it is more: you will destroy, than you hated. For he who is hated is not immediately punished with destruction. Let that question be true, whether at some time it is necessary to lie; for I do not examine that now: it is intricate, it has many folds; it is not convenient to cut all and reach to life. Therefore, its treatment is deferred to another time; perhaps it will be healed without our discourse by divine succor. But what I delayed, what I want to discuss today, pay attention and distinguish. Whether at some time it is necessary to lie, I said this difficult and most intricate question, I defer this. But whether Christ lied, whether Truth said something false, this today we have undertaken, admonished from the evangelical reading.

How being deceived and lying differ. But what is the difference between being deceived and lying, I will briefly say. One is deceived who thinks that what he says is true, and because he thinks it is true, therefore he says it. However, if what he says is true, he would not be deceived: if it were not only true but also known by him to be true, he would not be lying. Therefore, he is deceived because what he thinks is true is false; yet he speaks only because he thinks it is true. Error is in human weakness but it is not in the health of the conscience. But whoever thinks that something is false and asserts it as true, he is lying. See, my brothers, distinguish as those who are nurtured in the Church, taught in the Scriptures of the Lord, not unlearned, not rustic, not ignoramuses. For there are among you learned and educated men and those moderately instructed in whatever letters: and if you have not learned those letters which are called liberal, it is more that you have been nourished in the word of God. If I labor in explaining what I think, help me both by your attention in listening and your prudence in thinking. Nor will you help, unless you are helped. Therefore, let us pray for each other, and await the common aid together. One is deceived, who, when it is false, thinks what he says is true: but one lies, who thinks something is false, and asserts it as true, whether it is true or false. Observe what I have added. Whether it is true or false, yet he who thinks it is false and asserts it as true, lies: he desires to deceive. For what good is it to him that it is true? Meanwhile, he himself thinks it is false, and says it as if it is true. What he says is true in itself, in itself it is true: with him it is false, his conscience does not hold what he speaks; he thinks something to be true within himself, but asserts another thing outwardly as truth. It is a double heart, not a simple one; it does not express what it holds inside. A double heart has long been condemned. Deceitful lips have spoken evil in heart and heart. It would suffice if he said: They have spoken evil in heart; where are the deceitful lips? What is deceit? When one thing is done, another is pretended. Deceitful lips, not a simple heart; and because it is not a simple heart, therefore it is in heart and heart; therefore twice in heart, because it is a double heart.

Christ cannot be deceived, nor can He lie. Do we then consider that the Lord Jesus Christ lied? If it is less grievous to be mistaken than to lie, do we dare to say that He lied, whom we dare not say was mistaken? Indeed, He is neither mistaken nor does He lie: but entirely, as it is written (it is understood about Him, it should be understood about Him): Nothing false is said to the king, and no falsehood will come out of his mouth. If He called any man a king, let us place Christ the King above any human king. But if, as is more rightly understood, Christ is the one of whom it was said (nothing false is said to Him because He is not mistaken; no falsehood comes from His mouth because He does not lie); let us seek to understand the Gospel passage, and not build a pit of falsehood as if by heavenly authority. It is indeed more absurd to seek to explain the truth and prepare a place for a lie. What are you teaching me, I ask you, who explain this passage to me? What do you want to teach me? I do not know whether you dare to say: Falsehood. For if you dare to say this, I will turn my ears away, and stop them with thorns, so that if you attempt to force me, I will depart pricked, without the exposition of the Gospel. Tell me what you want to teach me, and you solve the question. Tell me, I pray you: behold, I am here; my ears are open, my heart is ready, teach me. But what am I asking? I am not going through many attempts. What are you going to teach? Whatever doctrine you are going to explain, whatever strong arguments apply in the discussion, say this only, I ask you one of two things: Are you going to teach me truth, or falsehood? What do we suppose he will answer, that I may not leave; so as not to leave him gaping and trying to express words? What will he promise, but the truth? I listen, I stand, I wait, I most attentively wait. Behold, he who promised to teach me the truth, insinuates falsehoods about Christ. How then will you teach the truth, when you say that Christ is a liar? If Christ lies, can I hope that you will tell me the truth? From the truth of the Gospel itself, Christ was defended against falsehood.

Behold another thing. What does it say? Christ has lied. Where, I ask you? Where did he say: I am not going up to this feast, and went up? Indeed, I would like to investigate this passage carefully, lest perhaps Christ did not lie. Rather, because I do not doubt that Christ did not lie, I will either investigate and understand this passage or, not understanding it, I will defer. However, I will not say Christ lied. Let me admit that I did not understand: I will depart ignorant. For it is better to be ignorant with piety than to judge with madness. Nevertheless, let us try to discuss, so that perhaps with his assistance who is the Truth, we might find something, and also be found by something, and that this ‘something’ shall not be false in the truth. For if I find falsehood in my search, I find nothing, not something. Therefore, let us seek where you say Christ lied. Because he said, you say: I am not going up to this feast, and went up. How do you know he said it? What if I, or rather another—not I, for I would not say such a thing—what if another says: Christ did not say this? How will you refute it? How will you prove it? You will open the book, find the reading, demonstrate it to a person, or even, with great confidence in your chest, strike the book against a resistant person: Hold, attend, read, you bear the Gospel. What then, I beg you, what disturbs you a little? Do not press, speak more clearly, more calmly. Behold, I carry the Gospel, and what of that? He says: The Gospel speaks that Christ said what you deny. And will you believe that Christ said this because the Gospel speaks it? Certainly, he says. I greatly marvel how you say Christ lies and the Gospel does not lie. But perhaps, when I say Gospel, you attend to the book, think of the parchment and ink as the Gospel—consider what the Greek name says: The Gospel is “good news” or “good announcement.” Therefore, does the messenger not lie but he who sent him lies? This messenger, evidently the Evangelist, even naming him, this John who wrote this, did he lie about Christ or tell the truth? Choose what you will, I am ready to hear you in either case. If he lied, there is no proof that Christ said those things. If he told the truth, truth does not flow from the source of falsehood. Who is the source? Christ: let John be the rivulet. The rivulet comes to me, and you tell me: Drink securely; and while you frighten me from the very source, claiming he in the source is false, you say: Drink securely. What do I drink? What did John say? That Christ lied? From where did John come? From Christ. Will he tell me truth who came from him, while he who sent him lied? I indeed read in the Gospel: John reclined on the breast of the Lord; but I think because he drank the truth. What did he drink? What, if not what he belched forth? In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God; this was in the beginning with God. All things were made through him, and without him was made nothing. What was made, in him is life, and the life was the light of men, and the light shines in the darkness, and the darkness did not overcome it; yet it shines, and if perhaps I have some darkness and cannot grasp it perfectly, it shines. There was a man sent from God, whose name was John; he came to bear witness about the light, that all might believe through him. He was not the light: who? John; who? John the Baptist. Concerning him the Evangelist John says: He was not the light; of whom the Lord says: He was a burning and shining lamp. But a lamp can be both lit and extinguished. What therefore? From what place do you distinguish? From which passage do you seek? To whom did the lamp bear witness? He was the true light. Where John added: true, there you seek falsehood. Still, listen to the Evangelist John belching forth what he drank: And we have seen, he says, his glory. What did he see? What glory did he see? The glory as of the only Son from the Father, full of grace and truth. Therefore, see to it, lest perhaps we should restrain weak or rash disputes, and presume nothing false about the truth, give the Lord what is owed; give glory to the fountain, so that we may be filled securely. But God is true; every man is a liar. What does this mean? God is full; every man is empty; if he wishes to be filled, let him come to the full. Come to him and be enlightened. Furthermore, if man is empty because he is a liar, and seeks to be filled, and with haste and eagerness runs to the fountain, he wishes to be filled, he is empty. But you say: Beware of the fountain, there is falsehood. What else do you say than: There is poison?

Solution to the question.

Now, he said, you have said everything, now you have restrained me, now you have corrected me. Tell me how he did not lie who said: “I am not going up,” and yet went up? I will tell you, if I can; consider it trivial that, although I have not placed you in the truth, I have at least forbidden you from rashness. However, I will tell you what, if you remember the words I commended, I think you already recognize. These very words resolve the question. That feast day was conducted over many days. To that specific day, he said, festively, to that specific day when they were expecting him, he did not go up; but went when he chose. Pay attention to what follows: After saying this, he himself stayed in Galilee. Therefore, he did not go up to that specific feast day. For his brothers wanted him to go first; that is why they had said: “Leave here and go to Judea.” They did not say: “Let us go,” as if they would be his companions; or: “Follow us to Judea,” as if they would go ahead; but as if they were to send him ahead. He wanted them to go ahead: he avoided this, commending human infirmity, hiding divinity; he avoided this just as when he fled to Egypt. It was not from weakness: but it was also of truth, to give an example of caution; lest any of his servants should say: “I do not flee because it is shameful,” when perhaps it would be expedient to flee. Speaking to his own: “When they persecute you in this city, flee to another,” he himself provided this example. For when he wished, he was apprehended; when he wished, he was born. Therefore, so that they would not go ahead and announce he was coming, and prepare ambushes: “I am not going up,” he said, to the feast day. He said: “I am not going up,” to hide himself; he added: “to this,” lest he lie. He added something, he subtracted something, he delayed something; yet he said nothing false, because nothing false proceeds from his mouth. Therefore, after he said these things: When his brothers had gone up, the Gospel speaks; pay attention, read what you offered to me; see if the very reading resolves the question, see if I derived what to say from elsewhere. Therefore the Lord awaited this, that they go up first, so they would not announce he was coming. After his brothers had gone up, he also then went up to the feast day, not openly, but as if in secret. What does “as if in secret” mean? It means acting as if in secret. What: as if in secret? Because even this was not entirely in secret. For he did not truly try to hide, who had the power over when he would be apprehended. But in that concealment, as I said, he provided an example of avoiding the plots of enemies to weak disciples, who did not have the power, when they did not wish to be apprehended. For he also went up openly afterward, and taught them in the temple, and some said: “Look, he is here, and teaching.” Certainly, our leaders said, wanting to apprehend him: “Look, he speaks openly, and no one lays hands on him.”

Another solution.

Now indeed, if we attend to ourselves, if we consider his body, because he is also ourselves. For even if we were not himself, it would not be true: "Whatever you did for one of the least of these brothers and sisters of mine, you did for me." If we were not himself, it would not be true: "Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me?" Therefore, we also are himself, because we are his members, because we are his body, because he is our head, because the whole Christ is head and body. Perhaps he foresaw that we would not be observing the Jewish feast days, and this is it: "I am not going up to this festival." Behold, neither Christ, nor the Evangelist lied: if it is necessary to choose one of the two, the Evangelist would forgive me, I would by no means prefer the prophet to the prophet himself; I would not prefer the one sent to the one who sent him. But thanks be to God, as much as I judge, it has been revealed what was obscure. Your piety will assist towards God. Behold, as I could, I have solved the question, both in Christ and in the Evangelist. Hold the truth with me, friend, embrace charity without contention.

Sermons - Sermon 134

SERMO 134 ON THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL OF JOHN (8, 31-34):

"If you remain in my word, you are truly my disciples."

Christ is the teacher of all. Abide in the word of God. Your Love knows that we all have one Master and are fellow students under Him. We are not your masters because we speak to you from a higher place, but the Master of all who dwells in all of us is speaking. He was just now speaking to all of us in the Gospel and was telling us what I am also telling you: but He speaks of us, and to us and to you: "If you remain in my word, not indeed in my word, who is now speaking, but in His, who was just now speaking in the Gospel: If you remain in my word," He says, "you are truly my disciples." It is little to come to a disciple; but to remain. Therefore, He did not say: "If you hear my word;" or: "If you come to my word;" or: "If you praise my word;" but see what He said: "If you remain in my word, you are truly my disciples; and you will know the truth, and the truth will set you free." What shall we say, brothers? Is it a labor to remain in the word of God, or is it not? If it is labor, consider the great reward; if it is not labor, you receive the reward freely. Let us therefore remain in Him who remains in us. We, if we do not remain in Him, fall; but He, if He does not remain in us, has not therefore lost His abode. For He knows how to remain in Himself, who never forsakes Himself. But let it be far from man that he should remain in himself, who has lost himself. Therefore we remain in Him out of need; He remains in us out of mercy. The reward of abiding in the word of Christ. To be freed is said in two ways.

Now therefore, if it is clear what we must do, let us see what we shall receive. For He has prescribed the work, and promised the reward. What is the work? If you continue in my word. A short work; short in word, great in deed: If you continue. What does it mean: If you continue? If you build upon the rock. O how great it is, brothers, to build upon the rock, how great it is! The rivers came, the winds blew, the rain descended, and beat upon that house, and it did not fall: for it was founded upon the rock. What then is it to remain in the word of God, but to yield to no temptations? What is the reward? You shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free. Have compassion on us, because you perceive my voice to be feeble; assist me with your tranquility. O the reward! You shall know the truth. Perhaps someone might say: And what does it profit me to know the truth? And the truth shall make you free. If the truth does not delight you, let liberty delight you. In common Latin usage, to be liberated is spoken of in two ways; and we are especially accustomed to hearing this word such that whoever is liberated is understood to escape danger, to be free from troubles. However, to be liberated is properly said to be made free: just as to be saved is to be made safe; to be healed is to be made healthy; thus to be liberated is to be made free. Therefore I said: If the truth does not delight you, let liberty delight you. This is more clearly expressed in the Greek language, and it cannot be understood otherwise. And so that you may know that it cannot be understood otherwise; while the Lord was speaking, the Jews answered: We have never been enslaved to anyone; how do you say that: The truth shall make you free? That is: The truth shall make you free, how do you say to us, who have never been enslaved to anyone? Those whom you see, they say, to have no necessity of servitude, how do you promise freedom to them?

Slavery of sin.

They heard what they ought to have done: but they did not do what they ought to have done. What did they hear? Because I said: The truth shall set you free; you considered yourselves to be free because you did not serve man, and you said: We have never served anyone. Everyone: Jew and Greek, rich and poor, honored and dishonored, emperor and beggar, everyone who commits sin is a slave to sin. Everyone, he says, who commits sin is a slave to sin. If men acknowledge their servitude, they will see whence they receive their freedom. A freeman is captured by barbarians, from a freeman he has become a slave; a compassionate man hears, considers that he has money, becomes a redeemer, goes to the barbarians, gives the money, redeems the man. Clearly, he has returned freedom, if he has taken away iniquity. But who has taken away iniquity? A man from another man? He who served among the barbarians, was redeemed by his redeemer; and there is a great difference between the redeemer and the redeemed; yet under the dominion of iniquity they might be fellow slaves. I ask the redeemed: Do you have sin? I have, he says. I ask the redeemer: Do you have sin? I have, he says. Therefore neither should you boast of being redeemed, nor should you exalt yourself as the redeemer: but both flee to the true liberator. It is little that those who are under sin are called slaves; they are also called dead. That which a man fears captivity would do to him, iniquity has already done to him. For what does it matter that they seem to live, did he who said this err: Let the dead bury their dead? Therefore all are dead under sin, dead slaves, serving dead, dying slaves. From the bondage of sin and death, none but Christ delivers. Likeness of sinful flesh in Christ. Who then frees from death and slavery, if not the one free among the dead? Who is free among the dead, if not the one without sin among sinners? Behold, the prince of the world comes, our Redeemer himself says, our Liberator: Behold, the prince of the world comes, and he will find nothing in me. He holds those he deceived, those he led astray, to whom he persuaded sin and death; he will find nothing in me. Come, Lord; come, Redeemer, come; let the captive recognize you, let the captor flee from you: you be to me a liberator. He found me lost, in whom the devil found nothing to act upon. The prince of this age found flesh in him, he found: and what kind of flesh? Mortal flesh, which he could hold, which he could crucify, which he could kill. You are mistaken, deceiver, the Redeemer is not mistaken: you are mistaken. You see mortal flesh in the Lord, it is not the flesh of sin: it is the likeness of the flesh of sin. For God sent His Son in the likeness of the flesh of sin. True flesh, mortal flesh, but not the flesh of sin. For God sent His Son in the likeness of the flesh of sin, so that by sin He might condemn sin in the flesh. For God sent His Son in the likeness of the flesh of sin: into flesh, yet not into the flesh of sin; but into the likeness of the flesh of sin. For what reason? So that from sin, which surely was not in Himself, He might condemn sin in the flesh: that the righteousness of the Law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not according to the flesh, but according to the spirit.

Sins, sacrifices for sins.

Therefore, if it was a likeness of sinful flesh, not sinful flesh itself, how: That he might condemn sin in the flesh on account of sin? It is also common for a likeness to take the name of the thing of which it is a likeness. A man is called true; but even if you show a painted image on a wall, and ask what it is, it is answered: A man. Therefore, the flesh having the likeness of sinful flesh was called sin, so that it might be a sacrifice for sin. The same apostle says in another place: He who knew no sin, he made to be sin for us. He who knew no sin; who knew no sin except him who said: Behold, the prince of this world comes, and he finds nothing in me? He who knew no sin, he made to be sin for us; he himself, Christ, ignorant of sin, God made to be sin for us. What is this, brothers? If it were said: He made him sin, or: He made him have sin, it would seem intolerable: how do we tolerate what is said: He made him to be sin, so that Christ himself is sin? Those who know the Scriptures of the Old Testament recognize what I say. For it is not said once, but often, very frequently, that sins are called sacrifices for sins. For example, a goat, a ram, anything offered for sin was named sin itself. Therefore sin was called a sacrifice for sin: so that somewhere the Law says, priests ought to lay their hands upon the sin. Therefore: He who knew no sin, he made to be sin for us; that is: he was made a sacrifice for sin. Sin was offered, and sin was erased. The blood of the Redeemer was shed, and the obligation of the debtor was erased. This is the blood which was shed for many for the remission of sins.

Conclusion.

What is it then that you foolishly rejoiced, my captor, because my Redeemer had mortal flesh? If he had sin, see: if you found anything of yours in him, hold on to it. The Word was made flesh. The Word is the creator, the flesh is the creature. What of yours is there, enemy? And the Word is God, and the soul of man is a creature, and the flesh of man is a creature, and the mortal flesh of God is a creature. Look for sin. But what are you looking for? The Truth speaks: The prince of this world will come, and he will find nothing in me. Therefore, he did not find not flesh, but nothing of his own, that is, no sin. You deceived the innocent, you made the guilty. You killed the innocent; you destroyed whom you ought not to have, return what you held. Why then did you rejoice for a moment, because you found mortal flesh in Christ? It was your trap: from where you rejoiced, there you were caught. Where you exalted that you found something, there now you grieve over what you have lost. Therefore, brothers, who believe in Christ, let us remain in his word. For if we remain in his word, we are truly his disciples. Not only those twelve, but all who remain in his word, we are truly his disciples. And we will know the truth, and the truth will set us free; that is, Christ the Son of God, who said: I am the truth. He will make us free; this is: he will liberate us, not from barbarians, but from the devil; not from captivity of the body, but from iniquity of the soul. He alone thus liberates. Let no one call himself free, lest he remain a slave. Our soul will not remain in servitude, because our debts are forgiven daily.

Sermons - Sermon 135

SERMO 135 On the Words of the Gospel of John "I CAME TO DO THE WORKS OF HIM WHO SENT ME."

Against the Arians. And about what he said, that one who was born blind was illuminated:

"We know that God does not listen to sinners."

Blindness of all men from birth. The Lord Jesus, as we heard when the holy Gospel was read, opened the eyes of a man who was born blind. Brothers, if we consider our inherited punishment, the whole world is blind. Therefore, Christ came as the illuminator because the devil had been the blinder. He made everyone be born blind, who deceived the first man. Let them run to the illuminator, let them run, believe, receive clay made from saliva. Saliva is like the Word, the earth is flesh. Let them wash their face in the pool of Siloam. It was appropriate for the Evangelist to explain to us what Siloam means, and he said: Which is interpreted: sent. Who is the one sent, but he who said in that reading: I, he said, have come to do the works of him who sent me? Behold Siloam; wash your face, be baptized, that you may be enlightened, and see who before you did not see. A place deceitfully claimed by the Arians.

Behold first, to what has been said, open your eyes: He says, I have come to do the works of him who sent me. Here already arises the Arian, and he says: Behold, you see that Christ did not do his own works, but those of the Father who sent him. He would never say this, if he saw, that is, if in him who was sent, as in Siloam, he would wash his face. What then do you say? Behold, he says, he himself said it. What did he say? I have come to do the works of him who sent me. Therefore not his own? No. And what is it that he himself, Siloam, the one sent, the Son, the Only Begotten whom you claim to be degenerate, says? What is it that he says: All that the Father has is mine? You say that he performed foreign works, because he said: I will do the works of him who sent me. I say that the Father possessed foreign things, I speak according to your heart. Why then do you want to dictate to me that Christ said: I have come to do the works of him, as if not mine, but his who sent me? The works of the Father and the Son are the same.

I ask you, Lord Christ, resolve the question, end the contention. He says, "All things that the Father has are mine." Therefore, are they not the Father's, if they are yours? For he did not say, "All things that the Father has, he has given to me," although if he had said this, he would have shown equality. But it is troubling that he said, "All things that the Father has are mine." If you understand: all things that the Father has are the Son's; all things that the Son has are the Father's. Listen to him in another place: "All mine are yours, and yours are mine." The question about what the Father and the Son have is settled; they hold it in concord, you should not dispute. He calls the works of the Father his own works; because "yours are mine," because he speaks of the works of that Father, to whom he said, "All mine are yours, and yours are mine." Therefore, my works are yours, and your works are mine. For whatever the Father does: the Lord said, the Only Begotten said, the Son said, Truth said. What did he say? "Whatever the Father does, the Son does likewise." Great expression, great truth, great equality. All that the Father does, the Son does. It would suffice to say: all that the Father does, the Son does. It is not enough; I add: likewise. Why do I add: likewise? Because those who do not understand, and walk with eyes not yet opened, are accustomed to say: the Father does by commanding, the Son by obeying; therefore, not likewise. But if likewise, as he does, so he does; so what he does, this one does. The Son of God, consubstantial and coeternal with the Father.

But, says the Father, let the Son do this. You think carnally, but without prejudice to the truth, I yield to you. Behold, the Father commands, the Son obeys: does this mean that the Son is not of the same nature because one commands and the other obeys? Give me two men, a father and a son: they are both men; the one who commands is a man; the one who obeys is a man: the one who commands and the one who obeys have the same nature. Did the one who commands not beget the son from his own nature? Did the one who obeys lose his nature by obeying? Therefore, understand, just as you understand two men, the Father commands, the Son obeys, yet both are God and God. Though they are men together, together they are one God: this is the divine miracle. In the meantime, if you want me to acknowledge obedience with you, first acknowledge nature with me. The Father begot that which he himself is. If the Father begot something different from what he is, he did not truly beget a Son; the Father says to the Son: From the womb, before the morning star, I begat you. What is "before the morning star"? It signifies time before time. Thus, before time, before all things which are called before; before everything that is not, or before everything that is. For the Gospel does not say: In the beginning God made the Word; as it says: In the beginning God made heaven and earth; or: In the beginning the Word was born; or: In the beginning God begot the Word. But what does it say? It was, it was, it was. Hear: It was, believe. In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. You hear repeatedly: It was, do not seek time, because it always was. Therefore, he who always was, and who was always with the Son, because God is able to beget without time; he said to the Son: From the womb, before the morning star, I begat you. What is "from the womb"? Did God have a womb? Should we think God is composed of bodily members? By no means. And why did he say: from the womb, if not to be understood as begotten from his own substance? Thus, from the womb proceeded that which was the same as the one who begot. For if the begetter was something different, and something different proceeded from the womb; it is a monstrosity, not a Son. As the Son does the works of the Father, so the Father does the works of the Son.

Therefore, let the Son do the works of Him who sent Him, and let the Father do the works of the Son. Surely the Father willed it, and the Son accomplished it. Behold, I show that the Son wills it, and the Father does it. Where do you show it, you ask? I show it now. Father, I will. Now, if I wanted to make a false accusation, behold the Son commands and the Father does it. What do you want? That where I am, they also may be with me. We have escaped, we shall be where He is: we shall be there, we have escaped. Who erases the "I will" of the Almighty? You hear the will of power, hear also the power of the will. Just as the Father, he says, raises the dead and gives them life; so likewise the Son gives life to whom He will. To whom He will. Do not say: The Son gives life to those whom the Father commands Him to give life. He gives life to whom He wills. Therefore, to those whom the Father wills and whom He Himself wills; because where there is one power, there is one will. Let us have in our not-blind heart the one and same nature of the Father and the Son; because the Father is true, the Son is true. What He is, He begot; because the begotten did not degenerate. The prayers of sinners are also heard.

I do not know what may be stirring in the words of him who was blind, and perhaps makes many who do not understand well despair. For among his other words, the same one whose eyes were opened says: We know that God does not hear sinners. What do we do, if God does not hear sinners? Do we dare to ask God, if He does not hear sinners? Give me someone to pray, behold, there is one who hears. Give one to pray, examine human nature from the imperfect to the perfect. Rise from spring to summer; for this is what we sang: You have made summer and spring. That is, You have made both the spiritual and those still carnal; because even the Son Himself says: Your eyes have seen my imperfect state. Your eyes have seen the imperfection that is in my body. And then what? Do those who are imperfect have hope? Clearly, they have. Hear what follows: And in your book all will be written. But perhaps, brothers, the spiritual pray and are heard, because they are not sinners. What do the carnal do? What do they do? Will they perish? Will they not pray to God? God forbid. Give me that Publican. Come, Publican, stand in the midst, show your hope, lest the weak lose hope. For behold, the Publican went up to pray with the Pharisee, and with his face cast down to the ground, standing afar off, beating his breast, said: Lord, be merciful to me, a sinner. And he went down justified rather than that Pharisee. Who said: Be merciful to me, a sinner? Was he speaking the truth or falsehood? If he spoke the truth, he was a sinner; and he was heard, and he was justified. What then do you say, to whom the Lord opened his eyes: We know that God does not hear sinners? Behold, God hears sinners. But wash the interior face, let it be done in the heart, what was done to your face; and you will see that God hears sinners. The imagination of your heart deceived you. There is still more for you to do. Certainly, this one was cast out of the synagogue; he heard, he came to Him, and said to Him: Do you believe in the Son of God? And he answered: Who is He, Lord, that I may believe in Him? He was seeing, and yet he was not seeing; he was seeing with his eyes, but yet not seeing with his heart. The Lord said to him: You have both seen Him, that is, with your eyes: and He who speaks with you, He is. Then he fell down and worshiped Him. Then he washed the face of his heart. No one here is without sin.

Therefore, sinners, engage in prayers; confess your sins, pray that they may be erased, pray that they may be diminished, pray that with your improvements they may disappear; however, do not despair, and sinners pray. For who has not sinned? Begin with the priests. To the priests, He said: First offer sacrifices for your sins, and thus for the people. The sacrifices convicted the priests; so that if anyone claimed to be righteous and without sin, he could be answered: I do not regard what you say, but what you offer; your sacrifice convicts you. Why do you offer for your sins if you have no sins? Are you lying to God in the sacrifice? But perhaps the priests of the old people were sinners, the priests of the new people are not sinners. Certainly, brothers, because God willed it, I am his priest, I am a sinner, I beat my chest with you, I ask for pardon with you, I hope for a propitious God with you. But maybe the holy Apostles, the first, highest rams of the flock, the shepherds' limbs of the shepherd, maybe they had no sin. Truly they too had, they had: they do not get angry, because they confess. I would not dare. First, listen to the Lord Himself saying to the Apostles: Thus pray. Just as those priests were convicted by sacrifices, so these ones by prayer. Thus pray. And among the other things He commanded to pray, He included this: Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors. What do the Apostles say? Every day they ask for their debts to be forgiven. Debtors they enter, absolved they leave, and to prayer as debtors they return. This life is not without sin, so that as often as it is prayed, so often sins are forgiven. The apostles were also liable to sin after the resurrection of Christ. But what shall I say? Perhaps when they learned to pray, they were still weak. Perhaps someone will say this: When the Lord Jesus taught them to pray, they were still little children, they were weak, they were carnal; they were not yet spiritual, who do not have sin. What then, brothers, did they cease to pray once they became spiritual? Therefore Christ ought to have said: Pray these things now, and give another prayer to the spiritual. There is one, the very same, He who gave it; therefore pray this in the Church. But let us remove the controversy: when you say the holy Apostles were spiritual, while the Lord suffered, they were carnal; this you are going to say. Consequently, as it is true, while He hung, they were frightened, and then the Apostles despaired when the thief believed. Peter dared to follow when the Lord was led to the passion, he dared to follow, who reached the house, and was weary in the courtyard, stood by the fire, and shivered: he stood by the fire, frozen with cold fear. When questioned by a maidservant, he denied Christ once; questioned again, he denied; questioned a third time, he denied. Thanks be to God, because the questioning ceased: if the questioning had not ceased, the denial would have been repeated often. Therefore, after He rose, then He confirmed them, then they became spiritual. Did they no longer have sin? The spiritual Apostles were writing spiritual Epistles, sending them to the Churches: they had no sin, you say. I do not believe you, I ask them themselves. Tell us, holy Apostles, after the Lord rose and confirmed you with the Holy Spirit sent from heaven, did you cease to have sin? Tell us, I ask. Let us hear, lest sinners despair, lest they cease to ask God, because they are not without sin. Tell us. One of them says. And who? Whom the Lord loved more, and who reclined on the Lord’s chest, and drank the secret of the kingdom of heaven which he belched forth. He when I ask: Do you have sin, or not? He responds and says: If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. But that John is the one who said: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. See how much he surpassed, to reach the Word. Such and so great a one, who flew like an eagle above the clouds, who saw with the serenity of mind: In the beginning was the Word; he himself said: If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. But if we confess our sins, He is faithful and just, to forgive us our sins, and cleanse us from all unrighteousness. Therefore, pray.

Sermons - Sermon 136

SERMO 136 "ON THE SAME READING OF THE GOSPEL OF JOHN," ON THE HEALING OF THE MAN BORN BLIND The illumination of those born blind.

We have heard the reading of the holy Gospel, as we are accustomed: but it is good to be reminded; it is good to renew memory from the slumber of forgetfulness. Finally, a very ancient reading, as if new, has delighted us. Christ illuminated the man born blind: why do you marvel? Christ is the Savior: He restored that benefit which He had done less of in the womb. However, when He was making fewer eyes for him, He was not erring; but was deferring to the miracle. Perhaps you say: How do you know this? I heard it from Him: He said it just now; we heard it together. For when His disciples asked Him, and said: Lord, who sinned, this man or his parents, that he was born blind? What did He respond, you heard with me: Neither did this man sin, nor his parents; but so that the works of God might be made manifest in him. Behold why He was deferring, when He was making fewer eyes. He did not do, what He would do; He did not do, what He knew He would do, when it was fitting. Nor should you think, brothers, that his parents had no sin, or that he himself did not contract original sin when he was born, on account of which sin infants are baptized for the remission of sins. But that blindness was not because of the parents' sin, nor was it because of his own sin; but so that the works of God might be made manifest in him. For all of us, when we were born, contracted original sin; and yet we were not born blind. Ask diligently: and we were born blind. For who was not born blind? but in the heart. However, the Lord Jesus, because He had created both, healed both. A blind error, thinking that sinners are not heard.

You have seen this blind man with the eyes of faith, you have also seen him going from blindness to sight; but you have heard him erring. In what did this blind man err, I say: first, because he thought Christ was a prophet, he did not know Him as the Son of God. Then we heard one of his responses which was entirely false: for he said, "We know that God does not hear sinners." If God does not hear sinners, what hope do we have? If God does not hear sinners, why do we pray, and why do we confess our sins by striking our breasts? Where is that Publican who went up to the temple with the Pharisee, and while the Pharisee boasted, parading his merits, the Publican, standing afar off, with eyes fixed on the ground, and beating his breast, confessed his sins? And the one who confessed his sins went down from the temple justified, more so than the Pharisee. Surely God hears sinners. But the one who spoke these words had not yet washed the face of his heart with the waters of Siloam. The sacrament had preceded in his eyes; but the effect of grace had not yet occurred in his heart. When did this blind man wash the face of his heart? When the Lord, having sent him out by the Jews, brought him to Himself. For He found him and said to him, as we have heard: "Do you believe in the Son of God?" And he replied, "Who is He, Lord, that I might believe in Him?" Surely he already saw with his eyes, but with his heart? Not yet. Wait: he would soon see. Jesus answered him, "I am He, who speaks with you." Did he doubt? Immediately he washed his face. For He spoke with him, Siloam, which is interpreted as "Sent." Who is sent but Christ, who often testified, saying: "I do the will of my Father who sent me." Therefore, He was Siloam. The blind man approached with his heart, heard, believed, worshipped: he washed his face, he saw. The blindness of the Jews, accusing that the Sabbath is broken by Christ. But those who sent him away remained blind, because they were accusing the Lord falsely, since it was the Sabbath when he made clay from spittle and anointed the eyes of the blind man. For whenever the Lord healed with a word, the Jews openly slandered him. For he did not perform any work on the Sabbath when he spoke, and it was done. It was an open calumny: they slandered him when he commanded, they slandered him when he spoke, as though they themselves did not speak on the Sabbath. I may say that they not only speak on the Sabbath, but do not speak on any day, since they have departed from the praises of the true God. Yet as I said, brothers, it was an open calumny. The Lord said to a man: Stretch out your hand; it was healed, and they slandered because he healed on the Sabbath. What did he do? What work did he perform? What burden did he carry? But now to spit on the ground, to make clay, and to anoint a man's eyes, is to work. No one should doubt, it was work. The Lord broke the Sabbath: but he was not guilty for it. What is it that I said: He broke the Sabbath? The light itself came, removing shadows. The Sabbath was indeed commanded by the Lord God, by Christ himself who was with the Father when that Law was given: it was commanded by him, but in the shadow of things to come. Therefore, let no one judge you in food or in drink, or in respect of a festival day, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbaths, which are a shadow of things to come. He to whom these shadows announced the coming had come. Why delight in shadows? Jews, open your eyes: the sun is present. We know. What do you know, you blind-hearted? What do you know? That this man is not from God, who thus broke the Sabbath? The Sabbath, pitiable ones, Christ himself proclaimed the Sabbath, whom you say is not from God. You observe the Sabbath carnally, you do not have the saliva of Christ. Pay attention in the land of the Sabbath to the saliva of Christ, and you will understand Christ was prophesied through the Sabbath. But because you do not have the saliva of Christ upon your eyes, that is why you did not come to Siloam, and you did not wash your face, and you remained blind; to his good, rather no longer blind neither in flesh nor in heart. He made clay with spittle, his eyes were anointed, he went to Siloam, he washed his face, he believed in Christ, he saw, and he did not remain in that very terrible judgment: I came into this world for judgment, that those who do not see may see, and that those who see may become blind.

How the blindness of the Jews was increased by the advent of Christ.

Great terror! So that those who do not see, may see: well. It is the duty of the Savior, it is the profession of medicine: So that those who do not see, may see. What is it, Lord, that you added: So that those who see, may become blind? If we understand, it is very true and very right. What is it, however: Those who see? They are Jews. Thus they see? According to their words, they see, according to the truth they do not see. What is it then: they see? They think they see, they believe they see. For they believed they saw, when they defended the Law against Christ. We know: therefore they see. What is: We know, except: We see? What is: Because this man is not from God, because he thus breaks the Sabbath? They are seeing: what the law said, they read. For it is commanded that he who breaks the Sabbath should be stoned. Therefore, they said that this man was not from God; but seeing, they were blind, because that future judge of the living and the dead came into the world for judgment. Why did he come? So that those who do not see, may see: those who confess they do not see, may be enlightened. And those who see, may become blind: that is, those who do not confess their blindness, may be hardened more grievously. Finally, it is fulfilled: Those who see, may become blind; defenders of the law, handlers of the law, teachers of the law, interpreters of the law crucified the author of the law. O blindness! It is the same which happened to a part of Israel. So that Christ would be crucified, and the fullness of the Gentiles would come in, a part of Israel was made blind. What is: So that those who do not see, may see? So that the fullness of the Gentiles would come in, a part of Israel was made blind. The whole world lay blind, but he came, so that those who do not see, may see; and those who see, may become blind. He was unknown by the Jews, crucified by the Jews; from his own blood he made an ointment for the blind. They became harder, they became blind, those who boasted they saw the light, crucified the light. How great a blindness! They killed the light: but the crucified light illuminated the blind.

Paul's testimony about the impotence of the law and the blindness of the Jews.

Listen to the seeing one, who was blind. Behold the cross on which they stumbled, those who refused to confess their blindness to the physician. The law remained for them. What does the law do without grace? O wretched ones! what does the law do without grace. What does the earth do without the saliva of Christ? What does the law do without grace, except make greater guilt? Why? Because hearers of the law and not doers, and thus sinners, transgressors. The son of the hostess of the man of God died, and the staff was sent through the servant, and placed upon his face, and he did not revive. What does the law do without grace? The Apostle already seeing, already enlightened from being blind, what does he say? For if a law had been given which could give life, righteousness would indeed be by the law. Attend: let us respond, and say: What is it that he said? If a law had been given which could give life, righteousness would indeed be by the law. If it could not give life, why was it given? He follows and adds: But Scripture has confined all under sin, that the promise by faith in Jesus Christ might be given to those who believe. The promise of illumination, the promise of love by faith in Jesus Christ, so that it might be given to believers, that Scripture, that is, the law, has confined all under sin. What is: confined all under sin? I would not have known lust, unless the law said: You shall not covet. What is: Scripture confined all under sin? It made the offender even a transgressor. For it could not heal the sinner. Scripture confined all under sin: but in what hope? The hope of grace, the hope of mercy. You received the law; you wanted to perform it, but you could not: you fell from pride, you saw your illness. Run to the physician, wash your face. Desire Christ, confess Christ, believe in Christ: the Spirit of the letter approaches, and you shall be saved. For if you withdraw the Spirit from the letter, the letter kills: if it kills, where is hope? But the Spirit gives life.

Elisha sending the staff ahead, then coming himself to raise the dead, what it foreshadows.

Let Giezi, the servant of Elisha, receive the staff, as the servant of God Moses received the law. Let him receive the staff, receive it, run, precede, advance, place the staff upon the face of the dead boy. And it happened: he received it, ran, placed the staff upon the face of the dead boy. But to what end? For whom is the staff? If a law had been given that could give life, the boy would have been resurrected by the staff: but because Scripture has concluded all under sin, he still lies dead. But why has it concluded all under sin? So that the promise by faith in Jesus Christ we might be given to those who believe. Let Elisha come, who sent the staff by the servant to convict the dead; let him himself come, let him himself come, let him enter the woman's lodging, ascend to the boy, find him dead, conform to the body's limbs of the dead, not dead but alive. This indeed he did:

placing face upon face, eyes upon eyes, hands upon hands, feet beside feet, he straitened himself, contracted himself, being great he made himself small. He contracted himself; as it were, he lessened himself. Because: When he was in the form of God, he emptied himself, taking the form of a servant. What does it mean: he conformed himself alive to the dead? What is it, you ask? Hear the Apostle: God sent his own Son. What does it mean: he conformed to the dead? Let him say it, follow, and let him say: In the likeness of sinful flesh. This is conforming oneself alive to the dead: to come to us in the likeness of sinful flesh, not in the flesh of sin. The dead lay in the flesh of sin, he conformed himself to the likeness of the flesh of sin. For he died who had no reason to die. He died among the dead alone free; because all flesh of men was indeed the flesh of sin. How could he resurrect unless he who had no sin conforming himself to the dead came in the likeness of sinful flesh? O Lord Jesus, suffering for us, not for you, not having guilt, and enduring punishment, so that you might dissolve both guilt and punishment.

Sermons - Sermon 136A

SERMON 136/A From the Gospel according to John, Chapter 9: On the Illumination of the Man Born Blind The deeds of Christ's miracles are like the words of the sacraments.

Lord Jesus came into this world to save sinners. Therefore, He found a man blind from birth. For who among men is born except blind? I say in mind, not in body. But to see, he is anointed with spittle and clay; but with spittle not just any spittle, not anyone's but Christ's. Christ's spittle is prophecy, clay is humankind. Remember from what man was made. When therefore men prophesied, spittle was in the clay. What shall I say of the ancient prophets? The Apostle himself says: We have this treasure in earthen vessels. This treasure behold you have as spittle: from it he was first anointed; and every one who is born blind is anointed from here, and sent to the pool of Siloam. For could not Christ open his eyes with His spittle? Finally, He could also command him to see without spittle and without clay and it would be done. He could: but the acts of miracles are like the words of sacraments. Therefore, he is sent to the pool of Siloam. Why these delays? We recognize the power. What you will, You do, O Christ; let this blind man see now. No, he says; let him first go to the pool of Siloam, and wash his face. Thanks be to the holy Gospel, it interprets the pool of Siloam for us. Siloam, he says, which is interpreted as sent. Who is this sent one? Recognize the sent one; he proclaims: The Father sent me. Therefore, he sent him to himself: he sent the believer to baptism. He washed his face, and saw; sins were washed away, and light dawned. Now indeed what he responded, and was so harassed by the Jews, he was already anointed in heart. But when he washed his face from Siloam, the reading itself testifies. He was therefore anointed still, not yet seeing, when he said: We know that God does not hear sinners.

There is hope even for the sinner.

What hope do men have, if God does not hear sinners? Did not two men go up into the temple to pray, one a Pharisee and the other a Publican? Did not the Pharisee say: I thank you, God, that I am not like other men, unjust, robbers, like this Publican too? He asked for nothing, as if he had gone up satiated, and was belching fulness. He did not say: Help me; he did not say: Have mercy on me, because my father and mother have forsaken me; he did not say: Be my helper, do not leave me. But the Publican stood far off. A marvelous thing: he stood far off in the temple, and he himself was approaching the God of the temple. Therefore, he stood far off, nor did he dare to lift his eyes to heaven: but he beat his breast saying: Lord, be merciful to me, a sinner. We have heard the controversy: let Christ pronounce the verdict. Behold, He says, let us hear: Amen, I say to you, that this Publican went down to his house justified, rather than that Pharisee. Certainly, God does not hear sinners. When he was beating his breast, he was punishing his sins; when he was punishing his sins, he was approaching God the judge. For God hates sins: if you also hate them, you begin to join with God, so that you may say to Him: Turn your face away from my sins. Turn your face away: but from where? From my sins; do not turn your face away from me. But what does it mean: your face from my sins? Do not see them, do not recognize them, so that you can forgive me. Therefore, there is hope even for the sinner; let him ask God, do not despair, beat his breast, avenge himself by repenting, lest He avenges by judging. The humbled one approaches the Exalted.

Let the sinner acknowledge his sins. But why did the Lord say: That publican descended justified, rather than that Pharisee, He immediately added the reason, He did not deceive you. For He says, as if we were to ask Him, why this? Because, He says, whoever exalts himself shall be humbled, and whoever humbles himself shall be exalted. You have heard why: if you have heard and understood, do what you have heard, humble yourself, ask God, tell your Lord God that you are a sinner, which He sees, even if you do not say it. You may say: If He sees before I speak, why do I need to say it? O man, have you forgotten: It is good to confess to the Lord? Have you forgotten: Confess to the Lord, for He is good? Even if you do not confess to a human judge because he is bad, confess to the Lord, for He is good; confess, groan, repent, beat your breast. Such a spectacle pleases God, where He sees His sinner avenging sin. You acknowledge, and He forgives; you punish, and He spares. But for Him to forgive you, you must not spare your sins. Respond: Let Him not spare, let Him blot out my iniquity.

Christ receives the human race.

After many things, the one who was blind and now sees was cast out of the synagogue of the Jews; they were angry with him, they cast him out of their synagogue. Behold what his parents feared; the Evangelist has exposed this to us, he did not remain silent: For his parents, he says, were afraid to confess Christ and be cast out of the synagogue; and therefore they said: He is of age, ask him. They thus feared to be cast out of the synagogue: he did not fear, and he was cast out; his parents remained there. Christ remains the supporter, so that he may say: For my father and my mother have forsaken me. And what did he add? But the Lord took me in. Come, Christ, take me in; they cast out, you receive; receive the one cast out, not the one admitted. Behold, he takes him in: he shows himself to the eyes, which he himself deigned to open. He says, Do you believe in the Son of God? And he still anointed: Who is he, Lord, that I may believe in him? And the Lord: You have seen him, and he who speaks with you is he. He washed his face. Therefore now seeing with the heart, he worshiped his Savior. This is what Christ Jesus does as to (the blind) born mankind, still anointed physically, because of the miracle; but he performed the miracle to commend faith; he commended from this miracle of the opened eyes of the one born blind that faith, by which he daily opens the eyes of mankind and of the one born blind himself.

Sermons - Sermon 136B

Sermon 136 From the Gospel according to John, Chapter 9: On the Illumination of the Man Born Blind He washes his face in Christ who is baptized in Christ.

Whoever has heard the name of Christ and believed and not yet been baptized, you have anointed eyes. Wash and see, for this blind man, when he had been anointed, was sent to the pool of Siloam, which is interpreted: 'sent.' Who is sent, if not Christ from the Father? Therefore, he washes his face in Christ who is baptized in Christ. However, what happened to his body had not yet happened to his heart. For all things are arranged in their own steps. It happened to his heart then when he recognized and adored the Son of God. But when he still thought he was a prophet, he had his heart's eyes anointed in a way and had not yet seen. When the Lord said to him: Do you believe in the Son of God? so that you might know that he had not yet seen, he thus answered: Who is he, Lord, that I may believe in him? And the Lord said: You have seen him and it is he who speaks with you; you have seen him with the eyes of the flesh, see also with the eyes of the heart. When did he see with the eyes of the heart? When he heard, and believed what he heard.

Christ came into the world as Savior. When therefore he was acting with somewhat anointed eyes of the heart and was not yet seeing, and thus he spoke, you heard what he said: We know that God does not hear sinners. He would not say this if he saw this light in his heart. For if God did not hear sinners, that tax collector would descend from the temple confused. But he descended justified rather than that Pharisee. Whence did this one descend justified? Because he did what Scripture says: I acknowledged my sin to you, and I covered not my iniquity. I said, I will confess my transgressions unto the Lord; and you forgave the iniquity of my heart. Therefore, does God not hear sinners? Believe this which the illumined now believe: God hears sinners. For what the Lord said that for judgment He came into this world, that those who do not see might see, and those who see might become blind, can perplex many who do not understand. For the Savior Christ has come. In one place He also said: For the Son of Man has not come to judge the world but that the world through Him might be saved. Therefore, if He came to save, it is acceptable that He said He came that those who do not see might see. But it is hard that those who see might become blind. If we understand, it is not hard but clear. That you may understand how truthfully it was said, refer your eyes to those two who were praying in the temple. The Pharisee saw, the tax collector was blind. What is to "see"? He thought he saw; he gloried in his sight, that is, in his righteousness. But he was blind because he confessed his sins. That one boasted of his merits, this one confessed his sins. The tax collector descended justified rather than that Pharisee because Christ came into the world that those who do not see might see and those who see might become blind. Therefore, when the Pharisees who were listening then said: Are we blind also? They were indeed like the one who ascended into the temple and said to God: I thank you that I am not like other men, unjust, adulterers, robbers, as though saying: I thank you that I am not blind, but I see, as other men of the kind of that tax collector. What did they say: Are we blind also? And the Lord said to them: If you were blind, you would have no sin. But now that you say, We see, your sin remains. He did not say: your sin increases, but: it remains. For it was there. Since you do not confess, it is not taken away, but remains.

God alone performs miracles.

Let the blind therefore come to Christ to be enlightened. For Christ is the light in the world, and among the worst men. Divine miracles have been wrought, and no one has performed miracles from the beginning of the human race except him to whom Scripture says: "He who alone does great wonders." Why is it said, "he who alone does great wonders," except because when he wishes to perform, he needs no man? However, when a man does it, he needs God. He alone performed miracles. Why? Because God in the Trinity is the Son with the Father and the Holy Spirit, certainly one God who alone does great wonders. The disciples of Christ also performed miracles, but none did so alone. What kind of miracles did they also perform? As it is written in the Acts of the Apostles: the sick desired to touch their fringes, and those touching were healed; the sick wished to be touched by the shadow of those passing by as they lay down. What kind of miracles did they perform, and none of them alone! Hear their Lord: "Without me you can do nothing." Therefore, beloved, let us love the patriarch like a patriarch, the prophet like a prophet, the apostle like an apostle, the martyr like a martyr, yet above all let us love God, and from him alone let us undoubtedly expect to be saved. The prayers of the saints who have earned well of God can help us, yet without any preceding fruit of their merits, since the merits of each saint are the gifts of God. God, who works openly, works secretly, works in visible things, works in hearts. He himself performs his wonders in his temple when he does so in holy men. For all the saints are together fused by the fire of charity and make one temple for God, and individually they are temples and all together one temple.

God prepares the will for faith.

You have noted what was said to holy Elijah: Go to Sarepta in Sidonia, there I have commanded a widow to feed you. For there was a great famine, but it was not great and without any human's ministration to feed his servant. Why was he sent to that woman, and not a raven bringing the prophet food by the command of God? But the raven did not bear fruit of its own. For even though it fed the prophet by the will of God, the raven was not therefore always to reign with Christ. He was sent to the widow for the good of the widow, not Elijah; not because he could not find food elsewhere, but so that she might gain merit before God by feeding the righteous one. Therefore, he came and found her collecting sticks. He asks for and requests food. She replied she did not have what to make bread with, saying she had only enough for herself and her children, and that when they consumed it, they would die. However, before death, what did she say: I am collecting two pieces of wood. When she was collecting two pieces of wood, she was seeking the cross. But should a prophet of God requesting food be excused? Where is the command the Lord had said to Elijah: I have commanded a widow to feed you? If she had the command, she should have recognized him coming and said: Lord, come, eat, for the Lord has already commanded me about you to prepare a place for you and to give from what I do not have so that I may have for you. But she did not say this; you heard what she said: I have only enough for myself and my children to consume and die. And he said: Go and make a small loaf and bring it to me first. For the Lord said that until the rain falls on the earth, neither that flour nor oil will run out. The entire patrimony of the widow was a small amount of flour and a small amount of oil. But not any opulent estate compared to the small jar hanging on a pole: for whatever the estate was, at that time it was thirsty, but that jar did not run out. She immediately believed, went and did, and took on the feeding of the man of God. This is what the Lord had said: I have commanded. What is "I have commanded"? I have prepared the will for faith. Thanks to His mercy, for the will is prepared by the Lord.

SERMON 136/C

I. Unusquisque bonus Christianus non veritas suffocat, qua supra dicti dictum levat errorem, quam tuam expositam audivit, dictumque es." FROM ABOVE. OF AURELIUS AUGUSTINE The works which Christ now performs in hearts. The works of our Lord Jesus Christ that He did then in bodies, He now does in hearts, although in many bodies He by no means ceases to do so, but what He does in hearts is greater. For if it is great to see the light of the sky, how much greater is it to see the light of God! For this purpose, the eyes of the heart are healed, for this purpose they are opened, for this purpose they are cleansed, so that they may see the light, which is God. For God is light, says the Scripture, and there is no darkness in Him, and the Lord in the Gospel: Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God. Therefore, we who marvel at this blind man and see, let us push onward, as much as we can, with the healing and cleansing of our hearts, God granting it. Let our conduct be good, and our hearts will be cleansed. For what does it profit to be cleansed from sins in the holy font and immediately to be defiled by the worst habits?

Concerning the order of the work of the Lord in which the blind man was enlightened. The very order of this work of the Lord by which the blind man was illuminated prompts us to behold something great and necessary. For the Lord Jesus Christ could have— and who is there to say He couldn't?—touched his eyes without spittle and clay, and instantly restored or rather bestowed sight upon him. He could have done this. Why do I say: if He had touched him with His hand? What could He not accomplish by a mere command? What can the Word not accomplish by a command? For it is not just any word, but the Word that was in the beginning, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. This Word in the beginning, God with God, was made flesh to dwell among us. The Word therefore walked clothed in flesh. And the flesh was visible, the Word was hidden. But this Word, to come in the flesh, many prophets before, as His heralds, foretold in His Spirit and in truth. Many came before saying: Behold, He will come, and He will come such that in Him the remission of sins will be. Behold, He will come in many ways, in many figures, in many types of sacrifices, in many veils of mysteries. All they were proclaiming was: Behold, He will come. After He came, immediately the friend of the bridegroom from the water: Behold the Lamb of God, behold Him who takes away the sin of the world; He who was promised to come, of whom Moses wrote, whose Law and Prophets bear witness. For whom the temple was sanctified and built, whose blood was prefigured in the sacrifices of the priests. Behold the Lamb of God, behold Him who takes away the sins of the world. Therefore the Lord also preserved the order in healing this man born blind, in which the blind human race was symbolized, thus illuminating this man. He spat on the ground and made clay, and anointed his eyes with the spittle. The earth signifies the Prophets. For indeed this was established as earth, for what are the Prophets but earth? Men, namely made from earth, received the Spirit of the Lord and anointed the people of God. They held prophecy, but did not yet see. In Christ, all prophecy is fulfilled. But see to where he was sent, to wash his face: to the pool of Siloam. What is Siloam? Appropriately, the Evangelist did not remain silent: which is interpreted as sent. Who is sent if not the one who continually says: The Father who sent me? Who is sent if not the one of whom it is said: Behold the Lamb of God? In him the face is washed, and the anointed one sees, because in the Lord Christ every prophecy is fulfilled. He who does not recognize Christ walks anointed. And if perchance he reads the Prophet, he is a Jew. Why do you read the Prophet? Go to Siloam to see him and recognize whose saliva you carry in your eyes. Moreover, this order which preceded in the eyes of this man was also observed in his heart. Observe how the Jews questioned him. You, what do you say about this man? He said: I say that he is a prophet. He had not yet washed the face of his heart in Siloam. Indeed, his eyes were already open, but his heart was anointed, when he had washed his face. He responded as he could, as one anointed but not yet seeing. He defended the anointing, that is, of his heart, but the eyes of his body were already open. And God hears sinners.

He also said something as if anointed yet not seeing: We know that God does not listen to sinners. If this were true, the Publican would have struck his breast in vain, but since he was anointed yet not seeing, let us excuse him. For God does indeed listen to sinners. They are the orphans, the humble, the poor. Judge, he says, the orphan and the needy, justify the humble and the poor. He was humble and poor who did not dare to lift his eyes to heaven. He struck his breast, saying: Lord, be merciful to me, a sinner. And he went down justified who said: Be merciful to me, a sinner. Does God certainly not listen to sinners? What is an orphan, if not still a little one in faith? For "orphan" is a diminutive word: pupus, pupulus, pupillus. For when he grows and begins to reach puberty, he is no longer an orphan but is now called an adult. When he reaches the age of twenty-five, he is now termed legitimate. What shall we say, brothers? If we consider the greatness of the holy angels, are we not orphans placed on earth? But someone says: How are we orphans, who even if little ones still cry out: Our Father who art in heaven? This is because we are spiritually orphans, not carnally. Carnally, an orphan is one whose father is dead; spiritually, an orphan, whose Father is hidden. We will no longer be orphans when we see our Father.

He has faith who sees with the heart.

Therefore, he now with open eyes, though still anointed in heart, when he washed his face, we find. The angry Jews, conquered and convicted, and the blind raging at the one who sees, cast him out. When he was cast out, then he entered into where the Jews who were placed in the house of God could not cast him out. Therefore, being cast out, he found the Lord in the temple and said to Him—of course, recognizing Him by whom he had been enlightened physically, it remained that he be enlightened in heart. Now he washes the face of his heart, now he comes to Siloam, because now he understands the Only-Begotten sent. “Do you believe,” He said, “in the Son of God?” And he replied, "Who is He, Lord, that I might believe in Him?” as if still anointed and not yet seeing. And the Lord said, “You have both seen Him and it is He who speaks with you.” To give these words is to wash the face. Finally, with his face now washed, seeing in heart, he said, “I believe, Lord,” and he worshipped Him prostrate. Turned to the Lord...

Sermons - Sermon 137

SERMO 137 In the Gospel of John (10:1-16):

1. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that entereth not by the door into the sheepfold, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber.

2. But he that entereth in by the door is the shepherd of the sheep.

3. To him the porter openeth; and the sheep hear his voice: and he calleth his own sheep by name, and leadeth them out.

4. And when he putteth forth his own sheep, he goeth before them, and the sheep follow him: for they know his voice.

5. And a stranger will they not follow, but will flee from him: for they know not the voice of strangers.

6. This parable spake Jesus unto them: but they understood not what things they were which he spake unto them.

7. Then said Jesus unto them again, Verily, verily, I say unto you, I am the door of the sheep.

8. All that ever came before me are thieves and robbers: but the sheep did not hear them.

9. I am the door: by me if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in and out, and find pasture.

10. The thief cometh not, but for to steal, and to kill, and to destroy: I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly.

11. I am the good shepherd: the good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep.

12. But he that is an hireling, and not the shepherd, whose own the sheep are not, seeth the wolf coming, and leaveth the sheep, and fleeth: and the wolf catcheth them, and scattereth the sheep.

13. The hireling fleeth, because he is an hireling, and careth not for the sheep.

14. I am the good shepherd, and know my sheep, and am known of mine.

15. As the Father knoweth me, even so know I the Father: and I lay down my life for the sheep.

16. And other sheep I have, which are not of this fold: them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and there shall be one fold, and one shepherd."

Concerning the Shepherd, and the Hired Hand, and the Thief Health of the members in unity and charity. Your faith, beloved ones, is not ignorant, and we know that you have thus learned, taught by the Teacher from heaven, in whom you have placed your hope, because our Lord Jesus Christ, who has already suffered for us and has risen, is the head of the Church, and the Church is His body, and in His body the unity of the members and the bond of charity exists, just as health exists. However, whoever grows cold in charity becomes weak in the body of Christ. But He who has already exalted our head is able to heal even weak members: provided they are not cut off by excessive impiety, but adhere to the body until they are healed. For anything that still adheres to the body is not in despair of health; but anything that has been cut off can neither be cured nor healed. Therefore, as He is the head of the Church, and the Church is His body, the whole Christ is both head and body. He has already risen. Therefore, we have our head in heaven. Our head intercedes for us. Our head, without sin and without death, already reconciles God for our sins; so that we too, rising at the end, and transformed into heavenly glory, may follow our head. For where the head goes, so do the other members. But while we are here, we are members; let us not despair, for we will follow our head. The unity of Christ and the members. For see, brothers, the love of our Head. He is already in heaven and labors here as long as the Church labors here. Here Christ hungers, here He thirsts, He is naked, He is a guest, He is sick, He is in prison. For whatever His body endures here, He said He endures: and in the end, separating His body itself to the right, and those who now trample upon Him to the left, He will say to those on the right: Come, blessed of My Father, receive the kingdom prepared for you from the beginning of the world. By what merits? For I was hungry, and you gave Me to eat; and He continues with the rest as though He received it Himself: to the extent that those not understanding will answer and say: Lord, when did we see You hungry, a stranger, and in prison? And He says to them: When you did it to one of the least of My brethren, you did it to Me. Likewise in our body, the head is above, the feet are on the earth: yet in some crowding and compression of people, when someone steps on your foot, does the head not say: You are stepping on me? No one has stepped on your head, nor touched your tongue: it is above, it is safe, nothing harmful has happened to it; and yet because of the connection of love, there is unity from the head to the feet, the tongue has not separated itself, but said: You are stepping on me; even though no one has touched it. Likewise then how the tongue, which no one touched, says: You are stepping on me; so Christ the Head, whom no one steps on, said: I was hungry, and you gave Me to eat. And to those who did not do this, He said: I was hungry, and you did not give Me to eat. And how did He conclude? Thus: Those will go into eternal fire, but the righteous into eternal life.

Christ is the door. Peter, weak and unknown to himself. So when the Lord spoke now, He said He was the shepherd, He said He was also the door. You have both there; and: I am the door; and: I am the shepherd. The door is in the head, the shepherd in the body. For He says to Peter, in whom alone He forms the Church: Peter, do you love me? He responded: Lord, I love you. Feed my sheep. And for the third time: Peter, do you love me? Peter was grieved because He asked him the third time: as if He who saw the conscience of the denier, did not see the faith of the confessor. He always knew him, He knew him even when Peter himself did not know himself. For then he did not know himself, when he said: I will be with you until death; and he did not know how weak he was. Just as it often truly happens to the sick that the patient does not know what is happening to him, but the doctor does; while the patient endures the illness itself, the doctor does not endure it. The doctor speaks more about what is happening in another, than the one who is sick about what is happening in himself. Peter, therefore, was then sick, but the Lord was the doctor. The former said he had strength, which he did not have; but the latter, touching the vein of his heart, said that he would deny Him three times. And it happened just as the doctor predicted, not as the patient presumed. Therefore, after His resurrection, the Lord asked him, not ignorant of the state of his mind regarding his confession of the love of Christ, but so that by a threefold confession of love, He might erase the threefold denial of fear.

What is required of Peter. To enter through the gate into the sheepfold.

Therefore, this is what the Lord requires of Peter: Peter, do you love me? As if to say: What will you give me, what will you offer me because you love me? What was Peter to offer the risen Lord, who ascended into heaven and sits at the right hand of the Father? As if he said: This you will give me, this you will offer me if you love me, that you feed my sheep; enter through the gate, do not ascend by another way. You have heard, when the Gospel was read: He who enters by the gate is the shepherd; but he who climbs in by another way is a thief and a robber; he seeks to scatter, to disperse, and to take away. Who is it that enters by the gate? He who enters through Christ. Who is this? He who imitates the suffering of Christ, who recognizes the humility of Christ; and although God became man for us, he recognizes that he was not God, but a man. For he who wants to appear as God, although being a man, does not imitate him, who, although being God, became man. But to you it is not said: Be something less than you are; but: Know what you are. Know yourself infirm, know yourself as man, know yourself as a sinner; know that he justifies, know that you are stained. Let your heart's stain appear in your confession, and you belong to the flock of Christ. Because the confession of sins calls for the healing physician; as in sickness, he who says: I am well, does not seek the physician. Did not the Pharisee and the Publican ascend to the temple? The former boasted of his own health, the latter showed his wounds to the physician. For the former said: God, I thank you that I am not like this Publican. He boasted against the other. Therefore, if that Publican were healthy, the Pharisee would have envied him; because he would not have had anyone over whom to exalt himself. How then did he come, who was so envious? Surely he was not healthy: and since he said he was healthy, he did not come down healed. But that one, lowering his eyes to the ground, not daring to lift them to heaven, struck his chest, saying: God, be merciful to me, a sinner. And what does the Lord say? Amen I say unto you, the Publican descended from the temple justified, rather than the Pharisee: because everyone who exalts himself shall be humbled; and he who humbles himself shall be exalted. Therefore, those who exalt themselves want to ascend to the sheepfold by another way: but those who humble themselves enter through the gate to the sheepfold. Hence he said about the latter: he enters; about the other: he ascends. He who ascends, you see, he who seeks high things, does not enter, but falls. But he who submits himself to enter through the gate, does not fall, but is a shepherd.

Three persons coming to the sheepfold: the shepherd, the thief, the hired hand. The shepherd is to be loved, the hired hand tolerated, the thief to be avoided. But the Lord mentioned three persons, and we must investigate them in the Gospel: the shepherd, the hireling, and the thief. When it was read, I think you noticed, He designates the shepherd, He designates the hireling, He designates the thief. He said the shepherd lays down his life for the sheep and enters through the gate. He called the thief and the robber climbing over another way. The hireling, he said, sees the wolf or even the thief and flees; because he does not care for the sheep: for the hireling is not a shepherd. He enters through the gate because he is the shepherd; he climbs over another way because he is the thief; he, seeing those who want to take the sheep, fears and flees, because he is a hireling, because he does not care for the sheep; for he is a hireling. If we find these three persons, Your Holiness has found those whom you should love, tolerate, and beware of. The shepherd must be loved, the hireling tolerated, the robber avoided. There are people in the Church, of whom the Apostle says, who preach out of selfish ambition, seeking their own gain from men, whether monetary, or honors or human praise. They preach to receive gifts in any way, and they do not so much seek the salvation of those to whom they announce, as their own profit. However, if one who hears salvation from someone who lacks salvation believes in Him whom he announces, and does not place hope in him through whom salvation is announced: the announcer will suffer loss; the one to whom it is announced will gain. The saying of Christ against the Pharisees, to be directed also to the bad pastors of the Church. The Church, one from Jews and Gentiles.

You have the Lord speaking of the Pharisees: They sit on Moses' seat. The Lord was not signifying them alone: as if truly those who believed in Christ would be sent to the school of the Jews, to learn there the way to the kingdom of heaven. Did not the Lord come, therefore, to establish the Church and to separate the good-believing, good-hoping, and good-loving Jews as wheat from chaff, and to make one wall of the circumcision, to which another wall of the uncircumcised Gentiles would be joined, which two walls coming from different directions would have Him as the cornerstone? Thus the same Lord spoke of these two peoples to be one: I have other sheep that are not of this fold. He was speaking to the Jews: I must bring them also, so there shall be one flock, and one shepherd. Hence there were two ships, from which He called the disciples. These two peoples were signified when they cast the nets and gathered such a large number of fish that the nets were almost breaking: And they loaded, it says, two ships. Two ships symbolized one Church, but made from two peoples, united in Christ, although coming from different places. This is also signified by the two wives of one husband Jacob, Leah, and Rachel. These two are also signified by the two blind men sitting by the way whom the Lord enlightened. And if you observe the Scriptures, you will find in many places the two Churches signified, which are not two but one. For the cornerstone's worth is that from two it makes one. That shepherd's worth is that from two flocks he makes one. Therefore, the Lord, teaching the Church and having His school beyond the Jews, as we see now, was He truly to send believers in Him to the Jews to learn? But by the name of Pharisees and Scribes, He signified some in His Church who would say and not do: He Himself had prefigured Himself in the person of Moses. For indeed Moses bore his person, and he would place a veil before himself when speaking to the people; because as long as they in the Law were devoted to carnal joys and pleasures and sought an earthly kingdom, a veil was placed before them so they might not see Christ in the Scriptures. With the veil removed, after the Lord suffered, the secrets of the temple were seen. Therefore, when He hung on the cross, the veil of the temple was torn from top to bottom; and the apostle Paul openly says: When you turn to Christ, the veil is removed. But whoever does not turn to Christ, though he reads Moses, a veil is placed upon his heart, as the Apostle says. Therefore, prefiguring certain people to be like this in His Church, what does the Lord say? The Scribes and the Pharisees sit on Moses' seat; do what they say, but do not do what they do.

Clerics striving to pervert the Gospel, while by their example draw the laity to sin. When evil clerics hear what is said about them, they want to pervert it. For I have heard that some desire to pervert this statement. If it were allowed to them, would they not erase it from the Gospel? Because indeed they cannot erase it, they seek to pervert it. But the grace and mercy of the Lord are present and do not allow them to do so; for He has surrounded all His statements with His truth and delivered them; so that anyone who wishes to cut something from Scripture, or to introduce something by misreading or misinterpreting, he who has a heart will join what has been cut from Scripture to Scripture and read what goes before or after, and he will find the sense that the one who misinterpreted wished to distort. Therefore, what do you think they say about those of whom it is said: Do what they say? Because indeed it is said to the laity. For a layperson who wishes to live well, when he notices an evil cleric, what does he say to himself? The Lord said: Do what they say; but do not do what they do. I will walk the way of the Lord, I will not follow this one's habits. I will listen to him, not his words, but God's. I will follow God, let him follow his own greed. Because if I were to defend myself before God by saying: Lord, I saw that cleric of yours living badly, and therefore I lived badly; would He not say to me: Wicked servant; had you not heard from Me: Do what they say; but do not do what they do? But an evil layperson, a non-believer, not belonging to the flock of Christ, not belonging to the grain of Christ, who is tolerated like chaff on the threshing floor, what does he say to himself, when he begins to argue against the word of God? Get out: what do you speak to me? Those bishops, those clerics do not do it, and you force me to do it? He does not seek an advocate for a bad cause, but a companion for punishment. For never will he be defended by that one in the day of judgment, whoever he might have wished to imitate among the wicked. For just as the devil leads all whom he deceives, not to reign with them, but to be damned with them; so all who follow the wicked, seek companions for themselves to hell, not advocates to the kingdom of heaven. A perverse interpretation of the Gospel.

How then do these people pervert this statement when it is said to those living wickedly: "It was rightly said by the Lord: What they say, do; but do not do what they do"? They rightly said, "For it is said to you that what we say, you should do; but what we do, you should not do. For we offer a sacrifice, you are not permitted to do it." See the cunning of people: what can I say? mercenaries. For if they were shepherds, they would not say these things. Therefore the Lord, to shut their mouth, followed and said: "They sit on Moses' seat; what they say, do; but do not do what they do, for they say and do not do." What therefore, brothers? If he were speaking about offering sacrifices, would he say: "For they say and do not do"? For they do the sacrifice, they offer it to God. What is it that they say and do not do? Hear what follows: "For they bind heavy and unbearable burdens, and lay them on men's shoulders, but they themselves are not willing to move them with a finger." He openly reproached, described, and showed it. But when they want to thus pervert a statement, they show that they seek nothing in the Church except their own advantages; nor have they read the Gospel: for if they knew this very page, and had read it entirely, they would never dare to say this.

Bad shepherds are in the Church similar to the Pharisees. Pastor, who is a hireling, who is chaste. Chaste wife. But listen more attentively, because the Church has such people. Lest anyone say to us: He spoke solely about the Pharisees, about the Scribes, about the Jews; for the Church does not have such people. Who then are those about whom the Lord says: "Not everyone who says to me: Lord, Lord, will enter the kingdom of heaven"? And he adds: "Many will say to me on that day: Lord, Lord, did we not prophesy in your name, and in your name perform many wonders, and in your name eat and drink?" Are Jews doing these things in the name of Christ? Surely it is clear that he speaks about those who bear the name of Christ. But what follows? "Then I will declare to them: I never knew you. Depart from me, all you workers of iniquity." Listen to the Apostle lamenting over such people. He says some preach the Gospel out of love, others out of selfish ambition; of whom he says: "They preach the Gospel not sincerely." The matter itself is right, but they themselves are not right. What they preach is right; but those who preach it are not right. Why are they not right? Because they seek something else in the Church, not God. If they sought God, they would be chaste; because the soul has God as its legitimate spouse. Whoever seeks anything from God outside of God does not seek God chastely. See, brothers; if a wife loves her husband because he is rich, she is not chaste. For she does not love her husband, but the gold of her husband. But if she loves her husband, she loves him even if he is naked and poor. For if she loves him for wealth; what happens if (as human events go) he is dispossessed and suddenly remains poor? Perhaps she would renounce him; because what she loved was not the husband, but his wealth. But if she truly loves her husband, she loves him more as a poor man; because she loves with compassion.

God must be sought chastely. And yet, brothers, our God can never be poor. He is rich, He made everything, heaven and earth, sea and Angels. Whatever we see, whatever we do not see in heaven, He made. But nevertheless, we should not love riches, but Him who made them. For He promised you nothing but Himself. Find something more precious, and He will give it to you. The earth is beautiful, the heaven and Angels are beautiful, but more beautiful is He who made these. Therefore, those who proclaim God, loving God; those who proclaim God, for the sake of God, feed the sheep, and are not hirelings. Our Lord Jesus Christ required this very chastity from the soul when He said to Peter: Peter, do you love me? What is: Do you love me? Are you chaste? Is your heart not adulterous? Do you not seek your own things in the Church, but mine? If therefore you are such, and you love me, feed my sheep. For you will not be a hireling, but you will be a shepherd.

Hired workers how useful. Shepherds are few, hired workers many. But those who do not preach chastely, about whom the Apostle laments. But what does he say? So what? As long as, in every way, whether for a pretext or in truth, Christ is preached. Therefore, he allowed there to be hired hands. The shepherd preaches Christ in truth, the hired hand preaches Christ for a pretext, seeking something else. Nonetheless, both preach Christ, and both preach Christ. Listen to the voice of the shepherd Paul: whether in pretense or in truth, Christ is preached. The shepherd himself wanted to have the hired hand. They do what they can, they are useful as far as they can be. But when the Apostle sought out other purposes, for the weak to imitate his ways: I sent to you, he says, Timothy, who will remind you of my ways. And what does he say? I sent a shepherd to remind you of my ways; that is, who walks just as I walk. And sending the shepherd, what does he say? For I have no one of like mind, who will genuinely care for you. Were there not many with him? But what follows? For all seek their own, not the things of Jesus Christ; that is: I wished to send you a shepherd; for there are many hired hands, but it was not fitting to send a hired hand. For performing other tasks and businesses, the hired hand is sent: but for those tasks which Paul then desired, a shepherd was necessary. And he scarcely found one shepherd among many hired hands: because there are few shepherds, many hired hands. But what is said of the hired hands? Truly, I say to you, they have received their reward. But what does the Apostle say of the shepherd? Whoever purifies himself from such things will be a vessel unto honor, sanctified, useful to the Lord, prepared for every good work. Not prepared for some tasks, and unprepared for others; but prepared for every good work. These things I have said about the shepherds. The fleeing hireling, Donatists, wolves, and robbers. But now we will speak about the hired hands. The hired hand, when he sees the wolf lying in wait for the sheep, flees. The Lord said this. Why? Because he does not care for the sheep. Therefore, the hired hand is useful only as long as he does not see the wolf, as long as he does not see the thief and robber; but when he sees them, he flees. And who among the hired hands does not flee from the Church when he sees the wolf and the robber? Wolves are abundant, robbers are abundant. They are the ones who climb up by another way. Who are these who climb up? Those who, from the party of Donatus, wish to plunder the sheep of Christ, they climb up by another way. They do not enter through Christ: because they are not humble. Because they are proud, they climb up. What does it mean: they climb up? They are exalted. From where do they climb up? By another way: from where they wish to be called of a party. Those who are not in unity, are of the other party, and they climb up from that very party, that is, they are exalted, and they wish to steal the sheep. See how they climb up. They say, "We sanctify, we justify, we make people righteous." See where they have climbed up. But he who exalts himself will be humbled. The Lord our God is able to humble them. But the wolf is the devil: he lies in wait to deceive, and those who follow him; for it has been said, that dressed in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ravenous wolves. If the hired hand sees someone speaking depraved things, or having harmful thoughts for their soul, or doing something wicked and obscene, and because he seems to have some significant role in the Church, from which the hired hand hopes for benefits, and when he sees the person dying in sin, he sees them following the wolf, he sees their throat being dragged by the bite to punishment; he does not tell them: "You sin"; he does not rebuke them, lest he lose his benefits. Therefore, this is: When he sees the wolf, he flees; he does not say to them: "You commit a crime." This is not a flight of the body, but of the soul. The one whom you see standing in body, flees in spirit when he sees the sinner, and does not tell him: "You sin"; and even takes counsel with him.

How can a grape be gathered from thorns? My brothers, does not a presbyter or bishop sometimes ascend and say nothing from a higher place except not to steal others' goods, not to commit fraud, not to commit crimes? They cannot say otherwise, who sit on the chair of Moses, and it speaks of them, not they of it. What then is this: Do they gather grapes from thorns or figs from thistles? and: Every tree is known by its fruit? Can a Pharisee speak good things? A Pharisee is a thorn: how do I read a grape from a thorn? Because you, Lord, have said: What they say, do; but what they do, do not do. Do you command me to pluck a grape from thorns, when you have said: Do they gather grapes from thorns? The Lord answers you: I did not command you to gather a grape from thorns; but observe, pay close attention, lest perhaps, as it often happens, the vine, as it wanders over the ground, gets entwined in thorns. For we sometimes find this, my brothers, a vine placed over a fig tree, because it has a thorny hedge there, it extends its tendrils, and it inserts itself into the thorny hedge, and a cluster hangs among the thorns; and he who sees the cluster plucks it, not from the thorns, but from the vine, which is intertwined with the thorns. So then they are thorny; but sitting in the chair of Moses, the vine entwines them, and clusters hang from them, that is, good words, good precepts. You pluck the grape, the thorn does not sting you, when you read: What they say, do; but what they do, do not do. However, the thorn stings you, if you do what they do. Therefore, to pluck the grape and not cling to the thorns: What they say, do; but what they do, do not do. Their deeds are thorns, their words are grapes, but from the vine, that is, from the chair of Moses.

Hired men fleeing, while they favor the wicked. Augustine is not a hired man.

Therefore, they flee when they see the wolf, when they see the thief. However, I began to say this because from a higher place they cannot say anything except: Do good, do not swear falsely, do not defraud, do not deceive anyone. But sometimes they live in such a way that advice is sought from the bishop about taking someone else's estate, and such advice is requested from him. This sometimes happens to us, and we say it having experienced it: for we would not believe it otherwise. Many people seek bad advice from us, advice to lie, to deceive; thinking they are pleasing us. But in the name of Christ, if the Lord wills what we say, none such has tempted us and found in us what they wanted. Because if He who called us wills it, we are shepherds, not hirelings. But what does the Apostle say? "It means little to me that I am judged by you or by a human day; but neither do I judge myself. For I am not aware of anything against myself, yet I am not thereby justified. The one who judges me is the Lord." Therefore, my conscience is not good because you praise it. For what do you praise, what you do not see? Let him praise who sees; let him also correct, if he sees anything there that offends his eyes. For we do not profess to be perfectly healthy; but we beat our chest and say to God: Be merciful, that I may not sin. Yet I think, as I speak before Him, seeking nothing else from you but your salvation; and we often groan in the sins of our brethren, and we suffer deeply, and we are tortured in spirit, and sometimes we rebuke them; indeed, we never fail to rebuke them. All who remember what I say are witnesses as to how often the sinful brethren have been rebuked by us, and sternly rebuked.

Concerning the sheep, an account which the shepherd must render.

I am now considering our counsel with Your Holiness. In the name of Christ, you are the people of God, you are the catholic people, you are members of Christ: you are not divided from unity. You communicate with the members of the Apostles, you communicate with the memories of the holy martyrs, spread throughout the earth, and you belong to our care, that we might give a good account of you. However, our whole reason, which it is, you know. Lord, you know that I have spoken, you know that I have not been silent, you know with what mind I have spoken, you know that I have wept to you, when I spoke, and was not heard. This, I think, is our whole reason. For the Holy Spirit made us secure through the prophet Ezekiel. You know that reading about the watchman: Son of man, he says, I have appointed you as a watchman for the house of Israel; if, when I say to the impious: Impious, you shall die by death, you do not say it; this is, therefore, why I tell you to say; if you do not announce: And the sword comes, and takes him away, that is, what I have threatened to the sinner; indeed, that impious one will die in his impiety, but I will require his blood from the hand of the watchman. Why? Because he did not speak: But if the watchman sees the sword coming, and blows the trumpet, so that he may flee; and he does not take heed; that is, he does not correct himself, so that he is not found in the punishment that God threatens; and the sword comes, and takes someone; indeed, that impious one died in his iniquity: But you, he says, have delivered your soul. And in that place of the Gospel, what else does he say to the servant? When he said: Lord, I knew you were a harsh or hard man, because you reap where you did not sow, and gather where you did not scatter; and fearing, I went and hid your talent in the earth: behold, you have what is yours. And he says: Wicked and lazy servant, because you knew I was harsh and hard, reaping where I did not sow, and gathering where I did not scatter, my very greed should have taught you that I seek profit from my money. Therefore, it was fitting for you to give my money to the moneychangers, and I, coming, would have collected what is mine with interest. Did it say: To give and to collect? Therefore, brothers, we give; he will come who collects. Pray, that he may find us prepared.

Sermons - Sermon 138

SERMO 138 OF THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL OF JOHN (10:11-16):

"I am the good shepherd," etc.

AGAINST THE DONATISTS The good shepherd, why praised in the singular?

We have heard the Lord Jesus commending to us the duty of the good shepherd. In this commendation, he indeed admonished us, as it is given to understand, to be good shepherds. And yet, so that the multitude of shepherds would not be understood in a perverse way, he said: "I am the good shepherd." And he subsequently showed from where he is the good shepherd: "The good shepherd," he said, "lays down his life for the sheep. But the hireling, and he who is not a shepherd, sees the wolf coming, and flees: because he does not care for the sheep; for he is a hireling." Therefore, the good shepherd is Christ. What about Peter? Was he not a good shepherd? Did he not also lay down his life for the sheep? What about Paul? What about the other Apostles? What about the blessed bishops and martyrs following them? What about this holy Cyprian himself? Were they not all good shepherds; not hirelings, of whom it is said: "Truly I tell you, they have received their reward?" Therefore, all these were good shepherds, not only because they shed their blood, but because they shed it for the sheep. For they did not shed it out of pride, but out of love.

Martyrdom without charity profits nothing. For even among heretics, who, on account of their iniquities and errors, have suffered some troubles, boast themselves in the name of martyrdom, so that, cloaked in this mantle, they deceive more easily, for they are wolves. But if you want to know in what number they should be counted, listen to the good shepherd, the apostle Paul; for not all who deliver their bodies to suffering, even to fires, are to be considered as having shed their blood for the sheep, but rather against the sheep. If I speak, he says, in the tongues of men and of Angels, but do not have charity, I have become like a sounding brass or a clanging cymbal. If I understand all mysteries, and have all prophecy, and all faith, so as to move mountains, but do not have charity, I am nothing. Therefore, great indeed is faith that moves mountains. Those things are indeed great; but if I have them without charity, he says, I am nothing, not those things. But he has not yet touched those who falsely glorify in the name of martyrdom in their sufferings. Listen as he touches them, or rather, pierces them. If I distribute all my goods to the poor, and deliver my body to be burned. Now they are the ones. But see what follows: But do not have charity, it profits me nothing. Behold, it comes to suffering, behold, it comes to the shedding of blood, it comes to the burning of the body; and yet it profits nothing, because charity is lacking. Add charity, and all things profit; take away charity, and the rest profit nothing.

Charity, how great a good.

What a great good is this charity, brothers! What is more precious? What is more luminous? What is firmer? What is more useful? What is more secure? There are many gifts of God, which even the evil possess, who will say: Lord, in your name we prophesied, in your name we cast out demons, in your name we performed many miracles. And he will not respond: You did not do these things. For they will not dare to lie before such a great judge, or boast of what they did not do. But because they did not have charity, he will respond to all of them: I do not know you. How does he have even a little charity, who also, when convicted, does not love unity? Recommending this unity to good shepherds, the Lord did not wish to call many shepherds. For, as I have already said, it is not that Peter, Paul, the other Apostles, and the later holy bishops, and blessed Cyprian were not good shepherds. All these were good shepherds: and yet, to the good shepherds, he did not commend good shepherds, but the good shepherd. I am, he said, the good shepherd.

Peter and others to be good shepherds.

Let us ask the Lord with whatever understanding we have, and with the utmost humility, let us converse with such a master of the house. What do you say, Lord, good shepherd? For you are the good shepherd, who is also the good lamb; the same shepherd and pasture, the same lamb and lion. What do you say? Let us hear, and help us to understand. "I am," he says, "the good shepherd." What about Peter? Either he is not a shepherd, or he is a bad one? Let us see if he is not a shepherd. Do you love me? You said to him, Lord: Do you love me? And he responded: I do. And you said to him: Feed my sheep. You, you, Lord, by your questioning, with the assurance of your word, made the lover a shepherd. Therefore, he is a shepherd, to whom you entrusted the feeding of your sheep. You entrusted it to him, he is a shepherd. Let us now see whether he is not good. We discover this from his very questioning and response. You asked if he loved you: he responded: I do. You saw his heart, for he answered truthfully. Therefore, is he not good, who loves such goodness? Whence came that answer brought forth from his innermost depths? Whence that Peter, bearing your witnesses in his heart, being sorrowful that you asked him not only once, but again and a third time, so that with the threefold confession of love, he might erase the threefold sin of denial; whence therefore, being sorrowful, because he was often questioned by him who knew what he was asking, and had forgiven what he heard; whence being sorrowful, he brought forth such words: Lord, you know everything, you yourself know that I love you? Thus he, confessing such things, nay, proclaiming them, would he lie? Therefore he truthfully responded your love, and brought forth from the innermost heart the voice of one who loves. But you said: A good man from the good treasure of his heart brings forth good things. Therefore, both a shepherd and a good shepherd; indeed nothing compares to the power and goodness of the shepherd of shepherds; but yet he also is a shepherd and a good one; and others like him are good shepherds.

There is however one good shepherd, Christ.

What is it, therefore, that you commend one shepherd to good shepherds, except that you teach unity in one shepherd? And the Lord himself explains more clearly through our ministry, recalling from the Gospel to your Charity and saying: Hear what I have commended: I am the good shepherd, I said, because all the rest, all the good shepherds are my members. One head, one body, one Christ. Therefore, the shepherd of shepherds, and the shepherds of the shepherd, and the sheep with the shepherds under the shepherd. What are these, except that the Apostle says: For as the body is one, and has many members; all the members, though many, are one body; so also is Christ? Therefore, if so also is Christ, rightly Christ having in himself all good shepherds, commends one saying: I am the good shepherd. I am, I am one, with me all in unity are one. Whoever feeds outside me, feeds against me. Whoever does not gather with me, scatters.

Therefore, hear the unity itself more vigorously commended: I have, he says, other sheep that are not of this fold. For he was speaking at first of the fold of the flesh of Israel. But there were others of the fold of the faith of Israel itself, and there were still outsiders, among the Gentiles, predestined, not yet gathered. He knew them who had predestined them; he knew them who had come to redeem them by shedding his blood. He saw them, not yet seeing him; he knew them, not yet believing in him. I have, he says, other sheep that are not of this fold; because they are not of the flesh of Israel. But yet they will not be outside this fold, because it is necessary for me to bring them, so that there may be one flock and one shepherd. The bride's affection for Christ.

Rightly, to this shepherd of shepherds, his beloved, his bride, his beautiful one—but made beautiful by him, earlier made foul by sins, later made beautiful by indulgence and grace—she speaks, loving and burning for him, and says to him: "Where do you graze?" And see how, with what emotion, this spiritual love is stirred. Much better indeed are they delighted by this affection who have tasted something of the sweetness of this love. They hear this well who love Christ. For in them and of them the Church sings in the Song of Songs: those who love Christ, as though foul and yet solely beautiful. For we saw him, it says, and he had no form or comeliness. Such he appeared on the cross, such he showed himself crowned with thorns, foul and without comeliness, as though having lost his power; as though not the Son of God. Such he seemed to the blind. Isaiah indeed spoke this of the Jews: We saw him, and he had no form or comeliness. When it was said: If he is the Son of God, let him come down from the cross. He saved others, he cannot save himself. And striking him with a reed on the head: Prophesy to us, Christ, who struck you? Because he had no form or comeliness. Such, Jews, did you see. Because blindness has occurred in part to Israel until the fullness of the Gentiles has come in, until the other sheep come. Because therefore blindness has occurred, hence you saw the beautiful without beauty. For if you had known, never would you have crucified the Lord of glory. Yet you did so, because you did not know. And yet he who endured you as though foul, for you prayed as beautiful: Father, he said, forgive them, for they know not what they do. For if without comeliness, what is it that this one loves, who says: Announce to me, whom my soul loves? What is it that she loves? What is it that burns, what is it that so greatly fears to be separated from him? What is it that so delights in him, for whom the only punishment is to be without him? What would there be to love, unless he were beautiful? But how could she love so, if he appeared to her as he did to the blind persecutors who did not know what they did? What kind then did she love? Beautiful in form beyond the sons of men. Beautiful in form beyond the sons of men, grace is poured on your lips. Therefore, from your own lips announce to me, whom my soul loves. Announce to me, she says, O whom my soul, not my flesh, but my soul, loves. Announce to me where you graze, where you lie at midday; lest perhaps I become as one who covers herself over your companions' flocks.

How the words of the bride are to be understood.

It seems obscure, it is obscure because it is the mystery of the sacred chambers. For she herself says: The king brought me into his chamber. Such is the secret of this chamber. But you, who are not profane from this chamber, listen to what you are and say with her, if you love with her; and you love with her if you are in her. All say, yet let one speak because unity speaks: Announce to me, whom my soul has loved. For to them in God was one soul and one heart. Announce to me where you pasture, where you lie down at midday. What does midday signify? Great fervor and great splendor. Therefore let me know who are your wise ones, fervent in spirit and brilliant in doctrine. Make your right hand known to me, and those educated in wisdom of heart. Let me cling to them in your body, join with them, enjoy you with them. So tell me: Announce to me where you pasture, where you lie down at midday, so that I do not encounter those who speak different things about you, think different things about you, believe different things about you, preach different things about you; and have their own flocks and your companions they are; because they live from your table, and they handle the Sacraments of your table. For they are called companions, because they eat together, as if eating together. Such are reproached in the Psalm: For if my enemy had spoken great things against me, I would indeed have hidden from him, and if he who hated me had spoken great things against me, I would indeed have hidden from him. But you, my unanimous one, my leader, and my familiar friend, who took sweet foods with me, we walked together in the house of God with consensus. Why now against the house of the Lord with dissension, unless because they went out from us, but were not of us? Therefore, O you whom my soul has loved, let me not fall into such as these, your companions, but such as were the companions of Samson, not keeping faith with a friend, but wanting to corrupt his wife. Therefore, let me not fall into such as these, let me not become over them, that is, fall into them, as if hidden, as if veiled and obscure, not as if established on a mountain. Therefore, announce to me, O whom my soul has loved, where you pasture, where you lie down at midday; who are wise and faithful, in whom you especially rest: lest perhaps, as if hidden, I encounter flocks, not yours, but of your companions. For you did not say to Peter: Feed your sheep; but: Feed my sheep. The response of the betrothed.

Let the good shepherd, who is more beautiful in form than the sons of men, respond therefore to this beloved one; let him respond to her whom he has made beautiful from among the sons of men. Listen to what he responds, understand; beware of what he warns, love what he advises. What then does he respond? Not tenderly, but he returns severity with kindness. He corrects, to bind, to save. “Unless you know yourself,” he says, “O beautiful among women; for however other women may be beautiful with the gifts of your husband, they are heresies; they are beautiful in adornment, not in substance, they shine outwardly and externally, they whiten themselves with the name of justice: But all the beauty of the daughter of the king is within. Unless therefore you know yourself, because you are one, because you are spread among all nations, because you are chaste, because you should not be corrupted by the perverse conversation of wicked companions. Unless you know yourself, because he rightly betrothed you to present a chaste virgin to Christ; and you rightly present yourself to me, lest by evil conversations, as the serpent deceived Eve by his cunning, so your senses should be corrupted from my chastity. Unless therefore you know yourself as such, go out; go out. For I will say to others: Enter into the joy of your Lord. To you I will not say: Enter; but: Go out; so that you may be among those who went out from us. Go out. But unless you know yourself, then go out. But if you know yourself, enter. But if you do not know yourself, go out in the tracks of the flocks, and feed your kids in the tents of the shepherds. Go out in the tracks, not of the flock, but of the flocks; and feed, not like Peter my sheep, but your kids; in the tents, not of the shepherd, but of the shepherds; not of unity, but of dissension; not set there, where there is one flock and one shepherd. She is confirmed, built up, she has become stronger in love, ready to die for her husband, and to live with her husband. The words of the bride wrongly taken up by the Donatists.

These words which we have recalled from the holy Song of Songs, concerning the epithalamium of the bridegroom and the bride; for these are spiritual nuptials, in which we must live with great chastity; because Christ granted to the Church in spirit what his mother had in the body, to be both mother and virgin; the Donatists therefore take these words according to their own perverse understanding much differently. And just as I will not be silent, and I will briefly remind you what to answer them, with the Lord's help, as much as I can. When we begin to press them with the light of the unity of the Church spread throughout the whole world, and we have asked them to show from the Scriptures any testimony, where God foretold that the Church would be in Africa, as if the other nations were lost; they usually have this testimony in their mouth, and say: Africa is in the south; therefore, they say, the Church asking the Lord where he feeds, where he rests; he responds: In the south, as if the voice of the one asking says: Tell me, whom my soul loves, where you feed, where you rest; and the voice as if responding: In the south, that is, in Africa. If therefore the one who is asking is the Church, and the Lord responds where he feeds, in Africa, because the Church was in Africa: the one asking was not in Africa. He says: Tell me, whom my soul loves, where you feed, where you rest; and he responds to a certain Church besides Africa: In the south, in Africa I rest, in Africa I feed, as if I do not feed you. Moreover, if the one who asks is the Church, about which no one doubts, which even they themselves do not contradict; and they hear something or other about Africa: therefore, the one who asks is besides Africa; and because it is the Church, it is the Church besides Africa. The Donatists are refuted.

Behold, I acknowledge that Africa is in the south; although Egypt is more in the south under the midday sun than Africa. However, there in Egypt, how this shepherd is, those who know recognize; those who do not know, seek how large a flock he gathers there, how much multitude of saints and holy ones he has who utterly despise the world. That flock has grown so much that it even expelled the superstitions from there. So, let me then omit how he has driven out all the idolatrous superstition that was strong there by growing; I accept what you say, O wicked companions; I fully accept and agree that Africa is in the south, and Africa is signified in what is said: Where do you pasture, where do you lie down at midday? But also you equally pay attention that these words are still from the bride, not yet from the groom. The bride still says: Announce to me, whom my soul loves where do you pasture, where do you lie down at midday, lest I become like one who is veiled. Deaf, blind, if you see Africa in the south, why do you not understand the woman in the veiled? Announce to me, she says, whom my soul loves. Surely she speaks to a man when she says: whom she loved. How if she were to say: Announce to me, whom my soul loved; we would understand the groom saying these things to the bride; thus when you hear: Announce to me, whom my soul loves where you pasture, where you lie down; add there, the following words also belong, at midday. I am asking where you pasture at midday, lest I become like one who is veiled over the flocks of your companions. I completely hear, I accept what you understand about Africa; in the south, it is signified. But the Church of Christ, as you understand, speaks to her groom from overseas, fearing to fall into African error. O whom my soul loved, announce to me, teach me. For I hear that in the south, that is, in Africa, there are two parties, indeed many splits. Therefore, announce to me where you pasture, which sheep belong to you, which fold you command me to love there, to which I ought to associate myself. Lest I become like one veiled. For they mock as if hidden, insult as if lost, as if nowhere else existing. So, lest I become as it were veiled, as it were hidden over the flock, that is, over the congregations of heretics, your companions, the Donatists, Maximianists, Rogatists, and other pests gathering outside; and therefore scattering; I ask you, announce to me, if I should seek my shepherd there, that I may not fall into the abyss of rebaptism. I urge you, I implore you by the holiness of such marriages, love this Church, be in such a Church, be such a Church; love the good shepherd, a man so beautiful, deceiving no one, desiring no one to perish. Pray also for the scattered sheep; let them come also, let them recognize also, let them love also; so that there may be one flock and one shepherd. Turned to the Lord...

Sermons - Sermon 139

SERMO 139 On the words of the Gospel of John (10:30):

"I and the Father are one."

Christ, how He is the Only Begotten of God the Father. The Lord God, Jesus Christ, the only Son of God, born of God the Father without any mother, and born of a virgin mother without a human father, you have heard what he said: I and the Father are one. Thus accept this, thus believe it, in order to be worthy of understanding. For faith ought to precede understanding, so that understanding may be the reward of faith. For the prophet spoke most clearly: Unless you believe, you will not understand. Therefore, what is preached simply must be believed; what is subtly disputed must be understood. Hence, first, for the instruction of your minds through faith, we preach to you Christ the only Son of God the Father. Why is it added: Only? Because He whose Only Son receives many sons through grace. Therefore, all the other holy ones are sons of God by grace; He alone is by nature. Those who are sons by grace are not what the Father is. Indeed, none of the saints dared to say what that Only One said: I and the Father are one. Is He not also our Father? If He is not our Father, how do we say in prayer: Our Father who art in heaven? But we are sons whom He has made sons by His will, not by His own nature. He indeed has begotten us, but in the manner in which it is said, adopted, brought forth by the benefit of the adopter, not by nature. Therefore, it is also stated that He called us to the adoption of sons; we are adopted men. He is called the Only Begotten, for He is what the Father is; we, however, are men, and God is the Father. Because He is what the Father is, He said, and truly said: I and the Father are one. What does it mean: we are one? We are one in nature. What does it mean: we are one? We are one in substance. The Son of God and the Father are of one substance.

Perhaps you understand less what "of one substance" means. Let us labor so that you may understand; may God help both me speaking and you listening; me, so that I may say things that are true and suitable for you; and you, above all and especially so that you may believe; then, so that you may understand as much as you can. What then is: "of one substance"? I shall use examples for you, so that what is less understood may become clear by example. Suppose, gold is God, gold is also His Son. If examples from earthly things are not to be given for heavenly things, how is it written: But the rock was Christ? Therefore, whatever the Father is, the Son is also; as I said, for example: Gold is the Father, gold is the Son. For he who says: The Son is not of the same substance as the Father, what else does he say but: The Father is gold, the Son is silver? If the Father is gold, the Son is silver, then the only Son has degenerated from the Father. A man begets a man; of whatever substance the father who begets is, of the same substance is the son who is begotten. What does it mean, "of the same substance"? He is a man, and he is a man; that one has a soul, and this one has a soul; that one has flesh, and this one has flesh; what that one is, this one also is. The objection of the Arians. But the Arian heresy responds to me and says. What does it say to me? Pay attention to what you have said. What did I say? That the son of man is to be compared to the Son of God. Certainly compared: but not, as you think, in propriety; but in likeness. But you, who wish to make anything of this, say. Do you not see, it says, that the father who begot is greater, and the son who was begotten is lesser? How then do you say, tell me; how then do you say that the Father and the Son are equal, God and Christ; when you see that when a man begets a son, the son is lesser and the father is greater? A wise man, you search for times in eternity; where there are no times, you seek ages. When the father is greater, the son lesser, both are temporal; one grows, the other ages. For by nature man is the father, by nature, as I said, he did not beget a lesser; but by age. Do you want to know that by nature he did not beget a lesser? Wait, he will grow, and he will be equal to the father. For a little boy reaches the greatness of his father by growing. But you say the Son of God was born lesser, such that he never grows and reaches the greatness of his Father by growing. Therefore, the son of man, born of man, was born in a better condition than the Son of God. How? Because he grows and reaches the greatness of his father. But Christ, as you say, is therefore born lesser, so that he remains lesser, and not even the increase of age is to be expected. Thus, you say, there is a difference in nature. But why do you say this, unless because you do not wish to believe that the Son is of the same substance as the Father? Finally, first confess that he is of the same substance, and say he is lesser. Look at a man, he is a man. What is his substance? He is a man. What about the one he begets? He is lesser, but he is a man. The age is different, but the nature is equal. You too say: What the Father is, the Son is, but the Son is lesser. Say, make progress, say of the same substance, but lesser, and you will reach the equal. For you are not far off, you are not far from the truth, when you confess the lesser, if you have confessed him of the same substance. But you say he is not of the same substance. Hence because you say this: it is gold and silver; such as you say, it is as if a man were to bear a horse. For man is of one substance, horse another. If therefore the Son is of a different substance than the Father, the Father has generated a monster. For when a creature, that is, a woman gives birth to what is not a man, it is called a monster. But that it is not a monster, what is born is what is he who begot; that is, man and man, horse and horse, dove and dove, sparrow and sparrow.

What a blasphemy to say that the Son of God is of a different substance.

God gave his creatures to generate what they are. God gave to His creatures, to mortal earthly creatures, He granted, He bestowed, that they generate what they are; and do you think that He could not keep this for Himself, who is before the ages? He who has no beginning of time, would He generate a son not like Himself, a degenerate? Hear how great a blasphemy it is to say that the only Son of God is of a different substance. Surely if it is so, He is degenerate. If you say to any son of man: You are degenerate; how great an insult is it? And how is it said that the son of a man is degenerate? Suppose his father was strong, but he is timid and cowardly. Whoever sees him, and wishes to reprimand him, looking at his father, a strong man, what does he say to him? Go away, degenerate. What does this mean: degenerate? Your father was a strong man, and you tremble with fear. He to whom this is said is degenerate by fault, equal by nature. What does it mean: equal by nature? He is a man, what his father is also. But he strong, he cowardly; he bold, he timid; yet man and man. Therefore, he is degenerate by fault, not by nature. When you say that the only Son, the one Son of the Father, is degenerate, you say nothing else but that He is not what the Father is; and you do not say He was born degenerate but begotten. Who can bear such blasphemy? If anyone could see this blasphemy with whatever eyes, they would flee from it and become catholic. The Arians falsely honor the Father through the injury of the Son. But what shall I say, brothers? Let us not be angry with them: but let us pray for them that the Lord may give them understanding, because perhaps they were born in this way. What is this: they were born in this way? They received from their parents what they hold. They prefer lineage to truth. Let them become what they are not, that they may uphold what they are; that is, let them become Catholics, that they may preserve what it is to be human; so that God's creature may not perish in them, and God's grace may come to them. For they think that they are honoring the Father by insulting the Son. When you say to them: You blaspheme; they respond: Why do I blaspheme? Because you say that the Son is not what the Father is. And he to me: Rather you blaspheme. Why? Because you wish to make the Son equal to the Father. I wish to make the Son equal to the Father, but not a stranger. The Father rejoices when I make His only Son equal to Him; He rejoices because He does not envy. And God does not envy His only Son, therefore He begot Him as He is. You do injury to both the Son and the Father, in whose honor you wish to insult the Son. Truly, you say that the Son is not of the same substance as the Father, lest you do injury to His Father. I quickly show you that you do injury to both. How, you say? If I say to someone's son: You are degenerate, not like your father; degenerate, you are not what your father is. The son hears this and becomes angry and says: So, am I born degenerate? The father hears this and becomes even angrier. In anger, what does he say? So, I have begotten a degenerate son? Therefore, if I am different, I begot something different, I begot a monstrosity. Why is it that when you wish to honor one by insulting the other, you insult both? You offend the Son, but you will not propitiate the Father. When you honor the Father through the Son's insult, you offend both the Son and the Father. From whom do you flee? To whom do you flee? Do you flee to the Son when the Father is angry with you? What does He say to you? To whom do you flee, whom you have declared degenerate? Do you run to the Father when the Son is offended? He also says to you: To whom do you flee, whom you said has begotten a degenerate? Let this suffice for you; hold this, commit this to memory, write this in your faith. To understand this, pour out prayers to God the Father and the Son, who are one.

Sermons - Sermon 139A

SERMON 139/A ON THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO JOHN (CHAPTER XI): On the Resurrection of Lazarus Lazarus was raised by Christ.

Thus, this evangelical reading is so widely known for its miracle that no one, not even the unbelievers, has not heard of Lazarus being raised by Christ; how much more is it known among the faithful, that it could not be unknown to the unbelievers? And yet, when it is read, the mind is refreshed as if by a new spectacle. It is not, therefore, inappropriate that we also should recite what we are accustomed to say about it. Nor will it perhaps be tedious, what I am about to say; for this reading is repeated more frequently in your ears than our discourse about it. For if it is read when it is not Saturday or Sunday, no sermon is given about it. I say this so that you may not disdain to hear what I will say. Let no one, therefore, say: "He already said that"; because the deacon already read it, and yet it was willingly heard. Therefore, listen.

Three dead people raised signify the three kinds of death in human sins. From the Lord Jesus Christ in the holy Gospel, we learn that three dead persons were raised. One, the daughter of the synagogue leader, in whose house He came, and after hearing that she was in danger of dying from illness, found her dead; and He said to her: "Little girl, I say to you, arise," and she arose. Another, a young man, who was already being carried out dead beyond the city gate, and was being deeply mourned by his widowed mother; then He saw these things, but He commanded the bearers to stop, and said: "Young man, I say to you, arise;" and the dead man sat up and began to speak, and He gave him back to his mother. The third is Lazarus, whom we have now seen with the eyes of faith both dying and rising again, through a much greater miracle and a grand benefit; for he had been dead for four days, and was already decaying; nevertheless, he was raised. What do these three dead persons symbolize? They do not signify nothing, for the acts of the Lord's miracles are words of mysteries. Thus, we find three types of death in the sins of men. Recall these three dead persons; first, that girl who was dead in the house, not yet carried out; that young man, however, had been carried out beyond the gate; Lazarus, on the other hand, was buried and weighed down by the mass of stone. What then are the three types in sins? I say. If someone consents to evil desire in his heart and decides to do what it beguilingly suggests, he is already dead. No one knows, because he is not carried out; it is a hidden death, in the house, in the bedroom, but it is still death. No one should claim he did not commit adultery if he decides to do it; if he consents to the titillating pleasure of doing it, he has already done it; he is the adulterer, she is chaste. Ask God; He will answer you concerning this hidden death, this inner death, this bedroom death; of such chambers we read: “What you say in your hearts, and on your beds, be sorrowful.” Therefore, hear the verdict of the one who raises the dead from this death: "Whoever looks at a woman to lust for her has already committed adultery with her in his heart," who has not yet engaged in fornication with his body. But sometimes the Lord looks, and he regrets having decided, regrets having consented; he was dead in the bedroom, he rises in the bedroom. But if he does what he decided, death has advanced, it is now outside; but even this can be ended by repentance, and the dead carried out is given back to life. But if custom is added to the act, then he already decays, and he is pressed down by the weight of the custom like a stone; but Christ does not despise even him, He is powerful to raise even him; but He weeps. We heard from the Gospel that Christ wept over Lazarus. Therefore, those who are pressed by habit suffer violence, and Christ groans to raise them. The divine word reproaches them greatly, Scripture cries out greatly to them; we cry out greatly to them, so that we may even be heard and, like Lazarus revived, we may rejoice. "Remove the stone," he says. How could he rise if the burden of custom was not removed? Shout out, tie up, rebuke, accuse, remove the stone; when you see such people, do not spare them; you labor, but you remove the stone. He, He whose voice reaches the heart, might cry: "Lazarus, come forth;" that is: "Live, come out of the tomb, change your life, end your death." And that dead man came forth, bound he stood; for even if he ceases to sin, he is still guilty of past deeds, and it is necessary to pray and do penance for his deeds; not for what he is doing, because he no longer does them; he revives, he does not do; but for what he has done, he is still bound. Therefore, to the ministers of His Church, through whom hands are laid upon the penitent, Christ says: "Loose him, and let him go." Loose him, loose him: “What you bind on earth shall be bound in heaven.” He who heard and kept these things from me, let him suppose he has now read what I have written; but he who has not heard, let him write it in his heart, that he may read it whenever he wants.

Sermons - Sermon 14

SERMO 14 SERMON GIVEN AT CARTHAGE In the Basilica of the New Ones on Sunday. The verse from the psalm: "To You the poor is left,"

"You will be a helper to the orphan."

What it is to be poor.

We sang to the Lord and said: To you the poor man is abandoned; you will be a helper to the orphan. Let us seek the poor man, let us seek the orphan. Nor should it be a wonder that I urge us to seek what we see and feel to abound so greatly. Are not all things full of the poor? Are not all things full of orphans? Yet among all I seek the orphan. And first it must be shown to your Charity that what we think is not what we seek. For those poor in whom God's commands and alms are fulfilled, concerning whom it is written: Enclose alms in the heart of the poor, and it will pray to the Lord for you, indeed this type of man abounds, but this poor man is to be understood more deeply. This poor man is of that kind about whom it was said: Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. There are poor people without money, barely finding daily sustenance, so needing the mercy of others' resources that they are not ashamed even to beg, if it is said of these: To you the poor man is abandoned, what are we to do who are not this? Therefore we who are Christians, are we not abandoned to God? And what other hope do we have if we are not abandoned to Him who does not abandon us? The rich man is he who is proud.

Learn, therefore, to be poor and to be left to God, O my fellow poor ones! The rich man is proud. For in those riches, which are commonly called riches, and in which the common poverty is opposed, there is nothing in those riches so much to be avoided as the disease of pride. For he who does not have money does not have the greatest resources, does not have what he could be proud of. Therefore, if he who does not have what he could be proud of is not praised for not being proud, let him who has be praised, if he is not proud. Why then do I praise the humble poor man, who does not have anything to be proud of? But who can bear both the poor and the proud? Praise the humble rich man, praise the rich poor man. Such are wanted by him who, writing to Timothy, says: Command the rich of this world not to be high-minded. I know what I am saying: this command to them. For they have riches inwardly persuading pride, they have riches in which they struggle to be humble. Give me Zacchaeus having great riches, the chief tax collector, the confessor of sins, short in stature, shorter in spirit, climbing a tree to see the one passing by who hung on the tree for him; give me the one saying: I give half of my goods to the poor. But you are very rich, O Zacchaeus, you are very rich! Behold, you will give half, why will you keep the other half? Because if I have taken anything from anyone, I will repay fourfold. The rich man and poor Lazarus. But every beggar says to me, tired from weakness, clothed in rags, weak from hunger, responds to me and says: "The kingdom of heaven is owed to me. For I am like that Lazarus who lay with sores before the house of the rich man, whose dogs licked his sores, and he sought to be satisfied with the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table. I am more like him, he says, our kind is to whom the kingdom of heaven is owed, not to those who are clothed in purple and fine linen and feast splendidly every day. For such was he, before whose house the poor man with sores lay. And see the outcome of both. For it happened that the poor man died, and was carried by angels to Abraham's bosom. But the rich man also died and was buried. For perhaps the poor man was not even buried. And what then? While the rich man was in torment in Hades, he lifted up his eyes and saw the poor man whom he had despised resting in Abraham's bosom. He desired a drop from the man who hoped for a crumb, and because he loved wealth, he found no mercy. He wanted to relieve his brothers, always foolish, late in showing mercy; he received nothing at all that he requested. Therefore, let us discern, he says, between the poor and the rich. Why do you urge me to understand other things? The poor are open, the rich are open." The rich are not despising the humble: an example of Abraham.

Therefore, listen to me regarding what you have proposed, poor lord. For when you say that you are that holy man with sores, I fear that by exalting yourself you are not what you say you are. Do not despise merciful rich men, humble rich men, and, to be brief, do not despise rich men made poor. O poor man, you too be poor; poor, that is humble! For if a rich man has become humble, how much more ought a poor man to be humble! The poor man has nothing to inflate himself, the rich man has something to struggle with. Therefore, listen to me. Be a true poor man, be pious, be humble. For if you glory in ragged and sore-covered poverty, because such was he who lay destitute before the house of the rich man, you notice that he was poor, and you notice nothing else. “What,” he says, “do I notice?” Read the Scriptures and you will find what I say. Lazarus was poor; he in whose bosom he was carried was rich. It came to pass, he says, that the poor man died, and was carried away by the angels. To where? To the bosom of Abraham, that is, into the secret where Abraham was. For do not understand it carnally, as if the poor man was carried into the fold of Abraham's robe. There was a bosom because there was a secret. Whence it is said: "Render to our neighbors sevenfold into their bosom." What is into their bosom? Into their secrets. What is "Render into their bosom"? Torment their conscience. Read, or if you cannot read, listen when it is read, and see that Abraham was most wealthy on earth, with gold, silver, household, cattle, possessions. And yet this rich man was poor, because he was humble. And he was humble: For Abraham believed God, and it was counted to him as righteousness. He was justified by the grace of God, not by his own presumption. He was faithful, he worked well. He was commanded to sacrifice his son, and he did not hesitate to offer the one he had received, from whom he had received it. He was tested by God, he was set as an example of faith. He was already known to God, but he had to be shown to us. He was not puffed up as if in his good works, because this rich man was poor. And to know that he was not puffed up as in his good works (for he knew that whatever he had, he had from God, and he gloried not in himself but in the Lord), listen to the Apostle Paul: For if Abraham was justified by works, he has something to boast about, but not before God. In the crowd we search for the poor man and scarcely do we find him.

You see that when the poor are abundant, we rightly seek a poor man. We seek him among the crowd and scarcely find him. A poor man comes to meet me, and I seek a poor man. Meanwhile, you extend your hand to the poor man whom you find. In your heart, you search for whom you seek. You say: "I am poor like Lazarus." This humble rich man of mine does not say: "I am rich like Abraham." Therefore you exalt yourself, he humbles himself. Why do you puff yourself up and not imitate? "I," he says, "am a poor man lifted into the bosom of Abraham." Do you not see that a rich man has received a poor man? Do you not see that the rich man is a supporter of the poor? For if you pride yourself against those who have money and deny that they belong to the kingdom of heaven, while perhaps humility is found in them which is not found in you, don't you fear that when you have died, Abraham might say to you: "Depart from me, for you have blasphemed against me"?

Consider the concerns of the rich and compare them to the securities of the poor.

Let us therefore admonish our rich ones, as the Apostle admonished. We are warned not to be proud in wisdom, nor to trust in the uncertainty of riches. Those riches, which you think are full of delights, are full of dangers. The poor man was safer and slept more securely; sleep came more easily upon the hard ground than upon a bed covered with silver. Consider the cares of the rich, and compare them with the securities of the poor. But let this rich man hear so that he may not be proud in wisdom nor trust in the uncertainty of riches. Let him use the world as though not using it. Let him know that he is walking on a path and has entered these riches as though in an inn. Let him be refreshed, he is a traveler; let him refresh himself and move on; he does not take with him what he finds in the inn. Another traveler will come, and he will have it but not take it away. All will leave here what they have acquired here. Naked, he says, I came out of my mother's womb; naked I shall return to the earth. The Lord gave, the Lord took away. - He did not take away, for the poor was left to you - Naked I came out of my mother's womb, naked I shall return to the earth.

Hear the poor man: Paul.

Hear another poor man: We brought nothing into this world, nor can we carry anything out. Having food and clothing, with these we shall be content. For those who desire to be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and harmful desires which plunge men into ruin and destruction. For the love of money is the root of all evil: which some coveting, have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows. Who are they that have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves with many sorrows? Those who want to become rich. Now let that ragged man answer me. Let us see if he does not want to be rich; let us see, let us question him if he does not want to be rich; let him answer, let him not lie. I hear the tongue but I question the conscience. Let him say if he does not want to be rich. But if he wishes, he has already fallen into temptation and many foolish and harmful desires. For I speak not of wealth, but of desires. From where? Because he wants to become rich. What of it? Many foolish and harmful desires, which plunge men into ruin and destruction. Do you see where you are? Why do you show me no resources, when I convict you of so many desires? Look now, compare the two. This man is rich, that man is poor. But this rich man is so already, does not want to become so. This man is rich, either from parents or from gifts and inheritances. Let us suppose, let us make it: he is rich even through iniquities. He no longer wants to add, he has imposed a limit, he has set a boundary to his greed, now in his heart he serves piety.

What you lament, if you could, you would do.

"You are rich," you say. I answer: "He is rich." Again, you, the accuser, respond and say: "He is rich from iniquity." What if he makes friends using the mammon of iniquity? The Lord knew what he was saying; certainly, he was not in error when he commanded: Make for yourselves friends using the mammon of iniquity, so that they may also receive you into eternal dwellings. What if that rich man does this? He has already ended greed, he practices piety. You have nothing, but you want to become rich. You will fall into temptation. But perhaps you have become very poor and destitute because of some ancestral possessions that used to sustain you, and some competitor's calumny took them away. You lament, I hear you, and you blame the times. What you lament, if you could, you would do. Do we not see, are not all things filled with daily examples? Yesterday he was lamenting because he was losing his own; today he, belonging to a greater one, seizes the possessions of others.

Christ, the true poor man.

We find a true poor one, we find a pious humble one, not trusting in himself, truly poor, a member of the poor one who for us became poor, though he was rich. See our rich one, who for us became poor, though he was rich; see that rich one: All things were made through him, and without him nothing was made. It is more to create gold than to have it. You are rich with gold, silver, flocks, household, lands, fruits: you could not create these for yourself. See that rich one: All things were made through him. See that poor one: The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us. Who can worthily think upon his riches, how he does who is not done, how he creates not being created, forms not being formed, remaining unchanged, eternal of temporals? Who can worthily think upon his riches? Let us think upon his poverty, lest perhaps we may even grasp it as poor ourselves. He is conceived in the womb of a virgin woman, enclosed in the bowels of a mother. O poverty! He is born in a narrow lodging, wrapped in infant coverings, laid in a manger, becomes food for poor beasts, and then the Lord of heaven and earth, the creator of angels, the maker and founder of all visible and invisible things, nurses, cries, is nourished, grows, tolerates age, conceals his majesty, afterward is held, despised, scourged, mocked, spit upon, struck with fists, crowned with thorns, suspended on wood, pierced with a lance. O poverty! Behold the head of the poor whom I seek, of which poor one we find a true poor member. Who is the orphan.

Briefly, let us seek the orphan, for in seeking the poor we have become weary. Lord Jesus, I seek the orphan; weary, I seek. Quickly respond, so that I may find. Do not, he says, call anyone on earth your father. The orphan on earth finds an immortal Father in heaven. Do not, he says, call anyone on earth your father. This orphan has been found. Let this orphan pray. Let us hear him and imitate him. What is his prayer? "For my father and my mother have forsaken me." He says, "My father and my mother have forsaken me; but the Lord has taken me up." Therefore, if blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven, the poor has been left to you. If my father and my mother have forsaken me, but the Lord has taken me up, you will be a helper to the orphan.

Sermons - Sermon 140

SERMO 140 On the Words of the Gospel (John 12:44-50):

"He who believes in me, believes not in me, but in him who sent me."

AGAINST A CERTAIN STATEMENT OF MAXIMINUS, BISHOP OF THE ARIANS, WHO, HAVING BEEN STATIONED WITH SEGISVULTUS THE COMPANION, BLASPHEMED IN AFRICA Faith in Christ.

What is it that we have heard, brothers, from the Lord saying: He who believes in me, does not believe in me, but in him who sent me? It is good for us to believe in Christ; especially because he himself also said openly what you have heard, that is, because he himself, the light, came into the world, and whoever believes in him will not walk in darkness, but will have the light of life. Therefore, it is good to believe in Christ. It is a great good to believe in Christ; and it is a great evil not to believe in Christ. But because Christ, the Son, is whatever he is from the Father, yet the Father is not from the Son, but the Father is of the Son; indeed, he commends faith in himself, but he refers the honor back to the author. The births of Christ are two. For this hold firm and fixed, if you wish to remain Catholic, that God the Father begot God the Son without time, and made Him from the Virgin in time. That birth exceeds times; this birth illuminates times. Nevertheless, both births are marvelous: that one without a mother, this one without a father. When God begot the Son, He begot from Himself, not from a mother; when the mother begot the Son, the virgin begot, not from a man. Born from the Father without a beginning; born from the mother today with a certain beginning. Born from the Father, He made us; born from the mother, He remade us. Born from the Father so that we might be; born from the mother so that we might not perish. The Father begot an equal to Himself, and all that the Son is, He has from the Father. But what God the Father is, He does not have from the Son. Therefore, we say the Father is God from no one, the Son is God from God. Therefore, all that the Son does wonderfully, all that He speaks truthfully, He attributes to Him from whom He is; nor can He be anything other than Him from whom He is. Adam was made a man; he could be other than what he was made. For he was made just and could be unjust. However, the Only Begotten Son of God cannot be changed from what He is; He cannot be converted into something else, cannot be diminished, cannot not be what He was, cannot not be equal to the Father. But indeed, He who gave everything to the Son at His birth, gave not to the needy; without doubt, the Father also gave the equality with the Father to the Son. How did the Father give? Did He beget Him lesser and add to His form to make Him equal? If He had done this, He would have given to the needy. But I have already told you what you should firmly hold, that is, all that the Father gave to the Son in His birth, not to the needy. If He gave to the begotten, not to the needy, without doubt He gave equality, and by giving equality, He begot an equal. And although He is the one and the other; nevertheless, He is not another being, but what He is, that too is the other. Not who He is, this and the other; but what He is, this and the other. The true Son of God, why Christ is called.

He who sent me, he says, you have heard: He who sent me, he says, himself gave me a commandment, what I should say, and what I should speak; and I know that his commandment is eternal life. Hold to the Gospel of John. He who sent me, himself gave me a commandment, what I should say, and what I should speak; and I know that his commandment is eternal life. Oh, if it would be granted that I say what I wish! For my poverty and his abundance cause me distress. He, he says, gave me a commandment what I should say, and what I should speak; and I know that his commandment is eternal life. Seek in the Epistle of John, the evangelist, what he said about Christ. Let us believe, he says, in his true Son Jesus Christ. He is the true God, and eternal life. What is this: The true God and eternal life? The true Son of God is true God, and eternal life. Why did he say: in his true Son? Because God has many sons, therefore he had to be distinguished by adding that he is the true Son. It is not enough to say that he is the Son; but by adding, as I said, that he is the true Son, he had to be distinguished because of the many sons that God has. For we are sons by grace; he by nature. We are made by the Father through him: he is what the Father is; are we what God is? No one except Christ dare say that he is one with the Father. But certain ones, from another perspective, not knowing what they are speaking, say: Therefore, it is said: "I and the Father are one," because they have a harmonious will between them, not because the nature of the Son is the same nature as the Father. For even the Apostles (and this one said, not I), for even the Apostles are one with the Father and the Son. Horrendous blasphemy! And the Apostles, he says, are one with the Father and the Son because they obey the will of the Father and the Son. Did he dare to say this? Then let Paul say: "I and God are one." Let Peter say, let any prophet say: "I and God are one." They do not say it. God forbid they say it! They know themselves to be of another nature, a nature to be saved; they know themselves to be of another nature, a nature to be illuminated. No one says: "I and God are one." No matter how much they progress, no matter how much they excel in sanctity, no matter how much they excel in the pinnacle of virtue, they never say: "I and God are one"; because if they have virtue, and therefore say this; by saying this, they lose what they had. The equality of the Son with the Father.

Therefore, believe the Son to be equal to the Father, yet nonetheless the Son from the Father, but the Father not from the Son. Origin with Him, equality with this one. For if He is not equal, He is not a true Son. What do we say, brothers? If He is not equal, He is lesser; if He is lesser, I ask the nature to be saved to wrongly believing, how the lesser was born. Answer: does the lesser grow or not? If He grows, then the Father also ages. But if what is born, is this; if the lesser is born, and will be lesser; perfect with His own detriment, born perfect with the detriment of the Father's form, He will never attain to the form of the Father. Thus you impiously consign the Son; thus you heretics blaspheme the Son. What then does the catholic faith say? The Son is God from God the Father; the Father is God not from God the Son. But the Son is God equal to the Father, born equal, not born lesser; not made equal, but born equal. What He is, so is He who was born. Was there ever a time the Father was without the Son? Never! Remove "ever," where there is no time. Always Father, always Son. Without beginning of time Father, without beginning of time Son; never Father before the Son, never Father without the Son. But yet because the Son is God from God the Father, the Father is God, but not from God the Son; let us not be displeased by the honor of the Son in the Father. For the honor of the Son gives honor to the Father, not diminishing His divinity. The Word of God is the command of the Father.

Therefore, as I was saying, which I had proposed: And I know, he said, that his commandment is eternal life. Pay attention, brothers, to what I say: I know that his commandment is eternal life. And we read in the same John about Christ: He is the true God, and eternal life. If the commandment of the Father is eternal life, and Christ the Son himself is eternal life; the commandment of the Father is the Son himself. For how is it not the commandment of the Father, which is the Word of the Father? Or if you take the commandment given carnally from the Father to the Son, as if the Father said to the Son: This I command you, this I want you to do; with which words did he speak to the only Word? Did he seek words when giving the commandment to the Word? Therefore, because the commandment of the Father is eternal life, and the Son himself is eternal life, believe and accept, believe and understand, because the Prophet says: Unless you believe, you will not understand. Do you not grasp it? Be enlarged. Hear the Apostle: Be enlarged, do not be unequally yoked with unbelievers. Those who do not want to believe before they understand are unbelievers. Because indeed they wanted to be unbelievers, they will remain unskilled. Let them believe, therefore, so that they may understand. Certainly, the commandment of the Father is eternal life. Therefore, the commandment of the Father is the Son himself, who is born today; a commandment not given in time, but a commandment born. The Gospel of John exercises minds, polishes and strips away, so that we may think not carnally, but spiritually about God. Therefore, let these things suffice for you, brothers; so that in the length of discussion the sleep of forgetfulness does not creep in.

SERMO 140/A AND THE SAME IN THE HOMILY ON THAT PLACE OF THE GOSPEL (JOHN 13:34-35) WHERE THE LORD SAYS:

"A new commandment I give to you, that you love one another."

[FRAGMENT] God was made man, not God changed into man.

He received from us what is vile, He gave to us what is great; He received our evil, He gave to us His good; He received death, He gave to us life; He received here insults, He gave to us honor; He received here the cross, He gave to us rest. How great are the evils He received here! How great are the goods He gave to us! Therefore our Lord Jesus Christ became the Son of Man; yet God became man, not God changed into man, but remaining in Himself perfect God, and changed into nothing worse; taking man to be changed in Him for the better, not for the worse in Him. And the rest.

Sermons - Sermon 141

SERMO 141 On the Words of the Gospel of John (14:6):

"I am the way, and the truth, and the life."

Truth found by the philosophers of this age, not the way.

Among other things, when the holy Gospel was read, you heard what the Lord Jesus said: I am the way, and the truth, and the life. Every man desires truth and life; but not every man finds the way. That God is a certain eternal, unchangeable, intelligible life, understanding, wise, making wise, even some philosophers of this age have seen. They indeed saw fixed, stable, unchangeable truth, where all the reasons for all created things are, but they saw it from a distance; they saw, but in error; and therefore, they did not find the way to that great and ineffable and beatifying possession. For because they also saw (as much as a man can see) the creator through the creation, the maker through the made, the fabricator of the world through the world, the Apostle Paul is a witness, to whom Christians certainly ought to believe. For he says, when speaking of such people: The wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness. These, as you recognize, are the words of the Apostle Paul. The wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who hold the truth in unrighteousness. Did he say they did not hold the truth? But they hold the truth in unrighteousness. It is good that they hold the truth; but it is evil where they hold it. They hold the truth in unrighteousness.

Whence the truth was found by them.

It would happen, however, that it was said to him: Whence do those impious detain the truth? Did God speak to any of them? Did they receive the law, as the people of Israel through Moses? Wherefore then do they detain the truth, or in that very iniquity? Hear what follows, and he shows it. Because what is known about God, he says, is manifest in them; for God has shown it to them. Did he show it to those to whom he did not give the law? Hear how he showed it. For his invisible attributes, understood by the things that have been made, are clearly seen. Question the world, the adornment of the sky, the brightness and arrangement of the stars, the sun sufficient for the day, the moon the solace of the night; question the earth yielding plants and trees, full of animals, adorned with men; question the sea, full of how many and what kinds of creatures; question the air, how it teems with so many flying creatures; question everything, and see if not by their sense they respond to you: God made us. These things even noble philosophers have sought, and by the art they understood the artisan. What then? why is the wrath of God revealed upon that impiety itself? Because they detain the truth in iniquity? Let him come, show how. For he has already said, how they knew. His invisible attributes, that is, of God, understood by the things that have been made, are clearly seen; also his eternal power and divinity; so that they are without excuse. Because when they knew God, they did not honor him as God, nor give thanks; but they became vain in their thoughts, and their foolish heart was darkened. These are the words of the Apostle, not mine: And their foolish heart was darkened; professing themselves to be wise, they became fools. What they found through curiosity, they lost through pride. Professing themselves to be wise, that is, attributing God's gift to themselves, they became fools. The words, I say, are those of the Apostle: Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools. The foolishness of those worshiping idols.

Show, prove their folly. Show, Apostle, and just as you have shown us whence they could have reached the knowledge of God, because His invisible attributes are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made; so now show how, professing to be wise, they became fools. Listen: Because, he says, they changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like corruptible man—and birds and four-footed animals and creeping things. For the Pagans made images of these animals their gods. You have found God, and you worship an idol. You have found the truth, and you hold the truth in unrighteousness. And what you have known through the works of God, you lose through the works of man. You have considered the whole; you have collected the order of the heavens, the earth, the sea, and all the elements; you do not want to consider this, that the world is the work of God, the idol is the work of the craftsman. If the craftsman, just as he gave the idol its shape, also gave it a heart; the craftsman himself would be worshiped by the idol. For, how is it, O man, that the craftsman is your god, so the man is the craftsman of the idol. Who is your God? He who made you. Who is the god of the craftsman? He who made him. Who is the god of the idol? He who made it. Therefore, if the idol had a heart, would it not worship the craftsman who made it? Behold in what iniquity they held the truth, and they did not find the way leading to that possession which they saw.

Christ made the way.

Christ, however, because He is Himself with the Father, the truth and the life, the Word of God, of whom it is said: Life was the light of men; therefore, because He is Himself with the Father, the truth and the life, and we did not have any way to go to the truth; the Son of God, who is always the truth and the life in the Father, by assuming man became the way. Walk through the man and you will reach God. Through Him you go, to Him you go. Do not seek how to come to Him, beyond Him. For if He had not wanted to be the way, we would always wander. Therefore, He became the way by which you come. I do not tell you: Seek the way. The way itself comes to you: Rise and walk. Walk by morals, not by feet. For many indeed walk well by feet, and walk badly by morals. For at times, those who walk well by feet, run past the way. Truly, you will find men living well, and not Christians. They run well; but they do not run in the way. The more they run, the more they wander; because they depart from the way. But if such men were to reach the way, and hold the way, oh how great the safety is, because they walk well and do not wander! But if they do not hold the way, however well they walk, alas how pitiable it is! For it is better to limp on the way, than to walk strongly beyond the way. Let these things suffice for your Charity. Turned to the Lord...

Sermon 142 On the burial of catechumens Let the bodies of the catechumens not be buried among the bodies of the faithful.

Concerning the burial of catechumens: Lord Father and Brother, since he deigns, commands that I inform your holiness. And indeed, it is especially his concern, but in that charity about which we were speaking, we share everything with you, so that we may be partakers in Christ. Pain is somewhat usual and, with pardon, begrudging. For who would not forgive the sorrowful and troubled if perhaps they speak with a tinge of envy? However, you all ought to know, dearest ones, what many of you and almost all know, that according to the custom and discipline of the Church, the bodies of deceased catechumens should not be buried among the bodies of the faithful, where also the sacraments of the faithful are celebrated, nor can it be granted to anyone. Otherwise, it will be nothing other than culpable favoritism. For why should it be granted to the richer and not to the poorer, if what there is in consolation for the dead? For the merits of the dead are considered, not in the places of the bodies, but in the affections of the souls. My brothers, and in this manner, as the faithful, learn to think: for the sake of the sacraments, bodies cannot be placed where they should not. No one is certain they will live tomorrow.

Nevertheless, we mourn and grieve for the catechumen who has departed from us and for whom our concern was. And from this, we admonish you, brothers, that no one may be certain he will live tomorrow. Run to grace, change your ways: let this be an admonition for you. What was healthier than he, what was more vigorous in body than he? Suddenly he has died. He was safe, and he passed away, and would that he had passed away and not truly died. For what shall I say, my brothers? Shall I flatter the man and say that even catechumens go where the faithful go? Shall we so flatter the sufferings of men that we dispute against the Gospel? We cannot, my brothers. We must run while we live, lest we truly mourn the dead and they be truly dead. If as much effort was put into the sacraments of the living as is put into the burial of the dead, perhaps no one would be reasonably mourned: for even if they were mourned, it would be with carnal affection. For he who attains better things is not to be mourned, having forsaken the temptations of the world, and fearing nothing, secure in Christ, not fearing the adversary the devil, not dreading a slanderous man.

About the rich man and Lazarus. For perhaps that Lazarus, whose wounds the dogs were licking, was not buried; for God was silent about his burial. It is said only that when he died, he was carried to Abraham's bosom. It is not said that he was buried either. For he who was despised while alive and hungry, perhaps was also cast out unburied when dead. Yet he was carried by the angels to Abraham's bosom. But the rich man also died and was buried. What benefit was perhaps the marble tomb to a soul in hell, thirsting and not receiving even a drop from the tip of a finger? I do not wish to say any more, my brothers; it is enough to have terrified you thus far, lest we augment the grief of some of our brothers who have been struck by this misfortune. For I ought not to have said these things, unless we were compelled to exhort and admonish all of you.

"Run while you live, so that you may live."

Consider the frailty of man, my brothers; run while you live, that you may live; run while you live, that you may not truly die. The discipline of Christ is not to be feared. He exclaims: My yoke is easy, and my burden is light, in this very chapter that we were discussing a little earlier: Learn from me, for I am gentle and humble in heart. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light, and you argue back and say: "I do not yet want to be faithful"? "I cannot." What is: "I cannot"? "... unless because the yoke of Christ is harsh, and the load is heavy? Therefore, does your flesh tell you the truth, and Christ lie? He says: It is gentle, and your vanity says: 'It is harsh.' He says: It is light, and your vanity says: 'It is heavy.' Believe Christ more, because His yoke is indeed gentle, and the load is light. Do not fear, and place it on your neck without hesitation. The yoke will be gentler on your neck the more faithfully you bear it. And so, brothers, we have said these things and admonished your love for two reasons: that no one may ask this and be sorrowful if he does not obtain it, and so that each one of you, O catechumens, when you live, beware lest you perish when dead, and, in what manner aid might reach you, let neither yourselves nor mother Church find."

Sermons - Sermon 142

SERMO 142 On the words of the Lord in the Gospel according to John: (14, 6) "I AM THE WAY, THE TRUTH, AND THE LIFE"

Christ is the safe way.

Divine readings uplift us, lest we be broken by despair; and again they terrify us, lest we be inflated by pride. To hold, however, the middle way, true and straight, as if between the left of despair and the right of presumption, would be very difficult for us, unless Christ said: I am the way. I am, he says, the way, the truth, and the life. As if he were saying: Which way do you want to go? I am the way. Where do you want to go? I am the truth. Where do you want to remain? I am the life. Therefore, let us walk securely in the way; but let us fear the pitfalls next to the way. The enemy does not dare ambush on the way, because Christ is the way; but next to the way, he plainly does not cease. Hence it is said in the Psalm: They have set snares for me alongside the path. Another Scripture says: Remember that you are walking amidst traps. These traps, among which we walk, are not on the way, but still they are next to the way. Why do you fear, why do you dread, if you walk on the way? Then you should fear if you leave the way. For this reason, the enemy is even allowed to set traps alongside the way, so that out of the exultation of security, the way is not abandoned, and one does not fall into the snares. The way of Christ is humble. Fornicate by the Lord. The way is Christ, humble is Christ; truth and life is Christ, exalted and God. If you walk in humility, you will arrive at exaltation; if in weakness you do not scorn the humble, in exaltation you will remain very strong. For what cause of the humility of Christ, if not your weakness? For indeed, your infirmity besieged you greatly and irremediably; and this situation made it so that such a great physician came to you. For if you were so diseased that you could go to the physician, the infirmity itself could seem tolerable; but because you could not go to him, he came to you; he came teaching humility, by which we might return. Because pride did not allow us to return to life, and it itself had caused the exalted human heart to withdraw from life against God, and neglectful in that healthy state of the life-giving precepts, the soul fell into infirmity. Let weak ones learn to listen to him whom they despised in health; let them hear that they might rise, whom they scorned that they might fall. Let them finally learn through experience what they were unwilling to obtain through command. For their own misery has taught them, which happiness had made negligent, alas, what an evil thing it is to fornicate against the Lord by presuming upon themselves; oh how good it is to cling to the Lord, always thinking humbly. For withdrawing from that simple and singular good into the multitudes of pleasures, and into the love of the world and corruptions of the earth, this is to fornicate against the Lord. To this one it is called out: A harlot's face has been made for you, and you have become shameless in your entirety. Let us now see the council of rebuke.

Rebuke of the sinner, so that he may healthily be shamed. For he does not rebuke to insult but wishes to bring presumption to confusion to heal it. Scripture vehemently cried out and did not flatter by caressing those whom it wished to restore by healing. Adulterers, do you not know that a friend of this world is made an enemy of God? The love of the world corrupts the soul; the love of the creator of the world purifies the soul; but unless it blushes with shame for its corruption, it does not long to return to those chaste embraces. Let it be confounded to return, which boasted itself not to return. Therefore pride hindered the soul's return. But he who rebukes does not commit a sin but shows the sin. What the soul did not want to see is placed before its eyes; and what it desired to have behind its back is brought to its face. See yourself in yourself. Why do you see the speck in your brother’s eye but do not notice the beam in your own eye? The soul is recalled to itself, which was going away from itself. Just as it had gone from itself, so it had gone from its Lord. For it had looked upon itself, and had pleased itself, and had become a lover of its own power. It departed from Him and did not remain in itself; therefore, it is driven from itself, and excluded from itself, and falls into externals. It loves the world, loves temporal things, loves earthly things. But if it loves itself, neglecting the one by whom it was made, it is already less, already failing, by loving what is less; for it is less than God; and much less, and so much less, as much as the thing made is less than the maker. Therefore, God is to be loved, so that for the love of Him, if it can be done, we forget ourselves. What is this transition then? The soul has forgotten itself by loving the world; now let it forget itself by loving the maker of the world. Driven from itself, as it were, it has lost itself; and because it does not know how to see its own deeds, it justifies its iniquities. It is carried away and becomes proud in wantonness, in luxury, in honors, in powers, in riches, in the power of vanity. It is reproved, corrected, shown to itself, displeased with itself; it confesses its filth, desires beauty; and what was going out in disarray returns in confusion.

Hatred of the sinner with his love.

Against that person it seems to be prayed, who says: "Fill their faces with shame." He says, "Fill their faces with shame, and they will seek Your name, Lord." Did he hate those whose faces he wished to be filled with shame? See how he loves those whom he wants to seek the name of the Lord. Does he only love, or only hate? Or does he both hate and love? Indeed, he both hates and loves. He hates your actions, he loves you. What does it mean: He hates your actions, he loves you? He hates what you have done, he loves what God has done. For what are yours, if not sins? And who are you, but what God has made? You neglect what you have been made, you love what you have done; you love your works outside of yourself, you neglect God's work within you. Justly, you fall, justly you also depart from yourself; justly you hear: "A spirit that walks and does not return." Rather, listen to the one calling and saying: "Return to me, and I will return to you." For God does not turn away and turn back; remaining, He corrects, He corrects without changing. He has turned away, because you turned away from Him; you caused your fall away from Him, He did not cause His fall away from you. Therefore, listen to Him saying to you: "Return to me, and I will return to you." For what it means that I return to you, is that you return to me. He follows the back of the one fleeing, He illuminates the face of the one returning. For where will you flee, fleeing from God? Where will you flee, fleeing from Him who is contained in no place and is nowhere absent; who frees the convert, punishes the one turned away? The judge you have while fleeing, have Him as a father when returning. The swelling of pride must be healed with the medicine of humility. Christ is both the way and the door.

Pride had swollen, and with that swelling, it could not return through a narrow way. He who was made the way cries out: Enter through the narrow gate. He tries to enter, but the swelling prevents it; and the more harmfully he tries, the more the swelling prevents it. For narrowness vexes the swollen; but vexed, he will swell even more. Swelling more, when will he enter? Therefore, he must deflate if he wishes to enter. From what deflate? Let him take the medicine of humility. Let him drink a bitter, but wholesome potion against the swelling; let him drink the potion of humility. Why does he narrow himself? The mass prevents, not large but swollen; for largeness has solidity, swelling has inflation. Let not the swollen seem great to himself; let him deflate so that he may be great, firm and solid. Let him not desire these things: let him not glory in the pomp of fleeting and corruptible things. Let him hear Him Himself who said: Enter through the narrow gate; saying: I am the way. As if the swollen one sought: By what shall I enter? I am, He said, the way. Enter through Me; walk only through Me so that you may enter through the gate. For as I said: I am the way, so: I am the gate. Why seek the way to return, where to return, by what to enter? Lest you err somewhere, He Himself has made everything for you. Briefly He says: Be humble, be meek. Let us hear this most openly said, so that we may see what way it is, where the way goes, where the way leads. Where do you wish to go? Certainly perhaps, through greed, you wish to possess all things. To Me all things have been delivered by My Father, He says. Perhaps you will say: To Christ have they been delivered; but what about me? Hear the Apostle saying: Hear, as I have said long ago, so that you do not break with desperation; hear how you were loved being unlovable, hear how you were loved as dirty, foul, before there was something in you worthy of love. You were loved first, so that you might become one worthy of being loved. For indeed, Christ, as the Apostle says, died for the ungodly. Or perhaps did the ungodly deserve to be loved? I ask what the ungodly deserved. To be condemned, you answer. Even so, Christ died for the ungodly. Behold what has been bestowed on you as ungodly; now what is preserved for you as godly? What has been bestowed on the ungodly? Christ died for the ungodly. Yet you desired to possess all things. Do not seek this through greed; seek it through piety; for if you seek it thus, you will possess. For you will hold Him through whom all things were made, and with Him you will possess all things.

Christ the healer drank the cup before the sick person.

We do not say these things as if reasoning. Listen to the Apostle himself saying: He who did not spare his own Son, but delivered him up for us all; how shall he not with him also freely give us all things? Selfish one, behold you have all things. Despise all that you love which hinders you from Christ, and hold him in whom you can possess all things. Therefore, the physician, needing no such remedy himself, yet to encourage the sick, drank what was not necessary, as if speaking to the reluctant one and lifting up the fearful one, he drank first. The cup, he says, that I shall drink. Though I have nothing in me that needs to be cured by that cup, nevertheless, I shall drink, lest you disdain, you for whom it is necessary to drink. Now see, brothers, if humanity ought to linger in sickness longer having received such a great medicine. Now God is humble, and yet man is still proud. Let him hear, let him learn: All things, he says, are delivered unto me by my Father. If you desire all things, you shall have them with me. If you desire the Father, you shall have him through me, you shall have him in me. Why shall I have all things, you say, if I do not have him? You rightly say. If you also desire to have him, hear what follows. For when he had said: All things are delivered unto me by my Father, as if exhorting and saying: Come to me, if you wish to possess all things, and lest you say: I do not want all things, but him who made all things, he follows and says: No one knows the Son except the Father, and no one knows the Father except the Son. Do not despair, hear the rest: and to whomsoever the Son will reveal him. He says to whomsoever:

perhaps he will not reveal to me? He would not have come humbly to you if he did not wish to make known the exalted to you. Perhaps you say here: Even if he reveals himself to me, I want to know the Father. Do you wish to know the Father? Hear Philip's voice; he was the first to announce this voice, and very aptly, as was fitting; he was thirsting after blessedness, and everywhere seeking it, he everywhere remained thirsty; he found nowhere to be satisfied. He said to the Lord thirsting: Lord, show us the Father, and it suffices us. What is: it suffices us? There resting, I shall seek no more. And the Lord: Have I been so long a time with you, and you have not known me? Philip, he who has seen me has seen the Father. This, therefore, is needed, that the Son shows himself. You will not find the Son to be lesser than the Father, nor did he say in vain: I and the Father are one. But he, one with the Father, emptied himself for you, taking the form of a servant. Because he emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, he granted this to you when you were turned away from him; however, being turned to him, he preserved for you I and the Father are one.

Christ presents a certain future vision. And see how openly he speaks this. He who loves me keeps my commandments; but he who loves me will be loved by my Father, and I will love him. He suspends us, as if about to give something, because he loves us. Just as if a man says to you: I love you, you only pay attention to what he gives you, what he offers you, what benefits you, in what way he is useful. Therefore, the Lord says: and I will love him. Seek what He is about to give you. Hear what follows: and I will show myself to him. What is this, brothers? You see where the flame of love carries you. We are about to see something; and that something is the Word of God; and that something is God with God, through whom all things were made. The gift is proclaimed, the gift is proposed. How great and how vain human joy is! Everywhere there is the fervor of the tumult of those rushing to meet, announcing to each other as if it were something great, encouraging themselves with exhortation and idle flatteries to go, to see. Where to go? What to see? Where the corrupted soul goes, and returns more corrupted, and unworthy of the embrace of such a legitimate spouse. People go there, people run there. And Christ proposes a certain future vision, a future expectation. For he says: I will love him, and I will show him - not what I have done, not the depths of the abyss, not the secrets of the earth, not the varieties of plants, not the multitude of kinds of animals, not finally the number of stars, not the conversions of stars, not the dimensions of times. Why do you want to see these things? For if you see them, surely they would not be great. I made these things. - I will show myself to him. Your capacity is exercised by the delay of good things. But when will this be, someone says, when will it show? It postpones, it does not remove. And in deferring, what does it do? It expands the bosom of the soul with desire. He is going to give something great, brothers; and what do I say, even great? If even this must be said. See how much he gives to the impious, and how much he grants to the unworthy. Why to them as well? Because: "He makes his sun rise on the good and the bad." See how the creature serves blasphemers; examine these natural gifts. They have health, they have the integrity of the senses, they have the spirit that invigorates their earthly members, they have the function of this air, the vision of light, the rational mind by which they are superior to other living beings. All these lie as common riches for the rich, the poor, the good, the evil. All are nourished, all are enlightened by this light, all live as if from public resources. He gives all these things. Hence, brothers, we should consider what he saves for his own, what he prepares for the faithful, so that those who do not see and believe may see? To believe before seeing is the merit of future vision. Therefore, your capacity is exercised by the deferment of goods; so that, increased by desire, you may be fit to receive what he promises and what you desire.

He gave the pledge of His Spirit. For He has already given something; indeed, He has given the pledge of His Spirit. What is it: He gave a pledge? As if saying: Behold, because I will give something, I now give that which may uplift you, which may inflame love, which the taste may carry away to fullness. Taste and see that the Lord is sweet. Where you have tasted, there you shall be satisfied. They shall be intoxicated, He says, with the abundance of Your house, and the rest. For with You is the fountain of life, and in Your light we shall see light. Is the fountain of life different from the light? It is said in many ways that whatever may be said will not be fully expressed. Therefore, let us be uplifted, let us be inflamed, let us burn, let us desire. And if we are delayed, we are not taken away. Let us only hold the way; there will be our satisfaction, there will be the fountain of life. The fountain of life Himself came, clothed in flesh, made us desire. He granted His death to the undeserving, He preserves His life for the deserving. The burden for you is the swelling of pride. But because, as we said, due to the swelling of pride we did not return, therefore He granted His death to the unworthy; He became humble so that the exalted might be lifted up. He did this so that your disease might subside. Those disciples, swelling with pride, wanted to enter, the two who asked through their mother- because they did not dare by themselves. Even their modesty should have warned them what to ask for. They did not dare on their own: they made their old mother, as one of deserving age, speak to the Lord. They desired the kingdom, which cannot be entered except through a narrow path. But they, still swelling with the desire for honor, the more they thrust themselves into it, the more grievously they were troubled. The Lord humbles them and gives a bitter cup, of which I spoke a little earlier, against the swelling. You said: I cannot; you call me through the narrow way, I cannot enter through the narrow way. Come to me, He said, all you who labor and are burdened. Your swelling is your burden. Come to me, all you who labor and are burdened, and I will refresh you. Take my yoke upon you, and learn from me.

Christ wants us to learn from him, not to perform miracles, but to be humble. The Master of angels cries out, the Word of God cries out, by which all rational minds are fed without defect, a food reviving and remaining whole, cries out and says: Learn from me. Let the people hear him saying: Learn from me. Let them respond: What do we learn from you? For we will hear something unknown from the great master, when he says: Learn from me. Who is it who says: Learn from me? He who formed the earth, who divided the sea and the dry land, who created birds, who created land animals, who created all swimming things, who placed the stars in the sky, who distinguished day and night, who established the firmament itself, who separated light from darkness; he himself says: Learn from me. Is he perhaps going to tell us this, that we might do these things with him? Who can do this? God alone does. He says, don’t fear, I do not burden you. Learn this from me, what I became for your sake. He says, learn from me, not to create the creature which was made through me. Nor do I indeed say that you should learn those things which I have granted to some, to whom I wanted, but not to all; to raise the dead, to give sight to the blind, to open the ears of the deaf; do not wish to learn these things as great from me. The disciples returned rejoicing and exultant, saying: Behold in your name even demons are subject to us. The Lord said to them: Do not rejoice in this, that demons are subject to you; rejoice rather that your names are written in heaven. To whom he wanted he gave the power to cast out demons; to whom he wanted, to raise the dead. These miracles were done even before the incarnation of the Lord; the dead were raised, lepers were cleansed. We read these things: and who did these, except he who was later the man Christ after David, but God Christ before Abraham? He granted all these, he did them through men, yet he did not give this to all. Should those to whom he did not give this, despair and say that they do not belong to him, because they did not merit to receive these gifts? In the body there are members; one member can do this, another that. God has joined the body: he did not give to the ear to see, nor to the eye to hear, nor to the forehead to smell, nor to the hand to taste. He did not give these; but to all members he gave health, he gave structure, he gave unity. He vivified all things equally with the Spirit, he united them. Therefore, he did not give to some to raise the dead, to another he did not give to preach; yet to all what did he give? We have heard him saying: Learn from me, for I am meek and humble of heart. My brothers, all our medicine is this: Learn from me, for I am meek and humble of heart. What does it profit, if one performs miracles, and is proud, is not meek and humble of heart? Will he not be counted in that number of those, who will come in the end and say: Have we not prophesied in your name, and in your name done many wonders? But what will they hear? I do not know you; depart from me, all you workers of iniquity.

Love without arrogance.

What then is the benefit of learning? Because I am gentle and humble in heart, he says. He introduces love, genuine love, without confusion, without arrogance, without exaltation, without deceit. It is this he introduces, who says: Learn from me, because I am gentle and humble in heart. How can the proud and inflated have the purest love? Indeed, it is necessary that he envies. Perhaps, does he who envies love, and are we mistaken? God forbid that anyone errs in such a way as to say that the envious have love. Therefore, what does the Apostle say? Love does not envy. Why does it not envy? Because it is not inflated. He immediately sets forth the cause where he has removed envy from love; because it is not inflated, it does not envy. At first, he said this: Love does not envy; but as if you asked why it does not envy, he added: it is not inflated. So, if it is envying because it is inflated; if it is not inflated, it does not envy. If love is not inflated, and therefore does not envy, he introduces love, who says: Learn from me, because I am gentle and humble in heart.

Without love, the other gifts of God are of no use.

Now let anyone have what they will, boast of themselves from wherever they will: If I speak in the tongues of men and of angels, but have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal. What is more sublime than the gift of various tongues? It is brass, a tinkling cymbal, if you take away charity. Hear other gifts. If I know all mysteries; what is more excellent, what more magnificent? Hear yet another. If I have all prophecy, and know all mysteries, and all knowledge; and if I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, but have not charity, I am nothing. He added ampler things. Brothers, what else did he say? If I distribute all my goods to the poor. What can be done more perfectly? When the Lord, for perfection, commanded this to the rich man, saying: Do you want to be perfect? Go, sell all that you have, and give to the poor. So is he now perfect, who has sold all that he has, and given to the poor? No: for he added: and come, follow me. He said, Go, sell all that you have, and give to the poor; and come, follow me. Why should I follow you? Now since I have sold all and distributed to the poor, am I not perfect? What need is there for me to follow? Follow, to learn: that I am meek and humble of heart. For one can sell all that they have and give to the poor, and yet not be meek, yet not be humble of heart. Surely they can. For if I distribute all my goods to the poor... And still hear. For some, leaving all they have behind, have followed the Lord, but have not yet followed to perfection—for to follow to perfection is to imitate—they could not bear the temptation of suffering. For Peter, brothers, was of those who had left all and followed the Lord. For when the rich man went away sorrowful, and the disciples, troubled, asked who then could be perfect, and the Lord consoled them, they said to the Lord: Behold, we have left all and followed you; what then shall we have? And the Lord told them what he would give them here, what he would reserve for the future. Yet he was already of their number, who had done these things. But when it came to the moment of passion, at the voice of a single maidservant he denied him three times, though he had promised he would die for him.

Perfection and charity are attained through the imitation of Christ.

Therefore, let your Charity take heed. "Go," he says, "sell all your possessions, give to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven; and come, follow me." Peter was perfect already when the Lord was sitting in heaven at the right hand of the Father; then he was perfect and made mature. Therefore, when he followed the Lord to His passion, he was not perfect; but when he began no longer to be on earth whom he was to follow, was he then perfect? On the contrary, you always have Him before you, whom you may follow. The Lord set an example on earth, he left the Gospel there; he is with you in the Gospel. For he did not lie, saying: "Behold, I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the age." Therefore, follow the Lord. What does it mean to follow the Lord? Imitate the Lord. What does it mean to imitate the Lord? Learn from me because I am meek and humble of heart. For if I distribute all my goods to the poor, and deliver my body to be burned, but do not have charity, it profits me nothing. Therefore I exhort your Charity to that very charity. But I would not exhort to charity, except by some charity. What therefore has been begun, I exhort to be completed; and what has been started, I pray to be perfected; and I ask you to pray for me, that what I advise to you may also be perfected in me. For we are all imperfect, and we shall be perfected there, where all things are perfect. The Apostle Paul says: "Brothers, I do not consider myself to have apprehended." He himself says: "Not that I have already received, or am already perfect." And does any man dare to boast of perfection? Rather let us confess our imperfection, that we may deserve perfection.

Sermons - Sermon 143

SERMO 143 ON THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL OF JOHN (16:7-11):

^7 But I tell you the truth: it is for your good that I am going away. Unless I go away, the Advocate will not come to you; but if I go, I will send Him to you. ^8 When He comes, He will prove the world to be in the wrong about sin and righteousness and judgment: ^9 about sin, because people do not believe in Me; ^10 about righteousness, because I am going to the Father, where you can see Me no longer; ^11 and about judgment, because the prince of this world now stands condemned.

"I TELL YOU THE TRUTH, IT IS TO YOUR ADVANTAGE THAT I GO."

Faith in Christ is necessary for justification. The medicine for all wounds of the soul, and the one atonement for the sins of men, is to believe in Christ; nor can anyone at all be cleansed, either from original sin, which he has derived from Adam, in whom all have sinned, and have naturally become children of wrath; or from the sins which they themselves have committed by not resisting carnal concupiscence, but by following it, and serving it in crimes and wickedness, unless they are united and joined to his body, who was conceived without any carnal allure and deadly pleasure, nor was he nourished in the womb by his mother in sins, and he did not commit sin, nor was deceit found in his mouth. Indeed, by believing in him, they become sons of God; because they are born of God through the grace of adoption, which is in the faith of Jesus Christ our Lord. Wherefore, beloved, rightly does our same Lord and Savior say this one sin; of which the Holy Spirit convicts the world, because it does not believe in him. I, he says, speak the truth to you, it is expedient for you that I go away. For if I do not go away, the Paraclete will not come to you; but if I go, I will send him to you. And when he comes, he will convict the world concerning sin, and righteousness, and judgment. Concerning sin, indeed, because they did not believe in me; concerning righteousness, because I go to the Father, and you will see me no longer; concerning judgment, because the prince of this world is judged. The sin of unbelief in Christ, why is it alone reproved?

Therefore, He willed the world to be convicted of this one sin, that they do not believe in Him; namely because by believing in Him all sins are forgiven, He willed this one to be counted, in which all others are included. And because by believing they are born of God, and become sons of God: For He gave them, He said, the power to become sons of God, to those who believe in Him. Therefore, whoever believes in the Son of God, insofar as he clings to Him, and also himself becomes a son and heir of God by adoption, and a co-heir with Christ, to the extent that he does not sin. Hence John says: He who is born of God does not sin. And therefore the sin from which the world is convicted is this, that they do not believe in Him. This is the sin about which He also says: If I had not come, they would not have sin. Did they not already have innumerable other sins? But by His coming, this one sin was added to the unbelievers, by which the others are bound. But in the believers, because this one was lacking, it has happened that all are forgiven to the believers. Nor for any other reason did the apostle Paul say: All have sinned and fall short of the glory of God; so that whoever believes in Him, will not be put to shame; just as the Psalm says: Come to Him and be enlightened, and your faces will not be put to shame. Therefore, the one who glories in himself will be put to shame; for he will not be found without sins. Thus, only he will not be put to shame, who glories in the Lord. For all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God. Therefore, when speaking of the unbelief of the Jews, he did not say: For if some of them have sinned, will their sin nullify the faith of God? For how could he say: If some of them have sinned; when he himself said: For all have sinned? But he said: If some of them did not believe, will their unbelief nullify the faith of God? In order to show more clearly this sin, by which all others are contained, lest they be remitted by God’s grace. Of this one sin through the coming of the Holy Spirit, that is, through the gift of His grace which is given to the faithful, the world is convicted, as the Lord says: Concerning sin, because they do not believe in me. The great gift of the Holy Spirit after the ascension of Christ. But it would not be a great merit and a glorious blessedness for believers if the Lord always appeared to human eyes in a resurrected body. Therefore, the Holy Spirit brought this great gift to those who would believe, so that they would sigh after Him whom they did not see with carnal eyes, with a sober mind free from carnal lusts and filled with spiritual desires. Hence also that disciple, who had said he would not believe unless he touched His scars with his hand, when he had touched the Lord's body, exclaimed as if awakening: My Lord and my God! The Lord said to him: Because you have seen Me, you have believed; blessed are those who have not seen and yet have believed. The Holy Spirit as the Paraclete brought this blessedness, so that with the form of a servant, which He received from the womb of the Virgin, removed from the eyes of the flesh, the purified gaze of the mind could be directed to the same form of God, in which He remained equal to the Father even when He deigned to appear in the flesh; so that, filled with the same Spirit, the Apostle could say: Even if we knew Christ according to the flesh, we now no longer know Him thus. For he who knows the flesh of Christ not according to the flesh, but according to the spirit, recognizes the power of His resurrection, not through a curious touching, but through a certain faith; not saying in his heart: Who will ascend into heaven? This is to bring Christ down; or: Who will descend into the abyss? This is to bring Christ up from the dead. But the word is near you, in your mouth, because the Lord is Jesus: and if you believe in your heart that God raised Him from the dead, you will be saved. For with the heart one believes unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation. These are the words of the Apostle, brothers, uttered by the holy inebriation of the Holy Spirit Himself. The justice of faith from the Holy Spirit after the departure of Christ.

Therefore, since we would in no way possess this blessedness by which we do not see and believe unless we received it from the Holy Spirit, it was rightly said: "It is expedient for you that I go away. For if I do not go away, the Comforter will not come to you; but if I go, I will send him to you." He is always indeed with us in his divinity; but unless he went away from us bodily, we would always see his body in a carnal manner and would never believe spiritually. By this faith, which justifies and blesses us, we would merit to behold with a purified heart the same Word, God with God, through whom all things were made, and which was made flesh to dwell among us. And if not by touching with the hand but believing with the heart unto righteousness, it is fitting that the world is reproved concerning our righteousness, which refuses to believe unless it sees. But in order that we might have the righteousness of faith, by which the unbelieving world is reproved, the Lord said: "Concerning righteousness, because I go to the Father, and you will see me no more." As if to say: This will be your righteousness, that you believe in me as mediator, whom you will surely know to have gone to the Father, although you do not see him carnally; so that being reconciled through him, you might be able to see God spiritually. Hence, to the woman bearing the figure of the Church, when she fell at his feet after the resurrection, he said: "Do not touch me, for I have not yet ascended to the Father." This is understood mystically as: Do not believe in me carnally through corporeal touch; but spiritually you will believe, that is, you will touch me with spiritual faith when I have ascended to the Father. Because blessed are those who do not see and yet believe. And this is the righteousness of faith, by which the world is reproved concerning us who are not without it; because the just shall live by faith. Whether, therefore, because in him rising again, and in him coming to the Father we are invisibly perfected in justification; or because, not seeing and believing, we live by faith, since the just shall live by faith; hence he said: "Concerning righteousness, because I go to the Father, and you will see me no more." The infidelity of the world is inexcusable. The world cannot excuse itself from being hindered by the devil from believing in Christ. For the prince of this world is cast out for those who believe, so that he can no longer operate in the hearts of the people whom Christ began to possess through faith; as he operates in the children of disobedience, whom he often stirs up to tempt and trouble the just. Since he has been cast out, he who used to rule from within, now fights from without. Even if the Lord directs the meek through his persecutions, yet he himself has been judged by the very fact that he has been cast out. And from this judgment the world is reproved; because it complains in vain about the devil, who does not want to believe in Christ, who being judged, that is, cast out, and permitted to attack us from outside for our exercise, has been overcome not only by men, but also by women, and boys, and girls who were martyrs. But in what did they conquer, except in Him in whom they believed, and whom they loved without seeing, and in whose dominion in their hearts they were freed from the worst ruler? And all this through grace, that is, through the gift of the Holy Spirit. Therefore, rightly, the same Spirit reproves the world, both of sin, because it does not believe in Christ; and of righteousness, because those who wished to believe did so, even though they have not seen Him in whom they believed; and by His resurrection, they also hoped to be perfected in the resurrection; and of judgment, because if they wished to believe, they would be hindered by no one, since the prince of this world has been judged already.

Sermons - Sermon 144

SERMO 144 OF THE WORDS OF THAT SAME GOSPEL OF JOHN (16, 8-11):

"He will convict the world concerning sin, and righteousness, and judgment." The sin of unbelief is alone reproved. The Holy Spirit is called the grace of God. When our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ spoke much about the coming of the Holy Spirit, whom He promised to send and did send; He said among other things: "He will convict the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment." And having said this, He did not change the subject but deigned to explain it somewhat more clearly. "Of sin indeed," He said, "because they do not believe in Me; but of righteousness, because I go to the Father; and of judgment, because the prince of this world is already judged." Therefore, a desire for understanding arises in us as to why the sin of men seemed to be solely not believing in Christ, so that He said the Holy Spirit would convict the world of this alone. For if it is evident that besides this unbelief there are many other sins of men, why does the Holy Spirit convict the world of this alone? Is it because all sins are held through unbelief and are forgiven through faith; therefore, God imputes this one above the others, because by it all the rest are not absolved, while a proud man does not believe in a humble God? For it is written: "God resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble." For the grace of God is the gift of God. But the greatest gift is the Holy Spirit Himself; and therefore, it is called grace. For when all had sinned and fell short of the glory of God; because through one man sin entered the world, and through sin death, in which all have sinned; therefore, it is called grace because it is given freely. It is given freely because it is not given as a worker's wage after a reckoning of merits, but a gift is given after the forgiveness of sins. To believe Christ, and to believe in Christ, are different.

Therefore, unbelievers are convicted of sin, that is, lovers of the world; for they are signified by the name of the world. For when it is said: "He will convict the world concerning sin," there is no other sin except that they did not believe in Christ. Indeed, if this sin is not present, no other sins will remain, because all are absolved by the just living by faith. But there is a great difference whether one believes that he is Christ, and whether one believes in Christ. For even the demons believed that he is Christ, yet they did not believe in Christ. For he believes in Christ who also hopes in Christ and loves Christ. For if he has faith without hope and without love, he believes that he is Christ, but he does not believe in Christ. Therefore, he who believes in Christ, by believing in Christ, Christ comes into him and in a certain way is united to him, and he becomes a member of his body. This cannot be done unless hope and love are also present.

Justice concerning which the world is reproved.

What does it mean when he says: "Concerning righteousness, because I go to the Father"? And first, it must be asked, if the world is convicted concerning sin, why also concerning righteousness? For what can rightly be convicted concerning righteousness? Is it that the world is convicted indeed concerning its own sin, but concerning the righteousness of Christ? I do not see what else can be understood; since: "Concerning sin," he says, "because they do not believe in me"; but "concerning righteousness, because I go to the Father." They do not believe, he goes to the Father. Therefore, it is their sin, but his righteousness. But why did he want to name righteousness in this alone, because he goes to the Father? Is it not righteousness indeed that he came here from the Father? Or is that rather mercy that he came from the Father to us, and righteousness that he goes to the Father?

Justice because Christ goes to the Father, why.

Thus, brothers, I think it is expedient that in such a profound depth of the Scriptures, in which perhaps something hidden lies that ought to be revealed at the right time, we should faithfully inquire together, so that we may deserve to find it beneficially. Why, then, does He call this righteousness because He goes to the Father and not also because He comes from the Father? Is it because it is mercy that He comes, therefore it is righteousness that He goes; so that we may also learn in ourselves that righteousness cannot be fulfilled if we are lazy in extending mercy, not seeking what is ours, but also what is others'? When the Apostle admonished this, he immediately joined the example of the Lord Himself: "Nothing," he said, "through contention, nor through vain glory; but in humility of mind each esteeming others better than themselves; not looking to their own interests, but also to those of others." Then he immediately added: "Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus; who, being in the form of God, did not consider it robbery to be equal with God; but emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men, and being found in the appearance as a man He humbled Himself and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross." This is the mercy by which He came from the Father. What then is the righteousness by which He goes to the Father? It follows and says: "Therefore God also has highly exalted Him, and given Him a name which is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of those in heaven, and of those on earth, and of those under the earth, and every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father." This is the righteousness by which He goes to the Father.

Christ alone ascended into heaven. Only Christ from head and members. Christ is one with the Father in one way, one with us in another way. But if he goes to the Father alone, what benefit is it to us? Why is the world convicted of this righteousness by the Holy Spirit? And yet, if he were to go alone to the Father, he would not say in another place: No one has ascended into heaven except the one who descended from heaven, the Son of Man who is in heaven. But even the Apostle Paul says: For our conversation is in heaven. But why is this? Because he also says: If you have been raised with Christ, seek the things that are above, where Christ is seated at the right hand of God; set your minds on things that are above, not on things that are on the earth. For you have died, and your life is hidden with Christ in God. So how is he alone? Is it because Christ is one with all his members, as the head is with its body? What is his body, if not the Church? As the same teacher says: But you are the body of Christ, and individually members of it. Therefore, when we have fallen, and he descended for our sake, what does it mean: No one ascends except the one who descended, except that no one ascends except by being made one with him, and as a member joined into his body who descended? Thus he also says to the disciples: Because apart from me you can do nothing. For he is one with the Father in one way, and one with us in another way. He is one with the Father because the substance of the Father and the Son is the same; he is one with the Father because though he was in the form of God, he did not consider equality with God as something to be grasped. But he has been made one with us because he emptied himself, taking the form of a servant; he has been made one with us according to the seed of Abraham, in which all nations will be blessed. When he recalled this, the Apostle says: And he does not say: And to seeds, as of many; but as of one: And to your seed, which is Christ. And since we also pertain to what is Christ, being incorporated together and adhering to that head, Christ is one; and because he also says to us: Therefore, you are the seed of Abraham, heirs according to the promise. For if there is one seed of Abraham, and that one seed of Abraham is understood to be Christ; and this seed of Abraham includes us too; thus this whole, that is, the head and the body, is one Christ. The righteousness of Christ, how (is) ours. And therefore we should not consider ourselves separated from that righteousness which the Lord Himself recalls, saying: "Of righteousness, because I go to the Father." For with Christ we have resurrected, and we are with our head, Christ, meanwhile in faith and hope; however, our hope will be fulfilled in the final resurrection of the dead. When our hope is fulfilled, then our justification will also be fulfilled. The Lord, who will fulfill this, shows in His flesh (that is, in our head), in which He rose and ascended to the Father. For it is written thus: "He was delivered over for our offenses and was raised to life for our justification." Therefore, the world is convicted concerning sin, in those who do not believe in Christ: and concerning righteousness, in those who rise in the members of Christ. Where it is said: "That we might become the righteousness of God in Him." For if not in Him, there is no way righteousness can be. But if in Him, all of Him, along with us, goes to the Father, and this perfect righteousness will be fulfilled in us. For this reason, the world is also convicted concerning judgment, because the prince of this world is already judged; that is, the devil, the prince of the wicked, who in their heart reside only in this world, which they love, and therefore are called the world; just as our conversation is in heaven if we have resurrected with Christ. Therefore, just as with us, that is, with His body, Christ is one; so with all the impious of whom the devil is the head, with a certain body of their own, the devil is one. Therefore just as we are not separated from the righteousness of which the Lord said: "Because I go to the Father"; so the impious are not separated from that judgment, about which He said: "Because the prince of this world is already judged."

Sermons - Sermon 145

SERMO 145 On the Words of the Gospel of John (16:24):

"Until now you have asked nothing in my name." AND ABOUT THE WORDS OF LUKE (10, 17. 20):

"Lord, behold in Your name even the demons are subject to us." A passage of John, how to reconcile it with the words of Luke. When the Holy Gospel was read, we heard that indeed every attentive soul ought to be moved to seek, not to fail. For he who is not moved, is not changed. But there is a dangerous movement, of which it is written: "Let not the foot of pride come against me." However, there is another movement of the seeker, the knocker, the petitioner. Therefore, what has been read, we all heard; but I think that not all understood. He reminds that you seek with me, ask with me, knock with me for receiving. For the grace of the Lord will be present, as we hope, that when I want to serve you, I also may be worthy to receive. What is it, I beseech you, that we have just heard the Lord say to His disciples: "Until now, you have asked nothing in my name"? Does He not speak to those disciples, whom He sent with the authority given to preach the Gospel and perform great works, who returned rejoicing and said to Him: "Lord, behold, in Your name even the demons are subjected to us"? You recognize and recall what I mentioned from the Gospel, true in every place and every statement, never false, never deceiving. How then is it true: "Until now, you have asked nothing in my name"; and: "Lord, behold, in Your name even the demons are subjected to us"? It certainly moves the mind to understand the secret of this question. Therefore, let us ask, seek, knock. This in us is faithful piety, not the restlessness of the flesh, but the submission of the soul; so that He who sees us knocking may open to us. To those who fear, the sweetness of God is hidden; to those who hope, it is revealed.

What then does the Lord give as a ministry to you, attentive ones, that is, take it as those who are hungry; what I will say, without a doubt, you will prove with healthy taste buds of the heart what is served to you from the Lord's cellar. The Lord Jesus knew from where the human soul, that is, the rational mind made in the image of God, could be satisfied, as if it were satisfied by that very thing. He knew this, and he knew that it still lacked that fullness. He knew that he appeared, he knew that he was hidden. He knew what was shown in him, what was hidden. He knew this. How great, says the Psalm, is the abundance of your sweetness, Lord, which you have hidden for those who fear you, but you have perfected for those who hope in you. Your sweetness, both great and abundant, you have hidden for those who fear you. If you hide it for those who fear you, to whom do you reveal it? You have perfected it for those who hope in you. A twin question has arisen, but each one is solved by the other. If anyone inquires, what is this: You have hidden it for those who fear you, you have perfected it for those who hope in you? Do some fear, and others hope? Are not the same ones fearing God, hoping in God? Who hopes in him, who does not fear him? Who fears him piously, and does not have hope in him? Therefore, let this first be solved. I want to say something about those who hope and those who fear.

Fear under the law, hope under grace. The law has fear, grace has hope. But what is the difference between the law and grace, since there is one giver of both the law and grace? The law terrifies one who presumes on oneself, grace assists one who hopes in God. The law, I say, terrifies; do not dismiss it because it is brief; weigh it, and it is great. See what I have said, take what we give, test from where we take. The law terrifies one who presumes on oneself, grace assists one who hopes in God. What does the law say? Many things, and who can enumerate them? I recall one small and modest commandment from it, which the Apostle recalled, very small; let us see who can bear it. You shall not covet. What is this, brothers? We have heard the law; if grace is not present, you have heard your punishment. Why do you boast to me, whoever you are, hearing this and presuming on yourself, why do you boast to me of innocence? Why do you flatter yourself about it? You can say: I have not stolen others' things; I hear, I believe, perhaps I also see; you do not steal others' things, You shall not covet. You have heard. I do not approach another's wife; and this I hear, I believe, I see. You shall not covet. You have heard. Why do you look around outwardly, and do not look inwardly? Look inwardly, and you will see another law in your members. Look inwardly, why do you bypass yourself? Descend into yourself. You will see another law in your members warring against the law of your mind, and dragging you captive to the law of sin which is in your members. Justly is the sweetness of God hidden from you. The law placed in your members captivates you, warring against the law of your mind. Of that sweetness which is hidden from you, the holy Angels drink; you cannot endure and taste the sweetness while a captive. You would not have known covetousness, unless the law said: You shall not covet. You heard, you feared; you tried to fight, but you could not overcome. For sin, taking opportunity through the commandment, worked death in me. Certainly you recognize, these are the words of the Apostle: Sin, taking opportunity through the commandment, worked in me all covetousness. Why did you boast proudly? Behold, the enemy conquered you with your own weapons. You indeed sought the commandment for admonition; behold, through the commandment the enemy found an opportunity to enter. For sin, taking opportunity through the commandment, deceived me, and through it killed me. What did I say: The enemy conquered you with your own weapons? Hear the same Apostle continuing and saying; Therefore the law is holy, and the commandment is holy and just and good. Now respond to the reproachers of the law; respond with the authority of the Apostle: The commandment is holy, the law is holy, the commandment is just and good. Therefore, did that which is good become death to me? By no means; but sin, that it might be shown to be sin, worked death in me through what is good. Why this, unless because receiving the commandment you feared, you did not love? You feared punishment, you did not love righteousness. He who fears punishment wishes, if it were possible, to do what he pleases and not have what he fears. God forbids adultery; you coveted another's wife, you do not approach, you do not do, opportunity is given, you have time, the place is open, a witness is absent, yet you do not do it; why? Because you fear punishment. But no one will know. Would not God also know? Indeed, since God knows what you are about to do, you do not do it; but you tremble at threatening God, and do not love commanding God. Why do you not do it? Because if you do, you will be cast into hell. You fear fire. Oh, if you loved chastity, you would not do it, even if you were to be totally unpunished. If God said to you: Behold, do it, I will not condemn you; I will not cast you into hell, but I will withhold my face from you. If for this threat you would not do it, you would not do it from the love of God, not from the fear of judgment. But perhaps you would do it; for it is not mine to judge. Grace helps, which makes saints, if you do not do it because you shudder at the defilement of adultery, because you love the preceptor, so that you demand the promisor, not because you fear the condemner; now it is grace, do not assume this for yourself, do not attribute it to your own strength. You do it out of delight, well; you do it out of charity, well; I approve, I consent. Charity works through you when you do willingly. Now you taste the sweetness, if you hope in the Lord.

Charity is not from us, but from God. But whence do you have this charity? If indeed it is; for I fear that you still do not do this by fearing, and you appear great to yourself. Now if you do not do it by charity, truly you are great. Do you have charity? I have it, you say. Whence? From myself. You are far from sweetness, if you have it from yourself. You will love yourself; because you will love from where you have it. But I prove that you do not have it. For because you think you have such a thing from yourself, for that reason I do not believe you have it. For if you had it, you would know from where you had it. Do you have charity from yourself, as if it were something light, something brief? If you were to speak with the tongues of men and angels, but did not have charity, you would be a sounding brass and a clanging cymbal. If you knew all mysteries and had all knowledge, all prophecy and all faith, so as to move mountains, but did not have charity, those things could not benefit you. If you were to distribute all your goods to the poor, and give your body to be burned, but did not have charity, you would be nothing. How great is this charity, which if it is lacking, all things are of no benefit? Compare it, not with your faith, not with your knowledge, not with your tongue; compare charity with lesser things, with the eye of your body, the hand, the foot, the belly, some extreme member; can any of these smallest things be compared with charity in any part? Therefore you have the eye and nose from God, and charity from yourself? If you gave yourself charity, which surpasses all things, you have made God vile to yourself. What more can God give you? Whatever He gives is less. Charity conquers all, which you gave to yourself. But if you have it, you did not give it to yourself. For what do you have that you did not receive? Who gave it to me, who gave it to you? God. Recognize the giver, lest you feel the condemner. By believing from the Scriptures, God gave you charity, a great good, charity surpassing all things. God gave it to you: because the charity of God is poured into our hearts; perhaps from yourself? God forbid; through the Holy Spirit who has been given to us. The presumption of man is removed by the law, captivity by grace.

Return with me to that captive, return with me to my proposition. The law frightens one who presumes upon himself, grace helps one who hopes in God. For see that captive. He sees another law in his members warring against the law of his mind and leading him captive in the law of sin which is in his members. Behold, he is overcome, behold, he is drawn, behold, he is taken captive, behold, he is subjugated. What did it profit him, "You shall not covet?" He heard, "You shall not covet," to know the enemy, not to conquer him. For he did not know desire, that is, his enemy, unless the law said: "You shall not covet." Now you have seen the enemy; fight, free yourself, assert yourself into liberty; pleasant suggestion must be suppressed, unlawful delight must be killed. Arm yourself, you have the law; proceed, conquer, if you can. For what is it that already from some grace of God you delight in the law of God according to the inner man? But you see another law in your members warring against the law of your mind; not warring and achieving nothing, but leading you captive in the law of sin. Behold from where that multitude of sweetness is hidden to you who fear; it is hidden to the one who fears, how is it fulfilled to the one who hopes? Cry under the enemy, for you have an assailant, you also have a helper who awaits you fighting, lifts you up laboring; but if he finds you hoping; for he hates one who is proud. Under the enemy, then, what do you cry? Wretched man that I am. You see now, since you have cried out. Let this be your cry when perhaps you labor under the enemy, say, in the innermost recesses of your heart say, with sound faith say: Wretched man that I am. Wretched I am, therefore wretched because I am. Wretched man that I am, both because I am I, and because I am a man. For in vain is he troubled. For although man walks in an image; Wretched man that I am, who will deliver me from the body of this death? Will you? Where are your strengths, where is your presumption? Certainly you are somewhat silent; you are silent, but silent from exalting yourself, not from invoking God. Be silent and cry out. For God himself is silent and cries out; silent from judgment, not silent from command; so you, too, be silent from elation, do not be silent from invocation; lest God say to you: I was silent, will I always be silent? Therefore cry out: Wretched man that I am. Recognize yourself defeated, confound your strengths, and say: Wretched man that I am, who will deliver me from the body of this death? What had I said? The law frightens one who presumes upon himself. Behold, man presumed upon himself, tried to fight, could not overcome; he was defeated, prostrated, subjugated, taken captive. He learned to presume upon God, and whom the law frightened while presuming upon himself, it remains that grace helps the one who hopes in God. Confident in this, he says: Who will deliver me from the body of this death? The grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord. Now see the sweetness, taste it, let it savor to you; hear the Psalm: Taste and see that the Lord is sweet. He has become sweet to you because he delivered you. You were bitter to yourself when you presumed upon yourself. Drink the sweetness, receive the pledge of such a treasure.

Disciples under the law are not yet free from desires. Asking temporal things from God, they ask for nothing. The disciples of the Lord Jesus Christ were still under the law of the world, still to be nurtured, still to be corrected, still to be guided. For they still desired; though the law says: "You shall not desire." With all respect to those holy leaders, rams of the flock; with all respect I say, for I speak the truth; the Gospel speaks: they were disputing as to which of them was the greatest, and while the Lord was still on earth, the leadership among them was in discord. How was this otherwise than from the old leaven? How was this otherwise than from the law in the members, warring against the law of the mind? They sought preeminence. They indeed desired; they thought about who would be the greatest; hence their pride was confounded by a child. Jesus called a child to Him to quell their swelling ambition. Therefore, rightly, when they returned and said: "Lord, behold, even the demons are subject to us in Your name," (They rejoiced over nothing; how trivial was this compared to what God promised them?). The Lord, the Good Teacher, calming their fear and building up their stability, said to them: "Do not rejoice in this, that the demons are subject to you." Why this? Because: "Many will come in My name saying: 'Behold, in Your name we cast out demons;' and I will say to them: 'I never knew you.'" Do not rejoice in this, but rejoice that your names are written in heaven. You cannot yet be there, and yet you are already written there. Rejoice therefore. And that: "Until now, you have asked nothing in My name." For what you have asked, which I wish to give, is nothing. What have you asked in My name? That the demons might be subject to you? Do not rejoice in this; this is nothing; if it were something, He would command rejoicing. Therefore, it was not exactly nothing, but it was small compared to the greatness of God's rewards. For truly the Apostle Paul was not nothing; yet in comparison to God, he who plants is nothing, nor he who waters. And we say to you, and we say to ourselves, when we ask for these temporal things in Christ's name. Surely you have asked. For who does not ask? One asks for health if he is sick; another asks for deliverance if he is imprisoned; another requests a port if he is troubled at sea; another seeks victory if he is fighting an enemy; and he asks all in the name of Christ, and it is nothing he asks. What then should be asked? "Ask in My name." And He did not specify what, but from the words, we understand what we ought to ask. "Ask, and you shall receive, that your joy may be full." Ask, and you shall receive, in My name. But what? Not nothing; but what? That your joy may be full, that is, ask for what will suffice for you. For when you ask for nothing; whoever drinks of this water will thirst again. He lowers into the well the bucket of desire, raises it to drink, that he may thirst again. Ask that your joy may be full; that is, that you may be satisfied, not delighted for a time. Ask for what will suffice for you; say the words of Philip: "Lord, show us the Father, and it is enough for us." The Lord says to you: "Have I been with you so long, and you have not known Me? Philip, he who has seen Me has seen the Father." Therefore, give thanks to Christ, for He is ready to quench your thirsty soul with His divinity. Turn to the Lord, etc.

SERMON 145/A

From the Gospel of John (20, 26-28): And after eight days his disciples were again inside, and Thomas with them. Jesus came, the doors being shut, and stood in the midst, and said, "Peace to you!" Then He said to Thomas, "Reach your finger here, and look at My hands; and reach your hand here, and put it into My side. Do not be unbelieving, but believing." And Thomas answered and said to Him, "My Lord and my God!" Where Thomas touched the Lord's scars. The Lord's Day of the Octave of Easter Thomas the apostle touched the flesh of Christ, and proclaimed His divinity.

You have heard that those who do not see and believe are more praised by the Lord than those who see and believe, and even those who have been able to touch. For the apostle Thomas, when the Lord had shown himself to his disciples, was absent; and when he heard from them that Christ had risen, he said: Unless I put my hand into his side, I will not believe. What if, then, the Lord had risen without scars? Indeed, could he not have resurrected his flesh, so that no traces of wounds would remain in it? He could have done this; but unless he had retained the scars on his body, he would not have healed the wounds in our heart. He was touched, and he was recognized. It was not enough for him to see with his eyes; he wanted to believe with his fingers. Come, he says, put your fingers here; I did not take everything away, I kept something for you to believe in; and see my side, and do not be unbelieving, but faithful. But when he revealed to him what had remained doubtful, he exclaimed: My Lord and my God. He was touching the flesh, and he was calling out to the divinity. What did he touch? The body of Christ. Was the body of Christ the divinity of Christ? The divinity of Christ was the Word; the humanity of Christ was soul and flesh. He could not touch the soul itself, but he could understand it, because the body which had been dead was moving alive. But that Word is neither changed nor touched, neither diminished nor increased; because in the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. This is what Thomas cried out; he was touching the flesh, he was invoking the Word, because the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us.

Sermons - Sermon 146

SERMO 146 On the Words of the Gospel of John (21, 15-17):

"Simon, son of John, do you love me?", etc. The duty of the shepherd and the sheep. Our inheritance, God himself. In today's reading, your Charity has noticed that it was said to Peter by the Lord through questioning: Do you love me? To which he responded: You know, Lord, that I love you. This for the second time, this for the third time; and to every single word of the respondent, the Lord said: Feed my lambs. Christ entrusted to Peter his lambs to be fed, who also fed Peter. For what could Peter provide to the Lord, especially now bearing an immortal body and about to ascend into heaven? As if he said to him: Do you love me? Show in this way that you love me: Feed my sheep. Therefore, brothers, listen with obedience that you are the sheep of Christ; because we also listen with fear: Feed my sheep. If we feed with fear and are afraid for the sheep; how much more should the sheep themselves be afraid for themselves? Therefore, let the care pertain to us, obedience to you; pastoral vigilance to us, humility of the flock to you. Although we, who seem to speak to you from a higher place, are with fear beneath your feet; because we know how dangerous is the reckoning to be rendered from this supposedly exalted seat. Therefore, dearest ones, Catholic buds, members of Christ, think about what kind of head you have. Children of God, think about what kind of Father you have found. Christians, think about what inheritance is promised to you. Not one such as which can be possessed on earth by children only when their parents have died. For no one on earth possesses the inheritance of the father unless he dies. We will possess what is given by our living Father; for our Father cannot die. I add more, I say more, and I speak the truth; the Father himself will be our inheritance.

He commands the newly baptized to beware of evil Christians and schismatics.

Live in harmony, especially you who are candidates of Christ, newly baptized, just regenerated, as I have previously admonished you, and I now say, and I declare my concern; for the present evangelical reading has instilled greater fear in me; watch over yourselves, do not imitate bad Christians. Do not say: I will do this, because many faithful do this. This is not to prepare a defense for the soul, but to seek companions to hell. Grow in this field of the Lord; in this, you will find good ones, who will also please you if you are good yourselves. Are you indeed our own property? Heretics and schismatics have stolen dominical property for themselves, and have desired to feed not Christ's flocks, but their own against Christ. Clearly, in their very depredations, they have placed their own title, so that their loot might seem defended by the title of the powerful. What does Christ do when such people convert, who have received His baptismal title outside the Church? He casts out the predator, does not remove the title, and possesses the house; because He finds His title there. What need is there to change His name? Do they not heed what the Lord said to Peter: Feed my lambs, feed my sheep? Did He say: Feed your lambs, or: Feed your sheep? And to those excluded, what did He say in the Song of Songs to the Church? Speaking as the bridegroom to the bride, He said: If you do not know yourself, O fairest among women, go forth. As if saying: I do not cast you out, go forth yourself, if you do not know yourself, O fairest among women, if you do not know yourself in the mirror of Divine Scripture; if you, O beautiful woman, do not attend to the mirror which does not deceive you with a false luster; if you do not know because it was said of you: Your glory is over all the earth; because it was said of you: I will give you the nations as your inheritance, and the ends of the earth as your possession; and countless other testimonies that commend the Catholic Church. Therefore, if you do not know yourself, you have no part, you cannot be made an heir. So, go forth in the footsteps of the flocks, not in the company of the flock: and feed your kids, not as said to Peter: my sheep. To Peter it is said: my sheep; to the schismatics it is said: your kids. Here sheep, there kids; here mine, there yours. Recall the right and the left of our judge; recall where the kids will stand, and where the sheep; and it will be apparent to you where the right hand is and where the left, white and black, luminous and dark, beautiful and deformed, those to receive the kingdom and those to find eternal punishment.

Sermons - Sermon 147

SERMO 147 ABOUT THE SAME WORDS OF THE GOSPEL OF JOHN (21:15-19):

"Simon, son of John, do you love me more than these?" etc.

Peter's presumption and denial.

You remember that the Apostle Peter was disturbed at the Lord's passion before all of the Apostles. Disturbed by himself, but renewed by Christ. For he was first a bold presumer, and afterwards became a fearful denier. He had promised that he would die for the Lord, while the Lord was to die first for him. Therefore, when he said: "I will be with you even unto death" and "I will lay down my life for you," the Lord replied to him: "Will you lay down your life for me? Truly, I say to you, before the cock crows, you will deny me three times." The hour came; and because Christ was God, but Peter was man, the Scripture was fulfilled: "I said in my fear: Every man is a liar." The Apostle also says: "Since God is truthful, but every man is a liar." Christ was truthful, Peter was a liar.

Peter's love for Christ is true. The unity of all pastors is figured in Peter.

Now what? The Lord asks him, as you heard when the Gospel was read, and says to him: Simon, son of John, do you love me more than these? He responded and said: Yes, Lord, you know that I love you. And again, the Lord asked this, and a third time, He asked this. And to the one professing love, He entrusted the flock. For at each instance the Lord Jesus was saying to Peter who stated: I love you: Feed my lambs, feed my little sheep. In one Peter, the unity of all shepherds was figured, but of good ones, who know how to feed Christ’s sheep for Christ, not for themselves. Was Peter now a liar, or was he deceitfully responding that he loved the Lord? He was responding truthfully; he was responding what he saw in his heart. However, when he had said: I will lay down my life for you, he intended to presume upon future strength. Every man knows what he is like at the moment he speaks; but who knows what he will be like on the morrow? Thus Peter was referring his eyes back to his heart when the Lord questioned him, and confidently responded with what he saw there: Yes, Lord, you know that I love you. What I tell you, you know; what I see here in my heart, you also see. However, he did not dare to say what the Lord had asked exactly. For the Lord had not simply asked: Do you love me? but had added: Do you love me more than these? meaning: Do you love me more than these others do? He was speaking of the other disciples; he could only say: I love you; he did not dare to say: More than these. He did not wish to be a liar again. It sufficed for him to testify to his own heart; it was not right for him to judge the heart of another.

Peter deserted by Christ, and afterwards strengthened. Is Peter then truthful, or is Christ in Peter truthful? When the Lord Jesus Christ willed, He deserted Peter, and Peter was found as a mere man; but when it pleased the Lord Jesus Christ, He filled Peter, and Peter was found to be truthful. The Rock made Peter truthful; for the Rock was Christ. And what did Christ announce to him when Peter, for the third time, declared his love for Christ, and the Lord, for the third time, entrusted His sheep to Peter? He predicted his own suffering to him. "When you were younger," He said, "you girded yourself and walked where you wanted; but when you are old, you will stretch out your hands, and another will gird you and lead you where you do not want to go." The Evangelist explained to us what Christ had said. "This He said," he said, "signifying by what kind of death he would glorify God"; that is, because he was to be crucified for Christ; meaning, "You will stretch out your hands." Where is the denier? Then after these things, the Lord Christ said: "Follow Me." Not as before, when He called the disciples. Indeed, even then He said: "Follow Me"; but then it was for teaching, now it is for the crown. Did he not fear death when he denied Christ? He feared to face what Christ had suffered. But now he should no longer fear. For he saw living in the flesh Him whom he had seen hanging on the wood. Christ, by rising, took away the fear of death; and because He had removed the fear of death, He rightly inquired about Peter’s love. Thrice fear denied Him, thrice love confessed Him. The trinity of denial, the abandonment of truth; the trinity of confession, the testimony of love.

Sermons - Sermon 147A

SERMON 147/A OF THAT WHICH IS SAID IN THE GOSPEL OF JOHN (21, 15-19):

Simon, son of John, do you love me?

There would be no place for Peter to show his love for Christ if he were not a faithful shepherd.

All things that are now read from the holy Gospel were done and spoken after the resurrection of the Lord. We heard, therefore, the Lord Jesus Christ asking the Apostle Peter, asking whether he loved him. Thus the Lord was questioning a servant, the master a disciple, the creator a man, the redeemer a liberated one, the firm a timid one, the omniscient an ignorant one; and where he was making himself the one asking, there he was showing himself as the teacher. For Christ did not need to know anything that Peter was bearing in his heart. He asks once, he responds. It is not sufficient, he asks again, not something else, but what he had asked; he responds the same again. The question is repeated a third time, the love is responded to a third time; for he was asked three times on account of love, who had denied through fear three times. When the Lord was dying, he feared, he feared and denied; but the Lord rising implanted love, banished fear. For what would Peter now fear? For when he denied, it was indeed because he feared death; with the Lord rising, what would he fear, in whom he found death dead? Certainly it was he who now asked alive, who was buried dead; he was present, who had hung on the wood. When our Lord Jesus Christ was judged by the Jews, then Peter denied when questioned, and what is worse by a woman, and what is more disgraceful by a maidservant. Under the maidservant, he was frightened, under the Lord, he stood bravely. Confessing his love once, and again, and a third time, he entrusted his sheep. Do you love me? he said. Lord, you know that I love you. And he said: Feed my lambs. This once, this again, this a third time; as if Peter had nowhere to show his love for Christ, except to be a faithful shepherd under the prince of all shepherds. Do you love me? I love. And what will you offer, loving me? what will you bestow upon me, man to your creator? what will you bestow from your love, redeemed to your redeemer, as a soldier to your king? what will you bestow? This only I require: Feed my sheep. To call the sheep of Christ one's own is not a Catholic voice.

Nevertheless, see, brothers, because of wicked slave-men who have made the Lord's flock their own private property and divided what they did not purchase. For some unfaithful slaves have arisen, divided the flock of Christ, and in a certain manner, through their theft, made private property for themselves from his flock, and you hear them say: Those sheep are mine. What are you seeking among my sheep? You will not find yourself among my sheep. If we say they are mine, and they say they are theirs, Christ has lost His sheep. Place before your eyes the chief shepherd, the Lord of His flock, standing and discerning and judging among His slaves. What do you say? Those sheep are mine. And what do you say? Those are my sheep. Where are the ones I purchased? Wicked slaves, you call these your sheep, and you claim what I have purchased for you, even when you would perish if I had not purchased you. May it never be that we say you are our sheep; that voice is not Catholic, not genuine, not of Peter, because it is against the Rock. You are sheep, but of Him who purchased both us and you. We have one Lord: He is the shepherd, but not hired. He feeds His own, and, what no one else makes of sheep, both paid the price, and made the testament. Seek the price, it is His blood; seek the testament, it is the Gospel, which you heard being read just now. What did He say to Peter? Do you love Me? I love You. Feed My sheep. Are they yours? Do you want to know to whom He says yours? Listen in the holy book which is called the Song of Songs; there are read the holy love songs, the bridegroom and the bride, Christ and the Church. And the whole book is as it were a nuptial song, like they say epithalamium, but of the holy bedchamber, the chaste chamber: For He placed His tabernacle in the sun, that is, in the light, in public, where it could be seen, and not hidden. And He came forth as a bridegroom from His chamber; for He took on a marriage, human flesh. His wedding chamber was the virginal womb; there He joined the Church to Himself, so that what was foretold before might be fulfilled: And the two shall be one flesh. The Donatists are accustomed to express their own meaning in these words, not the meaning of the Scriptures. So these lovers, Christ and the Church, were speaking among themselves. The Church said to Him: "Announce to me, whom my soul loves, where you pasture, where you lie at noon? Why do I want you to announce to me where you pasture, where you lie at noon? Lest I become like one who is veiled over the flocks of your companions." Therefore, she says, "I want you to announce to me where you pasture, where you lie at noon, so that when I come to you, I do not go astray, lest I become like one who is veiled over the flocks of your companions," that is, lest I fall into flocks not yours, but of your companions. Like one who is veiled. What else is veiled but as if hidden and unknown? The Donatists are accustomed to assert their own interpretation in these words, not the sense of the Scriptures. This indeed they are accustomed to say. Africa is the south, the south of the world is Africa; therefore the Church asks the Lord: "Where do you pasture? Where do you lie?" and He replies: "At noon"; as if to say, do not seek me except in Africa. Read and understand, heretical mind. A mirror is presented to you now, find yourself here; understand that the bride still asks; why do you make the bridegroom already respond? Or acknowledge the feminine gender. "Where do you pasture, where do you lie at noon?" Lest I become like one who is veiled. A veiled one, I think, is a woman, not a man. Therefore, O Lord, let Africa be the south; let it be understood as they understand. Africa is the south; here the faction of the Donatists was formed; here, the great division and saw of dissension was drawn through the flock of Christ. Therefore, she asks like the overseas Church, where this division was not made: "Announce to me, whom my soul loves, where you pasture, where you lie at noon? For I hear there being said the part of Donatus, some Catholics, some Donatists; announce to me where you pasture, lest I come and go astray. There I seek the announcement, where I fear uncertainly. Announce to me where you pasture, where you lie at noon? Why do I want you to announce to me? Lest I become like one who is veiled; because to the part of Donatus, I am as if veiled, as if unknown; there I am preached, and to them it remains hidden." The Jews are more excusable than the heretics.

These are the words of Scripture: In the last days, the mountain of the Lord will be manifest, prepared on the summit of the mountains, and it will be exalted above the hills, and all nations will come to it. It is called a mountain, and part of Donatus has covered the mountain. If one stumbles upon a stone, he is to be forgiven; if one stumbles upon a mountain, what kind of eyes does he have? My brothers, the Jews can be excused more easily; for the Jews stumbled upon a stone, while heretics stumble upon a mountain. How did the Jews stumble upon a stone? Because Christ, when he suffered, was still small; and it was said: They stumbled upon a stone of offence.

But the holy Daniel saw a vision, and wrote what he saw, and he said he saw a stone cut out of the mountain without hands. Christ is the one coming from the Judean people; and that was also a mountain, because it has a kingdom. What does "Without hands" mean? A stone cut without human work because a male's work did not approach the virgin, so that he was born without human work. The stone cut out of the mountain without hands shattered the statue, in which the kingdoms of the lands were signified. And what was said? He is the stone upon which the Jews stumbled; they stumbled upon a stone of offense. Who is the mountain upon which the heretics stumbled? Listen to Daniel himself: And the stone grew, he said, and became a great mountain, so that it filled the entire face of the earth. Rightly does the Psalm say to Christ the Lord rising: Be exalted above the heavens, O God, and let your glory be over all the earth. What does it mean: Let your glory be over all the earth? Over all the earth your Church, over all the earth your bride. And yet it says: Tell me, whom my soul loves. I am now everywhere, I now hold all lands, and I am covered with Africans. Therefore, tell me, lest I become as one covered among the flocks, not of your sheep, but of your companions. For companions have made schisms. Who are the companions? Those who have come to the table of the Lord, about whom the Psalm says elsewhere: He who was eating my bread; of whom it says: If an enemy had reviled me, I would have endured it; and if he who hated me had spoken great things against me, I would have hidden myself from him; but you, a man of one mind, my guide and my well-known, who used to take sweet morsels with me; in the house of the Lord we walked in agreement. At one time in agreement, now in disagreement, because without sense. These are the companions whom she feared to fall among. I fear, she says, that I might err; I fear that I might, as covered, fall into the flocks of your companions lest by wandering I perish, lest by repeating the baptism which I received, I lose it all. By following the Shepherd's footsteps, we do not go astray.

You have heard the concern of the bride, now hear the response of the groom. When this was said by the bride, the groom immediately responded: Unless you know yourself, O beautiful among women, Catholic, beautiful among heresies, unless you know yourself, unless you pay attention to know yourself there where you have learned of me, unless you prefer my Scriptures over human rumors, unless you know yourself because you are everywhere, unless you know yourself because you were designated where it was said: Ask of me, and I will give you the nations as your inheritance; unless, therefore, you know yourself, then what? Go out; unless you know, go out. A bad word, a sorrowful word, Go out. May God turn this away from us! See, it is said of those: They went out from us, but they were not of us. To the evil servant it is said: Go out, because the servant does not remain in the house forever, the son remains forever. Do you want to see that it is said to the evil servant: Go out? What is said to the good servant? Enter into the joy of your Lord. Therefore, everyone who hears, everyone who is a member of his bride, should fear what is said: Unless you know yourself, O beautiful among women, go out in the tracks of the flocks. What does it mean: in the tracks of the flocks? Through the errors of men, not in the voice of the shepherd. We, brothers, do not go out in the tracks of the flocks; we have the tracks of the shepherd, which by following we do not err. Christ suffered for us, leaving us an example, so that we might follow in his tracks. Therefore, unless you know yourself, go out in the tracks of the flocks, And feed your kids. Both kids, and yours. You know the sheep on the right, the kids on the left. And feed your kids. Why, your kids? Because you go out, you feed like Donatus your kids; but if you do not go out, you feed like Peter my sheep. It is ended.

Sermons - Sermon 148

SERMO 148 OF THE WORDS OF THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES 5, 4:

"Was it not remaining yours while it remained?" On the Lord's Day of the Octave of Easter Addressed to the Twenty Holy Martyrs The correction of Ananias and Sapphira not harsher, temporal death. When the reading was being read from the book entitled Acts of the Apostles, you noticed what happened to those who, having sold a property, withheld part of the price of the property and placed it at the apostles' feet as if it were the entire price. Immediately, both the man and his wife, seized, expired. Some consider this correction too severe, that people died because of money withheld from their own property. The Holy Spirit did not do this out of avarice, but the Holy Spirit punished the lie so. For you heard the words of the most blessed Peter, saying: Was it not remaining to you while it remained, and after it was sold, was it not in your power? If you did not wish to sell it, who would compel you? If you wished to offer half, who would demand the whole? For if half was to be offered, half was to be declared. For half as the whole, this is the lie to be punished. Nonetheless, brothers, do not consider this correction of temporal death severe. And may it be desired that punishment proceeded thus far. For what grave thing happens to mortals who will die at some point? But through their temporal punishment, God wished discipline to be known. It is to be believed that after this life, God spared them; for his mercy is great. Concerning deaths that occur from retribution, the apostle Paul said in one place, correcting those who misused the body and blood of Christ and saying: Therefore, many among you are weak and sick, and many sleep sufficiently; that is, as much as suffices for imposing discipline. Many among you sleep, that is, die. For they were corrected by the Lord's scourge; they became sick and died. And he added after these words, and said: For if we judged ourselves, we would not be judged by the Lord. However, when we are judged, we are disciplined by the Lord, so that we are not condemned with the world. What if, therefore, something like this happened to this man and his wife? They were corrected by the scourge of death, so that they might not be punished by eternal torment.

Vows are to be rendered to God.

Let your Charity attend to this: if it displeased God that people took away from the money which they had vowed to God, and surely that money was necessary for the uses of men; how much more does God become angry when chastity is vowed and not fulfilled, when virginity is vowed and not kept? For it is vowed for the uses of God, and not for the uses of men. What does it mean that I say: For the uses of God? Because God makes for Himself a house from the saints, He makes for Himself a temple, in which He deigns to dwell; and surely He wants His temple to remain holy. So it can be said to the consecrated virgin who marries what Peter said about the money: Was not your virginity remaining yours, and before you vowed it, was it not in your power? Whoever has done these things, vowed such, and not fulfilled; let them not think they are punished by temporal deaths, but condemned by eternal fire.

Sermons - Sermon 149

SERMO 149 IN WHICH QUESTIONS ARE RAISED FROM THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES (CHAPTER 10) And from the Gospel, they are resolved; or concerning the four questions;

First, concerning the vision of Peter. Second, concerning the words of the Gospel:

"Let your light shine before men,"

"That they may see your good works," etc. And a little later:

"Beware of practicing your righteousness before men,"

"SO THAT YOU MAY BE SEEN BY THEM," ETC. THIRD, ON THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL:

FOURTH, ON THE LOVE OF THE ENEMY (MT 5:16; 6:1-4; 5:43-48) Questions to be resolved: first question, concerning the vision of Peter.

Before last Sunday, I remember that I became a debtor to Your Holiness for certain questions proposed from the Scriptures. But now, as much as the Lord deigns to grant, it is the time to resolve them, lest we owe anything longer, except only love, which is always returned and always owed. We said that there should be an inquiry about the vision of Peter, what that vessel might mean; as if a sheet let down from heaven by four corners, in which were all the four-footed animals of the earth, and creeping things, and birds of the sky; and that it was said to Peter by the divine voice: “Kill and eat”; and that this happened three times and was taken up.

Gluttony was not commanded to Peter.

Against those who think that gluttony was commanded by the Lord God to Peter, it is easy to argue. First, because even if we wish to take literally what was said: "Kill and eat," it is not a sin to kill and eat, but to use immoderately the gifts of God, which He provided for human use. The abstinence of the Jews from unclean animals was symbolic. For the Jews had received certain animals which they might eat, and certain ones from which they should abstain; which the apostle Paul indicates they received in the signification of future things, saying: Therefore let no one judge you in food, or in drink, or in part of a feast day, or of the new moon, or of the sabbaths, which are a shadow of things to come. Therefore already in the times of the Church, he says in another place: All things indeed are clean to the clean, but it is evil for the man who eats with offense. For there were those at that time, when the Apostle was writing these things, who ate meats, to the offense of some of the weaker brethren. For the meat of those animals which soothsayers sacrificed was then sold in the market, and many brethren abstained from eating meat, lest they unwittingly encounter meats of which sacrifices had been made to idols. Whence in another place the same Apostle, so that their conscience might not tremble with fear, says: Eat everything that is sold in the market, asking no questions for conscience's sake. For the earth is the Lord's, and all its fullness. And again: If anyone from the unbelievers invites you, and you wish to go; eat whatever is set before you, asking no questions for conscience's sake. But if anyone says to you: This has been offered in sacrifice; do not eat it, for the sake of the one who informed you, and for the sake of conscience. Therefore everything in these matters, whether clean or unclean, is established not in the touching of flesh, but in the purity of conscience, or in the stain.

Animals prohibited to the Jews are signs.

Whence was given the freedom to Christians, which was not given to the Jews. For all the animals that are forbidden to the Jews to eat are signs of things, and as it is said, shadows of things to come. Just as that circumcision signifies the circumcision of the heart, which they bore in the flesh, and repudiated in the heart; so too those feasts are precepts of mysteries, and signs of things to come. Just as it is written for them, to eat those that chew the cud and have split hooves; but not to eat those to which one or both of these characteristics are lacking; certain men are signified who do not belong to the society of saints. For the split hoof pertains to morals, and chewing the cud pertains to wisdom. Why to morals the split hoof? Because it slips with difficulty. For slipping is a sign of sin. How does chewing the cud pertain to the doctrine of wisdom? Because the Scripture says: “A desirable treasure rests in the mouth of the wise, but a foolish man swallows it up.” Therefore, he who hears and through negligence becomes forgetful, swallows what he heard; so that now it has no taste in his mouth, burying the very hearing in forgetfulness. But he who meditates on the law of the Lord day and night, as if chews the cud, and in the palate of the heart enjoys the taste of the word. Therefore, what was commanded to the Jews signifies that those do not belong to the Church, that is, to the body of Christ, to the grace and society of saints, who are either negligent listeners, or have bad morals, or are reprehensible in both vices.

Why the precepts of Jewish observances are read to Christians.

Thus all other things that were commanded in this manner to the Jews are shadowy indications of future things. After the light of the world, our Lord Jesus Christ, came, they are read only to be understood, not also to be observed. Therefore, license was given to Christians that, according to this vain custom, they should not do, but eat what they want, with moderation, with blessing, with thanksgiving. Thus perhaps it was said to Peter: Kill and eat; so that he should no longer hold the observances of the Jews; yet it was not commanded to him as a glutton of the stomach and foul voracity. A figurative vision of Peter. But yet, in order for you to understand that this was shown as a figure, there were crawling creatures in that vessel. Could he indeed eat serpents? What then does this signify? That vessel signifies the Church: the four lines by which it was extended represent the four parts of the world, through which the Catholic Church extends, which is spread everywhere. Therefore, whoever wishes to go into a part and separate from the whole does not belong to the mystery of the four lines. But if it does not pertain to Peter's vision, nor to the keys given to Peter. For from the four winds, God says he will gather his saints in the end; because now through all these four corners the evangelical faith is spread. Therefore, those animals are the Gentiles. For all the Gentiles, who were unclean in their errors and superstitions and lusts before Christ came, upon his coming, with their sins forgiven, were made clean. Hence now, after the remission of sins, why should they not be received into the body of Christ, which is the Church of God, whose person Peter bore?

Peter bears the character of the Church. For Peter appears in many places of Scripture to bear the person of the Church; especially in that place where it is said: To you I hand over the keys of the kingdom of heaven. Whatever you bind on earth will be bound also in heaven; and whatever you loose on earth will be loosed also in heaven. Did Peter receive these keys, and Paul did not receive them? Did Peter receive them, and John and James did not receive them, and the other Apostles? Or are not these keys in the Church, where sins are forgiven daily? But because Peter was bearing the person of the Church in signification, what was given to him alone was given to the Church. Therefore, Peter was bearing the figure of the Church; the Church is the body of Christ. Let therefore the Gentiles, already purified and whose sins have been forgiven, be accepted; from which Cornelius, a Gentile man, and those who were Gentiles with him, had sent to him. His alms had been accepted and had cleansed him in some manner; it remained that, as clean food, he would be incorporated into the Church, that is, the body of the Lord. But Peter feared to deliver the Gospel to the Gentiles; because those who had believed from the circumcision prohibited the Apostles from delivering the Christian faith to the uncircumcised; and they said that they should not approach the participation of the Gospel, unless they had received the circumcision, which had been handed down to their ancestors. The reception of the Gentiles within the Church. That vessel therefore removed this doubt; and thus, after that vision, he was instructed by the Holy Spirit to descend and go with those who had come from Cornelius, and he went. For Cornelius and those who were with him were regarded as being among those animals which had been shown in the vessel; yet God had already purified them, because He had accepted their alms. Therefore, they were to be killed and eaten, that is, that their former life, in which they did not know Christ, should die in them; and they should enter into His body, as into a new life of the fellowship of the Church. For even Peter himself, when he had come to them, briefly recalled what had been shown to him in that vision. For he said: "And you know how unlawful it is for a Jewish man to join or approach a foreigner; but God has shown me that I should not call any man common or unclean." God indeed showed this then, when that voice sounded: "What God has cleansed, do not call unclean." And later, when he came to the brothers in Jerusalem, as some were agitated that the Gospel was being delivered to the Gentiles, calming their agitation, he also recalled that vision; which would not have been worth recalling unless it pertained to the same understanding. The linen of Peter's vision.

Perhaps it may also be asked why it was a linen cloth in which those animals were. Surely not without reason. For we know that the moth does not consume linen, which corrupts other garments. Let each one exclude from his heart the corruptions of evil desires, and thus be immovably established in faith without being penetrated by perverse thoughts, like moths, if he wishes to belong to the sacrament of that linen cloth, by which the Church is figured.

Threefold humility.

Why was it sent down from heaven three times? Because all the Nations themselves, which belong to the four parts of the world, where the Church is spread, symbolized by the four lines by which that vessel was connected, are baptized in the name of the Trinity. Those who believe in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit are regenerated, so that they belong to the fellowship and communion of the saints. Therefore, the four lines and the triple descent also indicate the number of the twelve Apostles, as if appointed three by four. For four times three make twelve. Enough, I think, has been discussed about this vision.

Second question, from the Gospel.

Another question was postponed by us, why the Lord, in the same sermon which he gave on the mount, said to his disciples: Let your works shine before men, that they may see your good deeds, and glorify your Father who is in heaven. And a little later in that same sermon he says: Beware of practicing your righteousness before men to be seen by them; and: Let your alms be in secret, and your Father who sees in secret will reward you. Often the doer wavers between these two commandments, and does not know which to obey, when indeed he wishes to obey the Lord, who commanded both. How will our works shine before men, that they may see our good deeds; and how will our alms be in secret again? If I wish to observe this, I offend against that; if I observe that, I sin here. Therefore each place of Scripture must be moderated in such a way that divine precepts cannot be shown to be in opposition to each other. For this apparent conflict in words seeks the peace of the interpreter. Let each one have harmony in his heart with God's word, and there is no discord in Scripture.

Discord from the improper interpretation of passages.

Therefore, propose a man doing alms, in such a way that no one at all knows, if it can be done, not even the one to whom it is given; avoiding also his eyes, he should prefer to place what he finds rather than hand over what he receives. What more can he do to hide his alms? He surely incurs that sentence, and does not do what the Lord said: Let your deeds shine before men, that they may see your good works. No one sees his good deeds, he does not invite imitation. The others will be barren, as far as it depends on him, while they think that no one does what God commands, if men act such that their good works are not seen; since greater mercy is bestowed upon him, to whom the example of good imitation is shown, than to whom the food for refreshing the body is handed. Propose another ventilating and boasting his alms among the people, desiring nothing other in them than to be praised; his deeds shine before men. You see that he does not offend against that command; but he offends against the other saying of the Lord: Let your alms be in secret. Such a one, even neglects, if there are some impious ones who perhaps reproach what he does. He depends on the tongue of the praisers; he is, however, like the virgins who do not carry oil with them. For you know the five foolish virgins, who did not carry oil with them; but the wise ones carried oil with them. The lamps of all were shining: but some did not have with them what they had to sustain that light, and they were so distinguished from those who had, that the foolish were called foolish, the wise were called wise. What is it then to carry oil with oneself, but to have the conscience of pleasing God with good works, and not to place the end of one's joy there, if men praise, who cannot see conscientiousness? For man can see what he does; but with what mind he does it, God sees.

Places that are seemingly opposed are reconciled.

Let us therefore propose someone keeping both commandments, obedient to both. He extends bread to the hungry and extends it before those whom he wants to make his imitators; having also imitated the Apostle saying: Be imitators of me, as I am of Christ. Therefore, he extends bread to the poor, manifest in deed, devout in heart. Whether he seeks his own praise there, or the glory of God, no man sees, no man judges; but those who are ready with benevolent zeal to imitate believe that what they see being done well is also done with a pious mind; and they praise God, by whose command and gift they see such things done. Therefore, his work appears so that men may see and glorify the Father who is in heaven; but its effect is in the heart, so that his almsgiving is in secret, and the Father who sees in secret will reward him. This one kept the proper measure, not a despiser of any commandment, but a fulfiller of both. For he took care that his righteousness would not be before men, that is, that it would not end there, to be praised by men, when he wanted not himself, but God to be praised in his good work. Since that will is within the conscience itself, that almsgiving was in secret, so that He who sees everything hidden may reward him. For who can show his heart to men when he acts, to show with what intention of mind he does it? The legitimate sense of each place is derived from the words of Christ themselves.

For, brothers, those words themselves were said by the Lord with sufficient consideration. Observe how He says: Be careful not to practice your righteousness in front of others to be seen by them. If He had ended where He said “to be seen by them,” this end is reprehensible and blameworthy, wanting to do good up to the praise by men, seeking nothing more from it. Therefore, anyone who does so only to be seen by men is rebuked by the Lord in this teaching. Rather, where He commands that our good deeds be seen, He did not place the end there so that just men would see the man, and praise the man; but it passes to the glory of God, so that the intention of the doer is led up to that. He says, Let your works shine before men, so that they may see your good works; but you should not seek this. What then? He adds and says: and glorify your Father who is in heaven. If you seek this, so that God may be glorified, do not fear to be seen by men. Even so, your charity is inwardly in secret; where only He whose glory you seek sees you seeking this. Hence, after the apostle Paul was struck down as a persecutor of the Gospel, and raised up as a preacher, he says: I was unknown by face to the churches of Judea which were in Christ. They had only heard that he who once persecuted us now preaches the faith he once tried to destroy; and in me, he says, they glorified God. He did not rejoice because the man who had received was recognized; but because God who gave was praised. For he himself said: If I were still trying to please people, I would not be a servant of Christ. Yet in another place he says: Even as I try to please everyone in every way. And that is a similar question. But what does he add? Not seeking what is profitable for me, but what is profitable for many, that they may be saved. This is what he meant there: And in me they glorified God; as also the Lord says: That they may glorify your Father who is in heaven. For they are saved when, in the works which they see performed by men, they glorify Him from whom these men received them. The third question, about the Gospel, is that the left hand should not know what the right hand is doing.

Two questions remain; but I fear that I may be a burden to those who are already weary, and likewise I fear that I may deceive those who are still hungry. Yet I remember what I have solved and what I owe. It remains to be seen what this means: "Let not your left hand know what your right hand does"; and about the love of the enemy, why was it considered permissible for the ancients to hate their enemies, whom we are commanded to love. But what should I do? If I discuss these briefly, perhaps I will not be understood as I ought; if I discuss longer, I fear that I may burden you more with the weight of my speech than relieve you with the benefit of the explanation. But certainly, if you understand less than enough, you will hold me still as a debtor, so that these things may be discussed more fully at another time. However, now these things should not be left so that nothing at all is said about them. The left hand is the desire of the carnal mind, the right hand is the charity of the spiritual mind. Therefore, if when someone gives alms, they mix in the desire for temporal advantages, seeking something of that kind through that work; they mix the awareness of the left hand with the works of the right hand. But if he assists a man with simple charity and pure conscience before God, aiming at nothing else than to please Him who commands these things, the left hand does not know what the right hand does.

Fourth question, about the love and hatred of the enemy. The question of loving an enemy is more difficult and cannot be resolved briefly. But when you hear this, pray for us, and perhaps the Lord God will quickly give what we consider difficult. For we live from one granary; because we are in one family. What we think is very hidden within, perhaps He who promises places it on the threshold, so that it may be given most easily to those who ask. The Lord Christ Himself loved His enemies; for, hanging on the cross, He said: Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing. Stephen followed His example, when stones were cast at him, and he said: Lord, do not hold this sin against them. The servant imitated the Lord, so that no servant may be lazy and think that this was something only the Lord could do. Therefore, if it is too much for us to imitate the Lord, let us imitate the fellow servant. For we are all called to the same grace. Why then was it said to the ancients: You shall love your neighbor and hate your enemy? Because perhaps it was truly said to them; but to us more openly, according to the distribution of times, through His presence who saw what should be concealed or revealed to whom. For if we have an enemy whom we are never commanded to love; however, it is the devil: You shall love your neighbor, a man; and hate your enemy, the devil. But since enmity often exists within humans, in their spirits who give place to the devil through infidelity and become his vessels in order to work in the children of disobedience; it can happen that a man abandons his evil and turns to the Lord; and while he is still raging, still persecuting, he must be loved, and prayed for, and good must be done to him; thus you will fulfill the first commandment, to love your neighbor, a man, and hate your enemy, the devil; and the second, to love your human enemies and pray for those who persecute you.

Pray for those who persecute.

Unless perhaps you think that Christians did not pray at that time for Saul, the persecutor of Christians. Perhaps the voice of Stephen the martyr was heard for his conversion. For he was in that number of his persecutors, and he kept the garments of those who stoned him. The same also, writing to Timothy, says: I beseech therefore, first of all, that supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks be made for all men, for kings, and for all that are in authority, that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life. Therefore, he commanded to pray for kings; and then kings persecuted the churches. But those whom they then persecuted praying for them, now being heard, defend them. The one closest in name is also commanded to be loved as an enemy. Do you wish to also keep that commandment of the ancients? Love your neighbor, that is, every human being. For we are all certainly neighbors, having been born from two first parents. Surely, our Lord Jesus Christ himself, who commands enemies to be loved, has testified that in these two commandments the entire Law and the Prophets are contained: You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind; and: You shall love your neighbor as yourself. He did not command anything there about the love of an enemy. So do these two commandments not contain everything? By no means. Because when he says: You shall love your neighbor, all people are included there, even if they are enemies; for, according to spiritual kinship, you do not know what a man is to you in the foreknowledge of God, who seems to you an enemy for a time. For the patience of God leads him to repentance, perhaps he will know and follow the one leading him. For if God himself, who knows who will persevere in sins, who will abandon justice and irrevocably fall into iniquity, still makes his sun rise over the good and the evil, and rains on the just and the unjust, surely inviting to repentance through patience, so that those who have neglected his goodness may experience severity at the end; how much care must a man take to be placable, lest, not knowing what he will be like, he may hate him who will reign with him in eternal happiness after having considered his present enmities? Therefore, fulfill the first commandment: Love your neighbor, every human being; and hate your enemy, the devil. Also fulfill the second. Love your enemies, but as humans; pray for those who persecute you, but as humans; do good to those who hate you, but as humans. The place of the Apostle is explained.

If your enemy is hungry, feed him; if he is thirsty, give him something to drink; for by doing so, you will heap burning coals on his head. And here lies the question. For how can one love whom he wishes to burn with coals? But if it is understood, there is no contention. For it is said of those destructive coals which are given to a man against a deceitful tongue. For when anyone has done good to an enemy, and not overcome by his evil, has overcome evil with good; often he will regret his enmities, and will rage against himself for having harmed such a good man. Moreover, the burning itself is repentance, which, like burning coals, consumes his enmities and malice.

Sermons - Sermon 14A

SERMON 14/A "The end is either of consumption or of completion."

Brothers, let us pay attention to what we have sung. From where the psalm is spoken, from there the psalm is presented. With the help of the Lord, let us speak something from what is written and what is fresh in voices and ears: Your discipline has directed me to the end, and Your discipline itself will teach me. For we seek to where we are directed, and what discipline it is that directs us, and what kind of doctrine this is. We want to be directed, and perhaps we inquire where we are directed. We have heard: to the end. However, when the end is spoken of, it is either of consumption or of perfection. Consumption causes to not be, perfection causes to be perfect. Food is ended by consuming, clothing is ended by weaving. Food is ended by consuming, so that it is not; clothing is ended by weaving, so that it is perfect. Therefore, without a doubt, we seek to be directed to such an end where we are perfected, not where we are consumed. The end of the law is Christ. Who then is this end, and what is the teaching? The end is Christ, the teaching is the law. Listen to the apostle: The end of the law is Christ, for righteousness to everyone who believes. This is therefore - to say it more plainly now and explain what we sang - this is your teaching directed me to the end, which is your law directed me to the end, your law directed me to Christ. The Jews have the law, but it did not direct them to the end. Indeed, they came to the end because they saw Christ, but by stumbling on the final stone, they transgressed, by stumbling on Christ they fell and fell outside the end. For they rejected him whom they ought to have come to. Hence that very end was made a stone of stumbling for non-believers, a cornerstone for believers. To you, [says] the apostle Peter, who believed, the stone rejected by the builders has become the head of the corner, but for non-believers a stone of stumbling and a rock of offense.

Faith of demons and faith of Christians.

We know what the end is; we have already spoken last Sunday about what it means to be directed toward the end. For to be directed toward the end is to come to Christ, that is, to believe in Christ. Must the same things repeatedly be said? You need to be reminded, not burdened. Although saying the same things to you is indeed not tiresome for us, it is safe for you. We have discussed this for the sake of those who think it is enough to believe and love to live wickedly, thinking that by believing they will be saved and by living wickedly they will not perish. Therefore, we have discussed that there must be a difference between the faith of Christians and the faith of demons, because they also believe - they said to Christ: "We know who you are." They believed Christ, but they did not believe in Christ. So, how then is one who believes Christ distinguished from one who believes in Christ? Because everyone who believes in Christ without a doubt immediately believes Christ, but not everyone who believes Christ immediately believes in Christ. The Son of God summed up all the work of God in this, by saying: "This is the work of God, that you believe in him whom he has sent." For what end, if not Himself? Do not seek an end beyond Him, lest by seeking an end beyond Him you become consumed, not perfected. For what is the end if not that to which we want to come, to stand and seek nothing further? For if you arrive but still seek, you have not yet reached the end. Therefore, to reach the end is to arrive at the point where you say, "It is enough."

"God is the end." When Philip thought that the Father alone was God and said, "Lord, show us the Father, and it is enough for us," the Lord showed him that the end is God, but God is a Trinity. Therefore, when you say, "The end is Christ," you do not separate God the Father from it, nor when you say, "The end is God the Father," do you separate Christ from it. He who wanted to separate, thinking that Christ alone was what he knew by sight, said joyfully: "Show us the Father, and it is enough for us." What does "It is enough for us" mean? There is the end of desire: we will seek nothing further; there will be our satisfaction, there we shall say, "It is enough, I want nothing more." Why is this? Because we know you already, show us the Father. For when we see you and do not see Him, it is not enough for us. We rejoice because we see you, but show Him to us, and it is enough for us: we will seek nothing more. And the Lord to him, because He Himself is the end, because He Himself satisfies, to take away from him what he thought - for he thought he did not see the Son of God when he saw the form of a servant - said to Philip: "So long a time I have been with you, and you have not known me? When you seek the end and do not see what you see - therefore indeed you seek the end, because you do not see that the end stands before you -, Do you not believe, He said, that I am in the Father and the Father in me?"

He who believes in the Son has eternal life. To this we are also encouraged by the reading that follows, which was read today from the Gospel: This is the will of the Father, that everyone who sees the Son and believes in Him should have eternal life. And I will raise him up on the last day. You were seeking an end: do you seek more than eternal life? This is the will of the Father, that everyone who sees the Son and believes in Him should have eternal life. And I will raise him up on the last day. What do we say, my brothers? For this vision, what eyes do we seek? For see another definition demonstrated today, similar indeed to the previous one, of which we have already spoken: This is the work of God, that you believe in Him whom He has sent. And what does He say here? This is the will of the Father, as if to say: This is the work of God. For he who does the work of God does the will of God. This is the will of the Father, that everyone who sees the Son and believes in Him should have eternal life. He said two things. [Everyone who sees] This is the work of God, that you believe in Him whom He has sent. But here He added: who sees and believes. The Jews saw, but did not believe; they had one, the other was lacking. How could they reach eternal life without the other? If therefore those who saw did not reach because they did not believe, we who believe but have not seen - if those two things merit eternal life: to see and to believe, and those who lack one do not reach the reward of eternal life -, what shall we do? One thing was lacking to the Jews, another to us. They had seeing, but lacked believing. We have believing, but lack seeing. For according to this that belief is present and seeing is absent, we were blessed in prophecy by the Lord Himself, for when Thomas, one of the twelve, touched the scars by feeling them...

Sermons - Sermon 15

SERMO 15

Sermon Delivered in the Third Region IN THE BASILICA OF PETER AT CARTHAGE On the verse of the Psalm:

"Lord, I have loved the beauty of Your house." The house of God is the Christians,

We love the beauty of the house of the Lord and the place of the tabernacle of His glory, if we are ourselves. What then is the beauty of the house of the Lord and the place of the tabernacle of His glory, if not His temple of which the Apostle says: "For the temple of God is holy, which you are"? Just as in constructed buildings, when they are elegantly and magnificently built, our physical sight is pleased, so when living stones, the hearts of the faithful, are bound by the bond of charity, it is the beauty of the house of God and the place of the tabernacle of His glory. Therefore, learn what you ought to love, so that you may be able to love. For he who loves the beauty of the house of God, there is no doubt that he loves the Church, not in wrought walls and roofs, not in the sheen of marbles and golden ceilings, but in faithful, holy people, loving God with all their heart and with all their soul and with all their mind, and their neighbor as themselves.

Many are Christians, but few are vessels for honor. But in the Christian congregation, as much as it pertains to the participation and communion of the sacraments, they have been multiplied beyond number. There is therefore a number, and others beyond the number. The number consists of those whom the Apostle says: "The Lord knows those who are his." Beyond the number, however, because in a great house there are not only gold and silver vessels, but also wooden and earthenware; some indeed for honor, others for dishonor. Therefore, the number is of vessels for honor; beyond the number are vessels for dishonor. Since these are the two kinds of vessels, do we doubt where the decor of God's house is? If therefore you wish to love, doing what you have sung, the decor of the house of God and the place of the tabernacle of His glory, seek the vessels for honor. And I do not want you to say: "I sought, and did not find." For indeed you did not find because you were not what you sought. Similar adheres to similar, dissimilar flees from dissimilar. If you are a vessel for dishonor, doubtless a vessel for honor will be burdensome to you even to see. Do you not hear how some say about someone: "He is even burdensome to us to look at"? What is burdensome for you to see, when will it be open for you to find? For these vessels are of the inner people. Certainly, when a just man has been seen, he is not immediately recognized as just. Both the just and the unjust have the same appearance. Each is a man, but not each belongs to the house of God, even if both are called Christians. Each is a vessel, but not each is for honor, but one for honor, the other for dishonor.

God uses even evils well. Shall the great house be deserted because of bad vessels? God, that is, the Lord of the great house, knows how to use both vessels for honor and vessels for dishonor. Just as the wicked use good things wickedly, so on the contrary, God knows how to use even evil things well. How many good things do the wicked use! For every creation of God is good. How do the wicked use them wickedly? How does Scripture rebuke them, saying: You ask and do not receive, because you ask wrongly, to spend it on your passions. What name do those who misuse the good things of God receive? It follows, and says: Adulterers. Why adulterers? Do you not know that friendship with the world is enmity with God? Adulterers, it says. There are adulterous souls, there are fornicating souls: let us examine them. Fornicating souls are, in a way, prostituted to many false gods; adulterous souls, however, are joined in legitimate marriage but do not keep the chastity of that legitimate marriage. To say this more precisely, the pagan soul is fornicating, the wicked Christian soul is adulterous. The pagan soul does not have a legitimate husband; it is corrupted by various demons to which it is prostituted. But why is the wicked Christian soul adulterous? Because it neither loves chastity nor leaves its husband. Therefore, do not say: "Why are they in the house of God?" It is answered to you: They are vessels for dishonor. God knows how to use them. He who created them knows, for he who could create them knows how to order them: they have their place in the great house. If you ask me how God uses them well, I confess, as a man, I cannot explain God’s counsel. For I know, with the Apostle Paul, to tremble at what he too considered and trembled, and trembling, he exclaimed: Oh, the depth of the riches and wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments and how inscrutable his ways! For who has known the mind of the Lord, or who has been his counselor? Or who has given a gift to him that he might be repaid? For from him and through him and to him are all things. To him be glory forever. Our part is consideration, admiration, trembling, exclamation, because there is no penetration. But to him what? Glory forever. Whether from vessels for honor or from vessels for dishonor, to him be glory forever. He crowns some, he condemns others, he never errs. He tests some, from others he makes a test, he orders all. The good are purified in tribulations like gold in fire.

"What do evil men do in this world?" he says. Answer me. In the goldsmith's furnace, what does chaff do? I think chaff is not there without reason where gold is purified. Let us see what all things are there: there is a furnace, there is chaff, there is gold, there is fire, there is the craftsman. But those three, gold, chaff, and fire, are in the furnace; the craftsman is at the furnace. Consider this world as well. The world is the furnace; evil men are the chaff; good men are the gold; tribulation is the fire; God is the craftsman. Observe and see: gold is not purified if chaff is not burned. But see in this psalm, where we love the beauty of the house of God and the place of the tabernacle of His glory, see there the gold, see the voice of gold. It desires to be purified: "Test me, O Lord, and try me, burn my mind." "Test me, O Lord, and try me." "Test me," he says, "O Lord, and try me." He who ought to have feared the trial asks for the trial. "Test me," he says, "O Lord, and try me." And see if he does not seek the fire: "Test me and try me, burn my mind and my heart." Do you not fear lest you fail in the fire? "No," he says. Why? "Because your mercy is before my eyes." Behold, he says, why I securely say, "Test me, O Lord, and try me, burn my mind and my heart," not because I am able by my own strength to endure the fire of trial, but because your mercy is before my eyes. "You who have granted me to be tested as gold, will you allow me to perish in the furnace?" Indeed, you send me in to be purified, you cast me out purified. "May the Lord guard your entrance and your exit." See the very exit, see the entrance into the furnace. "Count it all joy, my brothers, when you meet various trials." Behold, you have heard the entrance, seek the exit. For it is easy to enter; to exit is great. But do not fear: God is faithful - for indeed as you had entered, you were thinking of the exit - God is faithful, who will not allow you to be tempted beyond what you can bear, but with the trial will also make the exit. What is the exit? That you may endure. You have entered, you have encountered, you have endured, you have exited." The abundance of evils is the material of the purification of goods. A great matter for the purification of the good is the abundance of the bad. For in the multitude of the bad, although mixed, the good may lie hidden, the Lord knows who are His. Under the hand of such a great artist, a grain of gold cannot perish in a great heap of chaff. How much chaff there, how little gold? But do not fear; so great is the artist that he can purify, he cannot lose. Behold the blessed Apostle as gold in this furnace of the world, how he is tested by dangers: so let us come to the dishonorable vessels that are inside, which the Lord of the great house knows well how to use. Therefore, when the Apostle was tested by dangers, what did he say? In dangers at sea, in dangers in the wilderness, in dangers from his own people, in dangers from the Gentiles. All these are external. Look within: In dangers among false brethren. Therefore, I speak to the gold of God, I speak to the vessels made for honor, I speak to the grains toiling in the threshing floor among the chaff. I say to you, whoever hears, not me, but through me: Be good, endure evil. I do not want you to say: Who is good? Rather, I do want you to say this: that no matter how good you are, you will not be without some evil. Hence it is most rightly said: No one is good, except one, God. But that good one who does good, is God. If therefore God who does good is good, and He alone is the good maker of good, how is He the maker of good if no human is good? Therefore, in a relative measure man is also good. For if he were not, the Lord Himself would not say: A good man out of the good treasure of his heart brings forth good. The good must tolerate the evil. Be therefore good, and endure evil. Be simply good, and doubly endure evil. Good, only within: for if not within, good nowhere. Be therefore good within, endure evil both outside and within. Outside, endure the heretic, endure the pagan. Endure also within the evil Christian, for a man's enemies are those of his own household. Patiently endure many troublesome evildoers within; you are distressed, indignant, as if the time of winnowing has already come. You are placed in the threshing, you are still in the threshing, the barn is still being threshed. Still the grains and bundles, when the nations believe, are gathered into the threshing floor. Do you think you can be only wheat in the barn? You err. Groan in the barn, that you may rejoice in the granary. Many evils are done by bad Christians. Those who are outside and do not want to be Christians find excuses. To their encourager to believe, they respond: "Do you want me to be what that one is and that one?" And they name this one and that one. Sometimes they even speak the truth. But when the truth cannot be found, what great matter is it to slander? When that one does not hesitate to slander, he makes another suspect what he does not see. You, when you hear a man saying these things, perhaps because you know your evil brothers, you say to yourself: "He speaks the truth." Dangers in false brothers. But do not falter. What that one seeks, you be. Be a good Christian, that you may convict the slanderous pagan.

Leave behind filth, not faith, and for enemies. But he slanders and harms the good. He tells lies, and he is often believed. What does gold do? Everywhere there is chaff, fire. Set aside filth, not faith. Be purer, by that practice be purer. Let him be worth to you, who removes what makes you dirtier, not who suppresses what makes you gold. For if you fail, you perish in chaff, and if you perish in chaff, you were not gold, but you pretended to be gold. The Lord knows who are his. But those who are evil, about whom you are ashamed when you are among the evil who are outside, remember that they are not, in the great house where you are, vessels for honor but for dishonor. The Apostle has taught you, God governs you. If there were no evil persons, for whom would we pray, when it is said to us: Pray for your enemies? Or perhaps we would wish to have good enemies? How can that happen? You will not have a good enemy unless you are evil. But if you are good, your enemy will only be evil. Pray for your enemies. Therefore the good should pray for the evil. Return to your heart, oh you who are purified in this furnace, if your voice could be: Test me, O Lord, and try me; burn my kidneys and my heart, since your mercy is before my eyes: behold, return to your heart. You are under God, you are about to pour out a prayer. He who has harmed you meets you, he who has oppressed you meets you, he who has robbed you meets you, he who put you in prison meets you. Come now, pay attention to your heart, look at your Lord. Behold, your evil enemy, behold, your good Lord. Your evil enemy harms you. Pray for your enemy, your good Lord tells you. Between your evil enemy and your good Lord, what will you do? Will you pray against him, or will you obey Him? The Lord commanded, He commanded hard things, but promised great things.

You undertake, by the command of your Lord, to pray for that wicked enemy of yours. What will you do? The Lord commanded it, He commanded something hard, but He promised great things. What did He command that is hard? Love your enemies, do good to those who hate you, and pray for those who persecute you. Those things are hard, but for the words of Your lips, I have kept the ways that are hard. From where do you, by your strength, keep the hard ways, except because Your mercy is before my eyes? Behold, He commanded hard things, He commanded bitter things, see what He promised: Pray for those who persecute you, that you may be the sons of your Father who is in heaven. If He were to say to you: Pray for your enemy so that you may be the son of your father, to prevent your earthly father from disinheriting you - who is going to leave you something that cannot be taken away from here - you would be afraid and do it. It is promised to you for these hard things that you may be the son of the Most High. Consider the Father and recognize the inheritance. Therefore say, begin to pray for that great enemy of yours, who has done you much evil, who has inflicted many hard things on you, begin to pray for him, and see your heart arguing with you. Therefore, what you want, what is pleasing to you, what delights you according to the inner man, you obey your Lord, and you pray for your enemy, you are gold. But truly, when you begin to pray, carnal weakness starts to argue with you; those are the impurities from which God wants to purge you in the furnace.

Evils are more easily apparent than goods. Yet there are very many good people seeking God with all their heart.

Therefore, exercise amidst evils, O good one, if you are good, not from your own goodness because you were evil, but from His who is never evil, exercise amidst evils. And do not say to me, "At least if it were necessary for our exercise that there be evildoers, they should be few, evildoers should be few, and good people many." Do you not consider that if they were few, they would not harm many? Surely, consider, wise man, that if there were many good and few evil, the few evil would not dare to harm the many good. But if they did not dare, they would not exercise. Now, however, because there are many evildoers, few good ones labor among many evildoers; and when they labor they sweat; and when they sweat, the gold is purified. Be therefore an ornament of the house of God. Already your weakness has fought within your heart. Invoke that you may conquer. God be present with you, let Him help who commands. You have now become victorious over your weakness, you have now received the spirit and reward of praying for your enemy. See what good it is. Compare him to yourself. He contemplates temptations, you pour out prayers. If he harms, he harms openly; God knows that you pray for him. He does not believe, because he does not examine your heart. Therefore, while he harms openly, you pray secretly. In this press - for the Church is likened to a press - see if not he, who harms openly, is the dregs running through public. The dregs run through public, but the oil has hidden passages to its residence. And while it passes secretly, it appears in greatness. For many, my brothers, many in this conflict of things, in the malice of this world, in this abundance of evildoers, have withdrawn themselves, and turned to God, and have bid farewell to the world, and began to suddenly give their goods to the poor, who a little while before, were snatching away others'. Yet many robbers, invaders, plunderers appear publicly: they are the dregs running through the streets. But those, one here, one there, joined in heart, ashamed of doing bad deeds, thinking on the admonitions of God, mocking the hope of the world, waiting for the hope of heaven, changing their loves and habits, are the oil in the press of sanctity, are vessels for honor in a great house, are gold in the furnace, grain in the barn. There is the ornament of the house of God.

Sermons - Sermon 150

SERMO 150 OF THE WORDS OF THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES (17, 18-34):

"Some of the Epicurean and Stoic philosophers were conversing with him," etc.

Paul preaching among the Athenians. Your Charity has noticed with us, when the book of the Acts of the Apostles was read, that Paul spoke to the Athenians, and it was said by those who mocked the preaching of the truth that he was a sower of words. It was indeed said by the mockers, but it should not be rejected by the believers. For he truly was a sower of words, but a reaper of morals. And although we are so small and by no means comparable to his excellence, in the field of God, which is your heart, we sow the words of God and expect an abundant harvest from your morals. However, what we are reminded to speak to your Charity, which is contained in that reading, we urge you to attend more carefully, that if by some means with the help of the Lord our God we say something, which is not easy to understand unless it is said, and when it has been understood, it should not be despised by anyone. The faith of the Christians.

He was speaking at Athens. The Athenians had a great reputation among all peoples for their literature and learning. It was the homeland of great philosophers. From there a varied and multifaceted doctrine had spread through the other lands of Greece and the world. There the Apostle was speaking, there he was proclaiming Christ crucified; a stumbling block to Jews, and foolishness to Gentiles; but to those who are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God. You must consider how dangerous it was to proclaim this among the proud and learned. Finally, when his speech ended, they heard about the resurrection of the dead, the primary faith of Christians, some mocked; others said, "We will hear you again about this." Nor were there lacking those who believed, and among them is named a certain Dionysius the Areopagite, that is, a principal man of the Athenians (for the Areopagus was what the court of the Athenians was called); and a certain noble woman, and others. Therefore, while the Apostle was speaking, that multitude was divided into three parts, arranged with marvelous distinction by certain degrees: those who mocked, those who were uncertain, and those who believed. For some, as we heard it written, mocked; some said, "We will hear you again about this"; these were the doubters; and some believed. Between those who mocked and those who believed, there were the doubters. He who mocks falls; he who believes stands; he who doubts wavers. "We will hear you again about this," they say; it was uncertain whether they would fall with those who mocked, or stand with those who believed. Has that sower of words labored in vain? Yet if he had feared those who mock, he would not have reached the believers; just like that sower of the gospel, whom the Lord remembers (for certainly this was Paul), if he had hesitated to cast the seeds, fearing that some would fall by the wayside, some among thorns, and some on rocky places; the seed could never have reached the good soil. So let us also sow, scatter; prepare your hearts, give yield.

Epicureans and Stoics conversing with the Apostle. This also, if your Charity remembers, we heard when it was read that certain ones from the Epicurean and Stoic philosophers were conversing with the Apostle. Who the Epicurean and Stoic philosophers are or were, that is, what they thought, what they believed to be true, what they pursued by philosophizing, without a doubt many of you do not know; but since we are speaking in Carthage, many know. Therefore, let those who know assist us now in speaking to you. For indeed, it greatly pertains to the matter, which I think ought to be said. Let both the ignorant and the knowledgeable listen to us; let the ignorant be instructed, let the knowledgeable be reminded; let the former come to know, let the latter recognize. A blessed life is desired by all.

First, listen generally to the common pursuit of all philosophers, in which common study they had five divisions and differences of their own opinions. All philosophers, while studying, seeking, disputing, and living, aimed to grasp a blessed life. This was the one cause of philosophizing; but I believe that even this philosophers hold in common with us. For if I ask you why you have believed in Christ, why you have become Christians; every person truly responds to me: Because of the blessed life. Therefore, the desire for a blessed life is common to both philosophers and Christians. But where such a harmonious thing can be found, that is the question, and then the distinction. For to desire a blessed life, to will a blessed life, to long for, desire, and pursue a blessed life, I believe belongs to all humans. Hence, I see that I have said too little in calling this desire for a blessed life common to both philosophers and Christians; indeed I should have said, of all humans, absolutely of all good and evil. For even the good person is good in order to be blessed; and the evil person would not be evil unless they hoped to be blessed from it. It is an easy question regarding the good, that they seek a blessed life, hence they are good. As for the evil, perhaps some doubt whether they too seek a blessed life. But if I could ask the evil ones separated and distinguished from the good and say: Do you want to be blessed? No one would say: I do not want to be. For example, consider a thief; I ask him: Why do you steal? To have, he says, what I did not have. Why do you want to have what you did not have? Because it is miserable not to have. Therefore, if it is miserable not to have, he believes it is blessed to have. But in this he is impudent and errs, because he wants to be blessed by means of evil. For it is good for all to be blessed. Wherefore then is he perverse? Because he seeks good and does evil. What does he seek then? Why does the desire of evildoers aspire to the reward of the good? A blessed life is the reward of the good; goodness is the work, blessedness is the reward. God commands the work, promises the reward; says: Do this, and you will receive this. But the evil one responds to us: Unless I do evil, I will not be blessed. As if someone says: I will not reach good unless I am evil. Do you not see that good and evil are contrary? You seek good, and do evil? You run contrary; when will you arrive? The opinion of the Epicureans and the Stoics about the happy life.

Let us therefore leave these; perhaps it will be timely to return to them when we have completed what we have determined concerning the philosophers. For I do not think that it was without reason, by divine providence itself, when something great was accomplished, that although there were many sects of philosophers in the city of Athens, only the Stoics and Epicureans contended with the Apostle Paul. For when you hear what they believe in their sects, you will see how it was not without cause, that out of all the philosophers, only they contended with Paul. For he could not choose his opponents himself; but divine wisdom, which governs all things, placed these before him, in whom almost the entire cause of the philosophers' dissension consisted. Briefly, therefore, I say: let the uneducated believe us, let the educated judge us. I think that I do not dare to lie either to the uneducated or to the educated judges. Especially because I speak something where both the educated and the uneducated can truthfully judge. Therefore, I say this first, that man consists of soul and body. Here I do not ask you to believe but to judge. For I do not fear that anyone who recognizes himself will judge me poorly in this statement. Therefore, man, which no one doubts, consists of soul and body. This substance, this thing, this person which is called man, seeks a blessed life; and you know this; nor do I insist that you believe, but I remind you to recognize it. Man, I say, that is, this no small thing, precedes all animals, all birds, all aquatic creatures, and whatever bears flesh and is not man; therefore, man consisting of soul and body; but not just any soul, for the animal also consists of soul and body; therefore, man consisting of a rational soul and mortal flesh, seeks a blessed life. When man knows what makes a blessed life, unless he holds to it, follows it, claims it for himself, takes it up if it is possible, asks for it if it is difficult, he cannot be blessed. Therefore, the entire question is, what makes a blessed life. Now place before your eyes the Epicureans, the Stoics, and the Apostle; which I could also say, the Epicureans, the Stoics, and the Christians. Let us first ask the Epicureans what makes a blessed life. They respond: Bodily pleasure. Here now I ask you to believe because I have judges. For whether the Epicureans say this, believe this, you do not know because you have not read their letters; but there are those here who have read them. Let us return to questioning. What do you say, Epicureans, what makes a blessed life? They respond: Bodily pleasure. What do you say, Stoics, what makes a blessed life? They respond: Virtue of the soul. Pay attention with me, dear ones, we are Christians, we dispute among philosophers. See why only those two sects were arranged to debate with the Apostle. There is nothing in man that pertains to his substance and nature besides body and soul. Of these two in one, i.e., the body, the Epicureans placed the blessed life; in the other, i.e., the soul, the Stoics placed the blessed life. As far as man is concerned, if life is blessed from him, nothing remains besides body and soul. Either the body is the cause of a blessed life or the soul is the cause of a blessed life; if you seek more, you depart from man. Therefore, those who placed the blessed life of man in man could place it nowhere else but either in the body or the soul. Of those who placed it in the body, the Epicureans held the leadership; of those who placed it in the soul, the Stoics held the leadership. The opinion of the Epicureans refuted by the Apostle. What the Epicureans think about the soul. Certain Christians behaving as Epicureans.

Behold, they confer with the Apostle; does the Apostle have anything more? Or should he necessarily agree with one of these two sects, to the point that he also would place the reason for the blessed life either in the body or in the soul? Paul would never place it in the body; for this is not great; since those who think best of the body do not place the cause of happiness in the body. For the Epicureans feel the same about both the body and the soul, that both are mortal. And what is more grievous and detestable, they say that the soul dissolves before the body after death. They say that even while the cadaver remains and the outline of the limbs endures somewhat after the breath has been expelled, the soul immediately dissolves like smoke dispersed by the wind. Therefore, we should not be surprised that they placed the highest good, that is, the cause of happiness, in the body, since they felt the body to be better than the soul. Would the Apostle do this? By no means would he place the highest good in the body. For the highest good is the cause of happiness; rather, the Apostle grieved that some among the Christians chose the opinion of the Epicureans, not of men, but of swine. For from this number were those corrupting good morals with evil conversations, and saying, “Let us eat and drink; for tomorrow we die.” The Epicureans conferred with Paul the apostle; there are also Christian Epicureans. For what else are they who say daily, “Let us eat and drink; for tomorrow we die”? Which relates to: “There will be nothing after death, for our life is the passage of a shadow.” They said, thinking wrongly among themselves, among other things: “Let us crown ourselves with roses, before they wither; let there be no meadow that our luxury does not traverse, let us leave signs of joy everywhere, for this is our portion, and this is our lot.”

Fasting with prayer and almsgiving.

If we rebuke this more harshly and resist these desires more vehemently, they will say what follows: “Let us oppress the poor just man.” And yet, placed in this situation, we do not fear to say: Do not be Epicureans. Indeed, consider what is said by those who speak not rightly: “For tomorrow we shall die;” but we shall not die in every way; for what follows death indeed remains. A companion to the dying will either be life or punishment. Let no one say: “Who has returned from here?” That rich man clothed in purple wanted too late to return, and could not be permitted. He who despised the hungry poor man asked for a drop of water while thirsting. Therefore, let no one say: “Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die.” If you want to say: “For tomorrow we shall die,” I don’t forbid it; but say something else first. For Epicureans, as if not living after death, as if they have nothing else except that which delights the flesh, say: “Let us eat and drink; tomorrow we die.” Christians, however, who will live after death, and will rather happily live after death, should not say: “Let us eat and drink; tomorrow we die;” but hold to what is said: “For tomorrow we shall die;” and say: “Let us fast and pray; for tomorrow we die.” Clearly, I add something else, I add a third, nor do I omit what is particularly to be observed, so that the hunger of the poor may be satisfied by your fasting, or if you cannot fast, feed more, so that their satisfaction may grant you pardon. Therefore, let Christians say: “Let us fast and pray and give; for tomorrow we die.” Or if they want to say two things, I choose that they say: “Let us give and pray” rather than: “Let us fast and not give.” Therefore, may it be far from the Apostle to place in the body the highest good of man, that is, the cause of happiness. The Stoic opinion is not approved by the Apostle. But perhaps there is a not unseemly struggle with the Stoics. For behold, when asked where they place the efficient cause of a blessed life, that is, what makes life blessed in a person; they respond that it is not the pleasure of the body but the virtue of the mind. What does the Apostle say? Does he agree? If he agrees, let us agree. But he does not agree; for Scripture calls back those who trust in their own virtue. Therefore, the Epicurean, placing the highest good of man in the body, places hope in himself. But the Stoic, placing the highest good of man in the mind, indeed places it in a better aspect of man; but he also places hope in himself. However, both the Epicurean and the Stoic are human. Therefore, cursed is everyone who places their hope in man. What then? Now with the three set before our eyes, the Epicurean, the Stoic, and the Christian, let us question each one. Speak, Epicurean, what makes a person blessed? He responds: Pleasure of the body. Speak, Stoic. Virtue of the mind. Speak, Christian. Gift of God.

Rejection of the opinions of the Epicureans and Stoics concerning happiness.

Therefore, brothers, just as before our eyes the Epicureans and Stoics conferred with the Apostle, and through their discussion taught us what to reject and what we ought to choose. The virtue of the soul is a praiseworthy thing, prudence discerning good and evil, justice distributing to each their own, temperance restraining desires, fortitude patiently enduring troubles. It is a great thing, a praiseworthy thing; praise it, Stoic, as much as you can; but say: From where do you have it? It is not the virtue of your soul that makes you blessed, but He who gave you virtue, who inspired you to will, and granted you the ability. I know that perhaps you will mock me, and you will be among those of whom it is written that they mocked Paul. If you are the way, I am the sower, for I am a sower of words according to my measure. What was your mockery is my duty. I sow; what I sow falls on you like upon hard ground. I am not lazy; and I find good ground. What should I do with you? You are reproved, and reproved by the divine oracle. You are among those who trust in their own virtue; among those who place their hope in man. Virtue delights you; a good thing delights you; I know, you thirst; but you cannot procure virtue for yourself. You are dry; if I show you the fountain of life, perhaps you will mock. For you say to yourself: From this rock will I drink? The rod approaches, and water flowed. For the Jews seek signs; but you, Stoic, are not a Jew; I know, you are a Greek; and the Greeks seek wisdom. But we preach Christ crucified. The Jew is scandalized, the Greek scoffs. For to the Jews it is a scandal, but to the Gentiles foolishness; but to those called, both Jews and Greeks, that is, to Paul from Saul, and to Dionysius the Areopagite, and to such as these, such and those, Christ the Power of God and the Wisdom of God. Now you no longer mock the rock; recognize the rod the cross, Christ the fountain; and if you thirst, drink virtue. Be nourished by the fountain, perhaps you will burp thanksgiving; what you received from Him, you will no longer credit to yourself, but in your belching, you will exclaim: I will love you, Lord, my strength. You will no longer say: The virtue of my soul makes me blessed. You will not be among those who, knowing God, did not glorify Him as God or give thanks; but their thoughts became futile, and their foolish hearts were darkened; claiming to be wise, they became fools. For what does it mean to claim to be wise, if not to have from oneself, to suffice for oneself? They became fools, deservedly fools. True foolishness is false wisdom. But you will be among those of whom it is said: Lord, in the light of Your face they will walk, and in Your name they will rejoice all the day, and in Your justice they will be exalted; for You are the glory of their strength. You sought virtue; say: Lord, my strength. You sought a blessed life; say: Blessed is the man whom You instruct, Lord. For blessed is the people whose God is the Lord. This is the homeland of blessedness, which all desire; but not all seek it rightly. But we do not contrive a way from our hearts to such a homeland, and craft erratic paths; He came from there and is the way.

Happiness and the path to happiness is Christ.

What does the blessed one desire, what does he desire if not to not be deceived, not to die, not to suffer? And what does he seek? To be hungrier and eat more? What if it is better not to be hungry? No one is blessed unless he lives forever without any fear, without any deceit. For the soul hates being deceived. How much the soul naturally hates to be deceived can be understood from this—that those who laugh with an alienated mind are pitied by the sane; and a person would certainly choose to laugh rather than to weep. If these two choices are offered: Do you wish to laugh, or to weep? Who is there who would not respond: To laugh? Again, if these two choices are offered: Do you wish to be deceived, or to hold fast to the truth? Everyone responds: To hold fast to the truth. And one chooses to laugh and to hold onto the truth; from those two, laughter and weeping, To laugh; from these two, deceit and truth, To hold fast to the truth. But truth is so invincibly powerful that a person with a sane mind would choose to weep with a sane mind rather than to laugh with an alienated mind. Therefore, in that homeland, there will be truth, and deceit and error will be nowhere. But there will be truth, and there will be no weeping. For there will be true laughter, and rejoicing in the truth, because there will be life there. For if there is pain, there will not be life; neither should eternal and immortal torment be called life. Therefore, the Lord did not call the state that the impious will have life, even though they will live in fire; they do not end their life, so they do not end their punishment: For their worm shall not die, and their fire shall not be quenched; yet he did not wish to call it life, but he called this life that which is blessed and eternal. Hence, when that rich man asked the Lord: What good must I do to obtain eternal life? he himself indeed only called eternal life blessed. For the impious will have eternal, but not blessed life, because it will be full of sufferings. Therefore, he said: Lord, what good must I do to obtain eternal life? The Lord responded to him concerning the commandments. He said: I have done all these. But when he responded about the commandments, what did he say? If you want to enter into life. He did not say to him: blessed; because miserable should not be called life. He did not say to him: eternal; because where there is fear of death, it should not be called life. Therefore, life, which is worthy to be called by this name, is not unless it is blessed; and it is not blessed unless it is eternal. All want this, we all want this, truth and life; but how is it reached so great a possession, to so great a happiness? The philosophers devised paths of error for themselves; some said: This way; others: Not this way, but this. The way was hidden from them, because God resists the proud. It would also have been hidden from us, if He had not come to us. Therefore, the Lord says: I am the way. Lazy traveler, you were unwilling to come to the way; the way came to you. You were seeking where to go: I am the way. You were seeking where to go: I am the truth and the life. You will not go astray when you go to Him, through Him. This is the doctrine of Christians, not indeed comparable, but incomparably preferable to the doctrines of the philosophers, the impurity of the Epicureans, and the pride of the Stoics.

Sermons - Sermon 151

SERMO 151 ON THE WORDS OF THE APOSTLE (ROM 7:15-25):

"For I do not do the good I want to do"

"But what I do not want, this I do," etc. A passage of the Apostle dangerous for those understanding it poorly. The divine reading which is recited from the Epistle of the Apostle Paul, whenever it is read, it must be feared lest it be poorly understood and give an occasion to men who are seeking an occasion. For men are indeed inclined to sin, and they barely restrain themselves. Therefore, when they hear the Apostle saying: "For I do not do the good I want; but the evil I hate, this I do"; they do evil, and as if displeased with themselves because they do evil, they think they are similar to the Apostle, who said: "For I do not do the good I want; but the evil I do not want, this I do." Therefore, it is sometimes read, and it then imposes on us the necessity of disputing, lest men, poorly taking wholesome food, turn it into poison. Therefore, let your Charity be attentive, until with the Lord's help, I say to you; so that where you may see me perhaps toiling in the difficulty of some obscurity, you may assist me with the affection of piety. The just man's life here is a struggle, not yet a triumph. The voice of triumph.

Therefore, first recall, as you are accustomed to hear by the grace of God, that the life of the righteous in this body is still a battle, not yet a triumph. However, there will someday be a triumph of this battle. For this reason, the Apostle spoke of both voices of battle and voices of triumph. We just heard the voices of battle: For I do not do what I want, but I do the very thing I hate. Now if I do what I do not want, I agree that the law is good. The desire is present within me, but the ability to carry it out is not. But I see another law at work in the members of my body, waging war against the law of my mind and making me a prisoner of the law of sin at work within my members. When you hear "waging war," when you hear "making me a prisoner," do you not recognize a battle? The voice of triumph is not yet heard; but because it is to come, the Apostle teaches you, saying: This corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. When this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality; there is the voice of triumph: then the saying that is written will come to pass: Death is swallowed up in victory. Let the triumphant say: Where, O death, is your contest? We shall say this; one day we shall say; and that one day is not far off. For not as much remains of the world, as much as has already passed. Therefore, we shall say this then. But now in this battle, lest this reading be a trumpet of the enemy rather than ours to those who misunderstand it, from which he is encouraged, not overcome; pay attention, I beseech you, my brothers, and fight those who fight. For those who do not yet fight, you will not understand what I am saying; those who already fight will understand. My voice will be in the open, yours will be in silence. First, recall what he wrote to the Galatians, from which this can be better explained. For he says, speaking to the faithful, speaking to the baptized, to whom surely all sins had been forgiven in the holy bath; yet speaking to them, speaking to fighters, he says: I say then: Walk in the Spirit, and you shall not fulfill the lusts of the flesh. He did not say: do not do them; but: do not complete them. Why is this? He follows and says: For the flesh lusts against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh. For these are contrary to each other; so that you do not do the things that you wish. But if you are led by the Spirit, you are not under the law; of course, but under grace. If you are led by the Spirit; what is it to be led by the Spirit? To consent to the Spirit of God commanding, not to the flesh desiring. Yet it desires and resists; and it wants something, and you do not want; persevere, so that you do not want. The destruction of desires ought to be in our prayers.

Nevertheless, your desire should be such towards God that it is not in itself a lust which you resist. See what I have said: I say, your desire should be such towards God that it is not entirely a lust which must be resisted. For you resist, and by not consenting you conquer; but it is better not to have an enemy than to conquer. This enemy will sometimes not be. Turn your mind to the voice of triumph, and see if it will be. Where is, O death, your contention? It will be no more. Where is, O death, your sting? You will seek its place, and not find it. For this is not, as you ought especially to hear; for this is not like some other nature, as the Manicheans rave. It is our weakness, it is our vice. It will not be separated elsewhere, but it will be cured nowhere. Therefore do not fulfill the lusts of the flesh. Indeed it would be better to fulfill what the law said: You shall not covet. This is the fullness of virtue, the perfection of righteousness, the palm of victory: You shall not covet. Because this cannot now be fulfilled, at least let that be fulfilled which the holy Scripture likewise says: Follow not your lusts. It is better not to have them; but since they are, do not follow them. They do not want to follow you; do not follow them. If they want to follow you, they will not be; because they will not rebel against your mind. They rebel, rebel against them; they fight, fight against them; they assault, assault against them; just see this: that they do not conquer.

How to resist evil desires and bad habits.

Behold, I will place something from which you might understand the rest. You know that there are sober men; they are fewer, but they exist. You know there are also drunkards; they are abundant. A sober person is baptized; as far as drunkenness is concerned, he has nothing with which to fight; he has other desires with which he must fight. But so that you may understand the rest, let us place in the middle the struggle of one enemy only. A drunkard is baptized; he has heard, and heard with fear, among other evils by which the kingdom of God is excluded from those living wickedly, that drunkenness is also mentioned; because where it is said: Neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor sodomites, nor thieves; there it is added: Nor drunkards, etc., will inherit the kingdom of God. He heard and feared. He is baptized, all things with which he was intoxicated are forgiven him; the adversary habit remains. Therefore, the one reborn has someone to fight against. All his past sins are forgiven him; let him be vigilant, watchful, let him fight, lest at any time he becomes intoxicated. Therefore, the desire for drinking rises, it tickles the mind, induces dryness in the throat, lies in wait for the senses; it even wants to infiltrate the wall, approach the enclosed one, and drag him captive if it can. He fights, let him fight back. Oh, if only it did not exist! If it approached through bad habit, it will die through good habit; only do not satisfy it, do not satiate it by yielding, but kill it by resisting. Yet as long as it exists, it is an enemy. If you do not consent to it, and never become intoxicated, it will become lesser and lesser each day. For its strength lies in your subjection. For if you yield to it and become intoxicated, you give it strength. Is it not against me, and not against you? I advise, speak, and preach from a higher place; I forewarn what evil awaits the drunkards. There is no reason for you to say: I did not hear; there is no reason for you to say: God takes my soul away from the hand of the one who was silent to me. But you struggle because you yourself made a powerful adversary through bad habit. You did not work to nurture it; work to overcome it. And if you are less suitable against it, ask God. Yet if it does not conquer you, although your bad habit wrestled with you, if it does not conquer you, you have done what the apostle Paul says: You fulfill not the desires of the flesh. Desire came to being by tickling; but it is not fulfilled by drinking.

Desire is innate to us and arose from the first sin. Christ was conceived without sin, so that He might dissolve sin.

What I said about drunkenness, this applies to all vices, this applies to all desires. For we are born with some, we acquire others by habit. For because of those with which we are born, infants are baptized, so that they may be freed from the guilt of original sin, not from the bad habit, which they did not have. Therefore, we must always fight, because that very lust with which we are born cannot be ended as long as we live; it can be diminished daily, but it cannot be ended. Because of that, it is said that this is our body of death. The Apostle says about it: "For I delight in the law of God after the inward man. But I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members." This law was born when the first law was transgressed. This law was born, I say, when the first law was despised and transgressed. What is the first law? The one man received in paradise. Were they not naked, and were not ashamed? Why were they naked and were not ashamed, except because the law in their members did not yet war against the law of their mind? Man did a deed deserving punishment, and he found a shameful motion. They ate against the command, and their eyes were opened. For what? Previously, in paradise, were their eyes closed or blind and they wandered aimlessly? Far from it. For how could Adam name the birds and the beasts when all the animals were brought to him? How could he name them if he did not see? Then it was said: "The woman saw that the tree was good for food and pleasant to the eyes." Therefore, they had open eyes; and they were naked, and were not ashamed. But their eyes were opened to something they had never felt, something they had never feared in the movement of their bodies. Their eyes were opened for perceiving, not for seeing; and because they felt shameful, they sought to cover it. "They sewed fig leaves together and made themselves aprons." They felt it there, where they had covered it. Behold where original sin is drawn from, behold why no one is born without sin. Behold why the Lord did not wish to be conceived in the usual manner, whom the virgin conceived. He who came without it, solved it; he who did not come from it, solved it. Hence one and one: one to death, one to life. The first man to death, the second man to life. But why to death for that man? Because he was merely man. Why to life for this man? Because he is God and man. The apostles' struggle against desire is set forth, so that we may not despair.

Therefore, the Apostle does not act according to his will; for he wishes not to desire, and yet he desires; thus he does not act according to his will. Was that evil desire dragging the Apostle, enslaved, into fornication and adultery? God forbid. May such thoughts not ascend into our hearts. He was struggling, not being subdued. But because he did not even want to have this to fight against, he said: "I do not do what I want." I do not want to desire, and I do desire. Therefore, I do not do what I want; but still, I do not consent to the desire. For he would not otherwise say: "Do not fulfill the desires of the flesh," if he himself were fulfilling them. But he set his struggle before your eyes, so you would not fear your own. For if the blessed Apostle had not said this, when you saw desire being stirred in your members, to which you did not consent; yet, when you saw it being stirred, perhaps you might despair about yourself and say: "If I belonged to God, I would not be so moved." See the Apostle fighting, and do not make yourself despair. "I see another law," he says, "in my members waging war against the law of my mind." And because I do not want it to wage war; for it is my flesh, I myself am, it is a part of me: "I do not do what I want; but the evil I hate, this I do;" because I desire. To do or to accomplish neither good nor evil, what it is.

What then do I do that is good? Because I do not consent to evil desires. I do good, and I do not complete the good; and my enemy desire does evil, and does not complete evil. How do I do good and not complete good? I do good when I do not consent to evil desires; but I do not complete good so as not to desire at all. Again then, my enemy how does it do evil and not complete evil? It does evil because it stirs up evil desire; it does not complete evil because it does not drag me to evil. And in this battle is the whole life of the saints. Now what shall I say of the impure, who do not even fight? Subjugated, they are dragged; nor are they dragged, because they willingly follow. This, I say, is the fight of the saints; and in this battle man is always in danger, until he dies. But in the end, that is, in the triumph of that victory, what is said? rather what does the Apostle say while contemplating triumph? Then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written: Death is swallowed up in victory. Where, O death, is your contention? The voice of the triumphant. Where, O death, is your sting? But the sting of death is sin; by whose puncture death was made. Sin is like a scorpion: it stung us, and we died. But when it is said, Where, O death, is your sting? by which sting you are made, not that you made; when therefore it is said, Where, O death, is your sting? surely it will not be; because sin will not be. But the sting of death is sin. Against sin the law was given. But the strength of sin is the law. How is the strength of sin the law? It entered that transgression might abound. How is this? Because man was a sinner before the law; the law being given and transgressed, he was also made a transgressor. Men were held guilty by sin; the law being given, they were made more guilty by transgression. The grace of Christ sometimes overcomes desire. Now what should the faithful do? Where is hope, unless what follows: Where sin abounded, grace superabounded? Therefore this soldier and, in a certain way, highly practiced in this battle, so practiced as to be also a leader, when he labored in this battle against the enemy, and said: I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members, a foul law, a wretched law, a wound, a wasting sore, a languor; he added: Wretched man that I am, who will deliver me from the body of this death? And to the one groaning was help given. How was help given? The grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord will deliver you from the law of this death, that is, from the body of this death, the grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord. When will you have a body in which no concupiscence remains? When this mortal shall have put on immortality, and this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and will be said to death: Where is thy contention, O death? And it will not be: Where is thy sting, O death? And it will be nowhere. But now what? Hear: So then with the mind I myself serve the law of God, but with the flesh the law of sin. With the mind I serve the law of God, by not consenting; but with the flesh the law of sin, by concupiscing. Both with the mind the law of God, and with the flesh the law of sin. And I delight in this, and I concupisce in that; but I am not conquered; it titillates, it lies in wait, it knocks, it tries to draw: Wretched man that I am, who will deliver me from the body of this death? I do not always want to win; but I sometimes want to come to peace. So now, brothers, hold this mode; with the mind serve the law of God, but with the flesh the law of sin; but from necessity, because you concupisce, not because you consent. Sometimes this concupiscence so lies in wait for the saints, that it does to those sleeping what it cannot to those awake. Why did all of you acclaim, unless because all of you recognized it? It is embarrassing to linger here, but let it not be burdensome to pray to God about it. Turned to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 152

SERMO 152 OF THE FOLLOWING WORDS OF THE APOSTLE (ROM 7; 8:1-4); UP TO:

"God sent His Son in the likeness of sinful flesh," etc. The difficulty is not in obscure meanings, when the Spirit helps. Your Charity should remember that I discussed with you a very difficult question from the Epistle of the Apostle Paul, where he says: For I do not do what I want, but what I hate, that I do. Therefore, those who were present, you remember; be attentive now, so that you affirm what you have heard. For the reading that was recited today follows, which the reader began from there: God sent His Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin condemned sin in the flesh; that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us, who do not walk according to the flesh, but according to the Spirit. But the words that were read then, which were not discussed, are these that follow: Therefore I myself serve the law of God with my mind, but with my flesh I serve the law of sin. There is therefore now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus. For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus has set you free from the law of sin and death. For what the law could not do, in that it was weakened by the flesh. And it continues with what was read today: God sent his Son in the likeness of sinful flesh. The difficulty is not in obscure meanings, when the spirit assists. Therefore, let it assist us with your prayers; because the very desire to understand is a prayer to God. Therefore, you should expect help from Him. For we, like peasants in a field, work outwardly. But if there were no one who worked inwardly, neither would the seed be fixed in the earth, nor would the shoot rise in the field, nor would the stalk be strengthened and reach the beam; nor would branches, nor fruits, nor leaves be born. Therefore, the Apostle himself said, discerning the work of the workers and the Creator: I planted, Apollos watered; but God gave the increase. And he added: Neither the one who plants is anything, nor the one who waters; but God who gives the increase. If God does not inwardly give the increase, this sound to your ears is in vain. But if He gives, what we plant and water is worth something, and our labor is not in vain.

Fight against carnal desires.

I have already told you that the Apostle's statement should be understood in this way: "With my mind I serve the law of God, but with my flesh the law of sin"; so that you permit the flesh nothing more than desires, without which it cannot exist. But if you consent to evil desires and do not fight against them, you will mourn being defeated; and it is to be wished that you mourn, lest you also lose the sense of pain. Therefore, as far as it is in our vows, in our will, in our prayer, when we say: "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil"; we certainly desire that evil desires do not arise from our flesh. But as long as we live here, we cannot achieve this. Therefore he says: "But to complete the good I do not find." What do I find to do? Not to consent to evil desire. I do not find to complete: not to have an evil desire. Therefore, it remains in this struggle, that with the mind not consenting to evil desires, you serve the law of God; but with the flesh desiring, without you consenting, you serve the law of sin. The flesh carries out its desires, do you also carry out yours. Its desires are not oppressed or extinguished by you; yours are not extinguished; so that you labor in the struggle, not be dragged down in defeat. The evil of concupiscence in the baptized is without guilt. The Apostle therefore follows and says: Therefore there is now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus. Even if they have desires of the flesh, to which they do not consent; and if the law in their members resists the law of their mind, and wants to capture the mind; nevertheless, because by the grace of Baptism and the washing of regeneration, even the guilt with which you were born, and whatever you previously consented to as evil desire, or any disgrace, or any crime, or any evil thought, or any evil speech, all are erased in that font, where you entered as a servant, from which you exited free; because therefore these things are so: There is now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus. There is none now, but there was before. From one man all into condemnation. Generation had done this evil, but regeneration has done this good. For the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus has set you free from the law of sin and death. It resides in the members, but it does not make you guilty. You are freed from it; fight freely; but see that you are not overcome, and again become a servant. You labor by fighting, but you will rejoice by triumphing. The error of the Manichaeans must be avoided. But I told you, and you should especially remember, lest perhaps because of this struggle, without which a man cannot exist, even he who lives righteously; indeed, he is in it, who lives righteously; for he does not fight but is dragged, who does not live righteously; therefore do not think on account of this that there are two natures from different principles, as the Manicheans foolishly believe, as if flesh is not from God. This is false, both are from God. But human nature has deserved this within itself because of sin. Therefore, it is a weakness; it is healed and it ceases to be. The discord now that is in spirit and flesh, works towards concord; the spirit therefore labors so that the flesh comes into agreement with it. Just as if in one house a man and a wife have a quarrel among themselves; the man should labor for this, that he may subdue the wife. The subdued wife should submit to the husband; with the wife subdued to the husband, peace is made in the house.

Threefold law: the law of sin, the law of faith, the law of deeds. But when he had said: The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus set you free from the law of sin and death, he set before us to understand these very laws. Look at them and discern; this discernment is necessary for you. The law, he says, of the Spirit of life, behold one law: set you free from the law of sin and death, behold another law. And it follows: For what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, behold a third law. Or perhaps this is from the two? Let us inquire and with the Lord's help let us see. What did he say of that good law? The law of the Spirit of life set you free from the law of sin and death. He did not say this one was invalid for accomplishing: The law of the Spirit of life, he says, set you free from the law of sin and death. That good law set you free from this evil law. For what is the evil law? I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members. Why then is it also called a law? Quite rightly. For it was very lawful that the man who did not want to obey his Lord, his flesh should not serve him. Your Lord is above you, your flesh below you. Serve the better, that the inferior may serve you. You despised the superior, you are tormented by the inferior. This is therefore the law of sin, it is also of death. For through sin is death. On the day you eat, you will die by death. This law of sin thus drags the spirit and strives to subjugate. But I delight in the law of God according to the inner man. And therefore that battle occurs, and in the conflict it is said: With the mind I serve the law of God, but with the flesh the law of sin. The law of the Spirit of life set you free from the law of sin and death. For how did the law of the Spirit of life set you free? First of all, it gave forgiveness of sins. For this is the law, of which it is said to God in the Psalm: And have mercy on me according to your law. The law of mercy, the law of faith, not of works. What then is the law of works? You have already heard of the good law of faith: The law of the Spirit of life set you free from the law of sin and death. You have also heard of the other law of sin and death. For what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh. This third law therefore, which was named, I don't know what sort of unfulfillment; but the law of the Spirit of life fulfilled it; because it set you free from the law of sin and death. Therefore this law, which was named in third place, is the very Law which was given to the people through Moses on Mount Sinai, it is called the law of works. It knows how to threaten, not how to help; it knows how to command, not how to assist. It is the one that said: You shall not covet. Hence, says the Apostle: I would not have known covetousness, except the law had said: You shall not covet. And what did it benefit me, that the law said: You shall not covet? Sin, taking occasion by the commandment, deceived me, and by it killed me. I was prohibited from coveting, and I did not fulfill the commands, but was overcome. Before the law I was a sinner; having received the law, I became a transgressor. For sin, taking occasion by the commandment, deceived me, and by it killed me. The Law of Moses is defended against the Manichaeans.

Therefore, he says, the law indeed is holy. Thus, this law is also good (for the Manicheans criticize it too, just as they do the flesh). The Apostle says about it: "Therefore the law is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good." What then is good, has it become death to me? God forbid! But sin, that it might appear sin, worked death in me through that which is good. These are the words of the Apostle, see and attend. Therefore, the law indeed is holy. What is as holy as: "Thou shalt not covet"? The transgression of the law would not be evil unless the law itself were good. For if it were not good, it would not be evil to transgress an evil thing. Since it is indeed evil to transgress it, therefore it is good. What is as good as: "Thou shalt not covet"? Therefore, the law is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good. How does it satisfy? How does it insist? It cries out as if against slanderers. What do you say, Manichean? Is the law given through Moses evil? They say it is evil: O monstrosities! O impudence! You said once: It is evil; listen to the Apostle saying: "The law indeed is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good." Are you ever silent? What then is good, he says, has it become death to me? God forbid! But sin, that it might appear sin, worked death in me through that which is good. And here: through that which is good; thus he accuses the culprit so as not to retreat from the praise of the law. Through that which is good, he says, worked death in me. Through what good? The commandment. Through what good? The law. How did it work death? That sin might appear; that it might become exceedingly sinful, transgressing through the commandment. Therefore: exceedingly. When he sinned without the commandment, it was less; when he sins through the commandment, it exceeds the measure. For when someone is not forbidden, he thinks he is doing well. Once forbidden, he begins not to want to act; he is overcome, dragged, subjugated; now he has left to invoke grace; because he could not keep the law.

Three laws. And thus that law, of which it was said: For the law of the Spirit of life has set you free in Christ Jesus from the law of sin and death, is the law of faith, the law of the Spirit, the law of grace, the law of mercy. But that law of sin and death is not the law of God, but of sin and death. However, the other about which the Apostle says: The law is holy, and the commandment is holy and righteous and good, is the law of God, but the law of deeds, the law of works: the law of works, which orders but does not help; the law which shows you, but does not take away sin. Sin is shown to you by one law, taken away by another. There are two Testaments, the Old and the New. Hear the Apostle saying: Tell me, you who desire to be under the law, do you not hear the law? For it is written that Abraham had two sons, one by a slave woman and one by a free woman. But the son of the slave was born according to the flesh, while the son of the free woman was born through promise. These things are an allegory: for these women are two covenants. One is from Mount Sinai, bearing children for slavery; she is Hagar, the slave of Sarah who was given to Abraham and bore Ishmael, a slave. Thus, the Old Testament pertains to Hagar, bringing forth into slavery. But the Jerusalem above is free, and she is our mother. Therefore, the children of grace are children of the free woman; the children of the letter are children of the slave woman. Look for the children of the slave woman: The letter kills. Look for the children of the free woman: But the Spirit gives life. The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus has set you free from the law of sin and death, which the law of the letter could not free you from. For what was impossible for the law, in that it was weakened by the flesh. For your flesh rebelled, your flesh subdued you; it heard the law and increased your desire. Therefore, the law of the letter was weakened by the flesh; and thus it was impossible for the law of the letter to free from the law of sin and death. The flesh of Christ alone is not the flesh of sin.

God sent His Son in the likeness of sinful flesh; not in sinful flesh. Indeed in the flesh, but not in sinful flesh. Therefore, the flesh of all other men is sinful flesh; His alone is not sinful flesh; because His mother did not conceive Him in concupiscence, but in grace; nonetheless having the likeness of sinful flesh; whence He could also be nourished, hunger, thirst, sleep, become weary, and die. In the likeness of sinful flesh, God sent His Son. Of sin in Christ, how sin was condemned. And concerning sin, he condemned sin in the flesh. What sin? Which sin? He condemned sin concerning sin in the flesh; so that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us. Now that righteousness of the law may be fulfilled in us; now that righteousness which is commanded, may be fulfilled in us through the Spirit who helps; that is, the law of the letter may be fulfilled in us through the spirit of life: Who do not walk according to the flesh, but according to the spirit. Concerning what sin, then, did the Lord, which sin did he condemn? I see, I indeed see what sin he condemned, I clearly see: Behold the Lamb of God, behold him who takes away the sin of the world. What sin? All sin, all our sin he condemned. But concerning what sin? He himself had no sin; it was said of him: Who did no sin, nor was deceit found in his mouth. None at all, neither by drawing nor by adding; he had no sin, neither of origin, nor of his own iniquity. His origin the virgin shows; his holy conversation indeed shows well enough that he did nothing for which he was worthy of death. Therefore he says: Behold the prince of this world comes (signifying the devil), and he will find nothing in me. He will not find why the prince of death may kill me. And why then do you die? But so that all may know that I do the will of my Father, let us go hence. And he went to the passion of death, a voluntary death, not of necessity, but of choice. I have the power to lay down my life, and I have the power to take it again. No one takes it from me, but I lay it down, and I take it again. If you wonder at the power, understand the majesty. As God speaks, Christ speaks. An opinion of certain people about the passage of the Apostle.

About what sin, therefore, did He condemn sin? Some have understood and reached a reasonable interpretation. However, they could not fully grasp what the Apostle said, as it seems to me. Nevertheless, they did not say something bad; I will tell you this first, and then what seems to me and what the divine Scripture itself shows to be the truest. When they were troubled: About what sin did He condemn sin? Did He have sin? They said this: He condemned sin by sin, by a sin not His own; however, He condemned sin by sin. If therefore not by His own, by whose? By the sin of Judas, by the sin of the Jews. For from where did He shed blood for the remission of sins? Because He was crucified by the Jews. By whom surrendered? By Judas. The Jews killed Him, Judas surrendered Him. Did they do well, or did they sin? They sinned. Behold, from what sin He condemned sin. It was well said and truly said because through the sin of the Jews, Christ condemned all sin, because as they persecuted, He shed blood, by which He erased all sin. However, elsewhere see what the Apostle says: For Christ, he says, we serve as ambassadors, as though God were exhorting through us; we beseech you for Christ, that is, as though Christ beseeches you, for Him we beseech you, be reconciled to God. And it follows: He who knew no sin, God made Him to be sin for us, so that we might become the righteousness of God in Him. Can the sin of Judas, the sin of the Jews, the sin of any other man be understood here; when you hear: He who knew no sin, God made Him to be sin for us? Who? Whom? God made Christ, God made Christ to be sin for us. He did not say: He made Him a sinner for us; but, He made Him to be sin. If it is blasphemy to say that Christ sinned, who could endure Christ being sin? And yet we cannot contradict the Apostle. We cannot say to him: What is this that you speak? For if we say this to the Apostle, we say it to Christ Himself. For he says elsewhere: Or do you want to receive proof that Christ speaks in me? The truer interpretation of the Apostle. How Christ was made sin.

What then is it? Let your Love pay attention to the great and profound mystery. You will be happy if you love understanding, and arrive at the beloved. Completely, completely our Lord Christ, our Savior Jesus, our Redeemer, was made sin, so that we might be the righteousness of God in him. How? Listen to the law. Those who know, understand what I say; and those who do not know, let them read or listen. In the law, even the sacrifices which were offered for sins were called sins. You have, when the victim for the sin was brought, the law says: Let the priests lay their hands upon the sin; that is, upon the victim for the sin. And what is other than Christ the sacrifice for sin? Just as Christ, he says, loved you, and gave himself up for you, an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet-smelling aroma. Behold from which sin he condemned sin; from the sacrifice which he became for sins, from there he condemned sin. This is the Law of the spirit of life, which has set you free from the law of sin and death. Because that other law, the law of the letter, the law that commands, is indeed good; The commandment is holy, and righteous, and good; but it was weakened through the flesh; and what it commanded could not be fulfilled in us. Therefore, another law, as I began to say, shows you sin, another removes it; the law of the letter shows sin, the law of grace removes sin.

Sermons - Sermon 153

SERMO 153 ON THE WORDS OF THE APOSTLE, ROMANS 7: 5-13:

"When we were in the flesh" The passions of sins which are through the law They were working in our members, "SO THAT THEY MIGHT BEAR FRUIT TO DEATH," ETC.

AGAINST THE MANICHAEANS OPENLY, AND SILENTLY AGAINST THE PELAGIANS The place of the Apostle to be explained is so difficult.

We have heard, and we have answered in unity, and we have sung to our God with harmonious voice: Blessed is the man whom you instruct, O Lord, and whom you teach out of your law. If you would offer silence, you would hear. Wisdom finds no place where there is no patience. We speak, but God instructs; we speak, but God teaches. For no one is called blessed by being taught by a man, but by being instructed by you, O Lord. We can plant and water, but it is God's task to give the increase. He who plants and he who waters works outwardly; he who gives the increase assists inwardly. What reading from the holy Apostle's Epistle has been proposed for us to speak upon, how difficult, how obscure, how (if not understood or misunderstood) dangerous; I think, brothers, rather I know, that as it was recited among us, you have heard; and you were troubled, if you paid attention; or if some of you did understand, you have seen how arduous it is without doubt. Hence we have undertaken to explain this reading and the whole troublesome and obscure but, for those who understand, salutary portion of the Apostle's Epistle, with the aid of God's mercy, by expounding it through discussion. I know we are debtors to your charity, I feel that you are our exactors. Just as we pray that you may grasp these things, so also pray that we may be able to explain them to you. For if our prayer is in harmony; then God will make you capable listeners, and us the most faithful payers of this debt.

Here the Manicheans abuse. For when we were in the flesh, says the Apostle, the passions of sins which were by the law worked in our members to bring forth fruit unto death. Here it seems (which is the first and great danger for those not understanding) that the Apostle reproaches and blames the law of God. Someone might say: Far be this from the mind of any kind of Christian; who would even in madness dare suspect this of the Apostle? And yet, my brothers, these words, poorly understood, have fueled the madness and fury of the Manichaeans. For the Manichaeans claim that the law given by God through Moses was not given by God and assert it is contrary to the Gospel. And when they are engaged with, they try to convince by these testimonies of the Apostle Paul—which they do not understand—what shall I say, Catholics who do not understand and rather neglect it? For it is not much, if anyone wishes to be diligent, after hearing slanders from a heretic, at least to consider the context of the reading in the text. If someone does this, they will soon find wherewith to refute the verbose adversary, wherewith to overthrow the hostile and rebellious enemies of the law. For even if one is slow to understand the words of the Apostle, the praise of the law of God is there manifestly expressed. The calumny of the Manichaeans must be refuted by what follows. For first consider and observe. For when we were in the flesh, he says, the passions of sins which are by the law worked. Here now the Manichaean raises his neck, lifts up his horns, attacks you, makes an onslaught: Behold, he says, the passions of sins which are by the law. How is the law good, through which in us are the passions of sins, and work in our members, so that they bear fruit unto death? Read, proceed somewhat further, hear the whole thing patiently, and if not intelligently. For this which he says: "The passions of sins which are by the law worked in our members," it is much to understand; but first be with me in praising the law, and then you will deserve to understand. Do you have a closed heart, and blame the key? Behold, for the moment what we do not understand, let us put aside a little, let us come to what is open about the praise of the law. The passions of sins, he says, which are by the law worked in our members, to bear fruit unto death. Now therefore we are delivered from the law of death, wherein we were held, so that we may serve in newness of spirit, and not in oldness of the letter. Still it seems to accuse, blame, disapprove, detest the law; but not to the understanding. For when he says: "When we were in the flesh, the passions of sins which are by the law worked in our members, to bear fruit unto death. Now therefore we are delivered from the law of death, wherein we were held, so that we may serve in newness of spirit, and not in oldness of the letter," it indeed seems to accuse and blame the law. He saw this too, he saw, he felt himself not understood, and against the obscurity of his words the thoughts of men are moved; he felt what you can say, he felt what you can object; and he wanted to say this first, so that you may not find what to say. The Apostle himself condemns the critics of the law there.

What then shall we say? he says. This follows: What then shall we say? Is the law sin? By no means! With one word he absolves the law, condemns the accuser of the law. You were citing the authority of the Apostle against me, O Manichean, and you were saying to me, while you were criticizing the law: Behold, hear the Apostle, read the Apostle: The passions of sins which are through the law were at work in our members, to bear fruit unto death. Now, therefore, we are freed from the law of death, in which we were held, so that we might serve in newness of spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter. You boasted yourself, you shouted, you said: Hear, read, see; you had said these things and already wanted to turn your back and go. Wait, I have heard you, hear me; rather, neither I you, nor you me; but let us both listen to the Apostle, who frees himself and binds you. What then shall we say? he says. Is the law sin? You said this: The law is sin, indeed you said this. Behold, you heard what you said, hear what you should say. You were saying that the law of God is sin, when you, blind and imprudent, were criticizing it. You erred: Paul saw your error. What you said, he said. What then shall we say? Is the law sin? Do we say what you said? Is the law sin? By no means! If you were following the authority of the Apostle, weigh the word, and take counsel from it. Hear: Is the law sin? By no means! Hear: By no means! If you follow the Apostle, if you highly value his authority, hear: By no means! and let what you thought be far from you. What then shall we say? What shall we say? Because I said: The passions of sins which are through the law were at work in our members, to bear fruit unto death; because I said: We are freed from the law of death, in which we were held; because I said: Let us serve in newness of spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter: Is the law sin? By no means! Why then, Apostle, did you say such things? The law forbidding to covet evil is not evil. The law is far from being sin: But sin, he says, I did not know except through the law. For I would not have known desire, unless the law said: You shall not desire. Now I question you, Manichee, now I question you, answer me. Is the law which says: You shall not desire, evil? Not even a depraved and wicked person would answer me this. For even the same outrageous men, when they are reproached, are ashamed; and when they are among the chaste, they do not dare to be wanton. If therefore you say the law which says: You shall not desire, is evil; you wish to desire freely; you accuse the law, because it strikes at lust. My brethren, if we did not hear the Apostle saying: Is the law sin? Far from it! but merely recounting the words of the law, where it was said: You shall not desire; even if he did not praise the law, we should nonetheless praise it; it deserves praise, we deserve accusation. Behold the law, behold the divine trumpet above crying out to man: You shall not desire. You shall not desire, rebuke it if you can; do it, if you cannot rebuke it. You heard: You shall not desire, you do not dare to rebuke it. Because it is good that it said: You shall not desire; it is evil to desire. The law reproves evil, it forbids you your evil. Therefore the law reproves evil desire, it forbids your evil. Therefore do what the law commands, do not do what the law forbids, do not desire. The evil of lust was unknown before the law. But what does the Apostle say? I would not have known desire, if the law had not said: Do not covet. For I followed my desire, and I ran where it led, and I considered its sweet temptations and the pleasures from bodily indulgence as great happiness. For the sinner is praised, says the law, in the desires of his soul; and he who commits iniquity is blessed. You find a man following his carnal desires and giving himself entirely as a servant to them, seeking pleasures everywhere, fornicating, getting drunk; I say no more; fornicating, I repeat, and getting drunk. I have mentioned things that are lawfully committed, but not according to God's laws. For who was ever brought before a judge for entering a prostitute's brothel? Who was ever accused in the public tribunals for descending into lewdness and impurity through his own revelries? Who ever, having a wife, for corrupting his maid found it a crime? But before the worldly court, not the heavenly one; under the law of the world, not the law of the World's Creator. However, the lascivious, the impure, and the lewd are said to be happy, to abound in pleasures, to enjoy delights. Indeed, if he even revels in wine, if he drinks measureless quantities; it's not just that he doesn't find it a crime, he's even called a strong man; so much the worse, the more undefeatable he is under the cup. When these things are praised, and it is said: He is happy, he is great, it is well with him; and not only is this not considered a sin, but it is also thought to be either God's gift, or at least a pleasant, sweet, and lawful good: the law of God goes forth, and says: Do not covet. That man who thought it was a great good, who considered it great happiness to deny nothing to his desire, to follow where it led; hears: Do not covet; and recognizes it as sin. God spoke, man heard. He believed God, saw his sin; what he thought good, he recognized as evil; he wanted to restrain his desire, not to follow it, he constrained himself, tried, and was overcome. He who was previously ignorant of his evils, became knowledgeable, and worse, was defeated; he began to be not only a sinner but also a transgressor. For he was a sinner even before; but before he heard the law, he did not know he was a sinner. He heard the law, saw his sin; tried to conquer it, was overcome and thrown down; he became also a lawbreaker, who was previously an ignorant sinner. This is what the Apostle says: Is the law sin? By no means! But I would not have known sin except through the law. For I would not have known desire, if the law had not said: Do not covet.

Desire increased by the law, not conquered.

Taking the opportunity, sin, through the commandment, worked in me all manner of concupiscence. Desire was lesser when, before the law, you were unconcerned sinning; now, however, with the obstacles of the law placed before you, the river of desire is somewhat restrained, not dried up; but as the impetus that drove you on increases without obstacles, it overwhelms you once the barriers are broken. Your desire was lesser when it moved your lust, but it is all-encompassing when it transcends the law. Do you want to know how great it is? See what it has broken: You shall not covet. Not a man said it, God said it, the Creator said it, the eternal Judge said it. Not just anyone said it. Therefore, do what He said. Do you not do it? Observe Him who judges and who said it. But what can you do, O man? You have not conquered because you presumed upon yourself.

Presuming about oneself is defeated.

Therefore, pay attention now to the previous words, which seemed obscure: For when we were in the flesh. Pay attention to the previous words we mentioned, from where the passage that seemed obscure began: For when we were in the flesh, the passions of sins which were by the law. From where are they by the law? Because we were in the flesh. What does it mean: Because we were in the flesh? We assumed upon the flesh. For did the Apostle who was speaking no longer live in that flesh, or was he speaking to those who had already died and left that flesh? Certainly not; but according to the manner of this life, both he who was speaking, and those to whom he was speaking, were in the flesh. What then does it mean: When we were in the flesh; except: When we were assuming upon the flesh, that is, considering ourselves? For it was said to a man, and about men: All flesh shall see the salvation of God. What does it mean: All flesh shall see, except: All men shall see? And what does it mean: The Word was made flesh, except: The Word was made man? For not the Word and flesh without a soul; but man is signified by the name of flesh, in that which is read: The Word was made flesh. Therefore, when we were in the flesh, that is, we were engaged in the lusts of the flesh, and placed all our hope in them as in ourselves: the passions of sins, which are by the law, were increased by the law. For by prohibiting, they made the transgressor of the law; because he who was made a transgressor did not have God as a helper. Therefore, they worked in our members to bear fruit, to whom, except to death? If a sinner was to be condemned, what hope does a transgressor have?

Trust not in oneself, but in God.

Therefore, O man, your desire has conquered you; it has conquered because it found you in a bad place; it found you in the flesh, therefore it conquered you. Migrate from there: why are you afraid? I did not tell you to die. Do not be afraid because I said: Migrate from the flesh. I did not tell you to die, rather I dare to say, I told you to die. If you have died with Christ, seek the things that are above. Living in the flesh, do not be in the flesh. All flesh is grass, but the Word of the Lord endures forever. Let the Lord be your refuge. Desire presses upon you, it urges you, it has received great strength against you, it has become greater by the prohibition of the law, you suffer a greater enemy: let the Lord be your refuge, a tower of strength from the face of the enemy. Therefore, do not be in the flesh, be in the spirit. What does it mean: Be in the spirit? Place your hope in God. For if you place your hope in the very spirit by which you are human, your spirit will again slip back into the flesh, because you did not give it to Him by whom it may be upheld. It does not hold itself if it is not held. Do not remain in yourself, transcend even yourself: place yourself in Him who made you. For if you have hope in yourself, having received the law, you will be a transgressor. The enemy found you without refuge, he invades you; beware lest he snatch you, like a lion, and there is no one to deliver you. Attend to the words of the Apostle praising the law, accusing himself, making himself guilty under the law, and perhaps transfiguring your own person in himself, and saying to you: I would not have known sin except through the law. For I would not have known desire, except the law had said: You shall not covet. But sin, seizing the opportunity through the commandment, worked in me all kinds of desire. For without the law, sin is dead. What does it mean: it is dead? It lies hidden, does not appear at all, it is unknown as if buried. But when the commandment came, sin revived. What does it mean: revived? It began to appear, began to be felt, began to rebel against me.

Delight in the law of God, and delight in desire. But I have died. What does it mean: I have died? I have become a transgressor, and the commandment that was found to be unto life was found for me unto death. See that the law is praised, the commandment which was for life. For what kind of life is it not to covet? O sweet life! Sweet indeed is the pleasure of covetousness: it is true, and men would not follow it unless it were sweet. The theater, the spectacle, the wanton prostitute, the most shameful song, these are sweet to covetousness; sweet indeed, pleasant, delightful: but: The unjust have told me of their delights, but not as your law, O Lord. They are pleasant, sweet, delightful; but hear better: The unjust have told me of their delights, but not as your law, O Lord. Happy the soul that is delighted by such pleasures, where no foulness stains, and which is purified by the serenity of truth. But he who delights in the law of God, and delights in such a way that he overcomes all pleasures of wantonness, should not attribute this pleasure to himself: The Lord will give sweetness. What should I say? Lord, give me that sweetness, or that one? You are sweet, Lord, and in your sweetness teach me your statutes. In your sweetness teach me, and you teach me. Then I learn so that I may act, if you teach me in your sweetness. Otherwise, as long as iniquity flatters and is sweet, truth is bitter. In your sweetness teach me: that truth may be sweet, and by your sweetness iniquity may be despised. Truth is much better and sweeter, but sweet bread is for the healthy. What is better and more excellent than heavenly bread? But it does not dull the teeth of iniquity. For Scripture says: As sour grapes are harmful to the teeth, and smoke to the eyes; so is iniquity to those who use it. What does it profit you to praise the bread, if you live badly? What you praise you do not eat. When therefore you hear the word, when you hear the word of justice and truth, and you praise it; it is much more praiseworthy if you act. Therefore do what you praise. Or will you say: I want to, but I cannot? Why cannot you? Because there is no health. Whence did you lose health, unless by sinning you offended the Creator? Therefore, so that you may eat the bread you praise with sweetness, that is, with health, say to Him: I said, Lord, have mercy on me; heal my soul, for I have sinned against you. Therefore, he says: The commandment which was found to be unto life was found to be unto death. For he was previously unknown to himself as a sinner, and has become manifest as a transgressor. Behold, it was found unto death when it was unto life. The proud man slain by his own sword.

But, taking occasion, sin deceived me through the commandment, and by it killed me. Thus it happened first in paradise: Sin deceived me, he said, taking occasion through the commandment. See the serpent whispering to the woman. He asked her what God had said: she replied: God told us: From every tree which is in the paradise, you shall eat; but from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, you shall not eat. For if you eat from it, you will die by death. This is the commandment of God. The serpent, however, said: No, you will not die by death. For God knew that on the day you eat from it, your eyes will be opened, and you will be like gods. Therefore, taking occasion, sin deceived me through the commandment, and by it killed me. The enemy killed you with the sword you carried; he conquered you with your own weapons, he destroyed you with your own arms. Take up the commandment: know that it is a weapon, not by which you are killed, but by which the enemy is killed by you. But do not presume on your own strength. See little David against Goliath, see the small against the large; but relying on the name of the Lord. You come to me, he says, with shield and spear; I come in the name of the Almighty Lord. Thus, thus; no other way: in no way else is the enemy laid low. He who presumes on his own strength is laid low before he even fights. The Apostle is again and again the most evident praiser of the law.

Nevertheless, see, beloved, see again and again that the apostle Paul is the most open praiser of the divine law against the madness of the Manicheans; see what he adds: "Therefore, the law indeed is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good." Could it be praised more abundantly? A little earlier, with that phrase he said: "God forbid!" he defended it from crime, he did not praise it. It is one thing to defend from an alleged crime, another to proclaim with due praise. The alleged crime was: "What shall we say then? Is the law sin?" The defense, "God forbid!" The truth is defended with one word; because the authority of the Apostle defending it is great. Why defend it long? It suffices. "God forbid!" Or do you want, he says, to receive proof of Christ who speaks in me? Now, however: "Therefore, the law indeed is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good." The same argument is treated.

What, then, is good become death to me? By no means! Because death is not good. But sin, that it might appear as sin, worked death in me through what is good. Death is not the law, but sin is death. He had already said: Without the law, sin is dead. Where I reminded you, saying: It is dead, it lies hidden, it does not appear. Now see how truly it is said thus: Sin, he says, that it might appear as sin. He did not say: That it might be, because it was even when it did not appear. Sin, that it might appear as sin. What is it: That it might appear as sin? Because I did not know covetousness, unless the law said: You shall not covet. He does not say: I did not have covetousness; but: I did not know covetousness. So also here he does not say: That it might be sin; but: That it might appear as sin, it worked death in me through what is good. What death? That sin by the commandment might become exceedingly sinful. Note well: exceedingly sinful. Why exceedingly? Because now there is also transgression. For where there is no law, there is no transgression.

Sin derived from the first man.

Therefore, see, brothers, see the human race flowing from the first death of that first man. For indeed: Sin entered into this world through the first man, and through sin, death, and thus it passed into all men. It passed; pay attention to the word you have heard; consider, see what "passed" means. It passed: hence even a little one is guilty; has not yet committed sin, but has inherited it. For that sin did not remain at the source, but has passed; not into this or that person, but has passed into all men. The first sinner, the first transgressor, begot sinners subject to death. The Savior came from the Virgin to heal. For He came not in the way that you came; for He was not from the concupiscence of man and woman, not from that bond of concupiscence. "The Holy Spirit," He says, "will come upon you." This was said to the Virgin, said to the fervent faith, not to the burning concupiscence of the flesh: "The Holy Spirit will come upon you, and the power of the Most High will overshadow you." How could one who had such a shadow be burning with the heat of lust? Therefore, since He did not come to you in the way you came, He frees you. Where did He find you? Sold under sin, lying in the death of the first man, dragging the sin of the first man, having guilt before you could have will. Behold where He found you, when He found you as a little one. But you have outgrown the age of a little one: behold you have grown, you have added many sins to the original sin; you received the law, you became a transgressor. But do not be anxious: where sin abounded, grace abounded more. Converted to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 154

SERMO 154 OF THE WORDS OF THE APOSTLE, (ROM 7:14 AND FOLLOWING):

"We know that the law is spiritual; but I am carnal," etc.

AGAINST THE PELAGIANS Those who say that a man can be without sin in this life. The Dress at the Table of Saint Martyr Cyprian The law was given for what purpose.

Yesterday's reading from the Epistle of the holy Apostle Paul, which those present at the sermon heard, follows today’s lesson that has been recited. That difficult and perilous place still lingers, which we have undertaken to explain and untangle for you with the assistance of our Lord, as much as you help me with your devoted affection towards Him, and with the strength He deigns to grant. May your Charity grant me patience, so that if I have a difficult discourse due to the obscurity of the matters, I may at least have an easy voice. For if both are difficult, it wears us greatly, and would that this labor is not in vain. But so that our labor may be useful, let your listening be patient. Because the Apostle does not blame the Law, we satisfied those who listened yesterday, as I believe. For there he said: What then shall we say? Is the Law sin? By no means! Yet if it had not been for the Law, I would not have known sin. For I would not have known covetousness, if the Law had not said, You shall not covet. But sin, seizing an opportunity through the commandment, produced in me all kinds of covetousness. For apart from the Law, sin lies dead; that is, it is hidden, it does not appear. I was once alive apart from the Law, but when the commandment came, sin revived. I died, and the very commandment that was meant to bring life (for what is more pertinent to life than You shall not covet?), that proved to bring death to me. For sin, seizing an opportunity through the commandment, deceived me and through it killed me; it terrified concupiscence, not extinguished it; terrified, but did not oppress; created fear of punishment, not love of justice. Thus, he says, the Law is holy, and the commandment is holy and just and good. Did that which is good then bring death to me? By no means! It was sin, working death in me through what is good, in order that sin might be shown to be sin, and through the commandment become sinful beyond measure. For sin would not be reckoned as sin without the commandment. In another place, the same Apostle says openly: Where there is no Law, there is no transgression. What then? Why do we doubt that the Law was given for man to discover himself? For when God did not prohibit evil, man hid himself; he did not find his own weak powers, except when he received the Law of prohibition. Thus he found himself, found himself in evil. Where could he flee from himself? Wherever he flees, he follows himself. And what does the knowledge of himself found in evil profit him, if his conscience wounds him?

Whether the Apostle speaks of himself here.

Therefore, he speaks also in this reading, which was recited today, the one who finds himself. "We know," he says, "that the law is spiritual; but I am carnal, sold under sin. For what I do, I do not understand. For I do not do what I want, but what I hate, that I do." At this point, with great diligence, it is asked who is understood, whether it is the Apostle himself who is speaking, or he has transfigured someone else into himself, whom he addresses as himself, as he said in one place: "But these things I have transfigured in myself and Apollos for your sakes, so that you may learn from us." If therefore the Apostle speaks (which no one doubts), and when he says: "I do not do what I want, but what I hate, that I do," he does not say it of another, but of himself; what are we to understand, my brothers? Was it so that the apostle Paul, for example, did not want to commit adultery, and did commit adultery? Did he not want to be avaricious, and was avaricious? But who of us would dare to put himself into such blasphemy, to think this of the Apostle? Therefore perhaps it is another; perhaps it is you, or it is you, or he is, or I am. If therefore it is one of us, let us hear the thing as if it were about ourselves, and not correct ourselves in anger. But if it is he himself, perhaps it is, let us not thus understand what he said: "I do not do what I want, but what I hate, that I do," as if he wanted to be chaste and was an adulterer, or wanted to be merciful and was cruel, or wanted to be pious and was impious. Let us not take it in this way: "For I do not do what I want, but what I hate, that I do." The Apostle himself is not without desire. But why? I do not want to desire, yet I desire. What did the law say? You shall not covet. Man heard the law, recognized the vice: he declared war, he found captivity. But perhaps some man, not an Apostle. What then do we say, my brothers? Did the Apostle have no desire in his flesh, which he did not want to have, yet existing, titillating, suggesting, soliciting, burning, tempting, to which he did not consent? I say to your Charity, if we believe that the Apostle had no weakness of desire to which he resisted, we believe much about him; and we wish it were so. For we ought not to envy the Apostles, but to imitate them. But indeed, dearest, I hear the Apostle himself confessing that he had not yet reached so great a perfection of justice as we believe to be in the angels; whose equality with angels we hope for, if we attain what we desire. For what else does the Lord promise us in the resurrection, where he says: In the resurrection of the dead, they will neither marry nor be given in marriage; for they cannot die anymore, but will be equal to the angels of God? The Apostle speaks of his own imperfection.

Therefore, someone might say: And how do you know that the Apostle Paul did not yet have the justice and perfection of an angel? I do no injustice to the Apostle, I believe only the Apostle, I seek no other witness; I do not listen to the one who suspects, I do not care about the one who praises too much. Tell me, holy Apostle, about yourself, where no one doubts that you are speaking about yourself. For where you said: What I want to do, I do not; but what I hate, that I do, there are those who say that you transformed someone else unknown into yourself struggling, failing, conquered, captive. Tell me about yourself, where no one doubts that you are speaking about yourself. Brothers, says the Apostle, I do not consider myself to have taken hold of it. And what do you do? One thing, however: forgetting what lies behind and straining toward what is ahead, with intention, he says, not with perfection; with intention I follow toward the prize of the upward call of God in Christ Jesus. He had already said above: Not that I have already obtained it or am already perfect. Yet it is contradicted and said: The Apostle said these things because he had not yet attained immortality; not because he had not yet attained the perfection of righteousness. Therefore he was already as just as the angels, but not yet immortal like the angels. Indeed, they say, indeed this is precisely the case. Now you said: He was as just as the angels, but not yet immortal like the angels. Therefore he already held the perfection of righteousness, but by following the supreme prize, he was seeking immortality. The Apostle confesses the weakness of his soul.

Tell us, holy Apostle, a more manifest place, not where you seek immortality, but where you confess infirmity. And here already whispers arise, objections are made. I seem to hear the thoughts of some, and here it is said to me: “It is true, I know what you are going to say: he confesses infirmity, but of the flesh, not of the mind; he confesses infirmity, but of the body, not of the soul; in the mind, however, is perfect justice, not in the body. For who does not know that the Apostle was indeed fragile in body, mortal in body, as he says: We have this treasure in earthen vessels? Therefore, what do you have to do with the earthen vessel? Speak of the treasure. If he had anything less, if there were something to be added to the gold of justice, let us find it. Let us hear him himself, lest we be thought injurious. And lest I be exalted above measure through the abundance of the revelations, the Apostle says: lest I be exalted above measure through the abundance of the revelations. Surely here you recognize the Apostle as having an abundance of revelations, and fearing the precipice of elation. Therefore, that you may know that even the Apostle himself, who wished to save others, was still being healed; that you may know that even he was still being healed; if you highly value his honor, hear what the doctor applied to his swelling; hear not me, hear him. Hear him confessing, that you may feel him teaching. Hear: And lest I be exalted above measure through the abundance of the revelations. Behold, now I can say to the Apostle Paul: Lest you be exalted, holy Apostle? Lest you be exalted, is there still a need for caution? Lest you be exalted, is there still a need for fear? Lest you be exalted, is a remedy still to be sought for this infirmity? The Apostle was given a poultice for swelling.

What do you say to me? And you, hear what I am; and do not be proud, but fear. Hear how a short lamb enters where a ram so endangers itself. Lest I be exalted by the greatness of my revelations, there was given to me a thorn in my flesh, a messenger of Satan to buffet me. What kind of swelling did he fear, who received such a biting remedy? Therefore, say now that there was as much righteousness in him as in the holy Angels. Or perhaps even the holy angel in heaven receives a thorn, a messenger of Satan, to buffet him so that he may not be exalted? May such a suspicion about the holy Angels be far from us. We are men, let us acknowledge the holy Apostles as men; chosen vessels, but still fragile; still wanderers in this flesh, not yet triumphant in the heavenly homeland. Therefore, because he prayed to the Lord three times that this thorn might be removed from him; and he was not heard according to his will, because he was heard for his healing; perhaps he does not speak improperly where he says: But we know that the Law is spiritual; I, however, am carnal.

Every saint in this life is both carnal and spiritual.

Therefore, the fleshly Apostle, who said to others: "You who are spiritual, restore such a one in the spirit of meekness," speaks to others as spiritual, and is himself fleshly? But what did he say even to those spiritual ones, because they were not yet in heavenly and angelic perfection, they were not yet in the security of that homeland, but were engaged in the concern of this pilgrimage? What did he say to them? Surely he called them spiritual: "You," he said, "who are spiritual, restore such a one in the spirit of meekness, considering yourself, lest you also be tempted." Behold, he whom he already called spiritual, he feared for him the fragility of temptation, from which a spiritual one could be tempted, if not in mind, certainly in flesh. For he is spiritual because he lives according to the spirit; however, he is still in part mortal, fleshly: the same one is both spiritual and fleshly. Behold the spiritual: "With my mind I serve the law of God." Behold the fleshly: "But with the flesh the law of sin." Therefore, the same one is both spiritual and fleshly? Clearly the same, as long as he lives here, so it is. Who is entirely carnal, who is partly or entirely spiritual. Do not be surprised, whoever you are, if you yield and consent to carnal desires, either thinking them to be good to satisfy lust, or at least recognizing their evil but still yielding and following where they lead, and carrying out the evil suggestions they offer; you are entirely carnal. You, you, whoever you are in this state, are entirely carnal. However, if you indeed desire what the law forbids when it says: "You shall not covet," but still adhere to what the law also commands: "Do not follow your desires," you are spiritual in mind, but carnal in flesh. For there is a difference between not desiring at all and not following your desires. Not desiring at all is a sign of perfection; not following your desires signifies struggle, conflict, effort. Where the battle rages, why despair of victory? When will victory come? When death is swallowed up in victory. Then there will be the voice of the conqueror, not the sweat of the fighter. What will be the future voice of the conqueror when this corruptible body has put on incorruption, and this mortal body has put on immortality? See the victor, hear him rejoice, wait for him to triumph. Then the word written will be fulfilled: "Death is swallowed up in victory. Where, O death, is your victory? Where, O death, is your sting?" Where is it? It was here, and now it is not. Where, O death, is your victory? See the contention of death: "For I do not do what I want to." See the contention of death: "We know that the law is spiritual; but I am carnal." If the Apostle speaks of himself; if I say it, I do not reaffirm it; if the Apostle says, "We know that the law is spiritual, but I am carnal," meaning spiritually minded but physically carnal: when will he be wholly spiritual? When: "It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body." So now, when the contention of death rages, "I do not do what I want to": in part spiritual, in part carnal; spiritually better, carnally inferior. I still struggle, I have not yet won; it is a great thing for me not to be defeated. "For I do not do what I want to, but what I hate, I do." What are you doing? I desire. Even if I do not consent to desires, even if I do not follow my desires; yet I still desire: and indeed, even in this part, I am myself. The same both carnal and spiritual. For I am not in the mind, and another in the flesh. But what? Therefore, I myself: because I in the mind, I in the flesh. For not two contrary natures, but from both one man; because one God, by whom man was made. Therefore, I myself, I myself, serve the law of God with my mind, but with my flesh the law of sin. With my mind, I do not consent to the law of sin: but yet I would not want there to be any law of sin in my members. Because, therefore, I would not want it, and yet it is; not what I want do I do: because I desire, and do not want, not what I want do I do; but what I hate, that I do. What do I hate? Desiring. I hate desiring, and yet I do it with the flesh, not with the mind: What I hate, that I do.

Agreeing with the law.

If, however, I do what I do not want, I agree with the law that it is good. What does this mean: If I do what I do not want, I agree with the law that it is good? You would agree with the law if you did what it wanted: you do what the law hates, how do you agree with the law? Absolutely: If I do what I do not want, I agree with the law that it is good. How? Because the law commands: You shall not covet. What do I want? Not to covet? By wanting what the law wants, I agree with the law that it is good. If the law said: You shall not covet, and I wanted to covet; I would not agree with the law, and I would be entirely different from that perverse will. For if the law says: You shall not covet, and I wanted to covet; I do not agree with the law of God. What now? What do you say, O law? You shall not covet. And I do not want to covet, and I do not want; I do not want what you do not want; therefore, I agree because I do not want what you do not want. My weakness does not fulfill the law; but my will praises the law. Therefore, if I do what I do not want; I agree with the law because I do not want what it does not want, not because I do what I do not want. For doing itself is coveting, not consenting to covetousness: lest anyone now seeks an example of sinning for himself in the Apostle and gives a bad example. I do not do what I want. For what does the law say? You shall not covet. And I do not want to covet, and yet I covet; although I do not give my consent to my coveting, although I do not follow after it. For I resist, turn my mind away, refuse weapons, hold back my members; and yet what I do not want happens in me. What the law does not want, I do not want with the law; what it does not want, I do not want: therefore, I agree with the law. To be ignorant of sin. But because I am in the flesh, I am in the mind; but more so I am in the mind than in the flesh. For since I am in the mind, I am in the ruler; for the mind rules, the flesh is ruled; and I am more in that which rules than in that which is ruled. Therefore, because I am more in the mind: Now then it is no longer I who do it. Now then, what is it? Now then, redeemed, who was previously sold under sin, having now received the grace of the Savior, so that in my mind I delight in the law of God, it is not I who do it, but sin that dwells in me. For I know that no good dwells in me. Again therefore: in me; hear what follows: That is, in my flesh, good does not dwell. For to will is present with me. I know. What do you know? That no good dwells in me, that is, in my flesh. You had already said: What I do, I do not understand. If you do not understand, how do you know? You now say: I do not understand; you now say: I know; how am I to understand, I do not know. Or is this what I understand? For when he says: What I do, I do not understand; he says: I do not understand, I do not approve, I do not accept, it does not please me, I do not consent, I do not praise. For Christ will also not know those to whom he will say: I do not know you. Indeed this too I understand: For what I do, I do not understand; because what I do not do, I do not understand. For it is not I who do it, but sin that dwells in me. Therefore I do not understand: because it is not I who do it, as it is said of the Lord: He who did not know sin. What is it: did not know? Therefore did he not know what he judged? did he not know what he punished? If therefore he did not know what he punished, he punished unjustly. Because truly he punished justly, he knew what he punished. And yet he did not know sin, because he did not commit sin. For what I do, I do not understand: for it is not what I want to do that I do; but what I hate, that I do. But if I do what I do not want, I consent to the law that it is good. Now then, having already received grace, it is not I who do it; the mind is free, the flesh captive. It is not I who do it, but sin that dwells in me. For I know that no good dwells in me, that is, in my flesh.

It is not permitted for the saints to fulfill the law in this life. For I have the desire to do what is right, but not the ability to carry it out. The desire is present within me, but the ability to carry it out is not. He did not say: to do; but: to carry out. For you do not do nothing. Desire rebels, and you do not consent; another's wife attracts, and you do not agree, you avert your mind, you enter the inner chamber of your mind. You see desire bustling outside, you pronounce judgment against it, cleansing your conscience. You say, I do not want, I do not act. Assume that it attracts, I do not act, I have someone with whom I delight. For I delight in the law of God according to the inner man. Why do you stir up with your flesh? Why do you suggest foolish, transient, fleeting, vain, harmful delights tumultuously, and narrate them to me as if prattling? The unrighteous have narrated delights to me. From there also comes this desire. It narrates delights to me, but not like your law, O Lord. For I delight in the law of God: not from myself, but from the grace of God. You desire tumultuously in the flesh, you do not submit the mind to yourself. I will hope in God; I will not fear what the flesh does to me. Myself, myself, that is, with the mind not consenting, the flesh stirs up turmoil. "In God," it says, "I will hope; I will not fear what the flesh does to me." Neither another's, nor my own. Therefore, does one who acts in himself these things do nothing? He does much: he does a great thing, but still he does not carry it out. For what is: to carry out? Where, O death, is your contention? Therefore, the desire is present within me, but not the ability to carry out what is good. The same argument is being discussed. For I do not do the good I want; but the evil I do not want, this I practice. And he repeats: But if I do what I do not want, that is, if I desire; it is no longer I who do it, but sin that dwells in me. I find then a law, that when I want to do good. I find the law to be good; the law is good, the law is a good thing. Where do I prove it? Because I want to fulfill it. I find then a law that, when I want to do good; for evil lies close at hand to me. And this is mine. For it is not that my flesh is not mine, or the flesh is of another substance, or the flesh has another principle, or the soul is from God, and the flesh is from the race of darkness. God forbid! Illness opposes health. The half-dead lies on the road, still being healed, all his illnesses are healed. For I do not do what I want; but what I hate, that I do. If then I do what I do not want; I find then a law that when I want to do good, for evil lies close at hand to me. What evil?

There is still conflict in man. For I delight in the law of God according to the inner man. But I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind and making me captive to the law of sin, which is in my members; captive, yet from the flesh; captive, yet in part. For the mind resists and delights in the law of God. Thus we should understand, if the Apostle speaks of himself. Therefore now, if the mind does not consent to the sin that titillates, suggests, and entices; if the mind does not consent because it has other inner pleasures incomparable to the pleasures of the flesh: if therefore it does not consent, and there is something dead in me, and something alive, death still contends, but the living mind does not consent. Is not that very death in you? Is not that which is dead still concerning you? You still have a contention. What, then, is to be hoped for from this? The same argument is treated.

Wretched man that I am: even if not in mind, yet in flesh, I am a wretched man. For indeed, a man in mind, and not in flesh, is not a man. For who has ever hated his own flesh? Wretched man that I am, who will deliver me from this body of death? What is this, brothers? As if he wishes to be without a body. Why do you hurry? If your intention is so much to be without a body; death will come someday, and the coming of the last day will undoubtedly deliver you from this body of death. Why do you groan greatly? Why do you say: Who will deliver me? You speak as a mortal, you speak as one who will die. The separation of the mind from the flesh will someday come: because of the brevity of life it is never far away; because of daily misfortunes, you do not know when it will be. Therefore, whether you hurry or delay, all human life is brief: why do you groan greatly and say: Who will deliver me from this body of death? In the resurrection, only the just are freed from the body of death. And he adds: The grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord. Do pagans, who do not have the grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord, not die? Will they not, on the final day, be released from the flesh? Will they not be freed from the body of this death on that day? What is it that you consider a great matter of the grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord, that you will be freed from the body of this death? The Apostle answers you, if we have grasped his sense—rather, with the Lord's help, we have undoubtedly grasped it—the Apostle answers you, and says: I know what I am speaking of. You say that pagans are freed from the body of this death, because the last day of this life will come, and they will be temporarily released from the body of this death. The day will come when all who are in the tombs will hear his voice; and those who have done good will come forth to the resurrection of life; behold, they are freed from the body of this death. But those who have done evil, to the resurrection of judgment: behold, they return to the body of this death. The body of this death returns to the impious, and they will not be released from it at any time. Then there will not be eternal life, but eternal death, because of eternal punishment. The body of the saints after resurrection is immortal. But you, O Christian, beg as much as you can, cry out and say: Wretched man that I am, who will deliver me from this body of death? It is answered to you: You will be made secure, not by yourself, but by your Lord; you will be made secure by your guarantee. Hope for the kingdom of Christ with Christ, for you already hold the pledge of Christ's blood. Say, say: Who will deliver me from this body of death? So that it may be answered to you: The grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord. For you will not be delivered from this body of death so as not to have this body. You will have it, but it will no longer be of this death. It will be the same, but it will not be the same. It will be the same because it will be the same flesh; it will not be the same because it will not be mortal. Thus, thus you will be delivered from this body of death, so that this mortal body will put on immortality, and this corruptible body will put on incorruption. By whom? Through whom? By the grace of God, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Because through one man death came, and through one man the resurrection of the dead. As in Adam all die; that is why you groan. In Adam all die: that is why you groan, that is why you struggle with death, that is why there is the body of death. But as in Adam all die, so in Christ all will be made alive. Having been made alive, receiving the immortal body, where you say: Where is your sting, O death?, you will be delivered from this body of death; not by your own virtue, but by the grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord. Turned to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 154A

SERMON 154/A TREATISE OF SAINT AUGUSTINE ON WHAT THE APOSTLE SAID (ROM 7:15):

"FOR I DO NOT DO WHAT I WANT, BUT I DO WHAT I HATE"

What is being done in a man. The Apostle Paul, when he was read, we heard what happens in a man; and each one considering himself found that what the Apostle said is true. For he said that he does not do what he wants, but what he hates, this he does. And he said: If I do what I do not want, I agree with the law that it is good; because what I do not want, the law does not want either; what the law forbids me to do, this I do not want to do: but what I do not want, this... there is in me something else that fights against my will. And he said: For I delight in the law of God according to the inner man: but I see another law warring against the law of my mind, and leading me captive in the law of sin, which is in my members. See what happens in a man. But look at what he said in the following: Wretched man that I am! Who will deliver me from this body of death? The grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord. In man, there is strife.

Let each individual pay attention to himself: because in his Epistle, Paul has put a mirror, where every person may see himself. What the law commands delights our mind; and what the law prohibits delights our flesh; and our mind and our flesh contend; the mind contends for the law, the flesh against the law; and one person walks with the strife that is happening within him. In one person, there is strife: the tongue is silent, and inside there is tumult. I present to you, where you may better see it. A man sees another’s wife, and he desires her. He considers the law, which says: Do not commit fornication; and what does the person’s mind say internally? The law has spoken well, the law has said something great, it loves chastity; and the flesh delights in iniquity. There has been a strife in the person. Let two overcome one; let the law and the mind overcome the contradicting flesh. But see what the mind itself has said: I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and leading me captive in the law of sin, which is in my members. Therefore, the mind is conquered by the flesh. Let him call upon the help of the Savior, and he will escape the snare of the deceiver. For see what the Apostle said. What kind of person was the Apostle, how great and strong an athlete of God! Yet he would be led captive, if the crucified one did not come to his aid. Therefore, when he was in danger, what did he say? Wretched man that I am, who will deliver me from the body of this death, so that I may not commit iniquity, which delights my flesh? The grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord.

Christ watches you fighting, He can help you in danger.

Christ watches you, therefore, battling. Your conscience is the theater where two contend, the mind and the flesh. The mind consents to the law, the flesh contradicts the law; and wishes to curb the flesh. A great struggle: but He who watches you battling can help you in danger. For if you were wrestling with some human, he would strike you, and you would strike him; and a man would watch you to see who would win. Whoever was to win would receive a prize. This a man had to say to you: Whoever of you wins, will receive this. He was ready to crown the victor; but could he aid the struggler? Now, however, it is Christ who watches you; call out to Him, when you struggle, so that you might win; because your flesh, by its own misfortune, contends to win. For if two men were to wrestle, and engage in a pancratium, whoever of you won would be crowned. But in this struggle, if the mind wins, it liberates both soul and flesh; if the flesh wins, both are thrown into hell. Therefore, the flesh contends to its own misfortune, and wishes to win to its own misfortune. It is granted to the flesh to be conquered, so that it is not punished in eternal fire.

We shall have won if we do not consent to the evil desires of our flesh. The Psalm which we have sung, as we have said, therefore agrees: Out of the depths I have cried to you, O Lord; Lord, hear my voice. This is the depth where the flesh contends against the mind. For if the mind conquers, both are lifted up from that depth; the flesh is lifted up there, too, having been conquered, because it is conquered for its own good. Just as in a house when a wicked wife contends with a good husband, it is to her harm that she wins, and to her benefit that she is defeated. For if the wicked wife conquers, the house becomes perverse, when a bearded man serves a wicked woman. But if the wicked wife is conquered, she begins to serve the good husband; the woman herself becomes good, because she serves a good husband. Thus, it is with our flesh, like a wicked wife conquered, because she is conquered for her own good. So that he may be called to help, the one who unites the two and crowns both, therefore we cry out from this depth to our Lord, as we have said in the Psalm. For if we conquer, and do not consent to the evil desires of our flesh, afterwards the flesh will rise again; and there you will not find evil desires with which to contend. Now, indeed, you find evil desires, against which you must fight: and it is said to you: Conquer, and you will be crowned. And what is conquering for you now? Not consenting to evil desires. For can you not have those evil desires? But conquering is... consenting to not give in. But when we receive the flesh on the day of resurrection, this flesh itself is transformed, it becomes immortal; and then you will not find a desire with which you must wrestle... in which you might be crowned. And once you are above with your flesh, do you cry out from the depth where you were struggling against your flesh? The Canaanite woman, by faith, obtained what she sought by crying out. And that woman, who cried out after the Lord, how did the Canaanite cry out! Her daughter was suffering from a demon: because the flesh does not consent to the mind, she was possessed by the devil. If she cried out so much for her daughter, how much should we cry out for our flesh and soul? For you see what she obtained by crying out. At first, she was ignored; for she was a Canaanite, from an evil people who worshipped idols. But the Lord Jesus Christ was walking in Judea, from where the Patriarchs came, from where the Virgin Mary, who gave birth to Christ, came; and that nation alone worshipped the true God, not idols. Therefore, when some Canaanite woman interceded with Him, He did not want to listen to her. He ignored her because He knew what He was preserving; not to refuse the favor but so that she, by persevering, would obtain it. Therefore, His disciples said to Him: Lord, send her away already, give her an answer: you see she cries out after us and makes us weary. And He said to His disciples: I was not sent except to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. I was sent to the Jewish nation, where I sought the sheep that were lost. There were other sheep in other Gentiles, but Christ did not come for them; because they did not believe during Christ's presence but believed in the Gospel of Christ. Hence, He said: I was not sent except to the sheep; therefore, in His presence, He chose the Apostles. And among those sheep was Nathanael, of whom He said: Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom there is no deceit. Among those sheep was that great crowd, which carried branches before the Lord's donkey and said:

Blessed is He who comes in the name of the Lord. Those sheep from the house of Israel were lost and recognized the present shepherd and believed in the present Christ. Therefore, when she was denied, she was distinguished from the Gentile sheep. When she heard what the Lord said to His disciples, she persisted in crying out and did not cease. And the Lord said to her: It is not good to take the children's bread and throw it to the dogs. He made her a dog: why? Because she was from the Gentiles who worshipped idols: for dogs lick stones. It is not good to take the children's bread and give it to dogs. And she did not say: Lord, do not make me a dog, for I am not a dog; but rather she said: You speak truth, Lord, I am a dog. From where she acknowledged the insult, she obtained the favor; where iniquity was denied, humility was crowned. Indeed, Lord, you speak truth: But even the dogs eat the crumbs that fall from their master's table. And then the Lord: O woman, great is your faith; let it be done for you as you wish. Already a dog for a long time, now a woman, changed by barking. She desired the crumbs falling from the table: suddenly she found herself reclining at the table. For when He said to her: Great is your faith, He already counted her among those, whose bread He was unwilling to give to the dogs.

Let us persevere in praying.

All these things, what do they teach us except that when what we ask from God is good, we should persevere in praying until we receive it with longing desire? For God delays the seekers in order to exercise the desirers. But eternal life we ought to ask with great groaning, here a good life, and later eternal life; because also a good life you ought to ask from God, who aids your will. If He does not aid, you remain defeated; you begin to be led captive, if He does not help you as is said: Wretched man that I am, who will deliver me from this body of death? The grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord. Therefore, let us securely ask for two things: in this age a good life, in the future age eternal life. We do not know if other things are useful to us. A man asks God that he may marry a wife; how does he know if it will be for his good? A man asks God that he may acquire wealth; how does he know if he slept securely as a poor man, but as a rich man he dreams of robbers? He does not know then what is useful to him from everything that this age holds. Safely, however, he asks for a good life and eternal life; here that he may merit God, there that he may be crowned by God. But what is a good life? To love God with all your heart, with all your soul, with all your mind, and to love your neighbor as yourself. Therefore, let us love our God, let us love one another in His unity, let us have peace in Him, and among us charity; so that when our Lord Christ Himself comes... we may say: Lord, with Your help we have done what You commanded, with Your favor may we receive what You promised.

AGAINST THE PELAGIANS.

Conducted in the Basilica of the Holy Martyrs of Scillium Why concupiscence is called sin. How sin loses dominion.

Yesterday's reading from the holy Apostle was concluded at the point where it was said: "So then I myself serve the law of God with my mind, but with my flesh I serve the law of sin." In this conclusion, the Apostle showed that he had said what he had previously stated: "It is no longer I who do it, but sin that dwells within me"; because he was not doing it with his mind by consenting, but with his flesh by desiring. For he calls that by the name of sin from which all sins arise, that is, from carnal desire. For whatever sins exist in words, in deeds, in thoughts, they only arise from evil desire, they only arise from illicit pleasure. Therefore, if we resist this illicit pleasure, if we do not consent, if we do not provide our members as weapons; sin does not reign in our mortal body. For sin loses its reign first, and thus it perishes. In this life, therefore, as far as it concerns the saints, it loses its reign, in the other life it perishes. For here it loses its reign when we do not follow after our desires; there it perishes when it will be said: "Where, O death, is your victory?" As there is no condemnation here in the saints.

Therefore, when the Apostle said: "With the mind I serve the law of God, but with the flesh the law of sin," not giving the members to commit iniquities, but only desiring, and yet not giving hands to illicit desire; therefore when he said, "With the mind I serve the law of God, but with the flesh the law of sin," he continued and said, "There is therefore now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus." For those who are in the flesh there is condemnation; for those who are in Christ Jesus there is no condemnation. Lest you think this will be thereafter, he added: "now." Later, expect that there will be no desire in you against which you contend, with which you wrestle, to which you do not consent, which you bridle and tame; later expect that it will not even exist. For if what contends with us from the mortal body will also be thereafter, "Where, O death, is your contention?" will be false. Let us know, therefore, what will come later. Then what is written will happen: "Death is swallowed in victory. Where, O death, is your contention? where, O death, is your sting?" For the sting of death is sin; but the strength of sin is the law. Because from prohibition desire is increased, not extinguished. The law gave strength to sin, merely by commanding through the letter, not aiding through the spirit. Therefore, it will not be this then, but what now? What is now, you ask? What he said a little before: "But now it is no longer I who do it." And there "now." What does it mean: "I do not do it"? I do not consent, I do not agree, I do not decide, it always displeases me: I control my members. And this is great: since there is desire from the flesh, and the members of the body pertain to the flesh, when sin does not reign, that is, the desire of the flesh; the mind has more right to control the members of the flesh, lest they be given as instruments of iniquity, than the desire of the flesh itself to move the members of the flesh. Thus, there is desire of the flesh, and members of the flesh; yet the mind, because it has dominion: if indeed it is helped from above, lest when we give it too much against the grace of God, we make it not a king but a tyrant; therefore the mind is so strong, so it rules when it is ruled, that from the members of this flesh, against the desire of this flesh, it can accomplish what the Apostle says: "Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body, to make you obey its passions; neither yield your members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin." No one is free from the law of sin except through grace.

There is therefore now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus. Let them not be anxious if they are aroused by illicit desires; let them not be anxious that there still seems to be a law in their members warring against the law of their mind. For there is no condemnation. But for whom? For those who are now, at this moment, in Christ Jesus. And where is that statement made just a little while ago: "I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and making me captive to the law of sin which is in my members"? But he was lamenting from the flesh, not from the mind. So where is that law, if there is no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus? For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus. For the law, not that one on Mount Sinai through the letter: For the law, not in the oldness of the letter; but: the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus has set you free from the law of sin and death. For how could you delight in the law of God according to the inner man, unless the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus freed you from the law of sin and death? Therefore, human mind, do not attribute it to yourself, do not be overly proud; indeed, do not be proud at all, O human mind, that you do not consent to the desires of the flesh, that the law of sin does not bring you down from the citadel: the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus has set you free from the law of sin and death. That law did not set you free, of which it was said above: "that we may serve in the newness of the Spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter." Why did that law not set you free? Was it not also written by the finger of God? Is not the finger of God understood to be the Holy Spirit? Read the Gospel, and see that where one evangelist says, with the Lord speaking: "If I by the Spirit of God cast out demons"; another says: "If I by the finger of God cast out demons." Therefore if that law was also written by the finger of God, that is, by the Spirit of God; by which Spirit the magicians of Pharaoh, having been overcome, said: "This is the finger of God"; if therefore that law too, or rather since that law too was written by the Spirit of God, that is, by the finger of God, why is it not said of that law: For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus? The law of sin and of death, what is it? Why was the law of Moses given? For the law of death is not itself called the law of sin and death, nor is that law called which was given on Mount Sinai. The law of sin and death is that which, lamenting, he said: I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind. But that law, itself, is which is said: Therefore the law indeed is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good. And he added: What then is good, has it become death to me? By no means! But sin, so that it might appear to be sin, worked death in me through that which is good; that sin might become sinful beyond measure, through the commandment. What is: beyond measure? That transgression might be added. Therefore, the law was given, so that weakness might be found. It is not enough that this weakness be found, but also that it might be increased, and even so a physician might be sought. For if it were a mild disease, it would be despised; if the disease were despised, the physician would not be sought; if the physician were not sought, the disease would not be ended.

Therefore, where sin abounded, grace superabounded; which erased all the sins it found, and to our will, striving towards non-sin, supplied aid; so that our will itself might be praised not in itself, but in God. For in God we will be praised all day: and, In the Lord my soul will be praised; let the meek hear, and be glad. Let the meek hear: for the proud and contentious do not listen. Therefore, why is it not the law written by the finger of God, which gives this aid of grace, of which we speak? Why? Because it was written on tablets of stone, not on tablets of fleshly hearts.

Harmony of the Old and New Law.

Finally, my brothers, observe in the great mystery the concord, observe the difference; the concord of the law, the difference of the people. Passover is celebrated among the ancient people, as you know, with the slaughter of the lamb and unleavened bread; where the slaughter of the lamb signifies Christ, and the unleavened bread signifies new life, that is, without the old leaven. Thus the Apostle says to us: Purge out the old leaven, that you may be a new lump, just as you are unleavened. For Christ our Passover is sacrificed. Thus Passover was celebrated among that ancient people, not yet in the shining light, but in the significant shadow it was celebrated; and fifty days after the celebration of the Passover, as one who wishes may calculate, the law is given on Mount Sinai, written by the finger of God. The true Passover comes, Christ is sacrificed; He makes the passage from death to life. For in Hebrew, Passover is interpreted as passing over; which the Evangelist expressed, saying: When Jesus knew that His hour had come to depart from this world to the Father. Therefore Passover is celebrated, the Lord rises, makes the passage from death to life, which is Passover; and fifty days are counted, and the Holy Spirit comes, the finger of God. The difference of those same laws. But see how it was there, and how it is here. There the people stood afar off, there was fear, there was no love. For they were so afraid that they said to Moses: "Speak to us, and let not the Lord speak to us, lest we die." Therefore, as it is written, God descended on Sinai in fire; but terrifying the people standing afar off, and writing with His finger on stone, not in the heart. But here, when the Holy Spirit came, the faithful were gathered together in one; He neither terrified them on a mountain, but entered into a house. Indeed, there was suddenly a sound from heaven, as of a rushing mighty wind; it sounded, but no one was afraid. You heard the sound, see also the fire; because there was both fire and sound on the mountain; but there also was smoke, here however, the fire was clear. For, as Scripture says, there appeared to them tongues divided as of fire. Was He terrifying from afar off? By no means! For He sat upon each one of them, and they began to speak in tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance. Hear the tongue speaking, and understand the Spirit writing not on stone, but on the heart. Therefore, the law of the Spirit of life, written in the heart, not on stone; in Christ Jesus, in whom the truest Passover is celebrated: He has freed you from the law of sin and death. For to understand the very clear distinction between the Old and New Testament; from which the Apostle also says: "Not on tablets of stone, but on tablets of human hearts." The Lord says through the Prophet: "Behold, the days will come, says the Lord, and I will complete upon the house of Jacob a new covenant, not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers, in the day I took them by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt." Then clearly showing this difference: "Giving," He says, "My laws in their hearts; in their hearts," He says, "I will write them." Therefore, if the law of God is written in your heart, it does not terrify from outside, but soothes within; then the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus has freed you from the law of sin and death. The weakness of the law comes from the flesh. Christ in the likeness of sinful flesh. For what was impossible by the law.

For this follows in the reading of the Apostle: What was impossible by the law. And lest it be blamed, what did he add? In that it was weakened by the flesh. For the law commanded, but did not fulfill; because the flesh, where there was no grace, resisted most invincibly. And the law was weakened by the flesh, because the law is spiritual; but I am carnal. How then would the law aid me by commanding through the letter, but not giving grace? It was weakened by the flesh. What did God do, since this was impossible by the law, and it was weakened by the flesh? God sent His Son. By what was the law weakened, and why was this impossible by the law? It was weakened by the flesh. What then did God do? He sent flesh against the flesh; rather, He sent flesh for the flesh. For he killed the sin of the flesh, he freed the substance of the flesh. God sent His Son in the likeness of sinful flesh. Indeed in true flesh, but not in sinful flesh. But what is it: in the likeness of sinful flesh? That is, that there be flesh, true flesh. And whence the likeness of sinful flesh? Because death is from sin: death surely is in all sinful flesh; of which the Apostle says: That the body of sin might be destroyed. Because therefore death is in all sinful flesh: but both are there, both death and sin in other flesh. In sinful flesh, there is both death and sin; in the likeness of sinful flesh, there was death, but there was no sin. For if it were sinful flesh, and for the merit of sin would pay the penalty of death, the Lord Himself would not say: Behold, the prince of the world comes, and finds nothing in me. Why then does he kill me? Because what I did not steal, then I paid. Precisely what He did with the tax, He did with death. Tribute was demanded, a didrachma: Why, he says, do you and your disciples not pay the tribute? He called Peter to Him, and said to him: The kings of the world, from whom do they demand tribute? from their sons, or from strangers? The answer was: From strangers. Therefore, He said, the sons are free. But lest we offend them, go to the sea, cast a hook, and the first one that comes up, that is, the firstborn from the dead; open its mouth, He said, and you will find a stater, that is, two didrachmas, four drachmas; because a didrachma, that is, two drachmas, was demanded per head. You will find a stater there, that is, four drachmas, give it to them for me and you. What is it: For me and you? Christ Himself, Peter, the Church of Christ, the four Gospels of the Church. The mystery was hidden: Yet Christ paid a tribute not owed. Thus, He paid death: He did not owe, yet He paid. If He had not paid what was not owed, He would never free us from our debt.

Christ made sin.

What was impossible for the law, which made one a transgressor, because the mind had not yet been convinced to seek a Savior; in which it was weakened through the flesh, God sent His Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and concerning sin, condemned sin in the flesh. How then did He not have sin, if He condemned sin for sin? We have explained this to you before, but let those who remember recognize it; those who have not heard, let them listen; those who have forgotten, let them recollect. In the law, the sacrifice for sin was called sin. The law frequently mentions this; not once, not twice, but very often, sins were called sacrifices for sins. Such a sin was Christ. What then shall we say? Did He have sin? By no means! He did not have sin, and yet He was sin. He was sin, I said, according to that understanding because He was a sacrifice for sin. Listen, because this is how He was sin, listen to the Apostle himself. Speaking of Him, he says: "Him who knew no sin." I was explaining this statement to you when I said these things: "He," he says, "who knew no sin," that is, our Lord Jesus Christ, "God the Father made Him who knew no sin to be sin for us"; that very Christ who knew no sin, God the Father made to be sin for us, so that we might become the righteousness of God in Him. See these two things, the righteousness of God, not ours; in Him, not in us. Hence those great saints, about whom the Psalm says: "Your righteousness is like the mountains of God." And as if it were said in that Psalm, where it is mentioned: "Your righteousness"; for it is not their righteousness, but: "Your righteousness is like the mountains of God." For I have lifted up my eyes to the mountains, whence comes my help; but not from the mountains: "For my help is from the Lord, who made heaven and earth"; therefore when he said: "Your righteousness is like the mountains of God," as if it were asked: "Why then are there others born who do not pertain to the righteousness of God?" he added: "your judgments are like a great abyss." What does it mean: "like a great abyss"? It is high, it is impenetrable, it is inaccessible to human intention. For the riches of God are inscrutable; His judgments are inscrutable, His ways untraceable. Therefore also here: God sent His Son, because of those foreknown, and predestined, called, justified, glorified: so that the mountains of God may say: "If God is for us, who can be against us?" God sent His Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh, so that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us. It was not fulfilled by itself, it was fulfilled through Christ. For He did not come to abolish the law, but to fulfill it. To walk according to the flesh and according to the spirit. How the righteousness of the law is now fulfilled. But how would the righteousness of the law be fulfilled in us, or how is it fulfilled in us, or in whom is it fulfilled? Do you want to hear in whom it is fulfilled? In those who do not walk according to the flesh, but according to the Spirit. What does it mean to walk according to the flesh? To consent to carnal desires. What does it mean to walk according to the Spirit? To be helped by the Spirit in the mind, and not to obey the desires of the flesh. Thus the law is fulfilled in us, the righteousness of God is fulfilled in us. For now, it is fulfilled as follows: Do not follow after your desires. When you hear 'after your desires', understand it as illicit desires. Do not follow after your desires must be fulfilled by our own will aided by the grace of God; it must be fulfilled: Do not follow after your desires. For whatever that carnal desire enacted in us in our past sins, whether in deeds, words, or thoughts, it has all been erased by sacred Baptism; one indulgence has erased all debts. Therefore, the struggle with the flesh remains, for iniquity has been erased, but infirmity remains. There exists within us a teasing of illicit desire; fight against it, resist it, do not consent; and it is fulfilled thus: Do not follow after your desires, for even if they sometimes creep in and seize the eye, the ear, the tongue, or fleeting thoughts, let us not despair of our salvation. That is why we say every day: Forgive us our debts. The righteousness of the law, he says, is fulfilled in us. The wisdom of the flesh and spirit. But in whom is it for us? Those who do not walk according to the flesh, but according to the spirit. For those who are according to the flesh think of the things of the flesh; but those who are according to the spirit, the things of the spirit. For the wisdom of the flesh is death; but the wisdom of the spirit is life and peace. For the wisdom of the flesh is hostile to God. For it is not subject to the law of God: nor indeed can it be. What does it mean: nor indeed can it? It does not mean that man cannot, nor the soul cannot, nor finally the flesh itself, because it is a creature of God, cannot; but the wisdom of the flesh cannot, vice cannot, not nature. As if you were to say: Lameness cannot subject itself to walking uprightly; nor indeed can it. The foot can, but the lameness cannot. Remove the lameness, and you will see upright walking. But as long as there is lameness, it cannot; so as long as there is the wisdom of the flesh, it cannot. Let there not be the wisdom of the flesh, and man can. The wisdom of the spirit is life and peace. Therefore what he says: the wisdom of the flesh is hostile to God, do not understand it as if this hostility could harm God. It is hostile by resisting, not by doing harm. But it harms the one in whom the wisdom of the flesh is; because it is the vice of nature that harms, in which nature it is found. However, medicine was invented for the purpose of driving out the vice and healing the nature. Hence, the Savior came to the human race, found no one healthy, therefore the great physician came. The error of the Manichaeans. This was said because the Manichaeans, wanting to introduce another nature of evil against God, think that their error is somewhat assisted by this testimony of the Apostle, and they suppose that it was said as if naturally, because it was said: "It cannot, it is hostile to God: for it is not subject to the law of God, nor indeed can it be"; and they did not notice that it was not said of the flesh: "it cannot"; nor of man: "it cannot"; nor of the soul: "it cannot"; but of the prudence of the flesh. This prudence is a vice. Do you want to know what it is: To be wise according to the flesh? It is death. But that same man, and the same nature created by the true and good Lord God, yesterday was wise according to the flesh, today is wise according to the spirit; the vice has been expelled, the nature has been healed. For as long as there was that prudence of the flesh, it could in no way be subject to the law of God. For as long as there is a limp due to vice, there can by no means be a proper walk. However, with the vice healed, the nature is restored. You were once darkness; now, however, [you are] light in the Lord. Not to be in the flesh.

See then what follows: Those who are in the flesh; that is, those who trust in the flesh, who follow their desires, who dwell in them, who are delighted by their pleasures, who establish a blessed and happy life in their delights, they are in the flesh; they cannot please God. For it is not said thus: Those who are in the flesh cannot please God; as if it were said: As long as men are in this life, they cannot please God. So then, did the holy Patriarchs not please? So then, did the holy Prophets not please? So then, did the holy Apostles not please? Did the holy martyrs, who before laying down their body by suffering, by confessing Christ, not only despised pleasure but also very patiently endured pains, not please? They pleased, but they were not in the flesh. They bore the flesh, but they were not borne by the flesh. For it had already been said to the paralytic: Take up your bed. Therefore, those who are in the flesh, as I have said, as I have now explained, by not living in this world, but by consenting to the desires of the flesh, cannot please God. Not in the flesh, but in the spirit.

Finally, listen to him who resolves the question without any doubt. He was speaking while living in this body; and yet he added: But you are not in the flesh. Do you think this was said to anyone here among us? Behold, it was said to the people of God, to the Church; indeed, he was writing to the Romans, but he was speaking to the whole Church of Christ; he spoke to the wheat, not to the chaff; he spoke to the hidden mass, not to the visible straw. Let each one recognize in his own heart. We speak to the ears; we do not see consciences; nevertheless, according to what we have previously spoken, I think in the name of Christ, it was said to those in the people of Christ: But you are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit, if indeed the Spirit of God dwells in you. You are not in the flesh because you do not do the works of the flesh by consenting to the desires of the flesh; but you are in the Spirit, because you delight in the law of God according to the inner man; and this is: if indeed the Spirit of God dwells in you. For if you presume upon your own spirit, you are still in the flesh. Therefore, if you are not in the flesh, that you may be in the Spirit of God; for then you are not in the flesh. For if the Spirit of God departs, the spirit of man, by its own weight, reverts to the flesh, returns to carnal deeds, returns to worldly desires; and the last state of that man will be worse than the first. So then, have free will, so that you may implore for help. Are you not in the flesh, and is this from your own strength? Far from it! How, then?

If indeed the Spirit of God dwells in you. But if anyone does not have the Spirit of Christ, he does not belong to Him. Therefore, let not an impoverished and corrupted nature extend itself, boast, or claim its own power. O human nature! O Adam, when you were healthy, you did not stand, and did you rise by your own strength? If anyone does not have the Spirit of Christ: for the Spirit of God is the Spirit of Christ; and it belongs to both the Father and the Son: If anyone does not have the Spirit of Christ, let him not deceive himself, he does not belong to Him.

What is to be hoped for from the flesh?

Behold, with the help of His mercy, we have the Spirit of Christ; from that very love of justice, with complete faith, Catholic faith, we recognize that the Spirit of God is in us. But what about that mortal flesh? What about the law in our members warring against the law of the mind? What about that groan: Wretched man that I am? Listen: But if Christ is in you, the body is dead because of sin, but the spirit is life because of righteousness. Therefore, should we despair of the body dead because of sin? Is there no hope? Does it sleep in such a way that it will not rise again? By no means! The body is dead because of sin, but the spirit is life because of righteousness. Sadness remains about our body. However, no one ever hated his own flesh. We see how carefully the burial of the dead is attended to. The body is dead because of sin, but the spirit is life because of righteousness. Already you were saying for consolation: Indeed, I would wish that my body also be in life; but since it cannot, let at least my spirit be, let at least my soul be. Wait, do not be anxious. The restoration of the flesh and immortality is promised to the pious. For if the Spirit of Him who raised Jesus from the dead dwells in you, He who raised Christ Jesus from the dead will also give life to your mortal bodies. What do you fear? Why are you even anxious for this flesh? The hair of your head will not perish. Adam, by sinning, condemned your bodies to death; but Jesus, if His Spirit is in you, will give life to your mortal bodies; because He gave His blood for your salvation. Do you doubt the promise being fulfilled when you hold such a pledge? So then, man, that mortal struggle will not exist, thus it will be fulfilled as it was said: Miserable man that I am, who will deliver me from this body of death? Because Christ Jesus, if His Spirit dwells in you, will give life to your mortal bodies. Thus you will be delivered from this body of death, not by not having a body, or by having another; but by not dying any further. For if he had not added: of this death, and said: Who will deliver me from the body? perhaps the error might be suggested to the human mind, and it might be said: Do you see that God does not want us to be with a body? He says, of this body of death. Remove death, and the body is good. Let the last enemy, death, be removed, and my flesh will be my friend forever. For no one ever hated his own flesh. Even if the spirit desires against the flesh, and the flesh desires against the spirit; even if now there is strife in this house, the husband litigating seeks not the destruction, but the concord of his wife. By no means! My brothers, by no means let the spirit hate the flesh by desiring against the flesh. It hates the vices of the flesh, it hates the prudence of the flesh, it hates the contention of death. Let this corruptible put on incorruption, and this mortal put on immortality; let it be sown a natural body, raised a spiritual body; and you will see full and perfect concord, you will see creation praising the Creator. Therefore, if the Spirit of Him who raised Jesus from the dead dwells in you, He who raised Christ from the dead will give life also to your mortal bodies, because of His Spirit who dwells in you; not because of your merits, but because of His gifts. Turned to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 156

SERMO 156 ON THE WORDS OF THE APOSTLE (ROMANS 8:12-17):

"Therefore, brothers, we are debtors, not to the flesh,"

"That we may live according to the flesh," etc.

AGAINST THE PELAGIANS He was in the Basilica of Gratian, THE BIRTHDAY OF THE MARTYRS OF BOLITANA In the Scriptures some things are hidden, some things are open. The depth of the Word of God exercises study, it does not deny understanding. For if all things were closed, there would be nothing from which obscure things could be revealed. Again, if all things were covered, there would be nothing from which the soul could receive nourishment and gain the strength with which it could knock on closed doors. In the previous apostolic readings, which we have explained to your Love, as much as the Lord has deigned to help, we have endured much labor and anxiety. We sympathized with you, and were anxious both for us and for you. However, as I believe, the Lord has helped both us and you; and those things which seemed extremely difficult, He deigned to untangle through us, such that no question remained which would disturb a pious mind. For an impious mind even hates understanding itself; and a person sometimes, with an overly perverse mind, fears to understand, lest he be compelled to do what he has understood. About such people the Psalm says: They did not want to understand, in order to act well. But you, beloved, because it is good to think well of you, demand understanding, and God demands fruit. For understanding, as it is written, is good for all those who do it. Nevertheless, what remains and was read today, although it does not have as much difficulty as the earlier readings, which we have already, with the help of the Lord, passed through as we could, still requires your attention; as it is like a conclusion, because of what was said in the earlier readings, where there was labor, lest the Apostle be constituted guilty of all sins in a certain way by saying: For I do not do what I want. Then, lest the law appear either sufficient for a person having free will, even if no further divine help is extended, or certainly be believed to have been given in vain, the reason why the law was given is also stated, because it too was given for help, but not like grace. The law was given. The necessity of medicinal grace. For it is given, as we have already explained and you should hold, and we ought to commend to you more earnestly and diligently; it is given that man might find himself, not that disease might be cured, but that, through the increase of disease by transgression, a physician should be sought. And who is this physician, unless He who said: The physician is not needed for those who are well, but for those who are sick? Therefore, he who does not confess the Creator, arrogantly denies the Author. However, he who denies his own sickness judges the Savior as unnecessary. Therefore, let us both praise the Creator in our nature; and for the vice which we have inflicted upon ourselves, let us seek the Savior. And how do we seek the Savior? That He might give the law? It is not enough: For if a law had been given that could impart life, righteousness would certainly be by the law. If, therefore, no law has been given that can impart life, why was it given? It follows and shows why it was given; because even thus it was given as an aid, lest you consider yourself healthy. If therefore a law had been given that could impart life, righteousness would certainly be by the law. And as if we asked: Why then was it given? But Scripture has concluded all under sin, that the promise by faith in Jesus Christ might be given to those who believe. When you hear a promiser, expect a doer. Human nature was capable through free will of wounding itself: but already wounded and afflicted, it is not capable through free will of healing itself. For if you would wish to live intemperately to become sick, you do not require a physician for that; your own lapse suffices you. But when, acting intemperately, you begin to be sick, you cannot free yourself from sickness in the same way you could plunge yourself into sickness through intemperance. Yet the physician also prescribes temperance for the healthy. A good physician does this, he does not wish to be necessary for the sick. So the Lord God deigned to prescribe temperance to man created without vice; if he had kept it, he would not afterwards crave the physician for his illness. But because he did not keep it, he became weak, he fell; the infirm created the infirm, that is: the infirm begot the infirm. Yet God works what is good in all those born infirm, by forming the body, enlivening the body, providing sustenance, giving His rain and His sun upon the good and the bad; there is no cause for the good or the bad to accuse Him. Moreover, He did not wish to leave the human race condemned by His just judgment to everlasting destruction: but He also sent a physician, He sent a Savior; He sent one who would heal freely; it is little that He should heal freely, who would also reward those healed. Nothing can be added to this benevolence. Who is he that says: I will heal you, and give you a reward? He has done excellently. For He knew that He came as a rich man to the poor: and He heals the sick, and to the healed He gives, and He gives nothing less than Himself. The Savior is the aid of the sick, and the Savior Himself is the reward of the healed.

Read so as to use the law legitimately. The law is a tutor.

Therefore, brothers, what you were reminded of today, we are debtors not to the flesh, to live according to the flesh. For this we have been helped, for this we have received the Spirit of God, for this also in our labors we daily ask for assistance. The law which threatens for not fulfilling what it commands makes him be under it; these are under the law, not under grace. The law is good if anyone uses it lawfully. What is then: To use the law lawfully? To recognize one's disease through the law, and to seek divine assistance for healing. Because, as I said, and it must often be said: If the law could give life, righteousness would certainly be by the law, nor would a savior be sought, nor would Christ come, nor would he seek the lost sheep with his blood. For thus the same Apostle says in another place: For if righteousness is through the law, then Christ died in vain. What then is the use of the law, and what assistance? Because Scripture has concluded all under sin, that the promise by faith in Jesus Christ might be given to those who believe. Therefore, the law, he says, was our tutor in Christ Jesus. From this analogy, pay attention to the matter I am discussing. The tutor does not lead the child to himself, but to the teacher; but when the well-instructed child has grown, he will no longer be under the tutor. The usefulness of the law.

Discussing these matters, the Apostle speaks elsewhere too: for he recommends this very persistently; but I wish it were not to the deaf. He persistently recommends this, commending faith to the Gentiles; because by faith they obtain help, so that they may fulfill the law, not through the law, but obtaining the strength to fulfill it through faith; for this reason the Apostle says and recommends these things persistently, on account of the Jews, who gloried in the law and thought that their free will sufficed for the law; and because of this, thinking that their free will sufficed for the law, ignorant of God's righteousness, that is, the righteousness given by God through faith, and wishing to establish their own, as if fulfilled by their own strength, not obtained by the cry of faith, they were not subject to the righteousness of God, as he says. For Christ is the end of the law, he says, for righteousness to everyone who believes. Therefore, when discussing this, he opposed himself: What then is the law? As if: What is the utility of the law? He answered: It was added because of transgressions. This is what he says elsewhere: The law entered so that the offense might abound. And what did he add there? But where sin increased, grace abounded all the more. Because in lighter illness the help of medicine was despised: the disease grew, and the physician was sought. What then is the law? It was added because of transgressions; hence the neck of the proud, attributing much to themselves, and arrogating much to their own will, as if they thought free will could suffice for righteousness: when it was in perfect liberty, that is, in paradise, it showed its strength, it showed how much it could do, but for falling, not for rising. Therefore, the law was added because of transgressions, until the seed to whom the promise was made should come, arranged through angels in the hand of a mediator. The necessity of a mediator. What praiseworthy faith might be.

However, a mediator is not of one; but God is one. What does it mean: A mediator is not of one? Because indeed a mediator is between two. If God is one, and a mediator is not of one, we seek a mediator between what and God? Because a mediator is not of one, but God is one. Between what and what he is a mediator, we find the Apostle himself saying: For there is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus. If you were not lying down, you would not need a mediator: but because you are lying down, and cannot rise, in some way God stretched out His arm to you as a mediator. And to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed? Therefore, let no one say: Because we are not under the law, but under grace; therefore let us sin, therefore let us do what we will. He who says this loves sickness, not health. Grace is a medicine. He who wishes to always be sick is ungrateful for the medicine. Therefore, brothers, having received help, with divine assistance extended to us from above, by the arm of the Lord, and the very arm of the Lord extending help to us by the Holy Spirit, we are debtors not to the flesh, to live according to the flesh. Because faith cannot work well, except through love. For indeed it is the faith of the faithful, lest it be the faith of demons; because even demons believe and tremble. Therefore, that praiseworthy faith is the true faith of grace, which works through love. But in order that we may have love, and from it we may be able to have good works, can we give it to ourselves, seeing that it is written: The love of God is poured out in our hearts by the Holy Spirit who is given to us? Love is so much a gift of God, that it is called God, with the Apostle John saying: God is love, and he who abides in love abides in God, and God in him. To live according to the flesh is evil. Let the soul live according to God, the flesh according to the soul.

Therefore, brothers, we are debtors, not to the flesh, to live according to the flesh. For if you live according to the flesh, you will die. Not because the flesh is evil: for it is also a creature of God, and created by Him who also created the soul; neither that, nor that part of God, but both that and that creature of God. Therefore, the flesh is not evil: but to live according to the flesh is evil. God is supremely good, because He supremely is who said: I am who am. Therefore, God is supremely good: the soul is a great good, but not the highest good. But when you hear, God is supremely good, do not think it said only of God the Father, but of the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit. For this Trinity is one, and one God, and supremely good. Thus clearly there is one God, so that when you are asked about the very Trinity, you answer thus: lest perhaps when you hear, There is one God, you think it is the Father Himself, the Son Himself, the Holy Spirit Himself. It is not so: but He who is the Father in that Trinity, is not the Son; He who is the Son in that Trinity, is not the Father; He who is the Holy Spirit in that Trinity, is neither the Son nor the Father; but the Spirit of the Father, and the same Spirit of the Son. For He is the one Holy Spirit of the Father and the Son, co-eternal with the Father and the Son, consubstantial, equal. This whole Trinity, one God supremely good. The soul, however, as I said, created by the highest good, yet not the highest good, but a great good. Likewise, the flesh is neither the highest good, nor a great good; but still a small good. Therefore, the soul is a great good, but not the highest good; living between the highest good and the small good, that is, between God and the flesh, inferior to God, superior to the flesh; why does it not live according to the highest good, but lives according to the small good? This is said more plainly: Why does it not live according to God, but lives according to the flesh? For it is a debtor not to the flesh, to live according to the flesh. The flesh ought to live according to it, not it according to the flesh. Let it live according to it, which lives from it. Certainly, let each live according to that from which it lives. From what does your flesh live? From your soul. From what does your soul live? From your God. Let each of these live according to its life. For the flesh is not its own life; but the soul is the life of the flesh. The soul is not its own life: but God is the life of the soul. Therefore, the soul ought to live according to God; for it is not a debtor to the flesh, to live according to the flesh: therefore, it ought to live according to God; if it lives according to itself, it fails; does it live according to the flesh and advance? Then the flesh correctly lives according to the soul, if the soul lives according to God. For if the soul, I do not say according to the flesh, but according to itself, as I said, wants to live; I will tell you what it is to live according to itself: it is good for you to know this, and very healthy.

Epicureans living according to the flesh, and Stoics according to the soul.

There were philosophers of this age; some believed that there was no happiness unless one lived according to the flesh and placed the good of man in bodily pleasure. These philosophers were called Epicureans, named after a certain Epicurus, their founder and teacher, and others like him. However, there were others, proud as if distancing themselves from the flesh, who placed all their hope of happiness in their soul and placed the highest good in their virtue. The affection of piety recognized the voice of the Psalm in you: you know, you recognize, you have learned how they were mocked in the holy Psalm: "Those who trust in their own strength." Such were the philosophers called Stoics. Those lived according to the flesh, these lived according to the soul, and neither the former nor the latter lived according to God. Therefore, when the Apostle Paul came to the city of the Athenians, where these schools of philosophers flourished with zeal and disputation, as is read in the Acts of the Apostles; where I rejoice that you anticipate our discourse by recognition and reflection, as it is written there: "They conversed with him, certain Epicurean and Stoic philosophers"; they conversed with him, those living according to the flesh, they conversed with him, those living according to the soul, he conversed with them, living according to God. The Epicurean said: "To enjoy the flesh is good for me." The Stoic said: "To enjoy my mind is good for me." The Apostle said: "But for me, to adhere to God is good." The Epicurean said: "Blessed is he whose joy comes from the pleasure of his flesh." The Stoic said: "Rather, blessed is he whose joy comes from the virtue of his soul." The Apostle said: "Blessed is he whose hope is in the name of the Lord." The Epicurean errs: for it is false that a man is blessed whose joy comes from the pleasure of his flesh. The Stoic is also deceived: for it is false, and entirely mendacious, that a man is blessed whose joy comes from the virtue of his soul. Blessed, therefore, is he whose hope is in the name of the Lord. And because they are vain and lie: "And he did not look," he said, "on vanities and false insanities." The soul according to itself living is carnal.

Therefore, brothers, we are debtors not to the flesh, to live according to the flesh, like the Epicureans. But even if the soul wishes to live according to itself, it will be fleshly; it savors of the flesh, it does not rise from the flesh. For it is not possible to rise from there if one does not grasp the outstretched arm of the one lying down. For if you live according to the flesh. Where it is said: What can man do to me? there it is said: What can flesh do to me? For if you live according to the flesh, you will die. Not this death, when one exits the body; for you will die this death even if you live according to the spirit: but that death, about which the Lord says terrifyingly in the Gospel: Fear him who has the power to destroy both soul and body in the Gehenna of fire. Therefore, if you live according to the flesh, you will die. Our work in this life is the mortification of the flesh. But if by the Spirit you put to death the deeds of the flesh, you will live. This is our work in this life, to put to death the deeds of the flesh by the Spirit; to afflict, lessen, restrain, and kill daily. For how many things no longer delight those making progress, which previously delighted them? Therefore, when it delighted and was not agreed to, it was being put to death: because now it does not delight, it has been put to death. Trample on the dead, move on to the living: trample on the one lying, struggle with the one resisting. For one delight has died, but another lives: and you put that one to death by not consenting to it; when it begins to no longer delight at all, you have put it to death. This is our action, this is our battle. In this struggle when we fight, we have God as our spectator; in this struggle when we labor, we ask for God's help. For if He does not help us, I do not say we can win, but we cannot even fight.

Presumption about oneself must be avoided in the mortification of the flesh. When the Apostle therefore said: "But if by the Spirit you put to death the deeds of the flesh, you will live," that is, those desires of the flesh, to not consent to which is great praise, to not have which is perfection: if you by the Spirit put to death these morbid deeds of the flesh, and those holding contention of death, you will live. Here it is now to be feared, lest anyone should again presume to put to death the deeds of the flesh by his own spirit. For not only is God a spirit: but also your soul is a spirit, and your mind is a spirit. And when you say: "With the mind I serve the law of God, but with the flesh the law of sin;" because the spirit desires against the flesh, and the flesh against the spirit. Therefore, lest you presume to put to death the deeds of the flesh by your own spirit, and perish through pride, and resistance be made to you being proud, not grace granted to you being humble; for God resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble.

Lest perchance that pride should arise in you, see what follows. For when he had said: If by the Spirit you mortify the deeds of the flesh, you will live; lest human spirit should be uplifted here, and boast itself adequate and firm for this work, he added and said: For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God. Why then would you now wish to exalt yourself, when you heard: If by the Spirit you mortify the deeds of the flesh, you will live? For you would have said: My will can do this, my free will can do this. What will? What free will? Unless He guides, you fall; unless He raises, you lie prostrate. How then by your own spirit, when you hear the Apostle saying: For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God? Do you wish to lead yourself, and to be led by yourself to mortify the deeds of the flesh? What does it profit you that you will not be an Epicurean, and will be a Stoic? Whether you be an Epicurean, or be a Stoic, among the sons of God you will not be. For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God. Not those who live according to their own flesh, not those who live according to their own spirit; not those who are led by the pleasure of the flesh, not those led by their own spirit; but: For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God. To good, we are driven and we act.

Someone says to me: Therefore we are acted upon, we do not act. I reply: On the contrary, you both act and are acted upon; and you act well when you are acted upon by the good. For the Spirit of God that acts upon you is your helper when you act. The very name of helper proclaims to you, because you yourself also do something. Recognize what you ask for; recognize what you confess, when you say: Be my helper, do not forsake me. You indeed invoke God as helper. No one is helped, if by Him nothing is done. For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, these are sons of God: not by the letter, but by the Spirit; not by the law commanding, threatening, promising, but by the Spirit exhorting, enlightening, helping. The same Apostle says, We know that all things work together for good to those who love God. If you were not a worker, He would not be a co-worker.

Nothing good without the help of God. What is freedom without grace? But here be diligently vigilant, lest perhaps your spirit says: If the cooperation and help of God withdraws, my spirit can do this; even if with toil, even if with some difficulty, it can still accomplish it. Just as if someone says: We indeed arrived with oars, but with some labor; oh, if we had wind, we would arrive more easily. The help of God is not so, the help of Christ is not so, the help of the Holy Spirit is not so. Without a doubt, if it is lacking, you will not be able to do any good. Indeed, you act with free will not being helped by Him, but badly. To this your will is adequate, which is called free, and by acting badly becomes the servile condemned. When I say to you: Without the help of God you do nothing, I mean nothing good. For to do evil you have free will without the help of God: although it is not truly free. For by whom anyone is overcome, to him he is a slave; and: Everyone who commits sin is a slave of sin; and: If the Son sets you free, then you will be truly free.

Grace is necessary not only so that you may do it more easily, but that you may do it at all.

Absolutely believe this, thus you act with good will. Because you live, surely you act. For he is not a helper if you do nothing: he is not a co-operator if you do not work. Thus, nevertheless, know that you do good, so that the Spirit is the guiding helper; if he is absent, you can do no good at all. Not like some have begun to say, who have sometimes been forced to confess grace; and we bless God, because they have said this at some times; for by approaching they will be able to advance, and reach that which is truly correct. Now therefore they say that the grace of God helps, for doing things more easily. For these are their words: "To this end," they say, "God gave his grace to men, so that what they are commanded to do by free will, they can more easily fulfill through grace." By sail more easily, by oar more difficultly: yet even by oar it is traveled. On a mount more easily, on foot more difficultly: but even on foot it is reached. It is not thus. For the true Master who does not flatter anyone, does not deceive anyone, the truthful teacher, and also the Savior, to whom the most troublesome pedagogue has led us; when speaking of good works, that is, of the fruits of the branches and shoots, does not say: Without me indeed you can do something, but more easily through me; does not say: Your fruit you can produce without me, but richer through me. He did not say this. Read what he said: The Gospel is holy, all proud necks are bowed. Augustine does not say this, the Lord says this. What does the Lord say? Without me you can do nothing. Now when you hear this: For all who are led by the Spirit of God are sons of God, do not let yourselves be downcast. For God does not build his temple from you as from stones which have no movement of their own: they are lifted and placed by the builder. Living stones are not like this: And you, as living stones, are being built into a temple of God. You are led, but also run; you are led, but also follow; because when you have followed, it will be true that without him you can do nothing. For it is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God's mercy. The old law and the new law. The spirit of servitude and of freedom.

Perhaps you were about to say: And the law is sufficient for us. The law gave fear: and see what the Apostle added here, when he said: For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God; because when they are led by the Spirit of God, they are led by love: For the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Spirit which is given unto us; then he added: For you have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear. What is: again? As with a most troublesome schoolmaster terrifying. What is: again? Just as on Mount Sinai you received the spirit of bondage. Someone might say: One is the spirit of bondage, another the spirit of liberty. If it were another, the Apostle would not say: again. It is therefore the same spirit, but on tablets of stone in fear, on tablets of the heart in love. Now, three days ago, you who were present heard how the people, far off, were terrified by voices, fire, smoke on the mountain; but how the Holy Spirit, the same finger of God, coming on the fiftieth day after the shadow of Passover, came, and sat upon each of them with tongues of fire. Therefore now not in fear, but in love; that we may not be slaves, but sons. For he who still does good because he fears punishment does not love God, he is not yet among the sons; nonetheless, one should at least fear punishment. Fear is a servant, love is free; and so to speak, fear is the servant of love. Let not the devil possess your heart, let the servant precede in your heart, and keep the place for the coming mistress. Act, act at least out of fear of punishment, if you cannot yet out of love for righteousness. The mistress will come, and the servant will depart; because: Perfect love casts out fear. For you have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear. It is the New Testament, not the Old. The old things have passed away, and behold, all things have become new; all of them from God.

Father and Father, because two peoples in Christ.

Finally, what follows? What then have we received, as if you would say: But you have received the Spirit of adoption of sons, in whom we cry out: Abba, Father. The Lord is feared, the father is loved. You have received the Spirit of adoption of sons, in whom we cry out: Abba, Father. This cry is of the heart, not of the throat, not of the lips; it sounds within, it sounds to the ears of God. With mouth closed, and lips unmoved, Susanna cried out with this voice. But you have received the Spirit of adoption of sons, in whom we cry out: Abba, Father. Let the heart cry out: Our Father who art in heaven. Then why not only Father? What does: Abba, Father, mean? For if you ask what abba is, it is answered to you: Father. For abba means father in Hebrew. Why did the Apostle wish to place both? Because he saw the cornerstone, which the builders rejected, and has become the head of the corner, not without reason called angular, except because it receives into its embrace both walls coming from different directions. On this side circumcision, on the other the foreskin, as far from each other and themselves as they are from the corner; however, as close to the corner as they are to each other; in the corner, however, they are joined together. For he is our peace, who made both one. Thus on this side circumcision, on the other the foreskin, the concord of the walls, the glory of the corner. You have received the Spirit of adoption of sons, in whom we cry out: Abba, Father. The Spirit is rather an earnest than a pledge.

What kind of thing is it, if the pledge is such? It should not be called a pledge, but an earnest. For a pledge is taken away when the thing itself is returned. However, the earnest is given from the thing itself which is promised to be given; so that when the thing is returned, what was given is fulfilled, not changed. Therefore, let each one look at his heart, whether he says from the innermost marrow of his heart and with sincere love: Father. It is not now asked how great this love is, whether it is great or small or moderate; I ask whether it even exists. If it is born, it grows by hiding, it will be perfected by growing, and when perfected, it will remain. For that which is perfect does not incline toward old age, nor will it come from old age to death; it will be perfected so that it remains eternal. For see what follows. We cry out: Abba, Father. The Spirit itself bears witness with our spirit that we are children of God. It is not our spirit that bears witness to our spirit that we are children of God; but the Spirit of God, the earnest, bears witness for that thing which has been promised to us. The Spirit itself bears witness with our spirit that we are children of God. The inheritance of the children of God.

If however children, also heirs. For we are not children in vain. This is the reward: And heirs. This is what I was saying a little earlier, because our physician both grants us health and further deigns to bestow a reward. What is that reward? An inheritance. But not like the inheritance of a human father. For he leaves it to his children, not possessing it along with his children; and yet he makes himself great, and desires to be thanked, because he wished to give what he could not take away. For would he take it with him when dying? I think because if he could, he would have left nothing here for his children. Heirs of God in such a way that God Himself is our inheritance, to whom the Psalm says: The Lord is the portion of my inheritance. Indeed heirs of God; if that is too little for you, listen, so that you may rejoice even more: Indeed heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ. Turned to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 157

SERMO 157 ON THE WORDS OF THE APOSTLE (ROM 8, 24. 25):

"By hope we were saved;

Hope, however, that is seen, is not hope. The hope of Christians is in eternal things. The world is believed to be deceitful, not God. As your Holiness recalls the Apostle said, dearly beloved brothers: We were saved by hope. But hope, he says, that is seen is not hope; for what a man sees, what does he hope for? But if we hope for what we do not see, through patience we wait for it. Hence the Lord God Himself, to whom it is said in the Psalm: You are my hope, my portion in the land of the living, admonishes us to offer you an exhortatory and consolatory word. He Himself, I say, who is our hope in the land of the living, commands that we speak to you in this land of the dying; so that you do not look at the things that are seen, but at the things that are not seen. For the things that are seen are temporary; but the things that are not seen are eternal. Therefore, since we hope for what we do not see and wait for it through patience, it is rightly said to us in the Psalm: Wait for the Lord, act manfully, and let your heart be strengthened, and wait for the Lord. For the promises of the world always deceive; but the promises of God never deceive. But because the world promises what it seems to give here, that is, in this land of the dying, where we are now; but God promises to give us in the land of the living; many grow weary of waiting for the truthful One, and are not ashamed to love the deceitful one. Scripture says of such people: Woe to those who have lost patience and turn aside to crooked ways. Even when children of eternal death cease not to insult those who act manfully and wait for God with a strengthened heart, boasting of their temporary pleasures, which for a while sweeten their throats, but afterward they find them more bitter than gall. For they say to us: Where is what has been promised to you after this life? Who has returned from there and has shown that what you believe is true? Behold, we delight in the fullness of our pleasures, because we hope for what we see; but you are tormented in the struggles of continence, believing what you do not see. Then they add what the Apostle mentioned: Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we shall die. But see what he himself warned to be avoided: Bad company corrupts good morals. Be sober justly, and do not sin.

Patience and gentleness are necessary.

Therefore, beware, brothers, lest your morals be corrupted by such conversations, your hope overturned, your patience weakened, and you diverge into wicked ways. Rather, the meek and gentle should keep to the right paths that the Lord teaches you; about which the Psalm says: "He will guide the meek in judgment, and will teach the gentle His ways." Indeed, patience in the labors of this life, without which the hope of future life cannot be preserved, cannot be held perpetually by anyone unless he is meek and gentle; one who does not resist the will of God, whose yoke is easy and whose burden is light, but believes in God, hopes in Him, and loves Him. Thus, the meek and gentle will not only love His consolations, but also endure His chastisements as good children; so that, because you hope for what you do not see, you may wait for it with patience. Act this way, walk this way. For you walk in Christ, who said: "I am the way." Learn how to walk in Him, not only by His word but also by His example. For the Father did not spare His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all; not unwillingly, nor resisting, but equally willing; because the will of the Father and the Son is one according to the equality of the form of God, in which, being, He thought it not robbery to be equal with God; and singularly obedient, in that He emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant. For He loved us, and gave Himself up for us as an offering and sacrifice to God for a sweet-smelling savor. Thus, the Father did not spare His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, that the Son Himself might also give Himself up for us.

We see in our head what we hope for.

Therefore, He who is Most High, through whom all things were made, was delivered up because of the form of a servant into the reproach of men and the rejection of the people, into insult, into scourges, into the death of the cross. He taught us by the example of His passion, with how much patience we should walk in Him; and He strengthened us by the example of His resurrection, what we ought to hope for patiently from Him. For if we hope for what we do not see, we wait for it with patience. What we do not see indeed, we hope for; but we are the body of that head, in which is already perfected what we hope for. For it has been said of Him that He Himself is the head of the body, the Church, the firstborn, holding the preeminence. And of us it is written: But you are the body of Christ and members. If therefore we hope for what we do not see, we wait for it with patience, secure; because He who has risen is our head, He preserves our hope. And because before He rose, our head was scourged, He strengthened our patience. For it is written: For whom the Lord loves, He disciplines; He scourges every son whom He receives. Therefore, let us not fail in the scourging, so that we may rejoice in the resurrection. For it is indeed true that He scourges every son whom He receives, that He did not even spare His Only Begotten, but delivered Him up for us all. Therefore, considering Him, who was scourged without deserving it, who died for our sins, and rose for our justification, let us not fear that we may be cast away after being scourged; but rather let us be confident that we will be received as justified. Nor are we without joy. Fleeting are the delights of sinners.

Although the fullness of our joy has not yet come, nevertheless we are not left without joy; for we are saved by hope. Therefore the Apostle himself, who says, "If we hope for what we do not see, we wait for it with patience," also says elsewhere, "Rejoicing in hope, patient in tribulation." Therefore, having such a hope, let us use much confidence; and let our speech be seasoned with grace, so that we may know how to answer each one. For it must be said to those who, having lost or never received endurance, dare to insult us who endure the Lord (because we hope for what we do not see, and wait for it with patience), when they should imitate us: "Where are your delights, for which you walk by crooked paths?" We do not say, "Where will they be, when this life passes?" but rather, "Where are they now?" When today has taken away yesterday, and tomorrow will take away today, what of the things you love does not run and fly away? What does not speed away almost before it is grasped, since from this very today not even an hour can be retained? For the second hour is excluded by the third, just as the first was excluded by the second. Nothing of the present hour, which seems to be present, is truly present; for all its parts and all its moments are fleeting. The emptiness of temporal things.

Why does man sin if he is not blinded when he sins, or if he pays attention when he sins? He could see that pleasure, when passing, is desired without prudence; or when it has passed, it is considered with repentance. You mock us because we hope for eternal things, which we do not see; while you, subject to the temporal things which are seen, do not know what kind of day will dawn for you tomorrow; which, often hoping for a good one, you find evil; nor, if it has been good, will you be able to hold onto it so that it does not flee. You mock us because we hope for eternal things; which, when they come, will not pass away; for they do not come, but always remain; but we will come to them, when through the Lord's way we will have passed through these things which pass. But from you temporal things are never ceased to be hoped for, and yet often those things you hope for deceive you; nor do they cease to inflame you when they are coming, to corrupt you when they arrive, to torment you when they pass. Are they not the very things which, when desired, inflame, when obtained, become worthless, when lost, vanish? We also make use of them according to the necessity of our pilgrimage; but we do not fix our joys in them, lest we collapse with them as they slip away. For we use this world as not using it, so that we may come to Him who made this world, and remain in Him, enjoying His eternity. The certainty of our hope. But what is it that you say: Who has come from there, and who has informed humans of what is done in the underworld? And here He has shut your mouths, who raised the dead on the fourth day and, never to die again, resurrected on the third day, and who, before dying, revealed what kind of life awaits the dying as one to whom nothing was hidden, narrated about the resting poor man and the burning rich man. Yet those do not believe these things, who say: Who has returned from there? They want to be seen as believing, if any of their parents would come back to life. But cursed be everyone who places their hope in man. Therefore, God became man, willed to die and rise again; so that what was to come for man would be shown in the flesh of man, and yet believed in as God, not as man. And indeed, the Church of the faithful spread throughout the whole world is now before their eyes. Let them read that it was promised to one man many ages ago, who against hope believed in hope, that he would become the father of many nations. Hence, what was promised to the believing Abraham alone, we now see fulfilled; and shall we despair of what is promised to the believing whole world, that it will come? Let them now go and say: Let us eat and drink; for tomorrow we shall die. They still say that they will die tomorrow, but truth finds them already dead even when they say these things. But you, brothers, sons of the resurrection, citizens of the holy angels, heirs of God, and coheirs with Christ, beware of imitating those who, expiring tomorrow, die and are buried today by drinking. But, as the Apostle says, do not let bad company corrupt your good morals, be sober righteously, and do not sin; walk the narrow but certain path leading to the broadness of the heavenly Jerusalem, which is our eternal mother; firmly hope for what you do not see, patiently wait for what you do not yet have; for you most faithfully hold onto Christ the truthful promiser.

Sermons - Sermon 158

SERMO 158 ON THE WORDS OF THE APOSTLE (ROM 8:30-31):

"Those whom He predestined, He also called;" And those whom He called, He also justified, etc.

"If God is for us, who is against us?"

AGAINST THE PELAGIANS No one is able to harm the predestined.

We have heard the blessed apostle exhorting and strengthening us, when he said to us: If God is for us, who can be against us? And for whom God is, he showed earlier, where he says: Those whom he predestined, he also called; and those whom he called, he also justified; and those whom he justified, he also glorified. What then shall we say to these things? If God is for us, who can be against us? God is for us to predestine us; God is for us to call us; God is for us to justify us; God is for us to glorify us. If God is for us, who can be against us? He predestined, before we were; he called, when we were turned away; he justified, when we were sinners; he glorified, when we were mortals. If God is for us, who can be against us? To those predestined by God, called, justified, glorified, whoever wants to oppose, let him prepare himself, if he can fight against God. For where have we heard: If God is for us, who can be against us? unless he who conquers God, does not harm us. And who is it that conquers the Almighty? Whoever wishes to resist, harms himself. This is what Christ also called out from heaven to Saul, still Paul: It is hard for you to kick against the goad. Let him rage, rage as much as he can; he who kicks against the goad, does he not rage against himself?

God has become a debtor to us because of the promises. In these four notable matters commended by the Apostle, which pertain to those for whom God is—namely, predestination, calling, justification, glorification; in these four matters, therefore, we must consider what we already possess and what we still await. In these things that we already have, let us praise God the giver; in these things that we do not yet have, let us hold Him as a debtor. For He has been made a debtor, not by receiving anything from us, but by promising what pleased Him. In one sense, we say to a man: You owe me because I gave you; and in another sense, we say: You owe me because you promised me. When you say: You owe me because I gave you, the benefit came from you, but it was lent, not given. But when you say: You owe me because you promised me, you gave nothing, yet you still demand. The goodness of him who promised will give, lest faith turn into wickedness. For he who deceives is wicked, but shall we say to God: Give back to me because I gave to you? What have we given to God when everything we are and all the good we have, we have from Him? Therefore, we have given Him nothing. There is no way we can demand God as a debtor with this voice, especially since the Apostle says to us: For who has known the mind of the Lord? Or who has been His counselor? Or who has given a gift to Him that He might be repaid? Therefore, we can demand from our Lord in this manner, saying: Give what you promised, because we have done what you commanded; and this you have done, because you have helped those who labor.

We have been called and predestined by grace.

Therefore, let no one say: God called me because I worshiped God. How could you have worshipped if you had not been called? If God called you because you worshipped Him, then you gave first, and He repaid you. Does not the Apostle take away this thought from you when he says: Or who has first given to Him, that it should be repaid to him? But behold, when you were called, you already existed. How would you have been predestined if you did not exist? What did you give to God when you did not yet exist to give anything? What then did God do when He predestined you who did not exist? As the Apostle says: Who calls things that are not as though they were. If you already existed, you would not be predestined; if you were not turned away, you would not be called; if you were not impious, you would not be justified; if you were not earthly and abject, you would not be glorified. Who then has first given to Him that it should be repaid to him? For from Him and through Him and to Him are all things. What then do we repay? To Him be the glory. Because we did not exist when we were predestined; because we were turned away when we were called; because we were sinners when we were justified; let us give thanks to God and not remain ungrateful.

Whether we are now justified. The struggle remaining here in the justified. But we had proposed to consider from these four things what we have already achieved, what we still expect to obtain. For we were predestined even before we existed. We were called when we became Christians. Therefore, we already have this as well. Justified, what? What is it: justified? Dare we say that we already have this third thing? And will any of us dare to say: I am righteous? For I think that this is: I am righteous, which is: I am not a sinner. If you dare to say this, John confronts you: If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. What then? Do we have nothing of righteousness? Or do we have something, but not all of it? Let us therefore seek this. For if we have something, and we do not have something; let what we have grow, and what we do not have will be fulfilled. See, men are baptized, all their sins are forgiven them, they are justified from their sins; we cannot deny this: yet there remains a struggle with the flesh, there remains a struggle with the world, there remains a struggle with the devil. But he who struggles, sometimes strikes, sometimes is struck; sometimes wins, sometimes is killed; it is considered how he leaves the stadium. For if we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. Likewise, if we say that we have nothing of righteousness, we lie against the gifts of God. For if we have nothing of righteousness, we do not have faith either; if we do not have faith, we are not Christians. But if we have faith, we already have something of righteousness. Do you want to know how much that something is? The righteous lives by faith; the righteous, I say, lives by faith; because he believes what he does not see.

Justification truly through faith.

Fathers, holy rams, leaders of the Apostles, when they announced, not only did they see with their eyes, but they also handled with their hands; and yet the Lord preserving for us the gift of faith, to one of his disciples handling, touching, seeking and finding the truth with his fingers, exclaiming: My Lord and my God; the Lord himself and God said: Because you have seen, you have believed. And looking towards us in the future: Blessed, he said, are those who have not seen and believed. We have not seen, we have heard, and we have believed. We have been called blessed, and do we have nothing of righteousness? The Lord came in the flesh to the Jews, and was killed; he did not come to us, and he was accepted. A people whom I did not know served me, upon hearing with their ear they obeyed me. We are they, and do we have nothing of righteousness? We certainly do have. Let us be grateful for what we have: so that what we do not have may be added, and what we have may not be lost. Therefore, even this third thing is now performed in us. We have been justified: but that righteousness itself, as we progress, grows. And how it grows, I will say, and in a way discuss with you; so that each of you now established in that justification, having received the remission of sins through the washing of regeneration, having received the Holy Spirit, progressing day by day, may see where you are, approach, progress, and grow, until you are consummated, not to end, but to be perfected.

Faith that justifies is distinguished from the faith of demons by hope and charity.

Man begins with faith; what pertains to faith? To believe. But let this faith still be distinguished from unclean spirits. To faith, what pertains? To believe. But the apostle James says: Even the demons believe, and shudder. If you only believe and live without hope, or do not have love: Even the demons believe, and shudder. What great thing is it, if you say Christ is the Son of God? Peter said this, and heard: Blessed are you, Simon Bar-Jonah; the demons said this, and heard: Be silent. Peter is blessed and hears: Flesh and blood did not reveal this to you, but my Father who is in heaven. The demons, however, hear: Be silent; they say the same words, but are repelled. The voice is the same: but the Lord questions the root, not the flower. Hence it is said to the Hebrews: Let no root of bitterness springing up cause trouble, and by this many become defiled. Therefore, first distinguish your faith from the faith of demons. How do you distinguish it? The demons said it fearing, Peter said it loving. Add, therefore, hope to your faith. And what is hope, if not from some goodness of conscience? And to this hope, add love. We have the most excellent way, as the Apostle says: I show you a more excellent way: If I speak in the tongues of men and of angels, but have not love, I am a noisy gong or a clanging cymbal; and he enumerates other good things, confirming that without love they profit nothing. Therefore, these three remain, faith, hope, love: but the greatest of these is love. Pursue love. Therefore, distinguish your faith. You are already among the predestined, called, justified. The Apostle Paul says: Neither circumcision counts for anything, nor uncircumcision, but faith. Say more, Apostle, add, distinguish; because: Even the demons believe and shudder; therefore add and distinguish, for the demons believe and shudder regarding what they hate. Apostles distinguish, circumcise my faith, and discern my cause from an unholy people. Clearly, he distinguishes, discerns, and circumcises. And faith, he says, which works through love.

Free worship of God. Who alone satisfies the soul.

Therefore, each one, my brothers, should inspect himself inwardly, weigh himself, test himself in all his deeds, in his good works, which he does with charity, not expecting temporal retribution, but the promise of God, the face of God. For whatever God promises you is worth nothing besides God himself. God would not satisfy me at all, unless he promised me himself, God. What is the whole earth? What is the whole sea? What is the whole sky? What are all the stars? What is the sun? What is the moon? What is the army of angels? I thirst for the Creator of all these: I hunger for him, I thirst for him, I say to him: For with you is the fountain of life. He who says to me: I am the bread that came down from heaven. My pilgrimage hungers and thirsts, so that I may be satisfied by his presence. The world smiles upon many things, beautiful, strong, varied: he who made them is more beautiful, stronger and brighter is he who made them, he who made them is sweeter. I will be satisfied when your glory is revealed. Therefore, if the faith that works through love is in you, you already belong to the predestined, the called, the justified: therefore let it grow in you. For faith that works through love cannot exist without hope. But when we come, will there still be faith there? Will it be said to us: Believe? Certainly not. We will see him, we will gaze upon him. Beloved, we are children of God, and it has not yet been revealed what we shall be. Because it has not yet been revealed, hence faith. We are children of God, predestined, called, justified; we are children of God, and it has not yet been revealed what we shall be. Therefore, for now, faith, before it is revealed what we shall be. We know that when he is revealed, we shall be like him. Is it because we believe? No. Why then? Because we shall see him as he is.

What is hope? Will it be there? Hope will no longer exist when the reality comes into being. For indeed, this hope is necessary for our journey, it is what comforts us along the way. For when the traveler labors in walking, he tolerates the labor because he hopes to arrive. Take away from him the hope of arrival, and immediately the strength of walking is broken. Therefore, even the hope that is here pertains to the righteousness of our journey. Listen to the Apostle himself: "We ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption." Where there is groaning, that happiness cannot yet be said to exist, about which Scripture says, "Labor and groaning have passed away." Therefore, he says, "we groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, the redemption of our bodies." We still groan. Why? For we are saved by hope. But hope that is seen is not hope. For who hopes for what he sees? But if we hope for what we do not see, we wait for it with patience. In this patience, therefore, the martyrs were crowned; they desired what they did not see, they despised what they endured. In this hope they said: "Who will separate us from the love of Christ? Tribulation? Or distress? Or persecution? Or famine? Or nakedness? Or sword? Because of you." And where is the one for whom this is done? "Because of you," he says, "we are put to death all day long." Because of you. And where is it written, "Blessed are they who have not seen and have believed?" Look, where it is — it is within you, because even faith itself is within you. Does the Apostle deceive us, who says, "Christ dwells in our hearts by faith?" Now by faith, but then by sight: now by faith, as long as we are on the way, as long as we are in exile. For as long as we are in the body, we are away from the Lord; for we walk by faith, not by sight.

God will be all in all to the blessed. Charity alone always remains.

If this is faith, what shall be the vision? Listen to what it shall be: That God may be all in all. What does it mean: all in all? Whatever you were seeking here, whatever you esteemed greatly here, He Himself will be for you. What did you desire here, what did you love? To eat and to drink? He Himself will be food for you, He Himself will be drink for you. What did you desire here? Frail and fleeting bodily health? He Himself will be immortality for you. What did you seek here? Riches? Greedily, what then will suffice for you if God Himself does not suffice? But what did you love? Glory, honors? God will be glory for you: to whom it is also now said: My glory, and the one lifting up my head. Indeed, He has already lifted up my head. Our head is Christ. But why are you amazed? Because the head and the other members will be exalted; then God will be all in all. Thus we believe, thus we hope: when we arrive, we shall hold; and it will be vision, not faith: when we arrive, we shall hold, and it will be reality, not hope. What about love? Indeed, will it exist now and not then? If we love by believing and not seeing; how will we love by seeing and holding? Therefore, love will be, but it will be perfect; as the Apostle says: Faith, hope, love, these three; but the greatest of these is love. Having and nurturing this, confidently persevering in it with His help, let us say: Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? until He Himself has mercy, He Himself perfects. Tribulation? Distress? Hunger? Nakedness? Peril? Sword? For your sake, we are put to death all day long, we are accounted as sheep for slaughter. And who endures? Who tolerates all? But in all these things we conquer. How? Through Him who loved us. Therefore, If God is for us, who can be against us?

Sermons - Sermon 159

SERMO 159 ABOUT THE SAME WORDS OF THE APOSTLE (ROM 8, 30-31), Or, on Justification; Also, on the Words of James (1:2-4):

"Consider it all joy, my brothers,"

"When you have encountered various trials," etc.

Justification here in us is imperfect. Perfect justification is in the martyrs. It is an injustice to pray for a martyr.

Yesterday, a discourse was given about our justification, which is from our Lord God, by us as ministers, with His giving, and you listening. And since in this life we are burdened with the load of corruptible flesh, certainly not without sin — for if we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us — it became clear, as I judge, to your Charity that we are justified according to the manner of our pilgrimage, living by faith until we enjoy the vision. It begins with faith, therefore, to reach the vision: the way is run, the homeland is sought. In pilgrimage, our soul says: For all my desire is before you, and my groaning is not hidden from you. But in the homeland, there will be no place for praying, but only for praising. Why will there be no place for praying? Because nothing is lacking. What is believed here, is seen there; what is hoped for here, is held there; what is asked for here, is received there. However, there is some perfection in this life, which the holy martyrs have reached. Therefore, the ecclesiastical discipline holds, which the faithful know, that when the martyrs are recounted at the altar of God, prayers are not made for them; but for the other deceased commemorated, prayers are made. It is an insult to pray for the martyr, whose prayers we ought to commend ourselves to. For he has fought against sin to the shedding of blood. For some, still imperfect, and yet partly justified, the Apostle says to the Hebrews: For you have not yet resisted to blood, striving against sin. If, therefore, they had not yet resisted to blood, surely some did resist to blood. Who resisted to blood? Certainly, the holy martyrs; of whom the reading from the holy apostle James has just been heard. Consider it all joy, my brothers, when you fall into various temptations. It is said to the perfect, who can also say: Test me, Lord, and try me. Knowing, he says, that tribulation produces patience; and patience has a perfect work. The love of justice admits several degrees. First degree. Pleasures of the senses, lawful and unlawful. For indeed justice must be loved; and in this justice, there are degrees for those progressing. First, one must not prefer everything that delights over the love of justice. This is the first step. What did I say? That among all things that delight, justice itself should delight you more; not that other things do not delight, but that justice itself delights more. For certain things naturally delight our weakness, such as food and drink delight the hungry and thirsty; as this light delights us, which pours from the sky when the sun rises, or which shines from the stars and the moon, or which is lit on earth by lights comforting the darkness of our eyes: a melodious voice and a most pleasant song delight us, a good smell delights us; our touch is also delighted by whatever pertains to some pleasure of the flesh. And all these things, which delight us in the senses of the body, are somewhat permissible. For, as I said, these great spectacles of nature delight the eyes; but the spectacles of theaters also delight the eyes. The former are permissible, the latter impermissible. A sacred Psalm sweetly sung delights the hearing: but the songs of actors also delight the hearing. The former is permissible, the latter impermissible. Flowers and spices, which are God's creation, delight the sense of smell; but the incense on the altars of demons also delights the sense of smell. The former is permissible, the latter impermissible. Permissible food delights the taste; but the feasts of sacrilegious sacrifices also delight the taste. The former is permissible, the latter impermissible. The embrace of spouses delights; the embrace of prostitutes also delights. The former is permissible, the latter impermissible. Therefore, you see, dearest ones, that in these senses of the body there are permissible and impermissible delights. Let justice delight in such a way that it surpasses even permissible delights; and to the delight by which you are permissibly delighted, prefer justice. The delight of the mind from justice and faith.

Let us set before our eyes, on account of what I said, an example of a contest. I ask whether you love justice; you will answer: I do. You would not answer truthfully unless it delighted you to some extent. For nothing is loved unless it delights. Delight yourself in the Lord, Scripture says. Moreover, the Lord is justice. For you should not imagine God as an idol. God is similar to invisible things; and those things are better in us which are invisible. Faith is better than flesh, faith is better than gold, and faith is better than silver, than money, than estates, than family, than riches; and all these things are seen, faith is not seen. To which then shall we consider God more similar, to visible or invisible things? To precious or to vile things? Let me speak of more vile things. You have two slaves, one deformed in body, the other very handsome; but the deformed one is faithful, the other is unfaithful. Tell me which one you love more: and I see that you love the invisible. What therefore, when you love the faithful slave more, although deformed in body, than the handsome one who is unfaithful, have you erred and preferred foul things to beautiful ones? Certainly not: but you preferred more beautiful things to foul ones. For you despised the eyes of the flesh, and lifted up the eyes of the heart. You asked the eyes of the flesh, and what did they report to you? This one is handsome, that one is foul. You rejected them, disapproved of their testimony; you lifted up the eyes of the heart to the faithful slave, and to the unfaithful slave; this one you found foul in flesh, that one handsome; but you pronounced and said: What is more beautiful than faith? What is more deformed than infidelity?

Justice must be loved above all lawful pleasures.

Therefore, above all pleasures, that is, even lawful delights, justice must be loved. For if you have inner senses, all those inner senses are delighted by the delight of justice. If you have inner eyes, see the light of justice: For with you is the fountain of life, and in your light we shall see light. Of that light the Psalm says: Enlighten my eyes, lest I ever sleep in death. Again, if you have inner ears, hear justice. Such ears were sought by him who said: He who has ears to hear, let him hear. If you have inner smell, hear the Apostle: We are the sweet fragrance of Christ to God in every place. If you have inner taste, hear: Taste and see that the Lord is sweet. If you have inner touch, hear what the bride sings of the bridegroom: His left hand is under my head, and his right hand embraces me. The delight in justice must be preferred to other delights. As I began to say, let us propose an example of this struggle. Let us see, my brothers, who it may be; I ask, and let him respond, and what I am about to say, whether righteousness delights so much that he prefers it to other pleasures pertaining to these senses of the body. Behold, your gold delights you, your eyes delight in it: it is a beautiful metal, very shiny, it delights. It is beautiful, I do not deny it; for if I were to deny its beauty, I would do an injury to the Creator. Therefore the tempter comes and says to you: I take your gold unless you give false testimony for me; if however you say it, I will add to you. Two delights contend within you: now I ask you what you prefer, what delights you more, gold or truth; gold or true testimony. Does this shine and that not shine? Faith is sought in true testimony. Does gold shine, faith not shine? Be ashamed, have eyes; what you loved in your servant, return to your Lord. For just now when I asked about your two servants, one deformed and faithful, the other beautiful and faithless, whom you would love more; you answered justly, and preferred what should be preferred. Return to yourself, because now it concerns you yourself. Surely you loved the faithful servant. Is your Lord unworthy to have you as a faithful servant? And what did you promise your faithful servant as a great reward? That you would love greatly, the highest reward being freedom. What great thing did you promise your faithful servant? Temporal freedom. Do we not see many servants who are not in need, and free men begging? And you demanded faith from him to whom you promised freedom: and do you not keep faith to him who promises you eternity!

It is lengthy to go through each of the body's senses individually: but understand from what I have said about the eyes, it applies to the other senses as well; and prioritize the delight of the mind over the delight of the flesh. Indeed, illicit pleasures delight your flesh; let your mind delight in invisible, beautiful, chaste, holy, melodious, sweet justice, so that you are not compelled to it by fear. For if you are compelled to it by fear, it does not yet delight. You ought not to sin, not from fear of punishment, but from love of justice. Hence the Apostle says: I speak in human terms because of the weakness of your flesh. For just as you presented your members to serve uncleanness and iniquity leading to more iniquity, so now present your members to serve righteousness for sanctification. What did I say? I speak in human terms: what you are able to bear, I say. When you presented your members to iniquity to commit shameful acts, were you led by fear or invited by pleasure? What do you say? Answer us, for even those who live well now, perhaps once lived badly. When you sinned, you delighted in your sins; did fear lead you to sin, or the sweetness of sin? You will answer: The sweetness. Sweetness draws to sin, and fear drives to righteousness? Test yourselves, examine yourselves. Let someone who threatens take gold: justice is sweeter, justice is brighter. Do not give gold to one who promises: justice should be preferred to gold, should be preferred with delight; it is more splendid, brighter, sweeter, and more pleasant. Therefore, if anyone proves himself, and has won in this struggle, he has heard the Apostle saying: I speak in human terms because of the weakness of your flesh. Without a doubt, he spared the weakness; and he tried to say something gentler to the less capable. For the sake of justice, not only should pleasure be scorned, but also pain must be endured.

Behold, he says, I say this which you can grasp; you have presented your members to illicit pleasures, you were led by the sweetness of sins, so that you did those things; let the sweetness and sweetness of justice lead you to right deeds; love justice, as you loved iniquity. Justice is worthy, which may obtain from you to present to it what you presented to iniquity; this is: I speak in human terms, that is, what your weakness can still tolerate. What then does the Apostle withhold? What did he delay to say? What did he delay, I will say, if I can. Compare justice and iniquity; is justice as deserving as iniquity was? Should the former be loved as the latter was loved? Far from it, but even if only so, so be it. Therefore, more? Certainly more. In iniquity, you followed pleasure, for justice endure pain. In unjustness, I say, you followed delight, for justice endure pain; this is more. Behold, some lustful youth ensnared by alluring sweetness casts his eyes upon another's wife, loves her, desires to reach her; yet he seeks to hide: for he loves pleasure in such a way that he even more fears pain. Why does he seek to hide? He fears being caught, bound, brought in, imprisoned, produced, tormented, killed. Fearing all these things, in that pursuit of his sweetness he seeks a hiding place; he waits for the husband’s absence, he fears to find even a helper of his crime, because he dreads involving a conscience. And we see him led by sweetness: but that sweetness is not so great as to overcome even the fear and pain of punishment. Give me beautiful justice, give me the beauty of faith; let it come forth, show itself to the eyes of the heart, inspire fervor in its lovers. Now it is said to you: Do you want to enjoy me? Despise whatever else delights you, despise it for me. Behold, you have despised it, but this is little: It is human, due to the weakness of your flesh. It is little to despise whatever delighted you: despise whatever scared you; despise prisons, despise chains, despise the rack, despise torments, despise death. Defeat these things, you find me. In both stages, lovers of justice, prove yourselves.

Perhaps we find some who prefer justice to pleasures and the delight of their own bodies: but who despises punishments, pains, and death for it, do you think there is anyone among you? At least let us think about it, which we do not dare to profess. What do we think? Where do we think? Thousands of martyrs lie before our eyes, true and perfect lovers of justice themselves. About them it is said: Consider it all joy, my brothers, when you fall into various trials; knowing that the testing of your faith produces patience; but patience has a perfect work. What can be added so that it has a perfect work? It loves, it burns, it is fervent; it tramples on all things that delight, and passes by; it comes to harsh, dreadful, savage, threatening things; it tramples on, breaks, and passes by. O to love, O to go, O to perish to oneself, O to reach God! Whoever loves his life will lose it; and whoever loses his life for my sake, will find it for eternal life. Thus must the lover of justice be armed, thus must the lover of invisible beauty be armed. What I tell you in the dark, speak in the light; and what you hear in the ear, preach on the housetops. What is: What I tell you in the dark, speak in the light? What I tell you and you hear with the mind, speak boldly. And what you hear in the ear, preach on the housetops. What is: What you hear in the ear? What you hear in secret; because you still fear to profess and confess. What then is: Preach on the housetops? Your houses, your bodies; your houses, your flesh. Ascend to the rooftop, trample on the flesh, and preach the word. From God is, if we have any justice. But first, my brothers, lament what you were, so that you may be able to be what you are not yet. What I am saying is great. And where is this great thing to us? It is the highest, it is perfect, it is the best; where is it to us? Hear where it is to us: Every best gift and every perfect gift is from above, descending from the Father of lights, with whom there is no variation, nor shadow of change. From there comes what we have good, from there comes what we do not yet have. Do you not have it? Ask, and you shall receive. If you, says the Savior, if you who are evil know how to give good gifts to your children; how much more will your heavenly Father give good things to those who ask Him? Therefore let every man examine himself, and whatever good he finds in himself that pertains to our justification, let him give thanks to the one who gave it; and in giving thanks to the one who gave it, let him ask from Him also for what He has not yet given. For you do not progress in receiving, and He does not fail in giving. However capacious a mouth, a capacious stomach you may bring; the fountain surpasses the thirsty.

Sermons - Sermon 159A

SERMON 159/A Sermon of Saint Augustine, Bishop On honoring or despising parents Who will separate us from the love of Christ? The feasts of the holy martyrs are exhortations to martyrdom, so that it may delight us to imitate what we delight in celebrating. For this purpose, the holy Scripture freshly exhorts us in our ears and in a way inflames us, with the apostle saying: Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? As it is written: For your sake we are put to death all day long; we are considered as sheep to be slaughtered. Then follow other matters that seem violent towards separation, in which, however, He gives victory, so that we are not separated from Him who does not separate from us. Because of these imminent distresses and pressures, the faithful promisor and kind giver has deigned to promise us that He would be with us until the end of the age. For I am sure, he says, that neither death nor life, nor angels nor principalities, nor things present nor things to come, nor power, nor height nor depth, nor any other creature—for he could not name everything—will be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. And so that we might become very strong with hope and confidence against all the temptations of this age, lest we be separated from Christ—because our strength is by no means sufficient if we are forsaken by divine help—he said earlier: If God is for us, who can be against us? The Apostle, having briefly mentioned some of the things that seem to attack the Christian faith by raging, so that such things might not separate us from the love of Christ, armed us to endure all for Christ.

They try to separate us from Christ either by things that rage or by things that entice. But because they not only try to separate those things which rage, but also those which entice, just as we are armed with the apostolic words against those things which attempt to separate us from Christ by raging, so we are armed by the Lord Christ Himself against those things which try to seduce us by enticing. For it is to be feared lest perhaps what a cruel sword cannot separate, carnal affection may be able to separate. Thus, against those things which attack our faith by enticing, lest what they attack they conquer, let us listen to the Lord saying: If anyone comes to me and does not hate his father, mother, wife, children, brothers, and even his own soul, he cannot be my disciple. And whoever does not bear his cross and follow me cannot be my disciple. The Lord mentioned both what is enticingly sweet so that it may deceive, and what is threateningly severe. For against the allurements of deception from carnal affection, He said: If anyone comes to me and does not hate his father and mother, wife, children, and so forth, but against those things which, by roaring and threatening, turn us away from faith, He arms us and fortifies us with the single name of the cross. Whoever does not, He says, bear his cross and follow me, that is, whoever does not bear – for that is to bear – all things that are bitter and hard in this world as a cross, and follow me, cannot be my disciple.

I want you to be without anxiety.

Therefore let us place the martyr of Christ in the midst of threats and flattery; both doors are knocked upon, through which one enters the heart: desire and fear. The door of desire is knocked upon by father, mother, wife, children, brothers: all are alluring, pleasant, sweet. But are they sweeter than God? Sweeter than Christ? If you do not believe, taste and see how sweet the Lord is. The door of fear is knocked upon by threats, fury, reproaches, and finally by the very pains of the body, which no one can experience without feeling. For if he despises money, he suffers loss, not pain. All this is in the mind of the despisers: he who takes away what you do not love does not torment you. But you love money: you fear him who threatens loss, and he does not torment you, but you torment yourself, because you have subjected yourself to pains. For the root of all evils is greed, which some pursuing have wandered from the faith and themselves subjected to many pains. He threatens loss: he who does not find you greedy, finds you free; you laughed at the emptiness, because you did not subject yourself. Thus also with other things, which through saving doctrine we learn to despise, we are admonished not to love them, so that we may be found free in temptations. To which freedom that apostolic reading exhorts us, where it is: And those who use this world as though they did not use it, that they may have the use of freedom, not the affection of desire. For the figure of this world passes away. I want you to be without care. When the flesh is pricked, the heart feels pain. But the weakness of the flesh remains, which each of us, as long as he lives in this world, cannot alienate from himself. What do you do? When the flesh is pricked, does the heart not feel pain? It is a wound of weakness, until it takes on the garment of immortality. There is a great struggle. With the will turned away from money, the martyr of God stands secure against those who threaten with losses. "Let him take," he says, "what I do not love, where do I feel it?" Exile is threatened, but it is threatened by someone who alone desires the heavenly fatherland. Here the Christian, wherever he goes, is a pilgrim. Disgrace is threatened. He has something to respond: This is our glory, the testimony of our conscience. Dishonor is threatened. How great is the fleeting honor! Man threatens dishonor, but the Lord of men promises eternal honor. With all these things despised, freedom is safe. But what about the flesh? The soul remains with its garment, and that garment which it does not take off except by death. Now the man, that is the soul, is urged on by the proximity, by the weakness of his flesh. Therefore, the words of that Lord on the cross seem, indeed are understood, in that magnificent psalm, where almost the gospel is recited, where it is said: They have pierced my hands and my feet, they have numbered all my bones. They themselves, indeed, considered me; they divided my garments among them and cast lots for my clothing. These are now the words of the one suffering, now hanging on the cross, and yet it is said there: Do not depart from me, for trouble is near. If you understand "near" as "time approaching," they will not be the words of the one hanging on the cross: the trouble was already present if he was hanging. But why was it said: it is near? It is now in the flesh. Nothing is nearer to the soul than the flesh which it bears. Other things are outside, called external, because they are outside. When the flesh is tormented, the soul close by is struck. With God's help, we endure all evils.

These are grievous things, but in all these things we overwhelmingly conquer through Him who loved us. And why do we conquer even in these? Because if God is for us, who can be against us? Therefore, the Lord has deigned to signify by the name of the cross all things that are terrible, hard, bitter, intolerable, and cruel. For among the very types of death, nothing is more intolerable than the cross. Indeed, there is a great emphasis added by the same apostle, when he commended to us the humility of the Lord; for he says: "He did not regard equality with God as something to be grasped, but emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men, and being found in appearance as a man." How great was the Lord’s humiliation, to become a man! But listen further. Behold, He was humiliated because He became a man. What more? He humbled Himself, it says, becoming obedient to death, not only to human birth, but even to death. Do you have anything to add to this? "I do," it says, "even death on a cross." Looking at this most bitter end of the Lord of all, he called the cross all the things that rightly, and if faith has endured for His name's sake, the Christian flesh suffers. For faith suffers nothing, rather it makes sufferings tolerable. Therefore, instructed from both sides and having both doors of desire and fear fortified, desiring nothing more than what God promises, fearing nothing more than what God threatens, we repel those who flatter and those who threaten. The Old and New Testament were given by one and the same God. But someone arises and makes a question to us and says: "Indeed, whatever bitter, whatever hard, whatever fierce and difficult to endure should be borne for the faith of Christ, it should absolutely be borne, but it troubles me that he [who] placed in his commandments the first commandment to love one's neighbor: Honor your father and mother, which is the first commandment in promise, that it may be well with you; and when the apostle greatly mentioned this, the Lord says to me: If anyone comes to me and does not hate his father and mother. Where should I listen? What of these should I accept? How will I obey the one who commands me to honor my father and mother, while also commanding me to hate my father and mother? Is it not the same one who commands both, or—as some vainly think—is it another who gave the law and another who propagated the Gospel, since in the law it is written: Honor your father and mother, in the Gospel: Whoever does not hate father and mother "? By no means! He is the same one and the lawgiver and the propagator of the Gospel, he is completely. Recognize the Lord: lest he command contrary things, and distribute times to the commandments. For if you think that the commandment that we are ordered to honor father and mother, because it is read first in the Old Testament, is contrary to the evangelical commandment, in the same Old Testament something similar is written to what we have just heard being read in the Gospel. He who says to father and mother: I do not know you, and he who does not recognize his children, he has thought my testament. How similar, how twin-like, how equal it is recognized. Therefore, one Lord commands both, but let us distinguish the times of the commandments."

Relatives ought to be loved in the right order. To the crown of martyrdom he is armed, and comes the flattering father and mother to prevent what God promises, promising vain inheritance and taking away the eternity of light. Here indeed do not acknowledge those holding you back, rather hate such a father with piety, lest such a one remain. Thus a father, thus a mother, thus children, thus brothers, thus a wife, in whom greater is the question, when it comes to this point, hate even her if she tries to hinder. Beware of Eve: then she is not your member, but a minister of the serpent. You who unwisely listened to her first voice and did not profit from the experience, but she is the same wife to hinder the husband, a martyr, from the crown, and with feminine wiles she prescribes to the man as if from the law and from the Gospel itself. "Listen," she says, "to the precept." Which precept? "What God has joined, let not man separate." Certainly listen, lest you disdain. What God has joined, let not man separate." But see that the wife does not separate from God. "But what He has joined, man should not separate." Should human affection separate man from God Himself? And where will be what you just heard: Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Here then fear not: man does not separate what God has joined, but God separates the one trying to separate. Therefore do not listen to the wife saying to you: "I am your member, see you are a member." Answer: "If my member were to rot and in rotting sought to decay the whole body, would it not be excised by a doctor? Do I not hear the Lord Himself and true doctor saying:

Indeed it is better for you that one of your members perish, than for your whole body to go into hell? " Therefore respond, well understanding the law, against her wrongly using the law. For the serpent does nothing great, attempts nothing great to deceive you from the law through Eve, who deceived Adam first without the law. For he saw you now feeding from the law and sets a snare in your food. But say: My eyes are always toward the Lord, for He will pull my feet from the snare. Thus even in this peril where you are tempted about the law, let your eyes be toward the Lord, for He too was tempted by the same serpent about the law.

Christ the Lord offers an example of struggle and victory. For when the Lord deigned to be tempted by the devil as an example for us of struggle and victory, just as he deigned to be crucified by the impious, in the first temptation - for we read there were three - He responded to the devil with the law, saying: If you are the Son of God, command these stones to become bread, He replied from the law: Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word of God. Again, in another temptation: Worship me, prostrate, and I will give you these things, and He from the law: It is written: You shall worship the Lord your God, and Him only shall you serve. But when that cunning serpent saw himself repelled twice by the law, he created a third snare from the law: "Throw yourself down," he said, "from the pinnacle of the temple, if you are the Son of God." And immediately to the instrument of the law, to fight from where he was defeated: "For it is written," he said: "He will command His angels concerning you, to guard you, lest you strike your foot against a stone." Therefore, he said, if you are the Son of God, the angels will bear you up so you will not be harmed; throw yourself and prove to us what you are. Does the Lord, because the devil dared to lay hands on the law, withdraw His hand from the law? And here too He wounded the enemy with the same law, cast him down, and made him retreat confounded. For He said: It is written: You shall not put the Lord your God to the test. And here, therefore, when you see your wife trying to hinder you from martyrdom, recite the law to yourself and say: "What God has joined together, let no man separate," and you recite the law [Gospel]: Whoever comes to me and does not hate his father and mother, wife and children... The order of Christian love: God, wife, parents. Do not be angry, therefore, wife. Whom do you become angry with in this matter, because he hates you, he also hates his father in this matter, he also hates his mother. But it is little for the wife, for it is written: A man shall leave his father and mother and shall cleave to his wife. If the parents, that is the father and mother, have said to the son: “If your wife does not want to stay with us, you stay with us and leave her,” let the wife take this precept and fight, let her prescribe to the husband and say from the law of God: “Nay, leave them and do not leave me. For I recite: A man shall leave his father and mother and shall cleave to his wife.” You have recited, you have understood, you have conquered; certainly no one doubts that the father and mother attempting to separate the son from his wife must be left, so that the wife is not deserted. But understand, woman, if you choose to be faithful and do not disdain to hear the word of faith, understand: from where you have conquered, allow yourself to be overcome from thence. Behold we restrain your father-in-law and mother-in-law, your husband’s father and mother who begot, who nourished, who led him to this age at which he became your husband, we entirely restrain and correct by divine authority and say: “Do not wish to separate the son from the wife because of yourselves, for he is better separated from you than from her. If it can be, be all together. But if this cannot be, it is better that he be with her than with you without her.”

We handled your case. You won in this judgment: endure to be conquered in another, because we also handle your case there. Then we faithfully handled the case of your flesh: should we abandon the case of your eternal salvation? Learn. Your husband's father and mother did not separate you from your husband: you will not separate your husband from your God.

You have destroyed everyone who is unfaithful to you.

There, fornication is more to be feared in that chastity which the soul owes to God; fornication is more to be feared there, as the apostle feared saying: I have espoused you to one husband, to present you as a chaste virgin to Christ. But I fear lest, as the serpent deceived Eve by his cunning, so your minds may be corrupted from the chastity that is in Christ Jesus. You see that chastity is also required there. Why do you not want to separate from your husband? So that you do not have the necessity of fornication? But in the martyrdom of your husband, you should fear nothing. For when he is crowned and translated from human affairs to divine, you will be a widow; if you marry, you will not be a fornicator. But perhaps you are ashamed to marry again as the wife of a martyr. Behold, with your husband crowned, your faith is also in safety. Do not draw your husband away from the embrace of spiritual matrimony. Chastity is also required there, and more there because it is greater there, more there because it is eternal there. You have lost everyone who fornicates away from you. For what else do you do, so that your husband is overcome by your blandishments, than that there is no virtue in him? In whom there will be no virtue, what a bad husband he will be! He is overcome and cast down, effeminate by your blandishments: how will he be your husband, who will no longer be a man? For what else do you do, but that he yields to your blandishments, despises God's commandments, denies Christ, sacrifices to idols? Behold the flesh you seek, the soul fornicates, behold it hears: You have lost everyone who fornicates away from you. But you want him to cling to you and be separated from God: listen to what follows: You have lost everyone who fornicates away from you; but for me, it is good to adhere to God. Listen to your husband armed with faith, hurling against your iniquity the darts of righteousness: I am certain, he says, that neither death nor life, nor angel nor principality, nor height nor depth, nor any other creature will be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus. Perhaps here you say: "But among all these he did not name the wife." Among all these, you say, he did not name the wife. Deceptive one, the apostolic virtue also watched against you by adding: nor any other creature. Or do you dare to say that you are not a creature? If you are a creature, nay because you are a creature, neither will you separate him whom no creature will separate. Of the eternal glory of holy women.

We have spoken thus as if men hasten to martyrdom and are hindered by their wives: let us also console the weaker sex. How many women have been crowned and were not overcome by their husbands' unmanly blandishments! From where did Perpetua become perpetual, unless because she... perpetually? From where was Felicitas capable of such happiness, unless because temporal unhappiness did not frighten her? Therefore, lest even women be seduced in this matter by the blandishments of men, let them observe Perpetua, let them observe Felicitas, and let them hold onto perpetual happiness.

We are commanded to hate our own soul.

Therefore, let not the father and mother be angry in such a cause, nor the wife, nor the children, nor the brothers; and if they become angry, it is added: you should hate your own life as well.

Therefore, in this cause you love your wife badly, who are also ordered to hate your own life. What does it profit a man, he says, if he gain the whole world, but suffer the loss of his own soul? And yet you are ordered to hate it too, lest it deceive you as it wishes to remain here, wishes to always cling to this flesh, unwilling to migrate to better things; hate such a life, so that you do not have such a one. For what else does the danger of persecution whisper inwardly in men whom it tempts, than "Deny, live: afterwards you will repent"? It is the soul: it wants to perish. Hate it wanting to perish. Do not allow it to perish, chastise, reprove, teach, call upon God for help. For it withers away from you and weakens in the dangers of this life, it does not rightly contemplate eternal life with the eyes of faith: lift it up with encouragement and say: Why are you sad, my soul, and why do you trouble me? Perhaps it will answer you: "Because I am weak." Therefore you have what follows: Hope in the Lord, He will be your strength, He will be your firmness. Hope in the Lord, for I will confess to Him, I will not deny Him, for I will confess Him. But you, soul, were murmuring: "Deny Him." I will confess to Him: the salvation of my countenance and my God. Therefore whoever loves his life will lose it here, so that he may find it in eternal life. Therefore do not listen to those whispering contrary things, neither father nor mother, nor wife, nor children, nor even your own soul.

Every stage of human life has received the crown of martyrdom. As long as a wife should be heard with the fear of conjugal separation, so long as she does not advise anything by which God is offended. Thus all ranks will hold their own order: outstanding virginity, subsequent widowhood, thirdly marital union, none without reward. Virgins should think of Mary, widows of Anna, married women of Susanna. All have their rewards, and from all these ranks martyrs were by no means lacking. A husband fears in the moment of martyrdom lest his wife should be Eve to him, and a wife fears in the moment of martyrdom lest her husband should be the serpent to her. But let no one hear anyone advising anything against God. Hitherto, carnal affection should prevail; the weakness of the flesh should not transcend the spiritual wall: let it be below, because it is below. Let the soul, subject to God, lead the flesh; let the soul not be seduced from God by the principality of the flesh: it is perverse. You wish to have authority in your house, much more does God in His. Hold and meditate on these things, imitate these things in all the solemnities of the martyrs, and the God of peace will be with you. Turned to the Lord...

Sermons - Sermon 159B

Sermon 159/B Sermon of the blessed Augustine on the words of the apostle:

O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and the knowledge of God, And from Psalm 59: God, you have rejected us and you have destroyed us, you were angry and have had mercy on us, It is good for me that You have humbled me, that I may learn your justifications The depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God is unsearchable.

Divine readings, which nourish us spiritually, remind us that we must preach to you who are expectant and attentive, and as from the Lord's storehouse, of which we are stewards, to set something before those who are hungry. The Apostolic reading was pronounced to us in these words, which your holiness remembers with us: O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God, how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out. For who has known the mind of the Lord, or who has been his counselor, or who has first given to him and it shall be recompensed to him again? For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things, to whom be glory forever, amen. But that the Apostle might exclaim and, as if terrified by a certain depth of God's judgments, say: O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God, he had previously said: God has concluded all in sin, that he might have mercy upon all. Therefore, after this statement where he says: God has concluded all under sin, that he might have mercy upon all, because truly there is a mysterious depth—that men were first manifestly guilty in their own conscience so that they could be helped upon confessing—he exclaimed: O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God. Where is the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God? In that God concluded all in sin, that he might have mercy upon all. In what sin? Of unbelief. For he used this word: God has concluded, he says, all in unbelief, that he might have mercy upon all. Therefore, may the Lord our God himself, whose riches the Apostle praises, be present and deign to impart to us some part of these secret and profound riches of his, so that we may somehow express what we feel is inexpressible, not to explain it, but to commend the inexplicable. For it seems that by a certain human weakness, the Apostle, as it were, failed in explaining what he rejoiced in contemplating. He saw something which he could not express in words, he perceived in his heart that for which words were inadequate, and he found no way to make us attentive to what he saw, except to exclaim and elevate our hearts by saying: O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God, so that raised, our hearts might be directed to Him whose riches he saw, and not to the mouth of the weak steward who could not explain those riches. Therefore, let us do this to the best of our ability, and we have directed your hearts to Him to whom we all belong and under whom alone we are all fellow students in this school, where the riches of God are, where the depth of riches is, where his unsearchable judgments and his ways past finding out are, where he concluded all in unbelief, that he might have mercy upon all.

"Transgression preceded, humiliation followed."

He who enclosed all in unbelief seems to be angry, but he who has mercy on all is calm. Therefore, the chapter of the Apostle agrees with the psalm: God, you have rejected us and destroyed us, you were angry and have had mercy on us. Hear the angry and merciful one. God enclosed all in unbelief, that he may have mercy on all. What did the Lord our God want to do? First to be angry, to reject, to humble, and afterwards to help, to call back the estranged, to hear the converted, to assist the one heard, to change the one assisted, to crown the one changed. Connect other testimonies of the Scriptures. The voice of a certain man laboring on this earth, that is, Adam himself, the human race - which the second man from heaven did not leave, so that they first became earthly, afterwards celestial. For because they were humbled, hence earthly; because they were cast down, hence earthly; because they were repelled, hence earthly; but because he who repelled and cast down and humbled had mercy on us, hence celestial. Let us therefore hear the voice of this man elsewhere saying: Before I was humbled, I sinned. Groaning in his humility, he acknowledged his sin; he attributed iniquity to himself, justice to God. For what does he say? Before I was humbled - which is the penalty that God inflicted -, he says, I sinned. So that God, who humbled me, may not seem unjust, my sin preceded, my humiliation followed. Therefore, my Lord God is a just judge. For I would not come to this humiliation unless I first sinned. And because this humiliation indeed seems to resonate with the anger of God's judge, but pertains to mercy, hear his voice elsewhere: It is good for me that you have humbled me, that I may learn your righteousness. Let your charity understand what he says: Before I was humbled, I sinned. He seems to groan in the punishment, to sigh in the chains, to seek help from him in this mortality and earthly infirmity by confessing, whom he had offended by sinning. For these words sound thus: Before I was humbled, I sinned, that is: I do not attribute my humiliation to you, my God: I did what was evil, you did what was just.

God moved by mercy humbles us.

These words match those words which we have sung. For he who says: "God, you have rejected us and destroyed us," he also says: "Before I was humbled, I sinned." For you have heard that God rejected; you have heard that God cast down, that is, from a height he threw to the ground. You have heard. Seek the cause, why God did this: "Before I was humbled," he says, "I sinned." You have heard your preceding sin and the consequent justice of God; hear also because even the justice of God itself, which humbled you, not only indicates the severity of a just judge but also the mercy of the compassionate one. For he says, as I mentioned a little before: "It is good for me that you have humbled me, so that I may learn your justifications." Therefore, what, my brothers? Was God angry when he humbled, or did he show compassion? If humiliation benefited us nothing, let it be attributed to the excessive severity of God; although, if so, we could not complain about his injustice. For the sinner must receive his deserved merit; let the proud and unjust not flatter himself; first let him find out what he deserves, so that he may thus recognize what God has given. Does the heart of any sinful man dare to renounce anything but punishment, to renounce anything but the most just penalty? Or if punishment has followed man's iniquity, can it be said to a just judge: "You did wrong to condemn a sinner"? Therefore, as sinners, let us renounce this, let us confess in our punishments both our sins and the justice of our God: for in this way we will deserve to find the mercy of God in our very punishment. This, dearest brothers, no one finds unless he has first humbled himself. And because I am about to say as I can, I do not think any of you will understand what I am about to say unless he first suppresses the smoke of pride, by which the eyes of the mind are darkened, so that the mercy of God in the punishment itself can be understood.

Moved by love, the father punishes the degenerate son. But first consider this in daily life itself - for from there you can have a way to understand, because He did not abandon human mortality - with certain analogies in their very actions, to show us that punishment can be inflicted mercifully. What shall I say? You give discipline to your servant, and in giving discipline, surely in that very act of punishing, you are showing mercy, but I do not mean to the servant: perhaps you are so angry with the servant that you hate him. Indeed, you should not do this if you are a Christian; you should not do this if you consider yourself a human being; you should not do this if you consider that "servant" and "master" are indeed different names, but not "human" and "human." You should not persecute a sinning servant with hatred. But since this is often the way humans act, let us reject that analogy and use the son. No one can help but love their children: for a man is not to be praised who loves his son. For if you love those who love you, what reward will you get, says the Lord, do not even tax collectors do the same? How much more, then, should those love their children, whom they beget to succeed them. No one can, by the very right of nature, hate the one they have begotten. Nor is a man to be praised for what is found in beasts. No one praises a man for loving his own children. You find this not only in the mildest of animals: the ferocity of lions is softened towards their offspring, tigers love their cubs, serpents nurture their eggs and hatchlings. Therefore, if those things which seem to be savage and harsh in nature do not retain harshness and savagery towards what they beget, what great thing does a man do by loving his son? But I said these things, brothers, so that you may see that punishment of a merciful person can exist from the example of children, from that matter which no one can hate. Therefore, someone sees his son becoming prideful, exalting himself against his father, usurping more than he ought, wanting to waste himself in frivolous pleasures, wanting to squander what he does not yet possess; and while he does this, he is happy, laughing, rejoicing, exulting; but the father restrains him through reprimand, punishment, and lashes, removes the laughter, brings in weeping, and it seems that he has taken away something good and brought in something bad - see what he has taken away: joy, see what he has brought in: groaning - and yet, if he had let that unpunished joy continue, he would be cruel; because he forced him to weep, he is found to be merciful. Therefore, if a father who forces weeping is found to be merciful, why do we not understand that our Creator could have done what we sang: God, you have rejected us and humbled us? But why this? Is it for destruction, is it for perdition? Listen to what follows: You were angry and you had mercy on us. Why is He justly angry with you? Connect this, since we have said: Before I was humbled, I sinned. What advantage do you gain from being rejected and humbled? It is good for me that you humbled me, so that I might learn your statutes.

Man subject to God, master of visible creatures.

Let us now turn our mind to that of the apostle: God has concluded all in unbelief so that He may have mercy on all. The first sin of man was pride: thus we read in Genesis, thus we find in other Scripture. What do we read in Genesis? That man, created and formed, was placed in paradise under a certain law, under a certain command; a command that showed him this: that he was made great, so that he might have someone greater over him. Therefore, God commanded that humility be always retained by the man subject to Him, that is, that the humility of the man constituted under God be preserved. Man was indeed made in the image of God, and as it is written elsewhere, He gave him the power of containing all things: everything was under him, but above him was the One who made all things. Thus, man ought to have regarded those things that were under him, so that he might more regard the One who was above him; for clinging to the superior, he would more securely possess the inferior; but departing from the superior, he would be subjected to the inferior. Just as if we suppose three men: one man having a servant and a master, as often happens that peculiar servants have servants. Consider this: he has a servant, he has a master; subject to one, superior to another; he is superior to the servant, inferior to his master. We have placed a third as the servant of a servant, but the first as the master of a master, and the middle one both servant and master: master of his servant and servant of his master. That third is only a servant, the first is only a master, the middle one is both a servant and a master. And he securely possesses his servant if he does not offend his master. And, indeed, we have mentioned three men: all are of the same kind, all subsist from the same substance and nature. Not so are those three: God, man, and the creature inferior to man. For the Creator and the created, the maker and the made, the craftsman and the work, the creator and the creature are of a different kind and not of the same substance. However, those things which were created are generally called created things, but they differ by natures, orders, merits, and places. For first, there are spiritual things, and afterward, carnal things, those that God created, that God made. Spiritual things have the first place, while corporal things have the last place. The human mind is something spiritual, where the likeness and image of God is imprinted; whereas all things we discern as subject to the senses of the body: they are known to all, they are seen, heard, smelled, tasted, touched; hard and soft, hot and cold, rough and smooth, all these are called corporal things, and are inferior. Above all these things, man is constituted, but according to the mind, according to the intellect, according to that which in him is made in the image and likeness of God. For God is not circumscribed and enclosed by bodily form, such that He has a back on one side and eyes on another side, but He is a certain light—not the kind we see with our eyes, nor if you extend this kind we see with our eyes through the imagination of your thoughts and make fields of light, mountains of light, and trees of light, by flying through the vanities of your thoughts. Do you wish to understand spiritual light? Seek from where you understand.

Concerning knowledge which arises through the senses and concerning knowledge through intelligible light.

Understand this very light, I say, with which you understand. What did I say? You see white and black with bodily eyes, you are helped externally by light either of the sun or moon or lamp or any other little source of light. If that external light did not help your eyes, your eyes would be open in vain and would be called lights without cause. But what is open and healthy in you, that is the eye, and what is brought near for assistance externally, that is light, and what exists for you to see, that is colors and shapes, you know and distinguish. We have said this about the eyes. You hear voices, you know from where you hear. The eyes do not hear, nor do the ears see. Something is lacking to the eyes for sensing voices, and something is lacking to the ears for sensing colors. But nothing of these is lacking to you, because you see through the eyes, you hear through the ears. Therefore you recognize both what smells, and which member you bring near to sense the odor, you know. For you do not bring the ear near to sense the sweetness of the odor, but you bring what God created for you for smelling. Nor, when you want to taste some flavor, do you place it on the ears or on the eye: you know there is no sense there that discerns flavors. And if you wish to sense whether something is hard or soft, whether it is cold or hot? You know that you can sense touch with your whole body. You know these things. Well. Attend to that which is interior: who is this inside to whom all these senses report what humans sense? For these things are like instruments, these are as if subjected into servitude. There is some inner sense, an unknown commander to whom these messengers report whatever they find outside. But that interior one, who distinguishes all these things, is certainly superior to all these things. Therefore the eye has what to see, the ear what to hear, the nostrils what to smell, the mouth what to taste, the hands what to touch, and has the mind nothing that it can regard by itself alone? The mind indeed senses white and black, but with the eyes reporting; it itself senses in voices the melodious and the harsh, but with the ears reporting; it senses in odors the sweet-smelling and the foul-smelling, but with the nose reporting; it senses the sweet and the bitter, but with the mouth reporting; it senses the hard and the soft, but when the handling hand has reported. Therefore it can sense so many and various things with the body reporting: is it not able to sense anything by itself, with no body part reporting to it? Therefore seek what it senses by itself, and you will find where the image of God is. It sensed white and black through the eyes, the ears reported the melodious and the absurd. And lest I run again through each of these things that lie beside the body, the body's members reported. The just and the unjust, do the eyes report these? The mind discerns the just and the unjust and says: "This is just, this is unjust." Seek who reported it? If justice is color, the eyes reported it; if justice is sound, the ears reported it; if it is a scent, the nose reported it; if it is a taste, the mouth reported it; if it is hardness or softness, the hands reported it. If it is none of these, who reported it, except the inner light? Therefore this nature, this substance which you see as excellent, about which, if I wished to speak more abundantly, time would not suffice, is something interior, something divine made in us in the image and likeness of God, above all bodily things, and was so made that every bodily creature would be subjected to serve it, yet the mind itself is not God. For if it were God, would it have sinned? For God is unchangeable. Our mind, however, because it was created, because it was made, is not that which God is. It is changeable. We see even now the changes themselves. It is wise, it is foolish; it remembers, it forgets; it wills, it does not will; it rejoices, it is sad. These changes do not befall God, who is above the mind, and is the creator of the mind.

We offend God: through the body we are tortured. But yet all this that I said above is the body; it is below God, below the lord and above the servant. These are three things, of which I was speaking a little before. If, therefore, three men, though all are men, are ordered by a certain condition of this life, so that one of them is only a lord, another is only a servant, and the other is both the servant of the lord and the lord of a servant; how do you think, and how much easier and more distinctly do you suppose the whole creation to be ordained? The nature and substance of the mind are placed under God, the nature of the whole body is placed under the mind. But as I was saying: then he safely possesses his servant, if he does not offend his lord, so that mind, if it does not by a certain pride, by which it wished to be of its own power, offend its lord, the whole nature of the body would always be subjected to it like a servant. But because by pride it offended the Lord, the creature of the body, which was given for service, was made for the torment of punishment, for the torment of vengeance. For by the difficulty of the body now the mind is tortured, whereas before it dominated the whole nature of the body. Just as if that man – for from here you better accept a clearer comparison, because even this itself, which we understand with difficulty, pertains to the punishment by which we were humbled: we give some evidence from custom. Place those three servants again before your eyes, because you understand this with difficulty, since it is more distinct; for these things are more distinct, the more they are different: for God is far different from the mind, and the mind far different from the body. But truly in those three, there is man, and man, and man. The nature is not different, but the condition makes the order; yet because those are in our habit, we more easily understand them, than those which are more distinct. Therefore now understand this, which we say. Make him in the middle – because he is a servant in such a way that he is also a lord; he is a lord so that he is also a servant: a servant of the superior, a lord of the inferior – therefore make him to have offended his lord. How did he offend? By a certain pride. For he considered that he also had a servant, and dared to raise himself against his lord, by that very fact by which he seemed to have the servant in his power. He raised himself against his lord, his lord commanded that he be beaten by his servant. For the lord of the lord was the lord of both. The servant did not have his servant in his power as much as the lord of both had them. When could he despise that lord, not a servant of anyone, so as not to beat his own lord, at the command of the greater lord of both? Therefore, our God commanded, because we offended Him, that we be tortured by our body; and our body became mortal, and we began to suffer penalties from there, from where we dared to be proud against the Lord. Therefore, now we are beaten by our servant. We are tortured in the pains of our flesh; the Lord has humbled us, so that we are punished by the servant.

Let us serve the Lord, whom we desire to be served by the body.

Why then was he humbled, that we might be chastised by a servant? Because we first transgressed: Before I was humbled, I transgressed. Therefore, being placed under the lash of your servant, cry out to the Lord your God, and say to Him: It is good for me that You have humbled me so that I may learn your statutes. What are these statutes of yours? Because, just as I have the body as a servant, you also have me as a servant. And just as I seek for the body to obey me, so I ought to obey you. Therefore I have learned your statutes from this, as if my Lord speaks to me from above and says: "O wicked servant, at least now in this state of humiliation, acknowledge whom you have offended and to whom you have been subjected. Certainly, you are tormented by your servant: you have a body and you want it to obey you in all things; you want it to follow when you lift your hand, to follow when you lift your foot. Even though I wish for you to be beaten by your servant, your servant still serves you." For when we want to walk and move our body, we command the feet, and they obey; we command the eye to see when we wish to look at something: it does not contradict us, it turns, it reports back to us. We bring the ear to sounds, it immediately reports what is sounding; we lift the hand to handle something, it does not resist. In that the body serves us, it indicates that we are its masters; in that it resists us, it indicates that we have a Master. But let us see in what matters your body does not obey you. For example, you can walk ten thousand paces, but you want twenty: it does not obey. You can walk fifty thousand, but you want sixty: it does not obey. You want to stay awake for two nights: it obeys in part, in another part it does not obey. You want to move your hand to lift something: you lift some things; in other things you try: it does not obey. Add to this so many troubling difficulties of its infirmity and corruption which cannot be counted, and observe how the body, being corrupted, burdens the soul. Thus, in what it serves you, it shows that you are its master; in what it resists you, it reminds you to serve your Master. Therefore, say to your Lord: It is good for me that You have humbled me so that I may learn your statutes. How do you learn His statutes? So that now you are not ashamed to serve your Lord, just as you want your body to serve you. And you begin now to serve your Lord, but still, just as you wish, your body does not yet fully serve you. For you believe, you who were unbelieving, you follow the precepts of your Lord, you walk the path, but justice is not yet perfected in you: for this reason, obedience in your servant is not yet perfected; there still remains some bitterness, lest this world should become sweet to you and that you do not desire your Lord who made the world.

Christ the Lord is our only hope.

Cry out from the ends of the earth to Him, O Church spread throughout the world, say in the psalm: From the ends of the earth I have cried to You, when my heart was overwhelmed. These things are written in the psalm: You have lifted me up on the rock, You have led me, because You have become my hope. For God has exalted us on the rock. On what rock? The rock was Christ, says the Apostle. And how did He become our hope there? Because our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom we were made, He Himself is the Word of God, through whom all things were made. He took flesh from our mortal mass, and He took the death which pertained to the punishment of sin, He did not take sin, but in the mercy of freeing us from sin, He gave His own flesh up to death. For He was not given up unwillingly; He would not have been crucified unless He had given Himself up. Thus, when Judas betrayed Him, he betrayed one who was willing. Yet Judas is not credited with the merit of Christ's will, but with the merit of his own avarice. For when he betrayed the Lord, he did not consider our salvation, but his own greed and treachery. For Judas betrayed Him, Christ betrayed Himself, and the Father of Christ betrayed Him. They all seemed to do one thing. They did one thing, but not with one intention. The Father handed over the Son by mercy, the Son handed over Himself by the same mercy, Judas handed over his Master by treachery. It seems there is no difference between handing over and handing over, but there is a great difference between mercy and treachery. How did the Father hand Him over? Listen to the Apostle: He who did not spare His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all. How did the Son hand Himself over? The same Apostle says of the Lord Himself: Who loved me and gave Himself for me. Therefore, He gave this flesh to be killed, so you might not fear anything for your flesh. He showed in His resurrection after three days, what you should hope for at the end of the world. Therefore, He leads you forth, because He has become your hope. You now walk toward the hope of resurrection, but if our head had not first risen, the other members would not find what to hope for.

Christ suffered willingly, not by necessity.

What then, my brothers? Although, even before the Lord suffered, his body served him as Lord, for he was not so bound to the body as if for punishment, as if for retribution, to be struck by a servant as we are; but whatever he wanted to suffer in his body, he suffered willingly and by his power, not by necessity and poverty, as he himself said: "I have the power to lay down my life, and I have the power to take it up again: no one takes it from me, but I lay it down of my own accord." Therefore, great power was in him; nevertheless, what he wanted to suffer in the flesh there he demonstrated, that you suffer deservedly. He suffered undeservedly, you suffer deservedly. But so that you may endure what you suffer deservedly, he who suffered undeservedly consoles you. Therefore, endure what you suffer, until your mortality passes away. Therefore, your kingdom will come with certain measures of time; he gives what he promised, because he has already shown in himself that he has risen. For he rose on the third day; he wanted to rise first and show us what we should hope for at the end. We thought the flesh would perish; therefore he did not want to take flesh from another place than where we also have flesh. For if he took it from somewhere else, we would say: "The flesh that was taken from another place could rise." Was it not taken from the same place where we took ours? Indeed, he did not admit a man's union to his mother, because he was the only Son of God. Since he had a Father above, he sought on earth only a mother. He showed us that what he created is not evil: he created male and female, he created both himself. But because man was seduced by the woman, women could despair of themselves, unless that sex was honored through the Virgin Mary. He chose to be born of a woman; it was fitting to take on a man, to be born a man. But not only did God create man, he also created woman himself. Women could despair of themselves, as I said, and say they do not pertain to the mercy of God, because man was deceived by a woman; he deigned to be born of a woman, taking on a man, and honored the sex; he showed himself the creator of both sexes, and afterward the liberator. For since through a woman death was prepared for man by the serpent, life was announced to men by women. For the risen Lord was first seen by women and announced to the male apostles. Therefore, our Lord Jesus Christ showed us in his flesh what we should hope for in the end. Therefore, he humbled us, that we might learn his justifications. The cause of the sufferings which man endures is pride.

Now let us return humbled, who were cast down in pride. For the entire cause of our mortality, the entire cause of our weakness, the entire cause of all our torments, all our difficulties, all our hardships in this age, which the human race suffers, is nothing but pride. You have Scripture saying: "The beginning of every sin is pride." And what does it also say? "The beginning of pride of man is to apostatize from God." If pride seems to you to be a small evil, at least tremble at apostatizing from God. Further, if you tremble at apostatizing from God, remove the cause of apostasy. For pride made man apostatize from God. Because, therefore, it is itself the head of all our diseases - for we are sick in this life - just as a skilled doctor, when he sees a man languishing from various diseases, does not look at the proximate causes and ignore the origin of all causes - for if he cures the proximate causes while the source of diseases remains, the offshoots of calamity return, and for a time he seems to heal, but does not completely cure; however, that doctor is found to be most skilled who gathers well all the causes of all diseases, and having found the primary cause, from which all those diverse things seem to have sprouted like branches, cuts off the root, and the entire forest of pains is cut down - so the Lord Jesus Christ, why he is called Savior, and he who said: "The physician is not needed for the healthy, but for those who are ill," came to those who are sick, for the sick could not come to him; he sought those not seeking him, turned to the infirm, suffered many things, bore being killed by the blind, so that by his death he might heal their eyes - did all these things, and because he saw that the cause of all our diseases was pride, he healed us by his humility.

True is the flesh in which Christ was born and died.

Therefore, do not mock the humility of Christ. For many pagans mock Christ because He came humbly - and would that it were only pagans! - and many heretics who call themselves Christians do too. It offends them that Christ was born of a woman; it offends them that He was fixed on the cross and was wounded, and those wounds He received were real, and those nails that were driven in were real; it offends them and they say: "He feigned all those things, He pretended and did not endure them." So, has the truth freed you by means of a lie? Did you labor in deceit and were cured by deceit? How can that be? But whoever says these things shows what kind of masters they are themselves. For if the Lord has risen and presented His hands with their wounds to be touched by His doubting disciple, saying: "I will not believe unless I put my fingers into His side," He showed Himself not just to be seen by the eyes but to be touched by the hands; and when the disciple touched the wounds, he found the truth embodied and exclaimed: "My Lord and my God." So if Christ deceived, will you speak the truth? How can I listen to you, tell me. Do you wish me to listen to you as a teacher? "As a teacher," he says to me. What are you telling me, what are you teaching me? "I teach you," he says, "that Christ was not born of a woman, and did not have real flesh, and that death was not real, nor were those wounds real, and if those wounds were not real, then neither were those scars." And I learned differently from the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, who, when His disciple doubted, offered him His scars. Certainly, He could have risen without any scars, He who healed the eyes of the man born blind. But why did He want to bring testimony through His scars? Because the testimony of the scars of the body was the remedy for the wounds of the mind. So are you going to teach me that those things were false, and that Christ pretended all these things, and the disciple deceived by falsehood exclaimed: "My Lord and my God"? So if He wanted to restore health through falsehood, how do I know whether you speak the truth to me or lie? For you do not consider it a crime to lie when you try to present Christ the author of lies to me. For I will say to you: "You are lying," and you to me: "By no means, I am not lying." You are certainly lying. "Far be it from me to lie." This is what you will say to me, so that I believe you. For tell me: "I am lying," and I wish to know if I should believe anything you say. And to believe anything you say, you will say to me: "Far be it from me to lie." Why do you say "Far be it from me to lie" if you do not consider lying a crime when you teach? So what you consider a crime for yourself, you assign to Christ? Therefore, let human deceptions be gone: Christ came as it is written in the gospel. Do not be offended by the humility of Christ; that humility offends pride. Do not be proud, and the humble Christ will not offend you.

"Do not disdain the humility by which you are healed." The Apostle says: All things are clean to the clean. However, to the impure and unbelieving nothing is clean, but both their minds and consciences are polluted. With a pure heart, say: "A woman conceived, a virgin conceived." She conceived by faith, a virgin conceived, a virgin gave birth, a virgin remained. Believe all these things, and do not let those innards seem unclean to you. Because even if that flesh had been entirely unclean, Christ, coming to the flesh, would purify the unclean, not become unclean from the unclean. See the humility of your Lord: if it horrifies you, you are proud. Humility horrifies the proud. As proud as you are, compel yourself so that the cup of your pride does not horrify you. For when you are proud, you swell; you are not great. If you swell, drink the cup, so that your innards may de-swell, so that you can be healthy. This cup the doctor has prepared for you, so that you may drink. The doctor himself has prepared the cup for you: drink the bitter cup if you wish to be healthy. Do you not see that you swell, do you not see that your innards are not healthy? You think you are great, and you swell. That is not greatness, but sickness. Do you want to be free of sickness, do you want to be free of swelling? Drink the cup of humility. He who came to you in humility prepared it for you. And lest you hesitate to drink, the doctor drank first, not because it was necessary for the doctor, but to remove the hesitation from the patient. Do not, therefore, despise humility, by which you are healed. The root of all diseases is pride. He who deigned to become the head of the Church came to heal the root of all diseases. With the root of all diseases removed, you will be healthy. Humble yourself and you will be healthy, and you will say more securely: It is good for me that you have humbled me, that I might learn your righteousness. For you have exalted yourself and have been humbled. Humble yourself and you will be exalted, because God resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble. Therefore, God has concluded all in unbelief, so that He may have mercy on all. Where sin abounded, grace abounded much more.

Man departed from God, followed his desires, loosened the reins: by wandering and erring, he reached the worship of idols. Even the Jewish people, who worshipped one God, became proud and fell into iniquity. God, wanting to show them that they were weak, wanting to show them that they lie under the frailty of their flesh, and that the desire derived from their parents' lineage still remained in them, gave them the law and righteous, good, and holy commandments, as the Apostle says: Therefore the law is holy, and the commandment is holy, righteous, and good. What then, he says, is good, made death to me? By no means! But sin, so that it may appear sin, worked death in me through what is good. See how he calls the law itself good, which was given to the Jews. He calls it good because God had given it. And truly, He had prescribed all good things in the decalogue. Was there anything evil: Do not steal, do not kill, do not commit adultery, do not bear false witness, and so on, do not covet your neighbor's property? For even if you do not take it but merely covet it, the laws of the forum do not hold you, but God holds you in judgment. Therefore, brethren, consider: the law was given to the infirm Jews, but also to the proud. They began to try to do the righteousness of the law and suppress their desires, and they became guilty. Those who were previously iniquitous were not guilty of the law, nor were they transgressors. Whence the Apostle says: For where there is no law, there is no transgression. When the law is given, the one who acts against the law, even if he does what he was doing before, when he did this without the law, he was a sinner but not a transgressor; but when he does it after receiving the law, he is not only a sinner but also a transgressor. Therefore, because he is not only a sinner but also a transgressor, what the Apostle says is fulfilled: But the law entered so that the offense might abound. Why, then, did the offense abound? It is thus: God, you have rejected us and cast us off. He then continues and says: But where sin abounded, grace did much more abound. Since sin abounded, we rightly say: God, you have rejected us and cast us off, you were angry. But since grace abounded much more, we rightly add: And you had mercy on us. Thus, let not the Jews say: "We are something." For God has concluded them all in unbelief that He might have mercy upon all.

Let us lament, for we are away from the Lord.

Let us know, therefore, dearest brothers, our life, our Lord Jesus Christ; let us hold the humility of our Lord Jesus Christ as the remedy for our pride. Let us believe in Him, let us hope entirely in His mercy, who did not spare His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all; and when perhaps we make progress in His justifications, let us not become proud and disdain others, but let us consider on the path of righteousness not how much we have passed, but how much remains for us to complete; and let us mourn everywhere, and let us mourn as long as we are strangers, because our joy will not be except in the homeland, when we have been made equal to the angels. As long as we are in the body, we are away from the Lord. Why are we away from the Lord? For we walk by faith, he says, not by sight. Faith is to believe what you do not see, sight is to see what you have believed. When therefore sight comes, that flame of charity will be more intense, because what you desired absent, you embrace present; what you believed absent, you see present. And if God believed is sweet, what will He be seen? When therefore all these things which still torment us because of the remnants of our sins are ended, then there will be the fullness of righteousness, then united with the angels we will sing the eternal hymn "alleluia": the praise of God will be without defect to us, nor will hunger drive us away from there, because the body does not hunger, unless it is corrupted and burdens the soul; nor will we thirst nor be sick nor grow old nor incline to sleep nor be fatigued by any weariness, but just as the bodies of angels are, such will our flesh be in the resurrection of the dead. Do not marvel because these bodies will be heavenly bodies in the resurrection of the dead. Consider that before we were, we were nothing, and from this believe what we will be when we have resurrected. Let each consider himself: before he was born, what was he, where was he, where was he hidden? All this distinction of body: ears, eyes, face, the spirit that animates the entire weight of the body, where were all these? Surely in the secret of nature, surely where they were not seen. They proceeded from there, God formed you who were not. What is great for God to make an angel from man, who made man from clay? What were you? and you are a man; you are a man, and will you not be an angel? Closer it is to make an angel from a man, than from what you were to make a man. He has done the more wonderful thing in you, will He not do what remains?

We see that the promises of God have been fulfilled.

You must believe, and your faith should not abandon Christ, should not abandon the gospel, should not abandon His promises. Understand that all things that are written are nearly fulfilled; few things remain. This Church, which you see spread throughout the world, did not exist a short time ago. You were pagans a few years ago, now you are Christians; your parents served demons, temples were once full of those offering incense, now the Church is full of those who praise God. How swiftly did God change human affairs? Before all these things came to pass, the scriptures were read, believed, but not seen; now we see those things which our ancestors read. If therefore so many things have been fulfilled, are the few remaining things not going to come? Believe firmly that they are coming, brothers, because all these things indeed came as they were written and foretold before they happened. Many thousands of years ago, when it was said to Abraham: 'In your seed all nations will be blessed,' it was said to one man: 'In your seed all nations will be blessed'; he considered himself as one and this seed, and his wife already old and worn with age, and it was said to him not only: "A seed will come from you" - which if it alone had been said, what would be more marvelous? -, it wasn't enough to say to an old man: "You will have a son," [but] "In your seed," He says, "all the nations will be blessed." God spoke marvels, He spoke impossibilities, but they were easy for Him. That one man believed what he did not see, and we see; what he believed, was given to us, indeed it was given back to him, what was exhibited in us. For from the seed of Abraham came Isaac, and from Isaac came Jacob, and from Jacob the people of the Jews, and from the people of the Jews came David, and from the seed of David came the Virgin Mary, and from the Virgin Mary, the Lord Jesus Christ. Therefore, in the seed of Abraham, all nations will be blessed, because all nations are blessed in Christ. Behold, now what was promised to him has been given to us. Therefore, Almighty and faithful God, who fulfilled what He promised to one man, will He not fulfill what He promised to all? My brothers, let your faith be strengthened, let your hope be fortified. He did not deceive one man; will He deceive the whole world? He gave the whole world full of Christians to one man, will He not give the world to live with His Son Christ forever?

"The Church is not in part, but in the whole."

Holding these things, brothers, understand that the Church is not in a part, but in the whole. Christ bought all, He gave His blood for all: the whole world holds Christians, the unity of the Church is of Christ. Heretics argue in vain with the Church of Christ: it is not enough that they wish to disinherit themselves, they also slander the heirs. You, in unity, hold to the whole, do not let them deceive you to a part. If you follow them, you will go to a part; if they hear you, they will come to the whole: they win themselves for their gain. For Christ bought all, when He hung on the cross, my brothers: the bargains of Christ, the passion of Christ; there He bought us where He was crucified. There indeed He shed His blood, our price, there as it was foretold in the psalms still to come. See how many years ago it was foretold: They pierced my hands and my feet, they counted all my bones; they looked and stared at me, they divided my garments among them and cast lots for my clothing. All these things can scarcely be discerned whether they are heard in the psalm or recited from the gospel. Is it not that as they are sung in the psalm, so they are read in the gospel: They pierced my hands and my feet, they counted all my bones? There Christ bought us, where all His bones were counted; where His hands and feet were pierced with nails, there He bought us. There indeed He shed His blood, which is our price. In that very psalm it is understood what He bought. Do you want to know? Ask the psalm itself. What did Christ buy, hanging on the tree? For after a few verses it says: All the ends of the earth will remember and turn to the Lord, and all the families of the nations will worship before Him. Why will they worship? Because the kingdom is the Lord's, and He rules over the nations. As if it were asked why, who is he to whom all the ends of the earth will turn and before whom all the families of the nations will worship? Because it says, his is the kingdom, and he rules over the nations. Why is it his? Because he bought it.

Let us rejoice because we belong to the lot of Christ.

Recently the enemy, the possessor, has rushed in, and this under the name of Christ. He can divide some of the garments of Christ; no one will divide that tunic which is woven from above. "They divided," he says, "my garments among them, and for my clothing they cast lots." And the evangelist says: There was a certain tunic woven from the top, and those who crucified the Lord said among themselves: Let us not tear it, but cast lots for it. It was not placed in division; the tunic remained apart from division. Why did that tunic remain apart from division? Because it was woven from above. It was signified why it did not deserve to be divided, being woven from above. What is that is woven from above? Whence it is said to us "Lift up your heart." Thus, he who has his heart lifted up cannot be divided into parts, because he will belong to that tunic which cannot be divided. Therefore, my brothers, this tunic came by lot to our Lord Jesus Christ himself, because his lot is his inheritance. And since it was his inheritance, he bought it. Those, however, who are divided can belong to the other garments of Christ, because he is clothed in all. He is clothed in all who believe in him, in whatever way they are clothed. But all who seek earthly honors, temporal advantages, bodily illusions, are not woven from above, because they desire worldly things. Therefore, they can be divided. But that tunic which is woven from above, it cannot come into division. Rejoice that you belong to it, who are seedlings of the Catholic faith. Question your heart if you seek nothing from Christ except the kingdom of heaven: not vain things, not temporal things, not bodily images, not those things which delight in this world and on this earth. When you question yourselves, your conscience will answer "lift up your heart." And if you have "lifted up your heart," you are woven from above; if you are woven from above, you cannot be divided.

Sermons - Sermon 15A

SERMON 15/A In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. Let us beseech our Lord God that he may teach us, as he taught his disciples in the law, to fulfill his will. Let us ask him to give us knowledge and understanding in all spiritual wisdom, that we may walk worthy of him and please him in all things. My beloved brothers, as we are gathered here to offer divine praises and to hear the word of God, let us direct our hearts and minds to him, and let us cleanse ourselves from all worldly and carnal thoughts. For just as those who wash in water first cleanse their bodies from all uncleanness, and then are sprinkled with pure water, so too we, brothers, must wash and cleanse our minds from all vices and evil desires, and then be renewed by the pure word of God. For it is written, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." Therefore, let us strive to purify our hearts, so that we may be able to see God not only in the future life but also in this present one, in the contemplation of his holy law and in the works of his commandments. But if we want to be pure in heart, we must first remove from our hearts all pride and arrogance, all envy and malice, all anger and wrath, all hatred and enmity. For these are the things that defile the heart and make it impure. Instead, let us cultivate humility and meekness, patience and kindness, love and charity, which are the virtues that make the heart pure and pleasing to God.

Let us also, my dear brothers, be vigilant in prayer, constant in reading and meditating on the holy Scriptures, diligent in good works, and fervent in the love of God and of our neighbor. For these are the things that lead us to true purity of heart and to the vision of God. May our Lord Jesus Christ grant us this purity of heart, and may he make us worthy to see and enjoy his face forever. Amen.

Sermon Given at Hippo During Diarrhoea in the Basilica of the Pearl 10 days before the Kalends of October, the fifth weekday. ON THE RESPONSE OF PSALM 32:

"Rejoice, righteous ones, in the Lord; praise befits the upright."

Praise befits the righteous; it does not befit the wicked. To rejoice in the praise of God and to live in accordance with the praise of God, we are admonished by what we have just sung: "Rejoice in the Lord, O you righteous, for praise is fitting for the upright." For if it is fitting for the upright, it is not fitting for the wicked. But those who are upright are also righteous, to whom it is said to rejoice in the Lord: for praise is fitting for them. But who are wicked, if not sinners and the unjust, who cannot rejoice in the Lord because praise is not fitting for them? Rightly does it say in another psalm: "But to the sinner, God says, 'Why do you recite my statutes and take my covenant on your lips?' For praise is fitting for the upright, and indeed the justifications of the Lord and the covenant of the Lord are where the praise of the Lord is, rightly is it also said elsewhere: 'Praise is not becoming in the mouth of a sinner.' For where it is not fitting, it is not beautiful; and where it is beautiful, it is fitting."

Those are upright in heart to whom God appears good, whether in the sufferings of the pious or in the prosperity of the impious.

Yet who are properly righteous men, so that everyone may recognize whether the praise of God is fitting in his mouth, we find in the Scriptures in this way. A certain Psalm says: How good is God to Israel, to those who are upright in heart! And it follows: But my feet almost slipped, because I was envious of the arrogant when I saw the prosperity of the wicked. He confesses not indeed his turning away and fall, but nevertheless his danger. For he does not say that he fell, but that his feet almost slipped as if to fall. For he says: How good is God to Israel, to those who are upright in heart! But my feet almost slipped. When he distinguishes himself by this "but" from those who are upright in heart, he confesses that he was not at some time upright in heart, and therefore his feet almost slipped. Therefore, he says, God is good to Israel, to those who are upright in heart. But to me, at some time, He did not seem good, because I was not upright in heart. However, he did not dare to say: "God did not seem good to me," but nevertheless he said it. For when he says: God is good to Israel, to those who are upright in heart; but my feet almost slipped, he shows that his feet slipped because God did not seem good to him. But from where did God not seem good to him? My steps had well nigh slipped. Well nigh, what is it? They almost slipped. From where? Because I was envious of the arrogant when I saw the prosperity of the wicked. "I saw," he says, "sinners who do not worship God, who blaspheme God, who provoke God. I saw them abound in peace, abound in happiness. And it seemed to me that God does not judge rightly, giving happiness to His blasphemers." Therefore, when he observed this, that is, the happiness of the wicked, he said his feet almost slipped because God did not seem good to him. But because he later recognized, as he says in the same psalm: I strove to understand, and he added: This was an oppressive task to me, why the wicked are happy, this was an oppressive task to me, he says, until I entered the sanctuary of God and understood their final destiny, because to the wicked, happiness is given for a time, but eternal punishment is reserved at the end. When he understood this, he became upright in heart and began to praise God in all things, and in the sufferings of the pious, and in the very happiness of the impious, perceiving that God is a just rewarder at the end, now giving some temporal happiness to whom He reserves eternal unhappiness at the end, and some pious ones undergoing present unhappiness to whom He again reserves eternal happiness; and it is fitting for the fortunes to change, as in the case of that rich man who feasted splendidly every day, and that poor man full of sores lying at the rich man's gate, desiring to be fed with what fell from the rich man's table. But when both had died, the rich man began to be in torment in hell, while the poor man rested in Abraham’s bosom. And when it seemed unworthy to the rich man, and he wanted a drop of water from Lazarus' finger to be dropped on him, reciprocally desiring a drop from the finger of him from whose table he had desired a crumb, he heard from Abraham the sentence of the just God: Son, remember that you received good things in your lifetime, and Lazarus bad things; but now he is comforted here and you are in anguish. He, who once did not think God was good because he envied the peace of the sinners, upon entering the sanctuary of God directed his gaze to these final things. And recognizing God's true and just judgment, which indeed operates now but secretly, to be revealed in the end in manifestation, and as if straightening his own crooked heart, brought near as it were by the rule of God’s justice by which a tortuous heart would be corrected, he burst forth in this voice and said: How good is God to Israel, to those who are upright in heart! Now I understand the good, because I have become upright in heart. But before, He did not seem good to me, because my feet slipped: For I was envious of the arrogant when I saw the prosperity of the wicked.

God instructs you through hardships to give the kingdom of heaven.

If, therefore, God now appears good to you even when He gives happiness to the wicked, from which you used to murmur against God, you have been made upright in heart; praise befits you, for praise befits the upright. But if you are perverse, praise does not befit you. Why does it not befit you? The praise with which you praise God will not be persevering. For you praise God when it is well with you; you blaspheme God when it is ill with you. For He pleases you then when He gives happiness; but He displease you when He chastises. You are not upright in heart, you cannot say that verse from another psalm: I will bless the Lord at all times; His praise shall continually be in my mouth. For how is it "continually," if then when it is well with you you praise, not also when it is ill with you? For even what is said to be ill with you is well if you understand it as being from a chastising father. A foolish child often loves a gentle teacher and hates a chastising one. But a wise child understands a good teacher, both gentle and chastising. For he is gentle so that the child may not fail, he chastises so that the child may not perish. Therefore, when one has such a heart, that is, upright, so that God does not displease him even when He does something that may seem to oppose him for a time, that person securely praises God, because he will always praise, and truly praise befits him, and he truly and faithfully sings: I will bless the Lord at all times; His praise shall continually be in my mouth. For He chastises every son whom He receives. So what do you choose: to be chastised and received, or not touched and not received? See what sort of son you are. If you desire your father's inheritance, do not reject the chastisement. If you spurn the chastisement, renounce the inheritance. For what does He train you for, except that He might give you the inheritance? To be an heir to your father, did he not rebuke you, did he not scold you, did he not chastise you, did he not beat you? For what purpose? That you might eventually succeed him in a house that will eventually fall, a field that will eventually pass away, and gold that will not last longer in this world than you yourself, who possess the gold. For either living, you will lose what you have, or dying, you will leave it behind. For such a temporary inheritance you endured your father's chastisements, and you murmur against God who teaches you to give you the kingdom of heaven? And God is rightfully and steadfastly praised by those of upright heart.

Since you are such that God pleases you, and chastising you pleases you—either there is something in you that must be corrected with a whip, or your very uprightness is tested with a whip—since you are such, praise. For you praise securely. Why do you praise securely? Because you praise properly, because you praise perseveringly. For I do not fear that you now praise and shortly thereafter blaspheme. I do not fear that you praise when well and blaspheme when sick. I do not fear that from a healthy mouth proceeds the praise of God, from a sick tongue is sought a mathematician or a sorcerer, a chanter or a binder of diabolical remedies. I do not fear, because you have now understood that God is good even when He chastises, and you know that He who strikes the son knows also when to spare. It will be fitting to praise, because you will always continuously praise, and the praise of God will always be in your mouth. You receive willingly a flattering Father, you receive willingly also a chastising Father. You do not run to Him when He flatters and flee from Him when He chastises. For if you do this, you will be like a child who, fleeing from a chastising father, runs into the arms of a flattering slave trader and thinks him good, but considers his own father bad, and prefers the deceit of flattery to the truth of chastisements; by preferring flattery, he loses his inheritance and falls into bondage. Change your counsel, and make your heart upright. For God is not changed because He chastises you, but you are changeable. He does something through change so that you, changed for the better, may receive the inheritance. For if He leaves you and neglects you when He seems good to you, then He is very much angry.

Let your Charity notice what the Scripture of God says in another psalm. "The sinner provoked the Lord," it says. Why did he provoke? See where he cried out against the provoked Lord. Certainly, the sinner provoked the Lord to greater wrath: "In His great wrath," it says, "He will not seek."

Job blessed God in his riches, using them well.

Against Job the saint, blessing the Lord at all times, in whose mouth was always His praise, when he was rich, he blessed the Lord in his wealth, doing with it all the good works that are enumerated in his book: breaking bread for the hungry, clothing the naked, welcoming the stranger, and others, which only the wealthy from their wealth receive, which only the rich obtain. For they do not gain or presume upon the earnings which they leave to their children. They do not know who will possess their labors after their death. And this Scripture has called vanity: "Nevertheless, every man living is all vanity; he treasures and does not know for whom he gathers them." Therefore, all the profit that is made from riches is the treasure of the kingdom of heaven, from which the Lord gave advice, not that you lose, but that you change the place for your gold. For He does not say to you, "When you give, you lose," but: "You have it poorly on earth, in heaven I will keep it for you. What are you afraid to lose? You place it in heaven, Christ the keeper. If you are concerned about the place, heaven it will be; if about the keeper, Christ it will be. What are you afraid to lose?" Therefore, when Job did these things, surely he worked, and in his works God was praised and he blessed the Lord in what he had received. For not truly, brethren, are riches blamed. Do you think, when you see the wicked rich, that riches are evil? Riches are not evil, but those who are; riches, however, are gifts of God. Give them to a just man, and see what good he makes from them. Is wine therefore evil because someone gets drunk? Give it to a sober man using it well, and see the gift of God. Thus give gold to a greedy man. In order to make more of what he has, he seeks to commit all crimes. Give gold to a just man, and see how he distributes it, how he imparts it, how he aids the needs of men as he can. Therefore, it is not riches, but the one who uses them badly who is evil. When therefore Job used them well, as Abraham used them well... Certainly, brethren, the beggar with ulcers lying at the gate of the rich man was so needy that dogs licked his sores. Thus certainly we read, thus it is written. And yet where was he taken? Into Abraham's bosom. Reflect on the Scriptures. See if Abraham was poor here. You will find that he had much gold here, much silver, many flocks, many servants and estates. Therefore, the poor man is raised into the bosom of the rich man. If poverty merited this for him, he himself would not succeed to Abraham for rest, and would not have Abraham to receive him. But because there was in poor Lazarus what was in rich Abraham, that is humility, piety, worship of God, observance of God, riches were not harmful to him, nor poverty to this one, but his merit was piety. Hence, in that rich man who badly changed his ways, it is not his wealth that is censured but his mind. For he was clothed in purple and fine linen, and feasted splendidly every day, and allowed the ulcerated beggar to lie at his gate, and arrogantly despising him, he did not relieve his poverty. What do you think the rich man disdainfully said of the beggar? "Why does this one lie here?" But deservedly that tongue which scorned the poor man longed for a drop from his finger.

Job blessed God even in the poverty which he received from the hand of the Lord. So when the holy Job, as I said, had many riches, he praised God, was tempted to be tested, tested to be shown. For he was hidden not only from men but also from the devil himself, who watches more diligently than any man. Therefore, who Job was was hidden from him, but it was not hidden from the Lord. The tester permitted the tempter, but not for himself, but for us, so that it would be revealed to us what we ought to imitate. For he did not wish to show Job to the devil, but through the devil to us, so that we, having conquered the devil, would have something to imitate. Therefore, having lost everything not gradually but suddenly, he said: The Lord gave, and the Lord took away. As it pleased the Lord, so it was done. Blessed be the name of the Lord. As it pleased the Lord, so it was done. What pleased the Righteous One cannot be unjust. What pleased the Good One cannot be evil. For God is good to Israel, to those who are upright in heart. Job was upright in heart, thus praise was fitting for him. The Lord gave, and the Lord took away. As it pleased the Lord, so it was done. He confessed by praising: Blessed be the name of the Lord. The Lord gave and the Lord took away. There was abundance, now there is want. Things have changed with me, He has not changed. I was once rich, now poor; He is always rich, always righteous, always the Father. Blessed be the name of the Lord. The name of the Lord was not blessed in my abundance and cursed in my want. May this never be with me. This is what Job, endowed with inner riches, said. He had lost his whole house, but his heart was full. He lost his house, he lost his gold. He filled his heart. God himself was present for all that he had given. The Lord gave, and the Lord took away. See how he understands the supreme power. Do not, O Christian, wish to worship God for the sake of the kingdom of heaven and fear the devil for earthly goods, for all power and authority are entirely from him. The devil only wanted to harm; he could not unless permitted. Therefore, authority is with him. Otherwise, if the devil were permitted to do as much as he wills, which Christian would remain? Which worshiper of God would be left on earth? Do you not see his temples falling, his idols being shattered, his priests converting to God? Do you not think that from this the devil is suffering and tormented? Therefore, if he had power to act for his pain, what Church would remain on earth? Therefore, when the holy Job lost everything through the devil's snares, he is not given any power. When he praises God, he does not say, "The Lord gave, the devil took away," but says, "The Lord gave, the Lord took away. Let not the devil claim anything for himself. And what I was when I was rich was of God, and what I am in poverty is of God." And if he was permitted to tempt, he was not permitted to suffocate; indeed, if he tried to suffocate, he would not hold the throat and crush but cut off the spirit. If perchance he, under the pressure of tribulation, had uttered a blasphemous word from his mouth, then he would have breathed his last, suffocated by excluding the spirit of life from himself. He did not do this either in that sudden poverty or in that ultimate wound.

Finally, tempted by his wife, Job blessed God even in extreme weakness. For it was not enough for the devil to have taken away all that Job possessed; he also took his sons, whom he possessed, leaving only his wife. Indeed, he did not take her away, knowing what he was doing. He knew that Adam had been deceived by Eve. Therefore, he rather preserved her as his helper than as her husband's comforter. So, having taken all of those things and left one through whom he could tempt again, it wasn't enough for him. He also sought to take away the health of the body. And he was permitted to take it, so that, placed in that wound, righteous Job would praise God with an upright heart, changing in nothing, he whom praise befitted. She came to him, she who had been left for this purpose, and persuaded, or rather urged him to blasphemy. For she said: "How much evil we suffer! Curse God and die." First, Eve was deceived by the devil as if invited to life, and she found death. For the devil said: "You will not die by death." And thinking she would have life, she found death, because she acted against God's command, and persuaded her husband against God's command. Now the opposite: "Curse God and die." It was enough for Eve that she persuaded to act against God's command. She is still Eve, but he is now not Adam. She filled by the devil, he corrected by example. Job better in the dung heap than Adam in paradise. So that you may know how much it matters to have an upright heart, how did Job throw down the devil in that poverty, in that wound? For he replied to the woman and said: "You speak as one of the foolish women speaks. Shall we receive good from the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?" He blessed the Lord at all times, always His praise was in his mouth. For he was upright in heart, hence praise befitted him. If you then also wish for praise to befit you, be upright in heart. If you wish to be upright in heart, let not God displease you in anything. For either you see the reason why He does what He does, and seeing the reason you do not blame. Or if the reason escapes you, know that He does who in no way can displease.

God can act against your will, but not against your benefit.

Someone destroys his own house and is criticized. If you knew the reason, perhaps you would not criticize the person doing it. Indeed, we are in this basilica, and it is narrow and has something small. And it pleased the lord to make another, and this one will have to be destroyed. Whoever perhaps sees the destruction, when it begins to be torn down, says: "Wasn't this a place of prayer? Wasn't God's name invoked here? Why are they letting this be destroyed?" The work is displeasing because the plan is hidden. So also does God do something. Why He does it, either you know and praise, or you do not know and believe, if you are right in heart. For he is indeed right in heart who, in those cases which he knows, praises God, and in those things he does not know, does not attribute foolishness to God. Unjustly and foolishly, you are criticized, man, the governor of your house, by someone ignorant of your reasons and plans. And you dare to criticize the governor of the whole world and the creator of heaven and earth because the wind blew and the vines withered, or a cloud arose and poured down hail? Do not criticize. He knows how to govern and count all His works. You certainly could not create heaven and earth, and yet if you had the chance, you would say to God: "Oh, if I were in charge, I would not do what you do." When something done by God displeases you, wouldn't you want to be the governor? Blush. See who you wish to succeed: a mortal to the immortal, a man to God. It is better to yield to Him than to seek to succeed Him. Yield to God because God is. And if perhaps He does something against your will, it is not against your benefit. How much do doctors do against the will of the sick, and yet they do not work against health. And a doctor sometimes makes a mistake, God never. If, therefore, you entrust yourself to a doctor who sometimes errs, you trust human counsel. Not to apply a poultice that is mild, or a plaster that doesn't cause you pain, but often to burn, to cut, to remove a member born with you, you entrust yourself to him. You do not say: "He might make a mistake, and I will miss one finger." You allow him to remove one finger, lest the whole body rots from it. And will you not allow God to cut, to take something from your fruits, if perhaps you have discipline in that moderation?

However, God must be prayed to in afflictions so that He may assist us.

Therefore, Brothers, be upright in heart, that is, let God displease you in nothing. I do not say do not ask. Ask as much as you can in affliction. He suspends the rain, he must be asked. But if he rains, he must be praised, and if he does not rain, he must be praised, yet he must still be asked. For we do not say do not ask. Sometimes indeed he is moved and grants to those asking, and he does not want to grant unless to those asking. Is God arrogant, that he does not grant unless to one asking? But then the little soul will grow to the greatness of God, if he helps it in tribulation, so that he gives comfort to us who are asking and afflicted. He wishes to sweeten us for our good, not His. For see what evil it is if the world has become sweet to you, and God, who made the world, has become bitter. Shouldn't you be changed? Shouldn't you be corrected, so that you have a right heart? Rather, let the world be bitter and let God be sweet. Therefore, let our Lord God mix bitterness into this world, indeed, let him mix it. To flow here, to abound in delights, pleases to forget God. If he has any excess of money, he wishes to waste it, and not wishes to do something useful with it, to amass something heavenly. He wishes to destroy both money and himself and others on whom he spends money. Therefore, do you not wish for God to cut away the excess so that the whole does not rot from decay? He knows what he is doing. Let us leave it to him. Only give ourselves to be cured, not give advice to the physician. Turned to the Lord.

SERMO 16

TRACTATE OF SAINT AUGUSTINE THE BISHOP ON THAT WHICH IT IS WRITTEN:

"Who is the man who desires life"

"And desires to see good days?" This life is wished to be at least long because it cannot be eternal. The Spirit of God, calling the human race, by commanding what we ought to do and promising what we should hope for, first enflames our mind towards the reward, so that we may do what is commanded by loving good more than by fearing evil. Who is the man, he says, who desires life and loves to see good days? Thus he is asked who this may be, as if it could be found that it is not so. For who does not desire life? Who does not love to see good days? Therefore hear what follows, whoever you are who desire and love this, hear therefore what follows every man: Restrain, he says, your tongue from evil, and your lips from speaking deceit. Turn from evil and do good; seek peace and pursue it. Among all these, the former are in the command, the latter in the reward. For so that we restrain our tongue from evil and our lips from speaking deceit, turn from evil and do good, and seek peace, it is commanded to us. But it is promised to us that we may follow it. What peace is this, but the one which the world does not have? What is this peace, but the one that this life does not have, which in comparison to this life is not even life? For he would not have said about this life: Who is the man who desires life? And who would encourage by the subsequent commands to keep or prolong this, as if no one would desire even this. For this (worldly life) is at least wished to be long, because it cannot be everlasting; and through this a man can reach that life if he desired it to be not only long, but also good. However long this life may be, which will someday end? And what was long will be nothing, because even when it existed it did not remain, when it was prolonged it was not increased, nor did it grow by adding, because it was passing while coming.

Life is to be wished for more for its goodness than for its length.

Whoever you are, therefore, a lover of long life, be instead a lover of a good life. For if you wish to live wickedly, a long life will not truly be good, but will be a long evil. But see how absurd and twisted you are when you confess that you love life more than a villa, yet you wish to have a good villa rather than a good life. For by craving and scheming to obtain a good villa through deceit, you make your life wicked. Nevertheless, if you were asked, if you were questioned, whether you would rather lack a good villa by losing it or a bad life by dying, you would answer that, if you could not keep both, you would be more prepared for the villa to be taken from you. Why, then, is life not loved in such a way that it be good, which you prefer above all your goods, even if it is bad? Surely you wish it to be long, even if it is bad. Rather make it good, and do not fear that it will be short. For if it is spent anxiously, it will soon end; if it is spent well, it will be completed at leisure. For after this life, eternal life succeeds, blessed without fear, endlessly long. Indeed, it is about this that the one who says, "Who is the man who desires life and loves to see good days?" In this life, however, the Apostle commands us to redeem the time, for the days are evil. And what is redeeming the time, except when it is necessary that, even at the cost of temporal comforts, we gain time for seeking and pursuing eternal things? Hence the Lord also commands, saying: "If anyone wishes to go to law with you and take your tunic, give him your cloak as well." That you may indeed expend time lost in some temporal matter for the sake of peace, rather than the time you would have expended in a lawsuit.

It is not about the life of this time in the psalm.

Therefore, because the Spirit of God is not speaking of life and days of this time when it says: Who is the man who desires life and loves many days, that he may see good? the following context teaches us. For He adds such precepts by obeying which we may have life and see good days, so that this current life we now live and these days often have to be put aside to fulfill the same precepts. Therefore, if we understand this life which we are now in by what was said: Who is the man who desires life? and if we act according to the precepts connected for obtaining this life, what are we to do if someone powerful in malice threatens us with death unless we tell a false testimony? Indeed, if we do what is commanded here: Keep your tongue from evil, so that for the sake of this commandment we refuse the falsehood of testimony, we will seem to be deceived. Because we accepted to observe the commandment for the desire of keeping life, and by observing it we rather lost it. But if we understand life as eternally blessed, which God will give to those obeying Him after this life, about which the Lord said to someone: If you wish to enter into life, keep the commandments, then truly to the one asking: Who is the man who desires life? we will answer that we desire life if we even under the very strike of the attacker preserve truth in testimony, scorn death in the world, and obtain life in heaven.

Similarly, good days are not of this age.

Let us understand this about the good days. For if, for the sake of the days of this present age which are called good and are not, in the burial of the heart through the mounds of feasts, in the gulfs of luxury and drunkenness, in the most shameful delights of gluttony, if therefore for the sake of these days, as if for good days, we have received the precept that our lips should not speak deceit, often such days compel their lovers to speak deceit, and such days are denied to those who do not speak deceit. For what else is "speaking deceit" than to utter one thing with the lips while another is concealed in the chest? To this, above all, the business of flatterers has arisen, because almost always, lest they be kept away from rich tables and prepared feasts, by flattering they do not stay silent about falsehood, and they are kept away from these, if by loving God they speak the truth. Therefore, for the sake of those days which they think are good, to obtain them, they speak deceit, and they are denied them, if they do not speak deceit. There are other good days, therefore, about which we are admonished that if we desire to see them, we restrain our tongue from evil and do not speak deceit. Those days are not of this age; they are not possessed by the heaven that will pass away but by the one that will remain; they are not known by the land of the dying, but by the land of the living. Whoever understands and loves these days, let him restrain his tongue from evil; and if the terror of death compels him to evil, let his lips not speak deceit; and if he is invited to evil by days falsely called good, let him turn away from evil even among good, let him do good even among evil; let him seek peace which is not on earth and follow it in Him who made the heaven and the earth.

We must beware not to refuse the work whose reward is eternal life.

Therefore, Brothers, desire life and love to see good days where there will be no night, a life in which an evil day is not feared, good days in which life will never end. But if you love this reward, beware lest you reject the work whose reward it is. Seek that peace by following after it. Seek with your hands by night before God, and you will not be deceived. For what is with your hands, except in good work? What is by night, except in tribulation? What is before God, except in purity of conscience? By living thus and loving this, you will have God in contemplation, and in Him life without failing, good days without darkening, peace without dissension.

Sermons - Sermon 160

SERMO 160 Of the words of the Apostle (1 Cor 1:31):

"Let him who glories, glory in the Lord." AND FROM THE VERSE OF THE PSALM (70, 2):

"In your righteousness deliver me, and rescue me."

Let man glory in the Lord, not in his own righteousness.

We are advised by the Apostle, as follows: "Let him who boasts, boast in the Lord"; and to Him we have sung: "In Your righteousness rescue me, and deliver me." Therefore, to boast in the Lord means to boast not in one's own righteousness, but in His righteousness. This righteousness, however, was hidden from those who boast of their own righteousness. And this fault especially appeared in the Jews who rejected the New Testament and remained in the Old. They read and sang in vain and fruitlessly in their scriptures: "In Your righteousness rescue me." For, being ignorant of God's righteousness and seeking to establish their own, they did not submit to the righteousness of God. Therefore, let no one boast as if in his own righteousness, even if he is just. For to one boasting in his own righteousness it was said: "For what do you have that you did not receive?" So, let him who boasts, boast in the Lord. For what is safer than to boast in Him, of whom no one can be utterly confounded? For if you have boasted in a man, there can be found something in that man, indeed many things can be found in man, for which he who boasts in him may be confounded. But when you hear that one should not boast in man, surely not in yourself: for you are a human as well. Therefore, if you boast in yourself, you boast in a man; and this is more foolish and detestable. Because if you have boasted in some just or wise man, he does not boast in himself in whom you boast; but if you boast in yourself, you are neither wise nor just; and if it is not right to boast in a wise man, much less is it right to boast in an unwise man. But he who boasts in himself, boasts in an unwise man. For by this very fact he is convicted as unwise, that he boasts in himself. Therefore: "Let him who boasts, boast in the Lord." Nothing is safer, nothing is more secure. If you are capable, you have what you grasp, you will not be confounded boasting in the Lord. For nothing blameworthy can be found in Him, in whom you boast. Thus it was not said by him: "Rescue me in my righteousness"; but: "Rescue me in Your righteousness"; this was first said: "In You, O Lord, have I hoped, let me never be confounded." The Jews blinded by the opinion of their own righteousness. Is it not indeed for this reason, for which the Jews have erred, or by which other vice they have been excluded from evangelical grace, except that one which the Apostle did not keep silent about, which I mentioned a little earlier? He says, "I bear them witness that they have a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge." Where he praised, he also reproved. Wherefore are they at fault? Because, indeed, although they have a zeal for God, it is not according to knowledge. And as if we were consulting the Apostle, and we were to say, "What is it that you have said: not according to knowledge? What is this knowledge that they do not have, who nonetheless have a zeal for God?" Do you want to hear what knowledge they lack? Attend to what follows: "For being ignorant of God’s righteousness, and seeking to establish their own, they did not submit to the righteousness of God." Therefore, if you have a zeal for God and want to have it according to knowledge, and to belong to the New Testament, to which the Jews could not belong because they had a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge, acknowledge God's righteousness and do not seek to establish your own—this very thing, if you have it; if you live well, if you follow God's precepts, do not consider it your own. For this is indeed to seek to establish one's own righteousness. Acknowledge from whom you have received, and you have what you have received. For you do not have what you did not receive. But if you received it, why do you boast as if you did not receive it? For when you boast as if you did not receive it, you glory in yourself. And where is: "Let him who glories, glory in the Lord"? Hold fast to what is given, but acknowledge the giver. When the Lord promised that he would give his Spirit, he said: "If anyone thirsts, let him come to me and drink. Whoever believes in me, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water." From where is this river in you? Remember your former dryness. For if you had not been dry, you would not have thirsted; if you had not thirsted, you would not have drunk. What does it mean: "If you had not thirsted, you would not have drunk"? If you had not found yourself empty, you would not have believed in Christ. Before he said, "Out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water," he first said, "If anyone thirsts, let him come and drink." Therefore, you will have a river of living water because you drink; you drink because you thirst; but if you thirsted, why did you wish to glory as if from your own river? Therefore, "Let him who glories, glory in the Lord." To know Christ crucified is great wisdom. Pride prevents man from faith in Christ. And I, he said, brothers, coming to you, did not come with lofty words or wisdom, proclaiming to you the mystery of God. He also says: Did I say that I knew anything among you, except Jesus Christ, and Him crucified? And if he knew this alone, there is nothing he did not know. It is great to know Christ crucified; but before the eyes of little ones, he placed the treasure as if wrapped. Christ, he said, crucified. How great is this treasure inside! Then elsewhere, fearing for some, lest they be seduced from Christ through philosophy and vain deceit, he promised the treasure of the knowledge and wisdom of God in Christ. Beware, he said, lest anyone seduce you through philosophy and vain seduction, according to the elements of the world, not according to Christ, in whom are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. Christ crucified, the treasures of wisdom and knowledge hidden. Therefore, do not be deceived, he said, by the name of wisdom. Call upon this wrapping, pray that it be revealed to you. Foolish philosopher of this world, what you seek is nothing; whom you do not seek. What does it profit, because you thirst much, and you tread over the fountain? You despise humility because you do not understand majesty. For if they had known, they would never have crucified the Lord of glory. Jesus Christ, he said, crucified. I did not say I knew anything among you, except Jesus Christ, and Him crucified; His humility, which the proud mock, that it may be in them: You rebuked the proud; cursed are those who turn aside from Your commandments. And what is His commandment, except that we believe in Him, and love one another? In whom should we believe? In Christ crucified. What pride does not want to hear, let wisdom hear. His commandment is that we believe in Him. In whom? In Christ crucified. This is His commandment, that we believe in Christ crucified. This entirely; but this proud one, with raised neck, swelling throat, elevated tongue, puffed cheeks, mocks Christ crucified. Cursed, therefore, are those who turn aside from Your commandments. Why do they mock, except because they see a vile outer garment wrapped around, but do not see the hidden treasure inside? They see the flesh, they see a man, they see the cross, they see death; they despise these things. Wait, do not pass by, do not scorn, do not deride. Wait, search; perhaps there is something inside that delights you greatly. If you find what eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor has entered into the heart of man. The eye sees flesh; there is something within the flesh that the eye does not see. Your ear hears a voice; there is something there that the ear has not heard. It ascends into your heart, as if from earthly thoughts, a crucified and dead man; there is something there that has not entered into the heart of man. For it is usual thoughts that ascend into our hearts: It ascended, he said, into the heart of Moses to visit his brothers; this is the condition of man. And when the disciples doubted about the Lord Himself, and said among themselves, when they suddenly saw Him risen: He is, He is not; flesh is, spirit is; He says this to them: Why do thoughts arise in your hearts?

Let us then seek, if we can, not what can ascend into our heart, but to where our heart may merit to ascend. For he will be worthy to be glorified in reigning who has learned to glory in the Crucified. Hence the Apostle himself, seeing not only where to ascend, but also how to ascend; for many saw where but did not see how; they loved the height of the homeland but did not know the way of humility; knowing therefore the Apostle, and thinking and premeditating not only where but also how, he says: "Far be it from me to glory except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." He could have said: "In the wisdom of our Lord Jesus Christ," and he would have said truly; he could have: "In the majesty," and he would have said truly; he could have: "In the power," and he would have said truly; but he said: "In the cross." Where the philosopher of the world felt ashamed, there the Apostle found a treasure; by not despising the lowly wrapping, he reached the precious content. "Far be it from me," he says, "to glory except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." You have picked up a good burden, there is everything you sought; and you have shown what great thing lay hidden there. What assistance? "Through whom," he says, "the world is crucified to me and I to the world." When would the world be crucified to you if not through Him through whom the world was made, who was crucified for you? Therefore: "Let him who glories, glory in the Lord." Which Lord? Christ crucified. Where there is humility, there is majesty; where there is weakness, there is power; where there is death, there is life. If you wish to reach those things, do not despise these things. The sons of Zebedee, desiring greatness, are called to the way of humility.

You heard in the Gospel about the sons of Zebedee. They were seeking greatness, saying that one of them should sit at the right hand of such a master of the house, the other at his left. Truly, they were seeking great heights, great; but since they neglected the way, Christ calls them from where they wished to go, to that which they ought to go. For those who sought such great heights, what did He answer? Can you drink the cup that I am going to drink? What cup, if not the cup of humility, if not of suffering? Which, about to be drunk and transforming our weakness into Himself, He says to the Father: Father, if it is possible, let this cup pass from me. Transforming into Himself those who refused to drink such a cup and sought greatness, neglecting the path of humility, He said: Can you drink the cup that I am going to drink? You seek Christ on high; return to the crucified. You wish to reign and glory on the seats of Christ; first learn to say: May it never be for me to boast except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ. This is Christian teaching, the precept of humility, the commendation of humility, that we do not boast except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ. For it is not great in the wisdom of Christ to boast; it is great to boast in the cross of Christ; from where the impious insults you, from there may the pious boast; from where the proud insults, from there may the Christian boast. Do not be ashamed of the cross of Christ; therefore, you have received the very sign on your forehead as a seat of modesty. Reflect on your forehead, lest you fear the strange tongue.

Circumcision of the Old Testament, the cross of the New Testament as a sign. The sign of the Old Testament is circumcision in hidden flesh, the sign of the New Testament is the cross on the free forehead. For there is concealment here, revelation there; that is under a veil, this in the open. For as long as Moses is read, a veil lies upon their hearts. Why? Because they have not passed over to Christ. For when you pass over to Christ, the veil will be removed; so that you who had circumcision in secret may bear the cross on your forehead: "But we all with unveiled face, beholding as in a mirror the glory of the Lord, are being transformed into the same image from glory to glory," says the Apostle, "just as by the Spirit of the Lord." Do not attribute this to yourself, do not think it your own, lest, being ignorant of God's righteousness and seeking to establish your own, you do not submit to the righteousness of God. Pass over, therefore, to Christ, O you who glory in circumcision. For you wish to have glory from that which you are ashamed to show. It is a sign, it is true, it is commanded by God; but it is a sign of concealment. For the New Testament was veiled in the Old; the Old Testament is revealed in the New. Therefore, let the sign pass from hidden to manifest, and let that which lay hidden under the garment begin to be on the forehead. For who can doubt that Christ was foretold by that sign? Hence the stone blade: "And that rock was Christ." Hence the eighth day of circumcision, and the eighth day of resurrection. Therefore the Apostle, passing over from one to the other, coming from one to the other, passing over to Christ, so that the veil may be removed, knows where to glory. "But God forbid that I should boast except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." For what did he say previously? "For neither do those who are circumcised keep the law, but they desire to have you circumcised that they may boast in your flesh." What about you, Apostle? Transfer the sign to the forehead. "But God forbid that I should boast except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." Here I have, he says, that which I was ignorant of. The New Testament has come, that which was concealed has been revealed. "The people who sat in darkness have seen a great light." That which was hidden has been revealed to them; what was concealed, is now in the open. The very Rock has come, has circumcised us all in spirit, and has fixed the sign of His humility on the forehead of the redeemed.

Let glory be in the cross of Christ, not in our righteousness.

Now let the boasting be in the cross of Christ; let us not be ashamed of the humility of the Most High. How long shall there be a distinction of foods and the circumcision of the flesh? Their god is their belly, and their glory is in their shame. What was foretold to them, let it now be believed as accomplished. Let us not be ungrateful to him who came, if we awaited his coming. But why are the Jews deprived of, alienated from, and fugitives from this grace? Because they have a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge. What knowledge? Ignorant, he says, of God's righteousness, and seeking to establish their own; not holding God in precepts, and thinking to fulfill the precepts by their own strength, they avoided help. For Christ is the end of the law, the perfection of the law, for righteousness to everyone who believes. And what does Christ do? He justifies the ungodly. Indeed, believing in Him who justifies the ungodly, not the pious, but the ungodly; making pious whom He found ungodly: therefore, faith is credited to him as righteousness, who believes in Him who justifies the ungodly. For if Abraham was justified by works, as if he did it himself, as if he provided it for himself; he has glory, but not before God. But he who glories, let him glory in the Lord; and let him confidently say: "Deliver me in Your righteousness, and rescue me." For He delivers and rescues those who hope in Him; not attributing what they received to their own strength. And this is indeed wisdom, to know whose gift it is. Who said this? He who asked God to give him continence. What righteousness, what part of righteousness can be fulfilled without some continence? For it is pleasant to sin; for if it were not pleasant, it would not be done. But righteousness is less pleasant, or it does not please, or it pleases less than it ought. Whence is this, except from the sicknesses of the soul? Bread is loathed, and poison is delightful. How shall this sickness be healed, I implore you? Shall it be from ourselves and by ourselves? Since we were all capable of wounding ourselves, who among us is capable of curing what he has done? So also in the sins themselves, who does not wound himself when he wills? But not everyone heals himself when he wills. Therefore, let the soul be pious, let it be faithfully Christian, let it not be ungrateful for grace. Let the physician be acknowledged: a sick person never heals himself.

Sermons - Sermon 161

SERMO 161 ON THE WORDS OF THE APOSTLE, (1 COR 6:9, 10, 15, 19):

"Do not be deceived; neither fornicators, Neither idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate. NOR MALE BEDMATES... WILL INHERIT THE KINGDOM OF GOD. Do you not know that your bodies are members of Christ?

Fornication must be avoided. The fornicator injures Christ.

We have heard the Apostle, as it was read, reprimanding and restraining human desires; and saying: Do you not know that your bodies are members of Christ? Therefore, taking the members of Christ, shall I make them members of a prostitute? By no means! Therefore, he said our bodies are members of Christ; because Christ is our head, as he was made man for us, the head of which it is said: He is the Savior of our body. But his body is the Church. If, therefore, our Lord Jesus Christ had assumed only a human soul, only our souls would be his members; but since he also took a body, through which he is also the head to us, who consist of both soul and body, certainly our bodies are also his members. Therefore, if anyone wishing to commit fornication belittled himself, and despised himself in himself; let him not despise Christ in himself; let him not say: I will do it, I am nothing: All flesh is grass. But your body is a member of Christ. Where were you going? Return. Where did you wish to throw yourself? Spare Christ in yourself, recognize Christ in yourself. Therefore, taking the members of Christ, shall I make them members of a prostitute? For she is a prostitute who consents to you for adultery; and perhaps she herself, a Christian, takes the members of Christ and makes them members of an adulterer. You mutually despise Christ in yourselves, nor do you recognize your Lord, nor do you consider your price. But what kind of Lord is he, who made his servants his brothers? But it was little to make them his brothers, unless he made them his members. Has such great dignity become worthless? Because it was given so kindly, is no honor returned to it? If it were not given, it would be desired; because it was given, is it despised? The fornicator is injurious to the Holy Spirit.

These bodies of ours, which the Apostle says are members of Christ, because of the body of Christ, which He took from our type of body; therefore, the same Apostle says these bodies of ours are the temple within us of the Holy Spirit, whom we have from God. Because of the body of Christ, our bodies are members of Christ; because of the indwelling Spirit of Christ, our bodies are the temple of the Holy Spirit. Which of these do you despise in yourself? Christ, of whom you are a member? Or the Holy Spirit, of whose temple you are? The prostitute herself, who agrees with you to do evil, you perhaps do not dare to bring into your bedroom, where you have your marital bed; but you seek some low and vile place in your house, where you wallow in filth. You therefore show respect to the bedchamber of your wife, and do not respect the temple of your God? You do not bring an impure woman where you sleep with your wife, and yet you go to the impure woman, although you are the temple of God? I think the temple of God is better than the bedroom of your wife. Wherever you go, Jesus sees you; who made you, and redeemed you when lost, and died for you when you were dead. You do not recognize yourself; but He does not turn His eyes away from you, not to help, but to punish. For the eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous, and His ears are open to their prayers. Immediately He adds and terrifies those who give themselves false security, who say to themselves: I will act; for God does not deign to regard me doing such vile things. Hear what follows, attend to whose you are; for wherever you go, Jesus sees: But the face of the Lord is against evildoers, to cut off the memory of them from the earth. But from what earth? Remember where it is said; You are my hope, my portion in the land of the living.

Fornication excludes from the kingdom of God. For perhaps the evil, unjust, adulterer, shameless, fornicator rejoices because he commits, and he grows old in what lust does not grow old, and he says to himself: Surely it is true: But the face of the Lord is against those who do evil, to cut off the memory of them from the earth. Behold, I have already grown old, having committed so many things from my early age up to this day, I have buried many chaste ones before me, I have personally led the funerals of many chaste youths to the tomb, and I, shameless, have outlived the modest. What is meant when it is said that: The face of the Lord is against those who do evil, to cut off the memory of them from the earth? There is another land where there is no shameless one, there is another land in the kingdom of God. Do not be deceived; neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor men who practice homosexuality, nor thieves, nor the greedy, nor drunkards, nor revilers will inherit the kingdom of God. This means, He will cut off the memory of them from the earth. For many committing such things, they place hope for themselves; on account of those who living disastrously place hope for themselves in the kingdom of God, which they will not approach, it is said: He will cut off the memory of them from the earth. For there will be a new heaven, and a new earth, which the righteous will inhabit. There the wicked, there the evil, there the most worthless will not be allowed to dwell. Let him who is such choose now where he wishes to dwell, while there is time that he may be changed.

Two habitations, in fire or in the kingdom. How much is feared for the body.

There are indeed two dwellings: one in eternal fire, the other in the eternal kingdom. Suppose because in the eternal fire, one will be tormented differently than another; yet they will all be there, all will be tormented; less one, more another. Because it will be more tolerable for Sodom on the day of judgment than for another city; and some traverse sea and land to make one proselyte, and when they have made him, they make him twice the son of Gehenna than they are themselves. Suppose because some are twice, some simply; suppose because some more, some less; there is no region where you can choose a place for yourself. Whatever milder torments there are, they are worse than those which you dread in this world. Consider how you tremble if someone accuses you falsely, lest you be thrown into prison; and you yourself live badly against yourself, so that you will be thrown into the fire? You tremble, you are disturbed, you grow pale, you run to the church, you desire to see the bishop, you roll at his feet. He asks, why? Free me, you say. What is happening? Behold, he is accusing me falsely. And what is he going to do to you? Lord, I am shaken; Lord, I am sent to prison; have mercy on me, release me. Behold how the prison is feared, how confinement is feared; and the burning of Gehenna is not feared! Finally, when calamity increases, and severe pressure rages, and it rages to death when it seems good to a man not to die, not to be killed, everyone cries out that help should be given, all assistance is implored; help, run, for the soul. The whole aggravation of the calamity is because it is said, for the soul. Help should indeed be given, and aid should not be denied to this fear; what can be done should be done, by whom it can. The death of the soul is to be more feared than that of the body.

Nevertheless, I want to question the one who is in danger and who, by that name, stirs my innermost feelings; because he says: Run for the sake of your soul. To him, I easily respond: Indeed, I run for the sake of your flesh; would that you ran for the sake of your soul. And you should know that I run not for the sake of your soul, but for the sake of your body. I better listen to Christ telling the truth than to you murmuring in false fear. For the Lord himself says: Do not fear those who kill the body but cannot kill the soul. Certainly you want me to run for your soul; look, he whom you fear and under whose threats you tremble cannot kill your soul; he only rages against the body, you should not rage against your soul. It cannot be killed by him, but it can be by you; not by a spear, but by a tongue. The enemy who strikes you ends this life: But the mouth that lies kills the soul. From these things that men fear in this time, let them infer what they ought to fear. For he fears prison, and does not fear hell? He fears the torturers in interrogations, and does not fear the infernal angels? He fears temporal torment, and does not fear the punishments of eternal fire? In the end, he fears dying for a little while, and does not fear dying forever?

Life of the soul and life of the body, whence. The life of the soul is God.

He who is about to kill you, whom you fear, whom you dread, whom you flee, from whose terror you are not allowed to sleep, and if you see him in your dreams, when you sleep, you are terrified, what is he going to do to you? He is going to expel your soul from your flesh; see where your soul goes once expelled. For he cannot otherwise kill your flesh unless he expels your soul, by which your flesh lives. Indeed, by the presence of your soul your flesh lives, and as long as your soul is present in your flesh, your flesh must live. But he who seeks your death wants to eject your life from your flesh, by which your flesh lives. Do you think there is no life in which your soul itself lives? For indeed, the soul is a kind of life by which your flesh lives. Do you think there is no other life in which your soul itself lives; or how does your flesh have life, with the soul by which your flesh lives, and does your soul itself also have some life of its own? And just as the flesh, when it dies, expires its soul, its life; likewise, does your soul, when it dies, expire some of its own life? If we find out what this life is, not of your body, which is your soul; but the life of the life of your body, that is, the life of your soul; if we find it, from this death, in which you fear lest your soul be cast out of the flesh, I think that you should fear more that death, lest the life of your soul be cast out of your soul. Therefore, I shall speak briefly: and why am I held by many things? The life of the body is the soul, the life of the soul is God. The Spirit of God dwells in the soul, and through the soul in the body, so that our bodies are also the temple of the Holy Spirit, whom we have from God. For the Spirit comes to our soul; because the love of God is poured out in our hearts through the Holy Spirit, who has been given to us; and he who holds the chief place possesses everything. Indeed, in you that rules which is better. God holding what is better, that is, your heart, your mind, your soul, surely possesses also the inferior through the superior, which is your body. Therefore, let the enemy rage, threaten death, act if allowed, drive out your soul from the flesh; let not your soul drive out its own life. If you rightly lament, and think it miserably to say to your powerful enemy: Do not strike, spare my blood; does not God say to you: Have mercy on your soul, pleasing God? Perhaps your soul says: Ask him not to strike; for I release you. For if he strikes, I cannot stay with you. Ask him not to strike, if you wish me not to leave you. What does it say to you, if you wish me not to leave you? You yourself; for you who speak are a soul. Therefore, if he strikes the flesh, you flee, you go out, you depart, earth lies in earth. Where will that be which animated the earth? That which was given to you by the breath of God, where will it be? If it does not expire its own life, that is, its God, it will be in that which it did not lose, it will be in that which it did not exclude from itself. But if you obey the infirmity of your soul, saying to you: He strikes, and I release you; do you not fear God saying to you: You sin, and I release you?

Let us take useful fear from vain fear. Vain fear is the fear of all humans afraid of losing temporal things, things that will pass away, and trembling to depart, wanting always to delay what they cannot escape. This fear of humans is vain; and yet it exists, and it is intense, and it cannot be resisted. Hence, humans must be rebuked, reproached, mourned, and lamented, fearing to die and doing nothing else but dying more slowly. Why do they not act to not die? Because whatever they do, they do not accomplish not dying. But can they do something by which they achieve never dying? In no way. Indeed, whatever you do, however much you watch, wherever you flee, whatever defenses you seek, whatever riches you use to redeem yourself, whatever tricks you use to deceive the enemy; you do not deceive the fever. For you do nothing else to avoid dying quickly at the hands of the enemy but to die more slowly from a fever later. You have something to do so that you never die. If you fear death, love life. Your life is God, your life is Christ, your life is the Holy Spirit. You do not please them by acting badly. He does not inhabit a ruinous temple, he does not enter a filthy temple. But groan to Him, that He might cleanse a place for Himself; groan to Him, that He might build a temple for Himself; what you have destroyed, let Him construct; what you have ruined, let Him reform; what you have cast down, let Him raise up. Cry out to God, cry out inwardly, cry out where He hears; for you also sin where He sees; there cry out, where He hears.

One who does not do evil out of fear of punishment is not yet to be praised. Of what use is the fear of hell? And when you have corrected your fear, and have begun to fear usefully, not temporary torments, but the punishments of eternal fire, and therefore you will not be an adulterer; for from here we were speaking, because of the Apostle, who said: Your bodies are members of Christ; when therefore you will not begin to be an adulterer because you fear burning in everlasting fire, you are not yet to be praised; not indeed to be grieved for, as before, but yet not to be praised. For what great thing is it to fear punishment? It is great, but to love justice is greater. I ask you, and I find you out. You inspect my vocal question, and make of yourself a silent one. Therefore, I say to you: When you are overcome by lust, consenting, why do you not commit adultery? And you will answer: Because I fear hell, I fear the punishment of eternal fire, I fear the judgment of Christ, I fear the fellowship of the devil, lest I be punished by him, and burn with him. What? Shall I say: You fear wrongly? How did I tell you concerning the adversary, because he sought to kill your body. For there rightly I said: You fear wrongly; your Lord made you secure, saying: Fear not those who kill the body. Now, when you tell me: I fear hell, I fear to burn, I fear to be punished eternally; what shall I say? You fear wrongly? You fear vainly? I dare not, since the Lord himself, removing fear, subjected fear; and he said, where he said: Fear not those who kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do; but fear him who has power to kill both body and soul in the fire of hell; so I say to you, this one fear. Therefore, when the Lord has instilled fear, and vehemently instilled it, and doubled the threat by repeating the word, shall I say: You fear wrongly? I will not say these things. Fear plainly, nothing better you fear; there is nothing you more ought to fear. But I ask you: If God did not see you when you commit, nor anyone convict you in his judgment, would you do it? Look at yourself. For you cannot respond to all my words, inspect yourself. Would you do it? If you would do it, then you fear punishment, you do not yet love chastity, you do not yet have charity; you fear servilely; there is dread of evil, not yet love of good. But yet fear, so that this dread may guard you, so that it may lead you to love. For this fear, by which you fear hell, and therefore do not commit evil, holds you; and thus it does not allow the willing to sin inwardly. For fear is a certain guard, as if a pedagogue of the law; the letter threatens, it does not yet help with grace. Yet let fear guard you, while you abstain in fear, and love will come; it enters your heart, and as much as it enters, so much does fear depart. For fear did this, that you might not commit; love does this, that you may not want to commit, even if you could do it with impunity.

I have told you what to fear, I have told you what to desire. Seek charity, let charity enter; admit it by fearing to sin, admit love not sinning, admit love living well. That, as I began to say, entering, fear begins to exit. The more it enters, the less fear there will be. When it has fully entered, there will be no fear; because perfect love casts out fear. Therefore, charity enters, expels fear. However, it does not enter alone. It has its own fear with it, which it introduces itself; but it is chaste, enduring forever. There is the servile fear, by which you fear to burn with the devil; chaste fear is, by which you fear to displease God. Consider, dearest ones, and inquire the very human affections. A servant fears to offend his master, lest he commands him to be beaten, to be chained, to be imprisoned, to be ground in the mill. Fearing these, the servant does not sin; but when he perceives the eyes of his master absent and has no witness who can convict him, he acts. Why does he act? Because he feared punishment, he did not love justice. But a good man, a just man, a free man (for only the just is free; for everyone who commits sin is a slave of sin), delights in justice itself; and if he could sin without a witness, he dreads the witness even if God; and if he could hear God saying to him: I see you when you sin, I will not condemn you, but you displease me; unwilling to displease the eyes of the Father, not of a terrifying judge, he fears, not lest he be condemned, not lest he be punished, not lest he be tortured; but lest he offend the father's joy, lest he displease the eyes of the loving one. For if he loves himself, and feels his Lord loving him, he does not do what displeases the one loving him. The force of impure love.

Beware of wanton and dishonorable lovers; if anyone, driven by lascivious and depraved love for a woman, dresses himself differently than she likes, or adorns himself differently than she likes, she will say: "I do not want you to have such a cloak"; he does not have it; if during winter she says to him: "I love you in a cape"; he chooses to shiver rather than to displease her. Will she who is displeased condemn him? Will she send him to prison? Will she employ torturers? The only thing feared there is: "I will not see you"; the only thing trembled at there is: "You will not see my face." If an impudent woman says this and terrifies him, God says it and does not terrify? Surely very much; but if we love. But if we do not love, we are not terrified by that; but we are terrified as slaves, by fire, by Gehenna, by the most atrocious threats of Tartarus, by the most grievous torments of the devil and his angels and his punishments? We should be terrified from that. If we love less, we should at least fear those things.

Love makes sacred virgins.

Therefore, let there be no fornication. You are the temple of God, and the Spirit of God dwells in you. If anyone destroys the temple of God, God will destroy them. Marriages are lawful; seek nothing more. For no great burden is imposed. A greater love imposed a greater burden on virgins.

Virgins did not want what was permitted, so that they could more please Him to whom they devoted themselves. They desired that greater beauty of their heart. What do you command? As if they said: What do you command? Not to be adulteresses—this you command? Loving you, we do more than you command. Concerning virgins, the Apostle says, I have no commandment from the Lord. So why do they do this? But I give my advice. But those loving ones, to whom earthly marriages seemed worthless, who did not desire earthly embraces, so much accepted the command that they did not refuse the advice; in order to please more, they adorned themselves more. For the ornaments of this body, that is, of the outward man, the more they are desired, the greater the detriments to the inner man; but the less the ornaments of the outward man are desired, the more the inner man is adorned with beautiful morals. Hence Peter also says: Adorning themselves not in braided hair. For when he said: Adorning themselves, what else would be thought by carnal people than these visible ornaments? He promptly removed from thought what desire sought. Not, he says, in braided hair, nor in gold, or pearls, or costly clothing; but the hidden man of the heart, who is rich before God. For God would not give riches to the outward man and leave the inward one impoverished; He gave invisible riches to the invisible, and adorned the invisible invisibly. The love of sacred virgins.

Desiring these ornaments, the girls of God, holy virgins, neither sought what was permitted, nor consented to what they were compelled. For many also overcame the contrary efforts of their parents with the fire of heavenly love. The father was angry, the mother wept; she did not care, for before her eyes was the beautiful one surpassing the sons of men. Indeed, she desired to be adorned for him, so that she might entirely take care of him. For she who is married thinks on the things of the world, how she may please her husband; but she who is unmarried thinks on the things of God, how she may please God. See what it means to love. He did not say: She thinks how not to be condemned by God. For this fear is still that servile fear, a guardian indeed of the wicked, that they might abstain from evil, and by abstaining be worthy to admit love to themselves. But those women do not think about how not to be punished by God, but how to please God, with interior beauty, with the beauty of the hidden man, with the beauty of the heart, where they are naked to his eyes; naked within, not without; whole both within and without. Let virgins teach the married men and married women, not to go into adultery. They do more than is permitted; let them not do what is not permitted.

SERMO 162 ON THE WORDS OF THE APOSTLE (1 COR 6:9-20):

"Every sin whatsoever that a man commits,"

It is outside the body; but whoever commits fornication sins against his own body.

[FRAGMENT] A difficult question from the words of the Apostle. The question concerning the Epistle of the Corinthians of the blessed Apostle Paul, where he says: Every sin that a man commits is outside the body; but he who fornicates sins against his own body; I do not know if it can be resolved fully, although something can be said with probability by the grace of the Lord: for it is indeed profound. For when earlier in the same Epistle, the Apostle says: Do not be deceived; neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor male prostitutes, nor thieves, nor the greedy, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor swindlers will inherit the kingdom of God; and shortly after, he says: Do you not know that your bodies are members of Christ? Shall I then take the members of Christ and make them members of a prostitute? Never. Do you not know that he who joins himself to a prostitute becomes one body with her? For it is said, "The two shall become one flesh." But he who is joined to the Lord becomes one spirit with him. Flee fornication; and he adds there: Every sin that a man commits is outside the body; but he who fornicates sins against his own body. Do you not know that your body is a temple of the Holy Spirit within you, which you have from God, and you are not your own? For you were bought with a price; glorify God in your body. Therefore, after listing many dreadful sins of humans in this chapter, for which the kingdom of God will not be given, and which nevertheless can only be perpetrated through the body; indeed, it is the body of the faithful which he says is the temple of the Holy Spirit whom we have from God; and he asserts that the very members of our body are members of Christ; reproving and somewhat questioning, he says: Shall I then take the members of Christ and make them members of a prostitute? May it never be! He continues to say: Do you not know that he who joins himself to a prostitute becomes one body with her? For it is said, "The two will become one flesh;" but he who is joined to the Lord becomes one spirit with him; and he concludes: Flee fornication; yet he himself follows and says: Every sin that a man commits is outside the body; but he who fornicates sins against his own body; as if indeed the sins which he enumerated, saying: Do not be deceived; neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor male prostitutes, nor thieves, nor the greedy, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor swindlers will inherit the kingdom of God; could these crimes and immoral acts be committed or practiced only through the body? Who in his right mind could deny this? The entire passage the Apostle treated and defended because of the body already redeemed at a great price, that is, the precious blood of Christ, made the temple of the Holy Spirit by the Lord, so it would not be defiled by such immoralities, but rather be kept inviolate as God's dwelling. Why then did he wish to add this, from which a difficult question arises; that is, to say: Every sin that a man commits is outside the body; but he who fornicates sins against his own body; since whether it is fornication itself or other similar sins, which can only be perpetrated through the body, they are carried out and practiced only through the body itself? For who, I ask, can be (to pass over the other things mentioned above) a thief, or a drunkard, or a reviler, or a swindler, without the operation of this body? Nor can idolatry or greed achieve their purpose and fruition without the service of this body. What then is the meaning: Every sin that a man commits is outside the body; but he who fornicates sins against his own body? First, because a man, situated in this body, whatever he can unjustly desire only in his mind, cannot be said to commit outside this body, since it is clear he is doing this with carnal sense and carnal prudence, still surrounded by this body. For also what is written in the Psalm: The fool has said in his heart, "There is no God;" the same blessed Apostle Paul could not separate from bodily work, in the place where he says: We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, so that each may receive what is due for what he has done in the body, whether good or evil. For evidently, it is only in the body that the impious could say: There is no God. And to pass over the fact that in another Epistle the Teacher of the Gentiles says: Now the works of the flesh are manifest; which are fornication, impurity, lewdness, sorcery, enmity, strife, jealousy, wrath, disputes, dissensions, sects, envy, drunkenness, and things like these; I warn you, as I warned you before, that those who do such things will not inherit the kingdom of God. Do we not see that the other things he inserted there—jealousy, wrath, disputes, envy, sects—happen outside the body? And yet the Teacher of the Gentiles attributes these things to the works of the flesh in faith and truth. What then is the meaning: Every sin that a man commits is outside the body; and naming one sin only, fornication, he says: But he who fornicates sins against his own body? The resolution of the difficulty. Why is fornication alone said to be a sin against one's own body.

It is clear to even the slow and dull how difficult this question is; and if the Lord deigns to shed some light upon our pious intention and reveal it, we may be able to say something reasonable. For it seems that the blessed Apostle, in whom Christ spoke, either wished to exaggerate the evil of fornication above all other sins, which, although committed through the body, do not bind and subject the human mind to carnal desire in the way that the act of physical fornication does, where the powerful force of lust makes the mind coalesce with the body and be united with it like glue; so much so that at the moment and in the very experience of this great shame, nothing else is allowed to occupy the mind of a person but what this sinking and, in a way, the absorption of lust and carnal desire enslave the mind to, so that what has been said seems to be true: "But he who commits fornication sins against his own body"; because then the heart of the fornicating man becomes, so to speak, particularly and especially a servant of the body, especially at the time of the most wicked act itself; so much so that the Apostle, insisting on urging people to avoid this evil, said: "Should I then take the members of Christ and make them members of a harlot?" and exclaiming and detesting, he answered: "Never! Do you not know," he said, "that he who is joined to a harlot is one body with her? For the two," he said, "shall become one flesh." Could this be said of any other crimes of men? For it is possible for the human mind in other wicked deeds to perform one of those deeds and at the same time be distracted by other thoughts; which is not allowed for the mind at the time and act of fornication to be free to think of something else. For the whole person is so absorbed by and in the body that it can no longer be said that he is his own mind; but the whole person can be said to be entirely body, and the spirit going and not returning. Thus can we understand because: "Every sin that a man does is outside the body, but he who commits fornication sins against his own body"; as I said, the Apostle seems to wish to so exaggerate the evil of fornication, that in comparison, all other sins are considered to be outside the body in contrast to this one evil of fornication, where it is said to sin against one's own body due to the greater burning of lust, than which there is no higher, as the pleasure of the body holds and makes a slave captive.

General fornication, by which one does not adhere to God.

These things are said regarding the specific fornication of this body. But since fornication is not only specifically but also generally rebuked and named in the sacred Scriptures; let us try, with God's help, to say something plausible about this as well. Therefore, general fornication is openly manifested in the Psalm, where it says: "For behold, those who go far from you shall perish; you have destroyed all who are unfaithful to you." Where subsequently, how this general fornication can be avoided and escaped, is added, saying: "But for me it is good to be close to God." So that we may easily observe from this, that it is the general fornication of the human soul by which, not adhering to God, one adheres to the world. Whence the blessed apostle John says: "If anyone loves the world, the love of the Father is not in him." And the apostle James says: "Adulterers, do you not know that friendship with this world is enmity with God?" Briefly, therefore, it has been defined that one who has the love of the world cannot have the love of God; and that one who wishes to be a friend of the world is an enemy of God. To this also pertains what the Lord says in the Gospel: "No one can serve two masters; for either he will hate the one and love the other, or he will be devoted to the one and despise the other." And he concludes: "You cannot serve God and mammon." Therefore, this, as it has been said, is the general fornication of the soul, containing all else within itself, by which one does not adhere to God while adhering to the world; so that we may also understand according to this general fornication, what the Apostle says: "Every sin that a person commits is outside the body; but the fornicator sins against his own body." Because if the human soul does not fornicate by adhering to God, nor by adhering to the world, whatever other sins a person might incur due to the frailty of mortality, whether through ignorance, negligence, forgetfulness, or misunderstanding, this is as it is said: "Every sin that a person commits is outside the body;" because no sin of carnal or temporal desire can be found here; whence such a sin might be rightly said to be outside the body. But if the worldly man, adhering to the world, distances himself from God by fornicating from God himself, he sins against his own body; because by carnal desire for temporal and carnal things, the human soul is led and distracted by carnal sense and prudence, serving the creature rather than the Creator, who is blessed forever. The apostle's interpretation is twofold.

Thus, as it seems to me, in keeping with faith, it can be understood the evil of both types of fornication, both special and universal, in this one passage by so great a Doctor, where he says: "Every sin that a man commits is outside the body; but the one who commits fornication sins against his own body." [This means] either the Apostle might be emphasizing this particular fornication, which is rightly understood to sin against one’s own body because nowhere else does the whole human being so dedicate himself to the pleasure of the body, and is ineffably and inevitably attached to it, that in comparison to this great evil, other sins seem to be outside the body, even if they are performed through the body. Just as the force of certain lustful desires of fornication subjects the body to its condition and makes the body itself a slave to this worst evil, especially during the most impure acts; so that there is nothing else for the human mind to think or intend other than what it does in that body. But if the Apostle also wanted to signify general fornication, because he seems to have said: "Every sin that a man commits is outside the body; but the one who fornicates sins against his own body," it must be understood and taken in this way, that anyone who does not adhere to God but adheres to the world, loving and desiring all temporal things, may rightly be said to sin against his own body, that is, being wholly given over and subject to carnal concupiscence, as one who, being a servant to creation, becomes alienated from the Creator, through that beginning of all sins which is pride, the beginning of which pride, as it is written, is to withdraw from God. Anyone who is free from the general evil of fornication may be understood to be sinning outside the body, that is, outside the evil of all corporeal and temporal lust, just as has often been said. For only by the evil of carnal and general concupiscence does the soul fornicate from God through all things, being bound and tied to corporeal and temporal desires and pleasures, sins against its own body. Serving universally the concupiscence of the world and alienating oneself from God amounts to what is written: "The beginning of the pride of man is to apostatize from God." Therefore, to avoid the evil of general fornication, blessed John admonishes, saying: "Do not love the world or the things in the world; for the things in the world are the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, which is not from the Father but from the world. And the world passes away, and its lust; but he who does the will of God abides forever, as He abides forever." So, this love of the world, which includes in itself the universal lust of the world, is the general fornication, by which sin is committed against one’s own body; because the human spirit incessantly serves all the bodily, visible, and temporal desires and pleasures, deserted and abandoned by the Creator of all things.

Sermons - Sermon 162A

SERMON 162/A FROM THE READING OF THE APOSTLE (GAL 5:16-21), WHERE HE SAYS:

"I SHOW YOU A MORE EXCELLENT WAY."

AGAINST THE DONATISTS He can have all prophecy or all faith, and he who does not have charity.

It is good to speak of charity to those who love it, by which whatever is loved is loved well. For according to the Apostle, there is a most excellent way in charity. Just now it was read, we heard: "I show you," he said, "a more excellent way." Then he recounted many gifts, indeed distinguished and not to be undervalued; yet he said that these do not benefit men who do not have charity. Among these gifts he mentioned: speaking with the tongues of men and angels; having all prophecy, all knowledge, all faith, so as to remove mountains; giving all one's goods to the poor, giving one's body to be burned. All these are great and divine, but they must be set on the foundation of charity and spring from the root of charity. We would not dare to say that many of these gifts were in many who did not have charity, unless we were taught by examples, not of any men and sought from anywhere, but from the Holy Scriptures themselves, by which whoever does not have faith cannot have charity. But among the principal things that have been said, great there appears either prophecy or faith. What then of the others? If anyone having prophecy benefits not at all if he does not have charity, and anyone having faith cannot reach the kingdom of God, unless he has charity, what shall we say of the others? What is speaking in tongues compared to prophecy and faith? Or giving all one's goods to the poor, compared to prophecy? And giving one's body to be burned? Often reckless people do this in haste. Therefore there are two great things there, concerning which it is truly marvelous if we have been able to find any man having prophecy and not having charity, or having faith and not having charity.

Saul gives us an example of prophecy. The Book of Kingdoms provides us an example of prophecy. Saul was a persecutor of the holy David. While he was persecuting him and sent agents to seize him for punishment, those who were sent to bring David to be killed found him among the Prophets, where also was holy Samuel, the son of barren Hannah, who had asked him from the Lord to be conceived, received him from the Lord, and gave him to the Lord once born. So at that time, Samuel was there, at the time when David was there, the most outstanding of the Prophets; for David was anointed by him. Therefore, when he suffered persecution from Saul, he fled to Samuel, just as nowadays, for example, someone who suffers some persecution outside may flee to the Church. So he had fled there where not only Samuel, the most outstanding of all prophets, was, but also many other prophets. Among them, as they were prophesying, those sent by Saul came, who, as I said, were to seize him for death. The Spirit of God rushed upon them, and they began to prophesy—they who had come to bring a holy and just man of God to the sword and to take him from the midst of the Prophets; suddenly filled with the Spirit of God, they became prophets. This perhaps was due to their innocence; for they had not come willingly to seize him, but were sent by their king. And perhaps they had come to the place where David was, but were not going to do what Saul had ordered; perhaps they too were going to stay there. For even today these things happen. Sometimes an agent is sent by a great power to seize someone from the church; he does not dare to act against God, and so that he does not incur the sword himself, he stays there where he was sent to seize. Someone, therefore, might say in amazement that these persons suddenly became prophets because they were innocent; their own prophecy testified to their innocence. They came sent, but were not going to do what that wicked man had ordered. Let us believe this of these. Others were sent; and the Spirit of God rushed upon them, and they too began to prophesy. Let us also count these among the innocent by merit. A third set was sent; and the same happened to them. Let them all have been innocent. When they delayed and what Saul had ordered was not being done, he came himself. Was he then also innocent? Was he too sent by some power and not perverted by his own will? And yet, the Spirit of God rushed upon him, and he began to prophesy. Behold, Saul prophesies, having prophecy, but not having charity. A certain vessel was made, which might be touched by the Spirit, not that it might be cleansed by the Spirit. The impure spirit can touch, and is not defiled. For the Spirit of God touches some hearts to prophesy, but does not cleanse them. And if it touches but does not cleanse, is the Spirit itself perhaps defiled? For it is of the divine substance to touch all things, yet nowhere be defiled. Nor be amazed if this light which is poured out from heaven touches all defiled things spread everywhere, yet nowhere is defiled by the defiled. Not only this light from heaven, but also that which is sent from a lamp, touches wherever you lead the light; and perhaps whoever passes through a sewer, himself if he touches it is defiled; but if he carries a lamp, the lamp's brightness passes over everything, nowhere contracting a stain. If God was able to grant this to corporeal lights, can the true, eternal, and unchangeable light itself anywhere be defiled? Or can the light of God be absent anywhere, of which it is said: "It touches from end to end strongly, and arranges all things sweetly"? Therefore, it touches what it wills, and cleanses what it wills; not everything it touches does it cleanse, but what it cleanses does it touch. Thus, the Spirit of God did not cleanse Saul the persecutor, but yet touched him to prophesy. Caiaphas, the chief priest, was a persecutor of Christ; yet he spoke a prophecy when he said: "It is expedient that one man should die, and not the whole nation perish." The Evangelist followed up this prophecy and said: "This he did not say of himself, but, being high priest, he prophesied." Caiaphas prophesied, Saul prophesied; they had prophecy, but they did not have charity. Did Caiaphas have charity, who persecuted the Son of God, whom charity brought to us? Did Saul have charity, who persecuted him by whose hand he had been delivered from his enemies, not only being envious but also ungrateful? Therefore, we have proven that prophecy can exist in someone and charity not be present. But this prophecy cannot benefit them, according to the Apostle: "If I have not charity," he says, "I am nothing." He does not say: Prophecy is nothing, or faith is nothing; but: I am nothing, if I do not have charity. Having great things amounts to nothing; although one may have great things, he is nothing; indeed, those great things that he has, he does not have to help him, but has them to his judgment. It is not great to possess great things, but to use great things well is great; moreover, he does not use them well, who does not have charity. Indeed, no one uses anything well, unless a good will; a good will cannot be, where charity is not.

We find that demons believed what we believe, and do not love what we love.

What about faith? Do we find someone who has faith but does not have charity? Many are those who believe but do not love. Nor should we count only humans; we find demons who believed what we believe but do not love what we love. For when the Apostle James reproved those who thought it sufficient to believe and did not wish to live well, which cannot be done without charity—since a good life pertains to charity, and one who has charity cannot live badly; because living well itself is nothing other than being filled with charity—therefore, when some boasted that they believed in God and did not wish to live well, and suitably to the great faith which they had received, he compared them to the demons, saying: You say that there is one God. You do well; the demons also believe and tremble. If, therefore, you only believe and do not love, you still have something in common with the demons. Peter said: You are the Son of God; and it was said to him: Blessed are you, Simon Bar-Jonah, because flesh and blood did not reveal this to you, but my Father who is in heaven. We also find demons who said: What have we to do with you, Son of God? The Apostles confess the Son of God, and the demons confess the Son of God; the confession appears the same, the love is different. They believe and love; they believe and fear; love expects a reward, fear expects punishment. Therefore, we find that someone can have faith and not have charity. Therefore, let no one boast about any gift of the Church, if perhaps they excel in the Church with some gift attributed to them, but let them see whether they have charity. For the same Apostle Paul spoke and enumerated many gifts of God in the members of Christ, which is the Church; and he said that individual gifts were attributed to the members, nor could it be that all have one gift. No one, however, will be left without a gift; he said, Apostles, Prophets, Teachers, interpreters, those who speak in tongues, those with the gift of healing, those who provide aid, those who govern, different kinds of tongues. These were spoken; and we see some in some, others in others. Let no one be saddened, therefore, that what is granted to another is not granted to them; let them have charity, let them not envy the one who has it, and with them, they have what they do not have. For whatever my brother has, if I do not envy and love him, is mine. I do not have it in me, but I have it in him; it would not be mine if we were not in one body and under one head.

Let us love one another, as the members love themselves in the body. The left hand, for example, in the body has a ring, and the right does not; has that one remained without adornment? Consider the individual hands, and you will see one has it, the other does not; consider the connection of the body, to which both hands adhere, and see that which does not have it, has it in the one that does. The eyes see where to go, the feet go where the eyes look; nor can the feet see, nor the eyes walk. But the foot responds to you: I also have light, but not in myself, but in the eye; for the eye does not see for itself, and does not see for me. And the eyes say: We also walk, not in ourselves, but in the feet; for the feet do not carry themselves, and we are not carried. Therefore each member performs its own tasks, assigned to them, that the mind commands; all, however, established in one body, and preserving unity; nor do they arrogate to themselves what other members have if perhaps those members do not have; nor do they think it foreign to themselves what they have together in one body. Finally, brothers, if any member of the body encounters some discomfort, which members would deny their help? What seems so last in a man as the foot? And in the foot itself, what is so last as the sole? And in the sole itself, what is so last as the skin itself, where the earth is trodden? Yet this last part is so retained in the entire structure of the body, that if a thorn pricks it in that place, all members come together to help extract the thorn; immediately the knees bend, the spine curves, not the one that is stuck, but the one that holds the whole back; it sits down, that the thorn may be extracted; sitting down to do this, it concerns the whole body. How small is the place in discomfort! So small a place it is, as much as the thorn could prick; and yet the discomfort of that small and last place is not abandoned by the whole body; the other members feel no pain, and in that one place all feel pain. Hence, the Apostle gave an example of charity, urging us to love one another just as the members love themselves in the body: If one member suffers, he says, all the members suffer with it; and if one member is glorified, all the members rejoice with it. You are the body of Christ and members individually. If the members love themselves, having a head on earth, how much more should the members love themselves, whose head is in heaven? Certainly, the members do not love themselves if they are deserted by their head; but since that head is so head, and exalted, and placed in heaven at the right hand of the Father, yet labors on earth, not in itself, but in its members, so that it says at the end: I was hungry, I was thirsty, I was a stranger, when it will be said to him: When did we see you hungry and thirsty? and as if he answers: I was the head in heaven, but on earth my members were thirsty - finally he says: Inasmuch as you did it to one of the least of these my brothers, you did it to me, and again to those not doing it: Inasmuch as you did it not to one of the least of these, you did it not to me - we are connected to this head only through charity. This is in the members of Christ what health is in the members of the body. For thus, brothers, we see each individual member performing its own proper work in their offices, so that the eye sees but does not work; the hand, however, works but does not see; the ear hears, but neither sees nor works; the tongue speaks, but neither hears nor sees; and while they are distinct and separate in their individual offices, yet being bound together in the unity of the body, they have something in common in all. The offices are different, but the health is one. Thus, in the members of Christ, charity is what health is in the members of the body. The eye is placed in a better position, in a lofty place, and as if stationed in a citadel for counsel, whence it may look out, whence it may see, whence it may show; great honor is in the eyes, both in their position, their sharper sense, their agility, and a certain power that other members do not have. Accordingly, people often swear by their eyes rather than by any other member. No one has ever said to someone, "I love you as much as my ears"; and the sense of hearing is as close as, and next to, the eyes in sensitivity. What shall I say of the others? Men daily say, "I love you as my own eyes." And the Apostle, signifying the greater affection held for the eyes than for other members, when he said that he was beloved by the Church of God, said, "For I bear you witness, that if it had been possible, you would have plucked out your eyes and given them to me." Therefore, nothing in the body is more sublime and more honorable than the eyes; and nothing in the body is perhaps more lowly than the little toe of the foot. While these things are so, it is still advantageous for the body to be a finger and to be healthy than to be an eye and suffer inflammation; for the health, which is common to all members, is more valuable than the individual offices. Thus, you see in the Church a person having some small gift, yet possessing charity; another person perhaps more eminent in the Church with some greater gift, and yet not having charity. One might be the little toe, the other might be the eye; the one who has the ability to maintain health pertains more to the unity of the body. Finally, whatever in the body is diseased is a trouble to the whole; and all the members apply their efforts so that what is diseased may be healed, and it is often healed. But if it is not healed and has taken on such decay that it cannot be healed, it is consulted for the benefit of the whole body that it be cut off from the unity of the body.

Donatus could not hold the unity of the Church because he did not have charity. So there was a certain Donatus, like an eye in the body, thus it may be; we do not know what he was like, but absolutely he was as he was said to be; what did the excellence of honor and glory benefit him?

He could not hold on to health because he lacked charity. Finally, these people have decayed so much that they had to be necessarily cut off; and what they say they possess, they are the worms of decay; cut-off worms, they cannot accept health. Indeed, a member accepts health as long as it is not cut off from the body; for health flows from the rest of the healthy parts to the place of the wound; but when a member where there is a wound has been cut off, no way or means is found for health to come to it. Therefore, they are also compared to pruned branches, and the evangelical reading concurs with the apostolic reading. For the Lord there also especially commended to us that we remain in Him through charity: I am, He says, the vine, you are the branches, my Father is the farmer. Every branch in me that bears fruit, He prunes so that it may bear more fruit; and every branch that does not bear fruit in me, He cuts off. The fruit comes from that charity, for fruit comes only from the root. The Apostle also says: Being rooted and grounded in charity. Therefore, there is the root from which all fruit arises. Whoever begins to dissent from the root, even if it seems to remain somewhat, is either secretly cut off or openly to be cut off too; for he can by no means bear fruit. They were at one time in unity. They were cut off. From where were they cut off? From unity. But you say we have been cut off, they say. What are we to do? I say: You are cut off; you say: We are cut off. Let God judge. Have we deferred the question and sent it to God's judgment? Not plainly. In many matters, we do this where God's sentence has not yet been revealed; but when it appears, we use it and do not delay. I bring forth the scripture and see who has been cut off from where. If the Scripture bears witness to the part of Donatus, to a Church established in some part of the world, just as the part of Donatus is established in part of Africa, let them say that we are cut off, and let them say that they are rooted. But if the Scripture does not bear witness except to the Church spread throughout the whole world, why do we seek a human judge for our dispute? We have God; he does not yet preside in judgment, but he already presides in the Gospel.

Crispinus the Donatist appealed to the emperor.

Crispinus the heretic has just been judged. But what does he say? Have I been defeated by an evangelical statement? Claiming that he has not been defeated because the proconsul judged against him, not Christ. If, therefore, he holds the judgment of man in contempt, why did he appeal from the proconsul to the emperor? He himself demanded the judgment of the proconsul; he said: Hear me, I am not a heretic. Does the judgment of the one you demanded judgment from displease you? Why? Because he judged against you. If he had judged for you, he would have judged well; because he judged against you, he judged poorly. Before he judged, he was a good judge, to whom you said: I am not a heretic, hear me. But the proconsul judged, he says, according to the laws of the emperors, not according to the laws of the Gospel. If the proconsul judged according to the laws of the emperors; if, therefore, the emperors judge badly against you, why did you appeal from the proconsul to their judgment? Were there already emperors' laws against you, or were there not yet? If there were not yet, the proconsul did not judge according to them; if there were already, would the emperors judge for you against their own laws? Then I ask you: What are those emperors' laws against you? What was done? Teach me. For it is clear and undeniable that there are many emperors' laws against them. How did this happen? How did this come about? Did we perhaps persecute, and say many bad things to the emperors about you? This they indeed say to those whom they miserably deceive and mislead. For the cause, as it was carried out at that time, they completely hide from those they want to deceive. But, no matter how much they hide it, it is unearthed, it comes to light, it is published, it is brought to the knowledge even of the unwilling and the reluctant. Even though they close their eyes and are unwilling to see the light, the light itself may strike them. They cannot ignore the evident; they cannot turn away from what is obvious; they cannot conceal what is clear. Let us urge them with manifest truth. You demanded the emperor's judgment. They say, We are lying. Public records exist. The Donatists themselves, of the party of Majorinus, who was the first to be ordained against Caecilian, approached the then proconsul Anulinus and presented accusatory documents against Caecilian, signed with a seal, stating the crimes they had written down in that document against Caecilian, and requesting that the same accusation be sent to the emperor's court. There exists a report from Proconsul Anulinus writing to Emperor Constantine, that men from Majorinus' party came to him with documents of accusation against Caecilian, asking that these same documents be sent to the emperor; and he says he did what they asked. The emperor wrote to Bishop Melchiades and Marcus, transferring the ecclesiastical case to them, and removing it from himself. In the same letters, the emperor writes that he sent the documents sent by Anulinus; and in those same letters, it is unknown what those documents are, but in Anulinus' report, it is known, which today is contained in public records. Then the same Constantine writes to Anulinus to send the parties to Rome for episcopal judgment. Anulinus also reports in the end that he sent the parties. Therefore, you referred to the emperor; you brought the matter of the Church to human power. He was better than you: for you were referring to the emperor, he to the bishops. The case was heard in episcopal judgment, with them first accusing. The sentence was given in favor of Caecilian. They, not content with the ecclesiastical judgment, began to murmur, again seeking the imperial judgment after the episcopal judgment. He granted another ecclesiastical one at Arles; even from that judgment, they appealed to the emperor himself. Overcome by their importunity, he wanted to take up and investigate the case himself. He took it up, investigated it, judged Caecilian to be most innocent; and now, all the emperors' decrees are against them. What wonder? You dared to challenge the decision of him whose judgment you demanded? Why did you want to refer the judgment to him? You had the Church in Africa; did you not have it in the entire world? Where were they going from where they had already cut themselves off? They were no longer clinging to the Church; but the emperor was clinging to it, to whom the judgment was referred. Therefore, that most gentle man wanted the bishops to judge; and he yielded to them afterward, so that he might also judge. Hence the laws are against you; see if they are not against you. First, you yourselves were; you were the first accusers, you the last appellants, you the latest murmurers. But did you say you were defeated by the Gospel? You have been defeated by that judgment which you yourself chose.

Aug. exhorts to preserve the unity of the Church. But we do not refuse the sentence of the Gospel: clearly, even if it did not speak, we would read, we would discover, we would show. Let the Gospel be read; let us see where the Lord Jesus Christ says the Church is. Certainly, our ears and hearts should be open to it; let us listen to Him, let Him tell us where the Church is. If He says that His Church is in Africa, let us all flock to Donatus’s side; if He says that His Church is throughout the whole world, let the severed members return to the body; for the branches are not so broken off that they cannot be grafted back in. You have the apostle Paul saying: "But you say: The branches were broken off that I might be grafted in." Well. They were broken off because of unbelief; but you stand by faith. Do not be haughty, but fear. For if God did not spare the natural branches, neither will He spare you. For the Jews were broken off like natural branches, and the Gentiles were grafted in as a wild olive shoot into the olive tree. From these grafted branches and from this grafted wild olive tree, we are all made partakers of the olive tree. But, as the Apostle had threatened the boasting branches of the wild olive, they became so proud, that along with the natural ones who had been cut off before, they themselves deserved to be cut off for their pride. But what does the Apostle say? "And they also, if they do not continue in unbelief, will be grafted in again; and you, if you do not continue in the faith, will be cut off." No one should boast while in the vine, no one outside the vine should despair: if you boast while in the vine, take heed lest you be cut off; if they are placed outside the vine, let them not despair, let them dare to be grafted in. For they are not to be grafted in by their own hand. For he said: "God is able to graft them in again." They should not say: "How can it be, a thing cut off, a broken branch, that it should be grafted in again?" You say rightly that it cannot be done, if you ask human ability, not if you ask divine majesty. For what? Can any of the husbandmen do what the Lord has already done? He took the wild olive tree and grafted it into the olive tree; and the wild olive tree, grafted into the olive tree, did not bear bitter berries, but olives. Let one of them now do the same, let him graft the wild olive tree into the olive tree; he will see that nothing comes forth but the berries of the wild olive tree. Thus God was able, not to graft the olive tree into the wild olive tree, but to graft the wild olive tree into the olive tree, and to make the wild olive tree a partaker of the fatness of the olive tree, so that stripped of bitterness, it may be clothed with fatness; and will He not be able to graft you in again, cut off through pride, through humility? Well, you say, you encourage me, but first show me myself cut off; lest perhaps you should encourage yourself to come to me, rather than me to be grafted into you. I dare to say: Hear me; and yet I fear to say: Hear me; for I fear lest he scorn mankind. Rather, I encourage him to scorn mankind; for if he scorned mankind, he would not be on Donatus’s side; Donatus was a human being. Therefore, if we speak our own words, let us be scorned; if we speak the words of Christ, let Him be heard, for He is not heard in vain, and He is not scorned in vain; for He is heard to reward, not heard to punish. Let us listen to Him: let the Lord Himself tell us. A schismatic falsely claims to be a Catholic.

He shows the Church in countless places; nevertheless, let me mention one instance. After the resurrection, as you know, brothers, he showed himself to his disciples, showed them his scars, allowed them to touch, not just to see. However, those who were holding, touching, and recognizing him still hesitated for joy, as the Gospel teaches us, which must be believed, which it is unlawful not to believe. But the Lord, to those still hesitating for joy and doubting, brought confirmation from the Scriptures, and said: These are the words I spoke to you while I was still with you, that everything written about me in the Law of Moses, the Prophets, and the Psalms must be fulfilled. Then he opened their minds so they could understand the Scriptures, and he said to them: This is what is written: The Messiah will suffer and rise from the dead on the third day, and repentance for the forgiveness of sins will be preached in his name to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. Are you not there? I am there. Why do you expect a man to judge you from a tribunal? Listen to Christ from the Gospel. To all nations, he says, beginning from Jerusalem. Are you there? Do you communicate with all nations? Do you communicate with that Church which is spread through all nations, beginning from Jerusalem? If you communicate, you are there, you are in the vine, you are not cut off; for that is the vine that grew and filled the whole earth, the body of Christ, the Church of Christ, whose head is in heaven. But if you communicate only with Africans, and secretly send from Africa those who console pilgrims, do you not find that you have remained in part, cut off from the whole? What did you say in the judgment of the proconsul? I am Catholic.

That is the voice; it is recited from the Acts. Hold everything as a Catholic; for 'holon' means whole and the Church is called Catholic because it is throughout the whole. Was it called χαθαμεριχ■ and not Catholic? "M■ρος" means part, "■λον" means whole; it is called "Catholic" from the Greek word according to the whole. So are you in communication with the universe? No, you say. Then you are in part; how are you Catholic? There is a great difference between whole and part, hence the name Catholic. For you took the name from the party of Donatus; the Catholic took the name from the whole world. But we say it is in the whole universe, and does God perchance not say so? I mentioned the Gospel, I quoted from the Gospel. To all nations, he says, beginning from Jerusalem. Did it not come to Africa from there? If it began from Jerusalem, by filling everything, it came to you, not by drying up. Who says: A stream was drawn from the source, to come to me; it dried up on the way, and came to me? If it dried up on the way, how did it reach you? Certainly, by filling everything, it reached you. Ungrateful stream, why do you blaspheme the source? If it did not flow, you would not be filled. But I fear, that you have dried up; for every stream cut off from the source must necessarily dry up. They speak harshly against the Church out of dryness; they would speak mildly if they were watered. I am Catholic. What does it mean to be Catholic? A man from Numidia? Ask the Greeks at least. Surely, "Catholic" is not a Punic word, but a Greek word; seek an interpreter. Rightly you err in language, who does not consent with all languages.

They were speaking in all languages, who were filled by the Holy Spirit. What did it signify? When the Spirit came down from heaven and filled those who had believed in Christ, they spoke in all languages; and this was a sign at that time of having received the Holy Spirit, if anyone spoke in the languages of all. Is the Holy Spirit not given to the faithful now? Far be it from us to believe this, otherwise we would have no hope. And they certainly confess that the Holy Spirit is given to the faithful; and we say this, we believe this, we most especially and solely acknowledge that it happens in the Catholic Church. But if they are Catholics, the Holy Spirit is given there; if we are Catholics, the Holy Spirit is given here; let us not now inquire what difference there is, who are Catholics; it is evident that the Holy Spirit is given. Why do those who receive the Holy Spirit now not speak in all languages, unless because it was then prefigured in a few what would later be shown in all? For what did the Holy Spirit predict, stirring the hearts of those whom he had then filled, and teaching them all languages? Scarcely does a man learn two or three, either from teachers or from regions in which he stays through some familiarity; very rarely three or four languages. They spoke in all languages, who were filled by the Holy Spirit; and truly they spoke at once, not gradually learning. What then did the Spirit show at that time? Tell me, why does he not do this now, unless because he was doing something symbolically? What did he signify, if not that the Gospel would be in all languages in the future? I dare to say, even now the Church speaks in all languages; for in all languages the Gospel proclaims; and what I was saying of members, I also say of languages. And just as the eye says: The foot walks for me, so also the foot says: The eye sees for me; thus I say too: My tongue is Greek, my tongue is Hebrew, my tongue is Syrian; for one faith holds all, one bond of charity includes all. That which was demonstrated by the Lord, was foretold beforehand by the Prophets: Their sound has gone out into all the earth, and their words to the ends of the world. Behold how far the Church has grown, which is called Catholic by all. And see because all languages have gone through all lands: There are no languages nor speeches in which their voices are not heard. The Church spread everywhere calls to all, that they may return and be grafted in.

Therefore, this Church I hold, but you do not; if therefore you are cut off, acknowledge from where you are cut off. Return, and be grafted in, lest you wither and be cast into the fire. The Prophets speak, the Apostles speak, the Lord speaks about the Church spread throughout the whole world: against you all these speak judgment. From the proconsul to the imperial judgement: from the Gospel, where? Perhaps to Donatus? Will Donatus judge against Christ, or does Christ judge Donatus? What will Donatus say to you? I preached my Christ from Africa. What will he say? Perhaps: I opposed myself for Christ, and I succeeded Christ? This remains for him to say, because he dared to cut men off from the body, because he succeeded Christ. Behold the judgment of Christ, behold the Gospels. Through all nations, he says, beginning from Jerusalem. It began from Jerusalem: there the Holy Spirit came; there were the Apostles, when it came upon them; from there the Gospel began to be preached, from there to be spread through all nations, from there afterward it came to Africa. Where it came afterward, did it abandon them? By no means did it abandon, if they do not wish it. For we African too; certainly the Gospel, which came to Africa, remains here in catholic Africans, just as it remains in all nations. For there are heretics through all nations, some there, some here; and unknown Africans are not those who are in those nations. They are cut off from the vine. For the Catholic knows all; they themselves do not know. For indeed the vine, from which the branches are cut off, knows all the branches, both those that remain in it, and those that are cut off from it. For indeed the Catholic Church is spread everywhere. Those branches, where they are cut off, there they remained; they could not come to other parts and other parts. But this, spread everywhere, holds its own everywhere, mourns the cut off everywhere; it cries out to all, that they should return and be grafted in. Its cry is not heard, but yet the breasts of charity do not cease to flow with exhortation. It is solicitous for the cut off; it cries out in Africa to the Donatists, it cries out in the East against the Arians, against the Photinians, against others and others. For as it is spread everywhere, it finds everywhere against whom to cry out; for they were in it, and they are cut off from it. The branches began to be unfruitful, and they are cut off; if they do not remain in unbelief, they will be grafted in again. Hear these things, brothers, with fear, lest you become proud; with charity, so that you may also pray for them. Turned to the Lord.

Sermon 162/B TREATISE OF SAINT AUGUSTINE ON THE BENT WOMAN

[FRAGMENT] The bent woman is a symbol of the human race.

We have heard the Apostle saying to us: "We act as ambassadors for Christ, exhorting you to be reconciled to God." He would not exhort us to be reconciled unless we had been enemies. Therefore, the whole world was an enemy of the Savior, a friend of the captor; that is, an enemy of God and a friend of the devil. And the whole human race, like that woman, was bent down to the earth. Now, understanding these enemies, someone cries out against them and says to God: "They have bent down my soul." The devil and his angels have bent the souls of men down to the earth, meaning that they are inclined to what is temporal and earthly, not seeking the things above. For indeed this is what the Lord says about that woman, whom Satan had bound for eighteen years; and now it was necessary for her to be freed from her bond on the Sabbath day. However, they accused the one who raised her up. Who, if not the "bent ones"? Since they did not understand the very things God had commanded, they looked upon them with earthly hearts. For they celebrated the sacrament of Baptism carnally, not seeing it spiritually.

Sermons - Sermon 162C

"Do not hope to find perfect justice (or sanctity) in human affairs, much less in complex societies. It is Christ alone who gives the perfection that we seek; He, who is the just judge, will distribute to each according to his deeds."

Sermon of Blessed Augustine on the words of the Apostle to the Galatians where Paul rebukes Peter, Where first he teaches what kind of person a bishop ought to be. A just bishop makes the people of God joyful.

We know, brothers, and with sure love we trust that you rejoice with us when you see righteousness in us. For it is fitting that, when the holy ones of God see righteous priests, they rejoice over their shepherds and, in turn, gladden them with their conduct. And so also we have just sung to the Lord our God, with one voice and one heart: "May Your priests be clothed with righteousness, and Your saints will exult in joy"; seeing them clothed in righteousness, they will indeed rejoice with true joy and entirely genuine affection, without any flattery. Therefore, that you may exult with joy, holy ones of God, it is necessary that we be clothed with righteousness and offer you an example for every good work. But you who wish to rejoice over us, pray for us. For righteousness must be put on, as we have sung. And who gives this garment, if not He who, after the son's error and perdition, brought forth the first robe? For in the very matter that righteousness is commended as a garment, it is implied that we do not have it from ourselves ... A fragment preserved by Bede.

It is therefore necessary for a bishop to be irreproachable. Who denies this? But since it is necessary for a bishop to be irreproachable, is it fitting for a Christian to be reprehensible? "Bishop" is a Greek name, but in Latin it can be said as "overseer" or "visitor." We are bishops, but with you, we are Christians. We are properly called from visitation, all are commonly from anointing. If the anointing is common, then the struggle is common. For why do we visit, if there is nothing good that we see in you?

Peter rebuked by Paul.

... may be found. If we were to desire this, if we were to dare this with headlong rashness, surely we would be frightened by today's reading. For we all heard when the epistle of the apostle Paul to the Galatians was read: "When Peter came to Antioch, I withstood him to his face, because he was to be blamed." Peter was to be blamed, and shall I dare to profess myself without any blame at all? I, a weak sheep, should not fear this whirlpool, when I see the ram drying its fleece? He raised himself firmly from this whirlpool; if I fall in, who will find me? Therefore, I will avoid the swelling wave, I will not throw myself in, I will not plunge, even if I were entirely conscious that nothing could be found in me by men to blame. The eyes of God are different, those eyes are different to which it was truly said: "No one living will be justified in your sight." And yet Peter, as we heard just now when it was read, was blamed even by men. Therefore the Christian mind must be entirely free of this rashness, not daring to profess such a life that even men could not find anything to blame. Let a man blame, if there is something to blame; absolutely let him blame; if I take it badly, let him blame me twice. For Peter acted so that he was blamed once, when he bore his critic with equanimity; he did not provide an example of all-around perfection, like Christ, but he provided an example of complete humility. He accepted the critic with equanimity, not preceding in the apostleship, but following. Let the apostle Paul forgive: what he did is easy; what Peter did is difficult. We live in human affairs, we are surrounded by daily experiences: I have often seen a man criticizing, I don't know if I have ever seen a critic enduring with equanimity. Therefore Paul more purely, but Peter more admirably. However, I do not know if it is more pure to recognize another's fault than to willingly acknowledge one's own.

"Concerning those who deny that Peter was reproved by Paul." But it troubles some that Peter is said to have been rebuked, and it troubles and they dispute; but they should not be scorned if their presumption does not trouble them, but their love for Peter. They do not want to believe that he was truly rebuked; they think this was feigned, shaded for the eyes of men. "Inside, they say, something else was being done, and something else was shown to the people." O man, you fear the fault of one: do you not want me to fear the deceit of both? Out of love for Peter, you do not believe he was rebuked. You do not believe he was rebuked out of love for Peter; I believe he was rebuked out of love for Paul and Peter. I do not want to believe that the apostles were doing one thing inside and pretending another to the people. We are bishops, we follow in their footsteps as best we can: I do not want it to be permissible for us to deceive you. If one thing is done inside and another is pretended to the people, what sanctity is not to be feared? Neither do we want to deceive you nor be deceived by you. For if you think that we deceive you and we think that you deceive us, where is the charity that believes all things? Charity, he says, believes all things. It is believed so that it may be had, not so that it may be deceived. The dissimulation of Peter was justly rebuked by Paul.

"But answer: What did Paul reprove in Peter?" What did he reprove but what he himself said, he himself wrote? He himself preserved the letter in memory, he himself propagated it to be read in the Church for posterity. What in the divine books do I believe more securely, if I do not believe what is written in that letter? It is an apostolic letter, a canonical letter, a letter of Paul, who labored more than all of them, not he himself, but the grace of God with him. Therefore, it is the letter of the grace of God. And if we recall who spoke in him, it is the letter of Christ. Or do you want, he says, to take the proof of him who speaks in me, Christ? Hear and fear. He says proof, not fiction. If you think this is little, hear the preacher himself, even one who invokes God as a witness. He began to narrate what he insinuated, as if foreseeing certain future disputers: What I write to you, he says, behold, before God I do not lie. So does he, thus invoking God, lie, while you without the testimony of God: The mouth, he says, that lies, kills not the body, but the soul? I ask you: do not love Peter so as to kill Paul; I ask you: let not Paul be killed in soul for Peter, they were together killed in the flesh for Christ. And again you ask and say to me: "What did Paul reprove in Peter?" Again I answer you: Paul reproved in Peter what he said and wrote. With the testimony of God, Paul said he reproved Peter: what do you seek from me? The letter is read by all: recall with me. When Peter came to Antioch, I withstood him to the face because he was to be blamed. For before certain men came from James, he ate with the Gentiles. But when they came, he withdrew, fearing those who were of the circumcision, and the other Jews also joined in his hypocrisy, so that even Barnabas was led astray by their hypocrisy. Behold, you have heard what Paul reproved in Peter. Let us explain, and I will do this with the Lord's help, so that you understand. For I will do this not for you, but for those who hear both me and you. The sacraments of the Jews are useless, yet not to be abominated. The sacraments of the Jews: namely, circumcision, the Sabbath rest, the avoidance of certain foods and others of this kind, were divinely given, written in the law, and commanded by God as a figure of future times. These were not to be regarded as the abominable sacrileges of the Gentiles; these were not as the sacrifices of demons; this was not as if it were the worship of idols. God had commanded this through Moses to His people, the one God, the true God, He who said: I am who I am. But after the fullness of time had come, God sent His Son, born of a woman, born under the law, for He was also circumcised. [He was] born of a virgin woman, for by the custom of Hebrew speech, unless a virgin were called a woman, Eve would not have formed from a woman first. Therefore, after in the fullness of time God sent His Son, born of a woman through whom He made the woman, born under the law through whom He gave the law, to redeem those who were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons, the shadows began to be unnecessary with the coming of the light; nevertheless, because they were not unnecessary, they were not yet to be regarded, like the sacrileges of the Gentiles, as sacred condemnable. It was not right to tell a Jew: "Do not circumcise, because you have believed in Christ", as it was right to tell a pagan who became Christian: "Do not sacrifice to idols, because you have believed in Christ". For if you place two things: the sacrifice of the pagans and the sacrament of the Jews, one of these was never necessary, always pernicious; but the other was once necessary, later unnecessary, but for those who received the Gospel of the Jews, not yet pernicious. Therefore, when the sacraments of the Jews, after the advent of Christ, were no longer necessary, but were once necessary by those through whom [Christ] was foretold by whom they were not necessary, they were to be ended with honor, not to be rejected with horror. Therefore, as things stood, Paul the Apostle, who had been especially sent to preach the Gospel to the Gentiles, had to take special care in fulfilling his vow, lest the salvation of the Gentiles be hindered by the sacraments of the Jews. Therefore, with Christ speaking in him, with God breathing and revealing in him, he decreed at that time, in the newness of the Gospel, not to prohibit any of the Jews from these sacraments at that time, nor to compel any Gentiles to these sacraments. So, like those paternal funerals soon to be abolished, now [considering them] as bodies without the soul of prophecy with due respect to be led to the grave, and yet, because they were unused and dead, he judged that they were not to be placed upon the shoulders of the Gentiles.

Why Peter was justly rebuked by Paul. So then, in those sacraments at that time, the fault from which Peter was reproved, listen carefully, and assist our strength for such a great burden of a question, which then agitated the apostles themselves, perhaps less capable of breaking and solving it, but assist us: I implore you. Indeed, you have already heard many things, but listen as if anew to what more you want to hear, and I, standing, speak to you and am weak. Certainly, when the question seems to be newly proposed to you, our narration seems to pertain to this. For now, one who asked me just before, before I could explain through narration what I wanted, what Paul reproved Peter for, being made more cautious from my narration, says this: "If at that time and for those who came from Judaism abstaining from such sacraments was not imposed, and observing such sacraments was not imposed on the Gentiles, Peter who conducted such things from Judaisms, how did Paul rightly reprove him?" I say, brothers, the words themselves indicate it. Paul did not reprove Peter for observing Jewish sacraments but for imposing them on the Gentiles.

For a Jew who believed in Christ at that time, if he wanted to observe those things, he was not prohibited; if he did not want to, he was not compelled. However, for any of the Gentiles who had believed, when he wanted to be circumcised, hearing that it was not necessary for salvation? Perhaps even the Jews themselves would scarcely be circumcised, unless the children underwent this. But what was it to compel the Gentiles to observe those sacraments, where we said Peter was reproved by Paul, if anyone were to ask, what was that compelling itself? Were they held involuntarily, bound and circumcised? Far from it! Therefore, what was it to compel, what do we think, except to say to them: "You cannot be saved unless you observe those lawful precepts like the Jews?" For with this condition proposed because they were seeking salvation and it was said to them that otherwise they could not attain to salvation, they were compelled involuntarily to observe those sacraments, not because they loved these things, but because they desired salvation. The apostles decree that the ancient law must be observed.

Therefore, that moderation, namely that neither Jews were prohibited nor Gentiles compelled, was maintained by the apostles and decreed in the council. For when this question was agitating many and disturbing many, a meeting was held at Jerusalem, and with all the apostles and elders of the Church, that is, the presbyters and any preachers of the Gospel and the overseers of the Churches gathered, it was decided by common council, obviously inspired by the Lord, that Jews should not be prohibited from those practices, nor should Gentiles be compelled to them. Many recall that this is written in the Acts of the Apostles; let those who do not recall read it. Therefore, this manner was very temperate, very religious, very cautious. If those practices were ordered to be immediately rejected just like the sacrifices to idols, it would not be believed that the true God was the one who had commanded them. Therefore, Paul rebuked Peter, not because he observed these practices himself, but because he compelled the Gentiles to do so. How did he compel them? By consenting, though pretending, to those who said that Gentiles could not be saved otherwise unless they observed Jewish sacraments. This is also written in the Acts of the Apostles, narrated in the same book: "Then certain persons came to Antioch from James," that is, from Jerusalem, Jews who had already believed in Christ, "and they said to the brothers from the Gentiles who were coming, 'You cannot be saved otherwise unless you keep the lawful precepts.'" This is what it means to compel: to say that they cannot be saved otherwise.

Paul sometimes observed the sacraments of the law.

Against this, the Apostle Paul militated with the most ardent zeal. He removed this stone of horrendous oppression so that wretched nations might once rise again, as from the tomb of Lazarus. For if he reproached this observance and not compulsion, he would even reproach himself. For he also undertook these and celebrated certain Jewish sacraments in Jerusalem with the Jews in the temple; but he observed these things as one coming from the Jews, not compelling the nations to them. Paul, coming from the Jews, the evangelist of the nations, the counselor and executor of the holy apostles, by his example rather showed what pleased the Holy Spirit in such a question, what He decreed and established. For James said to him, already established in Jerusalem: "Many," he says, "think you oppose the legitimate ancestral practices and are an enemy and foe of the law. What then is it? Hear me. There are some here who have come to take purification: purify with them so that all may know" - it was not said "so that all may think": for devotion was commanded, not simulation suggested - "so that all," he says, "may know you are an emulator of the law and ancestral observances." Paul did this as a Jew from the Jews, not however that he might be justified by those very sacraments, but that he might not be thought to condemn them.

Why did Paul wish to circumcise Timothy, but not Titus?

Therefore, he did this. For he also circumcised Timothy, who was born of a Jewish mother, because of the scandal of the Jews, willing, not coerced, so that through him he might show that he did not condemn those [practices] but did not impose them on the Gentiles as necessary for salvation. But after he circumcised Timothy with this indifference that I have often recommended and which I think you now appropriately understand, certain Jews, who did not lay down the old skin and therefore wanted to circumcise the Gentiles, said that without those sacraments salvation could not be for them. Hence also a heresy arose: for even today there are some who believe in Christ and circumcise their sons, believing that without those sacraments they cannot have salvation. When, therefore, through this indifference of devotion, not of necessity, he had circumcised Timothy, as I said, some of them, placing salvation in those [practices], which displeased Paul, for which he rebuked Peter, began to boast to deceive others, that Paul also holds this. They said: "What we say, he also believes, that without these sacraments there can be no salvation. For if he does not believe this, why did he circumcise Timothy?" When Paul heard this, who had done this out of freedom, not necessity, because of the scandal of the Jews, not for the salvation of Timothy, he saw that they had taken occasion for different preaching and for raising a bad suspicion against Paul, and he did not want to circumcise Titus. It appears, however, why he wanted the one, why he did not want the other. He wanted the one because of the scandal of the Jews, he did not want the other because of the occasions of those who wrongly believed. The truth was vigorously defended by Paul. And see how he clearly and evidently commends this in his letter. "But neither Titus," he says, "though he was a Greek, was compelled to be circumcised like Timothy." And as if it were said to him: "Why was Titus not compelled to be circumcised, when Timothy, who was similarly a Greek, was compelled to be circumcised?" Why? Do you want to hear? Because of the false brothers secretly brought in who had slipped in to spy on our freedom. In the circumcision of Timothy, therefore, there was no necessity, but freedom; in Peter, however, necessity was reproved, not freedom. "Because of the false brothers," he says, "who had slipped in to spy on our freedom, so that they might bring us into slavery." "They," he says, "wanted to bring us into slavery by making freedom a necessity, to whom we did not yield submission even for a moment." Why? "So that the truth of the Gospel might remain with you." What is the truth of the Gospel? That the Jew should not be forbidden at that time, and the Gentile should not be compelled; the sacraments of the Jews should not be condemned by the Jews nor imposed on the Gentiles. What is the truth of the Gospel? That one can reach salvation through Christ without those sacraments. This they denied, to which Peter hypocritically consented. Hence it is added: "Other Jews acted hypocritically with him, so that even Barnabas was led astray by their hypocrisy." But when I saw, he said, that they were not acting in line with the truth of the Gospel, as he said there: "So that the truth of the Gospel might remain with you." You hear the truth commended everywhere, and you suspect deception everywhere, even among the apostles. He saw therefore that they were not acting in line with the truth. He saw moreover that the Gentiles thought those sacraments were necessary for their salvation. This is not the truth of the Gospel. These are no longer necessary for salvation: perhaps they were once necessary when they foreshadowed Christ to come. The petrine knife was necessary once, before the rock itself came.

Great in Paul is confidence, great in Peter is patience. When I saw, he said, that they were not walking rightly according to the truth of the Gospel, I said to Peter in front of them all: I said to Peter: Paul to Peter, the lesser to the greater, the follower to the predecessor; and I spoke both to Peter and in front of them all: great confidence, but great his patience. Since you have made them attentive, let us hear what you, Paul, said to Peter, and where. Let us understand what you did, what you arranged, since you never wanted to be deceitful. I said, he said, to Peter in front of them all: "If you, being a Jew"—what does "being a Jew" mean? To whom it was allowed to observe those things indifferently—"live like a Gentile and not like a Jew"—since before certain men came from James, he used to eat with the Gentiles—"if you, being a Jew, live like a Gentile and not like a Jew," he ought to have continued and said: "How do you now keep Jewish practices?" He did not say this, but where he was reprehensible, from where these matters were stirred, from where he was zealous for God, attempting to remove the obstacle from the Gospel, he said this confidently, he said this in front of them all: "If you, being a Jew, live like a Gentile, how do you compel the Gentiles to Judaize?" "You compel," he said, "to Judaize." I have already said how, by agreeing with those who said that the Gentiles could not otherwise be saved, "you compel the Gentiles to Judaize." Paul did not do this when he undertook purifications with certain people; he did not compel the Gentiles to Judaize when he circumcised Timothy according to that indifference, because both circumcision is nothing and uncircumcision is nothing; he did not compel the Gentiles to Judaize. And lest he be believed to compel them, he did not circumcise Titus; Paul did not compel the Gentiles to Judaize. He himself did not do this, and therefore he rightly reprimanded Peter because he himself did not do it.

If Paul wrote something false in the letter, what truth will be retained? But I will propose that he did this, even though it is not found or proven; I do not say this according to myself, but according to some, so that I may say for the moment, let us think that Paul did what Peter did, and that Paul criticized Peter for the same thing he himself had done: they would have been more easily corrected than allowing the detestable moth, that is the lie or suspicion of a lie, as a malignant worm to gnaw at every letter of Scripture, feared lest it persuade us that Paul lied in his canonical epistle, which he commended to the Church propagated by posterity. I ask you: fear this evil; let us all fear, lest we all later weep in vain. This is not a light evil: I warn you, fearing to frighten. Forgive my concern: we speak to you more rarely than you wish. They whisper to those who find your ears ready whenever they want - we are not permitted to speak often and from this place -, I do not say they malign in their minds, I do not do them injury, but beware of the erring, and deal with them in such a way that they themselves might rather be corrected, not that you be corrupted by them. For when they say to you: "Peter did this in pretense, Paul criticized him in pretense; Paul did not write the truth in his epistle that Peter was to be blamed; Paul did not write the truth in his epistle that he saw them not walking uprightly toward the truth of the Gospel; Paul did not write the truth in his epistle that Peter compelled the Gentiles to live as Jews, but everything was done in pretense," what truth will we hold, what page will we not suspect of lying? In divine Scripture, feigned speech is not admitted.

Behold, humans, we are oppressed by the most evident authority, and scarcely do we yield to the thundering and flashing truth! Where shall we go? What shall we do when perhaps I say to someone: "It is good to marry, but it is better not to marry, as the Apostle Paul wrote," if the condemner of marriage says to me: "Paul indeed condemned marriage, but he wrote this dissimulatingly, because the truth itself could not be endured by the weak; since continence is imposed laboriously, therefore he said: It is good to marry, for he knew it was bad to marry"? How do you prove that Paul was lying when he said: He who gives in marriage does well? "How do I prove it?" he says: "how he lied when he said: When I saw that they were not walking correctly toward the truth of the Gospel - for Peter was not walking correctly toward the truth of the Gospel -; how I said to Peter in the presence of all: If you, being a Jew, live like a Gentile and not like a Jew, how do you compel the Gentiles to live like Jews? - for Peter was not truly compelling the Gentiles to live like Jews. Just as Paul dissembled these things, so also, when he saw that the excellence of virginity could not be endured by carnal men, he said: He who gives in marriage does well. He was doing one thing, pretending another." If these things are so, where shall we go? What oracles shall we inquire? For the divine words in the canonical scriptures should be commanded to us as oracles indeed are. Is deceit to be feared there, where truth is found, where truth is presumed? I beseech you: foresee this little worm, to beware of it; do not admit it to the chamber of your heart. If you admit it, unless you quickly shake off the garments, you will find nothing whole there. On the Divine Authority of the Scriptures.

I said what I thought with great concern needed to be said; I retained your love for a long time, your concern held me for a long time. Everything written in the holy canonical books, we who debate and write books, write far differently, we write by making progress, we learn daily, we dictate by investigating, we speak by knocking. Certainly, I do not rest, as much as I can, wherever I can be useful to the brothers, both by speaking and by writing. I advise your love, from me, unto me, not to want to regard any book or debate of anyone as canonical Scripture. In the holy Scriptures, we learn to judge; in our writings, we do not disdain to be judged. Indeed, it is to be chosen and this rather ought to be desired from two options, that either by writing or by speaking we may speak the truth, that we may never err. But since fulfilling this is difficult, therefore the canon has another foundation, like the heaven where the luminaries of the Scriptures are placed, as between the waters and the waters, between the peoples of the angels and the peoples of men: those above, these below. Let us hold the Scripture as Scripture, as God speaking; let us not seek a wandering man there. For the canon was not vainly instituted in the Church: this is the office of the Holy Spirit. Therefore, if anyone reads my book, let him judge me: if I have said something reasonable, let him follow not me, but the reason itself; if I have proven this by the most evident and divine testimony, let him follow not me, but the divine Scripture. If, however, one wants to criticize something I have correctly said, he does not do rightly, but I am more irritated by such a praiser of mine who takes my book as if it were canonical, than by him who criticizes things in my book that should not be criticized. I ask you: although I see you are attentive and almost very recent, as if you have just begun to hear, yet I do not want to say anything more, so that you may strongly hold on to what I said last. Turned to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 163

SERMO 163 CONCERNING THE WORDS OF THE APOSTLE (GAL 5, 16-21):

"Walk by the Spirit, and you will not gratify the desires of the flesh."

Held in the Honoriana Basilica on the 8th day before the Kalends of October.

Dedication of a formerly profane temple.

If we consider, brothers, what we were before the grace of the Lord and what we have begun to be through the grace of the Lord, we indeed find that just as people are changed for the better, so also places of lands that were previously against the grace of God are now dedicated to the grace of God. For we, as the Apostle says, are the temple of the living God; for which reason God says: I will dwell in them, and walk among them. But the idols here, however, knew how to be fixed, they did not know how to walk. However, the majesty's presence walks in us if it finds the breadth of charity. Exhorting us to this, the Apostle says: Be enlarged, do not be unequally yoked with unbelievers. If we are enlarged, God walks in us; but for us to be enlarged, God himself must work. For if charity creates breadth, which does not know narrowness, see that God makes breadth for himself in us, as the Apostle himself says: The love of God has been poured out into our hearts through the Holy Spirit who has been given to us. Because of this breadth, I say, God walks in us. In us, as in a profane temple, some things must be torn down, others consecrated.

Just now, when the Apostle's Epistle was being read, we heard: "Walk by the Spirit, and you will not gratify the desires of the flesh. For the flesh desires what is contrary to the Spirit, and the Spirit what is contrary to the flesh. These are in conflict with each other, so that you do not do whatever you want." He was speaking to the baptized: but he was still building the temple of God, not yet dedicating it. See, my brothers, just as earthly places themselves are improved, some things are demolished and shattered, others are changed into better uses; so are we. The works of the flesh were in us. You heard them mentioned: "Now the works of the flesh are obvious," he says, "fornication, impurity, idolatry, witchcraft—not benefits, that is, not derived from good, but from poisons—strife, enmity, heresies, envy, drunkenness, and things like these; they must be destroyed, not changed: as I have told you before, I declare again, that those who practice such things will not inherit the kingdom of God." These in us, like idols, must be shattered. But the members of our body must be turned to better uses, so that what served the impurity of desire may serve the grace of charity.

Edification through faith, dedication through resurrection. But see what he said, and pay careful attention. We are workers of God, the temple of God is still being built. In His head, it is already dedicated; because the Lord rose from the dead, death having been conquered, mortality having been consumed, He ascended into heaven; because a Psalm of the dedication of the house was written about Him. Therefore, after His passion, He says: You have turned my mourning into dancing for me, you have torn off my sackcloth, and girded me with joy; so that my glory may sing praise to You, and not be silent. Therefore, that dedication took place after the passion in the resurrection. Thus also our building is now taking place through faith, so that dedication may also take place through the final resurrection. Finally, after this Psalm of the dedication of the house, where the resurrection of our head is shown, there is another Psalm after this one, not before this one, whose title is: When the house was being built after the captivity. Recall the captivity, where we were before, when the devil possessed the whole world like a mass of unbelievers. Because of this captivity, the Redeemer came; He shed His blood as our price: by shedding His blood, He wiped out the instruments of our captivity. The law, says the Apostle, is spiritual; but I am carnal, sold under sin. Previously sold under sin, but later freed by grace. After that captivity, the house is now being built; and it is being built through evangelization. For thus begins the Psalm itself: Sing to the Lord a new song. And do not think this house is being built in one corner, as schismatics or heretics build; note what follows: Sing to the Lord, all the earth. A new song. Christ, the salvation of God longed for by the ancients.

Sing to the Lord a new song: against the old song, the New Testament, because the Old Testament was before; the new man, so that the old man may be put off. Put off, he says, the old man with his deeds; and put on the new, who is created according to God in justice and holiness of truth. Therefore: Sing to the Lord a new song; sing to the Lord, all the earth. Sing and build up; sing and sing well. Proclaim day by day his salvation; proclaim day by day his Christ. For what is his salvation if not "his Christ"? For this salvation we prayed in the Psalm: Show us, O Lord, your mercy, and give us your salvation. The just of old desired this salvation, of whom the Lord spoke to the disciples: Many desired to see the things you see, and could not. And give us your salvation. The just of old said this: Give us your salvation; let us see your Christ while we live in this flesh. Let us see in the flesh, who will free us from the flesh; let the flesh come cleansing the flesh; let the flesh suffer, and redeem the soul and the flesh. And give us your salvation, O Lord. In this desire was that holy old man Simeon; in this, I say, was that holy old man and well-deserving of God, Simeon; without doubt, he also said: Show us, O Lord, your mercy, and give us your salvation. In this desire, in such prayers, he received the answer, that he would not taste death until he had seen the Christ of the Lord. Christ was born, he came, he went; but until he came, he did not want to go. Old age already grew ripe for departure, but sincere piety held him back. But when he came, when he was born, when he saw him carried in the hands of his mother, the pious old age recognized the divine infancy; he took him in his hands and said: Now you dismiss your servant, O Lord, in peace; because my eyes have seen your salvation. Behold why he said: Show us, O Lord, your mercy, and give us your salvation. The desire of the old man was fulfilled, while the world itself was declining into old age. He himself came to the old man, who found the world old. Therefore, if he found the world old, let the world hear: Sing to the Lord a new song; sing to the Lord, all the earth. Let oldness be destroyed, let newness arise. The preaching of Christ.

Sing to the Lord a new song, sing to the Lord. Behold the contest of the builders. Sing to the Lord, bless His name. Announce good news, which is in Greek "evangelize". What? Day by day. Which day by day? His salvation. Which day by day? Light from light, the Son from the Father, His salvation. Announce His glory among the nations, His wonders among all people. Behold how the house is built after captivity. He is more fearful than all the gods. More than which gods? For all the gods of the nations are demons; but the Lord made the heavens. He made the saints, He made the Apostles. For the heavens declare the glory of God. There are no languages nor speeches where their voices are not heard. Their sound has gone out into all the earth: for the whole earth sings the new song. The struggle of flesh and spirit.

Let us listen, therefore, to the Apostle, the architect of the master: "As a wise architect," he says, "I have laid the foundation." Let us listen, therefore, to this architect, constructing some new things and demolishing some old things. "Walk in the Spirit," he says, "this is the new construction: and do not fulfill the lusts of the flesh, this is the destruction of the old. For the flesh," he says, "lusts against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh. These are opposed to each other, so that you do not do what you wish." For you are still being built, not yet dedicated. So that you do not do what you wish.

What do you wish for? That there be no desires at all for evil and illicit pleasures? Who among the saints would not wish for this? But it does not happen: as long as we live here, this is not fulfilled. For the flesh desires against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh. For these are opposed to each other; so that what you wish to do, that there be no desires at all in you for illicit things, you are unable to achieve. What remains then? Walk in the spirit; and, since you cannot bring about the end of the desires of the flesh, do not fulfill the desires of the flesh. You indeed ought to wish totally to consume them and utterly uproot them, but as long as they are in you, and there is another law in your members warring against the law of your mind, do not fulfill the desires of the flesh. What do you wish for? That there be no desires of the flesh at all. They do not allow you to fulfill what you wish; do not allow them to fulfill what they wish. What do you wish for? That there are none at all. But they are. The flesh desires against the spirit: let the spirit desire against the flesh. So that what you wish to do, that is, that the desires of the flesh not be in you, neither do they accomplish what they wish, so that you fulfill their work. If you are not given in to completely, do not give in yourself. First, let the fight be equal, so that victory may be possible at some time.

Victory after the resurrection. Why victory is delayed. For without doubt, my brothers, it will be so; let us believe, let us hope, let us love, there will be victory at some time, in the dedication of the house, which is now being built after captivity. For the last enemy to be destroyed is death, when this perishable body puts on the imperishable, and this mortal body puts on immortality. Ponder the words of those who triumph: Where, O death, is your sting? This is the voice of those who triumph, not of those who fight. But the voice of those who fight is: Have mercy on me, Lord, for I am weak; heal me, Lord, for my bones are troubled, and my soul is greatly troubled; but you, Lord, how long? See the one laboring in struggle. And you, Lord, how long? What does "how long" mean? Until you prove that I come to help. For if I came to help quickly, you would not feel the struggle; if you did not feel the struggle, you would boast as if by your own strength; and through this pride you would never come to victory. It has indeed been said: While you are still speaking, I will say: Here I am; but God is present both when He delays and when He does not delay, and by delaying He is present; so that, when He fulfills a premature will, He does not fail to perfect healing. The remedy for pride in Paul.

For, my brothers, the apostle Paul did not lack, who when he strove, feared lest he be exalted. In the greatness, he says, of my revelations, lest I be exalted. See him striving in conflict, not yet triumphing in security. In the greatness of my revelations, lest I be exalted. Who says: Lest I be exalted? O fear, O tremor! Who says: Lest I be exalted? Though his words are so retarding of pride, restraining of swelling, and he says: Lest I be exalted? It is little that he says: Lest I be exalted; see the remedy he says was applied to him. Lest I be exalted, he says, a thorn was given me in my flesh, an angel of Satan. O poison, which is not healed except by poison! A thorn was given me in my flesh, an angel of Satan, to buffet me. The head was beaten, lest the head be exalted. O antidote, which is made as if from a serpent, and therefore called a theriac! For that serpent persuaded pride. Taste, and you will be like gods; this is the persuasion of pride. Whence he fell, thence he cast down. Deservedly, therefore, the poison of the serpent is healed by the serpent. What does the Apostle say? For this thing I besought the Lord thrice, that it might depart from me. Where is: While you are still speaking, I will say: Behold, I am here? Therefore, it was not once but again and a third time that I besought the Lord. Did he not then himself say: And you, Lord, how long? But because he delayed, was he not there, and was it false: While you are still speaking, I will say: Behold, I am here? For what? When the physician gives what you desire, is he present; when he cuts, is he not present? Do you not cry out under the physician's knife that he may spare; and because he is more present, he cuts more? Finally, to know that he was present, see what he answered to the one asking three times. He said, he says to me: My grace is sufficient for you; for my power is made perfect in weakness. I, he says, know; the best physician. I, he says, know to what swelling it leads what I wish to heal. Rest, I will apply what I know. My grace is sufficient for you: your will is not sufficient for you. These were indeed the words of one striving, and in peril in the conflict, and asking divine help.

Victory is to be obtained by humility. But what will be the words of the triumphant? Words of the contender, while the house is being built; words of the triumphant, when the house is finally dedicated. Where is your victory, O death? Where is your sting, O death? Now the sting of death is sin. Thus the Apostle was saying these things, as if he were already there. Indeed, after these words, which evidently concern the future perception, not the present conflict; since he says: "Then it shall be," not "it is now," but "then it shall be." What shall be then? The statement that is written: "Death is swallowed up in victory. Where is your victory, O death? Where is your sting, O death?" Then it shall be that the sting of death is nowhere, sin cannot be found anywhere. Why do you hasten? Then it shall be, then it shall be. Let humility be merited in you, so that it shall be in you then; lest pride prevent it from being in you even then. Then it shall be. Now, meanwhile, as you contend, as you labor, as you are endangered, say, say: "Forgive us our debts." Say always as you contend, say truly, say from the heart: "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves." You will be the devil to yourself. We deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. For we do not speak the truth, saying we have no sin; since here we are not without sin. Therefore, let us speak the truth, so that we may find security at some point. Let there be truth in the struggle, so that security may be acquired in the victory. Then it shall be: "Where is your sting, O death?" For the sting of death is sin.

Law without grace. But you presume about the law, because the law has been given to you, and a command has been given to you. It is good for you that the Spirit gives you life, lest the letter kills. I want you to will; but it is not enough to will. You must be helped so that you fully will, and accomplish what you will. For do you want to see what the letter ordering without the Spirit assisting can do? There it said. When it was said: Where, O death, is your sting? But the sting of death is sin; he immediately added: But the power of sin is the law. What does it mean: The power of sin is the law? Not by commanding evil or prohibiting good: rather, by prohibiting evil and commanding good. But the power of sin is the law: because, he says, the law came in so that the trespass might increase. What does it mean: so that the trespass might increase? Because where there was no grace, prohibition increased desire; and when trust in one's own strength was assumed, a great vice was made. But what did grace do? Where sin increased, grace abounded all the more. The Lord came: everything you inherited from Adam, everything you added with your depraved habits, he completely forgave, completely erased; he taught prayer, promised grace; imposed a struggle, helped the one laboring, crowned the victor. Therefore, the Apostle says, the law is indeed holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good. Then what is good, did it become death to me? By no means! But sin, that it might appear as sin. For when you were not prohibited, it existed; but it did not appear. For I would not have known covetousness, he says, unless the law had said: You shall not covet. Therefore, taking the opportunity, sin, through the commandment, deceived me, and through it killed me. Behold what it is: The letter kills. The necessity of divine assistance.

If you wish therefore to escape the threatening law, flee to the Spirit who helps. For what the law commands, faith hopes for. Call to your God, let Him help you. Do not remain condemned under the letter, but let God help you with His Spirit: lest you be similar to the proud Jew. For when the sting of death was sin, and the strength of sin was the law; what would human weakness do, in which the will was fatigued? "To will," he says, "is present with me; but to perform what is good I do not find." What then should he do? Behold the sting of death is sin, behold the strength of sin is the law. But the law entered, that the offense might abound. For if the law could give life, righteousness would certainly be of the law. But the Scripture has confined all under sin. How has it confined? Lest you should wander, lest you should be precipitated, lest you should be submerged; the law made barriers for you, that not finding a way to escape, you might flee to grace. But the Scripture has confined all under sin, that the promise. The one who promises, promises what he makes, not what you do. If you would accomplish it, God would be a foreteller, not a promiser. But it confined, he says, the Scripture all under sin, that the promise by faith in Jesus Christ might be given to those who believe. Listen: might be given. What do you boast of? Listen: might be given. For what do you have that you did not receive? Therefore, since the sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law; and this is of the good providence of God, that men might be confined under sin, and seek a helper, seek grace, seek God, not presume on their own strength; therefore, when he had said: The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law; why do you fear? Why do you labor? Why do you sweat? Listen to what follows: But thanks be to God, who gives us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. Certainly you do not give yourself victory? Thanks be to God, who gives us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. The help of God must be invoked.

Therefore, when you begin to struggle, fighting against the desires of the flesh, walk in the spirit, invoke the spirit, and seek the gift of God. And if the law in your members resists the law of your mind, from the lower part, that is, from the flesh, it holds you captive under the law of sin; and this will be corrected, and this will pass into the laws of victory. You only cry out, you only invoke. It is necessary always to pray and not to falter. Invoke entirely, invoke for help. While you are still speaking, He says, behold I am here. After you understand, you hear Him saying to your soul: I am your salvation. Therefore, when the law of the flesh begins to resist the law of the mind and leads you captive under the law of sin which is in your members; by praying say, by confessing say: Wretched man that I am. For what else is man? What is man unless that you remember him? Say: Wretched man that I am; for if the Son of Man had not come, man would have perished.

Shout out in distress: Who will deliver me from this body of death? Where the law in my members resists the law of my mind. For I delight in the law of God according to the inner man. Who will deliver me from this body of death? If you say this faithfully, if you say this humbly, it is most truly answered: The grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord. Turned to the Lord...

Sermons - Sermon 163A

Sermon 163/A ABOUT THE WORDS OF THE APOSTLE (GAL 5:16 AND FOLLOWING):

"Walk in the Spirit and do not fulfill the lust of the flesh."

SERMON GIVEN ON THE LORD'S DAY That we may dare to speak to you, faith makes. That we may dare to speak to you, faith makes, by which we believe that you pray for us. For I know that we are in your hearts to die together and to live together; the affection of your charity nourishes us with this hope. Therefore, whatever the Lord has granted, I beseech you to deign to hear willingly. The flesh and the spirit are opposed to one another.

We heard the apostle Paul, when his epistle was being read, admonishing with apostolic authority and saying: Walk by the Spirit, and you will not fulfill the lust of the flesh; for the flesh lusts against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh; for these are opposed to each other, so that you do not do the things that you want. He placed before our eyes a certain war, in which flesh and spirit clash in such a way that we do not do what we want; and since the lust of the flesh must be subjected to the command of God, he has preached to those engaged in the struggle, and said: Walk by the Spirit, and you will not fulfill the lust of the flesh. Fight, he says, bravely, and conquer, not an alien nature rebelling against you, but the lust that reigns in your members. I see, says the Apostle, another law in my members. Attack, conquer; it rebels, restrain; do not grant your members, and your soul will not be killed. Let not sin reign, he says, in your mortal body, nor yield your members to sin as weapons of unrighteousness. Deny lust its weapons, and your victory will prevail. Fight, labor; no athlete is crowned without sweat. In the stadium and in the contest, you are set in the struggle; against the lust of the flesh, your spirit fights. The flesh lusts against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh. The flesh suggests lust, the Spirit commands chastity; the flesh kindles to anger, the Spirit commands mercy. Set in this struggle, when you have not given your members to rebelling lust, which were weapons of unrighteousness to sin, they become weapons of righteousness to God. Do not presume on the strength of your free will.

Therefore, beloved, walk in the Spirit, and you shall not fulfill the lusts of the flesh. Situated in this battle, do not presume upon the strength of your free will; for the adversary conquers you. Implore the help of God's grace, and then you will overcome the rebellious desire of the flesh against you. But perhaps it has already been defeated, and you may say: I have already been defeated, the lust holds arms against me, sin already reigns in my mortal body, urging obedience to its desires. Cry out, and say with Paul: O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death? I delight in the law of God after the inward man; but I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members. Such a learned man is led into captivity; what should I do, captor and invalid? Therefore, implore the help of grace; you will be answered, and it will be said to you: The grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord. He says, Who shall deliver me from the body of this death? O Manichean, he spoke of the body of this death, not of the captivity of that nation. He says, The grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord. O Pelagian, he says, through Jesus Christ our Lord, not through our free will. Of the assistance of God's grace.

Therefore, beloved, if we live by the Spirit, let us also follow the Spirit. Let us not become desirous of vain glory. You have heard the apostolic reading: Walk by the Spirit, and you will not fulfill the desires of the flesh; for the flesh desires against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh; these are opposed to each other, so that you do not do what you want. Therefore, if you are led by the Spirit, you are not under the law anymore. The works of the flesh are evident, which are fornication, impurity, lewdness, idolatry, sorcery, enmities, strife, jealousy, outbursts of anger, dissensions, factions, envy, drunkenness, carousing, and things like these; I warn you, as I did before, that those who do such things will not inherit the kingdom of God. Put to death in yourselves the desires of the flesh with the help of God’s grace; despise the works of the flesh, love the fruit of the Spirit. For the fruit of the Spirit is joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, self-control. Do these things, and be in them, and the God of peace will be with you.

Sermons - Sermon 163B

Sermon 163/B CONCERNING THAT WHICH THE APOSTLE SAYS TO THE GALATIANS (GAL 6:1 AND FOLLOWING):

"Brothers, if a man is overtaken in any fault,"

You who are spiritual, instruct such a one, and so forth.

SERMON GIVEN AT CARTHAGE AT THE TABLE OF THE MARTYR CYPRIAN

September 8.

Aug. again presents the reading of the apostolic letter.

Recall the reading of the apostolic letter: Brethren, he says, if a man is overtaken in any fault, you who are spiritual should restore such a one in the spirit of gentleness, considering yourself, lest you also be tempted. Bear one another's burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ. For if anyone thinks he is something, when he is nothing, he deceives himself. Let each one test his own work, and then he will have reason for boasting in himself alone, and not in his neighbor. For each one will bear his own load. Let him who is taught the word share in all good things with him who teaches. Do not be deceived, God is not mocked; for whatever a man sows, that he will also reap; for he who sows to his own flesh will from the flesh reap corruption; but he who sows to the Spirit will from the Spirit reap eternal life. And let us not grow weary in doing good, for in due season we will reap, if we do not give up. So then, as we have opportunity, let us do good to all men, especially to those who are of the household of faith.

How we bear each other's burdens. The law of Christ is the law of love.

Up to this point, the letter of the Apostle has been read: up to this point, I have been a reader to you. But, my brothers, if the reader is understood, why is a disputant necessary? Behold, we have heard, we have understood: let us act, and let us live. And what need is there to burden your memory? Hold on to these things and think upon them. Or perhaps it troubles one of you, how it is to be understood what he said: Bear one another's burdens; and shortly after he said: Each one will bear his own burden? For you say in your hearts, those of you who noticed this: How do we bear each other's burdens if each one will bear his own burden? How will each one bear his own burden if we bear each other's burdens? I confess, it is a question. Knock, and it will be opened to you; knock with understanding, knock with eagerness, knock also for us, that we may speak something worthy to you, by praying; thus, in knocking, you help us, and this question will soon be solved. Would that, as soon as it is solved, each one would effectively do what he understands! In the burden of infirmity, we bear each other's burdens; in the matter of piety, each one will bear his own burden. What did I say? All men, what are we except men, and thus infirm, and who are not entirely without sin? For in this we bear each other's burdens. For if you have suffered weariness at your brother's sin, and he at yours, you neglect each other and commit a truly great sin. But if you endure what he cannot, and he endures what you cannot, you bear each other’s burdens; and because you bear each other’s burdens, you fulfill the most sacred law of charity. For this is the law of Christ; the law of charity is the law of Christ. Therefore He came, because He loved us; and there was nothing to love, but by loving He made us lovable. You have heard what it is: Bear one another's burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ. What then is: Each one will bear his own burden? Each one will give an account for his own sin; no one will give an account for another’s sin. Each one has his own case; he will give an account to God for his own. But even the overseers who give an account for the flocks of Christ, give an account for their own sin, if they have neglected the flocks of Christ.

Love, and do what you will.

Therefore, brothers, if a man is caught in any trespass, you who are spiritual, whoever you are who are spiritual, restore such a one in a spirit of gentleness. And if you rebuke, love within. Exhort, comfort, reprimand, be severe; love, and do whatever you want. For a father does not hate his son: yet the father, if necessary, chastises his son; he causes pain to preserve health. Therefore, this is: In the spirit of gentleness. For if a man is caught in any trespass and you say: It does not concern me; and I say to you: Why does it not concern you? and you answer me: Because each one will bear his own burden; I will answer you: Surely you have willingly heard, and understood: Bear one another's burdens. Therefore, if a man is caught in any trespass, you [who] are spiritual, restore such a one in a spirit of gentleness. Indeed, for his own sin he will give an account, because each one will bear his own burden; but if you neglect his wound, you will give a bad account of the sin of your negligence; and therefore, if you do not bear one another's burdens, you will have a bad account in this, because each one will bear his own burden. Do this so that you bear one another's burdens, and God spares you, because each one will bear his own burden. For if you bear the burden of another, when he is caught in any trespass, so that you restore him in a spirit of gentleness, you will come to the place where you heard: Each one will bear his own burden; and with a good conscience, you say to God: Forgive us our debts. Therefore, brothers, remember: If a man is caught in any trespass... Do not take it lightly: Man. For he could have said: If anyone is caught, if anyone at all is caught; he did not say this, but he said: Man. However, it is very difficult that a man is not caught in some trespass: for what is man? And the spiritual burden has to be borne by another. But these spiritual ones, whom he admonished to gently instruct that man who had been overtaken in a fault, perhaps said in their hearts: Let us bear the burdens of those who are overtaken by faults; because we do not have anything in ourselves that they might bear. Listen, because you should not be secure; the following words: Consider yourself, lest you also be tempted. Let the spiritual not be proud, not exalt themselves; although, if they are spiritual, they will not exalt themselves; I fear lest they exalt themselves precisely because they are carnal; yet let even the spiritual consider, lest they also be tempted. For is it because they are spiritual that they are not human? Is it because they are spiritual that they do not bear a corruptible body that weighs down the soul? Is it because they are spiritual that they have ended this life, which is entirely a temptation on earth? It was indeed well said, very well: Consider yourself, lest you also be tempted. And when he admonished them, that is, the spiritual, he immediately added that general sentence: Carry each other's burdens, and in this way you will fulfill the law of Christ. What does it mean: each other's? A carnal person should bear the burden of another carnal person, a spiritual person should bear the burden of another spiritual person. Carry each other's burdens, do not neglect each other's sins. Reprove those who trust you; admonish those whom you do not have the confidence to reprove; and if this is necessary, so that no one sins, pray, entreat. Perhaps I humbled you because I said, entreat? Listen to the Apostle: But commanding, he says, and entreating that you do not receive the grace of God in vain. The doctor, if he finds strength in the sick person, reproves; but if he does not find strength, and fears that the patient might possibly weaken under the bitterness of reproach, he supplicates, entreats, so that he may hear, do, and live. Therefore, the Apostle evidently said: Carry each other's burdens, because he had admonished the spiritual and had said: Consider yourself, lest you also be tempted; lest this spiritual one should so arrogate to himself as to think that he does not have a burden which ought to be supported by another.

Sometimes man himself is his own devil. Flatterers and deceivers.

Listen to this again, due to vanity, due to arrogance, due to pride, listen to it again: For if anyone thinks he is something, when he is nothing, he deceives himself. It could not be said better, he deceives himself. Not in all things should the devil be blamed; for sometimes man himself is his own devil. For why should the devil be guarded against? Surely so that he may not deceive you. Are you not therefore your own devil, when you deceive yourself? What then? But let each one test his own work, and then he will have glory in himself alone, and not in another. When you do something good, if it pleases you on account of someone praising you; but if that other does not praise you for it, you would fail in doing the good work, deprived of the praises' voices—in another you have glory, not in yourself. If the praise is there, you do it; if perhaps your good work displeased a foolish man, you do not do it. Do you not see people pouring out their wealth to actors and offering nothing to the poor, how much they are praised by the mouths of many? Is what they do good because they are praised? Wake up at last: The sinner is praised in the desires of his soul. All of you cried out because you know the holy Scripture from which the testimony we recalled comes; let those who do not know it listen. The holy Scripture said, the holy Scripture predicted: Because the sinner is praised in the desires of his soul, and he who does wrong is blessed. Now if the sinner is praised in the desires of his soul, and he who does wrong is blessed, seek praisers. Evil desires rend you; do wrong daily to fulfill your desires, and seek praisers. Believe me, you will find only flatterers or deceivers. How are they flatterers, how are they deceivers? I must give an account of my words. They are flatterers who know you do evil and yet praise you; those who praise you for doing evil because they think what you do is good are not flatterers, because they praise from the heart, but they are deceivers because they seduce you into doing those evils with their frequent praise and do not let you breathe. For in empty airs, you think what you do is good: you waste your goods, empty your house, leave your children naked. Those praises have made you insane: you run, you move your hands, you accept favors, you bring them to your mouth; you waste your house and gather wind. How, you ask, are these my deceivers who praise me from the heart? They are your deceivers because they were first mistaken themselves. Will he not toil to lay a ladder to you so that he might not deceive you, who deceives himself? Therefore the sinner is praised in the desires of his soul, and he who does wrong is blessed. Beware of such a praiser, shun this kind of blessing. Rather, you do good. But, you say, I will displease such a person if I do it. Be displeasing to him, and please God; for if you displease him and please God, you will have glory in yourself, and not in another. But the wicked denounce the good, and lovers of this world curse those who despise the world, they speak reproaches, they seek something to blame; as soon as something evil is said, they instantly believe; if something good is said, they refuse to believe; and your heart is troubled, that you fail in well-doing, because no praiser or flatterer or deceiver is found, and your conscience's testimony is not enough for you, in the theater of your heart, under the eyes of God. Why are you troubled, I beseech you, why are you troubled? Because many evil things are said about me. Is this what you say? You would not be disturbed in the ship of your heart, unless Christ were sleeping there. When you are troubled by insults, awaken Christ, awaken your faith, which sleeps in your heart.

You heard, when the Gospel was read, a great storm arose, and the ship was troubled and covered by the waves. Why? Because Christ was sleeping. When does Christ sleep in your heart, if not when you forget your faith? The faith of Christ in your heart is like Christ in the ship. You hear insults, you are wearied, you are troubled: Christ is sleeping. Awaken Christ, awaken your faith. You have what you need to do even when troubled; awaken your faith. Christ will awaken and speak to you: Are insults troubling you? What do I not endure for you first? This Christ says to you, thus your faith addresses you; listen to it, and see that it addresses you thus; unless perchance you have forgotten that Christ suffered for us, and before suffering so many evils for us, He heard insults. He cast out demons, and it was said to Him: You have a demon. Of Him it was said through the Prophet: The reproaches of those who reproached you have fallen on me. Therefore, awaken Christ, and He will say to you in your heart: When people revile you and say all kinds of evil against you falsely for my sake, rejoice and be glad, for your reward is great in heaven. Believe what has been said, and great tranquility will come in your heart. If, therefore, a man thinks he is something when he is nothing, he deceives himself; but let each one test his own work, and then in himself alone will he have reason to glory, and not in another. Whether he is praised or blamed, you have glory in yourself, because your glory is your God in your conscience; and you will be like the wise virgins, who took oil with them in vessels, so that they would not have glory in another, but in themselves. For those who did not take oil with them begged from others, and their lamps went out, and they said: Give us some of your oil. What is: Give us some of your oil, but: Praise our works, because our own conscience is not sufficient for us? What seemed obscure in the apostolic reading, as the Lord has granted, I have explained. The rest is clear: it does not require an expositor but a doer. However, that we may do what we have heard, let us ask Him, without whose help we can do no good; for He said to His disciples: Without me, you can do nothing. Turned to the Lord... AND AFTER THE SERMON, BECAUSE THE PEOPLE REQUESTED THAT WE SHOULD NOT DEPART BEFORE THE BIRTHDAY OF BLESSED CYPRIAN, HE ADDED:

Truly I say to your Charity, that we cannot endure the desire and complaints of our people even through letters; but because this, which you request, has already been commanded by the holy old man, thus I conclude my speech. The birthday of the blessed Cyprian is certainly already approaching; due to that solemnity, you wanted to be forceful in keeping me: therefore, we who devote ourselves to the word, it is good that we also fast bodily.

Sermons - Sermon 164

SERMO 164 ON THE WORDS OF THE APOSTLE (GAL 6:2-5):

"Carry each other's burdens"; AND ABOUT THESE:

"Each one will carry his own burden."

AGAINST THE DONATISTS, Shortly after the conference held in Carthage, he was pronounced The law of Christ is fulfilled by those bearing each other's burdens. The truth, through the Apostle, admonishes us all to bear one another's burdens; and in admonishing us to bear one another's burdens, it shows with what benefit we do this, adding and saying: And so you will fulfill the law of Christ; which will not be fulfilled unless we bear one another's burdens. What these burdens are, and how they ought to be borne, since we all ought to strive to the best of our abilities to fulfill the law of Christ, with the Lord's help I will try to show. Remember that you insist on me demonstrating this, and when I have done so, do not demand it again. I propose to demonstrate this, with the help of the Lord and your prayers for me, what burdens the Apostle commands us to bear with one another, and how they ought to be borne. If we do this, that benefit which was placed will naturally follow, so that we may fulfill the law of Christ.

Burdens must be distinguished.

Someone says: For the Apostle spoke obscurely, so do you attempt to explain what these burdens are, or how they should be borne by each other? There is a question there that forces us to distinguish burdens. And indeed, in that very section of the reading, you have it stated there: Each one will bear his own burden. Therefore, it immediately comes to your understanding: If each one will bear his own burden, how does he say: Bear each other's burdens? Unless because burdens must be distinguished, lest the Apostle be thought to speak contradictorily. For not far, not in another Epistle, not far above or below in this very same chapter; but in that very place, so that the same words are contiguous with one another, he placed both, both that each one will bear his own burden, and that he admonished and exhorted, that we should bear each other's burdens.

Two kinds of burden.

Therefore, there are certain burdens in which each one carries their own, neither carrying with another nor casting onto another; and there are certain burdens in which you rightly say to a brother: I carry it with you, or: I carry it for you. If therefore there is need of distinction, understanding is not easy. Hence, to those who thought a man could be contaminated by the sins of others, the Apostle responds: Each one will bear his own burden. Likewise, against those who might allow negligence to creep in, as if made secure by the fact that they would not be contaminated by the sins of others, they would care to correct no one: Bear one another's burdens. Briefly stated, briefly distinguished; and as far as I think, the manifestation of truth has not been hindered. For you have both heard briefly and understood quickly. I have not seen your hearts; but I have heard the voices of the heart as witnesses. Now therefore, as if secure in what has been understood, let us sometimes discuss more broadly; not to introduce understanding, but to commend what has been understood.

Each one his own burdens, sins. The burdens which each one carries are sins. To those men who carry the loads of these detestable burdens and who sweat in vain under them, the Lord says: Come to me, all you who labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. How does He give rest to those burdened with sins, except by granting the forgiveness of sins? The preacher of the world cries out from a certain watchtower of exalted authority: Hear, human race; hear, sons of Adam; hear, the laborious and unfruitful race: I see your labor, see my gift. I know you labor and are heavy laden; and what is more miserable, you bind destructive burdens to your shoulders; furthermore, what is worse, you ask for burdens to be added to you, not to be taken away. The burden of greed. The burden of laziness. Which of us in a short time can discuss the complexity and variety of these burdens? Yet let us mention a few from there and conjecture about the rest. Look at a man burdened with the load of greed, see him sweating, panting, thirsty under this load, and adding to the load by laboring. What are you expecting, O greedy one, embracing your burden and binding the evil load with chains of desire under your shoulders? What are you expecting? Why do you labor? Why do you gasp? Why do you desire? Surely to satisfy greed. O vain wishes and most wicked deeds! Are you expecting, then, to satisfy greed? It can press upon you, but you cannot satisfy it. Or perhaps it is not burdensome? Have you so far lost even sense under this load? Is greed not burdensome? Why then does it wake you from sleep, which sometimes even does not allow you to sleep? And perhaps you have with it another burden of sloth, and these two most wicked burdens pressing upon and tearing you apart. They do not command in equal terms, nor do they order alike. Sloth says: Sleep; greed says: Rise. Sloth says: Do not endure cold days; greed says: Bear storms even at sea. One says: Rest; the other does not allow rest. It commands not only: Go forth; but also: Sail across the sea, seek lands that you do not know. Wares must be carried to India; you do not know the language of the Indians, but the language of greed seems understandable. You will go unknown to the unknown; you give, you receive, you buy, you carry; you arrive risking dangers, you return with dangers, you cry out in the sea agitated by a storm: God, deliver me. Do you not hear the response: Why? Did I send you? Greed commanded you to acquire what you did not have; I commanded you to give to the poor without toil what you had at your door. It sent you to the Indians to bring back gold; I placed Christ at your door, from whom you would buy the kingdom of heaven. You labor under the command of greed, you do not labor under my command. We both commanded; you did not hear me: let him to whom you listened deliver you. For the burdens of desire, take up the burdens of love.

How many carry these burdens? How many positioned beneath them cry out against those very burdens as I speak against them? They entered with burdens, they exit with burdens; they entered greedy, they leave greedy. I have labored by speaking against these burdens. If you cry out, set down what you are carrying. Finally, do not listen to me; listen to your Emperor shouting: Come to me, all you who labor and are burdened. For you will not come unless you cease to labor. You want to run to me, but you cannot with heavy burdens. Come, he says, to me, all you who labor and are burdened, and I will refresh you. I grant forgiveness for past sins, I will remove what weighed down your eyes, I will heal what harmed your shoulders. I will indeed take away the burdens, but I will not leave you empty of burdens: I will take away bad burdens and lay on good ones. For when he said: And I will refresh you; he added: Take my yoke upon you. Lust subjected you badly, but love will subject you beneficially.

Christ the teacher, what he wishes to be learned from him. The burden of Christ is light.

Take my yoke upon you, and learn from me. If any human teaching has become vile to you, learn from me. Christ cries out as teacher, the only Son of God, the only truthful one, the truth itself cries out: Learn from me. What? Because in the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and God was the Word, and all things were made through him. Could we learn from him to make the world, to fill the sky with lights, to order the changes of day and night, to command times and ages to go forth, to give power to seeds, to fill the earth with animals? The heavenly teacher commands us to learn none of these things: he does these as God. But because this God deigned to be both God and man, listen to what he says to be refreshed in what concerns his divinity; listen to what he says to imitate in what concerns his humanity. He says, "Learn from me"; not to fabricate the world and create natures, nor even those other things which, as hidden God and manifest man, he accomplished; nor does he say: "Learn from me to drive out fevers from the sick, to cast out demons, to raise the dead, to command the winds and waves, to walk on the waters"; nor does he say this: "Learn from me". For he gave these powers to some of his disciples, to some he did not give them: but this, "Learn from me", he says to all; from this precept let no one excuse himself: "Learn from me, for I am meek and humble of heart". Why do you hesitate to bear this burden? Is this burden heavy, humility and piety? Is this burden heavy, faith, hope, charity? For these make one humble, these make one meek. And see that you will not be weighed down if you listen to him. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light. What does it mean: it is light? What if it has weight, but less? Does avarice have more weight, and justice less? I do not want you to understand it this way. This burden is not the weight of one overburdened, but wings for one about to fly. For birds also have the burdens of their feathers. And what do we say? They carry them, and they are carried by them. They carry them on earth, they are carried by them in heaven. If you wish to show mercy to a bird, especially in summer, and you say: "These feathers burden this poor little bird," and you remove this burden; it will remain on the ground, the one you wanted to help. Therefore carry the wings of peace, receive the wings of charity. This is the burden, thus the law of Christ will be fulfilled.

Each one bears the burden of his own desire or love. The burdens are distinct. See now, I don't know, someone greedy comes in; you know that greedy person, he stands with you, and you are not greedy; but you are even merciful, you give to the poor what you have, you do not covet what you do not have; you hear the Apostle saying: "Command the rich of this world not to be haughty, nor to set their hopes on the uncertainty of riches, but on the living God, who provides us with everything richly for enjoyment; let them do good, be rich in good deeds, be generous and willing to share, laying up for themselves a good foundation for the future, so that they may take hold of the life that is truly life." You have listened, recognized, learned, held on, acted. Do what you are doing, do not become slothful, do not cease. He who perseveres to the end will be saved. You did well to man, the man is ungrateful; do not regret having done well, lest by regretting you destroy what you accomplished through mercy; say in your heart: He does not see for whom I did it, but He sees for whom I did it; because if he saw, if he were not ungrateful, it would benefit him more than it would benefit me. Hold fast to God, who is not hidden from what I do; not only what I do, but even what I do from the heart; I hope for the reward from Him, who does not seek a witness of my deed. Such you are, and perhaps in the people of God stands next to you a greedy robber, coveting others' possessions. Whom you know to be such, and he is faithful, or rather called faithful, you cannot expel him from the Church, you have no access to correct and rebuke him, he will approach the altar with you; do not fear: Each one will bear his own load. Remember the Apostle, that you may come with peace of mind: Each one will bear his own load. Only let him not say to you: Carry with me. For if you wish to share greed with him, the load will not be lessened, but two will be burdened. Therefore let each bear his own burden, and you yours: because when the Lord threw off such a burden from your shoulders, He placed another; He threw off the burden of covetousness, placing the burden of charity. Therefore according to their desires each one bears his own load, the bad a bad one, the good a good one.

Burdens that must be shared.

Turn yourself now to that precept: Bear one another's burdens. For you have the burden of Christ; from which you should bear with another his own burden. He is poor, you are rich; his burden is poverty; you do not have such a burden. Be careful that when the poor man calls upon you, you do not say: Each one shall bear his own burden. Here, listen to another precept: Bear one another's burdens. Poverty is not my burden, but it is the burden of my brother. Be careful that wealth is not a greater burden for you. For you do not have the burden of poverty, but you have the burden of riches. If you consider rightly, it is a burden. He has one burden, you have another. Bear with him, and let him bear with you, so that you may carry each other's burdens. What is the burden of poverty? Not having. What is the burden of riches? Having more than is needed. Both he and you are burdened. Bear with him in not having, and let him bear with you in having more; so that your burdens may be equal. For if you give to the needy, you lessen for him the burden of not having, which was his burden; if you give to him, he begins to have; his burden of not having is lessened; he also lessens your burden, which is called having too much. Two of you walk the way of God in the pilgrimage of this age: you carry excessive unnecessary wealth, he carries no wealth; he joins you, desiring to be your companion; do not neglect, do not disdain, do not leave him. Don't you see how much you are carrying? Give something from it to the one who carries nothing and has nothing, and you will help your companion and relieve yourself. The apostolic sentence has been sufficiently, as I reckon, explained. The Donatists are stubborn in schism. Do not let them sell you delusions who say: We are holy, we do not carry your burdens, therefore we do not communicate with you. These carry greater burdens of division, greater burdens of cutting off, burdens of schism, burdens of heresy, burdens of dissent, burdens of animosity, burdens of false testimonies, burdens of slanderous accusations. We have tried, and we try, to lay these burdens off the shoulders of our brothers. They love holding those burdens to themselves, they do not want to be lesser, because they have been inflated by those burdens. For even he who puts down the burden he was carrying on his neck becomes as if lesser; but he has laid down the weight, not his stature.

He who tolerates the wicked does not thereby partake in their sins. But you say, I do not partake in others' sins. As if I were to say to you: Come, partake in others' sins. I do not say this, I know what the Apostle says; but I say this. Because of others' sins, if they were true, and not more your own, you would not abandon the flock of God mixed with sheep and goats; you would not leave the Lord's threshing floor as long as the chaff is being threshed; you would not tear apart the Lord's nets as long as they draw good and bad fish to the shore. And how, you ask, would I endure whom I know to be evil? Would it not be better to endure him, than to carry yourself out? Behold how you would endure: if you heeded the Apostle saying: Each one will bear his own load; this sentence would set you free. For you would not partake in his greed, but you would partake with him at Christ's table. And what harm would it be to you, if you partook with him at Christ's table? The Apostle says: For whoever eats and drinks unworthily, eats and drinks judgment upon himself. Upon himself, not upon you. Surely if you are a judge, if you have received the power to judge, according to ecclesiastical rule, if he is accused before you, if he is convicted by true documents and witnesses, control, correct, excommunicate, degrade. Let tolerance be vigilant in such a way that discipline does not sleep.

Caecilianus, absent and innocent, is condemned. The laws of the emperors against the Donatists. Caecilianus acquitted three times. Primianus. But they say, "Caecilian was condemned." Condemned? By whom? First in absence, then by traitors though innocent. These things were alleged, inserted in the records, and proven. They indeed tried to weaken the power of the truth and strove as much as they could to cloud its clarity with empty mists of accusations. The Lord was present; His clarity overcame their mists. And see how, unknowingly, they absolved the Church of the whole world, in whose communion we rejoice, whatever we might be within it. We do not defend ourselves, but we defend it; maintaining it, we defend the lord's threshing floor. I proclaim for the lord's threshing floor. Who you are within it, I do not want you to care; I await the winnowing fan. I do not want, I say, that you care about this; or if you want to care, do not care with contention, so that you may heal your brothers. Tend to the chaff, if you can; but do not neglect the wheat, if you cannot tend to the chaff. Sometimes the chaff is shaken out from the lord's threshing floor; sometimes also the grains, but not far. However, there are good workers, who go around the threshing floor and bring back what has been shaken out with some cleaning instruments, even if by pulling or even by compelling. The cleaning instruments are these worldly laws. Bring back, even with the earth, drag the wheat, lest the wheat perish because of the earth. They say, "Caecilian was condemned." He was once condemned in absence, thrice absolved in presence. We responded to them; and to the unteachable men, as much as we could, we briefly reminded them of their deeds, and said: Why do you recite against Caecilian the council of seventy bishops, passing sentences on an absent one? More sentences were passed by the council of the Maximianists against the absent Primianus. We said: Caecilian was condemned by those in his absence, Primianus was condemned by these in his absence. Just as these do not prejudice against the absent Primianus, so those could not prejudice against the absent Caecilian. The Donatists condemned by their own opinion.

What do you think they answered in this distress? What indeed could they say? How could they escape, enclosed in the nets of truth? To violently break these nets, what did they say briefly and absolutely on our behalf? And indeed many things, and almost all in our favor, as the deeds will show, which your Charity is now about to read. But at this point I ask you, and I implore you through Christ, that you hold, say, and always have on your lips. For no shorter, more certain, and clearer sentence could be given on our behalf. So what did he say, when we objected: As these do not prejudice Caecilian, so also those do not prejudice Primianus. And the defender of their cause said: Neither does a case prejudice a case, nor a person prejudice a person. O brief, clear, true response! For he did not know what he said; but like Caiaphas, though he was the high priest, he prophesied: Neither does a case prejudice a case, nor a person prejudice a person. If neither a case prejudices a case, nor a person prejudices a person, then each one carries their own burden. Let him now go and object to you about Caecilianus; not to you, a mere human, but to the whole world he should object about Caecilianus. When he does this, he objects to the innocent on behalf of the innocent. Certainly, the deeds will show this very clearly. Caecilianus has been acquitted. But even assume he was not acquitted, assume he was found guilty; hear your own voice from the whole world: Neither does a case prejudice a case, nor a person prejudice a person. O heretical soul, incurable, spirited, when you pass judgment on yourself, why do you accuse the judge? If I corrupted him to judge in my favor, who corrupted you to condemn yourself?

What holds the Donatists in error. Would that they think on these things at some time, or at least think on them late, or think on them when their animosity subsides; let them return to themselves, question themselves, scrutinize themselves, answer themselves, and not fear those to whom they have long sold falsehood for the sake of truth. For they fear to offend these; they are ashamed before human weakness, and are not ashamed before the most invincible truth. Certainly they fear this, lest it be said to them: Why then did you deceive us? Why did you lead us astray? Why did you speak so many evil and false things? They should reply, if they feared God. It was human to err, but it is diabolical to remain in error out of animosity. Indeed, it would have been better if we had never erred; but let us do at least what next best, to correct error sometime. We deceived because we were deceived; we preached false things because we believed those preaching false things. Let them say to their people: We erred together, let us together withdraw from error. We were leaders to the pit for you, and you followed when we led to the pit; and now follow when we lead to the Church. They could say these things; they could say to the indignant, to the enraged, and in time they would set aside their indignation, and love unity though late.

Patience must be shown towards them.

Nevertheless, brothers, let us be patient with them. They are in a state of fervor and swelling of the eyes whom we are treating. I do not say that we should cease to treat them, but that we should not provoke them to greater bitterness with insults; let us gently render reason, and not boast proudly of victory. For the servant of the Lord must not quarrel, says the Apostle, but be gentle to all, able to teach, patient, correcting with modesty those who dissent; if perhaps God may grant them repentance, and they may recover from the snares of the devil, by whom they are held captive according to his will. Therefore, bear patiently, if you are healthy, bear patiently, as far as you are healthy. For who is perfectly healthy? When the just King sits on his throne, who will boast of having a pure heart, or who will boast of being free from sin? Therefore, as long as we are such, we owe this to ourselves, that we bear one another's burdens. Turned to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 164A

Sermon 164/A On the Generality of Alms To whom alms should be given.

There are those who think that alms should only be given to the righteous and that such help must not be given to sinners. In this error, first place is held by the sacrilegious Manicheans, who believe that in any food the members of God are mixed and bound, which they think must be spared so they are not polluted by sinners and entangled in more wretched bonds. Perhaps this madness is less satisfactorily refuted than it offends the sense of all sane people if it is merely put forward. However, some, feeling nothing of the sort, think that sinners should not be fed so that we do not contend against God, whose wrath is declared in them, as if He might also become angry with us because we want to help those whom He wishes to punish. They also cite testimonies from the holy Scriptures, where we read: "Give mercy, but do not accept a sinner," and, "Render vengeance to the ungodly and to sinners." "Do good to the humble but do not give to the impious. For the Most High also hates sinners and will render vengeance to the impious." Not understanding how these words should be taken, they are clothed in detestable cruelty. Therefore, brothers, it is fitting that we speak to your charity on this matter, so that you do not consent to a perverse thought contrary to the divine will. The Apostle teaches that mercy is to be extended to all.

Paul the apostle teaches that mercy must be extended to all most clearly, saying: "Let us not become weary, as long as we have time, let us do good to all, especially to those who are of the household of faith." From this, it truly appears that in such works the just should be preferred. For whom else are we to understand as the household of faith, when elsewhere it is plainly written: "The just shall live by faith"? Yet, the bowels of mercy are not to be closed to other men, even sinners, nor even if they bear a hostile mind towards us, with our Savior himself saying and advising: "Love your enemies, do good to those who hate you." Nor is this silent in the Old Books. For there it is read: "If your enemy is hungry, feed him; if he is thirsty, give him something to drink," which also the Apostle used in the New.

Neither lax in punishing, nor inhuman in aiding. The things we have stated above are not false, because they are also divine precepts: Give mercy and do not support the sinner. For these things are said so that you do good to no sinner because he is a sinner, but to do good to him who hates you, not because he is a sinner, but because he is a man. Thus, you will hold fast to both precepts, neither lenient in vindication nor inhumane in assistance. For anyone who properly rebukes a sinner, what else does he want but for him not to be a sinner? Thus, he hates in him what God also hates, so that what man has done may be destroyed, and what God has made may be freed. For man made sin, but God made man. And when we say the two names together, sinful man, they are not said in vain. Rebuke because he is a sinner, and have mercy because he is a man. You will not by any means free the man unless you persecute the sinner in him. Every discipline watches over this office, as it is fitting and accommodated to each ruler: not only to the bishop ruling his congregation, but also to the poor man ruling his household, the rich man ruling his family, the husband ruling his wife, the father ruling his offspring, the judge ruling his province, and the king ruling his nation. All these, when they are good, certainly wish well for those they rule, and according to the power imparted by the Lord of all, who also rules those who rule, they strive to ensure that those they govern are preserved as men and that sinners perish. Thus, they fulfill what is written: Give mercy and do not support the sinner, so that they would not wish that what is sinful in him be saved; and render vengeance to the impious and sinners, so that what is impious and sinful in them may be eradicated; do good to the humble because he is humble, and do not give to the impious because he is impious, for the Most High hates sinners and will repay vengeance to the impious. However, because they are not only sinners and impious but also men, He makes His sun rise on the good and on the evil, and sends rain on the just and on the unjust. Thus, mercy is to be denied to no man, and impunity is to be relaxed to no sin.

Even to sinners mercy should not be denied, because they are also human. From this, therefore, it is especially to be understood how alms, which are bestowed upon the poor by the right of humanity, should not be despised, since the Lord relieved the need of the poor even from those purses which He filled with the wealth of others. But if perhaps someone might say that neither those weak and beggars, whom the Lord ordered rather to be invited, nor those to whom He used to distribute from the purses, were sinners; therefore, it does not follow that, on account of these evangelical testimonies, even sinners should be received or fed by the merciful; let him consider what I have already mentioned above, that surely the sinners and especially the wicked are those who hate and persecute the Church, concerning whom, however, it is said: Do good to those who hate you. And this is affirmed by the example of God the Father, who makes His sun rise on the good and the evil, and sends rain on the righteous and the unrighteous. Therefore, let us not receive sinners because they are sinners, but nevertheless treat those same individuals, because they are also human, with human consideration. Let us combat their inherent wickedness, but pity their common condition. And thus, tirelessly, while we have time, let us do good to all, but especially to those who are of the household of faith.

Sermons - Sermon 165

SERMO 165 FROM THE WORDS OF THE APOSTLE (EPH 3, 13-18):

"I ask that you do not lose heart at my tribulations for you,"

"WHAT IS YOUR GLORY", ETC., Of Grace and Free Will, Against the Pelagians.

Dress in the Basilica of the Elders Hope is to be placed in God, not in the strength of free will. The cooperation of grace and free will.

We have heard the Apostle, we have heard the Psalm, we have heard the Gospel; all the divine readings harmonize, so that we place our hope not in ourselves, but in the Lord. The Apostle says, "I ask that you do not weaken in my tribulations for you, which is your glory." I ask, he says, that you do not weaken, that is, that you do not lose heart when you hear that I suffer tribulations for you; because this is your glory. Therefore, he asks them not to lose heart; which he would not do if he did not wish to stir their will. For if they were to reply: "Why do you ask us for something we do not have in our power?" Would they not seem to have given a just response? And yet the Apostle, unless he knew there was within them the agreement of their own will, where they themselves could do something, would not say: "I ask." And if he were to say: "I command," unless he knew they could apply their will to his command, this word would proceed from his mouth in vain. But again, knowing that without God's help the will of man is weak, lest they should say: "We do not have free will," he said: "I ask"; and lest they should say: "Free will is sufficient for us," see what he added: "For this reason." For what reason, unless it was as he said above: "I ask that you do not weaken in my tribulations for you, which is your glory"? Therefore, because you have free will: I ask. But because free will is not sufficient to fulfill what I ask: For this reason I bend my knees to the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, from whom all fatherhood in heaven and on earth is named. That he may grant you. What: grant you? What I ask of you, I pray he may grant you. For I ask of you, on account of free will: I pray he may grant you, on account of the help of majesty. From God is asked this very thing which is required by man. But let us anticipate the words of the Apostle. Perhaps you are still waiting to hear, you who do not remember the text of the same reading, whether the Apostle indeed bows his knees to the Father for them to give them what he said: I ask. Therefore, remember what he asked of them. I ask that you do not lose heart at my tribulations for you: this he asks of them. Now see what he asks for them: I bow my knees to the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, that he may grant you according to the riches of his glory to be strengthened with power. What else is it but not to lose heart? To be strengthened with power, he says, through his Spirit. This is the Spirit of grace. See what he asks for. He asks this from God, which he requires of men; for in order for God to be willing to give, you must also adjust your will to receive. How do you wish to receive the grace of divine goodness if you do not open the bosom of your will? He says, grant to you. For you do not have it unless he grants it to you. May he grant you to be strengthened with power through his Spirit. For if he grants you to be strengthened with power, then he grants you not to lose heart. That Christ may dwell in your hearts through faith in the inner man. May he grant you all this. Being rooted and grounded in love, that you may have power to comprehend with all the saints. What to comprehend? May he grant you to be strengthened with power through his Spirit, and that Christ may dwell in your inner man through faith, and thus being rooted and grounded in love, you may have power to comprehend with all the saints: what? What is the breadth, the length, the height, and the depth. In the Latin language indeed, height signifies both: what is upwards is called height; and what is deep down is also called height. Therefore the interpreter rightly answered to call what is high upwards, height; and to call what is deep down, depth. In the four dimensions, the mystery of the cross.

What is it then, my brothers, let me explain this to you. Perhaps it is easier for anyone; what then? Because breadth, length, height, and depth, these four things that the Apostle says, are less suitable for me either to comprehend or to express, shall I pass by this? Or perhaps I will knock, and to bring forth something beneficial for you, will I be helped by your prayers? Why do you traverse, Christian man, in heart, through the breadth of the earth, the length of time, the height of heaven, the depth of the abyss? When do you understand these things either by mind or body? That is, whether by thinking or by looking with the eyes of the flesh, when do you understand these things? Listen to the Apostle himself saying to you: "But far be it from me to boast except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." And let us also glory in that, whether because we rely on it. Let us all glory in that, O good brothers, let us glory in that. There we may perhaps find both breadth, and length, and height, and depth. For by the Apostle's words, the cross is somehow set before our eyes. For it has breadth, where the hands are fixed; it has length, where the wood is led down to the ground; it also has height, which exceeds somewhat from the transverse part where the hands are fixed, where the head of the crucified is placed; and it has depth, which is planted in the earth and is not seen. Behold the great mystery. From that depth which you do not see, rises everything that you do see. The breadth of the cross, the length and the breadth. Where then is the breadth? Look at the life and ways of the saints, who say: Far be it for me to boast except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ. We find in their ways the breadth of charity; hence the Apostle himself admonishes them, saying: Be wide, do not be yoked with unbelievers. And because he himself was wide, who exhorted them to breadth, hear what he says: Our mouth is open to you, O Corinthians; our heart is widened. Therefore, breadth is charity, which alone works well. Breadth makes God love a cheerful giver. For if he has suffered distress, he will give sadly: if he gives sadly, what he gives perishes. Therefore, there is need for the breadth of charity, lest whatever good you do perishes. But since the Lord says: Where iniquity abounds, the love of many will grow cold; give me also length. What is length? He who endures to the end will be saved. This is the length of the cross, where the whole body is stretched out; where, in a way, one stands, and by standing perseveres. Therefore, if you seek to glory in the cross, to have the breadth of the cross, have the virtue of doing good. If you want to have the length of the cross, have the longanimity of persevering. But if you want to have the height of the cross, know what you hear, and where you hear: Lift up your hearts. What is "Lift up your hearts"? Hope there, love there: ask virtue from there, expect the reward there. For if you do well and give cheerfully, you seem to have breadth. If you persevere in the same good works until the end, you seem to have length. But if you do all these things not for the heavenly reward, you will not have height; and it will no longer be breadth nor length. For what is to have height, if not to think of God, to love God; and to love God freely as helper, as observer, as crown-giver, as reward-giver; finally to consider God himself as the reward, and to expect nothing from him but himself? If you love, love freely: if you truly love, he whom you love will be your reward. Do you indeed hold all things dear, and is He who created all things vile to you? The depth of the cross. That we may be able, the Apostle bent his knees for us, of course, in order that it might be given to us. For the Gospel terrifies: To you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom, but to them it is not given. For whoever has, it will be given to him. But who has to whom it will be given, except to whom it has been given? But whoever does not have, even what he has will be taken away from him. But who does not have, except to whom it has not been given? Why then is it given to this one, and not given to that one? I am not reluctant to say, this is the depth of the cross. From some deepness of the judgments of God, which we cannot scrutinize or contemplate, proceeds everything which we can. From the deepness, I say, of the judgments of God, which we cannot contemplate because they are inscrutable, which we cannot scrutinize, proceeds everything which we can. What I can, I see: whence I can, I do not see; except that I see this so far, that I know it to be from God. But why this one, and not that one; it is much for me, it is an abyss, it is the depth of the cross; I can exclaim in admiration, I cannot demonstrate in argument. What can I exclaim about this depth? How magnificent are your works, O Lord! Nations are enlightened, Jews are blinded. Some infants are cleansed by the sacrament of Baptism, but other infants are left in the death of the first man. How magnificent are your works, O Lord! Your thoughts have become exceedingly deep! And it follows: The unwise man does not know, and the fool does not understand this. What does the fool and the unwise not understand? Because it is deep. For if the fool does not understand, and the wise one understands, it is not exceedingly deep. But if the wise one understands because it is deep, the fool does not understand because it is indeed deep. The error of souls sins before the body, whence.

Therefore many, seeking to account for this profound mystery, have turned to foolish fables. Some have said that souls sin up in heaven, and according to their sins are directed to bodies based on their merits, and are imprisoned in them as if in prisons. They followed their own thoughts; wishing to dispute about the depth of God, they plunged into the depth. For the Apostle encounters them, wishing to commend grace, and chose those twins in Rebekah’s womb, and says: For the children not yet being born, nor having done any good or evil. See how he took away from vain men the fantasies of the souls' existence and actions in heaven before the body. For if they have already lived there, they have already done some good or evil, and are thrust into earthly bodies for their merits. If it pleases, let us contradict the Apostle, who said: For the children not yet being born, nor having done any good or evil. But because of the Apostle's clear statement, the Catholic faith rejects this, that souls first live and act in the heavens, and there assume merits for the bodies to be received. Thus these newcomers do not dare to say it now.

Death comes only from sin. The death of infants comes from the sin of the first man. But what do they say? Some, as we have heard, argue thus: Certainly, they say, all men die because of their merits, because they have sinned; for there would be no death unless it came from sin. It has indeed been well and truly said: There would be no death unless it came from sin. But when I hear this, I commend it because I look upon that first death and the sin of that first man. For I hear the Apostle: As in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive. By one man, sin entered into the world, and by sin, death; and so it passed upon all men, in whom all have sinned. For all were one. Do I thus hear you saying that man's death is caused by sin? No, he says. And what do you say? God creates every man immortal now. Remarkable newness. What are you saying? Certainly, he says, God creates every man immortal. Why then do little infants die? For if I say: Why do grown men die? You will tell me: They have sinned. Therefore, I will not dispute about adults: I will summon the infancy of little children against you as a witness. They do not speak yet, and they convict you; they are silent, and they prove what I say. Behold, infants are innocent in their deeds, having nothing but what they have drawn from the first man; for which reason Christ's grace is necessary for them, that they may be made alive in Christ, who have died in Adam; that because they have been stained by generation, they may be cleansed by regeneration. Therefore, I will summon them as witnesses. Answer me: Why do they die if all men are born immortal, and because they sin, therefore they die? What do you think could be said? What ears could bear it? They also have sinned. Where have they sinned? I ask you, when did they sin? how did they sin? They do not know what good and evil are. Do they take a sin who do not understand a command? Prove to me that infants are sinners; what you have said, truly because you forgot what you were, prove to me the sins of infants. Or because they cry, do they sin? Because with the movements of almost mute animals, they repel discomforts and accept pleasures, therefore they sin? If these movements are sins, they become greater sinners in baptism; for when they are baptized, they resist most vehemently. Why is sin not imputed to them in such great resistance, except because there is not yet any will of choice?

Little ones extinguished in the womb. But I say something else: Those who were born, as you think, have sinned. For if they did not sin, you say, they would not die. What do you say about those who die in the womb? O distress! And he says, they also sinned, therefore they die. Are you lying, or are you mistaken? The Apostle contradicts: Not yet born, nor having done anything good or bad. I rather listen to the Apostle than to you: I believe the Apostle more than you: Not yet born, nor having done anything good or bad. But if you refute this testimony, go rather to those wanderings, and say: Because they sinned in the heaven, and so they are thrown into bodies. I do not say, he says. Why do you not say? Because the Apostle says: Not yet born, nor having done anything good or bad. If therefore you do not accuse them in heaven, why do you accuse them in the womb? The Apostle responds to both, and he responds to those who say: They sinned in heaven; and he responds to those who say: They sinned in the womb, because those words which say, before they were born, they had done nothing either good or bad, apply to both. Why then do they die? And here I will listen to you, and not rather to the Master of the Gentiles?

Grace helping the little ones and the greater ones. The inscrutable mystery of grace.

Tell me, Paul the Apostle, why do they die? Through one man, sin entered into the world, and through sin, death; and so death passed upon all men, in whom all have sinned. Behold, the first man made the whole mass condemnable: come, come our Lord, the second man; come, come; come by another path, come through a virgin; come alive, find the dead: die, that you may help the dying, transfer the dead to life, redeem the dead from death, save life in death, kill death by death. This is the sole grace for the little ones, the sole grace for the greater ones: it alone frees the small with the great. Why him, and why him; why not him and him; do not ask me. I am a man: I observe the depth of the cross, I do not penetrate it; I am frightened, I do not investigate. His judgments are inscrutable, his ways unsearchable. I am a man, you are a man; he was a man who said: O man, who are you who answers God? A man was speaking, he was speaking to a man. Let man hear, that man may not perish, for whom God became man. Therefore in this depth of the cross, in this great obscurity of things, let us hold fast to what we have sung: let us not presume on our own virtue, let us not arrogantly attribute anything in this inquiry to the strength of our intellect: let us say the Psalm, let us say with the Psalm: Have mercy on me, O God, have mercy on me. Why?

Because I have a virtue by which I may merit you? No. Why? Because I bear the will's choice, where my merit precedes your grace? No. But why? Because my soul trusts in you. Great knowledge, this trust. Turned to the Lord...

Sermons - Sermon 166

SERMO 166 Concerning what the Apostle Paul said (Ephesians 4:25):

"LAYING ASIDE FALSEHOOD, SPEAK THE TRUTH" AND CONCERNING WHAT IS SAID THERE (PS 115, 11):

"Every man is a liar"

Lying is forbidden to man. This statement, which the Apostle said: Putting away falsehood, speak the truth, is not contrary to that statement which is said in the Psalm: Every man is a liar, if the Lord grants understanding, we will briefly explain. What then is: Putting away falsehood, speak the truth; and: Every man is a liar? Does God command impossible things through the Apostle? No. What then does He command? I dare to say: but may you accept it as said without offense, because I also say it about myself; God commands this, that we should not be humans. For if I were to say: God commands that you should not be humans, perhaps you would take it harshly; and so I included myself, so that no one may be angry.

Men are troubled because they are men. In the old man, falsehood; in the new man, truth. But I say more to your Holiness: we find the Apostle accusing men, as if it were a crime, for being men; for in reproaching them he said this. Just as we, when angry, say to someone: "You are a beast"; so he, in rebuking them with the rod of the Lord's discipline, accused men because they were men. What did he want them to become, for whom it was a crime to be men? For he says, "For whereas there is among you envying and strife, are ye not carnal, and walk after the manner of men? For when one saith, I am of Paul; and another, I am of Apollos; are ye not men?" Rebuking and reproaching he said, "Are ye not men?" What then did he want them to become, except what is said in the Psalm, "I said, Ye are gods, and all of you are children of the Most High"? This indeed God said: for to this He calls. But what does He add? "But ye shall die like men, and fall like one of the princes." And there it is a reproach that is cast, with the words: "But ye shall die like men." For Adam is man, and not the Son of Man; Christ, however, is the Son of Man and God. The old man pertains to falsehood, that is, Adam; the new man to truth, the Son of Man, that is, Christ God. If you discard falsehood, put off Adam; if you speak the truth, put on Christ; and those things will not be contrary to you which are now set in Scripture. For the Apostle, warning to put off the old man and put on the new, says: "Putting away lying, speak every man truth." And the Psalm was admonishing and lamenting those who, unwilling to put off Adam and put on Christ, did not want to be new men, but only men, to whom it is said: "Are ye not men?" and upon whom falls what is said: "Every man is a liar."

How the things that are of God, become ours.

If you wish to be a man, you will be a liar. Do not wish to be a man, and you will not be a liar. Put on Christ, and you will be truthful; so that what you have spoken will not be your own as if belonging to you, and founded by you, but of the truth enlightening and illuminating you. For if you are stripped of the light, you will remain in your darkness, and you will not be able to speak anything but lies. For the Lord himself says: He who speaks a lie, speaks of his own; because every man is a liar. Therefore, he who speaks the truth does not speak of his own but of God. Not indeed in such a way that we say he speaks of what is alien; for they become his own when he loves what he receives and gives thanks to the one who gives. For if the enlightenment of truth is taken away from a man, he will remain like one naked, stripped of the garment of light, and he will not be able to speak anything but lies. For this remains in him, which is written in the Psalm: Every man is a liar.

You have been called to be not a human, but a son of God.

There is therefore no reason for anyone to complain and say to me: "I lie because I am a man." For I will also say confidently: "Do not be a man, so that you do not lie." Therefore, he says, "Will I not be a man?" Not indeed. For you are called to this by Him who became a man for you, so that you might not be a man. Do not be angry. It is not said to you in such a way that you should not be a man to become a beast, but so that you may be among those who were given the power to become children of God. For God wants to make you god; but not by nature, as He whom He begat; but by His gift and adoption. Just as He became a partaker of your mortality through humanity, so He makes you a partaker of His immortality through exaltation. Therefore, give thanks and embrace what has been given, so that you may deserve to enjoy what you were called to. Do not be Adam, and you will not be a man. If not a man, certainly not a liar; because: "Every man is a liar." And when you begin not to lie, do not attribute it to yourself and be proud, as if it were your own; lest by the wind of pride, like a lamp lit from elsewhere, you be extinguished, and remain again in your lie. Therefore, do not lie, brothers. For you were old men; you have come to the grace of God, you have become new men. Lies belong to Adam; truth belongs to Christ. Therefore, putting aside lying, speak the truth, so that this mortal flesh which you still have from Adam, preceded by the newness of the spirit, may also deserve renewal and change at the time of its resurrection; and thus the entire man, deified, may adhere to the eternal and unchangeable truth.

Sermons - Sermon 167

SERMO 167 ON THE WORDS OF THE APOSTLE (EPH 5:15-16):

"See then that you walk circumspectly;" Not as unwise, but as wise.

Redeeming the time, because the days are evil.

You have heard the Apostle being read; indeed, we have all heard him, saying to us: See that you walk carefully; not as unwise, but as wise; redeeming the time, because the days are evil. The days are made evil, brothers, by two things: wickedness and misery. Evil days are led by the wickedness of men and the misery of men. Moreover, these days, as far as the span of hours is concerned, are orderly; they follow their turns, mark the times; the sun rises, the sun sets, the times pass. To whom are the times troublesome, if men are not troublesome to themselves? Therefore, as I have said, two things make evil days: the misery of men and the wickedness of men. But the misery of men is universal; wickedness ought not to be universal. From the time Adam fell and was expelled from paradise, days have never been anything but evil. Let us ask these children who are born why they begin with weeping, though they can also laugh. A child is born, and immediately weeps; after I know not how many days, it laughs. When it was weeping at birth, it was a prophet of its own calamity; for tears are witnesses of misery. It has not yet begun to speak, and already it is a prophet. What does it prophesy? That it will be in labor or in fear. And if it lives well and is just, it will certainly always fear, placed amid temptations. The righteous are never here without persecution.

What does the Apostle say? All who wish to live piously in Christ will suffer persecution. Behold, because the days are evil, the righteous cannot live here without persecution. Those who live among the wicked suffer persecution. All the wicked persecute the good, not with iron and stones, but with life and manners. Was any wicked man persecuting the holy Lot in Sodom? No one was troublesome to him; and yet he lived among the impious, and among the unclean, the proud, the blasphemers, he suffered persecution, not by being beaten, but by living among the wicked. Whoever hears me, and does not yet live piously in Christ, begin to live piously in Christ, and you will prove what I say. Finally, when the Apostle was recounting his dangers: In dangers, he said, on the sea, in dangers on the rivers, in dangers in the desert, in dangers among robbers, in dangers among false brethren. Other dangers may cease, but dangers from false brethren will not cease until the end of the world.

Redeem the time.

Let us redeem the time; for the days are evil. Perhaps you expect me to explain what it means to redeem the time. I will say it, though few hear, few bear it, few undertake it, few act on it; nevertheless I will say it, because even those few who will hear me live among the wicked. To redeem the time, this is: when someone brings a lawsuit against you, lose something in order to be free for God, not for lawsuits. So lose; from what you lose, the cost is for time. Indeed, when you go out for your necessities to the market, you give coins, and you buy for yourself bread, or wine, or oil, or wood, or some utensil; you give and you receive, you lose something, you acquire something; this is buying. For if you lose nothing and have what you did not have before, either you found it, or you received it as a gift, or acquired it by inheritance. However, when you lose something in order to have something, then you buy; what you have is bought; what you lose is the price. Just as you lose coins to buy something for yourself, so lose coins to buy peace for yourself. Behold, this is to redeem the time. A Punic proverb agreeing with the precept of Christ.

There is a well-known Punic proverb, which I will indeed tell you in Latin, because not everyone knows Punic. It is an ancient Punic proverb: The plague seeks a coin; give it two, and it will go away. Does this proverb not seem to be born from the Gospel? For what else did the Lord say, except: Redeeming the time, when He said: If anyone wants to sue you and take your tunic, let him have your cloak as well? He wants to sue you and take your tunic, he wants to draw you away from your God by lawsuits; you will not have a calm heart, you will not have a tranquil mind, you will be disturbed by your thoughts, you will be irritated against your very adversary. Behold, you have lost time. How much better it is, therefore, to lose money and redeem the time? My brothers, in your cases and in your dealings, when they come to us to be judged, if I tell a Christian man to lose something of his for the sake of redeeming the time, with how much more care and confidence should I tell him to return what belongs to another? For I hear both are Christians. Now the litigious one, who wants to make a case against another and take from him even for a settlement, rejoices at these words. The Apostle said: Redeeming the time, because the days are evil. Therefore, I make a complaint against that Christian, whether he wills it or not, he gives me something to redeem the time, because he heard the bishop. Tell me, if I will say to him: Lose something, so that you may have rest; will I not say to you: Litigious one, wicked son of the devil, why do you try to take what belongs to another? You have no case, and you are full of deceit. If, therefore, I say to him: Give him something, so that he may withdraw from deceit; where will you be, who will have money from deceit? He who redeems time from you to avoid deceit, tolerates evil days here; but you who feed on deceit, you will have evil days here, and after these, you will have worse ones on the day of judgment. But you might laugh at this, because you seize money. Laugh, laugh, and scorn; I will distribute, the one who demands will come.

Sermons - Sermon 167A

SERMON 167/A SERMON OF ST. AUGUSTINE CONCERNING THE SAME WORDS OF THE APOSTLE The Apostle exhorts us to pray against the devil. Our struggle is not against flesh and blood; because not only does a man persecute you, but the devil through him, and before he harms you in the body, he kills you in the mind. Our struggle is not against flesh and blood, men against men, who are flesh and blood, but against principalities and powers, rulers of these dark realms; because just as Christ governs and rules those who are light, so the devil precipitates and instigates to all evil those who are darkness. Therefore, the Apostle exhorts us, not to pray against the evil man, but against the devil who works with him, and to do whatever we can to expel the devil and free the man. For just as if someone were to come against another in battle, armed and riding a horse from the opposing side, it is not the horse but the rider who is angered, and he desires to do what he can to strike the rider and gain control of the horse; so it is with evil men, and it is not against them but against him who instigates them that we must labor with all our strength, so that when the devil is defeated, the unfortunate one whom he had begun to possess may be liberated.

What is the way in which Christ walked?

Whoever says he abides in Christ ought to walk in the same way in which He walked. What is this way in which Christ walked? What other way than charity, of which the Apostle says: I show you a still more excellent way? Therefore, if we wish to imitate Christ, we must run along the same way by which Christ deemed it worthy to walk even while hanging on the cross. For He was fixed on the cross, and running the path of charity, He prayed for His persecutors. Finally, He said thus: Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing. Therefore let us also always pray for all our enemies, that the Lord may grant them amendment of habits and forgiveness of sins.

Sermons - Sermon 168

SERMO 168 ABOUT THE WORDS OF THE APOSTLE (EPH 6, 23):

"Peace to the brothers, and love with faith." OR CONCERNING THE GRACE OF GOD, According to the confession of the chosen vessel And doctrine, since the faith of the mercy of God is a gift.

He makes the children of Abraham's faith, he who promised. May the Lord build your heart with readings, songs, and divine sermons, and most importantly, with His grace; so that what you hear as truth, you do not hear for judgment, but for reward. He will do this, for He who promised is able to do it. So Abraham believed, giving glory to God, thus also fully believing that He who promised is able to do it. Great is our joy; He promised us to Abraham; we are children of the promise. For when it was said to Abraham: "In your seed all nations shall be blessed," we were promised. Therefore, He made us the children of Abraham’s faith, who is able to do what He promised. No one should say: I did it. For God does not promise, and you accomplish. However, it can rightly be said that what you promise, God accomplishes. For you are weak, you are not almighty. Therefore, when you promise, unless God does it, your promise is in vain. But the promise of God does not depend on you, but on Him. But you say, I have believed. Granted. You speak the truth: you have believed, but you did not give yourself faith. From where did you believe, if not from faith? Faith in you is the gift of God. The faith of Christians is different from the faith of demons. The faith of the children of God, with charity. Faith is the beginning of salvation. True peace.

Listen to the Apostle himself, the disputant of faith and the great defender of grace; hear him saying: Peace to the brothers, and love with faith. He mentioned three great things: peace, love, faith. He began from the end and finished at the beginning. For the beginning is in faith, the end in peace. For that which we believe is faith itself. But faith must be of Christians, not of demons. For, as the Apostle James says: Even the demons believe and tremble. And the demons said to Christ: You are the Son of God, we know who you are; therefore, will they reign with the Son of God? By no means! Therefore, the faith of demons must be distinguished from the faith of saints. Clearly, it must be discerned vigilantly and diligently. For Peter also said this when the Lord asked: Who do you say that I am? You are the Christ, the Son of the living God. And the Lord said: Blessed are you, Simon Bar-Jonah. O Lord, the demons also said this to you; why are they not blessed? Why? Because the demons said this out of fear, Peter out of love. Therefore, the beginning is with faith. But with what kind of faith? Which the Apostle defined: Neither circumcision nor uncircumcision means anything, but faith. Say, what faith? Faith that works through love. The demons do not have this faith, which works through love; but only the servants of God, only the saints of God, only the sons of Abraham by faith, only the children of love, the children of promise; therefore it is said: and love. Those three words were spoken by the Apostle: Peace to the brothers, and love with faith. Peace to the brothers. Whence peace? And love. Whence love? With faith. For if you do not believe, you do not love. Therefore, the Apostle said, thus beginning from the end and coming to the beginning: Peace, love, with faith. Let us say: Faith, love, peace. Believe, love, reign. For if you believe and do not love, you have not yet distinguished your faith from those who trembled and said: We know who you are, the Son of God. Therefore, love; because love with faith itself leads you to peace. What peace? True peace, complete peace, solid peace, secure peace; where there is no pestilence, no enemy. That peace is the end of all good desires. Love with faith; and if you say it thus, you say well: Faith with love.

All good things, and faith itself, are from God. Full faith. The Apostle therefore mentioned great goods: Peace to the brothers, and love with faith; great goods. But let him say from where these goods come; from where are they, from us, or from God? If you say: From us, you glory in yourself, not in God. But if you have learned what the Apostle himself also said: So that he who glories, may glory in the Lord; confess peace, love with faith, to be not from you but from God. But you respond to me: You say this, prove what you say. I prove; I will call the Apostle himself as a witness. Behold you have it; the Apostle said: Peace to the brothers, and love with faith. He said it himself. What did he say? Look, he follows: Peace to the brothers, and love with faith, from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ. What do you have that you did not receive? But if you received it, why do you boast as though you did not receive it? For if Abraham gloried, he gloried in faith. What is full and perfect faith? That which believes all our goods are from God, and even faith itself. Again the Apostle says: I obtained mercy. O confession! He did not say: I obtained mercy because I was faithful; but, so that I might be faithful, I obtained mercy.

Grace was given to Saul, an unbeliever and cruel persecutor.

Let us come to his beginnings, let us see Saul raging, let us behold him furious, let us see him breathing threats and thirsting for blood. Let us look upon him, brothers, a great spectacle. Behold, after the death of Stephen, after the blood of God's witness was shed by stones, where he kept the clothes of those who stoned him, so that he could even cast stones in their hands, then the brethren who were gathered in Jerusalem were dispersed; and he, raging, for whom it was not enough to have seen and shed the blood of Stephen, received from the chief priests to go to Damascus, and whomever he found there Christians, to bring them bound. And he went. This was the way of Paul, whose way was not yet Christ; still Saul, not yet Paul. He went. What did he have in his heart? What, except evil? Give me his merits. If you seek his merits, they are of condemnation, not of deliverance. Therefore he went to rage against the members of Christ, he went to shed blood, he went a wolf to become a shepherd; thus he went. For he could not otherwise go to those things for which he was going. And as he walks, he thinks, he breathes slaughter; as his feet lead him in anger, hatred moves his limbs, while he proceeds and walks, the slave obeys cruelty; and behold a voice from heaven: Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me? Behold why he said: I received mercy to be faithful. He was unbelieving; it is not enough, he was even cruel in that unbelief; but he received mercy to be faithful. What will you say to God when He says: This I will? Therefore, Lord, he who did so much, who desired to do so much evil to your saints, do you deem him worthy of such mercy? This I will. Is your eye evil, because I am good?

Both faith and prayer are from the grace of God. The Pelagian objection. Have faith; but in order to have faith, pray with faith. But you cannot pray with faith unless you have faith. For no one prays without faith. For how can they call on him in whom they have not believed? Or how can they believe in him whom they have not heard? And how shall they hear without a preacher? Or how shall they preach unless they are sent? Therefore we speak, because we have been sent. Listen to us, listen to him through us. Therefore, someone says, we call upon God to give us perseverance in the good things we have, and to add the good things we do not have. So, therefore, faith preceded that which asks. Surely God gives everything. For I prayed in order that he might give to me; in order that I might pray, I first believed. Therefore I gave to myself by believing, and God gave what I believingly prayed for. The question stands, for it is not a small matter. I see you speak this way, because you claim that you first gave something to God, so that he might give you the rest. You gave him indeed your faith and your prayer. And where is it that the Apostle says: For who has known the mind of the Lord, or who has been his counselor? Or who has first given to him, and it shall be repaid to him? See what you wish to be. Therefore you first gave to God, and you gave that which God did not give to you? Did you find something to give? Beggar man, where did you have it from? Therefore, from where to give? Did you have something? What indeed do you have that you did not receive? Therefore you give to God from what God gave to you; from what he gave to you, he receives from you. For your beggary, if he had not first given, would have remained the emptiest.

Prayer made for the unbelieving Saul proves that faith is a gift of God.

Listen to how this can be proven more clearly. Behold, you who have believed, have received; what shall we say about those who have not yet believed, like Saul who had not yet believed? He received so that he might believe; after he believed in Christ, then he began to invoke Christ. From Him he received so that he might believe, and by believing he might invoke, and by invoking, he might receive the rest. What do we think, brothers? Did those who believed pray for Saul before he believed, or did they not pray? Tell me, if they did not pray for him, why did Stephen say: Lord, do not hold this sin against them? He was prayed for, and others who were unbelievers, so that they might believe. Behold, they did not yet have faith, and by the prayers of the faithful they received faith. They did not yet have what they could offer to God because they had not yet received mercy to become faithful. Indeed, after this Saul was converted, with one voice he was struck down and lifted up, struck down as a persecutor, lifted up as a preacher; after he began to preach the faith he once tried to destroy, what did he say about himself? But I was unknown by face to the churches of Judea which are in Christ; they only heard that he who once persecuted us now preaches the faith he once tried to destroy; and they glorified God because of me. Did he say: And they glorified me? But in me, who preached the faith I once tried to destroy, they glorified not me, but God. Therefore, it was He who made it so that Saul, putting off the old garment, tattered with sins, stained with blood, putting off that garment, would receive the garment of humility, and become from Saul to Paul.

Paul, that is, small, a preacher of the grace bestowed upon him.

What is Paul? "Least." For I am the least of the Apostles. Behold what Paul is. For Paul in Latin means "small." We speak this way when we say: After a little while I see you; a little later I do that. What does "a little later" mean? A little later; after a little while, after a small time. Why then Paul? Because he is small. Small, because he is the last. For I am, he says, the last of the Apostles, who am not worthy to be called an Apostle, because I persecuted the Church of God. You speak well; from where you deserved to be condemned, you received from Him whence you should be crowned. From whom did you receive whence you should be crowned? Do you want to hear from whom he received it? Do not listen to me, listen to him himself: I am not, he says, worthy to be called an Apostle, because I persecuted the Church of God; but by the grace of God I am what I am. Therefore what you were, you were by your own iniquity; what you are, you are by the grace of God. And his grace, he says, was not in vain toward me. Behold he preaches the faith which he once destroyed; nor is that grace empty in him, who says: It was not in vain toward me, but I labored more abundantly than all of them. Observe, you began to lift yourself up. Where are you, Paul? Surely you were small. I labored more abundantly than all of them. Say from where? For what do you have that you did not receive? Immediately he looked back; and when he had said: I labored more abundantly than all of them; as if he was alarmed at his own words, and straight away he subjected himself, humble Paul: Not I, but the grace of God with me.

Pray for the unbelievers, that they may believe.

Therefore, my brothers, so that you may know that faith is also from the Lord God for us, pray for those who have not yet believed. If anyone has a faithless friend, I advise him to pray for him. Is it truly necessary that I should advise him? The husband is a Christian, the wife is faithless; does he not pray for his wife, that she may believe? The wife is Christian, the husband is faithless; does not the religious woman pray for her husband, that he may believe? When the one who prays prays this; what does he pray for, except that God may grant faith to him? Therefore, faith is a gift of God. Let no one boast, let no one arrogate to himself, as if he has given himself something. He who glories, let him glory in the Lord.

Sermons - Sermon 169

SERMO 169 ON THE WORDS OF THE APOSTLE PAUL (PHIL 3:3-16):

"For we are not the circumcision,"

"WE WHO SERVE THE SPIRIT OF GOD," etc.

Against the Pelagians To serve God in spirit, what it is.

Let your Holiness direct your ears and mind to the apostolic reading, aiding us with your affection before the Lord our God, so that we may be able to present to you what He deems to reveal to us in an appropriate and beneficial manner. Therefore, when it was read, you heard the apostle Paul saying: For we are the circumcision, who serve the Spirit of God. I know that many codices have: Who serve God in spirit. However, as much as we have been able to investigate, more Greek texts have: Who serve the Spirit of God. But the issue is not there. For it is evident that both are appropriate and conform to the rule of truth, because we both serve the Spirit of God and serve God not by the flesh but by the spirit. Indeed, one serves God by the flesh, who hopes to please God through carnal things. But when even the flesh is subjected to the spirit for good works, we serve God by the spirit; because we subdue the flesh so that the spirit may obey God. For the spirit governs, the flesh is governed; nor does the spirit govern well if it is not governed.

Circumcision and righteousness are how we are. Our righteousness is from the gift of God.

Therefore, when he says: We are the circumcision; see what he wanted to be understood in that circumcision which was given in shadow signifying, which was removed with the coming of the light. But why did he not say: We have the circumcision; but: We are the circumcision; understand that the Apostle wished to say: We are justice. For circumcision is justice. Moreover, he emphasizes more by saying that we are justice than by saying that we are just; yet so that when he says justice, we understand the just. For we are not that unchangeable justice, of which we are made partakers; but just as it is said: There, in great youth, for many young people; so it is said justice, to understand the just. Hear this more clearly, with the same Apostle speaking: That we, he says, might be made the justice of God in Him. We might be justice, not our own, but of God; accepted from Him, not taken by us; imparted, not usurped; given, not seized. For to some it was robbery to be equal with God; and because he sought robbery, he found ruin. But our Lord Jesus Christ, being in the form of God, did not consider it robbery to be equal with God. For to Him, equality with God was natural, it was not robbery. Nevertheless, he emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, so that we might be the justice of God in Him. For if He had avoided poverty, we would not be free from poverty. For He became poor, though He was rich; so that by His poverty, as it is written, we might be made rich. What shall His riches do for us, whose poverty makes us rich? The Apostle therefore did not deny you circumcision, but explained it; he presented the light and removed the shadow.

Spiritual circumcision of those who glory in Christ. Why circumcision was done on the eighth day. The Lord's day.

We are, he says, the circumcision, who serve God in spirit, and glory in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh. He referred to some who trusted in the flesh; they were those who gloried in the circumcision of the flesh. Of whom he says in another place: Their god is their belly, and glory is in their shame. Understand circumcision yourself, and be the circumcision; understand, and be: For understanding is good to all who do it. Indeed, the infant was not ordered to be circumcised on the eighth day in vain, since the rock with which we are circumcised was Christ. For the people were circumcised with stone knives: But the rock was Christ. Why then on the eighth day? Because in the weeks, the same is the first who is the eighth. For after completing seven days, one returns to the first. The seventh is finished, the Lord is buried; one returns to the first, the Lord is risen. For the resurrection of the Lord has promised us an eternal day and consecrated unto us the Lord's day. Which is called "the Lord's", it seems particularly to belong to the Lord; because on that day the Lord rose. The rock has been given back, let those be circumcised who wish to say: For we are the circumcision. For he was delivered up for our sins, and raised for our justification. Your justification, your circumcision, is not from you. By grace you have been saved through faith; and this is not from you, but it is the gift of God; not from works. Lest perhaps you should say: I have deserved, and therefore I have received. Do not think you have received by deserving, who would not have deserved, unless you had received. Grace preceded your merit; not grace from merit, but merit from grace. For if grace is from merit; you have bought, not received it freely. For nothing, he says, you will save them. What does it mean: For nothing, you will save them? You find nothing in them from which you save, and yet you save. You give freely, you save freely. You precede all merits, so that your gifts may achieve my merits. You give completely freely, you save freely, who find nothing from which you might save, and find much from which you might condemn.

Trust in the flesh.

Therefore, he says, we are the circumcision, who serve the Spirit of God, and glory in Christ Jesus. He who glories, let him glory in the Lord. And not trusting in the flesh. And what does it mean to trust in the flesh? Listen, he says. Although I, he says, have confidence even in the flesh. If anyone else thinks he has confidence in the flesh, I more so. Do not think, he says, that I despise this because I do not have it. What is so great if an abject man, a commoner, an ignoble person, despises nobility, and then shows true humility? Although I, he says, have confidence even in the flesh. Therefore, he says, I teach you to despise it, because you see that I have what I despise. If anyone else thinks he has confidence in the flesh, I more so.

Paul's reason for boasting in the flesh, what it will have been. And listen to confidence in the flesh: Circumcised on the eighth day; that is, not a proselyte, not a stranger to the people of God, not circumcised when older, but born a Jew from parents, I have the circumcision of the eighth day. Of the stock of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, a Hebrew of the Hebrews, as touching the law, a Pharisee. Some were chiefs, and, as it were, separated for Jewish nobility, not mingled with the contemptible common people, who were called Pharisees. For it is said that this word is interpreted as “separation,” just as in the Latin language "egregious" is said, as if separated from the crowd. But there were Israelites, that is, of the stock of Israel, even those who were separated from the temple. However, the tribe of Judah, and the tribe of Benjamin remained at the temple. The tribe of Levi in priests, the tribe of Judah royal, and the tribe of Benjamin, this alone remained at Jerusalem and at the temple of God, when that separation happened in the servant of Solomon. Therefore, do not take lightly what he says: of the tribe of Benjamin; adhering to Judah, not departing from the temple. A Hebrew of Hebrews, as touching the law, a Pharisee, as for zeal, persecuting the Church. Among his merits, he recounts that he was a persecutor: for zeal, he says. What zeal? I was not, he says, a lazy Jew; whatever seemed opposed to my Law, I endured impatiently, pursued sharply. This is nobility among the Jews; but humility is sought in Christ. Therefore, there he is Saul, here Paul. Saul is derived from Saul. You know who Saul was; his tall stature was chosen. Scripture describes him as superior to all when he was chosen to be anointed as king. Paul was not thus, but became Paul. For Paul is little, therefore Paul means small. Hence: For zeal, he says, persecuting the Church. From this, men understand what kind of person I was among the Jews, who pursued the Church of Christ with zeal for the traditions of my fathers. To walk in the law without complaint.

He adds: According to the righteousness which is in the law, I have been blameless. Your Love knows that it is said that Zachariah and Elizabeth walked blamelessly in all the commandments of the Lord. Scripture says, walking in all the justice of the Lord blamelessly. Behold, this was also our Paul, when he was Saul. He walked blamelessly in the law; and what was blameless in him, this made a great complaint about him. What then do we think, brothers, is it evil to be blameless according to the justice which is in the law? If it is evil to be blameless according to the justice which is in the law, then is the law in some way evil? But we have the same Apostle saying: Therefore the law is indeed holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good. If the law is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good; how can it not be good, how can it not be holy, to walk blamelessly according to the justice which is from the holy law? Is it perhaps holy? Let us listen to the Apostle himself; see what he says: Whatever things were gain to me, those I considered loss for the sake of Christ. He calls them losses, and among his losses he counts that he was blameless in the justice which is in the law. Nevertheless, he says, and I count all things as loss for the excellence of the knowledge of Christ Jesus our Lord. I consider, he says, my praises, I compare them to the excellence of our Lord Jesus Christ. I desire that; I despise this. This is but little: For whom I have suffered the loss of all things, he says, and count them as dung, that I may gain Christ.

Justice from the law, why does it remove from Christ? A great question has arisen, O Paul! If you lived blamelessly according to the righteousness that is in the law, and this you regard as loss, damage, and dung to gain Christ, does that mean that righteousness was prohibited by Christ? I beseech you, explain this a little. Rather let us pray to God, that He may enlighten us, by whom he himself was enlightened, who wrote this letter to us, not with ink but with the Spirit of the living God. You see, beloved, how arduous it is, how difficult it is to understand this; while it is agreed that the law is holy, and the commandment holy, just, and good; it is totally agreed among faithful Catholics; so that no one dissents, except he who does not want to be Catholic, that this law was given only by the Lord our God; according to that righteousness, which is in the law, living blamelessly was an impediment to the Apostle, so that he might not come to Christ; nor did he come to Christ, unless he reckoned this which was according to the righteousness that is in the law, blamelessly, among losses, detriment, and dung. Let us follow, then, and come a little closer, lest something shines forth for us in the very words of the Apostle, from which this obscurity may be removed and solved. Losses, he says, I have considered all these things, and I have regarded them as dung, that I may gain Christ. Pay attention, I beseech you. Losses, damages, and dung I have regarded them as, including this, that I was blameless according to the righteousness that is in the law. Therefore, I considered all these things as losses and dung, that I may gain Christ and be found in Him, not having my own righteousness which is from the law. You who have anticipated the understanding of the exposition, think you are walking as the swift with the slower ones on the way. Let the speed be restrained a little, lest the slower companion is abandoned. That I may gain Christ, he said, and be found in Him, not having my own righteousness, which is from the law. If he said my own, why did he add from the law? For if it is from the law, how is it yours? Did you impose the law upon yourself? God gave the law, God imposed the law, God commanded you to obey His law. If the law did not teach you how you should live, how could you have righteousness without blame according to the law? If you have it according to the law, how can you say: Not having my own righteousness, which is from the law, but that which is through faith in Christ, which is from God?

He approaches the solution of the question. Justice from the law, when the law is obeyed out of fear. The desire is not removed by the fear of punishment. The delight of justice is a gift of God.

Now therefore I will speak as best I can; may He who possesses you reveal it better, granting both understanding and affection. For He will grant effect if He grants affection. This is what I want to say; with the law of God set forth, for it indeed said: "You shall not covet"; with the law of God set forth, apart from those carnal sacraments which were shadows of things to come; with the law of God set forth, whoever fears it and thinks he can fulfill it by his own strength, and does what the law commands, not loving righteousness, but fearing punishment; indeed, according to the righteousness which is of the law, he was a man without complaint; he does not steal, does not commit adultery, does not bear false witness, does not commit murder, does not covet his neighbor's property; he can do this, he can perhaps; from what source? From the fear of punishment. Although, who from the fear of punishment does not covet, I think he still covets. With a great terror of arms and weapons, and perhaps by the approaching multitude or the one going before him, even a lion is called back from its prey; and yet the lion comes, the lion returns; the prey was not seized, wickedness was not put away. If you are such, there is still justice, but it is the kind of justice where you consult your own interests so as not to be tormented. What is great about fearing punishment? Who does not fear it? What thief, what criminal, what evildoer? But this is the difference between your fear and the thief's fear, that the thief fears human laws, and therefore commits theft because he hopes to deceive human laws; but you fear His laws, you fear His punishment, whom you cannot deceive. For if you could deceive Him, what would you not do? Therefore, even your evil desire is not taken away by love, but suppressed by fear. To the sheepfold, the wolf; by the barking of dogs he is not taken away by love, but suppressed by fear. The wolf comes to the sheepfold; by the barking of dogs and the shout of shepherds, the wolf is driven away from the sheepfold; yet he is always a wolf. Let him be turned into a sheep. For indeed, the Lord makes this happen; but that is His justice, not yours. For as long as you have your own, you can fear punishment, not love righteousness. The delight of justice is a gift of God.

Therefore, my brothers, does iniquity have its delights, and justice does not? Does evil delight, and good does not delight? It entirely delights; but: The Lord will give sweetness, and our land will yield its fruit. Unless He first gives sweetness, our land will have nothing but sterility. Therefore, it is this justice that the Apostle desired, he was delighted; he remembered God, and he was delighted; his soul desired, and it burned in the courts of the Lord; and all things he considered great became worthless, losses, detriments, filth.
