will be believed in Christ, because even before He was born of the Virgin Mary, many believed He would come, just as now they believe in Him who has already come. And through that same faith, all are healed, nor is there any other salve for that darkness of spiritual sight, except, as it is written: “Cleansing their hearts by faith”. Therefore, He made all the saints His body, of which He is the head. Nor would He be the head of this body unless He had taken something from that body. From where did He assume flesh, which could die in Him? For if the soul of man cannot die, how could the divinity of the Word die? Therefore, thousands of martyrs were killed, and as if their blood were sown, the crop of the Church arose throughout the world. The things which the prophets announced have been displayed in our age.

Therefore, brothers, these things were foretold thousands of years ago and, as they were foretold, thus they seem to be expressed and revealed. Few things are left that we read and believe, for we have already read and seen many. From these things we read and see, it is not a great thing to believe the few things that remain. It was a great thing to believe for those who saw none of these things that we see. Now it is no longer praiseworthy to believe, but condemnable not to believe. Let those who still refused to be healed finally awaken and be healed. Let them believe: they will see. Let them not be so perverse as to say to us: "Let me see first and then I will believe." What is "let me see and then I will believe?" For he who sees, does he by any chance believe? He believes who does not see. To believe is one thing, to see is another. Believe because you do not see, so that by believing what you do not see you may deserve to see what you believe. The merit of vision is faith. The reward of faith is vision. Why do you seek the reward before the work? Therefore, believe and walk in faith: your salvation is in hope. Indeed, the greatest physician has begun to heal you, for whom no disease is incurable. Do not fear your past crimes, however immense, however unbelievable, that you might have committed: the diseases are great, but the physician is greater. Therefore, do not worry about the past: in one moment of sacrament, they will be forgiven, and absolutely all will be forgiven. Nothing of the past will remain to trouble your care. You will be secure not in your own strength, but in the hand of the physician. Therefore, be secure under him, for he will also heal what remains: that same infirmity of our mortality, from which indeed smaller sins creep in while we live here. He will heal everything, he will cleanse everything. All obscurity will be taken away, but such an eye of the heart will be given that you may be blessed when you see, because believing you heard: Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. Let those who have not yet believed look, my brothers, let them look at how much God has revealed. All that is seen to be done throughout the whole world in the name of Christ was foreseen, foretold, prescribed. In our hands are the books, in our eyes the deeds.

More difficult is what God has already done than what He has promised to do. And if we think truly, brothers, he has done something more difficult than what he will do. What is it that he has done something more difficult? He has justified the ungodly, made a believer from an idolater, a sober person from a drunkard, a temperate person from a lustful one, a generous person from a miser, not giving to hunters applauded by the devil but giving to the poor crowned by Christ, and acquiring for himself that which cannot pass away. It was more difficult what he did. For he who made a pious person from an impious one, will he not give the reward to the pious one? Notice, my brothers. What is more unbelievable? To make a pious person from an impious one, or to make an angel from a pious one? Impious and pious are opposites. Pious and angel are not opposites. Will he not fulfill from being close by, who has changed you from being opposite? For now when you have begun to be pious, you begin to imitate the life of an angel. But when you were impious, you were far removed from the chorus of angels. However, faith came and justified you. You are humbled before God, who used to blaspheme God. And you who were turned towards creation, now desire the Creator. See what he has done for you: he has shown his Church to the world; as he promised, he has shown it. It was foretold that idolatry would once be destroyed and removed: our ancestors read these things and did not see them, but we read them and see them. Heresies were foretold, schisms foretold: they also exist. Therefore, Christians are not disturbed when they see heresies and schisms. For they more certainly hope for the things promised, when the things foretold happen.

Happiness and unhappiness are now intermixed.

Therefore, flee from the wickedness of all heresies and schisms, flee from the sacrileges of the pagans, the curiosities of demons, the adoration of idols, the sacrilege of remedies, the consultations of astrologers. Flee from these, brothers. You have no reason to hope in them. They have never promised eternal life; and as for the present life, if they make any promises, they lie to you. Let someone come forward and say: “For me, I know, the astrologer spoke the truth, and for me, I know the diviner spoke the truth, and I had that remedy, and it worked.” Have only this known, beloved, which can be easily seen. The happiness and unhappiness of the present time, which is neither true happiness nor complete unhappiness, is interspersed among all people. If only those who do these things were happy according to time, you, brothers who have believed, would have to despise the present for the sake of future happiness. But when you see the healthy and those who do and those who do not do these things interspersed, the dying interspersed with those who do and those who do not do these things, the rich and poor interspersed with those who do and those who do not do these things, the honored and the dishonorable interspersed with those who do and those who do not do these things, when, therefore, you see temporal happiness or unhappiness interspersed within the human race, why do you not avoid eternal unhappiness, when it will be said: “Depart into the eternal fire,” and compare true happiness when it will be said: “Receive the kingdom”?

Whoever consents to the devil will be damned with him.

"Juno, he says, aids mothers in childbirth, and Mercury aids hunters or scholars, and Neptune aids sailors." These things are false. For if they are true, then women who blaspheme Juno should not give birth well. What great thing is it, my brothers, to open eyes to see these things? Did the prophets foretell these things as well? Ask yourselves: let the human race respond. Do all those who do not worship Neptune suffer shipwreck? Do all merchants who mock Mercury suffer loss? But if these things are false, they never promised you future life, and they are of no benefit to this present life. Why, then, are they worshipped, except to bind the feet of those walking the Lord's path, so they do not seek immortality and some rest after the labors and difficulties of this life? For that devil opposes with his angels, and makes himself seem necessary to reduce you into servitude. Rather, use your freedom; greater is he who redeemed you than he who opposes. Whoever consents to this will be condemned with him; whoever believes in Christ will condemn with him. These things will happen, but from those that have already come, surmise what remains.

"The cross of Christ is on the foreheads of kings."

Future persecutions for Christians by the kings of the world were foretold: they occurred, a massacre of martyrs happened, and those who did this thought that by killing they could end Christians. The Church grew through its own blood, persecutors were defeated, those who endured persecution triumphed. This too was foretold. We also find in the Holy Scriptures that these very kings would submit their necks to the yoke of Christ, from whom persecution of the Church first appeared to be something to be avoided. And this has happened, brothers: now the cross of Christ is on the foreheads of kings, kings worship what the Jews mocked. And because it was said thus: God chose the weak things of this world to confound the strong, and ignoble things of this world, and things which are not as though they are, so that the things which are may be brought to nothing, our Lord Jesus Christ came for the salvation not only of the poor but also of the rich, not only of commoners but also of kings. However, He did not want to choose kings for discipleship, nor did He want the rich, the noble, or the learned, but chose the poor, the unlearned, the ignoble, fishermen, so that His grace would shine forth even more. For He came to give the cup of humility and heal pride. And if He had first called a king, the king would say that his dignity was chosen; if He had called the learned first, he would say that his learning was chosen. Those who were called to humility had to be called through the humble. Therefore, Christ did not gain a fisherman from an emperor, but an emperor from a fisherman.

Humanity gathers to Christ.

Kings are now coming to Rome. A great matter, brothers, how it has been fulfilled. When it was said, when it was written, none of these things existed. It is wonderful: attend and see, rejoice. Let those who do not want to attend to it be curious; we want them to be curious about these matters: let them leave the crimes and trifles of vain curiosities, let them sometimes be curious about the divine Scriptures, let them find that those things which they now see were foretold so long ago. For they marvel at the whole human race, from kings to those clothed in rags, coming together and flocking in the name of the crucified one. No age is left out, no sect, no doctrine. For it is not that the unlearned believed and the learned did not believe, or that the ignoble believed and the noble did not believe, or that women believed and men did not believe, or that children believed and the old did not believe, or that slaves believed and the free did not believe. Every age has been called to salvation, every age has now come, all dignity, all abundance and human capability. Everything is already within. Few remain outside and still dispute; let them wake up occasionally even to the commotion of the world: the whole world shouts. The emperor goes to the tomb of the fisherman. The kings come to Rome, as I began to say. There are the temples of the emperors who, with their pride, demanded divine honors for themselves from men and, because they could - for they were kings and rulers - they extorted rather than deserved them. Who could extort such a thing from a fisherman? There is the tomb of a fisherman, there is the temple of an emperor. Peter is in the tomb there, Hadrian is in the temple there. The Temple of Hadrian, the memorial of Peter. The emperor comes. Let us see where he runs, where he wishes to kneel: in the temple of the emperor, or at the memorial of the fisherman? Setting aside his diadem, he strikes his breast where the body of the fisherman lies, thinking of his merits, believing in his crown, through whom he desires to reach God, by whose prayers he feels aided and finds help. Behold what that crucified and mocked one on the cross has done, behold how he subdued nations, not by raging sword, but by the mocked wood. Therefore, let the proud drink the cup of humility, with Christ humbled. Let them deign to be humble, let them now recognize their remedy, let them come and believe.

"Let there be in you the groaning of one who confesses."

Encourage them, brothers, not only with words but also with your conduct, and we exhort that they no longer delay. For some might think and say, "Tomorrow I will be a Christian." If tomorrow is good, today is also good. Indeed, to become a Christian, one does not need to consult a mathematician regarding the day. God made every day. That day is good for you when you perform something good. If, therefore, it is good to believe in Christ, so that the heart may be cleansed by faith and the eye that will see such a great light may be healed, why delay, why does the raven's voice remain in people? "Tomorrow, tomorrow," says the raven, which, sent out from the ark, did not return; the dove returned. The raven cries "tomorrow," the dove mourns daily. Let there not be a voice of procrastination in you, but the moaning of confession. Whoever is weary of hearing, let them pardon the diligent. Whoever still wishes to hear, let them pardon the weary, for we are also pressed by time to finish the sermon. For we see such eagerness in you in Christ that you could hear more, but we cannot hold the time. Whoever here has not believed, here we are, here is the Church: if they will, let them believe. If they think it must be delayed, which I believe they should no longer think, let them make way for those who are to perform the divine mysteries. And after the pagans went out: The word of God is shown in morals.

Now, brothers, we spoke to you yesterday and now we speak and always ask you, that by living well you may win over those who have not yet believed, so that you might not have believed in vain. We ask you that, just as the word of God pleases you, so it may also please you in your behavior, not just in the ear alone, but also in the heart, not in the heart alone, but also in life, so that you may be the family of God fit and pleasing in His eyes for every good work. Indeed, brothers, we do not doubt that, if you live worthy of God, soon none of those who have not yet believed will remain in unbelief.

Sermons - Sermon 360C

Sermon 360/C Sermon of Saint Augustine "About those who complain that they are being forced into unity."

Against the Party of Donatus Bear ye one another's burdens. For nothing is sweeter than the unity of brothers, but nothing is more dangerous than the discord of peoples. Indeed, by the sound of our tongue, flesh and charity seem to be close: they are close by the sound of the tongue. For what sounds closer than flesh and charity? Nevertheless, they are very far apart from each other, especially in this time. How distant these two things that sound alike are, is clear to you, since indeed, where there is charity, the heart expands, and the flesh contracts. But because our charity also toils in the flesh, and you have not yet received the vast fields of divinity as long as the bond of weakness still holds, nevertheless, dearest ones, consider how broad the spaces of these buildings have become! Do you think those far away find it harder to hear? The journey of our voice is your quiet. See how quickly they hear, even what is not said with a loud voice! Therefore, help each other, and as it is written, bear one another's burdens, so that you may together receive what is given to all.

Why Augustine came later than he had planned.

We see after a long and enduring desire your love physically present; in spirit, neither you have ever departed from us, nor we from you. When we hold "up the heart," there you dwell with us, where no one oppresses themselves. Yet, we ask for forgiveness, brothers, if perhaps we seem to have come to you later than both we would have wanted and you. Great necessities held us in the summertime, and those necessities were certainly not unknown to you. For we have also been aided by your prayers, so that what were necessities turn into pleasures. In the city of Hippo where I serve my children, your brothers, we labored for a long time and finally saw unity. Again and again, help us with your vows and prayers, so that the Lord may confirm what he has worked in us. Now, however, although we were still doing these things there, and in the region of Hippo the people now began to be converted, unity is delayed as much as rusticity understands with difficulty. Now therefore we were not led, but were seized by your desire, to come again to those desired. Therefore accept the petition for forgiveness concerning the tardiness. For at that time my venerable brother and colleague, Maximinus, was converted to the catholic faith. Thus then in the catholic faith his newness, through which he crushed the hard reigns of oldness, could certainly not be deserted by me nor was it proper, nor was it suitable for him immediately to depart from there. When therefore the Lord deemed it opportune, He allowed us both to come. Therefore, I think you will easily forgive my tardiness, because afterward I came with him for whom I did not come at first.

Christ is our bread and peace.

Now therefore, beloved, receive what is now at hand. We have heard your desires though absent, and you have heard our fervors though absent. You love unity, you cherish peace, you guard peace, you hunger for peace. We approve and rejoice in the healing of your palate, by which you taste how sweet the Lord is. For good bread is good for the healthy. However, the sick person, though he can praise the bread seen as good, cannot eat what is offered. For who is our bread, if not He who said: I am the living bread that came down from heaven? Is it possible that there is bread, but no peace? Let us also prove that peace exists. For we have proven that there is bread by His most manifest testimony: I am the living bread that came down from heaven. Let the Apostle also say: For He Himself is our peace. Therefore, He who says: I am the living bread that came down from heaven, it is said of Him: He Himself is our peace. We therefore have the bread of peace, but let us eat if we are healthy.

Christ is the way to salvation.

You have heard the bread itself speaking, just now from the Gospel. The disciples were seeking the first and highest place, and there was a contention of honor among the children of charity. They were asking who among them was the greatest. Weakness was seeking the higher place, which certainly charity holds. They did not yet know by what way they should go, although they understood to what end they were going. Through humility one comes to loftiness. Christ is the way. He is that bread, He is that peace, He is also the way. Ask from Him where you wish to go, He answers: "To me." Ask by what way you wish to go, He answers: "By me." And He remained where we might go, and He came by the way we might go. Therefore, dearest ones, children of peace, children of light, children of charity, offspring of the catholic faith, if we are strong, let us serve the weak; if we are healthy, let us serve the sick. Our Lord served. Consider that the Lord serves; a sick servant is one to whom the Lord serves. Behold, let us praise our bread, with whatever strength we can. Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brothers to dwell in unity. Rejoice, you just, in the Lord.

It is good for brothers to dwell together in unity.

It is indeed good, brothers, to live together in unity. All agree that it is good; not all grasp how pleasant it is. Ask anyone, even if he is still a heretic or already shows a defiant front, hiding his mind; ask, inquire of someone disdainful, refusing, rejecting the hands of a servant and pushing away the food he wants to eat in sickness; nevertheless, hold him, ask him: "Is unity good?" If he can, let him say: "It is evil." Absolutely not hesitating, I ask: "Is unity good?" He answers: "It is good." Whether he wants to or not, he answers this: "Unity is good." Are you silent? Even if you are silent, surely you are silent because you cannot say: "It is not good." Iniquity does not allow you to say it is good, but truth does not allow you to deny it is good. However, I insist to extract a voice, I will not cease, I will not retreat, you will not be relieved of me unless you say something. Finally, I have found your ears; if I do not hold you by your free will, I hold you out of fear. Speak, answer me. What I ask is easy, the question is brief. Is unity good? What will he do? By no means will he say: "It is not good." Therefore, to be rid of me, he will say: "It is good." And I reply: What you praise, if it is a possession, hold it with me; if it is a garment, wear it with me; if it is bread, eat it with me. "It is good," he says, "I do not deny it, but because I am forced into it, therefore I do not want it." Therefore, it is good, but why, if you are forced into it, do you not want the good: as if I would be troublesome in forcing, if you were eager in seeking. If it is good and you do not want it, therefore I compel you. For what you confess as good, you do not refuse out of verity, but out of weakness. I serve the weak: you are sick, I am your servant. I offer food, take the nourishment you praise. Perhaps, as sick people often refuse the food placed before them, do you find fault with how it is cooked? None of this can you say about the food I offer. Christ is the bread, Christ is the peace. This food was formed in the womb of virginity, cooked in the fire of passion. Take, brother; receive, brother, receive something lest you die. You certainly praise unity. Your weakness is against me, not your judgment. I offer food, not only to strengthen the sick, but also to sustain the sick. I am troublesome when I insist, but impious if I withhold. "Behold," he says, "I receive."

"God is Father and the Church is Mother."

What kind of illnesses do we suffer, brothers? "Behold," he says, "I receive." Some have come, distressed by the troubles of those serving, exhibiting the care of parents although troublesome, but nevertheless showing maternal affection. What do I say of parents, brothers? I do not speak of myself, nor of any human being. Our parents, feeding the healthy, restoring the sick, are God the Father and Mother Church. This pious mother, therefore, giving birth to her children both conceived and in danger, has not spurned the illness of her own; even if troublesome, even if importunate, she has come to those lying down; she has fed those refusing food. They hate the one restoring them, they more fear experiencing the one mourning. She restores the sick, she mourns the dead. Let her be troublesome in this ...

Sermons - Sermon 361

SERMO 361 On the Resurrection of the Dead The beginning of the discussion is taken from certain words of the Apostle.

We observe, when the Epistle of the Apostle was read, your commendable movement of faith and charity, as you have shuddered at men, who, thinking this life alone is common with beasts, and that after death everything of man ends, and there is no hope of another better life, corrupting the itching of evil ears, say: Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die. Hence, let the beginning of our discussion be taken from this, and let this be, as it were, the hinge of our discourse, to which the other things that the Lord has deigned to suggest will be referred.

Questions for debate are proposed. For our hope is the resurrection of the dead; our faith is the resurrection of the dead. Our love, too, is inflamed and kindled with desire by the preaching of things not yet seen, by the greatness of which our hearts are made capable of the blessedness that is promised to come, as long as we believe what is not yet seen: therefore our love itself also ought not to be occupied with these temporary and visible things, so that we hope to have something such in the resurrection, of the same kind, if we despise it now, we live better and are better, namely carnal pleasures and delights. Therefore, with the faith of the resurrection of the dead taken away, all Christian teaching falls away. However, with the faith of the resurrection of the dead established, there is not immediately security concerning the Christian soul, unless that life which is to come is distinguished from this life which passes. Therefore it must be proposed thus: If the dead are not raised, we have no hope of future life; but if the dead are raised, indeed there will be a future life; but the second question is, what kind it will be. Thus, the first discussion is whether there will be a resurrection of the dead; the second discussion is what kind of life the saints will have in the resurrection.

Those who say the dead do not rise are not Christians.

Therefore, those who say that the dead do not rise are not Christians: but those who think that the dead, when they have risen, will live carnally are carnal Christians. Therefore, whatever disputation exists against the opinion of those who deny the resurrection of the dead is against those who are outside, from whose number I do not think anyone is present here. Hence, our discourse might seem superfluous if it lingers too long, as we attempt to teach that the dead rise again. For a Christian who already believes in Christ should be led by the weight of authority, who by no means thinks the Apostle is lying. Therefore, it suffices that this person hears: If the dead do not rise, our preaching is in vain, and your faith is also in vain. He says, If the dead do not rise, neither did Christ rise. But if Christ has risen, in whom is the salvation of Christians, then it is certainly not impossible for the dead to rise: because he who raised his Son, and he who raised his own flesh, showed an example in the head for the rest of the body, which is the Church. Thus, a disputation about the resurrection of the dead could have been superfluous, so that we might already accept the one that Christians usually have among themselves, concerning what we will be like when we have risen, how we will live, what our affairs will be, whether there will be any or none; if there will be none, we will live idly doing nothing; or if we will do something, what will we do: then, whether we will eat and drink, whether there will be unions of men and women, or some simple and incorrupt life in common; and if so, what kind of life will that be, what kind of activity, what kind of figure of the bodies themselves. These are disputations of Christians, with the faith in the resurrection preserved.

Concern about overly carnal brothers forces one to dwell on the issue. To this discussion, therefore, as much as can be either undertaken or put forward by men for men, such as either we are, or you are, I would already proceed if a certain concern about our very carnal brothers, and almost pagans, did not compel me to dwell somewhat longer on that question where it is asked whether the dead rise at all. For I believe no one here now is pagan, but all are Christians. However, pagans and ridiculers of the resurrection daily do not cease to murmur into the ears of Christians: "Let us eat and drink; for tomorrow we die." And what the Apostle said, underlying his concern and annexing it to this statement: "Evil communications corrupt good manners"; fearing these evils and bearing concern for the infirm, not only with a paternal, but also with a certain maternal love, we will say something even on this, as much as might suffice for Christians, because today all those who have gathered have been drawn by a greater devotion to the Scriptures. For no festival celebration of any particular day has called even theatrical crowds to the church of God today. For some are accustomed to gather not out of piety, but out of festivity. This consideration has made us speak first about the resurrection of the dead; and then, if the Lord gives the opportunity, about what the future life of the just will be like.

Against those who decide to live here as if nothing remains after death. The Apostle says, "I am afraid that just as the serpent deceived Eve with his cunning, so your minds may be corrupted from the chastity which is in Christ." But their minds are corrupted by such conversations: "Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die." Those who love these things, who pursue these things, who consider this life alone to be, who hope for nothing beyond, who either do not pray to God or pray to Him for these very things, for whom the discourse of diligence is burdensome, let them hear us say these things with great sadness. They want to eat and drink; for tomorrow they die. If only they truly thought that they would die tomorrow. For who is so mad and perverse, who is so much an enemy of his own soul, who, dying tomorrow, does not think that all things for which he labors will have ended? For it is written: "On that day all his thoughts will perish." Even if men take care in drawing up a will on the imminent day of their death for the sake of those they leave behind, how much more should they think of their own soul? Man considers whom he will leave behind, but he does not think of himself who leaves all these things behind. Behold, your children will have what you leave, you will have nothing, and all your thought is consumed in the legacy of those who will follow you, not where they will go after passing through. If only there were thought of death. But when the dead are carried out, death is thought about, and it is said: "Alas, poor man! He was such a person, he walked here yesterday;" or, "Seven days ago I saw him, he spoke with me about this and that; man is nothing." These things are murmured. But perhaps, when the dead are mourned, when the funeral is arranged, when the burial is prepared, when he is carried out, when the procession goes, when he is buried, these words thrive: but once the dead is buried, such thoughts are also buried. Those deadly cares return, he forgets whom he has buried, he thinks about the succession, he who is about to die; he returns to fraud, to plunder, to perjury, to drunkenness, to boundless pleasures of the body, I do not say when they will be exhausted, but as they are indulged, they perish; and, what is more pernicious, from the burial of the dead, the argument for the burial of the heart is assumed, and it is said: "Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die."

Against those who object that no one has returned from the dead.

They also mock the faith of those who assert that the dead will rise, saying to themselves: Behold, this one has been placed in the tomb; let his voice be heard. But it cannot be: I hear the voice of my father, my grandfather, my great-grandfather. Who has risen from there? Who has indicated what happens in the underworld? Let us do good for ourselves while we live: but when we are dead, even if our parents, or loved ones, or relatives bring offerings to our tombs, they bring them for themselves, those who live, not for us, the dead. And this indeed Scripture also mocked, saying about some who do not feel the present goods: As if, it says, you set a feast before a dead man; and it is evident this does not pertain to the dead, and this custom belongs to the Pagans, not coming from the lineage and vein of the righteousness of our patriarchal fathers, for whom we read the rites were celebrated, but we do not read any offerings were made. This can also be observed in the customs of the Jews: for they did not retain the fruits of virtue from it, but they retained the antiquity of the custom in certain rites. And what some object from the Scriptures: Break your bread, and pour your wine over the tombs of the righteous, and do not give it to the unjust; it is indeed not to be discussed in this way, but I say that the faithful can understand what is being said. For it is known to the faithful how the faithful do these things religiously for the memories of their own; and because these things are not to be offered to the unjust, that is, the unfaithful, since: The righteous shall live by faith, this too is known to the faithful. Therefore let no one seek a remedy for the wound, and from the Scriptures attempt to twist a bond from which he ties a noose of death for his soul. It is clear how this is understood, and this celebration of the Christians is open and healthy. Our faith must be aroused. So then, as I began to say, let us consider this: because of people murmuring in the ears of the weak: "Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die"; because they say: "No one has risen from there, I have not heard the voice of anyone, since my grandfather was placed there, or my ancestor, or my father; I have not heard the voice of anyone." Answer, Christians, if you are Christians: lest perhaps while you wish to be drunk among the people, you are reluctant to respond to corrupters. You have something to respond with; but you waver in the desire for pleasures and want to be engulfed and buried alive. The desire for drunkenness rises, and like a certain wave it rushes upon the soul, driven by the breath of one who persuades badly. Therefore, you suffer a great storm, you do not wish to respond to the corrupter, while you favor the one who offers the drink; but the wave of desire rises too high and it wants to overwhelm your heart like a ship. Christian, Christ is sleeping in your ship: wake Him up; He will command the storms to be still. For at that time, when the disciples were in the ship and Christ was sleeping, they signified that Christians fluctuate when the Christian faith is asleep. For you see what the Apostle says: "That Christ may dwell," he says, "in your hearts through faith." For according to the presence of His beauty and divinity, He is always with the Father; according to the presence of His body, He is now above the heavens at the right hand of the Father; according to the presence of faith, He is in all Christians. And therefore you fluctuate because Christ sleeps: that is, you do not overcome those desires, which are aroused by the breath of those who persuade badly, because faith sleeps. What does it mean that faith sleeps? It is dormant. What does it mean that it is dormant? You have forgotten it. Therefore, what does it mean to wake Christ? To wake faith, to remember what you have believed. Therefore, remember your faith, wake Christ: your faith itself will command the waves, by which you are troubled, and the winds of the perverse persuaders: they will immediately depart, everything will immediately be calm; because even if the bad persuader does not cease speaking, he no longer moves the ship, does not raise a wave, does not sink the vessel in which you are carried. By which testimonies faith is confirmed.

What then are you doing raising Christ? What had that evil conversationalist said to you? What had that corrupter, corrupting good morals through bad conversations, said? What had he said? Surely he had said this: No one has returned from there, I have not heard my father, nor my grandfather; let someone return from there, tell what is done there.

You, now with Christ awakened in your ship, recalling your faith, respond to him and say: Fool, if your father were to rise again, you would believe; the Lord of all has risen, and you do not believe? For what reason did he want to die and rise again, except that we all might believe in one, so that we might not be deceived by many? And what would your father do, if he were to rise and speak, only to die again? Consider with what great power he has risen, he who now dies no more, and death shall no longer have dominion over him. He showed himself to his disciples and faithful followers: the solidity of his body was touched, when it was not sufficient for some to see what they remembered unless they also touched what they saw. Faith was confirmed, not only in the hearts but also in the eyes of men. He, who demonstrated these things, ascended into heaven, sent the Holy Spirit to his disciples, and the Gospel was preached. If we lie about these things, ask the whole world. Many promises have been fulfilled; many hopes have been realized; the entire world flourishes in the Christian faith. Even those who do not yet believe in Christ do not dare to detract from Christ's resurrection. There is testimony in heaven, testimony on earth; testimony from angels, testimony from the dead. What remains that does not proclaim it? And you say: Let us eat and drink; for tomorrow we die! But you have become sad about your dearly beloved who was buried, because you did not immediately hear his voice. He lived, he died; he used to eat, now he does not eat; he used to feel, now he does not feel; he does not partake in the joys and happiness of the living. An example of resurrection drawn from seed. Would you mourn the seed when you plow? If, therefore, there were someone so ignorant of things, who, when the seed is brought out into the field and cast into the ground, and the clod broken, is buried; if, therefore, there were anyone ignorant even of future things, who would mourn the wheat because he remembered summer and thought to himself, saying: "This grain, which is now buried, with how much labor was it reaped, carried in, threshed, cleaned, reserved in the barn, we saw its beauty and rejoiced; now it is taken away from our eyes; I see the plowed land, but I do not see the grain either in the barn or here": he would lament the wheat as if dead and buried, weep bitterly, looking at the clods and the land, not seeing the harvest: how he would be laughed at by anyone unlearned, but not in that matter; unskilled indeed in other things, but skilled in that matter which he unlearned mourner would lament disgracefully? And what would those who knew say to him, if by chance he was mourning because he knew none of these things? "Do not be sad; this which we have buried indeed is no longer in the barn, it is not in our hands: we will come to this field, and it will delight you to see the appearance of the crop, where now you mourn the nakedness of the plowing." He who knew what would come from the grain, would even rejoice in the very plowing: but he, indeed faithless or rather foolish, and, to speak more truthfully, inexperienced, would perhaps first mourn, but believing when experienced, would depart consoled, and would hope for the coming harvest with the experienced.

Every creature bears witness to the resurrection. But the harvests are seen every year; however, there will be one final harvest of the human race at the end of the age. This cannot be shown to the eyes now; but an example was given of the one principal grain. The Lord himself says: "If the grain remains as it is, and is not put to death, it will remain alone," speaking of his own death, because the resurrection of those believing in him will be manifold. An example was given of one grain, but such an example as all might believe who would wish to be grains. Though indeed every creature speaks of the resurrection, if we are not deaf: from which we should infer what God will do with the human race at the end, since we see so many similar things daily. The resurrection of Christians will happen once, the sleep and awakening of animals is daily. To sleep is similar to death; to awaken is similar to resurrection. From what happens daily, believe what will happen once. The moon is born, grows, is perfected, wanes, is consumed, is renewed every month. What happens monthly with the moon, that is what will happen once in totality in the resurrection. Just as what happens daily with the sleeping, so with the moon monthly. From whence do the leaves go, from whence do they return to the trees? Into what secrets do they depart, from what secrets do they come? It is winter, certainly now trees appear similar to those dried-up, but in springtime they become green. Is this happening for the first time now, or was it the same last year? Indeed, it was the same last year. It is interrupted by autumn in winter, returns through spring in summer. Therefore, the year returns in its time, and men, made in the image of God, when they die will they perish?

Other certain examples. But someone who looks less carefully at the changes and restorations of things might say to me: Those leaves have decayed, new ones are born. However, the one who considers well sees that even those which decay, contribute to the strength of the earth. For whence does the earth become enriched, if not from the decay of earthly things? Those who cultivate the field observe this; and those who do not, because they always live in the city, certainly know from the gardens near the city how even the most contemptible refuse of the city is saved with what care, by whom they are even bought at a price, where they are carried. Certainly, things already deemed contemptible, exhausted of all utility, might be thought so by the inexperienced. And who deigns to look at dung? What man shudders to look at, yet takes care to preserve. Therefore, that which seemed consumed and discarded returns to the richness of the soil, the richness into sap, sap into the root; and what passes from the earth into the root moves invisibly into strength, is distributed through branches, from the branches into buds, from the bud into fruit and leaves. Behold, that which you shuddered at in the decay of dung, you marvel at in the fruitfulness and greenness of the tree.

Objection that the body turns into ashes.

I do not want you to oppose me with the objection you are accustomed to: The body of the buried dead does not remain whole; for if it did remain, I would believe in resurrection. Therefore, do only the Egyptians believe in resurrection, because they diligently take care of the corpses of the dead? For they have the custom of drying out bodies and rendering them almost like bronze: they call them Gabbaras. Therefore, according to these people, who are ignorant of the secret depths of nature, where everything remains safe for the Creator, even when they are removed from mortal senses, only the Egyptians rightly believe in the resurrection of their dead, while the hope of other Christians is limited? For often, when tombs have been opened or exposed either by age or by some non-sacrilegious necessity, bodies have been found to have decayed, and people who love corporeal appearances have sighed deeply and groaned, saying in their hearts: Will this ash ever regain that form of beauty, be restored to life, be restored to light? When will this happen? When will I hope for something living from this ash? You who say this see only ash in the tomb: consider your own age, if you are, for instance, thirty, fifty, or more years old: in the tomb there is ash of the dead, where were you fifty years ago? Where were you? The bodies of all of us, who now speak or hear, will be ash in a few years, and a few years ago they were not even ash. Therefore, He who was able to create what did not exist, will He fail to repair what did exist? The Lord Himself is a witness to us.

Therefore, let the murmuring of those who speak ill and corrupt good morals with evil conversations cease. Set your feet firmly on the path, firmly: so that you do not forsake the path, not to remain on the path, but as it is said: Run so that you may obtain. Let Christ always flourish in the heart, who willed to show in the head what the rest of the body hopes for. Indeed, on earth we toil, our head is already in heaven and neither dies, nor fails, nor suffers anything: yet it suffered for us. Because he was delivered up for our offenses and was raised for our justification. We know this by faith: and those to whom he appeared learned through their eyes. Yet we are not disqualified because he rose, and we could not see him with carnal eyes. We have the testimony of the Lord himself, who spoke to the doubting disciple and searched for belief by touch. For when he exclaimed, convinced by the touch of the scars, and said: My Lord and my God; he responded: Because you have seen me, you have believed; blessed are those who do not see and yet believe. Therefore, awaken to your blessedness, let no one with ill persuasion shake from your hearts what Christ has fixed in them. Nor let that be said to me. For this is said by all who, even unwillingly, have yielded to the authority of Christ. For almost all Pagans, even those who are reluctant or delay in embracing Christ devoutly, do not dare to reproach him: although they dare to reproach Christians, they do not dare to reproach Christ; they yield to the head, and yet insult the body. But the body, hearing their insults, who now yield to the head, should not think itself cut off from the head, but supported by it. For if we were cut off, we ought to fear the voices of those insulting: but that we are not cut off, he himself testifies, who said to Paul, then Saul, persecuting the Church: Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me? He had already passed through the hands of the impiety of the Jews, he had already penetrated the infernal, he had already risen from the tomb, he had already ascended into heaven, he had already enriched and strengthened the hearts of the believers with the gift of the Holy Spirit, seated at the right hand of the Father interceding for us: he was not to be handed over to death again, but was to deliver us from death, what could he suffer from the raging Saul? How could Saul's hand touch him, even though, as it is written, he was breathing murder? He could attack the Christians laboring on earth: but when and how could he attack Christ? Yet he cries out for the other members, and does not say: Why do you persecute mine? For if he had said: Why do you persecute mine? we would believe him to speak of his servants. But not as much are the servants joined to the master as Christians to Christ. This is a different structure: a different order of members, a different unity of love. The head speaks for the members, neither does he say this at least: Why do you persecute my members? But he says: Why do you persecute me? He was not touching the head, but he was touching that which is joined to the head.

Against those who say that only Christ was allowed to rise again.

We have often said this, but because the analogy is apt and well illustrates the matter, it must be repeated. He who treads on you in a crowd presses your foot, but does nothing to your tongue. What then does it mean that your tongue shouts, "You are treading on me"? The pressure is on the foot, there is no injury to the tongue, but there is one body. And if one member suffers, all the members suffer with it; and if one member is honored, all the members rejoice with it. Therefore, if your tongue speaks for your foot, does Christ not speak for Christians in heaven? Your tongue does not speak for your foot by saying, "You are treading on my foot," but rather, "You are treading on me," though it itself has not been touched. Recognize Him as your head, as He speaks for you from heaven and says, "Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me?" Therefore, brothers, why have we said this? Lest perhaps those of whom the Apostle speaks subtly creep in among you: Bad company corrupts good morals, because they say, "Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die"; so that they say to you (for they do not dare to reproach Christ, they tremble at His majesty, established throughout the whole world; but as it is written: The sinner will see and be angry, he will gnash his teeth and melt away: he can gnash and melt away; but he does not dare to blaspheme Christ); lest perhaps they speak thus and say, "Only Christ was permitted to do this." Sometimes they speak from the heart, but sometimes out of fear: you however notice what they dare to say, and what they do not dare to.

How one should respond to those who exaggerate the majesty of Christ with perverse praise.

They will therefore say: You tell me that Christ has risen, and from there you hope for the resurrection of the dead; but it was permissible for Christ to rise from the dead. And now he begins to praise Christ, not to give honor to Him, but to make you despair. The cunning destructiveness of the serpent, to turn you away from Christ with the praise of Christ, deceitfully proclaims what he does not dare to blame. He magnifies His majesty to make it singular, lest you hope for something similar, as was shown in His rising. And he appears more reverent towards Christ when he says: Behold, he who dares to compare himself with Christ, as if because Christ rose, he thinks he will rise too. Do not be disturbed by the perverse praise of your Emperor; hostile schemes disturb you, but the humility and humanity of Christ comfort you. He proclaims how exalted Christ is from you: but Christ tells how much He descended to you. So answer him: awaken that faith; it is a storm, there are waves, the ship is struggling, Christ is asleep; awaken that faith, do not forget what you believed. You will respond immediately, when the evangelical faith begins to awaken in you. You will not lack in responding: for it will not be you who speaks; Christ dwelling in you will seize His instrument, your tongue, like His sword, using your heart and voice as dwelling possessor, He will resist the adversary, He will make you secure: you only awaken the sleeper, that is, remember the forgotten faith. On the mortality of Christ by which he became a mediator for us.

Only just now, what shall I say, how shall you respond to such things? I will not say something new, but what you have believed. Therefore, arouse faith, and respond to the one saying: Christ alone could do it, we cannot: respond and say: Therefore Christ could, because he is God; he certainly, because he is God. If because he is God, because he is omnipotent; if because he is omnipotent, why should I despair that he could achieve in me what he demonstrated in himself for me? Then I inquire from where Christ rose. He will respond: From the dead. I inquire why he died. For can God die? That divinity, the Word equal to the Father, the art of the omnipotent creator, through whom all things were made, immutable wisdom, remaining in itself, renewing all things, reaching from end to end mightily and disposing all things sweetly, could it die? No, he says. And yet Christ died. From whence did he die? Clearly, because he did not consider being equal to God something to be grasped, but emptied himself, taking the form of a servant. Before this, what does he say? Who, though he was in the form of God. Had he taken the form of God, or was he naturally in it? The Apostle makes a distinction. When he said the form of God, he said was: when he mentioned the form of a servant, he said taking. Therefore, Christ was something, he took something, so that what he took would be one with him. In the form of God he was equal to God, as that fisherman evangelist says: The Word was in the beginning, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God; that is: Though he was in the form of God, he did not consider being equal to God something to be grasped. For what is not naturally inherent, but is illicitly seized, is a robbery. The angel usurped equality with God, and fell, and became the devil: man usurped equality with God, and fell, and became mortal. He however, who was born equal, because he was not born in time, but the eternal Son to the eternal Father, always born, through whom all things were made, was in the form of God. But to be a mediator between God and men, between the just and the unjust, between the immortal and mortals, he took something from the unjust and mortals, preserving something with the just and immortal. For with the just and immortal retaining justice, assuming mortality from the unjust and mortals, he became the reconciler in the middle, tearing down the wall of our sins; from whom it is sung by his people: And in my God I will leap over a wall; returning to God what sins had alienated, redeeming with his blood what the devil had possessed; he died for us, and rose for us. He bore our sins, not clinging to them, but sustaining them: just as Jacob bore the skins of the goats, so that he would appear hairy to his blessing father. The evil Esau had his own hair, but the good Jacob carried others'. For sinful men carry sins inherently. But they did not adhere to him who said: I have the power to lay down my life, and I have the power to take it up again.

Death, therefore, in our Lord was a sign of others' sins, not the punishment of His own. But in all men, mortality is the punishment of sin: for it is drawn from the origin of sin, whence we all come; from the fall of that man, not from His descent. For it is one thing to fall, another to descend. One fell wickedly, another descended mercifully. For as in Adam all die, so in Christ all shall be made alive. Bearing, therefore, others' sins: "What I did not steal, I then had to restore"; that is, having no sin, I was dying. "Behold," He says, "the prince of this world is coming, and he has nothing in me." What does it mean: "he has nothing in me"? He shall find no cause of death in me. For the cause of death is sin. Why, then, will you die? He proceeds and says, "But that all may know that I do the will of my Father, arise, let us go hence." And He rises, proceeding towards the passion. Why? Because He was doing the will of His Father, not because He owed anything to the prince of sins, in whom there was no sin. Therefore, our Lord Jesus Christ brought His divinity with Him, but He assumed mortality from us. He received this in the womb of the Virgin Mary, uniting Himself, the Word of God, to human nature, as a bridegroom to the bride in the virginal chamber, that He might come forth as a bridegroom from His chamber.

Moved by mercy, Christ became mortal.

Return, therefore, to what I was saying. Mortality came from sin to all men: however, in the Lord, it was from mercy, and yet it was true; because such flesh was true, and truly mortal, having the likeness of sinful flesh; not the likeness of flesh, but the likeness of sinful flesh: for it was true flesh, but not flesh of sin. For He did not receive that mortality, as I said, on account of the merit of sin, He who emptied Himself taking the form of a servant, and became obedient unto death. What therefore was He, and what did He have? He was divinity, having mortality. However, from what He died, from that He rose again.

Consider now those who say: Only Christ could rise again, not you. But respond and say: Christ rose again in what he had taken from us. Take away the form of a servant, there would not be one in which he could rise again; because there would not be one in which he could die. Why, then, do you wish to destroy in me the faith of the praise of my Lord, which my Lord has built in me? For in that he took the form of a servant, he died. According to this, however, he rose again, according to what he died. In no way, therefore, should I despair of the servant's resurrection, since the Lord rose in the form of a servant. Or if they attribute to the power of man that Christ rose from the dead; for they also often say this, that he was so just a man that he could also rise from the dead: in the meantime, speaking according to them, and not mentioning the divinity of our Lord; that just one, to the point that he could even rise from the dead, could in no way deceive us when he also promised us resurrection.

How the future resurrection is proven.

Therefore, all that has been said, brothers, is meant for this end, that you may be instructed if any say that the dead do not rise. What has been said, if you remember, as far as God has deemed necessary to suggest, and testimonies from the nature of things and daily examples have been given; and about the omnipotence of God Himself, to whom nothing is difficult, who, if He could create what was not, can much more easily restore what was; and about the Lord and Savior Jesus Christ Himself, whom it is certain has risen, and His resurrection did not occur except in the form of a servant, because death could not have come, from which it would be necessary to rise, except through the form of a servant. Hence, because we are servants, we ought to hope for that in our form, which He deemed to prefigure in the form of a servant. Thus let the tongues of those who say: Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die, fall silent. Indeed, you also respond, and say: Let us fast and pray, for tomorrow we die. On the expectation of the last day. An example is taken from Noah.

It remains for us to speak of what the life of the righteous will be like in the resurrection. But because you already see the time taken today is moderate, ponder what we have delivered; and pray that we may sometimes deliver what we owe. Especially remember that which we have spoken, particularly for these festive days, my brothers, which the pagans celebrate. Be attentive: this world is passing away, remember the Gospel where the Lord predicts the last day will come like in the days of Noah. They were eating and drinking, buying and selling, marrying and being given in marriage, until Noah entered the ark; the flood came and destroyed them all. You have the Lord clearly warning you, and in another place saying: Do not let your hearts be weighed down with carousing and drunkenness. Let your loins be girded, and your lamps burning; and be like the servants waiting for their lord, when he shall return from the wedding. Let us wait for Him to come, let Him not find us slothful. It is shameful for a married woman not to desire her husband: how much more shameful is it for the Church not to desire Christ? The husband comes to physical embraces and is received with great vows by his chaste wife: the Bridegroom of the Church will come to grant eternal embraces, to make us his coheirs forever, and we live in such a way that we not only do not desire His coming, but we even fear it! How true is it that that day will come like in the days of Noah? How many will He find to be so, even those who call themselves Christians? Therefore the ark was being built through many years, so that those who do not believe may awaken. For a hundred years it was being built, and they did not awaken to say: The man of God is not building the ark without reason, but because destruction threatens the human race; and they would have appeased God's wrath, turning to the ways which please God, as the Ninevites did. For they produced the fruit of repentance, and appeased the wrath of God. And Nineveh is an example.

Jonah announced, not mercy, but future wrath: for he did not say, "In three days, Nineveh will be overthrown; but if you repent in these three days, God will spare you." He did not say this. He only threatened destruction and foretold it. And yet, they, not despairing of God's mercy, turned to repentance; and God spared them. But what shall we say? That the prophet lied? If you understand it carnally, it seems he spoke falsely; if you understand it spiritually, what the prophet said came to pass. For Nineveh was overthrown. Consider what Nineveh was and see that it was overthrown. What was Nineveh? They were eating and drinking, buying, selling, planting, building, giving themselves to perjuries, lies, drunkenness, crimes, corruption: this was Nineveh. Consider Nineveh now: they are mourning, grieving, feeling contrite, in sackcloth and ashes, in fasting and prayers. Where is that Nineveh? Clearly, it is overthrown, for it is no longer engaged in those former activities. Who are the men who enter into the ark of the Church which Christ builds?

Therefore, brothers, even now the ark is being built, and those hundred years are these times: this entire span of time is signified by that number of years. If then they rightly perished, who disregarded Noah building the ark; what do they deserve, who disregard salvation while Christ is building the Church? There is as much difference between Noah and Christ, as there is between a servant and a master; even more, as between God and man. For a servant and a master can also both be called men. And yet, because men did not believe when a man was building the ark, an example is given from them for posterity to beware. Christ God, becoming man for our sake, builds the Church; He laid the foundation of that ark with Himself: daily, uncorrupted wood, faithful men renouncing this world, enter into the structure of the ark; and it is still said: Let us eat and drink; for tomorrow we die. Therefore you, as I said, brothers, say against them: Let us fast and pray; for tomorrow we die. For they say: Let us eat and drink; for tomorrow we die, who do not hope for the resurrection: but we, who now believe and proclaim the resurrection both in the words of the Prophets, and with Christ and the Apostles preaching, who hope to live after this death, let us not falter, nor burden our hearts with gluttony and drunkenness; but eagerly expecting, girded with loins and with lamps burning, the coming of our Lord, let us fast and pray, not because we will die tomorrow, but so that we may die in security. What remains then, brothers, demand it from us at another time in the name of the Lord. Turned to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 362

SERMO 362 On the Resurrection of the Dead Proposal: what kind of resurrection of the just will be in the future.

Remembering our promise, we also had appropriate readings from the Gospel and Apostle recited. For whoever among you were present at the previous sermon remembers with us that the question about the resurrection was proposed by us and distributed into a twofold discussion: firstly, to deliberate for those who doubt or even deny whether the resurrection of the dead will happen; and afterwards, as much as we are able, to search according to the Scriptures what kind of life the righteous will have in the future resurrection. Therefore, in the first part, where we treated that the dead will rise, we delayed for so long, as you deigned to remember, that the time to handle the second question ran out, and thus we were compelled to defer it to this day. Therefore, your attention demands what is owed by us, and we recognize the time for delivering it.

Therefore, with a similarly pious intention of the heart, let us beseech the Lord, so that we may discharge our duty fittingly, and you may receive it healthily. For this is, as must be admitted, a greater question: but charity, which is stronger than all difficult questions, we all must serve, so that God, who commanded this, may turn all our difficulties into ease and joy.

Memory of the previous sermon.

You remember that on that day we responded to some who said, as the Apostle rebukes them: "Let us eat and drink; for tomorrow we die," adding and saying: "Evil communications corrupt good manners;" and concluding thus: "Be sober, righteous, and do not sin: for some have ignorance of God; I speak this to your shame." We all have heard these apostolic words and have committed them to heart: and whoever has heard and committed them to heart, let their works show it. For he who hears is like a field receiving the seed of the sower: but he who commits it to heart is like one who breaks the clod and covers what is sown: but he who acts according to what he has heard and committed to heart, he is the one who rises into the harvest and brings forth fruit with patience, some thirtyfold, some sixtyfold, some a hundredfold. For him, not fire like chaff, but granaries like for wheat are prepared. In those very hidden storehouses, in the resurrection of the dead, there is that perpetual blessedness, even that secret of the righteous, to which the Scripture commends them to be received.

We must use images to signify hidden things.

He also mentioned vessels in another place when the Lord Jesus Christ said that the kingdom of heaven is like a dragnet, that is, nets; for certain nets are called dragnet. Therefore, He said, the kingdom of heaven is like a dragnet cast into the sea, gathering fish of every kind: which, when it was filled, they drew to shore, and sitting down, collected the good into vessels, but cast the bad away. Our Lord wished to signify that in this way the word of God is now sent to the peoples and nations, as a dragnet is cast into the sea. But now the Christian sacraments gather both good and bad: however, not all those whom the dragnet picks up are also stored in the containers. For the containers are the abodes of the saints and the great hidden things of blessed life, which not all who are called Christians can reach, but those who are called in such a way as to be. The good and the bad fish swim within the dragnet, and the good tolerate the bad until they are separated at the end. It is also said somewhere: "You will hide them in the secret of your face"; for He was speaking of the saints. "You will hide them," He said, "in the secret of your face": that is, where human eyes and mortal thoughts cannot follow; signifying certain secrets that are too hidden, too concealed, which He called in the secret of the face of God. Should it be carnally thought that God has some great face, and in His face there is some bodily receptacle where the saints are to be hidden? You see, brothers, how carnal these things are and should be rejected by the hearts of all the faithful. Therefore, what should be understood by the secret of the face of God, except what is known only to the face of God? When barns are mentioned to signify secrets, and in another place vessels are mentioned; neither are the barns which we know nor the vessels. For if it were something of one kind, the other thing would not be mentioned. But because through the similitudes known to men the unknown things are conveyed as they can be, accept that both terms are used to mean the same secret, both by the name of the barn and of the vessels. But if you ask what kind of secret, listen to the Prophet saying: "You will hide them in the secret of your face."

We sigh with faith for our homeland.

Since these things are so, brothers, we are still wandering in this life, still sighing by faith for that unknown country. And why is it an unknown country, from which we are citizens, if not because, being forgotten by wandering in faraway lands, we have forgotten it so much that we can call our homeland unknown? The Lord Christ expels this forgetfulness from the heart, the king of that same country, coming to the wanderers; and by taking on flesh, his divinity becomes for us the way, so that through the man Christ we may proceed, and remain in the God Christ.

What then, brothers? That secret, which no eye has seen, nor ear heard, nor has entered into the heart of man, with what eloquence can we explain it to you, or with what eye shall we see it? We can sometimes know something, which nevertheless we cannot express: but what we do not know, we can never express. Therefore, since it can happen that if I knew those things, I could not express them to you; how much more difficult will my eloquence be, when even I, brothers, walk with you by faith, not yet by sight? But this I, or even the Apostle himself? For he consoles our ignorance, and builds up faith, saying: "Brothers, I do not reckon myself to have apprehended. But one thing, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling"; wherein he shows himself to be on the way. And in another place: "As long as we are in the body, we are absent from the Lord: for we walk by faith, not by sight." And again: "For we are saved by hope. But hope that is seen is not hope: for what a man sees, why does he yet hope for it? But if we hope for what we see not, then do we with patience wait for it."

We explain what we believe, not what we know.

Thus, brothers, hear from me a voice which is in the Psalms, pious, humble, gentle, not haughty, not turbulent, not hasty, not rash. For the Psalm says in one place: I believed, therefore I spoke. And the Apostle inserted this testimony and added: And we also believe, therefore we also speak. Do you want me, therefore, to say the things that I know? I am not deceiving you, hear what I believed. Do not despise it, because you hear what I believed: for you hear a truthful confession.

But if I were to say: Hear what I know; you would hear a rash presumption. Therefore, brothers, all of us, and, as we believe from the holy scriptures, all also who have lived in the flesh before us, and through whom the Spirit of God speaking distributed to men as much as was sufficient to signify to those on pilgrimage, all of us speak what we believe: but the Lord himself speaks what he knows. What then, if the Lord alone could know of eternal life to come what he spoke; but others following the Lord, because they believed? We find our Lord Jesus Christ himself, knowing what he was speaking, yet not saying it. For he said in one place to his disciples: I have yet many things to say to you; but you cannot bear them now. He, because of their weakness, not because of his difficulty, deferred saying what he knew. But we, because of our common weakness, do not attempt to speak worthily what we know, but explain what we worthily believe, as we can; and you understand as you can. And if perhaps one of you can grasp more than I can say; do not look to the small stream, but run to the most abundant source: for with him is the fountain of life, in whose light we shall see light. A Christian is not permitted to doubt about the resurrection.

Therefore, since there is a resurrection, we dispute thus, we believe thus, we must believe thus, we speak thus, because we have believed thus, if we are Christians, looking at the power of the Lord’s arm casting down everywhere the pride of the nations, and building this faith so widely throughout the world, as was promised long before it happened: looking at these things, we are built up to believe in those things which we do not yet see, so that we receive the very vision as the reward of faith. Therefore, since it is manifest in our faith that the future resurrection of the dead will occur, and so manifest that anyone who would doubt this would impudently call himself a Christian, it is asked what kind of bodies the saints will have, and what their future life will be like. For it has seemed to many that indeed there will be a resurrection, but only through the souls.

Questions concerning the resurrection are proposed.

Since bodies indeed rise again, there is no need for a long discussion after the previous sermon. However, this kind of question arises: If bodies are to exist, what kind will they be? Will they be of the same kind as now, or of another kind? If of another kind, what kind will it be? If of the same kind, then will they undertake the same works? Because the Lord prescribes differently, because the Apostle teaches differently. For they are not to the same life, not to the same mortal and corruptible deeds that perish and pass away, not to carnal joys, not to carnal consolations. If therefore not to the same, neither to the same kind. If not the same kind, then how will the flesh rise again? However, we have the resurrection of the flesh in the rule of faith, and we are baptized confessing it. And whatever we confess there, we confess from truth and in truth, in which we live and move and are. For in certain temporal and passing deeds, and things that pass and transition, we are instructed towards eternal life. All that has been done, so that we might hear something salutary, so that miracles might happen, so that our Lord might be born, hunger and thirst, be captured, suffer insults, be whipped, crucified, die, be buried, rise again, and ascend into heaven, all have passed; and when they are preached, certain temporal and transient actions of our faith are preached. Do they pass away because they themselves pass away, or do they likewise pass away because they are built through them? Let Your Holiness consider, so that you may see this through a likeness. An architect builds a lasting house through temporary machines. For in this great and vast structure that we see, when it was being built, there were machines that are not here now; because what was built through them is now perfect and stands. So therefore, brothers, something was being built in the Christian faith, and certain temporal mechanisms were perfected.

For our Lord Jesus Christ's resurrection has passed; for he does not still rise again: and his ascending into heaven has passed; for he does not still ascend. But the life in which he now lives, where he no longer dies, and death no longer has dominion over him; the same human nature that he deigned to take on, in which to be born, die, and be buried, this has been built, this remains forever. However, the machines through which it was built have passed. For Christ is not always conceived in the virgin womb, nor always born of the Virgin Mary, nor always captured, judged, scourged, crucified, buried. All these are considered machines, so that what remains forever might be built through these machines. However, the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ is placed in heaven.

Heavenly Jerusalem has its foundation in Christ.

Let your Charity attend to the marvelous building. These earthly buildings indeed press the earth with their weight, and the entire tendency of their weights in this large structure strives towards the earth, and unless held together, it falls downward, where the weight leads. Because it is built on the earth, a foundation is laid beforehand on the earth; so that he who builds may securely construct upon the foundation. Therefore, he places extremely firm masses at the bottom, so that they may adequately bear what is placed above, and the magnitude of the foundation is prepared proportional to the greatness of the building: yet on the earth, as I said, because that which is built above is also certainly placed on the earth. That our Jerusalem is built as a pilgrim in heaven. Therefore, Christ the foundation has gone before us into heaven. For in heaven is our foundation and the head of the Church: for he is called both the foundation and the head, and truly he is so. Because the head of the building is the foundation: for it is not the head where it ends, but where it begins upwards. The summits of earthly buildings are raised, yet they establish the head in the solidness of the earth. Thus the head of the Church has gone before us into heaven, and sits at the right hand of the Father. Just as men work to lay down a foundation by drawing something to stabilize from below, for the security of the upcoming mass in the construction of the future fabric: so through all those things which happened in Christ, being born, growing, being captured, suffering insult, being scourged, crucified, killed, dying, buried, it is as if the mass was drawn to the heavenly foundation.

Therefore, having laid our foundation on high, let us be built upon it. Hear the Apostle: No other foundation, he says, can anyone lay than that which is laid, which is Jesus Christ. In Christ, life must be built for us so that we avoid the fire of Gehenna. But what follows? Let each one see how he builds upon the foundation, gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble. Christ is indeed in heaven, but also in the hearts of believers. If Christ holds the first place, the foundation is rightly placed. Therefore, he who builds should build securely, if he builds gold, silver, precious stones according to the dignity of the foundation. But if he does not build according to the dignity of the foundation, wood, hay, stubble; let him at least hold onto the foundation, and because of those things which he has built, dry and fragile, let him prepare himself for the fire. But if the foundation is, that is, if Christ has obtained the first place in the heart, and worldly things are so loved that they are not preferred to Christ, but rather Christ the Lord is placed over them, to be the foundation holding the first place in the building of the heart: he will suffer loss, he says; but he himself will be saved, yet so as through fire. Now is not the time to exhort you, that you would rather build gold, silver, precious stones upon so great and strong a foundation, than wood, hay, stubble: but yet take it briefly said, as if spoken at length and with many words. For we know, brothers, that whoever among you would be imprisoned by the threats of some judge, so as to endure only smoke, would prefer to lose all those things rather than to endure that place. But somehow, when fire is named to be future in the day of judgment, all despise it, and fearing the flames of the hearth, they consider the flame of hell as nothing. What is this hardness? what such great perversity of heart? If at least men were to fear as the Apostle said, through fire, how one fears being burned alive, which happens in a moment, until the sense abandoning the members makes all those flames redundant; nevertheless he would fear, and not do anything that is rightly forbidden, lest he should arrive at that momentary torment. The resurrection to be hoped for is such as has preceded in Christ.

But, as I said, brothers, now there is no time to discuss this matter: I say this, that we ought to hope for the resurrection of the dead, which is expressed in our Head, which is expressed in the body of our Lord Jesus Christ. Whoever hopes for something else, already does not build upon the foundation, not only with gold, silver, and precious stones, but not even with straw itself. For he sets the whole outside, because he does not set it in Christ. Therefore, our Lord rose in that body in which He was buried. The resurrection is promised to Christians. Let us hope for such a resurrection, as preceded in our Lord of all our faith. For He went before for this, so that our faith might be founded upon it. What then? How not such as we are now? For the flesh of our Lord Jesus Christ rose, but ascended into heaven. On earth, He preserved human duties, to persuade that this had risen which was buried. But is there such food even in heaven? For we read that angels also executed human duties on earth. They came to Abraham, and ate; and with Tobias, the angel was, and ate. What do we say, that that eating was a phantom, and was not real? Is it not clear that Abraham killed a calf, made bread, and set it on the table; served the angels, and they ate? All these things were done very manifestly and expressed very manifestly.

Man eats out of necessity, angel eats out of power.

What then does the angel say in the book of Tobit? "You saw me eating, but with your sight you were seeing." Therefore, was it because he was not eating, but was seen to be eating? No, rather, he was eating. What then is the meaning of "with your sight you were seeing"? Let Your Holiness pay attention to what I say: pay attention in prayer more than to me; so that you may understand what we say, and we may speak as you ought to hear and understand what you hear. As long as our body is corruptible and destined to die, it suffers the need for nourishment, hence hunger arises: therefore we hunger and thirst; and if we postpone our hunger and thirst longer than the body can endure, it leads to emaciation and to a certain unhealthy thinness, as the strength departs and is not replaced: and if it is prolonged further, death will also follow. For always something leaves our body as if by a certain stream of departure, but we do not feel the strength departing because we take in replacements through nourishment. For what comes abundantly departs gradually: therefore, we refresh in a short time, but over a longer time, the strength we received when we were refreshed leaves us. Just as oil in a lamp, which is supplied in small amounts, is gradually consumed over a longer time. But when it is almost consumed, the weakness of that small flame, like hunger of the lamp, warns us, and we promptly intervene to restore that appearance and maintain the light in the lamp by feeding it its nourishment when we add oil. So our strength, which we receive by eating, departs and leaves us through continual departure, but gradually. For this is now happening in us, and in all our actions, every even in our stillness, what was taken in continues to depart: and if it is entirely consumed, man dies just as a lamp extinguishes. So that he does not die, that is, so that he does not extinguish—not because he dies in the spirit, but so that this corporeal life does not extinguish and a certain vigilance persists in this body—we run and replace what has left, and we say to refresh. Whoever says refresh, what does he refresh if nothing is deficient? Through this neediness and corruption, we are all mortal, because this body is such that death is reserved for it. The mortality is signified by the skins with which Adam and Eve were clothed and dismissed from paradise. Skins as a matter of fact signify death, which are usually taken from dead animals. Therefore, as we bear this defective weakness, even if food is never lacking, but repeatedly restores strength, it does not, however, prevent future death (for the entire state of the body through succeeding ages, even if one lives longer here, ultimately reaches the limit of old age, and beyond there is nothing further but death. For even the lamp itself, though oil is constantly provided, cannot always burn; for if it does not extinguish for other reasons, the wick itself wears out and is consumed by a sort of old age). Therefore, as long as we bear such bodies, from deficiency we need, from need we hunger, from hunger we eat. But the angel does not eat from need. It is one thing to do something out of power, another out of necessity. Man eats so as not to die: the angel eats to relate to mortals. For if the angel does not fear death, he is not refreshed out of deficiency: if he is not refreshed out of deficiency, he does not eat out of need. Those who saw the angel eating thought he was hungry. This is what he said: "You were seeing with your sight." He did not say: "You saw me eating, but I did not eat": he said, "You saw me eating, but with your sight you were seeing"; that is, I was eating to relate to you, not because I suffered any hunger or need, driven by which you are accustomed to eat, and therefore when you have seen someone eating, you suspect them to do so out of need, as you measure what you see by your own custom: this is "with your sight you were seeing."

After the resurrection, there will be no need for eating.

What then, my brothers? We know, as the Apostle says, that Christ, rising again from the dead, dies no more, and death shall have no more dominion over him. For in that he died, he died to sin once: but in that he lives, he lives unto God. If therefore he dies no more, and death shall have no more dominion over him, so let us hope to rise, that we may always be in that state to which we shall be changed by rising. Even if there will be the power of eating and drinking, there will not be the necessity. But there was then a reason why the Lord did this, because there were still in the flesh those to whom he wished to be fitting, to whom he also wished to show his scars. For it was not that he who made the eyes of the blind, which he had not received in the mother's womb, could not rise again without scars. He who, if he wished, could change the mortal neediness of his own flesh before death so that it would have no need of want, indeed could: for he had it in his hand, because he was God in the flesh, and the omnipotent Son, as the omnipotent Father. For he even changed his own flesh before death into what he wished. Indeed, when he was on the mountain with his disciples, his face shone like the sun. But he did this by power, wishing to show that he could change his own flesh from all neediness, so that he would not die if he did not wish to. "I have power," he says, "to lay down my life, and I have power to take it again. No one takes it from me." This power is great, by which he could also not die: but his mercy is greater, by which he wished to die. For he did this by mercy, which he could also not do by power, to establish for us the foundation of the resurrection: so that that which he bore for us in mortality, and died because we are to die, and rose to immortality, so that we might hope for immortality. Therefore before death it is written not only that he ate and drank, but also that he hungered and thirsted; after the resurrection, only that he ate and drank, but not that he hungered and thirsted; because in a body no longer subject to death there was not that need of corruption, so that there would be a necessity of replenishment, but there was the power of eating. It was done for the sake of fitting, not to relieve the want of the flesh, but to persuade the truth of the body. On a certain statement of the Apostle which seems to contradict the resurrection.

Against such great evidence, some raise a question to us from the Apostle: against this dispute, see what they object. They say, "The flesh will not rise: for if it will rise, it will inherit the kingdom of God; yet the Apostle openly says: Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God." You heard it when the Apostle was read. We say that the flesh will rise, and the Apostle exclaims: "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God." Therefore, do we preach against the Apostle, or did he himself preach against the Gospel? The Gospel testifies with a divine voice: "The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us." If it was made flesh, it was made true flesh. For if it was not true flesh, it was not flesh. Just like the true flesh of Mary, the true flesh of Christ, which was assumed from there. This true flesh was seized, scourged, struck, and hung; this true flesh died, this true flesh was buried; this true flesh also rose from the dead. The scars bear witness: the eyes of the disciples see, and still, wonder fluctuates; the hand touches, lest the mind doubt. Against such great evidence, brothers, which our Lord Jesus Christ wanted to persuade the disciples to preach around the world in this way; does it seem the Apostle fights against this evidence, saying: "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God?" The question is very easily solved.

We could solve this question in this way, and resist the empty slanderers: nonetheless, it will also be solved thus, as it can be quickly answered, and more diligently, considering what the Apostle said, from where it is spoken. Therefore, I say how we can respond most easily. What does the Gospel have? That Christ rose in the body in which he was buried: because he was seen, because he was touched, because he said to the disciples, thinking he was a spirit: Touch, and see, because a spirit does not have flesh and bones, as you see me having. What does the Apostle say against this? Flesh and blood, he said, will not possess the kingdom of God. I embrace both, and I do not say these things are in conflict, so I do not fight against the goad myself. How then do I embrace both? Quickly, as I said, I could respond thus: The Apostle said: Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God. Rightly so; for it is not of the flesh to possess, but to be possessed. For it is not your body that possesses something, but your soul through the body that possesses, which even possesses that body itself. If then the flesh rises in such a way that it is held, not that it holds; so that it is possessed, not that it possesses: what wonder if flesh and blood will not possess the kingdom of God, because certainly it will be possessed? For the flesh possesses those who are not the kingdom of God, but the kingdom of the devil, and therefore are subject to the pleasures of the flesh. Whence also the paralyzed man was carried by a mat: but when healed the Lord said: Take up your mat, and go to your house. Thus, having healed the paralysis, he holds his flesh, and leads it where he wills: not where he does not will is he dragged by the flesh, and he rather carries the body, than is carried by the body. It is clear that in that resurrection the flesh will not have the lure of enticements, to lead the soul through certain titillations and blandishments, where the soul does not will, and often is overcome, saying: I see another law in my members warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin, which is in my members. Still the paralyzed man is carried by the mat, not yet carries; let him therefore exclaim: Wretched man that I am, who will deliver me from the body of this death? Let it be answered: The grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord. When therefore we have risen, the flesh will not carry us, but we will carry it: if we carry it, we will possess it: if we will possess it, we will not be possessed by it; because freed from the devil we are the kingdom of God: and thus flesh and blood will not possess the kingdom of God. Therefore let those slanderers be silent, who truly are flesh and blood, and can think nothing but carnally. For concerning those who persist in the same wisdom of the flesh, whence they are rightly called flesh and blood, it could rightly be said: Flesh and blood will not possess the kingdom of God. In this way, let this question also be resolved: because such people, who are called flesh and blood (for the Apostle also speaks of such people: We do not wrestle against flesh and blood), if they do not convert to a spiritual life, and by the Spirit put to death the deeds of the flesh, will not be able to inherit the kingdom of God.

What the Apostle wished to signify.

Nevertheless, what does the Apostle say, someone might ask? For that is the truer meaning which is revealed by the context of the reading. Therefore, let us rather hear him, and from the entire structure of the Scripture around it, let us see what he wanted to be understood in that place. For he says thus: "The first man is of the earth, earthy; the second man is the Lord from heaven. As is the earthy, such are those who are earthy; and as is the heavenly, such are those who are heavenly. As we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly. But this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, neither does corruption inherit incorruption." Let us therefore examine each bit. "The first man," he says, "is of the earth, earthy; the second man is the Lord from heaven. As is the earthy, such are those who are earthy," that is, all who are mortal; "and as is the heavenly, such are those who are heavenly," that is, all who will rise again. For the heavenly man has now risen and ascended into heaven: to whom we are now joined by faith, so that he may be our head; the members, however, follow their head in due order, and that which was prefigured in the head is shown in due time in the members: but now we bear this in faith, so that in due time we may come to the very thing and appearance itself. For thus he says in another place: "If then you have been risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sits at the right hand of God; set your minds on things above, not on things on the earth." Therefore, just as we have not yet risen ourselves, as Christ in the body, nevertheless by faith we are said to have risen with Christ: so he commands us to bear the image of the heavenly man by faith for the time being, that is, of the one who is already in the heavens.

How Christ, the heavenly man, is from heaven. But if anyone asks why the man is spoken of as the second who is not in heaven but from heaven, since the Lord Himself took a body from the earth, because certainly Mary was born of Adam and Eve; let him understand that the earthly man is described according to earthly desire: and since that affectation is earthly, by which men are born through the union of a man and a woman, also drawing original sin from their parents; but the body of the Lord was created from the virginal womb without any such affection, although Christ assumed flesh from the earth, which is understood to be signified by the Holy Spirit, saying: "Truth has sprung from the earth"; yet not earthly, but heavenly man, and is said to be from heaven. For if He provided this to His faithful through grace, so that the Apostle rightly says: "Our conversation is in heaven"; how much more should the heavenly man Himself be said to be from heaven, in whom there was never any sin? For, on account of sin, it was said to man: "You are dust, and to dust you shall return." Therefore, the heavenly man is most rightly said to be from heaven, whose conversation never departed from heaven: although the Son of God, also made the son of man, assumed a body from the earth, that is, the form of a servant. For He did not ascend except He who descended. For even if others, to whomsoever it has been granted, ascend, or rather are lifted to heaven by His grace, even so He Himself ascended, because they become His body; and in this way, one ascended: because the Apostle explains that great sacrament in Christ and the Church, where it is written: "And the two shall become one flesh." Whence it is also said: "So then they are no longer two, but one flesh." Therefore, no one ascends into heaven except He who came down from heaven, the Son of Man, who is in heaven. For this reason, He added, who is in heaven, lest anyone should think that His conversation had departed from heaven, while He appeared to men on earth with an earthly body. Therefore, as we have borne the image of the earthly man, let us also bear the image of Him who is from heaven, meanwhile in faith, through which we have also risen with Him: so that we may have our hearts lifted up, where Christ is sitting at the right hand of God; and thus let us seek and savor the things which are above, not those on earth.

Something different is signified when flesh is mentioned, something different when body is mentioned. But because he was discussing the resurrection of the body, for he had proposed thus: "But someone will say, How are the dead raised? With what kind of body do they come?" And for this reason, he had said, "The first man is of the earth, earthly; the second man is from heaven. As is the earthly, such are they also that are earthly; and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly," so that we may hope that what has preceded in Christ's body will happen to our body; and though we have not yet fully understood this in reality, let us meanwhile hold it by faith. Therefore, he added, "As we have borne the image of the earthly, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly." Lest we believe that we shall be resurrected to such a state in which we performed actions in corruption according to the first man, he added immediately, "But this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God." And wishing to show what he meant by flesh and blood, meaning not the substance of the body but the corruption signified by the name of flesh and blood, which corruption will not exist then, for a body without corruption is not properly called flesh and blood, but a body. If it is flesh, it is corruptible and mortal; but if it does not die anymore, it is no longer corruptible; and therefore, with the substance remaining without corruption, it is no longer called flesh but body: and if it is called flesh, it is not properly so called, but because of a certain similarity of appearance. Just as, for the same similarity, we might perhaps call even the bodies of angels flesh, when they appeared to men as human beings; although they were bodies, not flesh, because there was no need for corruption. Therefore, because we can call even an incorruptible body flesh according to resemblance, the Apostle, being careful, wishes to explain what he meant by flesh and blood: that he said this not according to substance but according to corruption, and he added immediately: "Nor does corruption inherit incorruption," as if he were saying: What I said, "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God," I said this because corruption cannot inherit incorruption. The life of the body after the resurrection should not be thought of carnally. And so that no one might say: If incorruptibility cannot be possessed from corruption, how will our body be there? Hear what follows. As if it were said to the Apostle: What then do you mean? Did we believe in the resurrection of the flesh in vain? If flesh and blood will not inherit the kingdom of God, did we believe in vain that our Lord rose from the dead in the body in which he was born and crucified, and in that same body ascended into heaven before the eyes of his disciples, from which heaven he called out to you: Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me? This occurred to Paul, the holy and blessed Apostle, and by his pious love, he labored in giving birth to his children in Christ, begotten through the Gospel, whom he was still giving birth until Christ was formed in them, that is, until they bore the image of him who is from heaven through faith. For he did not want them to remain in that ruin, thinking that they would do such things in the kingdom of God, in that eternal life, as they did in this life, in the pleasures of eating and drinking, marrying, and begetting children: for these works belong to the corruption of the flesh, not to the nature of the flesh itself. Now then, since we are not to rise again for such things, the Lord prescribed, as I have already said, in the evangelical reading that has just been recited. For the Jews indeed believed in the resurrection of the flesh, but they thought that life in the resurrection would be like the life they lived in this world; and thinking carnally in this way, they could not answer the Sadducees who proposed the question about the resurrection, asking whose wife the woman would be who had had seven brothers in succession, each wanting to raise offspring for his deceased brother from her. For the Sadducees were a certain sect of the Jews who did not believe in the resurrection. Therefore, the Jews, wavering and hesitating, could not respond to the Sadducees who proposed such a question because they thought that the kingdom of God could be possessed by flesh and blood, that is, that incorruption could be possessed by corruption. The Truth came, was questioned by the deceived and deceiving Sadducees, and that question was proposed to the Lord. And the Lord, who knew what to say and wanted us to believe what we did not know, answered with the authority of his majesty what we should believe. The Apostle explained as much as he was given: that, as much as we can, we might understand. What then did the Lord say to the Sadducees? "You are wrong," he said, "not knowing the Scriptures or the power of God. For in the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage; neither do they begin to die, but they will be like the angels of God." Great is the power of God. Why do they not marry nor are given in marriage? Because they do not begin to die. For where there is no dying, there is no succession. Therefore, no such corruption will be there. And the Lord himself ran through all ages from infancy to youth, for he still carried the substance of mortal flesh: but after he rose in the age in which he was buried, do we believe he ages in heaven? Therefore, he said, they will be like the angels of God. He took away the suspicion of the Jews and refuted the slanders of the Sadducees: for the Jews indeed believed the dead would rise, but as to what works they would rise to, they thought carnally. He said, they will be like the angels of God. You heard about the power of God, now hear also about the Scriptures. Concerning the resurrection, he said, have you not read how the Lord spoke to Moses from the bush, saying: I am the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob? He is not the God of the dead, but of the living.

What the change of the good in the future resurrection will be.

Therefore, it is said that we will rise again: and because we rise to the life of the Angels, we have heard from the Lord: in what form we will rise again, he showed in his own resurrection. Since that form will not have corruption, the Apostle says: But this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; nor does corruption inherit incorruption; to show that he wanted to be understood by the name of flesh and blood as the corruption of the mortal and animal body. Then he resolves the question himself, which anxious listeners might inquire of him: because he is more concerned about the understanding of the sons than the sons are about the words of the parents.

Therefore, he adds and says: Behold, I tell you a mystery. Let your thoughts rest, O man, whoever you are. For you had begun to think from the words of the Apostle that human flesh does not rise again, when you heard: Flesh and blood shall not inherit the kingdom of God: but lend your ear to the subsequent words and correct the presumption of thought. Behold, he says, I tell you a mystery: We shall all rise, but we shall not all be changed. What is this? Change is either for the worse or for the better. If therefore change is posited, so that we do not yet see what it will be like, whether into something better or something worse: therefore let it follow, and let him explain it himself; what are we to suspect? And perhaps apostolic authority does not allow you to err in your human conjecture and explains clearly what kind of change he wants to be understood. What then? When he said: We shall all rise, but we shall not all be changed: I see that all will rise, both the good and the wicked; but let us see who will be changed; and from this let us understand whether the change will be for the better or for the worse. For if this change is for the wicked, it will be for the worse; but if for the good, it will be for the better. In a moment, he says, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trumpet. For the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. Therefore, this change will be for the better, when he says: And we shall be changed; but it has not yet been expressed to the extent that it ought to be expressed, as far as our body is changed for the better. What is this better, has not yet been said. For even when changing from infancy to adolescence, it can be said to be changing for the better, where, although less infirm, it is still infirm and mortal. In an atom of time, the resurrection of all the dead will occur.

Therefore, let us consider each point more diligently. "In the atom," he says. It seems difficult for men that the dead should rise again, but it is astonishing how the Apostle has removed all perplexing difficulties from the hearts of the faithful. You say: "The dead do not rise again": I say not only that the dead rise, but they will rise with such speed, faster than you were conceived and born. For how long does it take for a man to be formed in the womb, to be perfected, to be born, to be strengthened by the succession of ages? Is it perhaps that he will rise in this way? No: but "in the atom," he says. Many do not know what an atom is. An atom is named from ■τομος, which means section: τομ■ in Greek means something that cannot be divided. But an atom is said to be in the body, it is said to be in time. In the body, it is said, if something can be found that is indeed said to be indivisible, some very small body that no longer has a place where it can be divided. But an atom in time is a brief moment, which no longer has a place where it can be divided. For example, so that even the slower minds can grasp what I say: there is a stone; divide it into parts, and divide those parts into small pebbles, indeed the pebbles into grains, like sands, and again divide those grains of sand into the tiniest powder, until, if possible, you reach some minuteness that can no longer be divided. This is an atom in bodies. But in time it is understood thus. A year, for example, is divided into months, the months are divided into days, the days can still be divided into hours, the hours still into somewhat longer parts of hours, which allow divisions, until you come to such a point of time, and some drop of a moment, that it can no longer be extended by any delay, and therefore can no longer be divided: this is an atom of time. Therefore you said that the dead do not rise again: not only do they rise, but they rise with such speed that in an atom of time the resurrection of all the dead will take place. And explaining to you the speed of the atom, after he said: "in an atom," he immediately added, as much as the action and motion of time can happen in an atom: "In the blink of an eye," he said. For he knew that he had spoken obscurely: "in an atom," and he wanted to say more plainly what could be more easily understood. What is the blink of an eye? It is not that with the eyelids we close or open the eye: but by the blink of the eye, he means the emission of rays to see something. For as soon as you cast your gaze, the ray emitted reaches the sky, where we behold the sun, moon, stars, and constellations, separated by such an immense distance from the earth. Indeed, he calls the last trumpet the final sign. For he says, the trumpet will sound, and the dead will be raised incorruptible, and we will be changed. "We," indeed, he says, the faithful, and those rising first to eternal life. Therefore, that change, because it pertains to the pious and the holy, will be for the better, not for the worse. The transformation will be of the body, not of the flesh, when we are clothed with immortality. But what is this transformation? What does he mean when he says: "We shall be changed"? Is the current form lost, or is it only the corruption, because it is said: "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; nor does corruption inherit incorruption"? So that this might not move the listener to despair of the resurrection of the flesh, he adds: "Behold, I tell you a mystery: we shall all rise, but we shall not all be changed." And lest we think the change will be for the worse: "But we shall be changed," he says. Therefore, it remains for him to say what kind of change it will be. He says, "For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." If this corruptible puts on incorruption and this mortal puts on immortality, then the flesh will no longer be corruptible. Therefore, if the flesh will no longer be corruptible, the name of corruption in flesh and blood will cease, and the proper name of flesh and blood will also cease; because these are names of mortality. And if it is so and the flesh rises, and because it is changed and becomes incorruptible, flesh and blood will not inherit the kingdom of God. But if someone wishes to understand that transformation in those whom that day will find still alive then: so that those who were already dead will rise, but those who are still alive will be changed; it may be believed that the Apostle took upon himself their identity when he says: "And we shall be changed"; yet the same reasoning follows, because that incorruption will apply to all, when this corruptible puts on incorruption and this mortal puts on immortality. Then the saying that is written will come to pass: "Death is swallowed up in victory." "Where, O Death, is your sting? Where, O Death, is your victory?" However, a body that is no longer mortal will not be called flesh and blood, which are earthly bodies; but it will be called a body, which can now be called heavenly. Just as the same Apostle, when speaking of the different kinds of flesh, says: "Not all flesh is the same flesh. There is one kind of flesh of men, another flesh of beasts, another of fishes, another of birds, another of serpents. And there are bodies celestial and bodies terrestrial." By no means, however, would he speak of celestial flesh; although flesh can be called a body, but an earthly one. For every flesh is a body: but not every body is flesh; not only because a heavenly body is not called flesh, but even some earthly ones, like wood and stones, and anything of the sort. Therefore, flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God thus: because the rising flesh will be changed into such a body, in which there will no longer be mortal corruption, and hence neither the name of flesh and blood. The resurrection according to the spirit is believed by some to be the only true one. But pay attention, brothers, we ask you; it is not a matter to be taken lightly, it concerns our faith: which should be guarded not so much from pagans, as from certain perverse ones, who wish to be called and seen as Christians. For there were even under the Apostles those who said that the resurrection had already happened, and they perverted the faith of some, about whom the Apostle said: They have erred concerning the truth, saying that the resurrection has already happened; and they have overturned the faith of some. It is not without reason that he did not say: They have wandered from the truth; but: concerning the truth, yet they did not hold to the truth. Therefore death is taken away, and will not exist in a certain manner: as the Apostle says: The mortal will be swallowed up by life. For it is also said of the Lord, that he swallowed up death. For death does not depart as if having some substance of its own: but in the very body where it was, it will cease to be, so that you see the appearance, hold the appearance, seek corruption and mortality, and do not find them. So has corruption departed somewhere? No: but it was killed there, it was swallowed up there. Therefore when he said: It is necessary for this corruptible to put on incorruption, and this mortal to put on immortality: then the saying which is written will be fulfilled: Death is swallowed up in victory. Where, O death, is your strife? where, O death, is your sting? And he did not say: Death has departed in victory; but: Death is swallowed up in victory. How then did they wander concerning the truth? Because they spoke of one true resurrection, but denied the other. The resurrection of the wicked and the good is distinguished. For there is a resurrection according to faith, in which everyone who believes rises in spirit. Indeed, one will rise well in the body who first has risen in the spirit. For those who have not first risen in spirit through faith will not rise to that change in the body, where every corruption will be taken up and absorbed, but to that penal integrity. For even the bodies of the impious will be complete, nothing will appear diminished from them; but the integrity of the body will be for punishment, and a certain, so to speak, certain firmness of the body, a corruptible firmness: because where pain can exist, it cannot be said that there is no corruption; although that infirmity in sufferings does not fail, so that pain itself does not die out. For it is not unreasonably believed that corruption itself is signified prophetically by the name of the worm, and pain itself by the name of the fire. But because the firmness will be so great that it will neither yield to sufferings into death, nor be changed into incorruption, in which there is no pain; therefore it is written thus: Their worm will not die, and their fire will not be extinguished. But the change which will have no corruption will belong to the saints. Therefore, it will belong to those who now have the resurrection of the spirit through faith; about which resurrection the Apostle says: If then you have been raised with Christ, seek the things that are above, where Christ is seated at the right hand of God: set your minds on things that are above, not on things that are on the earth. For you have died, and your life is hidden with Christ in God. Just as we die according to the spirit, and rise according to the spirit: so later we die according to the flesh, and rise according to the flesh. Death according to the spirit is not to believe the vain things which one believed before, not to do the evil things which one did before. Resurrection according to the spirit is to believe the healthful things one did not believe, and to do the good things one did not do before. He who thought earthly idols and images were gods, recognized the one God, believed in Him, died in idolatry, rose in the Christian faith. He was a drunkard, he is sober; he died from drunkenness, he rose in sobriety. Thus, when one withdraws from all evil works, a kind of death occurs in the soul, and it rises in its good works. The Apostle says, Mortify therefore your members which are upon the earth, immorality, impurity, passion, evil desire, and covetousness, which is idolatry. Therefore, with these members mortified, we rise in the good things that are contrary to these; in holiness, in tranquility, in love, in almsgiving. Just as death according to the spirit precedes the resurrection which is according to the spirit: so will death according to the flesh precede the resurrection which is to come according to the flesh.

Testimonies of the double resurrection from the Apostle.

Therefore, let us recognize both, the spiritual and the bodily. The spiritual pertains to what is said: Arise, you who sleep; and arise from the dead; and that: Those who sat in the shadow of death, a light has arisen for them; and what I mentioned a little earlier: If you have been raised with Christ, seek the things that are above. The bodily resurrection, however, pertains to what the Apostle now says, who had proposed such a question to himself: But someone will say, how do the dead rise? And with what body do they come? Therefore, he was dealing with the resurrection of the body, in which the Lord preceded His Church; concerning this he thus says: This corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. Because of what he had said: Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God. However, we have in another place very clear testimony of the apostle Paul regarding the resurrection according to the spirit, and the resurrection according to the flesh. For the mortal body, which is or was animated, is called flesh. Thus, the Apostle speaks: But if Christ is in you, the body indeed is dead because of sin, but the spirit is life because of righteousness. Behold, the resurrection of the spirit is now understood to be accomplished through righteousness: see whether the resurrection of the body is also to be hoped for. For he did not wish to call the mortal body mortal, but dead; and he nevertheless indicates in what follows that he meant this. Thus, he follows and says: If the Spirit of Him who raised Jesus from the dead dwells in you, He who raised our Lord Jesus will also give life to your mortal bodies through His Spirit who dwells in you. Wherefore, those erred concerning the truth, who denied one resurrection. For if they denied it in every way, they would stray from the truth, not concerning the truth. Because they erred concerning the truth, they confessed one, which is according to the spirit; however, they denied the other, which is hoped for through the resurrection of the flesh, saying that the resurrection has already happened: which unless they said in such a way as to prevent belief and hope in the one that is to come in the body, it would not be said of them: They subvert the faith of some. The testimony of the Lord Himself in the Gospel according to John. But now hear the most manifest testimony of the Lord Himself in the Gospel according to John, in one place declaring both resurrections, both the one that is happening now according to the spirit, and the one that will later according to the flesh, so clearly that no one who in any way considers himself a Christian and is subject to evangelical authority can doubt; so that there remains no room for calumniators, as if wanting to overturn Christians through Christian faith by inserting their poisons to kill the souls of the weak. But listen from the very text. For this reason, not only do I perform the office of a disputant, but also that of a reader, so that our discourse may be supported by the authority of the sacred Scriptures, not built upon human suspicions on sand, in case something is not remembered. Therefore, listen to the Gospel according to John. The Lord speaks: Amen, amen I say to you, that he who hears my word and believes in Him who sent me, has eternal life; and does not come into judgment, but has passed from death into life. Amen, amen I say to you, that the hour is coming, and now is, when the dead will hear the voice of the Son of God; and those who hear shall live. For as the Father has life in Himself, so He has granted the Son also to have life in Himself; and He has given Him authority to execute judgment, because He is the Son of Man. Do not marvel at this, for the hour is coming in which all who are in the tombs will hear His voice: and will come forth—those who have done good, to the resurrection of life; and those who have done evil, to the resurrection of judgment. I indeed think that many understand from the Lord Himself in this place both resurrections, and according to the spirit through faith, and according to the flesh, declared distinctly and clearly by that well-known trumpet. Yet let us carefully consider these same words, so that it may be clear to all who hear. Amen, amen I say to you, that he who hears my word and believes in Him who sent me, has eternal life; and does not come into judgment, but has passed from death into life. A resurrection according to the spirit, which happens now through faith. But lest it might seem to have been proposed in such a way as if it were still far off; although He did not say: He will pass from death into life; but: He has passed from death into life: yet, lest He might seem to have used a past tense figuratively, as is: They pierced my hands and feet, which was still to be foretold; He follows and explains this very thing more plainly: Amen, amen I say to you, He says, that the hour is coming and now is, when the dead will hear the voice of the Son of God; and those who hear shall live. What He said above: Has passed from death to life; He now says: they shall live. But lest what He said: The hour is coming, might be hoped for at the end of the world, when also the resurrection of bodies will take place; He added: and now is. For He did not say only: The hour is coming; but: The hour is coming, and now is. But those who hear this voice shall live; namely, the life which He signified earlier, saying: Has passed from death to life. Therefore, here He signified those who do not pertain to the penalty of judgment; because they anticipate judgment with their faith, and pass from death to life.

What the resurrection will be like.

Therefore, it remains to show that the future judgment will distinguish between the good and the bad: for here he only mentioned the good as pertaining to the present resurrection, which is according to the spirit. It follows then, and he says: And he gave him the power to execute judgment, because he is the son of man. He hinted at in what way he received the power of judgment: because, he says, he is the son of man. For as the Son of God, he has eternal power with the Father. He now consequently explains what the future judgment will be like: Do not marvel at this, he says, for the hour is coming in which all who are in the tombs will hear his voice; and they will come out, those who have done good, to the resurrection of life; but those who have done evil, to the resurrection of judgment. Earlier when he said: The hour is coming; he added: and is now, lest that hour, which is to come at the end of the world, be thought to be foretold as the resurrection of bodies. Here, therefore, because he wanted it to be understood, when he said: The hour is coming; he did not add: and is now. Likewise, earlier he said the dead would hear the voice of the Son of God, but he did not mention the tombs, so that we might distinguish the dead through the error of the mind who are now resurrected through faith, from those dead whose corpses are in the tombs to be resurrected at the end of the world. Here, therefore, so that the resurrection of bodies might be hoped for at the end: All, he says, who are in the tombs, will hear his voice, and come out. Likewise, earlier he said: They will hear the voice of the Son of God; and those who hear will live. Why was it necessary to add: Those who hear, when it could have been said simply: They will hear the voice of the Son of God, and live; unless it was because he was speaking of those who are dead through the error of the mind, of whom many hear and do not hear, that is, do not obey, do not believe? But those who hear as he wished, when he said: He who has ears to hear, let him hear, they will live. So many will hear, but those who hear will live, that is, those who believe. For those who hear in such a way that they do not believe, will not live: whence it appears from what kind of death, and from what kind of life he was speaking in that place: namely, from the death which pertains only to the wicked, precisely because they are wicked; and from the life which pertains only to the good, precisely because they become good.

Here, however, where he declares that they will rise according to the bodies, he does not say: they will hear his voice, and those who have heard will come forth. For all will hear the final trumpet, and will come forth, because we will all rise again. But because not all will be changed, he follows and says: those who have done good, to the resurrection of life; but those who have done evil, to the resurrection of judgment. So above, where they revive according to the spirit through faith, all revive to the same lot; so that their life is not distributed into happiness and misery, but all belong to the good part. And therefore, when he had said: those who hear, will live; he did not add: those who have done good, to eternal life; but those who have done evil, to eternal punishment. For this same thing that he said, will live, he wished to be understood only in the good; just as above he said: He has passed from death to life; nor did he say to which life; because to be revived from death by faith, cannot be a bad life. Here, however, first, not: they will hear his voice and live; for he wished for live to be understood in the good throughout this entire reading; but he said: they will hear, and will come forth, by which word he signified the bodily movement of bodies from the places of their burials. But because coming forth from the graves will not be to the good for all: those who have done good, he said, to the resurrection of life; here too he wished life to be understood only in the good; but those who have done evil, he said, to the resurrection of judgment, judgment clearly being placed for punishment.

What kind of body, and what kind of life of the saints after the resurrection. So now, brothers, let no one seek with perverse subtlety what kind of figure the bodies will have in the resurrection of the dead, what stature, what movement, what gait. It is enough for you that your flesh will rise in that form in which the Lord appeared, in the form of a man indeed. But do not fear corruption because of the form: for if you do not fear corruption, you will not fear that statement either: Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; nor will you fall into the snare of the Sadducees, which you cannot avoid because you think that men will rise again for this purpose, to marry wives, and to beget children, and to do the works of mortal life. If you ask what the life will be like, who among men can explain it? It will be the life of the Angels. Whoever can show you the life of angels will show you their life; for they will be equal to the Angels. But if the life of Angels is hidden, let no one inquire further; lest through error he does not arrive at what he seeks, but at what he has devised for himself. For he seeks rashly, and seeking hastily. You walk along the way; you will come to the homeland if you do not desert the way. Therefore, hold on to Christ, brothers, hold on to faith, hold on to the way: it will lead you to what you cannot see now. For in that head appeared what is hoped for in the members; in that foundation is demonstrated what is to be built on in our faith, so that later it may be perfected in form: lest perhaps, while you think you see, something may appear to you through a false image as being what it is not, and having left the way you stray into error, and do not reach the homeland to which the way leads, that is, to the form to which faith leads. In the perpetual future sabbath, there will be no works, not even works of mercy.

You ask: How do the Angels live? It is enough for you to know this, that they do not live corruptibly. Indeed, it is easier for you to be told what there will not be there rather than what there will be there. For even I, my brothers, can briefly run through some things that will not be there: and I can do this because we have experienced these things and we know what will not be there. But what will be there we have not yet experienced. For we walk by faith, not yet by sight: as long as we are in the body, we are away from the Lord. So, what will not be there? Marrying a wife so that children may be born; because there is no death there. There will not be growing because there is no aging. There will not be refreshment, because there is no depletion. There will not be business, because there is no need. Nor will there be those commendable works of innocent men, which the need and necessity of this life compel them to do. For I do not say only that there will not be the work of robbers or usurers, but even those things that innocent men do because they need to alleviate human necessities will not be there. The Sabbath will be perpetual, which is celebrated by the Jews temporarily, but is understood by us eternally. There will be an ineffable rest, which cannot be explained; but, as I said, it is explained in some manner when things that will not be there are spoken of. We strive for that rest, we are spiritually regenerated for that rest. For as we are born carnally to labors, so we are reborn spiritually to rest: with Him crying out: Come to me, all who labor and are burdened, and I will refresh you. Here He feeds, there He perfects: here He promises, there He returns: here He signifies, there He demonstrates. But when in that blessedness we are perfected and saved in both spirit and body, these businesses will not be; nor will those things be there which are praised here in the good works of Christians. For who is not praised as a Christian for giving bread to the hungry and drink to the thirsty, clothing the naked, welcoming the stranger, making peace for those in conflict, visiting the sick, burying the dead, consoling the mourner? Great works, full of mercy, full of praise and grace. But those too will not be there: because the necessity of misery created the works of mercy. Whom do you feed, where no one is hungry? To whom do you give drink, where no one is thirsty? Will you clothe the naked, where all are clothed in immortality itself? You heard a little earlier about the tunics of the saints, when the Apostle spoke: This perishable nature must put on the imperishable. Where 'putting on' sounds, it indicates clothing. Adam lost this garment to take up skins. Will you welcome the stranger, where all live in their homeland? Will you visit the sick, where all will thrive in the same firmness of incorruption? Bury the dead, where all live forever? Make peace for those in conflict, where all things are in peace? Console the sad, where all will rejoice eternally? Therefore, as miseries will simultaneously cease, these works of mercy will cease too.

Amen and Alleluia will be our entire activity with perpetual delight.

What then will be done there? Did I not say earlier, it is easier for me to say what will not be there than what will be there? This I know, brothers, that we will not be sleeping doing nothing, because sleep itself was given as a support for the soul's weakness. Indeed, a fragile body could not bear the continuous strain of mortal senses, unless it were repaired by being put to sleep so that it may bear the same strain; and as there will be a renewal from death, so now there is wakefulness from sleep. Therefore, it will not be there. For where there is no death, there will not be an image of death. Nor let any fear of tedium creep into anyone, when it is said to them that they will always be watching, and not doing anything. I can say, and indeed I cannot say how it will be, because I cannot yet see it: nevertheless, I can say something not impertinently, because I say it from the Scriptures, what our activity will be there. Our entire activity will be Amen and Alleluia. What do you say, brothers? I see that you hear and are glad. But do not be saddened again by carnal thought, because if perhaps one of you stood and said daily: Amen and Alleluia, you would wither with tedium, and in those very voices fall asleep, and wish to be silent: and therefore think life to be despicable to you, and not desirable, saying to yourselves: Shall we always say Amen and Alleluia, who will endure it? I will say then, if I can, as much as I can. We will not say Amen and Alleluia with passing sounds, but with the affection of the soul. For what is Amen? What is Alleluia? Amen is true: Alleluia, praise God. Because therefore God is unchangeable truth, without defect, without progression, without loss, without increase, without any inclination of falsity, perpetual and stable, and always remaining incorruptible; these things we do in the creature and in this life, are like figures of things through the signs of the body, and certain things in which we walk through faith; when we see face to face what now we see through a mirror in a mystery, then in a far different and ineffable manner we will say: It is true; and when we say this, indeed we will say Amen, but with an insatiable satisfaction. Because nothing will be lacking, hence satisfaction: because indeed what will not be lacking will always delight, hence there will be, if it can be said, an insatiable satisfaction. As much as you will be insatiably satisfied with truth, so insatiably with truth you will say: Amen. How can anyone say: what eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor has it entered into the heart of man? Therefore, without any weariness and with perpetual delight, we will see the truth, and with the most certain evidence we will contemplate it, kindled with love for that truth and clinging to it with a sweet and chaste embrace and that incorporeal one, we will praise it with such a voice, and we will say: Alleluia. Rejoicing indeed, inflaming one another with the most fervent charity towards equal praise and towards God, all the citizens of that city will say: Alleluia, because they will say: Amen. The rest of the blessed in the contemplation of truth.

This, therefore, will so fulfill the life of the saints, along with their bodies transformed into a heavenly and angelic state, and will so invigorate them immortally that from that most blessed contemplation and praise of the truth, no corruption of necessity will avert or distract them. Thus for them, food will be the truth itself: and rest itself, like reclining. For it is said that the reclining ones will feast, as the Lord says: "Many will come from the east and the west, and recline with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of my Father": this signified that they will be nourished with the great rest of the food of truth. For such food refreshes and does not fail; it fills and remains whole: you are consummated, but it is not consumed. Such is that food, not like this one, which fails in order to refresh, and lest life end for the one who takes it, it ends instead. Therefore, that reclining will be eternal rest: those feasts will be immutable truth: that feasting will be eternal life, that is, the knowledge itself. Because this is, he says, eternal life, that they know you, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom you have sent.

Testimonies of the Scriptures concerning the blessed life in which we will be free for God. For because that life in the contemplation of truth will not only remain ineffably, but also delightfully, many places in Scripture testify, which we cannot all recount. Hence it is that: Whoever loves me will keep my commandments; and I will love him; and I will show myself to him. As if indeed a fruit and reward were being sought from him, because his commandments are kept: I will show, he says, myself to him; placing perfect happiness, that he may be known as he is. Hence also it is that: Beloved, we are now children of God, but it has not yet been revealed what we shall be. We know that when it is revealed, we shall be like him; because we shall see him as he is. Therefore Apostle Paul says: Then, he says, face to face; because he also said in another place: We are transformed into the same image from glory to glory, as by the Spirit of the Lord. And in the Psalms it says: Cease, and know that I am the Lord. Then therefore he will be seen best, when we will be at our most idle. But when will we be at our most idle except when the laborious times have passed, the times of necessities, by which we are now bound, as long as the earth brings forth for sinful man thorns and thistles, that in the sweat of his brow he may eat his bread? Therefore with the times of the earthly man entirely passed, and the day of the heavenly man entirely perfected, we shall see most highly; because we shall be most idle. For with corruption and need ended in the resurrection of the faithful, there will be no reason for labor. As if it were said: Recline and eat; so it is said: Cease and see. Therefore we shall be idle and we shall see God as he is; and seeing we shall praise God. And this will be the life of the saints, this the activity of the tranquil, because without failure we shall praise. We shall praise not for one day: but just as that day has no end of time, so our praise will have no end of cessation; and therefore we shall praise for ages of ages. Also listen to what Scripture says to God, which we desire: Blessed are they who dwell in your house; they will praise you for ages of ages. Turned to the Lord, let us pray to him for ourselves and for all his people standing with us in the courts of his house: which he may deign to keep and protect; through Jesus Christ his son our Lord, who with him lives and reigns for ages of ages. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 362A

(Erfurt 5Sermon 362/A Sermon of Saint Augustine On the resurrection of the dead [On the birthday of Marcellinus the martyr] Here is required faith. Believe what you do not yet see.

If faith is present, the consolations of Christians are not vain. But in order that faith may be present, the examples of the saints and the teachings of the books have preceded and call out. For why should we not believe the deeds narrated to us in past times, when we see happening what was predicted for the future? For those who narrated the past to us are the same who foretold the future which we discern. These things which we now see on earth, such as all people abandoning the demons to whom they were enslaved, the breaking of idols they worshipped, temples being overturned everywhere, and the entire human race being converted to one name, were foretold in the holy books; and when they were predicted, they seemed very incredible. But because we see them fulfilled, they have become insignificant, because they are easily obtainable. Therefore, let us set before our eyes the lands and all the nations which existed before, where not a single Christian was, where sacrifices were made to demons, stone altars were set up, sacrifices were offered to stones, priests were appointed, and everything due to the true God was rendered to false gods, that is, to demons. Let us set before our eyes such lands and imagine someone suddenly saying that all these things could soon be changed and that people would abandon those vain things and turn to one God: who would not laugh at him? Who would not think him delirious? Who would deign to listen? Who would hesitate to drive him out? And yet these things have happened. Where these things that we see were written and when they were spoken of and not seen, there also were written those things that are not yet seen. What are those things that are not yet seen? That the Lord Himself will come in the body in which He deigned to appear here, to die and to rise, but now immortal and incorruptible, as He remains in heaven and sits at the right hand of the Father, and will come for judgment; that all the dead will rise from their graves, all bodies will return from all forms of consumption, and not only the monuments, but the world itself will return what it received from the elements. When these things have happened, they will likewise not be marvelous, just as these things are not marvelous which have already happened. But now they are not believed because they are not yet shown. Here faith is required. Believe what you do not yet see: what great thing will you do if you will only believe when you see it? A reward is given for belief because it believed what it had not yet seen, so that it may rejoice when it sees it; and punishment is given for disbelief because it refused to believe what it had not yet seen, so that it may grieve when it sees it.

It is more incredible that it was not established than that it was restored.

This, however, is the only thing that usually disturbs people, namely, how consumed bodies will rise again, which are buried precisely because they offend the eyes when they are consumed. For they were dear to us with the souls they had, but when the souls leave, those things which we loved lie and we do not want them to decay before our sight, and so we bury them. So, when it is said that they will be resurrected, you human heart, consider what is happening now, and do not believe what is to come? For if you weigh and judge rightly, you consider little the secrets and daily miracles of nature. From where do the crops proceed in the fields that are not buried in the seed? From where do the leaves become green again on the trees? From where are the forests, bare in winter, clothed in summer? For this reason, all these things are renewed, so that we may believe that bodies can also be renewed in their time. It is more incredible that what did not exist was brought into being than that what existed is restored. Man was created who did not exist: and do you not believe that what existed can be restored? Those things that are buried are both flesh and bones: what were you before you were born? You were brought forth from the secret places of nature, so that you appeared in this visible form to the eyes: and do you not believe that when you have departed again into the secret places of nature, He who was able to create you before you existed can bring you forth again from there?

Let us believe this because Christ said it, who cannot deceive.

Finally, let us believe this because he said it, who cannot deceive. He who promised us the resurrection of bodies, while he was here in the body, raised the dead. He who promised us the resurrection of bodies, while he was here in the body, himself rose on the third day. Let us not believe even those deeds if what was foretold to follow has not indeed followed. When the Lord appeared to his disciples after the resurrection, because they themselves did not believe he had risen, they thought they were seeing a spirit. He said to them: Why are you troubled, and why do thoughts arise in your hearts? See my hands and my feet, that it is I myself. Touch and see, for a spirit does not have flesh and bones as you see I have. He showed himself not only to be seen by their eyes but also to be handled by their hands. He spent forty days with them entering and exiting, eating and drinking, but by power, not by necessity. He convinced them of the grace of resurrection by the evidence of his true body and ascended into heaven before their eyes. And when they saw him after the resurrection, he said to them: These are the words which I spoke to you while I was still with you, that everything written about me in the law and prophets and psalms must be fulfilled. Then he opened their understanding - the gospel says this - so that they might understand the scriptures and he said to them that thus it is written and thus it was necessary for Christ to suffer and to rise from the dead on the third day and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. The gospel holds this. See when it was written. For it was being written when what was predicted there was not yet happening. For Christ was then passing by and his disciples were looking at him in the body they knew. Was it then, when they saw him in the body they knew, that which follows? And what then? And that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. That was, this was not. They saw that which was, they believed that which was not yet. We now see it fulfilled: repentance and remission of sins is preached in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ among all nations. Is it not happening? Was it already, when those things were being shown and when they were being written? Just as therefore the Apostles saw Christ and believed in the future Church, so we see the Church and believe in Christ. For of these two things, they saw one and believed the other. But what they saw, we do not see. If we see what they believed, let us believe what they saw. May our Lord God grant him to reign with Him without end.

Therefore, our Lord Jesus Christ, the Word of the Father, the only-begotten Son, through whom all things were made, who deigned at the appropriate time to take flesh from the Virgin Mary and appear to human eyes, to do worthy deeds, to suffer unworthy things, to perform divine acts, to endure human sufferings, to die, to rise again, and to ascend into heaven, this same Lord our God, listen to what He said about the future resurrection and, removing all arguments, believe, for He who said it cannot lie: "The hour is coming," He says, "when all who are in the graves will hear His voice and will come forth—those who have done good, to the resurrection of life, and those who have done evil, to the resurrection of judgment." Therefore, thanks be to God for the reason that those who have done evil will rise to judgment. All things, brothers, were forgiven us in baptism. Believe, dearest brothers, because He whom He wished to free from all sins in a moment of time grants them to reign with Him without end.

Sermons - Sermon 363

SERMO 363 FROM THE SONG OF EXODUS 15, 1-21

1. Then sang Moses and the children of Israel this song unto the LORD, and spake, saying, I will sing unto the LORD, for he hath triumphed gloriously: the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea. 2. The LORD is my strength and song, and he is become my salvation: he is my God, and I will prepare him an habitation; my father's God, and I will exalt him. 3. The LORD is a man of war: the LORD is his name. 4. Pharaoh's chariots and his host hath he cast into the sea: his chosen captains also are drowned in the Red sea. 5. The depths have covered them: they sank into the bottom as a stone. 6. Thy right hand, O LORD, is become glorious in power: thy right hand, O LORD, hath dashed in pieces the enemy. 7. And in the greatness of thine excellency thou hast overthrown them that rose up against thee: thou sentest forth thy wrath, which consumed them as stubble. 8. And with the blast of thy nostrils the waters were gathered together, the floods stood upright as an heap, and the depths were congealed in the heart of the sea. 9. The enemy said, I will pursue, I will overtake, I will divide the spoil; my lust shall be satisfied upon them; I will draw my sword, my hand shall destroy them. 10. Thou didst blow with thy wind, the sea covered them: they sank as lead in the mighty waters. 11. Who is like unto thee, O LORD, among the gods? who is like thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders? 12. Thou stretchedst out thy right hand, the earth swallowed them. 13. Thou in thy mercy hast led forth the people which thou hast redeemed: thou hast guided them in thy strength unto thy holy habitation. 14. The people shall hear, and be afraid: sorrow shall take hold on the inhabitants of Palestina. 15. Then the dukes of Edom shall be amazed; the mighty men of Moab, trembling shall take hold upon them; all the inhabitants of Canaan shall melt away. 16. Fear and dread shall fall upon them; by the greatness of thine arm they shall be as still as a stone; till thy people pass over, O LORD, till the people pass over, which thou hast purchased. 17. Thou shalt bring them in, and plant them in the mountain of thine inheritance, in the place, O LORD, which thou hast made for thee to dwell in, in the Sanctuary, O Lord, which thy hands have established. 18. The LORD shall reign for ever and ever. 19. For the horse of Pharaoh went in with his chariots and with his horsemen into the sea, and the LORD brought again the waters of the sea upon them; but the children of Israel went on dry land in the midst of the sea. 20. And Miriam the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand; and all the women went out after her with timbrels and with dances. 21. And Miriam answered them, Sing ye to the LORD, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea. In examining the Scriptures, the authority of the Scriptures must be followed by us. Our sense, dearest brothers, in considering and handling the holy Scriptures ought to be governed by the most manifest authority of those same Scriptures; so that from those things which are plainly said to nourish us, those things which are said more obscurely may be faithfully discussed to exercise us. For who would dare to explain the divine sacraments otherwise than as proclaimed and prescribed by the apostolic heart and mouth? But the apostle Paul says, "I do not want you to be ignorant, brothers, that our fathers were all under the cloud, and all passed through the sea, and all were baptized into Moses in the cloud and in the sea; and all ate the same spiritual food, and all drank the same spiritual drink. For they were drinking from the spiritual rock that followed them, and the rock was Christ. But with most of them God was not well-pleased. For they were overthrown in the wilderness. Now these things happened as examples for us, so that we would not crave evil things as they also craved." And a little later he says, "Now these things happened to them as an example, and they were written for our instruction, upon whom the ends of the ages have come." The crossing of the Red Sea is a figure of Baptism.

Hence, dearest ones, let none of the faithful doubt that the passage of that people through the Red Sea was a figure of our Baptism: so that, being led by our Lord Jesus Christ, whose figure Moses then bore, we may be liberated through Baptism from the devil and his angels, who, like Pharaoh and the Egyptians, oppressed us as slaves of the flesh with their works like bricks. Let us sing to the Lord: for He has gloriously triumphed; horse and rider He has thrown into the sea. For they are dead to us who can no longer dominate us: because our very sins, which had made us subject to them, being liberated by the washing of holy grace, have been submerged and obliterated as if in the sea. Therefore, let us sing to the Lord: for He has gloriously triumphed; horse and rider He has thrown into the sea, He has destroyed pride and the proud in Baptism. For already the humble, submissive to God, sing this song. For to the proud seeking their own glory and magnifying themselves, the Lord is not gloriously magnified. But the ungodly justified, believing in Him who justifies the ungodly, so that their faith may be credited to them as righteousness, so that the righteous may live by faith, not ignorant of God's righteousness and not wishing to establish their own, not subject to the righteousness of God, truly sing that the Lord is their helper and protector unto salvation, their God, whom they glorify. For they are not among those haughty ones who, knowing God, did not honor Him as God. Thus it is said: God of my father. For He is the God of the father Abraham, who believed God, and it was credited to him as righteousness. And therefore, as little ones, not presuming on our righteousness, but on His grace, we magnify the Lord, for He vanquishes battles, who is our peace. And therefore, His name is the Lord: He whom we call upon through Isaiah: Possess us. His name is the Lord. We were nothing, and He made us: we were lost, and He found us: we sold ourselves, and He redeemed us. His name is the Lord. Pharaoh's chariots and his army He has thrown into the sea. He has obliterated worldly exaltations and the countless legions of sins that warred against us on behalf of the devil in Baptism. He had placed three drivers in the chariots who terrified us with the fear of pain, the fear of humiliation, and the fear of death, pursuing us. All these were submerged in the Red Sea, for we were buried with Him through Baptism into death, who for us was scourged, dishonored, and killed. Thus, the Red Sea covered all enemies, who consecrated Baptism with a bloody death in which our sins were consumed. But if our enemies, as a stone, have descended into the depths, hardness belongs to them and with them the devil, of whom it is written: The sinner, having reached the depths of evil, despises. For they do not believe that what they have done can be forgiven: and in that despair, they sink even deeper. But: Your right hand, O Lord, is glorified in power; Your right hand, O Lord, has shattered enemies; and with the greatness of Your majesty, O Lord, You have destroyed adversaries. You sent Your wrath, and it consumed them like stubble. For we feared You being born, and believed in You, and all our sins were consumed. For why, by the spirit of the Lord's wrath, was the water divided, and the waters congealed as a wall, the waves congealed in the midst of the sea; when in this division of water, with the waves congealed, a way opened for the liberated people? Therefore, why was not the water rather divided by the spirit of mercy of the Lord; unless because the fear of God's wrath, which the sinner despises, having reached the depths of evil, compels to Baptism, so that through the water not suffocating, but passing through the way, we are liberated? The enemy said: I will pursue, and overtake them; I will divide the spoils, and my soul shall be filled; I will draw my sword, my hand shall dominate. Nor does the enemy understand the power of the Lord's Sacrament, which is in the saving Baptism, to those who believe and hope in Him: and still thinks that sins can dominate the baptized, since they are tempted by the frailty of the flesh, not knowing where, when, and how the complete renewal of the whole man is perfected, which is inaugurated and signified in Baptism, and is already held by certain hope. For then this mortal will put on immortality, and every rule and authority will entirely be void, and God will be all in all. But now, as long as the body which decays burdens the soul, the enemy says: I will pursue, and overtake. But You sent Your spirit, and the sea covered them. Now the spirit of God's wrath is not mentioned when the sea covered the enemies: and a little earlier it was said: By the spirit of Your wrath, the water was divided; when rather by this the passing people of God was liberated. But indeed God seems not to be angry, whose sins are forgiven, and rather it increases. Thus compared to lead he descends into the depths, the more so, the more he sees those justified by faith, bearing present evils for the hope of future life, live in labors in which they are strengthened by the Spirit of God to endure. Therefore, God sent His Spirit to console and exercise the righteous in labors; and the sea covered the ungodly, not only thinking there is no difference between them and those; but rather considering God to be angry with those who are afflicted with such tribulations, and favorable to themselves who rejoice in such prosperity. Thus they descend like lead in the mighty waters. Who is like You among the gods, O Lord? who is like You? glorious in holiness, who do not glory in themselves: wondrous in majesty, who do wonders. For these things that were done then, foretold something future, for they were figures of us. You stretched out Your right hand, the earth swallowed them. Certainly, none of the Egyptians at that time was swallowed by the earth; they were covered by water, perished in the sea. What then does it mean: You stretched out Your right hand, the earth swallowed them? Should we not rightly understand the right hand of God to be Him of whom Isaiah says: And to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed? For He is indeed the only Son, whom the Father did not spare, but delivered Him up for us all. And thus He stretched out His right hand on the cross, and the earth swallowed the impious, while they considered themselves victors and Him contemptible. For the earth was given into the hand of the wicked, and the face of His judgment covered it, that is, His divinity. Thus the Lord guided His people, as if carried by that wood, where the earth, that is, the flesh of the Lord, extended, swallowed the impious. For the people did not cross the sea by a ship, to be said specifically that He guided it. But You guided Your people with Your righteousness, not presuming on their righteousness, but living by faith under Your grace: this people, whom You have redeemed. For the Lord knows who are His. On the pilgrimage after Baptism by which one reaches the homeland.

You have been exhorted in your strength, that is, in your Christ. For what is weak of God is stronger than men. And although He was crucified through weakness, yet He lives by the power of God. You have been exhorted in your strength and in your holy refreshment. Indeed, in that the mortality of the flesh was refreshed in Him through the resurrection, and in Him this corruptible has put on incorruption, we are exhorted, hoping for the future and bearing all present things on account of these. For after Baptism, the passage through the desert remains, through the life lived in hope, until we come to the promised land, the land of the living where the Lord is our portion, in the eternal Jerusalem; until we come there, this whole life is a desert for us and a total trial. But in Him who overcame the world, the people of God overcome everything. For just as in Baptism, as if enemies pursuing from behind, past sins are erased: so after Baptism, on the journey of this life, while we eat spiritual food and drink spiritual drink, we overcome all things adverse to us. The name of our Emperor has indeed terrified the enemies of our way. For at first the wrath of the nations arose to destroy the Christian name; but when wrath could do nothing, it turned into sorrow, and as faith grew more and more and occupied everything, sorrow turned into fear; so that even the proud of this world, like the birds of the sky, seek refuge and protection under the shadow of that plant, which from the tiniest mustard seed has greatly grown. Likewise, in this song, where those things which then happened in figure in those people are commemorated, the order of the wrath, sorrow, and fear of the nations is preserved. He said, "The nations heard and were angry; pains seized the inhabitants of Philistia. Then the leaders of Edom were hurried, that is, disturbed, and the princes of Moab: trembling seized them; all the inhabitants of Canaan melted away. Let trembling and fear fall upon them, by the greatness of Your arm. Let them be as still as stones, until Your people pass over, O Lord, until this people whom You have acquired pass over." Thus it was done, thus it is done. The enemies of the Church, astonished with wonder, become as stones until we pass over to the homeland. And those who might try to resist, as then Amalek resisted with the hands of Moses extended, so now they are overcome by the sign of the Lord's cross. And thus we are introduced and planted on the mountain of the inheritance of the Lord, which from the small stone that Daniel saw grew and filled the entire earth. This is the habitation prepared for the Lord. For the temple of God is holy, and the sanctification of His house is from Himself. For the temple of God is holy, says the Apostle, which temple you are. And lest anyone should look to the earthly Jerusalem, where that temple temporarily bore a certain figure, as it had to, he signified that he was speaking about the eternal kingdom, which is the eternal inheritance of God, the eternal Jerusalem. For he continued by saying: "The place You have prepared, O Lord, the sanctuary, O Lord, which Your hands have established. The Lord shall reign forever and ever, and beyond." Is there anything beyond forever? Who would say this? Why, then, did he add: and beyond? Perhaps because "forever" is often understood as a very long time, so "and beyond" was added to comprehend true eternity, which is without end. Or because God reigns forever in the heavens, which He established forever; He set a decree, and it shall not pass; and forever in those whom, after they turned from the transgression of the decree, He forgave their sins and acquired them from time, and gave them endless happiness. He still reigns over those whom He has ordered in the most just punishments under the feet of His people. For no one escapes His kingdom, in whose eternal law in the distribution of giving and repaying, and the merits of rewards and punishments, and the most just order of creation, all creatures are restrained. For God resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble. Because Pharaoh's cavalry entered with chariots and riders into the sea; and the Lord brought over them the waters of the sea. But the children of Israel walked on dry land in the midst of the sea.

Those who sang the Song then and who can sing it today. This sang Moses and the sons of Israel, this Mary the prophetess and the daughters of Israel with her, this also we now, whether men and women, or our spirit and flesh. For those who belong to Jesus Christ, says the Apostle, have crucified their flesh with its passions and desires. This is aptly understood to signify the tambourine that Mary took up, so that she might accompany this song. For on wood the flesh is stretched, so that it might become a tambourine: and from the cross they learn to confess the sweet sound of grace. Humble, therefore, made through Baptism by the piety of grace, and our pride extinguished there, through which the proud enemy ruled over us, so that now he who glories, glories in the Lord. Let us sing to the Lord: for he is gloriously magnified; he threw the horse and its rider into the sea.

Sermons - Sermon 364

SERMO 364 The Sermon of Saint Augustine, Bishop, on Samson

Exhortation. In this reading, which has been recited to us, dearest brothers, many very obscure divine mysteries are contained; which, because they cannot be explained briefly, for this reason alone we wanted to conclude the morning psalms earlier, lest a longer sermon should weary you. And because now you are about to leave the church at the customary hour, hear what needs to be said, according to your custom, with attentive mind in silence and quiet. The strength of Samson was from grace, not from nature. But Samson, dearest brothers, the strength he had was from the grace of God, not from nature: for if he were strong by nature, when his hair was cut, his strength would not have diminished. And where was that most powerful strength, except in what the Scripture says: The Spirit of the Lord began to move upon him? Therefore, that strength belonged to the Spirit of the Lord. In Samson, it was a vessel; in the Spirit, there was the fullness. The vessel can be filled and emptied. Every vessel has its completeness from elsewhere; thus in Paul, that grace was commended when he was called the chosen vessel. Let us therefore see what kind of riddle Samson proposed to the Philistines. He said, "Out of the eater came something to eat, and out of the strong came something sweet." This riddle was disclosed, reported to friends, and solved: Samson was defeated. If this man is righteous, it is very hidden, and the justice of this man is profound: for it is also read that he was overcome by feminine wiles, and that he went in to a harlot, it seems that his merit wavers to those who understand the secrets of truth less. For even a prophet is ordered by the command of the Lord to take a harlot as a wife. Perhaps we could say that these things were not criminal or damnable in the Old Testament, since what he either said or did was a prophecy. Let us therefore inquire what it signifies that he was defeated, what it signifies that he was victorious, what it signifies that he yielded to feminine wiles, what it signifies that he revealed the secret of the riddle, what it signifies that he went in to a harlot, what it signifies that he caught foxes, and with the tails of the foxes, to which he tied fire, burned the enemies' crops. Indeed, he could have burned those crops in a simple manner if he did not contemplate a mystery in the foxes. Could dry straw not burn, unless the fire was drawn through it by the foxes? Let us therefore understand that great mysteries lie hidden here.

Samson completely prefigured Christ.

What was Samson? If I say that he represented Christ, I believe I speak the truth; but immediately it will arise in the minds of those thinking: And was Christ conquered by the blandishments of women? And how is it understood that Christ could have entered into a harlot? Then also, when is Christ shorn of his head, stripped of strength, bound, blinded, mocked? Awake, faith, attend to what Christ is: not only what Christ did, but also what Christ suffered. What did he do? He acted as strong, he suffered as weak. In one, I understand both: I see the fortitude of the Son of God, I see the weakness of the Son of Man. Another point is added, because Christ as a whole, as Scripture commends him, is both head and body: as the head of the Church is Christ, so the body of Christ is the Church; and it alone is not, but with its head, the whole Christ is. Thus, the Church has in itself the strong, it has the weak; it has those who feed on solid food, it has those who are still to be fed with milk. I add another point which must be confessed: in the society of sacraments, in the communion of Baptism, in the participation of the altar, it has the just and it has the unjust. Now, for the body of Christ, as you know, is the threshing floor, later it will be the barn; yet, while it is the threshing floor, it does not refuse to endure chaff: when the time comes for storage, it will separate the wheat from the chaff. Therefore, some things Samson did from the role of the head, some from the role of the body, yet all from the role of Christ. In that Samson performed virtues and miracles, he represented Christ, the head of the Church: in what he did prudently, he bore the image of those who live justly in the Church: where he was caught by surprise and acted unwisely, he represented those who are sinners in the Church. The harlot whom Samson takes in marriage is the Church, which before the knowledge of one God had fornicated with idols, whom Christ later joined to himself; after she received the faith illuminated by him, she also merited that through him she should understand the sacraments of salvation, and by the same be revealed the mysteries of heavenly secrets. For the question itself, which contains: “Out of the eater came forth food, and out of the strong came forth sweetness,” what else does it signify, if not Christ rising from the dead? Indeed, from the eater, that is from death, which devours and consumes all things, came forth that food, which said: “I am the living bread that came down from heaven.” Whom human iniquity exasperated, and to whom the bitterness of vinegar and gall was offered, from him the people of the Gentiles, being converted, received the sweetness of life; and thus from the mouth of the dead lion, that is, from the death of Christ, who lay down to sleep as a lion, came forth the swarm of bees, that is, Christians. But when it says: “You would not have solved my riddle, unless you had plowed with my heifer,” this heifer is the Church, which, having been revealed by her husband the secrets of faith, the mysteries of the Trinity, of the resurrection, of judgment and of the kingdom, has spread them by the doctrine and preaching of the Apostles and saints to the ends of the earth, and has promised to those who understand and recognize the rewards of eternal life.

Samson, the companion of the heretics, bore the figure.

It follows: Samson was angry because his companion took his wife. This companion carried the figure of all heretics. A great secret, my brothers. For the heretics, who divided the Church, wanted to lead and take away the wife of their Lord; for from the Church and the gospels came those who, through the adultery of impiety, attempt to invade the Church, that is, the body of Christ, into their part. Hence that faithful servant and friend of the Lord's bride speaks: For I have betrothed you to one man to present you as a chaste virgin to Christ. And the depraved companion touches the person with the zeal and rebuke of faith: And I fear, he says, lest as the serpent deceived Eve, so your minds may be corrupted from the truth which is in Christ Jesus. But who are these companions, that is, the deserter heretics, who wanted to invade the Lord's bride, if not Donatus, Arius, Manichaeus, and the other vessels of error and perdition? The apostle speaks of such people: I hear, he says, that there are divisions among you. For one says: I am of Paul; another: I am of Apollos; another: I am of Cephas. Let us see, therefore, what this mystical Samson did, offended in his wife by a stranger. For he caught foxes, that is, adulterating companions, of whom it is said in the Song of Songs: Catch for us the little foxes that destroy the vineyards. What does it mean, catch? that is, apprehend, convict, refute, lest the ecclesiastical vineyards be destroyed. What else is it to catch foxes, but to overcome heretics with the authority of divine law, and to bind and restrain them with the testimonies of the holy Scriptures as if with certain chains? He catches the foxes, he binds them, and sets fire to their tails. What do the tied tails of the foxes mean? What are the tails of the foxes, if not the rear parts of the heretics (who have pleasant and deceitful beginnings) bound, that is, condemned and dragging fire at the end; so that they consume the fruits and works of those who acquiesce to their seductions? He says to a man now: Do not listen to heretics, do not yield to heretics, do not be seduced by heretics. He replies: Why? did not this and that man listen to the heretics? did not any Christian else commit so many evils, perpetrate so many adulteries, exercise so many robberies? and what evil befell him? The first parts of the foxes are what the seduced notice; and the fire is behind. Nothing, he says, has happened to him now. What, because nothing precedes, does nothing follow? He will come to the later fire. Do you think, therefore, that the heretics drag fire, from which the fruits of the enemies burn, and they themselves will not burn? Without a doubt the foxes, where they set fire to the crops, they themselves indeed burned. Judgment will come upon the heretics later: what they do not see now, they have behind them; they soothe with flatteries, show their first parts free: in the judgment of God they are bound by their tails, that is, they drag fire in their rear parts, because wickedness precedes their punishments. The deeds of Samson and Christ are to be compared. But that he entered to the harlot, if he did so without a cause, whoever did so is unclean; but if a prophet did so, it is a sacrament. If he did not enter to lie with her, perhaps he entered for the sake of a mystery. But we do not read that he lay with her. It follows: But his enemies awaited him at the gates of the city to capture him when he had gone out from the harlot to whom he had entered; but he was sleeping. See, it is not written that he mingled with the harlot, but it is written that he was sleeping. Where he rose, it says, in the middle of the night he went out and took away the gates of the city with the bars, and carried the same gates to the top of the mountain, and could not be held by the Philistines. He took away the gates of the city by which he had entered to the harlot, and lifted them to the mountain. What is this? Both hell and the love of a woman, Scripture joins them together: the harlot's house held the image of hell. Correctly it is set for hell: because it repels no one, draws everyone entering to it. We recognize in this place the works of our Redeemer: after the synagogue, to which he had come, was separated from him by the devil, after it trampled him, that is, crucified him in the place of Calvary, he descended to the infernal regions; and the enemies guarded the place of the sleeping one, that is, the tomb, and wanted to capture him, whom they could not see. But he was sleeping: here it is said for this reason, because it was not true death. What is said: He rose at midnight, this signified that he rose in secret: for he suffered openly, but to his disciples alone and to some certain individuals, after he had resurrected, he was manifested. Therefore, what he entered, everyone saw; what he rose from, few recognized, held, and touched. However, he takes away the gates of the city, that is, removes the gates of hell. What is it to take away the gates of hell, but to remove the dominion of death? For it received and did not release. But what did the Lord Jesus Christ do after taking away the gates of death? He ascended to the top of the mountain: for we know that he both resurrected and ascended into heaven. The mystery of Samson revealed and fulfilled by Christ. But what is it that he had power in his hair? And this, brethren, pay careful attention to: he had no strength in his hand, not in his foot, not in his chest, not in his very head, but in his hair, in his locks. What are hairs? What are locks? And we see, and the Apostle, when asked, answers us: Hair is a covering; and in the covering, Christ had power when the shadow of the old law covered him. Therefore the hair of Samson was in a covering: because in Christ one thing was seen, and another was understood. But what does it mean that the secret was betrayed, and Samson was shaved? The law was despised, and Christ suffered: for they would not have killed Christ if they had not despised the law; for they knew themselves that it was not lawful for them to kill Christ. They said to the judge: "It is not lawful for us to put anyone to death." Samson was shaved, the thickets were revealed, the covering was removed; and Christ, who was hidden, appeared. But the revived hair covered his head again, because the Jews did not want to recognize the risen Christ. He was indeed at the mill, he was blinded, he was in the house of the prison: the house of the prison, or the mill, is the toil of this age. But the blinding of Samson indicates those, who, blinded by unbelief, recognized neither Christ working miracles nor ascending to the heavens; therefore, the blindness they inflicted signified the blindness of the Jews. Christ was both captured and killed by the Jews; but by killing him, they rather killed themselves. Therefore, the enemies brought him to mock him. Now here observe the image of the cross: for he stretched out his hands to the two columns as if to the two beams of the cross; but being killed, he crushed his adversaries, and his suffering became the slaughter of his persecutors. And thus Scripture concludes: He killed more in his death than he had killed in his life. Which mystery was clearly fulfilled in our Lord Jesus Christ: for our redemption, which he had hardly accomplished while alive, he consummated in his death. Who lives and reigns forever and ever. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 365

SERMO 365 Of the verse 7 of Psalm XV:

"I will bless the Lord, who has granted me understanding," and so forth.

God should be praised with the heart, not just with the mouth. Praise without love is neither true nor acceptable to God.

We have sung, and we have said: I will bless the Lord: would that it were with the heart and not only with the mouth: for if with the mouth and not the heart, the praise of the Lord in the mouth of the sinner becomes foul; nor does the confession of the mouth profit him, if there is not within the profession of charity. Look, brothers: charity is not the virtue of the mouth; it sets its seat where the bridegroom’s friend is beautiful. But where is this beauty? All the glory of the king’s daughter is from within. This glory is nothing other than beauty, this beauty is nothing other than charity, charity is nothing other than life. Therefore, to live, love. If you love, you are beautiful: love is good, love is beautiful. If that beauty is absent, you do not live; you have appearance, but not inwardly. Let that tomb propped up by great columns be opened, let the marble be broken open; what else will you find but a horrendous corpse, putrid bones, ashes, worms? There is appearance, but it covers death, the sight of which makes you shudder, bristle. Do you think a dead man says: I will bless the Lord? Indeed, Scripture bears witness: The dead will not praise you, Lord, nor all who descend into hell. Open the Gospel, you will hear the Lord rebuking and saying to the devil: Be silent. Why? Because the dead will not praise you, nor all who descend into hell. No one praises whom he does not love; or if an enemy praises, he loves the virtue he praises in the enemy. He who sins exercises enmities with God: therefore, he does not praise God, nor does he praise the virtue of God; because praise is some good, which does not fall into sin. He who praises someone and lies, slanders, or mocks rather than praises. Remove charity from the heart, only lies remain. Do you want a lie to praise the truth, and for God to take praise from where blasphemy originates? Wise men do not highly value those who are praised by the insane and wicked: will God be praised by an impure and most shameless heart, by a blasphemous and most insane mind? Therefore, say: I will bless the Lord, who gave me understanding. You are not insane; you are healed, you have understanding; praise your God, who gave you understanding, who provides the eye: understanding, to grasp; the eye, to see; grasp how vast is the breadth and length of the love of God, see the author and finisher of faith; grasp charity, see Christ; charity, to love; Christ, to bless, and by loving and blessing, to know the Lord, who gave you understanding; and by knowing, to live: because: This is eternal life, that they may know you, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom you have sent.

Against heretics who boast that they have a good understanding by nature. But whence, I ask, do you have this understanding? Someone will come from sideways and say: He who gave nature, gave understanding; good nature, good understanding; I am to have this good, it suffices: nor indeed will understanding be degenerate; and from there I will bless the Lord, from whom He bestowed understanding upon me, that is, from nature. O heretic, so you have been allotted good nature? Let the Apostle be silent and be confounded: "For I do not do the good I want," he says; and yet he was allotted good nature, and in this good nature, the good which he wishes to do, he cannot do. He wishes, desires, tries: he wishes weakly, desires in vain; tries in frustration; and against what he wishes, desires, tries, this good he does not accomplish. O good nature, whose will is weak, desire in vain, efforts useless! Let philosophers play their parts, and they will thank you greatly, who grant them such a good nature so gratuitously. What then? They know the sky, know the earth, know the sea, probe the depths, investigate the secrets of nature, know the distinctions, differences, essences; they give an account of all these things; what then? Go on, say more. After so many things they fail, and did not glorify God, and became vain in their thoughts, and were made foolish, thinking themselves wise, and changed the glory of God into the likeness of an ox that eats grass, and were dispersed in the error of Baal; and the god of this world blinded them, and they were given over to dishonorable passions, and they became like those they worshipped. And yet they rejoiced in good nature, and in understanding through nature. O madman, do you see that this nature grants understanding, by which they bless God? Rather it grants understanding, by which they curse God, and rise up against the Creator? Rather say, brothers: I will bless the Lord, who has granted me understanding: unless He had granted it, I would not have understood; unless I had understood, I would never have blessed: He gave understanding, He gave sight. Blind Nature, where it herself lacks she does not bestow. Make understanding for yourself, and you will make yourself blind. The light which is in you, is darkness. Hence say: Enlighten my darkness, lest I sleep in death. What is it to sleep in death? To hope for something from nature, to make one’s own arm flesh, to fabricate understanding for oneself: whoever does these things is not only in death but sleeps in death, and is more than four days dead, and stinks more. If he were only in death, he could be raised: but in this very death he sleeps a more than iron sleep, he rests in it. There is no hope for him. The nature of humans is frail, but Christ has healed it. But do you want to know what he did who was blessed with a good nature? Did he say as you do: In a good nature, I have good understanding, and he who granted one did not deny the other? Let us crush the scorpion, let us trample it, let its mouth be sealed against iniquity. Read: I have been endowed with a good soul. Proceed, let us hear what kind of treasure you have obtained, which perhaps will turn into coals, and if only into coals that piled up on your head might consume the superfluous. And when I was better situated, I came to an untainted body: and as I knew that I could not otherwise contain myself, unless God gives it; and this itself was wisdom, of which it was the gift to know: I approached the Lord and entreated Him. You have truly been endowed with good nature, who can deny it? For even the nature of the devil is good, and all things that God made are good: but in this nature, although good, will you have the wise understanding, with which you could abstain from lusts and desires, which wage war against the soul, if God does not give it? Learn, heretic, learn at last. And I knew that I could not otherwise contain myself, unless God gives it: and in this the chief part of wisdom, which is entirely understanding, is to know from where you contain yourself, and that you do not contain yourself otherwise than from God alone. Oh excellent nature which can abstain from nothing, nor can do otherwise, unless it falls, if God does not give the understanding with which it does not fall! Therefore let us sing, brothers, let us sing. I will bless the Lord, who has granted me understanding: He gave nature, He gave understanding; He healed nature, He healed understanding. In both, the merciful Samaritan exhibited mercy; He descended, He bound wounds, He cleansed with the wine which we understand, He healed, He took [the wounded] into the inn, that is into the Church, He entrusted him to the host. To what host? The Holy Spirit, the inhabitant of the holy Church. He, having received the coin, but which He poured out from the torn sack for those who pay for the wretched, with His oil, with His ointment, healed the wounds of the lying and expiring nature, and with the same oil that He lights, He illuminated my darkness, and made understanding clear. If you do not believe this, He will not be the Samaritan to you, and you will perish in the wound, who refuse to admit the hand of the healer. The intellect is a gift of the Holy Spirit, which Christ purchased for us with His Passion.

Let the Apostles be questioned, and let them say who on that fiftieth day from the Lord's resurrection gave them understanding. Did they perchance produce that terrible noise by which the place where they awaited the promises of the Father was shaken? Perhaps they kindled that heavenly fire by which they were all ablaze? Perhaps they themselves created those fiery tongues? Maybe they themselves procured for themselves those divine gifts, among which is understanding, and poured them into themselves according to the desires of their hearts? Whoever says this has no part in this sacred fiftieth day; nor does he obtain understanding, who believes understanding is given according to nature. When, therefore, was understanding given, except when the Spirit was also given? Let us reason together, already you are confused, already you are blushing; and would that you were thus confused so that you might be edified, thus blushing so that you might be glorified. What is the Holy Spirit, if not the promised gift of the Father, if not the gift of the Son? If it is promised, you have the one by whom it is promised, for what is promised is outside of us; and it would be promised in vain if it was either within our power when it is promised, or if it could be possessed whenever we wish. I promise you this which you do not have, and it is in me when I promise, so that what I promise may descend upon you. The Holy Spirit is indeed a gift, and above all a gift, and a gift that is owed to no one, and a gift that is given freely. Christ was born and reclined in a manger to become the food of devout animals: yet He suffered thirst, fatigue, was sold by His own, betrayed and accused by the Jews, scourged by the Gentiles, crowned with thorns, crucified, and finally enclosed in a rock: to what end all these? To purchase for you this gift, which He would later dispense to the believer; or rather dispense so that you might believe. For unless He had first given it, neither before nor after would you believe. Hence, if you have this gift by nature, you render the death of Christ, His suffering, the cross, in vain. For He dies in vain, to acquire for you what is in you, and to give what you possess. Return to the Lord the humility of the manger, return the curse of the cross, return the abundance of the shed blood, all these things in vain: you suffice for yourself, all these things are vain; you are wealthy, and you attribute understanding to the goods of nature, which nature gave, not grace, and for which you are not a debtor to the Creator, except insofar as He granted nature, which bestowed understanding upon you. The speech returns from the heretics to the brothers; exhortation to investigate inward experience.

You acknowledge, I suppose, the error: and may your kidneys correct you so that you may better recognize, and recognizing, request, and requesting, obtain the spirit of understanding, counsel, and fear, whereby you might become wiser, more cautious, and more subject to the Lord. These things, brothers, even if I did not discuss them, there would still be another who would educate you: and you would be educators among yourselves. For if, God forbid, you had fallen into such a gross and stupid error as to believe that you were endowed with understanding by nature, which you have by God's grace and mercy alone, your kidneys would correct you and shout: Why do such thoughts arise in your heart? Let each one consult himself, touch himself, scrutinize, and not seek outside himself; interrogate his kidneys, and they will say: there has been a law in my members contrary to the law of my mind; I am prone to every crime, so overwhelmed by the waves of desires that I am drowned daily and fall into the depths of sins. Envy rises, pride rises, lust rises, forming an army that attacks the wretched soul: if I avoid Charybdis, I run into Scylla; if I repel lust, I succumb to anger; if greed does not subdue me, drunkenness strikes me; if I refrain from plundering, I close my hand and heart to the poor; if I stop my ears from slanders, death enters through the windows, that is, through the eyes I drink in the incitements of lusts and pleasures; finally, if I plug one crack, a hundred open, through which I receive the hostile storm, and at last I fall apart. These are the things your kidneys discuss within you, and aware of their own weakness, they educate and correct you until night. What kind of night? The murky night of your conscience, whose darkness you would wrap around yourself, if you could, as a shield against the light of truth, and hope well of your own strength. But your kidneys correct you. There is strength in the kidneys and loins, as it is written somewhere in Scripture: but since your loins are so unsteady, your kidneys so flabby, they educate you and tell you: If there is so much weakness, so much infirmity in the kidneys, the source of strength, what will become of the rest? Therefore, when our loins have educated us and taught us how vain is human salvation, what remains except to gird our loins so they do not fall apart? When in our houses, the beams, from either excessive age, excessive heat, storm impact, or some other cause, split apart, we immediately fasten them with nails and braces: let this be done with your loins, that is, with your strength; they loosen, collapse, fall apart, the whole frame is disjointed; you have nails in the crucified one, drive them in forcefully, and the better the deeper; do not place them loosely to uphold what is falling; thus will the disjointed frame be strengthened. The nails of the cross have the power to raise what is fallen, restore what is weak, support what is collapsing. Drive them in, hammer them, to the marrow, to the very soul, from this correction you shall be healed, and being healed, you will say to the Lord: I will guard my strength in you: from you is my strength, to you is my strength. Turned towards the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 366

SERMO 366 "The Lord rules me, and nothing will be lacking to me."

Psalm 22 is given to those to be baptized so that they may learn it, because it deals with the reformation of man.

We deliver to you a psalm, beloved ones who hasten to the Baptism of Christ, to be committed to memory in the name of the Lord; and it is necessary that we expound its mystery, with divine grace illuminating. For this psalm specifically contains the reformation of the fallen human race, and the discipline of the holy Church along with the sacraments. Therefore, let the ears of your heart be opened in silence to listen, and may the prepared furrows of your whole intention find the seed of the word: so that what the thirsty earth now receives, in due time drenched with the blood of Christ, flourishing in a tall stalk, may bring forth abundant fruits.

Psalm 22, 1: We can now confess this praise of the Lord, because the Lord has raised us from misery. The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want. A great beginning, beloved, of confession. For He has established the confidence of defense, strengthened the infinite substance of riches. The Lord is my shepherd; He has established the confidence of defense. And I shall not want; He has strengthened the infinite substance of riches. But let us inquire of whose, how great, and of what sort is this confession. It is his, dearest, who descending from Jerusalem to Jericho, fell among robbers. Who, stripped of the dignity of his original state, and struck down by the weapon of death, lay helpless and naked on the ground. Who, while the trumpet of the Law and Prophets was sounding, and while he was striving to rise by his own strength, was drawn back by the pain of his wound, and fell more grievously than he lay. For the Law, as the Apostle says, brought nothing to perfection. Whom that Samaritan of ours, namely Christ, who is called a Samaritan by the Jews, which means Guardian, mercifully, as He passed by the same way, that is, when He came in the flesh to die for us sinners, lifted him up from the earth onto His beast; and bearing him like a sheep upon His shoulders, He restored him to paradise, from where he had fallen, to a hundredfold, that is, to a perfect number. For He Himself, as the prophet says, carried our sins and grieved for us. Now speak, man, speak on the beast of mercy, and sitting on the shoulders of the Lord's affection, who, recognized, recognize your Author and Lord: The Lord is my shepherd. Certainly, unless raised up by the Lord, lying down you could not say this. Therefore, He governs you, who carries you. For when you say, The Lord is my shepherd; there is nothing of your own to trust in yourself. Therefore, be careful not to boast of your merits. For there were none, when the Lord came to lift you up. He found you naked, not clothed; wounded, not healthy; lying down, not standing; wandering, not returning. Beware of arrogance, beware; for He who mercifully lifted you from the earth half-dead, carries the humble, but hurls down the proud. When you say fearfully, and walk in innocence: The Lord is my shepherd; you will confidently add, and I shall not want. Because nothing is lacking to those who fear Him; and the Lord will not deprive of good those who walk in innocence.

Ps. 22, 2: On the pastures and shepherd of Christians. For you to know that nothing will be lacking to you, add what follows: In a place of pasture he has set me; beside the waters of refreshment he has led me. Recognize, man, what you were, where you were, under whom you were. You were a wandering sheep, in a pathless and waterless place, you were feeding among thorns and brambles: placed under a hireling, you were not safe when the wolf came. But now, sought out by the true shepherd, lifted up on his shoulders through compassion, you have been brought back to the fold, that is, to the house of God, namely the Church, where your shepherd is Christ, and the gathered sheep remain. This shepherd is not like the hireling under whom you suffered miserably, under whom you feared the wolf. Do you want to know how much care this good shepherd has for you? He laid down his life for you. For he himself says in the Gospel: The good shepherd lays down his life for the sheep. He did this. For the wolf lurking for you, he offered himself to be killed for you. Now, therefore, you remain secure in the fold. Nor do you need anyone else who closes and opens the door of your court: for Christ is both your shepherd and your door; he himself is also your pasture and provider. I am, he says, the door of the sheep. Through me, if anyone enters, he will be saved; and he will go in and out, and find pasture. Therefore, the pasture which this good shepherd has prepared for you, in which he has set you to be satisfied, is not the variety of green herbs, in which some are composed of sweet juice, some of the bitterest, which by the succession of times are sometimes there, sometimes not. The pastures for you are the sweet-sown words and commandments of God. Those pastures were tasted by the one who said to God: How sweet are your words to my taste, more than honey to my mouth! From these pastures, the same one cries out to the Lord's sheep, and says: Taste and see how good the Lord is. Therefore, read the Decalogue of the Old Testament: You shall not kill, you shall not steal, you shall not bear false witness, and the others. Read the praise of the precepts of the New Testament: Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth: and the other following or similar, and many things sown by the Prophets and Apostles. From these pastures surely the shepherd calls to the sheep: Work for the food that does not perish. The reason it does not perish is because the word of the Lord remains forever. The word of the Lord is your food, and not only food, but also drink. Hear him through the Prophet speaking to the old people: Those who eat me will still hunger; and those who drink me will still thirst. Again, through himself: My flesh is true food, and my blood is true drink. But these pastures are not far from the waters of refreshment. The one place for these is the Catholic Church of God; where the commandments of life are your pasture, and the fountain of the water that springs up into eternal life, whose stream you will be refreshed by when you are to be renewed in Christ through baptism. Therefore, unless your pastures are watered by this water, you cannot be brought forth: for the commandments of God cannot germinate without the baptism of Christ, nor be eaten to the soul's satisfaction.

Ps 22, 3: What are the paths through which we are commanded to walk. So when you have begun to be made suitable through the water of Christ's refreshment, so that you may be satisfied with the taste of sweet pastures, then you will know, and you will shout with joy, saying: "He restores my soul; He leads me in paths of righteousness for His name's sake." The devil overturned your soul through sin and turned you away from God; whom God the Father, through Christ, has turned back to Him not by your merits, but for His name's sake. Now therefore, having been illuminated, now converted, now believing, now satisfied with divine pastures through the water of refreshment, you will say: "He restores my soul." The glory of your confession is good if it does not alter your conscience. For then you will truly and unchangeably say this with a firm conscience, when you say it not on account of your merit, but for His name's sake. But what are the paths of righteousness in which He has led you? Listen to your guide. "How wide and spacious is the road that leads to destruction; but narrow and constrained is the way that leads to life." For every path is short and concise. Therefore, God did not ordain you to go to the kingdom of heaven through worldly delights, opulence of gold and silver, or splendor of precious stones and garments, honor of all kinds, nobility, swelling with philosopher's wisdom: because all these things, and similar things which are used wrongly, which are given to be used well, become a wide and spacious way for them, that is, in hope which is only seen; and it leads them, when they are deprived of present life, not to the hope they did not have, but to perdition. For they have slept their dream, and all the men of wealth have found nothing in their hands. He has set you up to go along the paths of righteousness, that is, through mercy and truth. For all the paths of the Lord are mercy and truth. Having disregarded the wide and spacious road, He wants you to walk the narrow and concise paths, that is, through hunger and thirst, through nakedness, through fasting, through ignobility, through poverty, through patience, through the contempt of all present things, with hope truly promised. Do you want to clearly understand the summary of the paths through which you are ordered to walk? You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and your neighbor as yourself. On these two commandments hang all the Law and the Prophets. Therefore, to quickly reach, if you hasten to the kingdom of heaven, in these two paths, which are the head of all and make one way, walk; so that when you have arrived, you may rejoice that you have diligently and without weariness completed them all.

Psalm 22:4: With you on the way is the Lord your God.

Therefore, hold to these paths, let your steps remain in them, amidst the snares of the raging devil, so that you may securely sing to God and say: "For even if I walk in the midst of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for you are with me." The shadow of death is the path of sin, in which the fog and pirate devil spreads the snares of deception for the righteous walking rightly. It is a shadow because there is nothing in common between light and darkness. The Apostle teaches us to repudiate the works of this shadow, saying: "Let us cast off the works of darkness and put on the armor of light; let us walk honestly as in the day, not in revelry and drunkenness, not in lewdness and lust, not in strife and envy." Therefore, as long as you remain in this present life, you walk in the midst of vices, secular oppressions, which are the shadow of death. Let Christ shine in your heart, who illuminates the lamp of our mind through the love of God and neighbor: and you will not fear evil, for He is with you. He says through the prophet, "I will not leave you nor forsake you." Likewise, in the Gospel: "Behold, I am with you always, even to the end of the age." Your guardian is fit. The Lord your God is with you. Beware lest you forsake His company through pride, and remain abandoned in the shadow of death.

Psalm 22, 4-5: Let us confidently approach the table prepared by Christ.

Therefore, when you know that you are being attacked by the enemy with snares in the shadow and are being frightened, seize the rod of discipline, and confidently lean on the staff of mercy, so that when the sun of righteousness, Christ, shines upon you to help, you may truly say: Your rod and Your staff, they comfort me. For the rod rules the proud, as it is said in the second Psalm about Christ: You will rule them with a rod of iron and break them as a potter’s vessel. But the staff supports and sustains the weak and weary. Therefore, remember the rebuke and discipline of the rod, so that when you have been filled with the good gifts of God, you may not be lifted up with pride and murmur against Him: for like an angry potter with it He will break you. Also, remember the aid of the staff, and do not trust in your own strength, nor say: I am holy, I cannot stumble. Our infirmity has many lapses, nor is it ruled by the holiness of its works while still placed on the earth that brings forth thorns and thistles, or has the glory of purity. Therefore, as long as it returns to the earth whence it was taken, unless it is ruled by the staff of divine grace, it cannot stand. Therefore, whether you are prospering in God, or troubled by the storm of trials, cast all of yourself on the staff of God's mercy, so that when you are nourished with spiritual gifts upon it, delighted by the taste of His sweetness, you may rightly say: You prepare a table before me in the presence of my enemies. You anoint my head with oil, and my cup overflows with how excellent it is! The whole Church throughout the world, supported by the staff of grace, sings this. Against the heretics, Jews, and Gentiles who mockingly trouble it, it proclaims this, not boasting in itself but in the Lord. For the table of joy is the passion of Christ, who offered Himself as a sacrifice to God the Father for us on the table of the cross, granting His Catholic Church the vital feast, namely, feeding us with His body and inebriating us with His blood. Nourished and enlivened by this table, the Church exults against those who trouble her, having the hope of eternal life through her Lord Christ, who abundantly anointed her with the oil of gladness through the Holy Spirit. For this reason, the Apostle rebuked the Corinthians who were dining in an idol’s temple, saying: You cannot drink the cup of the Lord and the cup of demons; you cannot partake of the table of the Lord and the table of demons.

"Psalm 22, 6: The mercy of God both goes before us and follows us, so that we may walk with Him." When therefore divine grace, to which you hasten, has brought you, you will recognize the table of the spiritual feast so that, having recognized the truth, each of you rejoicing and giving thanks to God may now competently and confidently say: And your mercy will follow me all the days of my life. Great consolation of glory accompanies you. On account of the misery, namely of your infirmity, the mercy of God follows you. But first, that it may show you the way of eternal life, it goes ahead of you, that is, it precedes you, according to what is said in another psalm: My God, his mercy will precede me. Therefore his mercy goes ahead of you, that is, it leads you on the way, ignorant of the way, it calls you to God who have been made far from God; it draws the servant of sin so that he may be made free, so that walking on the way all the days of your life you do not err. It also follows you, guarding your back, so that the serpent the devil, lying in wait at your heel with whom you have enmity, does not trip you up. Indeed, the thief either kills by confronting or by rising up behind. For this reason, the mercy of God precedes and follows you, so that, in the middle, you walk safely and secure all the days of your life. Therefore, have hope and glory, not in yourself, but in the preceding and following mercy of God: with which you were prevented as a sinner, that you might be saved; you were not found righteous, that you might glory in having pleased.

Psalm 22, 6: To the house of God Christ leads the believers and the persevering. But see where he leads you if you do not forsake the guide. Not to the field of worldly misery, where you might seek bread amidst thorns and brambles in toil and sweat; not to the dangers of the sea, where for the sake of trade you pursue uncertain gains on fragile wood, where many have sunk due to their greed. He leads you to the house of God, not as a guest for a time, so that you would depart from it, but as an inhabitant to remain in it. For it follows: "And that I may dwell in the house of the Lord for length of days." This house of the Lord is paradise. The length of days is eternal life. There you will not hunger, nor thirst, nor will you labor under the heat of the sun and moon, you will not feel the cold and storms of winter. Sorrow and sadness are not there. You will be blessed always with the company of the saints. You will rejoice with them, and exult, living and praising God forever and ever. For it says in another psalm: "Blessed are those who dwell in your house; they will praise you forever and ever." This is the hope of your faith, dearest. You have approached the Lord to believe; hasten and give diligence to seize through good conduct what you have believed. For you are not made Christians for the sake of this present life, but for the future life, which the Lord Christ himself grants to you who believe and persevere in him: who lives and reigns with God the Father in the unity of the Holy Spirit, forever and ever. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 367

SERMO 367 On the words of the Gospel, Luke 16:19-31, where it speaks of the rich man and Lazarus The gospel narrative is set forth to the rich so that they may recognize their madness. Your Holiness has noticed, dearest brothers, and with me, as I believe, with the whole attention of the mind, has perceived the wealth of the rich man and the poverty of the beggar; one being lavish with food, and the other failing with hunger. Both indeed are men, both are carnal, both are mortal: but not both are equal. One nature, but not one life. Neither of them is exempt from the condition of death: and yet one feasts splendidly, and the other decays in rags and in hardship. The former rejoices in delicate dishes by the invention of cooks: the latter waits for crumbs to fall from his table. Now let the rich, who do not wish to be merciful, hear; let them hear that we all are born with one law, live by one light, breathe one air, and are extinguished by one death: which, if it did not intervene, not even the poor himself would endure. This ulcered and naked Lazarus, lying, is carried to Abraham's bosom by the hands of angels. Behold, the rich man, refreshed and splendid, is enclosed in a Tartarean prison. Where is that fine linen garment? where is that abundant and overflowing life with many riches? Do not all things pass away with death as with a shadow? "We brought nothing into this world," says the Apostle, "and we can take nothing out of it." We take or seize nothing with us. What if we took something, would we not devour living men? What greed of desire is this, when beasts themselves have a limit? They then snatch when they are hungry: they spare the prey when they feel satiation. Insatiable is the greed of the rich alone. It always seizes, and never is satisfied: it neither fears God nor respects man: it neither spares a father nor acknowledges a mother: it neither obeys a brother nor keeps faith with a friend: it oppresses the widow, invades the property of the orphan: it recalls freedmen into servitude, brings forward a false will. The possessions of the dead are occupied; as if those who do this will not also die.

What is then this madness of souls, to lose life and seek death? to acquire gold and lose heaven? But because no one thinks of God, therefore judgment remains in death. On the just condemnation of a wealthy man.

It is rightly said to the rich man: Because you received good things in your life, and Lazarus likewise bad things; now, however, he is comforted here, and you are tormented. Let the rich who do not want to be merciful hear this. Let those who refuse to distribute their aid hear that punishments are inflicted on them. Let them hear that the poor man is refreshed, while the rich man is tormented by more severe sufferings. Father Abraham, he says, send Lazarus, so that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue; because I am tormented in this flame. But he replied: Remember, son, that you received good things in your life, and Lazarus likewise bad things. Punishments are weighed for riches, refreshment for poverty, flame for purple, consolation for nakedness, so that the balance's equity may be preserved, and the measure of that scale may not lie: In the measure you measured, it will be measured to you. Therefore, mercy is denied to the rich man in punishments, because he himself, while he lived, did not want to show mercy. Therefore, the rich man asking is not heard in torments; because he did not listen to the poor man asking on earth.

How a poor person becomes rich by the way of heaven. The rich man and the poor man are contradictory to each other: but again they are necessary to each other. No one would be in need if they supported each other; and no one would labor if they both helped each other. The rich man is made for the poor man, and the poor man is made for the rich man. It is the poor man's role to pray, and the rich man's role to give; it is God's role to judge the great and the small. From His mercy, a small amount generates a large abundance. The field of the poor is fertile, quickly yielding fruit for those in power. The way to heaven is through the poor, through whom one comes to the Father. Therefore, begin to give out, if you do not want to err. Release in this life the fetter of your inheritance by which you are bound; that you may freely access heaven: cast off from yourself the burdens of wealth, cast off voluntary chains, cast off anxieties and tedium, which trouble you for many years. Give to the petitioner, that you may yourself receive: give to the poor, if you do not wish to be scorched by flames. Give to Christ on earth, that He may repay you in heaven. Forget what you are, and consider what you will be. The present life is fragile, and prone to death. No one can stand: but we are all compelled to pass over. We go unwillingly, we leave unwillingly, because we are wicked. But if we were to send something ahead of us, we would not come to an empty inn. For what we give to the poor, we send ahead of us: but what we seize, we leave entirely here.

Sermons - Sermon 368

SERMO 368 SERMON OF BISHOP AUGUSTINE ON WHAT IS WRITTEN:

"HE WHO LOVES HIS LIFE SHALL LOSE IT"

If there is no one who hates his own flesh, much more no one hates his own soul.

Just now, brothers, when the divine reading was read, we heard the Lord saying: "He who loves his soul will lose it." This statement seems to be contrary to what the Apostle says: "No one ever hates his own flesh." If therefore there is no one who hates his own flesh, much less is there anyone who hates his own soul. Indeed, the soul is greatly preferred to the flesh: because it is the inhabitant, the flesh is the dwelling; and the soul rules, while the flesh serves; the soul is superior, the flesh is subordinate. If therefore no one ever hated his own flesh, who is there that hates his own soul? By this, the present evangelical reading brought us not a small question, where we heard: "He who loves his soul will lose it." It is dangerous to love the soul, lest it perish. But if it is therefore dangerous to love your soul lest your soul perishes, you should not love it, because you do not want it to perish. But if you do not want it to perish, you love it. What is this? If I love, I lose: therefore I should not love, lest I lose. But because I fear to lose, for that reason I do not love; and certainly, what I fear to lose, I love. The Lord also says elsewhere: "What does it profit a man, if he gains the whole world, but suffers the loss of his own soul?" Behold, because thus the soul is to be loved, so that it is preferred to the gain of the whole world; and yet, let him who loves his soul take heed, because if he loves he will lose it. Do you not want to lose it? Do not love it; but if you do not want to lose it, you cannot help but love it. Of the perverse love of the soul which comes from hatred, and of the right hatred which comes from love.

There are those who perversely love their own soul: and this the word of God wants to correct, not that they may hate their soul, but that they may love it rightly. For by loving it wrongly they destroy it, and something great and almost absurd and contrary happens: but yet it happens that, if you love it perversely, you lose it; if you hate it rightly, you preserve it. Therefore, there is a certain perverse love of it, and a certain right hatred of it; but the perverse love comes from hatred, the right hatred from love. What is the perverse love of the soul? When you love your soul in iniquities. Hear because from hatred comes this perverse love: But he who loves iniquity, hates his own soul. And right hatred, see because it comes from love; there the Lord follows and says: But he who hates his soul in this world, shall keep it to life eternal. Surely what you want to find in life eternal, you greatly love. For what you love for a time, what does it profit? Either you will be taken away from it, or it will be taken away from you: when you are removed, the lover perishes; when it is removed, what you loved perishes. Therefore, where either the lover perishes or what is loved, it is not to be loved. But what is to be loved? That which can be with us forever. If you want to have your soul saved forever, hate it for a time. Therefore, right hatred comes from love: perverse love comes from hatred. On the right love of the soul: how it belongs to few; how it should be acquired.

What, then, is the way to love the soul? Do you think the martyrs did not love their souls? You certainly see now, if one's life in this present age is endangered, how his friends run for it: how they rush to the church, ask the bishop to pause whatever actions he has, to hurry, to make haste. Why? For the soul. And everyone trembles, they decide that all other matters should be put aside and they should hurry: all haste is praised, all delay is blamed. Why? For the soul. What does this mean, for the soul? That man may not die. Did the martyrs not know how to love their souls? And yet this is for the soul, that man may not die. The death of a man is unjust. If you run a hundred miles for this life, how many miles should you run for eternal life? If you hasten to gain a few days, and those uncertain—since even a man freed from death today does not know if he will die tomorrow—nevertheless if such haste is made for the gain of a few days, because even up to old age a few days are few, how much more should one hasten for eternal life? And yet people are lazy for this: it is difficult to find someone who will even slowly move for eternal life. Therefore, a perverse love of the soul abounds; but true love is found in very few. For just as there is no one who does not love his own soul, so there is no one who does not love his own flesh: whence it can be true what the Apostle said: No one ever hated his own flesh, and the soul is not loved. Let us therefore learn, brothers, to love our souls. All the pleasures of this world will pass away. There is a useful love, there is a harmful love: let love be hindered by love; let harmful love depart, and useful love take its place. But because people do not want to depart from there, therefore nothing else can enter into them: if they do not receive, they are full; let them pour out, and they will receive. They are full of the love of carnal pleasures, they are full of the love of this present life, they are full of the love of gold and silver, and possessions of this world. Therefore those who are full are just like vessels. Do you want honey to enter, from which you have not yet poured out the vinegar? Pour out what you have, so that you may receive what you do not have. Therefore, the first renunciation is of this world, and then conversion to God. He who renounces pours out, he who converts is filled: but if it is done not only with the body, but also with the heart.

One must yield to the natural affection for oneself. How the things below us are to be loved.

It is asked, brothers, how this love grows: for it has its beginnings, it has its increases, it has its perfection. And we should know who has started, so that we might encourage him to growth: who has not started, so that we might advise him how to begin: and who has started and grown, so that we might spur him to perfection. First, let your Charity observe this: all loves and affections are first for the persons themselves, and thus for another thing which they love. If you love gold, first you love yourself, and thus gold: because if you were dead, there would be no one to possess the gold. Therefore, affection begins for each one with himself, and it cannot begin except with himself. And no one is advised to love himself: for this is not only innate in men, but also in animals. For you see, brothers, how not only do great beasts and large animals, such as oxen or camels or elephants, but also flies, and even the smallest worms, how they do not want to die, and they love themselves. All animals flee death. Therefore, they love themselves and want to preserve themselves: some by speed, some by hiding, others by resisting and fighting back; yet all animals fight for their lives, they do not want to die, they want to preserve themselves. Therefore, they love themselves. Another thing also begins to be loved. But what is that other thing? Whatever you love, it is either what you are, or it is inferior to you, or it is superior to you. If what you love is inferior to you, love it to console, to handle, to use, not to be bound by it. For example, if you love gold, do not bind yourself to gold: how much better are you than gold? For gold is shining earth: but you, that you might be illuminated by the Lord, were made in the image of God. Although gold is a creature of God, yet He did not make gold in His image, but you: therefore, He placed gold below you. Therefore, this love should be disdained: these things should be assumed for use, not adhered to with a bond of love as if with glue. Do not make for yourself limbs which, when they begin to be cut off, you grieve and are tormented. What then? Rise from this love, by which you love things inferior to yourself: begin to love what is equal to you, that is, what you are. But why prolong this? If you wish, you can do it briefly. By what order of true love one may attain perfection. By what order, therefore, we can have true love and true charity, the Lord Himself told us in the Gospel and clearly showed. For He thus said: You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your strength; and your neighbor as yourself. Therefore, first love God, then love yourself; after this love your neighbor as yourself. However, first learn to love yourself, thus love your neighbor as yourself: for if you do not know how to love yourself, how can you truly love your neighbor? Indeed, some men think they love themselves rightly when they seize other people's goods, when they get drunk, when they serve lust, when they acquire unjust gains through various slanders. Let such as these hear the Scripture saying: He who loves iniquity hates his own soul. If, therefore, by loving iniquity you not only do not love yourself, but also hate yourself, how can you love either God or your neighbor? Therefore, if you wish to keep true charity's order, practice justice, love mercy, flee lust; begin to love not only friends but even enemies according to the Lord's commandment. And when you strive with all your heart to keep these faithfully, you can ascend by these virtues as by certain steps, so that you deserve to love God with all your soul and all your strength. And when you come to this blessed perfection, you will consider all the desires of this world as dung, and with the prophet you will be able to say: But it is good for me to cling to God.

Sermons - Sermon 369

SERMO 369 Sermon Given in the Restored Basilica THE BIRTHDAY OF THE LORD Born in time, eternal. Our Savior, born of the Father without a day, through whom all days were made, wished to have in the world this birth day, which we celebrate today. Whoever marvels at this day, let him rather marvel at the eternal one abiding before every day, creating every day, born on this present day, freeing us from the evil of the day. Yet marvel more: she who gave birth is both mother and virgin; he who was born is both infant and Word. Rightly did the heavens speak, the angels rejoice, the shepherds celebrate, the magi change, the kings be troubled, and the little ones be crowned. Nurse, mother, our food; nurse the bread coming from heaven and placed in the manger as if the devout animals' fodder. For there the ox knew its owner, and the donkey its Lord’s manger, circumcision and uncircumcision, adhering to the cornerstone, whose first fruits were the shepherds and the magi. Nurse him who made you thus, so that he himself might be made in you, who brought you the gift of fruitfulness and did not take away the honor of virginity when born; who for himself, before he was born, chose both the womb from which he would be born and the day on which he would be born. And he himself created what he chose, so that he might come forth from there like a bridegroom from his chamber, to be seen by mortal eyes, and to testify by the annual increase of light that he had come as the light of minds. The prophets sang of the maker of heaven and earth to be among men on earth; the angel announced that the Creator of flesh and spirit would come in the flesh. John greeted the Savior from the womb in the womb; the old Simeon recognized the infant God; the widow Anna the virgin mother. These are the testimonies of your birth, Lord Jesus, before the waves were laid beneath your feet as you walked, yielded to your command; before the wind was silenced by your command, the dead lived at your call, the sun paled at your death, the earth trembled at your resurrection, and heaven opened at your ascension: before these and other wonders, already done in the age of your youthful body. You were still carried in your mother's arms, yet already acknowledged as the Lord of the world. The same little child from the seed of Israel, and the same God Emmanuel with us. The eternal Word spoken is eternally nourished.

What is this generation of our Savior, co-eternal with the Father who begets him, when the world marveled at the virgin birth, which pious faith recognized and held onto, but unbelief laughed at and pride feared, being overcome? What is this generation in which the Word was in the beginning, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God? What is this Word, which, having spoken before, was not silent, and by speaking did not cease what was said? What is the Word without time, through which times were made; the Word which opened no one's lips to begin, nor closed to finish; the Word which has no beginning from the mouths of speakers, and opens the mouths of the mute; the Word which is not made eloquent by the tongues of nations, and makes the tongues of infants eloquent? What is this generation, I ask, to which the Father does not yield in dying, because he does not precede it by living? From all intervals of places and times, from all the dispersion of spaces, which we are accustomed to sense either in days or in bodies, let us raise our soul to Him, as much as we can with His help, if in some way we can comprehend both the one who begets not preceding the one who is born, and the one who is born not following the one who begets, Father and Son: neither fathers at the same time, nor sons at the same time, but equally eternal: not both begetting, nor both being born, but one not living without the other. And let us think of the Father eternally begetting, and the Son eternally being born, if we can; if we cannot, let us believe. It is not what we want to say here, but yet it is not far from each of us: For in Him we live, and move, and have our being. Let us transcend our flesh, in which parents live before children; because they grew so that they might generate children, and they age as their children grow; parents lived before their children were born, because children will live even after parents have died. Let us also transcend our souls: they too give birth to something by thinking, that they retain by knowing; but they can lose it by forgetting, because they did not have it before by not knowing. Let us transcend all corporeal, temporal, mutable things, so that we may see above all through whom all things were made. Our ascent is in the heart, because even that by which we ascend is near. But we are far from Him, to the extent that we are dissimilar to Him. Therefore, His likeness ascends to Him, which He made and remade in us, in which, not yet perfected, the weak gaze trembles and cannot contemplate the ineffable glow of the eternal light. Whose radiance the eye of the mind has not yet grasped, who will recount his generation? But the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us.

Let us adore the child God born in human condition.

Therefore, this generation, whose day we celebrate today, in which He deemed it worthy to come through Israel and become Emmanuel: God with us in the weakness of the flesh, not with us in the iniquity of the heart; approaching us through what He assumed from us, and freeing us through what He remained in His own - for indeed the Lord visited His servants through mortal weakness to make them free through unchangeable truth - therefore this generation, of which human frailty is somewhat capable; not that which remains without time, without mother above all; but this one which was made in time, without father among all: let us praise, love, and adore this son of the virgin and bridegroom of virgins, born of an incorrupt mother and producing with incorruptible truth, so that in His mercy we may triumph over the cunning of the devil. The devil crept in with a corrupted feminine mind to deceive us: Christ proceeded even with incorrupt female flesh to liberate us.

Sermons - Sermon 37

SERMO 37

SERMON GIVEN ON THE FEAST OF THE MARTYRS OF SCILLITUM IN THE BASILICA OF THE NEW WHERE HE SAYS:

"A virtuous woman, who can find?" The Church is the mother of martyrs.

He who commended this day among his saints will grant us that the weakness of our voice may suffice for your intent. I mentioned this so that you might deign to assist me with your silence. For the spirit is willing towards you, but the flesh is weak. And this very spirit, whatever joys it may have conceived from the Scripture of God, labors and seeks to deliver in your ears and minds. Provide a nest within yourselves for the word. For even in Scripture the turtledove is commended, seeking a nest where it may place its young. And this text we hold in our hands, namely the Scripture you see, commends to us the search for and praise of a certain woman about whom you heard a little while ago when it was read, who has a great man, that man who adorned her when she was lost and adorned her when she was found. About her, according to the tenor of the reading you see me bearing, I will say a few things as the Lord suggests. For it is the day of the martyrs, and therefore the mother of the martyrs is more to be praised. By now you have understood who this woman is as I spoke. See also if you recognize her as I read. Every listener now, as appears evident from your affection, says in his heart: "It must be the Church." I confirm this thought. For who else could be the mother of the martyrs? Thus it is. What you have understood is true. The woman about whom we wish to speak is the Church. For it would not be fitting for us to speak of any other woman. Although we also heard in the reading of the passion of the martyrs of certain women about whom it is proper to speak, we do not neglect them when we praise their mother.

Christ redeemed the Church.

Pay attention to whose members you are; observe whose children you are. Who can find a strong woman? It is fitting to speak of the strength of martyrs as that of a woman. For if she were not strong, those her members would have faltered in suffering. Who can find a strong woman? It is difficult to find her, rather it is difficult not to know her. Is she not the city on a hill, which cannot be hidden? Then why is it said: Who can find her? when it should have been said: Who cannot find her? But you see the city set on a hill. However, that she might be set on the hill, she was found who had been lost. When illuminated, who does not see her? When she was hiding, who would find her? For she is indeed the city and is also the one lost sheep that the shepherd sought and, having found, joyfully carried back on his shoulders. The shepherd himself is the hill; but the sheep on his shoulders is the city on the hill. It is easy for you to see her placed on the hill. When would you find her, when she hid in the brambles, surely in the thorns of her sins? For there it is great to have sought her; there it is marvelous to have found her. This difficulty in finding her is commended when it is said: Who can find a strong woman? For who, because he is one, not because he is none. Just as it is said of her husband himself, the lion of the tribe of Judah, of whom prophecy previously foretold: You have ascended reclining, surely on the cross. Ascended, it is the cross; reclining, it is death. What is: You have ascended, except that which is written: And they crucified him? For he said: Just as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so must the Son of Man be lifted up, that whoever believes in him may not perish but have eternal life. What is: reclining? And bowing his head, he gave up his spirit. Therefore, when it was said: You have ascended reclining, the following is: You have slept like a lion. You slept like a lion, you did not flee like a fox. What is: You slept like a lion? By power, not by necessity. But when it was said: You slept like a lion, the following is: Who roused him? Who roused him? For it is not no one, but who of men? For none but God, who raised him from the dead and granted him the name which is above every name. He raised himself too. For he said: Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up. And now when you heard: Who can find a strong woman? do not think it is said of the Church that is hidden, but of that Church which has been found by one so that no one may not see her. Therefore, she should be described, praised, commended, to be loved by all of us as a mother, for she is the wife of one. Who can find a strong woman? Who does not see this woman so strong? But now found, now eminent, now conspicuous, now glorious, now adorned, now bright, now to quickly explain, spread throughout the whole world. The Church is found to be more precious than any stones.

It is more precious than precious stones, which is of such a kind. What is so great, because this woman is more precious than precious stones? If you consider human avarice, if precious stones are received for their own sake, what is so great that the Church is found to be more precious than any stones? There is no such comparison. But there are precious stones in her. These stones are so precious that they are called living. Therefore, precious stones adorn her, but she herself is more precious. I wish to commend something to your Charity, as much as I understand, as much as you understand, as much as I fear, as much as you ought to fear, about these precious stones. There are precious stones in the Church, and they always were, learned, abundant in knowledge and eloquence and all instruction of the law. Clearly, these stones are precious. But some from their number have strayed from the adornment of this woman. For as far as doctrine and eloquence from which it shines are concerned, the precious stone - for the doctrine of the Lord shines - Cyprian was a precious stone, but he remained in her adornment. Donatus was a precious stone, but he recoiled from the structure of the adornment. The one who remained wanted to be loved in her. The one who was shaken off from her sought a name for himself apart from her. The one remaining with her collected to her. The one recoiling desired not to gather, but to scatter. Evil children, why do you follow a precious stone shaken off from the adornment of this woman? You answer me: "What then? Do you understand as he did? Or do you speak as he did? Or are you as learned as he was?" Let him be understanding - A good understanding belongs to those who do it - let him be learned, let him be educated in the liberal disciplines and mysteries of the law, he is a precious stone. Return from him to her: She is more precious than precious stones. A precious stone, if it is not in the adornment of this woman, lies in darkness. Wherever a precious stone may lie, if it is not in the adornment of this woman, it lies in darkness. It was necessary for it to remain in the adornment of this woman, to be in the structure of her adornment. But I will confidently say. Precious stones are so called because they are worth much. Now he is vile, he has lost his worth, who does not have charity. Let him boast of his doctrine, let him boast of his tongue, let him hear the appraiser of the true stones of this matron. Let him hear, I say, a certain artist, an inspector of adornments. Why does he boast of tongues, not living precious, but vile stones? If I speak in the tongues of men, he says, and of angels, but do not have charity, I have become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal. Where is that stone? It no longer shines, but it tinkles. Therefore, learn to evaluate stones, traders of the kingdom of heaven. No stone should please you, besides the adornment of this woman. She who is more precious than precious stones, she herself is the worth of her adornment. The heart of her husband trusts in the Church. The heart of her husband trusts in her. Clearly, he trusts, and he has taught us to trust. For he has commended the Church to the ends of the earth, among all nations, from sea to sea. If she did not persevere until the end, the heart of her husband would not trust in her. The heart of her husband trusts in her. He trusts with foreknowledge, he who trusts cannot be deceived. It is not said: The heart of her children trusts in her. For her little children could be deceived. His heart trusts in her, whose heart no lie can deceive. Therefore, it is true that he trusts. She, such as she is, will not need spoils. Not because she does not seek spoils, thus she will not need, but because she will abound in many. She, such as she is, will not need spoils. Since she despoils the world, diffused everywhere; she seizes trophies from the devil from everywhere. For this her husband has promised as well, to whom she says in another psalm: I exult in your words, as one who finds many spoils. How does she, who seizes from everywhere, pulls from everywhere, acquires from everywhere, need spoils? For she works good and not evil for her husband, at all times. Hence it is that this woman plunders nations, by working good and not evil for her husband. At all times she works good and not evil. Not for herself, but for her husband, so that he who lives, may no longer live for himself, but for him who died and rose again for all. Therefore, she works good for her husband, she works good before God. She serves him, she is devoted to him, she loves him, she always strives to please him. She does not adorn herself, neither for her own eyes, nor for the eyes of others. She is not one of those who please themselves, she is not one of those who seek their own: For she works for her husband. But those who work for themselves, all seek their own, not the things of Jesus Christ.

God is to be worshipped not only in private conscience but openly.

Finding wool and flax, she made it useful with her hands. Holy Scripture describes this woman as both a wool-worker and a flax-worker. But it is asked of us what wool is, and what flax is. I believe wool is something carnal, flax something spiritual. I dare to conjecture this from the order of our clothing. For linen garments are inner, woolen garments are outer. Whatever we do with flesh is apparent; whatever with spirit is secret. To work with flesh but not to work with spirit, although it may seem good, is not useful. To work with spirit but not to work with flesh is slothful. You find a man giving alms to the poor with his hand, but not thinking of God there, rather wanting to please men. A woolen garment might be seen, but it does not have an inner linen. You find another saying to you: "It suffices for me to worship God in my conscience, to adore God. Why do I need to either go to church or visibly mix with Christians?" He wants to have linen without the tunic. This woman does not know or commend such works. Spiritual things indeed must be said and taught without the carnal ones, but those who receive ought to hold onto the spiritual and not work carnally on the carnal. This woman found wool and flax and made it useful with her hands. These wools and this flax are in the Holy Scriptures. Many find them but are unwilling to make anything useful with their hands. She found and made. When you listen, you find; when you live well, you make. Finding wool and flax, she made it useful with her hands. Look at her to whom it is said:

Extend to the right and to the left; for your offspring will inherit the nations; do not withhold, extend your cords farther. Look at her here: She has become like a ship, which trades from afar and gathers wealth for herself. The wealth of this woman is the praises of her husband. See how she gathers wealth from afar: From the rising of the sun to its setting, praise the name of the Lord. The Church is the diligent servant of the Lord.

She rises while it is still night and provides food for her household and tasks for her servant girls. She rises while it is still night. What do the nights mean? They do not burden her, they do not force her to lie in darkness. And she rises while it is still night. Nights are tribulations. But who rises even during these nights and makes progress even in tribulations? And she provides food for her household: she made herself an example during the nights. Doing, she taught what needed to be done, and then gave food to her household during the nights. Who eats at night? Certainly, she still provided food then. For those to whom she gave food are always hungry. Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness, for they will be filled. At night my spirit watches for you, O God. At midnight I rise to give thanks to you. These nightly provisions are abundant in this woman’s house. No one there suffers from hunger. Nor does one grope to find something to eat: the lamp of prophecy burns brightly. But is there only eating and idle time? For she who provided food for her household also provided tasks for her servant girls. Are these servant girls hers or her husband’s? Or because they are her husband’s, are they hers too? Or is she herself many servant girls? For although she is the lady of the house, she does not disdain to be a servant. Let her heed her value, let her love her Lord. Let her acknowledge, I say, that she is a servant and not fear her condition. For he does not disdain to make his wife whom he bought at great price. And every good wife calls her husband lord. Indeed, she not only calls him lord, but she also thinks this, expresses this, carries this in her heart, professes this with her mouth, and considers the marriage certificates as evidence of her purchase. She is therefore a servant, assigning tasks to the servant girls. She is a servant: for her son is the one who says, "I am your servant and the son of your maidservant."

You were wondering what those works are doing even at night. Listen to what it is doing: It considers a field and buys it. Considering not the present but the future, it buys that field, considering it with faith and hope. Hence, it also rises in the night. For if we hope for what we do not see, we wait for it with patience. In all tribulation being patient, it considers the field which it buys. Therefore, it is called a strong woman. What are those nights compared to that field? For our present, slight tribulation - when we rise in the nights - in an incredible way works an eternal weight of glory in us, with our heart towards that field - not looking at what is seen, but at what is not seen. For what is seen is temporary; but what is not seen is eternal. What kind of field is that? What is its beauty? Let us burn with desire to possess it. Do we think it is not the one regarding which God said, "And the beauty of the field is with me"?

Procure for yourself a heavenly field.

She considers a field and buys it. When she buys it, she has a field there. Where is the field? Where did she buy it from? Where she also placed her treasure, that she might become: "Where your treasure is, there your heart will also be." She considers a field and buys it. Where did she buy it from? Lest you perhaps hope and sigh and do nothing, this field does not love a sluggish lover. Certainly there, when you come to it, perhaps you will rest, nor will there be a need for you to labor. For that field is not like this one where Adam eats his bread in the sweat of his face. However, now that you might reach the appearance of that field, obtain for yourself that from which you might obtain it. Act accordingly. What? Gather the price. For this is what this woman does. See if it is silent. When it was said: "She considers a field and buys it," as if you were to say: "Where does she buy it from?", from the fruits of her hands she plants a possession. These were indeed the works which she gave to her maidservants, so that from the fruits of her hands she might plant a possession forever. For she referred to that possession which is to come. This she implies by the word she says: "Considers."

She has girded her loins with strength and has strengthened her arms. Truly strong. See if she is not a servant. How devotedly she serves, how diligently. Lest the loose folds of carnal desires hinder her from working, she girds her loins, so that she may step on nothing superfluous while hastening in her work. Here indeed is the chastity of this woman, tightly fastened with the belt of command, and always ready for every good work. She has girded her loins with strength and has strengthened her arms, not growing weak. Whence does this come? She has tasted that it is good to work. Where is the palate by which this is tasted? Men flee labor as if it were bitter. Fearing to taste it, they do not know what to love. A good work is made by a good conscience. And what is sweeter, Brothers, than a good conscience? If it is not present, and the bad pricks it, everything is bitter. Taste then, taste, and you will see how it tastes, how it will delight you, how afterward you will not stop until you consume it all. She has tasted that it is good to work. Our hope is our lamp. Her lamp is not extinguished all night. No one lights a lamp and places it under a bushel. You will light my lamp, O Lord. Her lamp, her hope. Every man works for it, whatever good he does is for hope. And in the night this lamp burns. For if we hope for what we do not see, therefore it is night. But if we neither see nor hope, it is both night and the lamp does not burn. What is more unfortunate than such darkness? But so that we do not falter in the darkness and wait patiently for what we hope but do not see, our lamp must burn all night. For he who speaks to us daily pours oil as it were, lest the lamp be extinguished.

He extends his hands to useful things. How far does he extend these hands? From sea to sea, and from the river, where it begins, to the ends of the earth, where it reaches. Hence it is not in vain that it was said: Extend to the right and to the left. He extends his hands, but to useful things.

It is discussed about the spindle and distaff.

He also strengthened his arms with the spindle. With the spindle, not from "pouring in," but referring to that instrument of weaving, which is called a spindle. I will speak about this spindle that the Lord gives. Neither are such weaving activities foreign to men. Hear what it is: He strengthened his arms with the spindle. He could have said: With the distaff. He said spindle, perhaps not without reason. Although it might seem to be reasonably understood as referring to weaving, and good work in weaving, like that of a chaste woman and an industrious and diligent matron. However, dear ones, in this spindle, as I understand it, I will not remain silent. Everyone who lives in good works in the holy Church, not neglecting but doing the commandments of God, does not know what he will do tomorrow, but knows what he did today. He fears future work, rejoices in past work. And to persevere in good works, he watches, lest being negligent of the future, he loses what is past. However, in praying to the Lord, in every supplication, he does not have a firm conscience about future work, but about past work, from what he has done, not from what he will do. Therefore, if you see this to be true with me, attend to these two instruments in weaving: the distaff and the spindle. On the distaff, wool is wrapped, which, drawn and spun into thread, passes to the spindle. What is wrapped on the distaff is the future; what is collected on the spindle is already past. Therefore your work is on the spindle, not on the distaff. For on the distaff is what you will do; on the spindle is what you have done. Therefore, see if you have anything on the spindle, there let your arms be strengthened. There your conscience will be strong, there you will securely say to God: "Give, because I gave; forgive, because I forgave; do, because I did." For you do not ask for a reward except for a task accomplished, not a task to be accomplished. Therefore whatever you work on, let your whole mind be on the spindle. For what hangs on the distaff is to be transferred to the spindle, but what is collected on the spindle is not to be recalled to the distaff. Therefore see what you do, so that you have something on the spindle, so that you strengthen your arms on the spindle, so that everything strives for the spindle, so that you have something spun that consoles you, that strengthens you, that gives you confidence in praying and hoping for promises. And what shall I do? Perhaps you say, what do you bid me hold on the spindle? Hear what follows: She opened her hands to the poor. Ah, we are not ashamed to teach you sacred textile work. See, if someone has a full purse, a full barn, a full storeroom, let all these things be on the distaff, let them pass onto the spindle. See how she spins, indeed see how she spins - while all are instructed, let them not fear the grammarians. She opened her hands to the poor, and stretched out her fruit to the needy. Her hands to the poor, her fruit to the needy. There is a certain poor person, seeking your hands. There is a certain needy person, seeking your fruit. He truly desires nothing from you except what benefits his need; he is the poor person seeking your hands. There is another needy person who says: As having nothing and yet possessing all things. Not seeking to be satisfied for his need by your gift, but as if on the Lord's tree, which He planted and watered, he seeks fruit. Listen to him saying to some when speaking of such: Not because I seek a gift, but I seek fruit. The Lord knows who are his. Her husband is not worried about the things in the house when he is away somewhere. Her husband is not worried about the things in the house because the Lord knows who are his. How would he be worried when those he predestined, he also called; those he called, he also justified; those he justified, he also glorified? If God is for us, who can be against us? Her husband is not worried: he knows his own, and his own know him. When he is away somewhere. Where does he delay, if not from where he is to come? He delays there, as if he tarries there. For many desire his coming now, and their desire is deferred until the number of the members of this matron is fulfilled. But many misuse his delay for their own impiety. And the wicked servant says: My lord delays. And he begins to beat his fellow servants and to eat and drink with the drunken. The lord of that servant will come on a day when he does not expect him and at an hour he does not know, and will cut him in pieces. For it is the body of ministers and overseers that gives food to fellow servants in due time. He will cut him in pieces, he says. He has good ones, he has bad ones, he separates the good from the bad. And he will appoint his portion with the hypocrites. Not the whole ministry, because there are those who also desire the coming of the Lord. There are also those from that number of whom it is said: Blessed is that servant whom his lord, when he comes, will find so doing. Therefore, he will come and cut him in pieces.

Now, in the meantime, he delays somewhere, but he is not concerned about what happens in the house. For all are clothed with her. Will he be concerned about the nakedness of his servants when he delays somewhere, having such a wife? They are clothed, and very well. How very well do you wish to know? As many of you as were baptized in Christ have put on Christ. All indeed are clothed with her. And both wicked servants and good servants are clothed. But good servants are clothed, who have put on Christ, not only in the form of the sacrament but also in the work of example, following the footsteps of their Lord. However, others only up to the sacrament, returning an account of their clothing. Yet that woman does not cease, that woman does not cease to clothe all, so that no one complains, no one says: “Therefore I have not done well, because I am not clothed." See then how you ought to be clothed. Let us also work for our clothing. For all are clothed with her.

Christ is God and man.

What about her husband? Does she, who clothes the servants, do nothing for her husband? She made double garments for her husband. She works. She made double garments for her husband. You already acclaim. I believe you recognize what the double garments are, which the Church makes for her husband Christ. The garments she makes for him are praises: praises of faith, praises of confession, praises of preaching. Why are these double for Christ? You praise God, you praise the man. Praise doubly, and praise simply: doubly, because he is both man and God; simply, so that you are not deceitful. I don't know which woman at some Photinus' house, a gem seemingly precious shaken from this woman's ornament, now cheap and cast out from which the Photinian heretics are named, chose to make this simple garment for her husband. He does not accept it, who, of course, from his wife, truly his, as we read written, takes double garments. For he indeed said Christ is only a man. Again, some other detestable woman appeared, as if she too were weaving a garment for her husband, but weaving tattered stories. For she says: "Christ is only God, having nothing of man whatsoever." Manicheans say this. Photinians say he is only a man, Manicheans say he is only God. They confess nothing divine in the Lord. These seemingly all divine, and yet so false that not even at least human. For if he was not a man, then he did not die, then he was not crucified, then neither was he resurrected. Because he could rise, who died. Therefore, to the doubting disciple, he showed false scars. For without a doubt those scars were false, if no true wounds preceded them. But if true wounds preceded, then true flesh. If true flesh, true death, true cross, true man, and entirely truth: abundant praise from this woman's weave. However, those who fearfully disregarded these praiseworthy double garments, remained doubly in falsehood. She made double garments for her husband. Certainly, she made double garments. We confess God, we confess man. Praise God in the man, man in God. She wove that most precious garment of praise: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. This was in the beginning with God. She also wove another garment, for daily interaction among men: The Word became flesh and dwelt among us. She made double garments for her husband.

Garments of fine linen and purple he made for himself, and garments for himself. For it was not fitting for the wife of such a man to go either naked or ragged. He made for himself garments of fine linen and purple. Of fine linen, pure confession; of purple, glorious suffering. This fine linen, when we pray, we recognize; this purple in the martyrs we praised this morning. The Son of Man will come in majesty. His husband becomes conspicuous at the gates. The one who stays away somewhere, the one who is not anxious about his house because of such a wife, the one whom no one sees while he is absent somewhere, becomes conspicuous at the gates. Pay attention to when. See what follows: When he sits in council with the elders of the land. Nothing is clearer.

Read another prophecy: He shall come to judgment with the elders of his people. In that council, that is, in that judgment, he will be conspicuous when the saints, with whom it was said, "You will sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel," are judging with him. For the Son of Man will come, as he said, in his majesty, and all the angels with him. There all the angels will be: both the angels of heaven and the angels who are heralds of the word of God. Indeed, even a prophet has been called an angel. For an angel is a messenger. And: "Behold, I send my angel before your face," was said of John. And: "You received me as an angel of God," says the Apostle. Therefore, the one now staying away somewhere, about whom many say, "When is he coming, or who is coming?" will be conspicuous at the gates, that is, in the open, manifested. He will be conspicuous at the gates. But he admits some, against others he closes. His husband will be conspicuous at the gates, when he sits in council with the elders of the land. Until that happens, let him do in the meantime what he was doing. Let him work, not cease. Let him await him who will be conspicuous at the gates, not trembling at the holy council of God's judgment. Let him come with a good conscience, come gloriously, because the members are his too and the sons are his too, who will judge with his husband.

Buy for yourself the living bread which has descended from heaven.

She made linen garments and sold them. Well, because she made linen garments. Why did she sell them? Unless it is because she does not seek to be given, but requires fruit. Understand this selling, brothers, essentially as for free. And does anyone buy for free? If he takes it for free, he does not buy it. If he buys it, he gives a price. If he gives a price, he does not take it for free. And where is: "Whoever is thirsty, go to the water, buy for yourselves without silver"? When you buy, you do not give silver, and yet you buy. If you buy, you give something, but you do not give silver, you give yourself. For represent linen garments as spiritual things – which this woman makes and preaches about through all lands. And perhaps it should be said to sell because the Apostle said: "If we have sown spiritual things for you, is it a great matter if we reap your carnal things?" For indeed there is this reason for giving and receiving. For in every sale the reason for giving and receiving is involved. But the Apostle is saddened against certain markets where he did not sell linen garments. He said, "No church shared with me in the matter of giving and receiving." But he who sells thus does not seek to be given, but requires fruit, lest you think of him as a seller of the Gospel. He is indeed a merchant of his Lord, but he seeks a greater price. For he definitely sells, gives spiritual things. And what does he seek? Perhaps carnal things? They are indeed owed too, but the Apostle was not seeking them, saying: "For I seek not yours, but you yourselves." Therefore give the price, give yourselves. For did not Joseph in Egypt sell grain, and yet made those buying, the king's servants? Wanting to live in that famine, they took grain and wept as servants. Do we fear to become servants? Alas for us, if we are not his servants. What benefit is it to us to refuse such a Lord? And we will be under the devil, and we will suffer famine, and we will not escape the power of the true Lord. Give yourself, and buy yourself a linen garment, that is, a spiritual covering. Just as you yourself are the price of a certain bread. For what? Because you give yourself to pleasure, do you not give yourself as a price for the lust of the flesh, as if to buy a prostitute? How much better is it to give yourself to God, to buy yourself the living bread that came down from heaven, at the same price which you yourself are? For the price of a prostitute is as much as the bread of one. She made linen garments and sold them.

Girdles for the Canaanites. He made girdles for the Canaanites. Let them gird themselves, let them work, let them come, let them be servants of this house, so that all may be clothed, all may be fed. For he made girdles, certainly for work, for she herself, making work, girded her loins strongly. Who are the Canaanites? Neighboring foreign nations to the people of Israel. Sometimes you who were far off have been made near by the blood of Christ. You who were once strangers to the Covenants, and having no hope of the promise, and without God in this world, now you are citizens of the saints and household members of God. Having received girdles, work in the Lord's house, now made household members of God from Canaanites, whence was that woman just now recited in the Gospel. She was a Canaanite, did not dare to approach the children's table, but like a dog was seeking crumbs. See how she girded herself for work. Her girdle, faith. He praises this: O woman, great is your faith!

Let us see the rest. She is clothed with strength and dignity. With dignity, like fine linen; with strength, like purple. For because she is strong, therefore in the bloody passion. And she rejoiced in the last days. She rejoiced in the last days; therefore, here long troubled. For how would she have purple garments without tribulation?

Let us not disturb or confuse what God has ordained.

He opened his mouth attentively. May the Lord grant us, placed in that moment, praising her, adhering to her, waiting with her and in her for her husband, so that we too may open our mouths attentively. Not rashly, but attentively, cautiously, carefully. With much fear and trembling I was among you, said the Apostle. As if saying: "I opened my mouth attentively": Our mouth is open to you, O Corinthians. He opened his mouth attentively. And he set the order of his tongue, praising the creature as a creature, the Creator as the Creator, the angels as angels, heavenly things as heavenly things, earthly things as earthly things, men as men, beasts as beasts. Nothing disturbed, nothing disorderly. Not taking the name of the Lord his God in vain, not perceiving the substance of the creature as the Creator, speaking everything in such order that he does not place lower things before higher things, nor subject higher things to lower things. He arranged the order of his tongue. Nothing is more beautiful than this order. Hence she herself also says: "Establish charity in me in an orderly manner. Do not act preposterously, do not disturb and confuse what God has ordered. Establish charity in me in an orderly manner. Love me as me, love God as God, lest you offend God for my sake, nor offend me for the sake of anyone else but me. Establish charity in me in an orderly manner." Blessed is his daughter established in this order, whose passion we celebrate among others today and whose confession we heard a little before, arranging her tongue: Honor, she says, to Caesar as Caesar, but fear to God. Therefore, he opened his mouth attentively, and he set the order of his tongue. The conversations of his houses are severe. Severe, strong, strict. There is no place where it can be dissipated, it does not love dissolution. However, he does not eat sluggish foods. Rightly he has acquired so much.

Thus, this diligent, vigilant, solicitous woman, harshly chastising her household, rising in the night, watching the lamp so that it does not go out, strong in tribulation, patient without having received the promises, strengthening her arms in the spindle, not eating the bread of idleness, but after these labors as if in poverty and secular necessity, what will she be because in the last days she rejoiced? What will it be, do you want to hear? Hear why our lamp burns all night for this hope. Now listen. Her sons have risen and are enriched. Now we live in poverty, we stay awake in poverty. And when we die, we sleep in poverty. But we will rise and be enriched. Then her sons will be enriched. Her sons have risen and are enriched. Compare now any riches of this earth, subject to thieves, moths. Why do you boast? Because you are weak, therefore you need many things. You need to be clothed abundantly, because you cannot endure the cold; you use beasts of burden, because you cannot walk on foot. These are supports of weakness, not ornaments of power. What are those riches of angels? They have one garment of light. It never wears out, it is never soiled. Those are true riches, where there will be no want, no need. Why do you seek this now, before you rise? If you are this woman's son, heed when riches are promised to you. Her sons have risen, and are enriched. Prepare yourself to receive the riches of the resurrection. Do not love these, so that you may deserve to come to those. Her sons have risen, and are enriched. And her husband praised her. We praise her, but not from our own. Her husband himself praised her. When her children arose and were ennobled, he attended to her, and looked upon her and praised her. Who would not wish to hear how he praised her? If you listened so joyfully when she was praised by us, how would we listen if we could hear as her husband praised her? He praised her in the resurrection. When we have risen, we will hear. Or did he not even now remain silent about that praise? Here is the very praise itself, she follows it. Let us hear so that you may live in it, and with her let us hear how her husband praised her, seeing her now with such happiness of the children, enriched in the resurrection of the dead.

Evil daughters are heresies, yet daughters.

Many daughters, he says, have done valiantly. These are the praises by which her husband praises her. Many daughters have done valiantly. Which daughters, to whom is she being compared? She is not being compared. Many daughters have done valiantly. But you have surpassed them. Pay attention, I beg you: we are now at the end of the reading. For I fear that I may find you weary at the very point where I most need your attention. Let us hear her praises. Many daughters have done valiantly. But you have surpassed them and outstripped them all. You, he says, have surpassed them all; you have outstripped them all. Who then are the other daughters who have done valiantly and whom this woman has surpassed, over whom she has outstripped? Or what valor have they shown, or how has this woman surpassed them? For there are indeed evil daughters, that is, heresies. Why daughters? Because they too are born from her. But they are evil daughters, daughters not by similarity of morals, but by similarity of sacraments. They also have our sacraments, they have our Scriptures, they have our Amen and Alleluia; many have our Creed, many have our baptism. Therefore, daughters. But do you want to know what is said about this woman elsewhere in the Song of Songs? Like a lily among thorns, so is my beloved among the daughters. A wonderous saying, he called them both thorns and daughters. And do those thorns perform valiantly? They certainly do. Don't you see how even heresies pray, fast, give alms, and praise Christ? I might say there are false prophets among them, about whom it is said: They perform great signs and wonders, so as to deceive, if possible, even the elect. Behold, I have warned you. Thorns also perform valiantly. Of what valor is it said: Did we not eat and drink in your name, and perform many miracles? We ate and drank—but not just any food. You know what food he could mean, or drink. And we performed many miracles. Many daughters perform valiantly, we do not deny. And thorns have flowers, but they do not have fruit. But this woman, to whom is said: But you have surpassed them and outstripped them all, how has she surpassed, if not because she has not only flowers but also fruit? The works of the flesh and the fruits of the spirit are listed.

What fruit has it? From where did it prevail? Tell me. I show you, he says, a more excellent way. What more excellent way? Because it prevailed from there, it placed these things above all from there. If I speak in tongues of men and of angels, but do not have love, I am a sounding brass or a clanging cymbal. He speaks in tongues: it pertains to the power of the flower. If I understand all mysteries and all knowledge, and have all prophecy and all faith, so as to move mountains - how great a power! - but do not have love, I am nothing. Hear still other powers, pertaining to the flower, not to the fruit: If I give all my possessions to the poor, and surrender my body, so that I may burn, but do not have love, it profits me nothing. This is the more excellent way from which it is said to her: Many daughters have done powerful things. Many have spoken in tongues, understood all mysteries, performed many virtues, cast out demons, distributed their goods to the poor, surrendered their bodies to the fire. They are below you because they did not have love. But you have surpassed and placed above all, not only heavy with flower, but abundant in fruit too. See the very cluster, from where it starts. When he enumerated the works of the flesh: Fornications, he says, impurities, luxuries, servitude to idols, witchcraft, enmities, strifes, jealousies, animosities, dissensions, heresies, envies, drunkenness, revelries, and things like these, which I warn you, as I have warned before, that those who do such things will not inherit the kingdom of God. Having enumerated all the thorns to be thrown into the fire: But the fruit of the spirit is, he says, love. And from this beginning, as from this root, the rest are connected: Joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faith, meekness, self-control. Where is this beautiful cluster from? Because it hangs from love. Many daughters have done powerful things. But you surpassed and placed above all.

Blessed is he who works wisely on earth. In them, what remains? The graces are false, and the appearance of the woman is vain. Why are the graces false and the appearance vain? Because if I do not have love, I have become a sounding brass and a clanging cymbal, I am nothing, it profits me nothing. Therefore, the graces are false and the appearance of the woman is vain. For the wise woman will be blessed. The one who sought to understand, who kept wisdom, that one is wise, that one will be blessed, not those false appearances, not that vain grace. The wise woman will be blessed. She herself will praise the fear of the Lord. She who will be blessed, will praise something for which she will be blessed, because she is wise. What will she praise? The fear of the Lord, through which she was led to wisdom. For the beginning of wisdom is the fear of the Lord. She herself will praise the fear of the Lord. Toilsome through so many nights, patient among so many trials, provident in watching, strong in enduring, constant in persevering, with labors finished: Give her of the fruit of her hands. She has done, she has done. She is worthy to receive. Give her of the fruit of her hands. What give? Come, blessed of my Father. Give her of the fruit of her hands. What give? Receive the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. Behold what give. From what fruits of her hands? For I was hungry, and you gave me to eat. Give her of the fruit of her hands. When our labors are finished, we will have time to praise God in heaven. And what will be their duty then, after their labors are ended? And her husband is praised in the gates. He himself will be the haven of our labors, to see God and to praise God. There it will not be said: "Arise, work, clothe the servants, and dress yourself with purple, give food to the household, ensure the lamp does not go out, be diligent, rise in the nights, open your hand to the poor, spin from the distaff to the spindle." There will be no works of necessity where there is no need. There will be no works of mercy where there is no misery. You do not break bread for the poor where no one begs. You do not take in a stranger where all live in their own country. You do not visit the sick where all are perpetually healthy. You do not clothe the naked where all are clothed with eternal light. You do not bury the dead where all live without end. Yet, spending no time on these things, you will not be idle. For you will see whom you desired, and you will praise without ceasing. This shall be your reward. Then there will be the one thing you asked for: I have asked one thing from the Lord, this I will seek: that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life. And what will you do there? To gaze upon the beauty of the Lord. And her husband is praised in the gates. Blessed are they who dwell in your house, they will praise you forever and ever.

Sermons - Sermon 370

SERMO 370 ON THE NATIVITY OF THE LORD Four types of human birth.

Today's day for holding the hope of eternal life has brought great joy to the human race. For the first man, through whose fall we all fell, whose ruin is our mortality, was not born but made; with no father, no mother, but by God's working. This is the first condition of man. Adam from the earth. The second condition of man, in which the woman is created from the side of man. The third condition of man, in which a man is born from a man and a woman. The fourth condition is of God and man, in which Christ was born without a man from a woman. Among these four conditions only one is familiar to us, the other three are not in the eyes of the flesh, but in the faith of the heart. We do not know a man made from the earth without father, without mother; we do not know the woman made from the side of a man, we have read and heard and believed. The third is familiar to us, itself daily; from the union of man and woman men are born daily. Now then there was one without man and woman, there was another from man without woman, there was a third from man and woman, the fourth remained without man from woman. But this fourth liberated the three. For the first and second fell, the third was born from their fall, in the fourth they found salvation.

Every rank of the faithful testifies that the Savior was born for all men.

Let virgins exult, therefore; a virgin bore Christ. Let them not think anything of what they vowed has been destroyed: she remained a virgin after childbirth. Let widows exult; the widow Anna recognized the infant Christ. Let married women exult; Elizabeth, who was married, prophesied about the Lord Jesus Christ who would be born. No state of life was omitted, from which the salvation of all did not have testimony. For is it that only virgins reach the kingdom of heaven? Widows reach it too. The holy widow Anna was of great merit. For she had lived with her husband from her virginity for seven years; and when he died, she reached old age, and in her holy old age she awaited the infancy of the Savior; so that the aged would see the child, the old woman would recognize the child, the Savior entering the world she would see as she was departing. And in the male sex, the same three states are commended. Christ Himself was born as a child; let children exult, vowing continence at a young age. He indeed consecrated the integrity of chastity, who granted fertility to His mother, but did not take away her virginity. That old man Simeon had lived a long time, his age compared to Anna's; and he had received the response that he would not see death until he had first seen the Christ of the Lord. The longing for the birth of Christ among the ancient saints. Simeon.

Understand, brothers, how much desire the ancient saints had to see Christ. They knew He was to come, and all who lived piously said: "Oh, if that birth may find me here! Oh, if I may see with my own eyes what I believe in the Scriptures of God!" And to know how great a desire the saints had, who knew from the holy Scriptures that a virgin would give birth, as you have heard when Isaiah was read: "Behold, a virgin shall conceive and bear a son, and his name shall be called Emmanuel." The Gospel has revealed to us what Emmanuel means, saying: which translates as:

God with us. Therefore, it should not be a wonder to you, whatever unbelieving soul you are, nor should it seem impossible for a virgin to give birth, remaining a virgin giving birth. Understand God born, and you will not marvel at a virgin's childbirth. So that you may know that the ancient saints and just men desired to see what was granted to this old man Simeon; our Lord Jesus Christ, speaking to His disciples, said: "Many righteous men and prophets desired to see what you see, but did not see it; and to hear what you hear, but did not hear it." This old man was late in hearing but ripe in seeing. He did not wait to hear Christ speaking, for he recognized the infant. And this was granted to him in old age, as though he desired and sighed daily in his prayers, saying: "When will He come? When will He be born? When will I see Him? Do you think I will endure? Do you think He will find me here? Do you think these eyes of mine will see, through whom the eyes of my heart will be revealed?" He said these things in his prayers, and for his desire, he received the answer that he would not taste death before seeing the Christ of the Lord. Mary, His mother, was carrying the infant: he saw Him and recognized Him. How did he know whom he recognized? Was He revealed inside, who was born outside? He saw and recognized. Simeon recognized the silent infant; and the Jews killed the young man performing miracles. When he recognized Him, he took Him in his arms, that is, in his arms, he embraced Him. He carried Him who carried him. For He is Christ, the wisdom of God, reaching from end to end mightily, and disposing all things sweetly. How great was He there, and how great, how small He became? Small He became, seeking small ones. What does it mean, seeking small ones? Not the proud, not the haughty; but He collected the humble and meek. He deigned to be placed in a manger, to be the food of devout animals. Thus Simeon took Him in his arms and said: "Now you dismiss your servant, Lord, in peace. You dismiss in peace because I see peace. Why then do you dismiss in peace? Because my eyes have seen your salvation." The salvation of God, the Lord Jesus Christ. Announce his salvation day by day.

Boys and old men and the married testify to Christ.

You have therefore, children, the child Jesus; the holy old men, the old man Simeon. If, however, you seek for a married man to bear witness to the Lord, consider Zachariah. Therefore, let no one seek something else, my brothers, faithful Christians, whether virgin or widow or married or child or continent or husband: whatever more anyone wants to be, they will not find how it pertains to Christ. We do not find that adulterers, fornicators, or the impure bore witness to Christ. And so that such as these may bear witness to Him, He Himself provided, He Himself granted. For no one is holy by their own strength. Let us rejoice, therefore, dearest ones. From today, the days increase. Believe in Christ, and the day grows in you. Have you believed? The day has begun. Have you been baptized? Christ is born in your heart. But does Christ remain just as He was born? He grew, He reached youth: but He did not decline into old age. Therefore, let your faith also grow, let it find strength, let it know no old age. Thus you will belong to Christ the Son of God, the Word at the beginning with God, the Word God; but the Word made flesh, to dwell among us. Majesty lay hidden there, where weakness appeared. In his hands, Simeon received the weakness, but he recognized the majesty within. Let no one scorn the born, if they wish to be reborn. It pertained to Him to be born for our sake; it pertains to us to be reborn in Him: who lives and reigns for ever and ever. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 371

SERMO 371 ON THE BIRTH OF THE LORD The two nativities of Christ.

Today a Savior is born to us; and therefore today the true sun has arisen for the entire world. God was made man, so that man might become God: and that a servant might be turned into a lord, the Lord took on the form of a servant. The inhabitant of the heavens lived on earth, so that the man who lives on earth might dwell in the heavens. Therefore, a Savior is born to us, having suffered the day of birth from a repudiated Law conceived: yet born from the Father always, from the mother once. Indeed, we have received two births of our Lord Jesus Christ: first the divine, then the human; but clearly both are marvelous: in that one, the duties of the mother ceased, in this one, those of the father: one eternal, to create temporals; the other temporal, to grant eternals. He therefore in the form of God is equal to the Father, he in the form of a servant is subject to the Father. He, the creator of times, was born in time: and became so small as to be suckled by a woman; but remained so great indeed that he was not separated from the Father. Therefore, these births of the Lord are testified by the two beginnings of the evangelists as well. For one speaks thus of the divine birth: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God: this was with God in the beginning. All things were made through him, and without him was made nothing. Of this human birth, another evangelist reports thus: The book of the generation of Jesus Christ, the son of David. Therefore, this is the nativity of the Lord, this is the day of the second birth: let us exult and rejoice in it. Nor without reason, with the day now lengthened, does light increase today; since on this very day true light has come to mankind: so that rightly the day increases its sunlight path, by which he brought us Him, through whom we would be freed from the darkness of death. Therefore, the Prophets, announcing him, like lanterns, preceded the day of his rising, and published with the brightest proclamations the miracles he would perform in the flesh. For it was fitting that he be proclaimed as coming, lest when he came, he would be doubted. Therefore, this is our God, conversing as a man among men. For he appeared to those seeing as a man, to those understanding as God: offering to those beholding a man, preserving to those believing a God. Therefore, the sight of his infirmity saved the weak; the contemplation of his divinity seeks the strong.

Humanity willed to be born, so that we might be born in him.

I beseech you, beloved, consider how great this mystery of truth is. To save mankind, He had given the Law, sent the Prophets: and because these remedies had preceded for healing of illnesses, God willed to offer Himself to the salvation of men. Moreover, men could not see God Himself in His substance: but men ought not to place their hope only in man. What then should be done here? They ought not to follow man, man who was to be followed could not be seen: God who was to be followed could not be seen. Therefore, to be displayed to man, and to be seen by man and to be followed by man, God became man. Finally, when He was already among men, and having brought three apostles into secret, He stood shining brightly with the clarity of divine worship: which the apostles who were present could scarcely behold due to the weakness of human condition. He willed to be born humanly, so that we might be born in Him, and might establish the sacraments of renewed birth for His future worshippers: so that we who were held bound by that birth, accompanying the footsteps of our Savior, might attain with certain protection of a second birth; whereby being born in God and from God, we might break the chains of ancient death, when we received the Holy Spirit as the pledge of salvation. Therefore when God desired to appear to men, and also wished to teach in person those things which He had previously commanded, He moderated His divine power by assuming human nature, and made darkness His hiding place around Him, when He covered Himself with the tabernacle of flesh. By such a great and ineffable sacrament, Christ our God is considered both man and God; man through the mother, God through the Father. Thus it comes to be true, that which He said: "The Father is greater than I"; and: "I and the Father are one." For He is equal to the Father in divinity, subordinated to the Father in incarnation.

God and man could be mixed. The mingling of soul and body is more difficult.

Some, however, are accustomed to ask how man and God could be mixed. They seek the reason for this mystery, which happened once: since they cannot in any way provide a reason for what always happens, that is, how the soul is mixed with the body, so that man may exist. Therefore, just as a corporeal thing and an incorporeal thing are joined to make a man: so man was joined to God, and Christ was made. And yet, for Christ to be made, those two incorporeal things, that is, the soul and God, could more easily be joined and mixed, than one incorporeal thing with another corporeal thing, that is, the soul and the body, to constitute the person of a man. But if God, the creator of heaven and earth, when he was God, became man, and humbled Himself even to death, death on the cross, how much more should earth and ashes not be proud? See, brothers, how much God humbled Himself for the sake of men. How much the servant ought to humble himself, when the Lord has descended to such great humility? This humility, dearest ones, if fully possessed by men, will even advance to love. For while one considers another superior, love creates equality. Therefore, man should not despise himself, for whom indeed God deigned to undergo these things. The dignity of man arises from God's condescension towards him. And I indeed, brothers, for whom I desire to expend and be expended, although I have always held you great in my conscience; yet this matter somehow makes you greater, when I consider how great is the condescension of my Lord for man. You are indeed the price of the Lord's incarnation, you are the price of the Lord's blood, you are members of Christ, to you Christ is the head: for you he did not hesitate to be born, for you to suffer all things; he even bore the cross itself for this, that he might join you to himself in his family. You are called brothers of Christ, you are called heirs of Christ. Therefore, beloved, let each one consider himself worthy, before whom he should not sin; let him consider himself worthy, before whom if he thinks of sin, he should blush. For you were bought with a great price: glorify and bear God in your body. He was born for you, he was offered for you; he also, if you act worthily, dwells in you. Let us act, meditating on the law of the Lord day and night, so that we may deserve to comprehend him, to see him. Let us act, so that because God deigned to descend for men, man may be able to ascend to God.

Sermons - Sermon 372

SERMO 372 On the birth of the Lord The birth of Christ is twofold. Your faith knows, beloved, which has gathered this entire multitude, that a Savior is born to us today. He was born always of the Father, once of the mother: of the Father without sex, of the mother without common experience. With the Father, indeed, the womb of the conceiver was absent: with the mother, the embrace of the begetter was absent. The first birth from the Father preserved nature: the second birth from the mother sowed grace. The former held the majesty of the divine substance; the latter accepted the companionship of human mortality. And in this, He deigned to come so that He might become obedient unto death, and by dying, conquer death. Each birth is ineffable, each is wonderful. For what human heart can comprehend, or what tongue can explain, how Christ is always born from God, or how He was recently from the womb? Who can understand the coeternal Father with the Son, who can express the virgin mother? Him begetting without beginning, without end; her conceiving without lust, giving birth without corruption? Each birth is wondrous, because it is divine. Therefore, whether the human mind considers the one or the other, it rightly says: Who shall declare His generation? And what shall we do, brothers? Since we are not able to speak worthily, should we remain silent? Far be it from us, far be it that the tongue of the servant should remain silent when it is the Lord's Nativity. Therefore, let us say what we can, what we read. The wedding feast of Christ.

Blessed David, speaking about Christ, says in the Psalms: He has placed his tabernacle in the sun, and he like a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, rejoiced as a giant. For today he has come forth from the sacred chamber, that is, from the hidden and incorrupt secret of the womb of blessed virgins. He came forth thence as the son of a virgin, the bridegroom of a virgin: namely, the son of Mary, the bridegroom of the Church. For the Apostle was speaking to the whole Church when he said: I have betrothed you to one husband, to present you as a chaste virgin to Christ.

Bridegroom and giant. To such a marriage of Christ, the Father of the groom first invited the people of the Jews. But what does the Gospel say? Those who were invited were not worthy. Afterward, the multitude of all the Gentiles was invited; it filled the Church and received from the Lord's table not cheap meals or ignoble drinks, but it tasted the flesh and blood of the very Shepherd, the very Christ who was slain. The innocent lamb himself was slain for his wedding, slain for his wedding; and whomever he invited, he fed with his flesh. He prepared the feast by being slain: by rising, he celebrated the wedding. Slain, he endured voluntary suffering: by rising, he took his appointed bride. In the womb of the virgin, he received human flesh as a pledge: on the cross, he poured out his most precious dowry, his blood: in his resurrection and ascension, he strengthened the bonds of eternal marriage. For he ascended on high, led captivity captive, and gave gifts to men. What gifts? The Holy Spirit, through whom love spread in human minds, the Church adhered inseparably to Christ as her husband. Therefore, today he proceeded as a bridegroom from his sacred chamber, and as the Psalm says: He rejoiced as a giant to run his course. He proceeded as a bridegroom, rejoiced as a giant. Beautiful and strong: beautiful, as a bridegroom; strong, as a giant. Beautiful, to be loved; strong, to be feared: beautiful, to be pleasing; strong, to conquer. Where is the beauty of this bridegroom found in the Holy Scriptures? Fairer in form than the children of men: grace is poured upon thy lips. Where is the strength of the giant found? The Lord, strong and mighty, the Lord mighty in battle. Both beauty and strength were seen and understood by Isaiah when he said: Who is this that comes from Edom, with garments dyed red from Bozrah, so splendid in his apparel, marching in the greatness of his strength? Therefore, this prophet, who called him both beautiful and strong, knew him as both bridegroom and giant. The life of man is a river. Christ the savior.

Therefore, beloved, He rejoiced as a giant to run His course. What course, if not the mortal path which He deemed worthy to share with us? That is the path through which humankind passes. For they pass through it by being born and by dying. And this river of the human race flows perpetually from the hidden veins of nature from the beginning to the end. From this rapid and turbulent river Christ deigned to drink. You have just heard in the psalm: "He drinks from the torrent in the way." This torrent led us to birth, and led us to death. As from a hidden spring, Christ received the abyss of the sea. For us, He was both born and died. And because men, positioned in the middle of this river, often delight in the flatteries and allurements of the world, which are involved in the silt of this torrent, and they are submerged into the depths of hell, who, eagerly drinking the passing waves, are thus killed by trying to stand in the precipitous torrent and seeking firm steps in its republic: thus the Lord drank from the torrent in the way. What does it mean, "He drank in the way"? He drank while passing through. For He drank and passed through, He did not remain: nor did He stand in the way of sinners. Again, men fear death; because it is necessary for all to be hurled by the force of this torrent: but Christ could not fear the death He voluntarily accepted; thus it is said: "And He rejoiced as a giant to run His course." For He descended and ran: ascended and sat. You know this because you confess it frequently: after He rose again, He ascended into heaven, and sits at the right hand of the Father. Blessed Ambrose very briefly and beautifully sang of our giant's journey in the hymn you sang a little earlier. Speaking of the Lord Christ, he thus said: "His going forth from the Father, His return to the Father: His journey down to the infernos, His return to the seat of God." If we ask why all these things were done, dearest ones, we will find they were done for us. For He descended, so that we might ascend; died, so that we might live; rose again, so that we might rise again; ascended into heaven, so that we might learn to despise worldly things and to lift our hearts upward. Finally, to raise our hope after Him, He first raised His flesh: and so that we might hope this would follow in us, what He received from us preceded in Him.

Sermons - Sermon 373

SERMO 373 On the Epiphany of the Lord Christ more manifest. The solemnity we celebrate today, due to the manifestation of the Lord, has received the Greek name Epiphany. Indeed, on this very day, with the Magi worshiping as the first fruits of the Gentiles, He is commended as manifested, who is also said to have been born a few days ago. That cornerstone, which like two walls, namely of the circumcision and the uncircumcision, that is of the Jews and the Gentiles, coming from different directions, united them in His unity, and He became our peace, who made both one; so that it was announced to the shepherds of the Jews, the Angels came from heaven; and so that He might be adored by the Magi of the Gentiles, a star shone brightly from heaven. Whether through Angels or through the star, the heavens declared the glory of God: so that in the grace of Him who was born, the Apostles might also declare it, carrying the Lord like the heavens, and their sound went forth into all the earth, and their words to the ends of the world. Because these have also come to us, we believe, for which reason we also speak.

Many, therefore, are the things to be considered, brothers, in this gospel reading which we have heard. The Magi come from the East, seeking the king of the Jews, who so many kings of the Jews have never sought before. Yet they seek not a man of mature age or an old man, visible to human eyes seated on a high throne, powerful with armies, terrifying with weapons, shining in purple, gleaming with a diadem [or exulting on a cross, on which he would redeem all confessing martyrs, or rising from the dead, or ascending into heaven]; but a newborn, lying in a manger, clinging to the breasts, with no adornment of body, with no strength in his limbs, with no wealth of his parents, excelling neither in his age nor in the power of his own. And they seek the king of the Jews, from the king of the Jews; from Herod [a man], [seek] Christ [God and man; from an earthly king, a man, the king of heaven who had created man]: from the great, the little one, from the renowned, the hidden, from the exalted, the humble, from the speaking, the infant, from the wealthy, the poor, from the strong, the weak; and yet [although persecuted by Herod, Christ who ruled over himself and others], from the despiser, the one to be adored: surely in whom no royal pomp appeared, but true majesty was worshipped.

Innocent children granted the crown of martyrs.

Finally, Herod is afraid: the Magi desire. They wish to find the King, he fears ending his rule. Both ultimately seek: they, through whom they might live; he, whom he wants to kill: he, in committing a great sin; they, who forgives all sins. Herod indeed kills many infants, while he wishes to reach the death of one. And when he performed the most savage and bloody slaughter among so many innocents; he first killed himself with such iniquity. Meanwhile our King [Christ], the Word [of God] as an infant [God], with the Magi worshipping him, little ones dying for him, whether he was lying down, or nursing; and not yet speaking, he found believers; and not yet suffering, he also made martyrs. O blessed little ones, born just now, never tempted, not yet struggled, already crowned! In the passion for Christ, he who also does not believe that Baptism benefits little ones of Christ, might waver from your crown. Indeed, you did not have the age to believe in Christ about to suffer:

but you had the flesh, in which you would endure suffering for Christ about to suffer. In no way would the grace of the infant Savior desert these infants, who came to seek what had perished, not only by being born in the flesh, but also by hanging on the cross [descending to hell, ascending to heaven, and sitting at the right hand of the Father]. For he who could have angel preachers at birth, skies as narrators, Magi as worshippers, could also grant that they should not perish here dying for him, if he knew they would perish by that death, and not rather live with greater happiness. Far be it, far be it, that Christ coming to free men, did nothing for the reward of those who would be killed for him, who prayed for them suspended on the wood by those who killed him. The Jews are very much like milestone stones.

What shall I say about the misfortune of the Jews, who, when the Magi sought Christ, even brought forth the prophetic sign, pointed out the city Bethlehem [which they themselves did not find]? They are like the builders of Noah's Ark, who provided a way of escape for others but perished in the flood themselves; like milestone markers, they showed the way, but could not walk it [because they remained foolish on the path]. It was asked of them where Christ would be born; they answered: In Bethlehem of Judea. For thus it is written by the prophet: And you, Bethlehem, land of Judah, are not the least among the princes of Judah. For out of you shall come forth a ruler who will shepherd my people Israel. The seekers heard and went; the teachers spoke and stayed: separated by contrary affections, some became worshippers, others persecutors. Even now the Jews do not cease to present a similar pattern to us. For some pagans, wishing to know Christ as prophesied beforehand, when we bring forth clear testimonies from the Scriptures, suspect that they might have been fabricated by Christians, and prefer to believe the books of the Jews: and just as the Magi did then, they dismiss them to read aimlessly, while they proceed to worship faithfully. A spiritual spectacle in this feast.

Let us therefore celebrate, rejoicing in the Lord, the feast day of the Lord; not only the day He was born of the Jews but also the day He was revealed to the Gentiles. It is pleasant to gaze at everything and, brought together into one view, discern with the mind the spiritual spectacle. Christ is born: a virgin conceives, a virgin gives birth, a virgin nourishes; fertility is present, and integrity is not absent. Angels announce, shepherds glorify, the heavens declare, the Magi long for Him, kings fear Him, Jews indicate Him, Gentiles adore Him: persecutors are thwarted, infants are crowned, believers marvel. What is this humble exaltation, this strength of the weak, this greatness of the small? Certainly, the Word, by which all things were made, accomplished all these things. The Word which was far from us was made flesh, so that He might dwell among us. Let us therefore recognize in time Him by whom times were made: and celebrating His temporal feasts, let us long for eternal rewards.

Sermons - Sermon 374 augm

Sermon 374 Sermon of Saint Augustine delivered on Epiphany To see God, let us cleanse our hearts. The annual celebration of this day demands from us an annual sermon, which is due to your ears and hearts, and, if you listen devoutly, also due to your morals. For the fruit of our whole life is righteousness, the reward is eternal life, the beginning of righteousness is faith. For we were not called to what we already see, nor do we already possess what was promised. But because the promiser is true, we must first live in hope, that we may be worthy to live in reality: what God has promised, without doubt, He will give. But because what He is going to give is great, by delaying, He extends our desire so that He may make us capable of such a great gift. For He is not going to give perishable, changing, fragile goods that, when they abound, fill us with fears, and when they recede, fill us with sorrows. But He is going to give – what do you think? – something earthly? Far from it! Something heavenly, the like of which we see with the eyes of the body? Even that is cheap in comparison to the promised gift, for receiving which hearts are cleansed. For if God now gave you something that pertains to the present time, He would seek your eyes to see what He gives. But because He will give what the eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor has entered into the heart of man, as the Apostle says, what does He prepare to give you? Blessed, He says, are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. Therefore our whole reward will be to see God. Is it a small reward to see the one by whom you were made? Stretch out the lap of your desire as much as you like, be greedy in desiring what such a great one has promised: He cannot give you anything better than Himself. For whatever God has made is cheaper and inferior to its maker. An eternal reward is promised to the man created in the image of God. And where does the creation of God begin? With the angels. And where does the creation of God end? It extends to earthly mortals. Upward, the end of creation is, beyond which God is. Downward, the end of creation is, beyond which nothing is. Therefore begin to count the gifts you have received for now, not yet those to which you have been called. Begin. Behold the earthly goods: light, a certain nourishment of air without which we cannot exist at any time, then the fruits of the earth, springs, the very health of the body, and other such things that can be mentioned, which were to be briefly touched upon: they are God's gifts, they are divine favors. But do not covet these greatly from Him in whose image you were made. For you see that these are still common to you with the beasts, nor will you find the source of these things except from that true God, the creator and giver of all; however, because He even gives these, you should not be content with them: He reserves something for His image which He does not give to the beasts. Therefore let us seek what it is, and having recalled it, let us desire it, having desired it, let us expect it, and, that we may attain it, let us do what He who promised commands.

"If you love the reward of faith, do not flee from the toil of labor."

There, the reward; here, the work. The Promiser of the reward is also the giver of the command: He who predicts what you will receive, commands what you should do. If you love the reward of faith, do not shun the labor of the work. He will give: for God is truthful. Whoever promises and does not give fails to give for one of two reasons, either because he is a liar, or because he cannot. What can we say like this about God? Is the truth a liar? Is there anything the Almighty cannot do? Therefore, if He is both truthful and has the means to give, why would He deceive you? Lift up your mind, hope confidently: He who promised is powerful, eternal. Do you fear that, after you have worked, before you receive, your promiser might pass away? Therefore, let us rather see what is promised. Let us transcend these common goods shared with animals; let us see what unique quality man possesses beyond what animals have: to speak, to understand, to distinguish between true and false, just and unjust, and finally, the very One by whom he was made. The reward promised to us will not be given to the unjust.

It is a great work to seek what is a great reward to find. Therefore, man is distinguished from animals by speaking, indeed he is distinguished from animals by talking, from certain men by eloquence. This gift of eloquence is great, a great good, but even the wicked possess it. It is not shared with beasts, but it is shared with the wicked. Many have eloquence and are wicked, and they deceive many with that same eloquence and seek temporal power for themselves. All these are to be condemned, yet they are still men. Seek something from God that you may have in common not only with beasts, but not even with wicked men. If I spoke of eloquence, take this also concerning riches. For riches were given not to beasts, but to men. For it pertains to humans to rule, command, and govern. Yet many wicked men also possess riches: this earthly good is possessed by both the good and the wicked, and the good do not possess it while the wicked do not possess it. Seek something higher. Do you fear that, once you find something chosen that can be given neither to beasts nor to wicked men, the Almighty may not be able to give it to you, who has called you to do a work and receive a gift? "I have found something." What will you find? Wicked men also have intellect, wicked men also have memory, they have riches – as I said – and wicked men have honors and temporal power. What will you find? In the absence of the good by which you become good, you will not be able to use other goods well.

Oh if you would listen to me, seek nothing from God except God. To whomever this is granted, he is indeed made good. What separates the good from the evil cannot be common to both. For there is a difference between a good thing which allows you to do good, and a good thing which makes you good. All good things besides God are such that you can do good with them, but God is such a good that He makes you good. You have gold: it is good, but it is something with which you do good. You have eloquence: it is good, but it is something with which you work well. You have bodily health: use it well. For many have been corrected by infirmity and ruined by health. Many have fallen ill because of their good and recovered because of their malign. Therefore, even bodily health, which is a poor man's inheritance, unless it is turned to good use, is also harmful. Sharpened wit, a great good, but still such that both the good and the evil can use it well or poorly: it is not yet the good by which you become good. All the perversities of all errors, all sects of deviation and impiety have had great minds as authors. They were not created by just any people, but were established by sharp-witted individuals. For the ruin of the human race, all theatrical absurdities were not invented except by clever people. "All are enemies, certainly disgraceful." They are disgraceful, you say. So how can what is done disgracefully be viewed honorably? You confess this is disgraceful, and yet you support it so it can exist. I do not know whom to call worse: the seller of disgrace or the buyer. Yet these things were invented and established by the sharpest minds. Therefore wit is also good, but only if used well. Up until now I have mentioned those goods with which you do good, not those with which you become good. If that good by which you become good accompanies, you will use the other goods well. But if that good does not accompany by which you become good, how can you, being evil, use other goods well? What is the good by which you become good? God Himself.

"There is an inhabitant inside, he has his own eyes."

There is a certain thing that is seen by the mind. For the eyes do not have what they see, and the mind does not have. What is better: the body or the soul? I think that even lifeless bodies, if they could, would respond that the soul is better. But it does not wish to tell me that the soul is better than the body. So I ask: Who is better, the one who rules or the one who is ruled? Now here I think even beasts would not doubt to respond that the ruler is better. Who then rules? Certainly the soul, which is better than the body. If the soul becomes absent, the windows of the body, even if they are open, do not have someone to see through them. The eyes are open, the ears are open: if the inhabitant is absent, what use are the open doors? Therefore, the soul sees certain things through the eyes: light, colors, shapes; the soul hears certain things through the ears: voices and sounds; the soul smells certain things through the sense of smell: all odors; the soul tastes all flavors through the sense of taste; the soul feels through the entire body hard and soft, rough and smooth, cold and hot, light and heavy. The eye does not hear, nor does the ear see, yet the soul sees through the eye and hears through the ear. It cannot do both through both, but yet it alone can do what it can through both. Does the soul do nothing by itself? If it can do through the body, can it not do by itself? It sees white and black through the body, can it not by itself see just and unjust? And yet many are those who think that only these things that are seen through the body exist, doing an injury to their mind, ungrateful to God by whom they were made in His image. The inhabitant is inside, it has other eyes of its own.

Only the mind perceives the nature of justice.

If I wanted to show jewels, if I wanted to show gold and silver, crafted vessels, precious garments and whatever precious and beautiful things are counted among the riches of men, if finally I wanted to show the heavens, and not a coffered, but a starry chamber of the poor, what would I seek? Eyes. When I want to show what is just and unjust, what do I seek? To whom do I show it? But perhaps I do not have something to show. For some have thought that justice is not by nature, but established by opinion, that is, that this is just—or rather called just—because men wanted it to be by some pact of human society, and not by some nature of justice. Is it then not truly by nature that justice exists? We struggle to show—and yet we ought to know most clearly what we know through the mind alone—we struggle to show what the nature of justice is, and we do not struggle to show that gold exists, that earth exists, that the heavens exist. Do I need to struggle to show these things? Every man proclaims that what can be seen through the body exists, and many deny that what can be seen only through the mind exists.

"God cannot be shown by man; He shows Himself."

It is a wonder if this soul is not ailing, it is a wonder if it does not have its eyes wounded or even extinct! Whence shall they be restored? Whence shall they be healed? The door of medicine is faith. For in order to see what it does not see, it must first believe that there is something to see, but it must also recognize that it is not yet in a condition to see. "Perhaps I can: show me." But to whom shall I show? Indeed, I cannot either, but He can who also showed me, if I see anything from here. The physician comes to the sick man having wounded eyes, or perhaps already lost eyes - he has forgotten ever seeing, or perhaps has never seen since his birth - but yet there is such a great physician who can banish ancient blindness by cure: he promises to show something if the patient allows himself to be healed. But moreover, if the patient does not believe before he sees, how shall he be healed? "There is," he says, "something for you to see, but you shall see it when your eyes have been healed." And he replies, "I will not be healed unless I see." What an absurd and perverse response: to want to see first in order to be healed, when indeed if he could see, there would be no reason why he should be healed. Therefore, believe in the physician who will demonstrate, so that you do not resist the healer. "Show me," he says. What shall I show you? "God," he says. To whom? "To me," he says, "if you wish me to believe. For I do not believe unless I see." Whom do you seek to be shown, to whom do you seek to be shown, by whom do you seek to be shown? God must be shown, to man He must be shown, He cannot be shown by man: He shows Himself. I can admonish you what to do, so that you may merit to see. The soul moves the flesh, God moves the world.

"Absolutely not," he says, "there is no God." All are horrified. Who has said this: "There is no God"? And yet the psalm did not remain silent about this: The fool said in his heart, "There is no God." Because it is such a word that horrifies everyone, he said it in his heart, he did not entrust it to his tongue and voice. Nevertheless, I also seek something. "Show me," he says, "God." Brother, let us seek together. Even if I try to show and cannot—as indeed it probably requires time, effort, and certain teachings—nevertheless I also ask something. You say: "Show me God"; I say: Show me your soul. You ask me for the most lofty thing, I ask for the humble; you for the one who is absent, I for the one who is present; you for the sought, I for the seeker. Behold, if I say you do not have a soul, what would you do? For if we must believe only in the eyes, you do not have a soul; unless I see your soul, I will not believe it exists. You will say: "Indeed, a soul cannot be seen with the eyes, but it can be shown through works. You see a person walking, you hear a person speaking; you speak, I respond, and you doubt that I have a soul?" In the meantime, I have not seen your soul, but I have seen the works of your soul. If I recognize your soul through its works, recognize God through the works of God. There is a soul because it moves the flesh, and there is no God who moves the world? Does the order of things not terrify you: earthly things subjected to celestial, the alternation of night and day, the arrangement of seasons, the brightness of the sun that fills the clarity of the day, the moon and stars that temper the darkness of night, fruits emerging from the earth, flowing springs? The very animals that are born on earth are born with life: what is made lives, and He who makes does not live? Therefore there is a God, far be it that we doubt! But perhaps still one who doubts seeks, but let him seek in such a way that he first believes, so that by not believing he does not fail to deserve to find what he seeks.

"As God wanted Himself to be worshiped, He also wanted Himself to be written about."

Therefore, God is, and the question arises more about how He should be worshiped than whether He exists. What then? And hence we shall say something. I think it is easy for me to speak to Christians: God should be worshiped as He ordered Himself to be worshiped. For if a Christian asks me how God ordered Himself to be worshiped, I do not put forth my own word, but I recite the book to which, without a doubt, he is rightfully subject in his faith. For it is not permitted for him to doubt the divine writings: God also willed it to be written how He wished to be worshiped; what He willed to be written, He willed to be recited, and He placed such a peak and summit of authority on that Scripture that He placed beneath it all the authors of other books. For there were those who wrote what they wanted, as they wanted. Whose book is placed at such a peak of authority that the world responds to it with “amen”? When we deal with someone perhaps not subject to the great authority of those books and contending with me and saying: "Men wrote these things for themselves," what should I do? From where shall we prove that these writings are divine? The daily miracles of God have become commonplace through their frequent occurrence.

Apart from this administration of nature by which the world is governed, men have not been awe-struck by certain divine works except through wondrous deeds and sayings. Nature indeed is full of miracles, but all things to be wondered at have become common through constant occurrence. For instance, if one man who was among men rises from the dead, the divine work is proclaimed by all: every day many who were not are born, and no one marvels. Christ turned water into wine, a great miracle: what else does he do every year in the vine? Do you think it is a small thing to be wondered at, that moisture is drawn from the earth, turned into the quality of that wood, passes through the tendrils, unfolds into leaves, and even produces swelling clusters, increases immature grapes, and colors the ripe ones? Ask the root how all these things happen. What numbers, what measures, what art of working in such a small and contemptible appearance? I still wonder at the workmanship of the root, but the seed grain is even more to be marveled at. How small, how almost nothing, yet where all the numbers of the future root, strength, branches, fruits, leaves are contained, and the workmen numbers drawing sap, turning it into such a beautiful and delightful work. These are the astounding works of the Creator. You have not yet gone up to heaven to see him present, and already you find him creating on earth. These things require consideration. For is there anything more wondrous than such works? However, because they are daily occurrences, as I said, they have become common. Therefore God, wanting to quicken the minds of men, reserved for himself certain things not greater, but certainly rarer. For it is more to make a man than to raise one. But because now no one marvels at him making every day, he sometimes presented himself as raising the dead. He gave sight to the blind, hearing to the deaf, speech to the mute. He who does these things without a miracle in seeds, did them with a great miracle in men.

"Every miracle is either in deed or in word."

These things are written, these things are read. "But now," he says, "they do not happen, and I fear that these things were written by men and did not happen." We sometimes suffer such questioners; indeed, you ought not to be such but should be able to respond to such. I know that I speak almost superfluously to believers, but let me be like one persuading unbelievers so that you may be able to be instructed against unbelievers. Some men say, indeed now few, but not none: "These things were written, but they did not happen." How then shall I prove that they happened? Certainly every miracle is either in deed or in word. Marvelous deeds are those that occur beyond the usual course and order of nature; marvelous words are those by which future things are announced. Therefore, if you do not wish to believe in the marvelous deeds which are written to be read, at least believe in the marvelous words which are shown to be true by their very effect. For here he shows his faith who narrated to you the wonders of the past, when you see the present things which he foretold would come. Or perhaps divine prophecy is not divine, from which it even got its name, to which the curiosity of men is so given that many today do not want to be Christians because they want to allow themselves to consult soothsayers, astrologers, augurs, and - what else shall I say? - magicians? But the power of Christ also extinguishes the works of this art, which led the Magi from such a distant nation to worship him.

Through the revelation of the Magi, they were taught about the sign of the star.

They came to worship the child, the Word of God. Why did they come? Because they saw an unusual star. And how did they know it was Christ's? Indeed, they could see the star, but could it speak to them and say: "I am Christ's star"? Undoubtedly, it was indicated in some other way, through some revelation. However, a king was born unusually who was to be worshiped by foreigners as well. Were kings not born before in Judea or throughout the entire earth in different nations? Why was this one to be worshiped—and worshiped by foreigners—not by a terrifying army, but hidden in the poverty of flesh with the majesty of virtue? When he was born, he was worshiped by the Israelite shepherds to whom the angels had announced him. But the Magi were not from Israel: they worshiped idols or the gods of nations, that is, demons, deceived by their deceitful power. Therefore, they saw some unusual star, they marveled: without a doubt, they inquired whose sign it could be that they saw as so new and unusual, and surely they heard. But you say: "From whom did they hear?" Surely from the angels, through some admonition of revelation. You may perhaps ask: "From good angels or bad?" Indeed, even the evil angels, that is demons, confessed Christ as the Son of God. But why would they not have heard from the good ones, since their salvation was being sought in worshiping Christ, not condemnation of iniquity? Therefore, even the angels could have said to them: "The star you have seen is Christ's, go and worship him where he is born," and at the same time indicate what kind and how great the born one is. Having heard this, they came and worshiped. They offered gifts of gold, frankincense, and myrrh, according to their custom: for they were accustomed to offer such things to their gods. The magi adore Christ, the Jews show Him born but do not believe.

Before they could act, before they found him in the city where he had been born, they came asking where the king of the Jews was born. Could they not have known this by revelation, just as they knew that this star was the king of the Jews, worthy of worship even from foreigners? Could the same star not have led them to that city, just as it later led them to the place where Christ was with his mother as an infant? It could indeed have done so, but it was not done, so that this might be asked of the Jews. Why did God want this to be asked of the Jews? So that while they pointed out him in whom they did not believe, they might be condemned by their own demonstration. Note that this happens even now. The Magi, the first fruits of the Gentiles, freed from greater impiety, give greater glory to the one who freed them. They ask: Where is he who has been born king of the Jews? Herod, hearing of the king’s name, trembles with jealousy. He calls the experts in the law and asks them according to the Scriptures to tell him where Christ was to be born. They respond: In Bethlehem of Judea. The Magi set out and worship, while the Jews who pointed the way stay behind.

"We convict the unbelievers from the books of the Jews."

O great sacrament! Today we convince unbelievers from the books of the Jews to become believers; through their books, we show pagans what they do not want to believe. For sometimes pagans put this kind of question to us: when they see the things that are written being so fulfilled that they cannot deny at all that through the name of Christ all things are presented among all nations which are recited as having been foretold in the holy books—in the faith of kings, in the destruction of idols, in the transformation of human affairs—they are sometimes so moved that they say: "You saw these things happening and wrote them as if they had been predicted." A certain poet of theirs did this: those who have read recognize these things. He narrated that someone descended to the underworld and then came into the region of the blessed, and that certain future Roman leaders were shown to him, whom the writer himself already knew had been born. Indeed, he narrated past events but wrote them as if they were prophesied future ones. "Thus you," the pagans say to us, "saw all these things happening and wrote books for yourselves in which these things are read as if predicted future ones." O glory of our king! Deservedly the Jews were conquered by the Romans but not destroyed. All nations subjected by the Romans passed into Roman laws: this nation was both conquered and remained in its law; as far as the worship of God is concerned, it preserves its ancestral customs and rites. Even with their temple destroyed and their former priesthood extinguished, as foretold by the prophets, they still keep circumcision and a certain custom by which they are distinguished from other nations. For what other reason, except for a testimony of the truth? The Jews are scattered everywhere, carrying books in which Christ is foretold—and as he is foretold, he is presented—so that even pagans may be shown. I produce the book, read the prophet, show that the prophecy is fulfilled. The pagan doubts, lest I have invented this: my enemy has this book, anciently commended to him by his ancestors. From this, I convince both: the Jew, because I have recognized that what is prophesied there is fulfilled; the pagan, because I did not invent this.

Things which were once offered to God in sacrifices had to be changed.

Therefore, let not demons seduce the unwary and those improperly curious about temporal matters by the appearance of divination, nor let them, through their haughty pride, deceive and demand honor from the impious sacrifices offered to them. The true divine prophecies belong to the one true God. True sacrifice is owed to the one true God, whose figures were previously foreshadowed in incense and victims, so that, by divine providence announcing in many ways what was to come in one way, it might show how great it would be. For this too, among other things foretold for Christian times, was prophesied—that those things previously offered to God as sacrifices were to be entirely changed. "Why then," you ask, "were they commanded if they were to be changed?" O sick one, do not give advice to the physician on how you should be cured. One man, Adam, filled the world through his offspring. The human race, as it were, one great sick man lying from east to west, needs to be healed: a great sick man, but a greater physician. Let us therefore take an analogy from the very art of human medicine. The physician comes to the sick man and says: "Take this in the morning, but in the afternoon take that." And the sick man to the physician: "Why," he says, "not this in the afternoon just as in the morning?" Would not the physician rightly respond to him: "You can be sick, but you cannot cure yourself; allow the art to counsel your recovery"? "Then," says the sick man, "the art is inconstant, ordering one thing first and another later." "Rather be quiet and heal. The art is constant; it knows what to apply in the morning, what in the afternoon. The art has not changed, but your sickness is changeable. It knows what is expedient at any time, assisting mutable maladies according to the diversity of times." Thus, for the benefit of the human race, some things were profitable in earlier times, others in later times. Do you ask why? Be a friend of the physician, and perhaps you will understand, lest even today you think we ought not to go to sacrifice to God unless with a bull, with a ram, or with incense. Of the Old and New Testament.

"Show, someone says, that God commanded these things and predicted these changes, and I will believe, lest I think you speak these things from yourself, not from divine authority." So listen to the words of God, a few among many: "Behold, the days are coming," says the Lord. The prophet speaks. If you think this is fabricated by Christians, let a Jew bring forth the codex. How then can I bring forth something my ancient enemy carries? Therefore, let the codex be brought from the library of the Jews, and we shall read from it. What shall we read? "Behold, the days are coming," says the Lord, "and I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah." "But perhaps he says this about the testament the Jews received, and it is said to be new when our fathers received it through Moses on Mount Sinai, because it was not before in human kind." You suggested well, but wait: I require patience until I recite the rest. Listen about the New Testament: "Behold, the days are coming," says the Lord, "and I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah." I am not yet saying the rest. Who is speaking? Jeremiah. When did Jeremiah prophesy? Long after Moses through whom the first testament was given. If therefore Jeremiah, who says, "Behold, the days are coming," speaks of the future, and "I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah," there is no reason to say it signifies the testament given through Moses. Therefore, he speaks of another new testament. But still, listen to the rest: "Behold, the days are coming," says the Lord, "and I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah, not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers on the day I took their hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt." What could be clearer? For then the first testament was given through Moses, which is called old.

What the Magi offered to Christ were signs rather than gifts.

Behold, brothers, heed the divine words. We read what was foretold, we perceive what has been fulfilled, and still, do we doubt the divine authority of the books? Therefore, let no one say: "Behold, the Magi brought frankincense to Christ, why do we not also burn incense to Christ?" First observe that the Magi brought frankincense, they did not burn it. "But why did he accept this gift?" you ask. As if they would indeed forbid that anything created be offered to the Creator! God made frankincense—not demons—God made myrrh, God made gold. The Magi sin by giving these to demons and honoring them, using creation to injure the Creator. Nevertheless, today learn that they gave such things as they were accustomed to give to their gods. But Christ did not let them give these things in vain: rather, they were symbols than gifts. He received frankincense as God, gold as a king, myrrh as one destined to die for burial. At that time, not only frankincense was offered, but also the sacrifices of animals by both pagans and Jews, that is, by those who worshiped many false gods and by those who worshiped one true God. These, I say, were offered to God according to the Old Testament, but this changed with the New Testament. "Behold," he says, "the days are coming," says the Lord, "and I shall consummate a new covenant with the house of Israel and the house of Judah, not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers, on the day that I took their hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt."

"The sacrifice cleansing sins, the body of Christ."

"But, one may say, he did not speak about sacrifices." Do you then want to hear something about sacrifices? Because God predicted that all those sacrifices would be abolished and that a single sacrifice, truly cleansing sins, the body of Christ, would be given, the faithful know. And what I am saying, I know is not understood by all, but let those who understand rejoice and live worthily of such a great sacrament. But those who do not yet understand, it is in their power to change their life, to receive the sacrament of change, and to know what is offered by the faithful and what is received. For there is what was foretold: You are a priest forever according to the order of Melchizedek. For the first priesthood was according to the order of Aaron, but afterward it was said to our priest, and this by a prophet long before he came in the flesh: You are a priest forever according to the order of Melchizedek. Therefore, the order of Aaron was changed, and the order of Melchizedek came. According to the order of Aaron were the animal sacrifices, according to Melchizedek, the body of Christ. "You still have not said," someone says, "whether God predicted that those sacrifices would cease." Behold, I read to you, lest perhaps my memory fails me. For I, brothers, did not learn these writings from my youth, and, what is worse, I can recite other things from memory that are superfluous. But these things to which I did not apply myself from childhood, unless I look at the books, I cannot pronounce. Or perhaps it is more useful that you hear not from my mouth but from the divine book, what you should healthily know. Listen now and do not be surprised that now Christ is not approached with incense, since he established another sacrifice, of which all past things were shadows."

Through the things that have been made new, we understand the old.

Among many, the prophet Isaiah speaks, whose book I hold in my hands. What does Isaiah say? "Do not remember the former things or consider the things of old." Behold now, brothers, the abolishment of the old is clear. "But still," you say, "he has said nothing about sacrifices. Perhaps he has changed other things, but not these." Although it is general, "nor consider the things of old," and there I may understand from what later the apostolic doctrine taught me, what I should offer, what I should no longer offer—I have an expositor of this obscurity, I have a teacher telling me how to take this—however, even the prophet himself does not allow a man to guess as he pleases: for he speaks plainly what you will hear. Therefore listen: "Do not remember the former things or consider the things of old. For behold, I am doing a new thing; now it springs forth, do you not perceive it?" What is this: "For behold, I am doing a new thing; now it springs forth, do you not perceive it?" That is: I will do new things which were not, so that you might understand what has been. Animals were killed, blood was shed, and through blood God was appeased. Indeed, God is appeased by blood, and God desires blood, and God delights in the smoke of sacrifices, or seeks the smell of incense or other aromatics who creates all, who gives all to you? Perish the thought! He is fed by your devotion, and indeed that is useful to you, not to him whom you serve. Every human servant of a human master serves his master for the benefit of his master, and in turn, the master looks after his servant for the benefit of the servant. Not so with God. Whoever serves him, serves him for his own benefit, not for his. And do I perhaps say this on my own? Hear the prophet: "I said to the Lord." What? "You are my Lord." Why? "Because you do not need my good things," he says. You have an absolute sentence, there is no doubt: God does not need your good things. Therefore do not believe that your God needs such sacrifices, but seek what they teach, what they signify. Formerly, blood was shed from victims, because the true one victim's blood to be shed was foretold, the blood of your Lord, the blood your price, the blood by which your debt's handwriting would be erased, that is, the oldness of your sin would be abolished. It has come, it has been shed, he himself is offered. Let the day breathe now, and let the shadows be removed. "Do not remember the former things or consider the things of old. For behold, I am doing a new thing; now it springs forth, do you not perceive it?" Now we understand why those things preceded which foretold what was to come. All things are interpreted in relation to Christ, all things have an end in Christ. "For behold, I am doing a new thing; now it springs forth, do you not perceive it?" Before all these new things happened, the old things were carried out and not understood.

Augustine is not a debater, but a reader.

What follows then? I will make a way in the wilderness. In which wilderness? Certainly of the nations, where there was no worship of the true God. I will make a way in the wilderness and rivers in the dry land. Nowhere among the nations were the prophets read, now their Scripture is spread through all nations. Behold rivers in the dry land. The beasts of the field will bless me. What are the beasts of the field, if not understood as the nations? The beasts of the field and sirens, daughters of sparrows, will bless me. Some impious souls, daughters of demons, will bless me. How, unless by deserting the devil they turn to Christ? "But these things are still obscure and interpreted almost according to our understanding to something clearer. Say specifically where it is shown that God was displeased with sacrifices of victims." If I could not recite something clearer, I would not dare to take up this codex. Therefore, let your charity hear with patience. The beasts of the field and sirens, daughters of sparrows, will bless me. Why will they bless? Hear what follows: Because I will give water to the desert, and rivers in that place where there was no water, that I might give drink to my chosen kind. To which kind of yours? To my people whom I have acquired for myself. I did not call you Jacob, nor did I make you labor as Israel. Why do I need sheep for burnt offerings? Ah, brothers. I do not know if there is anyone who might say to me: "I do not understand. You say what you want, you interpret what you want." Now I have become not a disputant, but a reader. Refer this to that from which we started, where it says: You must not be mindful of former things nor consider the things of old. For it appears that God first commanded these things to be done for the sake of a certain sacrifice, foretelling the shedding of righteous blood and foreshadowing it through the likeness of victims. Now what does he say? Why do I need sheep for burnt offerings? For neither have you adorned me with your sacrifices, nor have you served me with your sacrifices. For I did not make you for this, that you should labor in incense. Lest perhaps someone says he forbade sacrifices, but allowed incense: For I did not make you for this, he says, that you should labor in incense, or that you should buy incense for me with silver, nor have I desired the fat of your sacrifices. In the sacrifices of the old law there was not abolition, but testimony of sins.

Let us dare to say to the Lord our God: "And why did you establish these things beforehand?" Now here we seek understanding. This was not the abolition of these things, but a testimony to sins. What I said, I know is obscure and somewhat needs to be made clear. But I say briefly, because I have already said many things; if by chance I could explain this less due to the constraints of time, the Lord will be present so that I may be able to do so at another time. However, I say this: that people were such that they had certain wise men, holy, just, and they also had a carnal crowd, ignorant of why these commands were given, doing rather than understanding; now, however, through this prophet, he briefly shows why he commanded those things. When he said: "Neither did I desire the fat of your sacrifices," and other things like that, immediately as if it were asked why he commanded them then, he added and said: "But in your sins and iniquities you will stand before me." For all these things served as testimony to the sinners. Why this? Unless to break the pride of the neck. Why this? Unless because Christ was to come with grace, erasing the handwriting of sins, and the Jews would say: "We are just." But what does the Apostle say to them? "For all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God." "From where, where do you prove that we have sinned?" "The sacrifices you offered for sins testify against you." This is what God says: "Neither did I desire the fat of your sacrifices, but in your sins and iniquities you will stand before me." Hence the sacrifices you offered convicted you, they did not cleanse you. Therefore now let the guilty people, broken of pride, confessing their sickness, seeking salvation, say to themselves: "What then shall I do? If my sins are not cleansed by those sacrifices, from where shall I be cleansed?"

Christ the physician and the medicine, he himself the priest and the sacrifice.

Listen to what follows: I am, I am he who blots out your iniquities, that you may be justified. I am, I am, not a bull, not a ram, not a goat, not any aromatics, not frankincense, but I am, I am he who blots out your iniquities, that you may be justified. How greatly he commended his grace! Lest anyone boast about the merits of works or the abundance of sacrifices, it was not enough to say once: I am, but by repeating this he more strongly commended it: I am, I am. He himself is the doctor, he himself the medicine. The doctor because the word, the medicine because the word was made flesh. He himself is the priest, he himself the sacrifice. I am, I am he who blots out your iniquities, that you may be justified. Lest perhaps, because he says: I blot out your iniquities, it always pleases you to sin, to this end he blots them out that you may be justified, that is, that with previous iniquities blotted out you may live rightly afterwards, so that you may receive what he has promised. Rightly also those Magi, the firstfruits of the nations, in whom as sin had abounded, so grace superabounded, being divinely warned not to return to Herod, they returned by another way. He who then changed the way of the Magi, now also changes the life of the wicked. Whose manifestation in the flesh, which is called theophany in Greek, nations justified in the Spirit today solemnly celebrate, that the solemnity may renew the memory, piety may flourish in devotion, charity may glow in the congregation, truth may shine among the envious.

Sermons - Sermon 374

SERMO 374 ON THE EPIPHANY OF THE LORD The magi were led to Christ by the star and the revelation of the angels. The annual celebration of this day demands an annual sermon from us, due to your ears and hearts. Today our Savior brought the Magi to Himself from such a distant nation. They came to worship the infant, the Word of God. Why did they come? Because they saw an unusual star. And how did they know it was of Christ? For they could see the star; could it speak to them and say: I am the star of Christ? Without a doubt, it was indicated differently, through some revelation. Nevertheless, an unusual king was born, who was to be worshipped even by strangers. Were not kings born before in Judea, or throughout the earth in different nations? Why was this one to be worshipped, and by foreigners, not with a terrifying army, but in the poverty of the flesh, with the majesty of power hidden? When He was born, He was worshipped by shepherds of Israel, to whom the Angels announced Him: but the Magi were not from the people of Israel. They worshipped the gods of the Gentiles, that is, demons; they were deceived by their false power. Therefore, they saw a certain unusual star, they marveled: undoubtedly they inquired whose sign it was, which they saw so new and strange. And without a doubt, they heard, surely from the Angels, from some admonition of revelation. You might ask: From good Angels, or bad ones? Even the evil angels, that is, demons, confessed that Christ was the Son of God. But why not also hear from the good ones, when in worshipping Christ, their salvation was now sought, not iniquity domination? Therefore, the Angels could say to them: The star you saw is of Christ, go and worship Him where He is born, and at the same time indicate how and how great He was born. When they heard this, they came and worshipped Him. They offered gold, frankincense, and myrrh, according to their custom. For they were accustomed to offering such things to their gods.

Christ demonstrated to the Gentiles by the Jews.

What indeed before they acted, before they found him in the city where he was born, they came seeking: Where is he who has been born king of the Jews? Could they not also have known this by revelation, just as they had known that star to be the star of the king of the Jews? Could not the same star have led them to that city, just as later it led them to the place where Christ was with his mother as an infant? It surely could have, but it was not done so; so that they might inquire this from the Jews. Why did God want this to be inquired from the Jews? So that while they show the one in whom they do not believe, by their own demonstration they might be condemned. Notice, too, that now the wise men, the first fruits of the Gentiles, being delivered from greater impiety, give greater glory to the one who delivered them. They ask: Where is he who has been born king of the Jews? Herod, hearing the name of the king, trembles as a rival. He calls the experts in the Law, asks them according to the Scriptures to indicate where Christ was to be born. They reply: In Bethlehem of Judea. The wise men went and worshiped; the Jews remained, who had pointed them out. O great mystery! Today we convict through the books of the Jews: they become faithful through their books. We show the pagans what they do not want to believe. For sometimes pagans pose such a question to us, when they see things written so fulfilled that they absolutely cannot deny that they are presented in all nations through the name of Christ, which are recited as predicted in the holy books, in the faith of kings, in the overthrow of idols, in the change of human affairs: and sometimes they dare to say: You saw these things happening, and as if they were foretold, you wrote them down. Some of their poets did this: those who have read know. He narrated that someone descended to the underworld and came to the region of the blessed, and the rulers of the Romans to be born were shown to him, whom he who was writing this already knew to have been born. For he narrated past events; but as if they had been predicted in the future, he wrote them down. Thus, they say to us pagans, you saw all these things happening and wrote for yourselves books in which these are read as if foretold. O glory of our king! Rightly the Jews were conquered by the Romans, but not exterminated. All nations subdued by the Romans passed into the laws of the Romans: this nation was both conquered and remained in its own law, as far as the worship of God is concerned, preserving ancestral customs and rites. Even with their temple overthrown, their former priesthood extinguished, as said by the Prophets; yet they keep circumcision and a certain custom by which they are distinguished from other nations. Why, except for the testimony of the truth? Jews are scattered everywhere, carrying the books in which Christ is foretold and presented as predicted, so that now it can be shown to the pagans. I bring forth the book, I read the prophet: I show the prophecy fulfilled. The pagan doubts, lest perhaps I have made this up. My enemy has this book, handed down to him from antiquity by his ancestors. From this, I convict both: the Jew, because I have known that prophecy and its fulfillment; the pagan, because I did not invent this. The sacrifice owed to the one God.

Therefore, let not demons, by the appearance of divination, seduce the unwary and those with an ill curiosity for temporal matters; nor, with proud arrogance deceiving the impious, demand for themselves the honor of sacrifices. Truly divine men, disciples of the one, have foretold divine things. The true sacrifice is owed to the one true God. The figures of this, before grace, were prefigured by victims. What was to happen in one manner, divine providence foretold in many ways, to show how great it was. He is the doctor, He is the medicine: the doctor, because the Word; the medicine, because the Word was made flesh. He is the priest, He is the sacrifice. He is the one who changed the way of the Magi: He also now changes the lives of the wicked. The manifestation of Him in the flesh, which in Greek is called Epiphany, the nations justified in the spirit celebrate with today's solemnity: so that the solemnity may renew the memory, devotion may flourish with piety, charity may glow with the congregation, and truth may shine for the envious.

Sermons - Sermon 375

SERMO 375 On the Epiphany of the Lord Christ revealed first to the Jews and afterwards to the Gentiles. Christ the cornerstone.

Epiphany is the manifestation in Latin. The Lord Christ was manifested to the Jews a few days before His birth: but on this day He was declared to the Gentiles by the star. The ox recognized its owner, and the donkey its master's manger. The ox from the Jews, the donkey from the Gentiles; both came to one manger and found the food of the Word. The Magi who came to worship Christ, and signify the first fruits of the Gentiles, did not receive the Law, nor did they hear the Prophets: the star was the language of heaven to them. As if it were said to them: "What did I seek for profit from you? The heavens declare the glory of God." And yet Herod was troubled, and he asked the Jews where Christ was to be born. And they answered: "In Bethlehem of Judea"; and they provided prophetic testimony; and while the Magi proceeded to worship, they themselves remained immobile. On the mound, there are stones; they show the way but do not walk. Nevertheless, the Magi went on to Bethlehem; but having found the city, how could they find the house? Behold, that star which shone from heaven, led them on earth, and stood over the place where the child was. How great the servitude of the elements, and the wickedness of the Jews! Herod was troubled, as though Christ had come to seek and find an earthly kingdom. The lion of heaven was born, and the earthly little fox was troubled. The Lord said of Herod: "Go, tell that fox." What did the troubled one do? He killed the infants. What did he do? He killed infants for the infant Word. They were made martyrs by blood before they could confess the Lord with their mouth. And Christ sent these first fruits to the Father. The infant came, and the infants went; the infant to us, the infants to God. "Out of the mouth of infants and nursing babies, you have perfected praise." Let us rejoice, the day has dawned for us. The Magi, the first fruits of the Gentiles, signified us. The Jews recognized Him when He was born, the Gentiles recognized Him yesterday. Different walls came to the cornerstone, from there the Jews, from there the Gentiles; from different directions, but not to different ones. You have seen and known that the walls are as far apart from each other as they are distant from the corner. As they draw near to the corner, they draw near to each other: when they come to the corner, they cling to each other. Christ did this. The Jews and Gentiles, circumcision and uncircumcision, those with the Law and without the Law, worshippers of the one true God and of many false gods, were far from each other. How far? But He is our peace, who made both one. But those who came from the Jews are numbered in the good wall: for those who came, did not remain in ruin. They and we have been made one: but in one, not in us. Whence was Christ born? From the Jews. Thus you have written: "Salvation is from the Jews," but not for the Jews alone. For He did not say: "Salvation to the Jews"; but: "Salvation from the Jews." They comprehended, and they lost it; they bound him, and He fled from them; they saw Him, and they killed Him: we neither comprehended Him, and we hold Him; nor saw Him, and we believe; we are last, and precede. Those who preceded us lost the way: but we have found the way and, walking in it, we will come to the homeland.

Sermons - Sermon 375A

SERMON 375/A Here begins another on the same day concerning the sacraments On the humility and power of Christ. As the truth sounded through the Apostles, and their sound went out into all the earth, and their words to the ends of the world, our Passover, Christ, was sacrificed. Of whom the prophet had previously predicted: He was led like a sheep to slaughter, and as a lamb before its shearer is silent, so he opened not his mouth. Who is this? Surely, the one of whom it follows and says: In his humiliation, his judgment was taken away. Who can describe his generation? I see an example of such humility in a king of such great power. For this one, like a lamb before his shearer not opening his mouth, is himself the lion of the tribe of Judah. Who is this lamb and lion? He endured death as a lamb, he devoured it as a lion. Who is this lamb and lion? Gentle and strong, lovable and terrifying, innocent and powerful, silent when judged, roaring when to judge. Who is this lamb and lion? A lamb in suffering, a lion in resurrection. Or rather, both lamb and lion in suffering and in resurrection? Let us see the lamb in suffering. It has already been said: Like a lamb before its shearer is silent, so he opened not his mouth. Let us see the lion in suffering. Jacob said: You climbed up, you lay down to sleep like a lion. Let us see the lamb in resurrection. The Apocalypse, speaking of the eternal glory of the virgins: they follow the lamb wherever he goes. Let us see the lion in resurrection. The same Apocalypse says, as I have mentioned above: The lion of the tribe of Judah has prevailed to open the book. Why a lamb in suffering? Because he accepted death without iniquity. Why a lion in suffering? Because being slain, he slew death. Why a lamb in resurrection? Because eternal innocence belongs to him. Why a lion in resurrection? Because eternal power belongs to him.

Christ is God. Who is this lamb and lion? How can you ask who he is? If you ask who he was before: in the beginning was the Word. If you ask where he was: and the Word was with God. If you ask what kind of Word it was: and the Word was God. If you ask how powerful he is: all things were made through him. If you ask what he himself was made: and the Word was made flesh. If you ask how or from the father without a mother, or from the mother without a father he was born: who will explain his generation? Born from eternity, co-eternal with the Begetter; the Word remaining, made flesh: creator of all times, created at the opportune time: prey to death, predator of death: deformed in appearance beyond the sons of men, beautiful in form beyond the sons of men: knowing how to bear infirmity, and to remove it: making humble things exalted, exalted things humble: God-man, and man-God: both firstborn, and creator of the firstborn: both only-begotten, and brother of many: born of the substance of the Father, made a partaker of the adopted: and Lord of all, and servant of many. This is the lamb who takes away the sins of the world; this is the lion who conquered the kingdoms of the world. We were asking who he is: let us ask who they are, for whom he died. Perhaps for the just and holy? The Apostle does not say this, but rather, that Christ died for the impious: not of course that the impious might remain impious, but that by the death of the just, the impious might be justified, and by the shedding of his sinless blood, the handwriting of sin might be erased. Ends the treatise on the sacraments on the day of Easter.

Sermons - Sermon 375B

Sermon 375/B SERMON OF AURELIUS AUGUSTINE ON THE FIRST DAY OF HOLY EASTER It happens to everyone to die, only to martyrs for Christ.

We have heard the Gospel: the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ was read. Christ is risen, therefore Christ died. The resurrection is a witness to death, but the death of Christ is the destruction of fear. Let us not be afraid to die, Christ died for us; let us die with the hope of eternal life, Christ is risen so that we may rise. In His death and resurrection, we have an ordained work, a promised reward: the ordained work is His passion, the promised reward is His resurrection. This work the martyrs have fulfilled: let us fulfill it with piety, if we cannot through passion. For it does not happen that everyone suffers for Christ and dies for Christ; yet, everyone dies. Happy are those for whom it happened to do what must be done for Christ: for death was necessary, but it was not necessary to die for Christ. Death will come to all, but death for Christ does not come to all. Those who happen to die for Christ have, in a way, returned what was dispensed to them. The Lord had dispensed to them that He should die for them; they returned it by dying for Him. But how could the wretched poor return anything, if the blessed Lord had not given it? Therefore, what Christ dispensed to the martyrs, He gave them so that they could return it to Him. For the voice of the martyrs is: "If the Lord had not been in us, perhaps they would have swallowed us alive." The persecutors, they say, perhaps would have swallowed us alive. What does it mean, "alive"? Knowing that we would do evil if we denied Christ, even so we would do such a great evil consciously, that is, knowingly; and thus they would have swallowed us alive, not dead. What does it mean, "alive"? Consciously, not unknowingly. And by what virtue did they not do what they were compelled to do by the persecutors? Let them be asked, let them say. Behold, they respond: "If the Lord had not been in us." Therefore, He gave what was to be returned to Him. Thanks be to Him: He is rich, and, as it is written about Him, He became poor to make us rich; enriched by His poverty, healed by His wounds, exalted by His humility, vivified by His death. The Jews boast without reason as if they have overcome Christ.

What shall I render to the Lord for all His benefits toward me? the martyr was saying. Hear what follows. He considered, and asked what he should render to the Lord: and what does he say? I will take the cup of salvation. This I will render to the Lord: the cup of salvation, the cup of martyrdom, the cup of passion, the cup of Christ. This is, the cup of salvation, because our salvation is Christ. Therefore I will take, he says, His cup, and render it to Him. Of this cup He also said to the Father before His passion: Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me. He came to suffer, He came to die; He had power over death. Or, if I lie, hear Himself: I have power, He says, to lay down my life, and I have power to take it again. No one takes it from me, but I lay it down of myself, and I take it again. Have you heard the power? No one takes it. In vain do the Jews boast: they have sin from it, not power. Christ died because He willed; He says in a psalm: I slept and took rest. They cried: Crucify, crucify: they held, hanged. So let them live, because they were able to do something. I slept. And what next? And took rest. Truly, the sleep was for three days. What then afterwards? And rose again, for the Lord sustained me. According to the form of a servant, He speaks, the Lord sustained me: as also in another place: Shall he who sleeps not also rise again? The Jews boast, as if they have conquered me. Shall he who sleeps not also rise again? They hanged, intending to kill: but I slept, because when I chose I laid down my soul, and when I chose I rose again. On the humanity of Christ.

Therefore, it is the cup that he wanted to pass from him, which he came to drink. What is it then, Lord, that you said: Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me? You said to the disciples, about to suffer and die: My soul is sorrowful unto death. I seek therefore in these words those words of yours: I have power to lay down my soul, and I have power to take it again. Whence do I hear: My soul is sorrowful unto death? No one takes it from me: why are you sorrowful? You have the power to lay down your soul: why do you say: Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me? He answers to the one questioning and says to you: Man, in my flesh I have taken you up: therefore, if I have taken you up in my flesh, have I not taken you up in my voice? When I say: I have power to lay down my soul, and I have power to take it again, I speak as the Creator; when I say: My soul is sorrowful unto death, I speak as one created. Rejoice in me in yourself, recognize yourself in me. When I say: I have power to lay down my soul, I am your help; when I say: My soul is sorrowful unto death, I am your mirror.

Christ the Word. Have you not read that he died? Do we deny it? If we deny his death, we also deny his resurrection. He died from where he deemed it worthy to be man: from there he resurrected, from where he deemed it worthy to be man; because we too are humans and we are to die, and we are to rise again. Did the Word die in him? Could what was the Word in the beginning, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God, suffer anything? What could such a Word suffer? And yet it was necessary that the Word should die for us: and it could not die, and yet it had to die. In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. Where is the blood? Where is the death? Is there death in the Word? Is there blood in the Word? If there is neither death nor blood in the Word, where is our price? Isn't our price his blood? From where then would he give this price if he remained only the Word unless the Word took on flesh? The flesh however living from the human soul: that since the Word could not be killed, only the flesh which lived from its own soul could be killed. For neither could the soul be killed: a soul which, cleaving to divinity, was one spirit, especially as the Lord himself assumed it, not it believing in him, as it is written about us: He who joins himself to the Lord is one spirit. For we, when we were unbelievers, were unworthy and alien to God; but by believing, we cleaved to God. That soul, however, was created worthy of cleaving to God, assuming the unity of the divine person newly and in a rudimentary form. By this unity and singularity of the two unequal spirits, the flesh died, which lived in a new way and new kind of manner from this unity of the two spirits, having a twin and admirable life, was left behind for a very short time. For God is spirit, and the human spirit, his image, are immortal.

Christ received death from us, we received life from Him.

Thus, therefore, our Lord God, our savior, speaks to us in a certain way, saying: O humans, I made man upright, and he made himself perverse. You departed from me, in yourselves you perished: but I sought what was lost. You departed from me, he says, you lost life: And life was the light of men. Behold what you left, when in Adam all perished. Life was the light of men. What life? In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. There was life: you lay in your death. The Word, whence I might die, I did not have: man, whence you might live, you did not have. Because the Lord Christ kindly condescends, I have taken up his words: if he himself mine, how much more I his! In a certain way our Lord Christ, speaking in silence through these things themselves, says: Whence I might die, I did not have: man, whence you might live, you did not have. I took from you whence I might die for you: take from me whence you might live with me. Let us celebrate the exchange: I give to you, give to me. I receive from you death: receive from me life. Awake: see what I give, what I receive. Exalted in heaven, I received from you humility on earth: your Lord, I received from you the form of a servant: your health, I received from you wounds: your life, I received from you death. The Word, I became flesh, so that I could die. I did not have flesh with the Father: I took from your mass, whence I might distribute to you - the Virgin Mary was from our mass; there Christ took flesh from us, that is, from the human race - I took from you flesh, whence I might die for you: take from me the life-giving spirit, whence you might live with me. Finally, I died from what is yours: live from what is mine. The Creed of Hippo.

Therefore, brothers, when you hear: Born of the Spirit from the Virgin Mary, suffered, was beaten, received blows; when you hear: Christ has suffered these things, do not think that the Word, in its nature and substance in the beginning with God, could have suffered in such a way. But can we say that the Word of God, the only-begotten God, did not suffer for us? He suffered, but according to His soul and passible flesh. For He took the form of a servant, so that He might suffer as a man. For He had both a soul and flesh, because He came to liberate the whole man, not by losing His life, but by giving life. However, let us give a comparison, so that you may more easily perceive what we say; for example, when the martyr Stephen and Phocas or any other suffered, were killed, and buried, their flesh alone was killed and buried, but their souls could neither be killed nor buried, and yet we most correctly say: Stephen, Phocas, or any other died for the name of Christ. Thus, when the only-begotten God was suffered, killed, and buried, His flesh alone was killed and buried; however, His soul, and much more, His divinity, could not be killed: and hence securely we say, that the only Son of God, namely, the only-begotten God, died and was buried for us. Therefore truly, not falsely, Christ the Lord Himself, who is the truth without falsehood, said: For God so loved the world, that He gave His only-begotten Son, that whoever believes in Him should not perish but have everlasting life. And the Apostle similarly says of God the Father: He who did not spare His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all. But if you want to know what Christ is, do not look at the flesh alone, which lay in the tomb; do not look at the soul alone, of which He said: My soul is sorrowful, even unto death; do not look at the Word alone, because the Word was God; but understand that Christ entirely is the Word, and soul, and flesh. The error of the Apollinarists and Arians concerning the soul of Christ. Do not take anything away from the soul of Christ. For the Apollinarian heretics said that He did not have a mind, that is, the soul did not have intelligence, but the Word was for it in place of mind and intelligence. This Apollinaris said. But the Arians say: He did not have any kind of soul. Therefore, you must faithfully hold that absolutely the whole Christ is Word and soul and flesh. And when you hear: My soul is sorrowful, understand the human soul, not animal: for the soul without intellect is the soul of a beast, not a human soul. If He did not come to liberate the mind, He did not have a mind. Therefore, one Christ, the Word and soul and flesh. What is man? Soul and flesh. What is Christ? Word and man, and therefore Word and soul and flesh, one Christ. When you strike a man with fists, what of him do you strike? The soul, or the flesh? You admit that it is the flesh. And yet the soul cries out: Why do you strike me?

Why do you beat me? If you were to say to the soul: Who touched you? I strike the flesh, not you; do not those who hear you saying these things mock, and judge you senseless or insane? Thus, those who scourged the flesh of the Word of God, or struck with slaps, cannot say: We scourged, or struck with slaps, the flesh, not the Word or the soul of Christ; for they scourged or struck with slaps the whole Christ, that is, the Word and the soul and the flesh: for they did not scourge or strike with slaps His dead body. And although they could not kill His soul or His very divinity, which is true life, on the cross, they delighted in killing the whole Christ in their hearts and in their evil intent. For whoever persecutes someone to kill him, wishes to extinguish him entirely, just as the whole light of a lamp is extinguished when it is shattered on the ground, so that it no longer shines at all, when any evildoer sees that it obstructs him. This cannot happen to a man in any way, that he should be entirely extinguished, who certainly has one mortal substance and another immortal: for nothing in him is mortal except the flesh. However, Christ, the only-begotten of God, could be even less entirely extinguished, although Jews thought they were extinguishing Him, who in His three substances, that is, one eternal and divine, and in two temporal, that is, human, had only one mortal, that is, His flesh; but He undoubtedly had His soul and especially His divinity immortal. And therefore, by His death of short duration, He alone could redeem us from our eternal death, who was not only flesh and human soul, but God and soul and flesh, the one only-begotten of God. For He who descended to the lower parts of the earth, He is also who ascended above all the heavens: which man alone could not do.

Life triumphs over death.

Therefore, let us rejoice and be glad, dearest brothers, because he redeemed us by his death, who even defeated the enemies when he was killed. For being slain, he slew death, and forever freed us from its hand, and rising on high, he led captivity captive, and after sending the Holy Spirit to mankind, he gave his gifts: who even while lying in the tomb could introduce the believing thief into paradise.

Sermons - Sermon 375C

Sermon 375/C TREATISE ON THE FIFTH DAY OF HOLY EASTER The unbelief of Thomas.

Today's reading from the holy Gospel once again revealed the Lord to the servants, Christ to the Apostles, and convinced the unbelieving disciple. For one of the twelve disciples, the Apostle Thomas, did not assent to the news of the resurrection of the Lord Christ reported not only by women but also by men. And certainly, he was to be made an apostle to preach the gospel. So when he later began to preach Christ, how did he want to be believed in what he had not himself believed? I suppose that he was ashamed of himself when he reproved the unbelievers. His fellow disciples, indeed co-apostles, said to him: "We have seen the Lord." And he responded: "Unless I put my hands into His side, and touch the places of the nails, I will not believe." He wanted faith to be brought to him by touch. For if the Lord had come to be touched, how then in that reading, which is read before, does He say to Mary: "Do not touch me, for I have not yet ascended to the Father?" He says to the believing woman, "Do not touch me"; He says to the unbelieving man, "Touch." For Mary had already run to the tomb and had first thought the standing Lord was the gardener, and said: "Lord, if you have taken him away, tell me where you have laid him, and I will take him." The Lord, however, answered her name: "Mary." At once she recognized the Lord by the voice of her own name: He called, and she recognized; He made her happy by the calling, giving her recognition. Immediately, therefore, when she heard her name from that authority and tongue with which He was accustomed, she also responded as usual: "Rabboni." So Mary had already believed, and the Lord said to her: "Do not touch me, for I have not yet ascended to the Father."

Humanity assumed by Christ.

Just now in that reading, which most recently sounded in your ears, what did you hear Thomas saying? I do not believe unless I touch. And the Lord to Thomas himself: Come, touch, put your hands into my side, and do not be unbelieving but believing. He said, If you think it too little that I offer myself to your eyes, I offer myself also to your hands. For perhaps you are one of those who sing in the Psalm: In the day of my trouble I sought the Lord with my hands, and my hands were stretched out in the night without ceasing. Why was he seeking with his hands? Because he was seeking in the night. What does it mean, he was seeking in the night? He was carrying the darkness of disbelief in his heart. However, this happened not only for himself but also for those who were going to deny the true flesh of the Lord. For Christ could have healed the wounds of his flesh in such a way that no marks of the scars would appear: he could, therefore, not bear the marks of the nails on his limbs, not bear the mark of the wound in his side; but those scars were allowed to remain in the flesh so that the wound of disbelief in human hearts would be removed, and the signs of the wounds would cure true wounds. For he who allowed the marks of the nails and the spear to be in his body knew that there would be wicked and perverse heretics who would say that our Lord Jesus Christ had feigned his flesh and had spoken lies to his disciples and our evangelists when he said: Touch and see. Behold, Thomas doubts. How does he doubt? Unless I touch, I will not believe: he places belief beyond touch. Unless I touch, he says, I will not believe. What do we think the Manichaean says? And Thomas saw, and Thomas touched, and Thomas felt the places of the nails, and it was false flesh. So then, if he had been there, he would not have believed even by touching.

Thomas is allowed to touch Christ, Mary is not allowed.

Therefore, let your Love heed the horrendous destruction, the detestable deceit, the incredible impiety. See how great is the difference between holy Mary Magdalene, who, when she heard: 'Mary,' believed in the resurrection of Christ at one word, and those who, as soon as they saw Christ in the breaking of the bread, immediately believed. What do we think is the difference between her faith and theirs? What? She saw in a somewhat obscure way, they saw very clearly; yet both she and they believed by seeing. Afterwards, He appeared to all: they thought they were seeing a spirit. He dispelled their vain opinion and inserted the most certain truth. They thought they were seeing a spirit. This is what the Manicheans also think, that Christ was a spirit, not having flesh. Remain in such faith if Christ wished His disciples to remain in it. If you think Christ was a spirit and appeared as a phantom, that is, as if His flesh were not true, this is what the disciples thought: you are wounded with the disciples, be healed with them. When the disciples thought this, that Christ was a spirit, and what they saw was more of an appearance than a reality, what did the Lord do? He said, 'Why do thoughts arise in your hearts?' No external enemy has come to you, and internal thought strangles your souls. You are thinking about me: 'Why do thoughts arise in your hearts?' What thoughts? Because they thought they were seeing a spirit. The Lord fears such thoughts, lest they destroy the faith of the disciples; therefore, fear to have such thoughts: what the physician fears, the sick person is not safe from. 'Why do thoughts arise in your hearts? See my hands and my feet; handle and see, for a spirit does not have flesh and bones as you see that I have.' They saw, and touched, and believed, and proclaimed: and the Manicheans still contradict about Thomas: 'I will not believe unless I touch.' Therefore, do not be unbelieving. Were the wounds of the Lord false, and are the words of the Manicheans true? God forbid. Rather, the words of the Lord are true, the Lord showed true bones: true wounds: true members lifted to heaven; but corruption was not lifted to heaven. Flesh, he said: death is dead.

Christ is the way, Christ is the homeland.

Let us return to that question about Saint Mary. Behold, He is touched by the disciples: Feel and see, because a spirit does not have bones and flesh, as you see that I have. He is touched by doubting Thomas; he exclaims: My Lord and my God! And to him the Lord says: Because you have seen, you have believed; blessed are those who have not seen, and believe. To whom you announce me, they surpass your faith. You announce what you have seen, you announce what you have touched, you announce what you have hardly believed by seeing and touching; and yet someone will believe you who has neither seen nor touched. You see me, and you do not believe me: you touch me, and you hardly believe me; another hears you, and believes in me. But you ask: Why is it that Thomas is allowed to touch, and Mary is told: Do not touch me? Here He Himself said the reason: For I have not yet ascended to the Father. What does this mean? You are here on earth, and you forbid yourself to be touched: when you ascend, who touches you? Situated on earth you repel a nearby hand. Here we can very elegantly surmise, and say: The Lord rightly kept His touch for the unbelievers; He forbids her to touch, because she had already believed. For what need was there to touch and seek, whom she had recognized by hearing? But yet He did not keep silent, afterward He stated the reason. Do not touch me. Why? For I have not yet ascended to my Father: touch me when ascending to the Father. What does it mean, touch me when ascending to the Father? Touch the one equal to the Father. What does it mean, touch the one equal to the Father? Touch God, that is, believe in God. It is easy what you see: the form of a servant is assumed for your sake, it is the garment of God; it is not great to see the flesh. The Jews saw, who killed Him; the Gentiles did not see, and believed. Therefore, He says, just as you see me, in bodily limbs, the appearance you know, just as you see, do not touch me: that is, do not remain there, do not intend only up to there, do not let your faith end here. Indeed, I want you to believe that I am a man, but do not stay there; extend the hand of faith, do not remain there.

Faith is like touching Christ. Do not touch in the way that the heretic Photinus did: he said that Christ was a man, nothing more; therefore he did not grasp, did not understand, did not touch. The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us. That she might not think Christ to be just a man: Do not touch me this way: my garment is before you; keep what is done in heaven, extend the hand of your heart; and then you touch me when I ascend to the Father. Those who confessed this way have touched: He ascended to heaven, sits at the right hand of the Father. Behold, this is how the Church touches, whose figure Mary bore. Let us touch Christ, let us touch. To believe is to touch. Do not extend your hand only to the man; say what Peter said: You are the Christ, the Son of the living God. Therefore do not see Christ as only a man; because if you touch as the heretic said, you will be like Photinus. But again, do not avoid the man Christ, but do not remain there. I do not say to turn away; what do I say? Do not remain there: he does not reach the mansion who wants to remain on the way. Rise, walk: man Christ is your way, God Christ is your homeland. Our homeland, truth and life; our way, the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us. We were lazy to walk, the way came to us; because the way came to us, let us walk. Man Christ is our way: let us not abandon the way, to reach the only begotten Son of God, equal to the Father, transcending all creation, coeternal with the Father, without day, the day, the creator of faith. For this reason let us walk, that we may touch this.

Christ God, Christ flesh.

Thus finally she touched Him, who was suffering from an issue of blood. Such was her faith in Him, that the Lord said to her: Now come forward and reveal yourself to the crowd; obtain praise, from whence you obtained salvation! Go, daughter, your faith has made you well; go in peace. If you ask what faith this is, listen. She said in her heart: If I touch the hem of His garment, I shall be saved. She touched so that she might obtain what she believed; she did not touch so that what she had not believed might be proved. Then the Lord asked, saying: Who touched me? So, do You not know, Lord, who touched You? You see the thought, and you ask about the act? What does it mean, who touched me? I will show you who touched me: faith touched me; it made power go out from me by its touch. Where I was not, where I did not walk, where I was not born, there I was believed in: A people I did not know served me. Oh touching! Oh believing! Oh demanding! And this woman, exhausted by her bloody afflictions, like the Church afflicted and wounded by the shedding of blood in martyrs, but full of the virtues of faith; she had previously spent her substance on physicians, that is, the gods of the nations, who could never cure her: to which Church the Lord did not present His bodily presence, but a spiritual one. Now therefore both the woman touching and the Lord touched know each other. But so that those who needed to know salvation might be taught to touch, He said: Who touched me? And the disciples responded: The crowds press upon You, and you say, who touched me? As though You were in some high place, where no one could touch You, so You ask who touched, when the infinite crowds press upon You? The Lord said: Someone touched me: I felt more one touching, than a pressing crowd. A crowd easily knows how to press: would that it could learn to touch!

What does faith teach about the incarnate Son of God?

Let our conclusion, brothers, be that we believe our Lord Jesus Christ to have existed before Abraham, before Adam, before heaven and earth, before angels and archangels, and thrones and dominations, and principalities and powers, before all things created and made, whether seen or unseen, without any lapse of time, without any count of years, coeternal with the Father, equal to the Father, the true Only-begotten of the Father, the power and wisdom of the Father: equally everlasting, equally immortal; and truly immortal, because completely unchangeable; equally invisible, because incorporeal; equally powerful, and indeed omnipotent himself. Let us believe such of the Only-begotten Son of God. But remember, when we say: And Jesus Christ, His only Son, our Lord, remember what follows: who was conceived by the Holy Spirit, born of the Virgin Mary. Born of a mother without a father here below on earth, who was already above with the Father before time, born without a mother, destined to create time. In true flesh now at the end of times, born from true flesh: but his flesh had the semblance of sinful flesh, it was not sinful flesh. And from where did it have semblance of sin? Because it was mortal. And from where was it not sinful flesh? Because it came through the faith of the virgin. That same flesh of Christ itself grew, itself reached the age of youth. In it, Christ hungered, thirsted, ate, drank, grew weary, rested, slept: in all these things, sin was nowhere to be found. In it, he suffered, in it, God hidden as man was manifest, seeking man in man, seeking the lost through what he had taken on. In it, then, he suffered unworthy things from men on behalf of men. It was true flesh which was held by the Jews; it was true flesh which ate the Passover with the disciples. The Jews slapped true flesh; the Jews placed thorns on true flesh; unbelievers hung true flesh on the cross; infidels and wretches pierced true flesh with a spear after the soul had departed; the disciples took true flesh down from the cross and laid it in the tomb; truth resurrected true flesh; truth showed true flesh to the disciples after the resurrection; truth demonstrated the scars of true flesh to the hands of those who touched. Therefore, let falsehood be ashamed, because truth has conquered.

Sermons - Sermon 376

SERMO 376 THE SUNDAY IN THE OCTAVE OF EASTER Entering through closed doors is a sign of the omnipotence of God. Your Charity has heard, when the holy Gospel was read, that our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ entered to His disciples after His resurrection while the doors were closed. A great miracle: but you cease to be amazed if you consider that He is God. For it would indeed be amazing if only a man had done this. Refer it to omnipotence, not to fantasy. He entered while the doors were closed. I answer you, so that you may know that it was true flesh, He showed the wounds to be touched. But just as it is not the nature of a bodily entity to enter through a closed door, so it is not the nature of a bodily entity to walk upon the waves of the sea. He entered through the closed doors; answer me, give me the solidity of flesh. He walked on the waters of the sea, you too give me the weight of flesh. Do you want to know that this was by omnipotence? He also granted it to Peter. He gave what He willed; He kept what was proper to Himself. For He who entered through the closed doors while living did not violate the integrity of His mother in being born. Therefore, brothers, let us admire and believe, believe and obey, obey and hope for the promises, if we do the commands: because He helps us to do the commands, from whom we hope for the promises.

Sermons - Sermon 376A

SERMON 376/A Sunday in the Octave of Easter The revelation of heads in the octave of infants is an indication of liberty.

[2. 2.] Today is called the octave of the infants; their heads are to be uncovered, which is a sign of freedom. For this spiritual birth indeed has freedom: whereas the birth of the flesh has servitude. There are two births of a man, to be born and to be reborn. We are born to labor, we are reborn to rest: we are born to miseries, we are reborn to eternal happiness. For those children, infants, little ones, suckling at their mothers' breasts, and ignorant of how much grace is bestowed upon them, as you see, because they are called infants, and today they have their octaves: and these old men, young men, youths, all infants. For one of their infancies pertains to oldness, the other to newness. For those whom you see newly born, are born old. Our old man is called Adam, from whom we are born: the new man is Christ, through whom we are reborn. Therefore these are both new and reborn to another life, and there is in them, if it can be said, a new oldness when they are born.

Exhortation that the baptized should not imitate bad Christians who are mixed with the good.

[2. 3.] Behold, today our infants are mixed with the faithful and fly away as if from the nest. It is necessary, therefore, that we speak to those giving birth to them. For as you recall, my brothers, the chicks of swallows or domestic sparrows, when they begin to fly from the nest, the mothers fly around them with noise and with pious voices testify to the dangers of their children.

We know, therefore, that many who are called faithful live badly, and that their behavior does not match the grace they have received; they praise God with their tongue, but blaspheme with their life. However, we also know that among these many, as among much and abundant chaff, there are groaning grains under the threshing, but they console themselves with the hope of the granary. We know that these two kinds of people exist in the Church. We know that the Lord's threshing floor is the Church: we hope for the winnowing on the day of judgment, we desire the mass of wheat at the resurrection, we wish to enter the granary in eternal life. There will be no chaff there, just as there will be no grain in Gehenna. Therefore, now, my brothers, since we know that there are these two kinds of people in the Church, the pious and the impious, the good and the wicked, the fearful and the contemptuous, we do not know to which of these they will be joined. But they themselves know what we wish: whether our wishes concerning them will be fulfilled, human ignorance tires itself with anxiety, and is sometimes disturbed by false suspicions. It is learned from these things on this earth, where one does not live without temptation. Therefore I admonish you, holy seedlings; I admonish you, young plants in the Lord's field, that it may not be said of you what was said of the vineyard of the house of Israel: I looked for it to bring forth grapes, but it brought forth thorns. May he who was crushed for us as the cluster of grapes find a cluster in you. Bear grapes, live well. For the fruit of the spirit is, as the Apostle says, charity, joy, peace, long-suffering, kindness, goodness, gentleness, faith, temperance, chastity. When our farmer comes to us, whose workers we are, he who gives growth inside: for we know how to plant and water outside; but the Apostle says: Neither he that plants is anything, nor he that waters; but God who gives the increase; who now sees how you listen, who now inspects how you fear, or begin to fear: when that farmer comes to you, may he find in you what the Apostle said: My joy and my crown, all who stand in the Lord.

Snares must be resisted; God must be trusted; alms must be given.

Brothers, dearest sons, beloved children, imitate the good, beware of the evil. For I know that evil men will come to you, and persuade you to drunkenness, and will say to you: Why? Are we not also most faithful? I know, therefore I grieve, therefore I fear. Now if you will say firmly: Brother, I do not wish to do what you do, but if I cannot lead you to my good, at least do not drag me to your evil. For such people, as often happens, their heads will ache. Your neighbor or neighborly woman will say: This one is a sorcerer, this one is a healer, and somewhere a mathematician. You say: I am a Christian, it is not permitted for me. And if he says to you: Why? am I not also a Christian? you will say: But I am faithful. And he to you: And I am baptized. They become angels of the devil, members of Christ. Because the enemy possesses him, he seeks to drag another as well. Let him find you prepared, who prepared these things for you. Therefore I speak, therefore I testify, therefore I do not remain silent, therefore I shake out my garments, therefore I have myself excused at the tribunal of my God. I will say to my God: Lord, I did not remain silent; Lord, I did not hide the talent you gave me, but I gave it. He will be able to say to me: Wicked servant, you should have given, I would have demanded. Behold, Lord, I have given, you demand. And if by chance old habit tickles you, you have someone to intercede. Greater is the helper than the opponent. Therefore you groan, therefore you pray, therefore you say: Lead us not into temptation. Observe also, my brothers, what you say above: Forgive us our debts; to do as follows: as we also forgive our debtors. You do alms, you receive alms. You forgive, you will be forgiven. You give, it will be given to you. Hear God saying: Forgive, and you will be forgiven; give, and it will be given to you. Keep the poor in mind. I tell everyone: do alms, my brothers; do, and you will not lose. Trust in God. Not only do I say to you, you do not lose what you do for the poor: but I plainly tell you, this alone you do not lose, the rest you lose. Behold, let us see if you cheer up the poor today; you are their storehouses, so that God may give you whence you give, and forgive what you might sin. Include mercy in the heart of the poor, and it will intercede with the Lord for you: to whom be honor and glory for ever and ever. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 377

SERMO 377 ON THE ASCENSION OF THE LORD The eternal Word cannot be worthily praised by us. How like a giant it rejoiced to run its course.

Dearest brothers, who can worthily utter a temporal word about the eternal Word? How can the lowly suffice for the great? The heavens praise, the virtues praise, the ethereal powers praise, the luminaries of heaven praise, the stars praise, so too does the earth praise as it can: not that it praises worthily, but lest it be condemned as ungrateful. Who can explain, who can speak, who can even comprehend him who reaches from end to end mightily, and arranges all things sweetly, how he rejoiced to run his course, so that his going forth was from the highest heaven, and his return even to the highest heaven? If he reaches everywhere, from where does he go out? If he reaches everywhere, to where does he go? He is not stretched out by places, nor varied by times, nor does he have comings and goings: remaining in himself, he entirely encircles all places. What are the spaces that do not contain the omnipotent, that do not hold the immense, that do not welcome the coming one? If you think about the word, we have said nothing. But to teach the humble to say something about himself, he humbled himself by taking the form of a servant. In this form he descended, in this form, according to the Gospel, he progressed in the study of wisdom, in this form he was patient, in this form he fought bravely, in this form he died, in this form he defeated death and rose again, in this form he returned to heaven, who never departed from heaven. Therefore, he is blessed in the firmament of heaven, who became for us, according to the Apostle, accursed, so that in the Gentiles the blessing of Abraham might come. He rejoiced like a giant. What kind of giant? He overcame death by dying. What kind of giant? He broke the gates of hell: he went out, and ascended. Who is this king of glory, for whom it was said to certain princes: Lift up your gates, O princes; and be lifted up, O eternal gates? Be lifted up, he is great: you are narrow, you do not fit; be lifted up. Why this? That the king of glory may enter in. They are frightened: Who is this king of glory? He is not recognized. He is not only God, but also man: he is not only man, but also God. Does he suffer, surely he is God? does he rise, surely he is man? Or is he both God and man? For truly he suffers, and truly he rises. But this is said twice in one and the same psalm: Lift up your gates, O princes; and be lifted up, O eternal gates, and the king of glory will enter in. And this very thing is repeated after the same words, as if it is thought superfluous and unnecessary. But in the repetition of the same words, observe the ends, and notice why it was said twice. For as if to the one who rises once, and to the one who ascends once, both the gates of hell and of heaven are opened twice. For it is a new thing, God present in the underworld: it is a new thing, man taken up to the heavens. At both times, in both places, the princes are frightened. Who is this king of glory? How do we discern this? Hear what is answered to both. To those asking it is said: The Lord strong and mighty, the Lord mighty in battle. What battle? To undergo death for mortals, to suffer alone for all, to not resist omnipotence, and yet to conquer by dying. Therefore, this king of glory is great, even in the underworld. This is also repeated to the heavenly powers: Lift up your gates, O princes; and be lifted up, O eternal gates. Are not the eternal gates those of which Peter received the keys? But because he lifts up man with himself, there he is said as if not recognized: Who is this king of glory? But there, because he is no longer as a fighter, but as a victor, because he does not battle, but triumphs; there it is not answered: The Lord mighty in battle; but, The Lord of hosts, he is the king of glory.

Sermons - Sermon 378

SERMO 378 ON THE DAY OF PENTECOST The gift of the Holy Spirit is the pledge of eternal life, as we journey towards our homeland. The feast is pleasing to God, where piety thrives, and charity fervorizes. For it is the effect of the presence of the Holy Spirit: as the Apostle teaches, saying: "The love of God is poured out in our hearts by the Holy Spirit who has been given to us." Therefore, the arrival of the Holy Spirit filled one hundred and twenty people established in one place. When the Acts of the Apostles were read, we heard: "There were gathered together in one place one hundred and twenty, holding the promise of Christ." For He had said that they should be in the city until they were clothed with power from on high. For He said, “I will send my promise upon you.” A faithful promiser, a kind giver. What He promised on earth, He ascended to heaven and sent. We have the pledge of future eternal life and the kingdom of heaven. He did not deceive us with a recent promise, and will He deceive us with future expectation? When men contract any business with each other, and the pledge of monetary business is loosened, they often receive or give earnest money: and the given earnest money secures faith, indicating that the very thing for which the earnest money was given will follow. Christ gave us the Holy Spirit as an earnest: and He who cannot deceive us made us secure when He gave the earnest, which even if He had not given, He would doubtlessly exhibit what He had promised. What did He promise? Eternal life, whose earnest He gave as the Holy Spirit. Eternal life is the possession of those who dwell in it: the earnest is the consolation of those who are journeying. For it is better said to be an earnest than a pledge. These two seem to be similar among themselves: but yet they have some not negligible difference. A pledge is given, and earnest money is given, for the reason that what is promised may be fulfilled: but when a pledge is given, a man returns what he has received, with the matter completed for which he received the pledge; however, when earnest money is given, it is not taken back, but is added to so that it may be fulfilled. Therefore, we have the earnest: let us thirst for the very source whence the earnest is. We have the earnest, a certain sprinkling in our hearts of the Holy Spirit: if anyone feels this dew, let him desire the source. For why do we have the earnest, except so that we do not fail from hunger and thirst during this journey? For we do hunger and thirst, if we nevertheless recognize ourselves as journeying. He who is journeying, and knows he is journeying, desires his homeland; while he desires it, the journey is troublesome. If he loves the journey, he forgets his homeland, and does not wish to return. Our homeland is not such that we should prefer anything to it. Sometimes men, while journeying, become rich. Those who were in need in their homeland become wealthy through their journey, and do not wish to return. We have all been born as pilgrims from our Lord, from whom the breath of life first inspired man. Our homeland is in heaven, citizens are angels. Letters have been sent to us from our homeland, to encourage us to return, which are read daily among the people. Let the world be vile, let the one who made the world be loved.

Sermons - Sermon 379

SERMO 379 SERMON OF SAINT AUGUSTINE ON SAINT JOHN THE BAPTIST How profound is the mystery of John the Baptist.

Saint John the Baptist, whose nativity we celebrate today, was so great among men that the Lord Christ bore such testimony to him, saying: Among those born of women, no one has arisen greater than John the Baptist. We have heard, when the holy Gospel was read, how miraculously he was conceived out of despair, with what testimony of the Holy Spirit he was begotten. His father, because he did not believe, became mute. Announced then by an angel and not believed, the voice was taken from his father, and being born, he loosened his tongue. The great and lofty mystery of this great man is difficult not only to explain but even to think about worthily. Nevertheless, to the best of our ability, as much as God grants, for the solemnity of this day, since this is what you most should and do expect to hear, receive, I say, the sacrament of this matter.

John bears witness to Christ.

Before the Lord Christ, John was sent ahead. Prophets were also sent before through earlier ages, who did not fail to preach Christ and foretell His coming. For such a great judge was about to come that many heralds ought to precede Him. From the very beginning of the human race, Christ did not cease to be prophesied and His coming foretold: indeed, we cannot recall all these prophecies, but those who are diligent about the divine Scriptures know both what I leave unsaid and recognize what I state. Lastly, John was born, a man, but a man than whom no one ever existed greater, and to whom no man could ever be compared. But the Lord Christ was about to come, not only a man but also God; because God in flesh is indeed both God and man: always God, a man for a time; God before time, a man in time; God before the ages, a man at the end of the age; God, through whom man was created, who made man, deigned to become that which He made for the sake of man. Therefore, this is Christ. But John, only a man. Therefore, to the coming Lord Jesus Christ, who was more than a man, to prevent Him from being considered merely a man, John had to bear greater testimony to Him.

Let us hear the testimonies.

I spoke briefly. If the more intelligent have prevailed, the slower ones should not be abandoned. Let what I have said be explained more clearly again, with the Lord's help. Christ, I say, the Lord, is not only God, not only man, but both God and man: God who made us, man who remade us. But John was only a man. But how great a man? Listen concerning him to both God and man. O Lord, who is John? How great is John? Among those born of women, he says, no one has arisen greater than John the Baptist. O John, O great man, among those born of women, no one greater has arisen, and you tell me: Who is this? Tell me, O great man: Who is this who is considered only a man? Who is this, listen: Of whom I am not worthy, he says, to carry the sandals. Who is this, listen; these are John's words about the Lord Christ: He who has the bride is the bridegroom; but the friend of the bridegroom - speaking of himself - stands and listens to him and rejoices greatly because of the bridegroom's voice. Again, another testimony from John himself: We have all received from his fullness. The Word God.

Understand, my brothers, recall the saving mystery, hunger for the word of God, grasp what we preach, so that we may rejoice together in the truth. Christ the Lord, who and how great he became for us so small, ask from John the Evangelist. He himself speaks of the Lord Christ: In the beginning was the Word. What does Moses say? In the beginning God made heaven and earth. What does John say? In the beginning, not: God made the word, but: the Word was. The Word was before the heaven and earth were made in the beginning, the Word was there to make them, but it is the Word of God, so that it would not be despised by the custom of human words through which it was made. Hear John: The Word was with God, and the Word was God. What kind of God, how great a God? All things were made through him, and without him nothing was made. What was made in him was life, and the life was the light of men. And the light shines in the darkness, and the darkness did not comprehend it.

Lux vera.

What therefore is said: The darkness did not comprehend? Be light so that you may comprehend. Let faith make you light so that it may fulfill the forms. As long as we are in the body, we are absent from the Lord; if we are absent from the Lord, we are absent from the light. What then? Shall we remain in darkness? Far from it. Come to Him and be illumined. Hence because the evangelist John said: The light shines in the darkness, and the darkness did not comprehend it, lest there be darkness left, what does he say thereafter? There was a man sent from God, whose name was John. God could not be seen: a lamp was lit: There was a man whose name was John. The light in Christ was so great that tainted hearts could not grasp it: it was made a comfort to them by the lamp, so that the lamp might bear witness to the light. For there was a man sent from God whose name was John. He came for testimony, to bear witness to the light. Why? Because the light shines in the darkness and the darkness did not comprehend it. So John came, a man tempered by the darkness of his mortal frailty. Let him come and speak about Christ what man cannot grasp: he came to bear witness to the light. And it continues: He was not that light. Who? John. He was not that light, but to bear witness to the light. Which light? It follows: He was the true light. True. What kind of true light? That which enlightens every man coming into this world, therefore also John. If He enlightens every man, then also John, than whom no one greater has arisen among those born of women. If He enlightens every man, John spoke truly: We all have received from His fullness.

John was a burning lamp.

Therefore, was John not the light? What can we say against the Gospel? Another John, also truthful, testifies and says: He was not the light. The Apostles are called light, and was the one greater than whom no one born of women has arisen not light? But how do we prove that the Apostles are called light? Listen to the Lord Christ speaking to the Apostles: You are the light of the world. And John was light: I do not dare to detract from John what is given to the Apostles, nor do I detract from the Lord Jesus himself, who has deigned to bear such testimony to him, that no one born of women has arisen greater than John the Baptist. Let him therefore solve the question who promised illumination, let him clearly solve it. Listen. He was not the light, it was said thus, so that you would not believe you could be enlightened by him. In himself, as much as was in himself, because he was illuminated, he was light. To illuminate you, he was not light. Finally, to teach you how he was not the light, he immediately added in comparison to whom he was not: He was the true light. He added, true. What do you mean by true? What enlightens every man, for the light that is illuminated is light by participation in light, not by its own power. The true light, which enlightens, is not extinguished; a lamp can be both lit and extinguished. How are the Apostles called light? How, as a lamp. How is this proven? So that I may not seem disrespectful, shortly afterwards listen to the Lord himself: You are the light of the world, and he follows: No one lights a lamp and places it under a bushel; thus you are light as a lamp. What about John? Let the Lord himself be heard, he said about John himself: He was the burning and shining lamp. The Apostles are a lamp, John is a lamp. Worthily did he recognize himself as a lamp and submitted himself to the day: I am not worthy, he says, to loosen the strap of his sandal. He rightly did not place himself on high, so that he would not be extinguished by the wind of pride.

John, the friend of the bridegroom, sends to Christ; he wanted to teach us this.

We say therefore through John, and through a man it is necessary to believe in Christ, and hope is not to be placed in a man but in Christ. Behold, you have a great man, greater than whom no one has arisen. John he is, but see where he sends you. John, a friend of the bridegroom, is jealous for the bridegroom, not for himself, as the blessed apostle Paul. And he also a friend of the bridegroom, how did he not want hope to be placed in himself? Carnal men were dividing themselves at that time, and some were saying: I am of Paul; others: I am of Apollos; others: I am of Cephas; others: I am of Christ. The triple voice of chaff is the voice: I am of Cephas, that is, of Peter, still a voice of chaff. I am of Christ: now it is wheat, there is the mass which, when the threshing floor is winnowed, will appear at the end and fill the granary of eternal life. Therefore, then, the apostle Paul, because he was jealous for the bridegroom not for himself, reproves them and drives them away from himself. Does he make it for himself? For what of himself? He says: Is Christ divided? Was Paul crucified for you, or were you baptized in the name of Paul? Certainly you honored me, certainly you wanted to be mine. Do not be mine lest we perish together, but let us all belong to him so that we may remain on the threshing floor: Was Paul crucified for you? Friend, he says, I am of the bridegroom: I am jealous for the bridegroom, not for myself. Consider, my brothers, and see what I say. If anyone journeys and entrusts his bride to a friend, and while he is journeying, the wanton woman sets her eye on the friend who is her guardian, will he not shudder at another’s lust, lest he lose his own faith? So also see where John sent them: Indeed, I baptize you with water. But he who comes after me is greater than I, whose sandal strap I am not worthy to untie. He will baptize you with the Holy Spirit. Come through me, but do not remain in me. Pass over to him who created both you and me, because he gives life: We have all received from his fullness. Whence we, thence also you; let us drink together, lest pride cause us to perish. Thus John sent to Christ. However just they may be, however much they may excel in grace, however much they may shine with wisdom, however much they may be exalted by merits, they are mountains. Look at the Psalm: I lifted up my eyes to the mountains, from where shall my help come? Because there was a man sent from God, whose name was John; this one came to bear witness to the light. You lifted up your eyes to the mountain John, from where help would come to you, because he bore witness to the light. Follow the psalm, do not remain on the mountain: My help comes from the Lord, who made heaven and earth. He is Christ: All things were made through him. He is the maker of the world: For he is the Word of the Father, the Father made all things through the Word. Do not despise the humble vestment, because it is the medicine of the sick. Did it become vile because it was hidden? Could you bear it if it were revealed? Give thanks to him, for clothed as a human, he adjusted himself to our infirmity, so that he might make us partakers of his divinity. Sing faith so that you may come to sight. Walk the way, so that you may be led to the homeland. He remains there to where we go, he came from where we return, yet he so came that he did not depart from there, so ascended into heaven that he did not desert us.

Sermons - Sermon 38

SERMO 38 "Of the Words of Ecclesiasticus II, 1-5:

"Son, approaching the service of God" etc. AND ON THE WORDS OF PSALM 38:7, "Although man walks in an image" etc. On Continence and Endurance

There are two things which in this life are commended to us by the Lord as laborious: to restrain and to endure. For we are commanded to restrain from those things which are called good in this world, and to endure those things which abound as evils in this world. The former is called restraint, the latter endurance. Two virtues which purge the soul and make it capable of divinity. In restraining desires and curbing pleasures, lest what flatters badly seduces and what is called prosperous weakens, we need restraint: not to believe in earthly happiness, and to seek the happiness which has no end until the end. As restraint entails not believing in the happiness of the world, likewise endurance entails not yielding to the unhappiness of the world. Whether therefore we are in abundance of things or in distress, the Lord is to be waited for, who both grants what is truly good and pleasant, and averts from us what is truly evil.

Good and evil are mixed in this world. The good things of God which He promises to the righteous are kept for the end; and the bad things which He threatens to the impious are kept for the end. The good and the bad which circulate and mix in the world are neither possessed solely by the good nor solely by the bad. Whatever good you speak of in this world, both the good have it and the bad have it. For example, even good health of the body is possessed both by the good and by the bad. Riches can be found among both the good and the bad. The success of children we see as a common gift to both the good and the bad. A long life some good people live long, some bad people live long. And whatever other things you wish to count in this world as good, you find mixed among both the good and the bad. Again, whatever rough things, whatever sad things, both the good and the bad suffer: hunger, disease, pains, losses, oppressions, bereavements. This is the common material of tears for all. Therefore it is easy to see this, that both the goods of the world are among the good and the bad, and the evils of the world are endured by the good and the bad. And hence, the feet of some in the way of God stumble, and they try to deviate. Many even deviate and wander astray, having set and proposed in their mind to serve God in order to abound in earthly goods and avoid evils, and to escape them. For when they propose this to themselves, and set this reward for their piety and religion, when they see themselves laboring and the wicked flourishing, as if they had lost their reward, as if He who called them had deceived them, as if He had assigned the work in vain and deceived them of the reward, they renounce God. And where do the wretched turn, turning away from Him by whom they were made and clinging to the things that were made? When that which was made begins to perish, where will the lover of the temporal be, who lost eternity?

John distinguishes the time of faith and the time of appearance.

Therefore, on account of those goods, which God will not give except to the good, and on account of those evils, which God will not give except to the wicked, because both will appear in the end, God wants to be believed. For what is the reward of faith, or what is the very name of faith altogether, if you only wish to see what you hold? You should not, therefore, see what you believe, but believe what you see; believe as long as you do not see, so that you may not be ashamed when you have seen. Therefore, we believe while it is the time of faith, before it is the time of sight. For so says the Apostle: As long as we are in this body, we are exiled from the Lord. For we walk by faith, not by sight. Therefore, through faith, as long as we believe what we do not see. We will hold sight, when we will see face to face, as it is. The apostle John also distinguishes the time of faith and the time of sight in his epistle, saying: Beloved, now we are children of God, and it has not yet appeared what we shall be. This is the time of faith. See the time of sight. We know, he says, that when He appears, we will be like Him, because we will see Him as He is. The time of faith is laborious. Who denies it? It is laborious, but this is the work whose reward it is. Do not be slothful in the work whose reward you desire. For if you had hired a laborer, you would not count the reward before exercising in the work. You would say to him: "Do it, and receive." He would not say to you: "Give, and I do." Thus it is also with God. You do not deceive your laborer fearing God, and will God himself deceive you, who commands not to deceive the laborer? And yet you may not be able to give what you have promised. And if it is not in your heart the deceit of falseness, surely there is in human frailty the poverty of difficulty. Why do we fear God, who neither can deceive because He is truth, and abounds in all things because He made all things? Our life does not grow but diminishes.

Let us therefore believe in God, brothers. This is the first commandment, this is the beginning of religion and our way, to have a heart fixed in faith, and by fixing the heart in faith to live well, to abstain from seductive goods, to endure temporal evils, and as long as they allure and they threaten, to have a heart steadfast against both, lest you slide into the one or be broken by the other. Therefore, by having self-control and also endurance, when the temporal goods will have passed and the evils which are inflicted will no longer be, you will have a good God, you will have no evil. Therefore, what was said to us in the reading? Son, if you approach to serve God, stand in justice and in fear, and prepare your soul for temptation. Humble your heart and endure; so that your life may grow in the last times— not as it is now, but that in the last times—your life may grow. How much do we think it may grow? So that it may become eternal. For now, human life, as long as it is extended and seems to be extended, decreases rather than increases. Attend and see, reason and see that it decreases. A man is born. For instance, God has allotted him seventy years of life. Life is added to him, we say, by growing. Is it added, or is it subtracted? Behold, from the seventy years, he has lived sixty years, ten remain. What was proposed has diminished, and the more he lives, the less remains to him. Hence, by living here, life decreases, it does not increase. Hold what God has promised you, that in the last times your life may increase.

Greed is to be detested, wisdom is to be loved.

Then it follows what has not been read: Accept everything that has been brought to you, and endure in pain, and in your humility have patience. For gold and silver are tested in fire, but acceptable men in the furnace of humiliation. It seems hard, you have faltered. Have you not lost what does not falter? Why? Many suffer much for perishable money, and you do not want to suffer for enduring life? Thus you refuse to labor for the promises of God, as if, by not laboring for the promises of God, you will not labor for your own desires. How much do robbers suffer for their wickedness, how much do the lost suffer for their crimes, the lustful for their depravity, the traders crossing the sea committing their body and soul to winds and storms for their avarice, leaving their homes, rushing to unknown lands! If a judge pronounces exile, it is a punishment. Greed commands exile, and it is joy. What then does wisdom command you that greed could not also command? And yet when greed commands, you obey. And when you have done what greed commands, what will you have? A house full of gold and silver. Have you not read: Although man walks in an image, he is still in vain disturbed. He stores up riches, and does not know for whom he collects them? Why then did you sing and say to God: Gather my tears in your bottle, that is, Perceive my tears with your ears? Why do you not perceive with your ears his words, from whom you want your tears to be perceived? If you accuse your greed, it will invite you to its wisdom. But when you take on the yoke of wisdom, will it be laborious? Certainly laborious. But consider the end, the reward. Do you not know for whom you are gathering what you collect through wisdom? You are gathering for yourself. Wake up, arise, have the heart of an ant. It is summer time, gather what will benefit you in winter. When it is well for you, it is summer. Therefore, when it is well for you, learn from where you will be sustained when it is ill for you. It is well for you, it is summer. Do not be lazy, gather grains from the Lord's storehouse, the words of God from the Church of God, gather and store them within your heart. For you know it is well. There will come a time when it is ill. Tribulation will come to every man. And even if all things are serene, certainly when he begins to die, he passes through tribulation to another life. Who says: "It will be well for me, and I will not die"?

If you wish to enter into life, keep the commandments.

Although, if you love life and fear death, the fear of death itself is a daily winter. And then the fear of death stings most keenly, when things are going well for us. For when things are bad, we do not fear death. When things are going well for us, then we fear death more. Therefore that rich man, who took great delight in his wealth - for he had great wealth and vast possessions - I believe he was beset by the fear of death, and was wasting away amid his luxuries. For he thought he would leave those goods behind. He had gathered wealth, and did not know for whom, and he desired something eternal, and he came to the Lord, and said to him: "Good Master, what good must I do to gain eternal life?" It is well with me, but what I hold is slipping away. It is well with me, but soon what I have will not be. Tell me how I may have what will always be; tell me how I may attain what I will not lose. And the Lord to him: "If you wish to enter into life, keep the commandments." He inquired, "Which commandments?" He listened. He replied he had kept all of them from his youth. The Lord, the counselor of eternal life, said to him: "One thing you lack. If you wish to be perfect, go, sell all that you have and give to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven." For I have not said: lose, but keep, and come follow me. He who delighted in his riches, and therefore sought from the Lord what good he might do to gain eternal life, because he desired to move from delights to delights, and feared to leave those in which he took pleasure, departed sorrowful to his earthly treasures. He did not want to believe the Lord that he could store in heaven what is perishable on earth. He did not want to be a true lover of his treasure. By holding it poorly, he lost it; by loving it greatly, he missed it. For if he loved it well, he would migrate to heaven, to follow it later himself. God showed him the home where he might migrate, not the place where he would lose. For he followed with the saying: "For where your treasure is, there also will your heart be." But men want to see their riches. Do they not fear to be seen storing up their treasure on earth? They dig, they bury, and they cover. Do they see what they have? Not even he sees. He desires it to be hidden; he fears it being exposed. He wants to be rich in opinion, not in truth. As if it suffices to have it in conscience, because he has kept it on earth! O how much greater and better will your conscience be, if you have kept it in heaven! Here, when you bury on earth, you fear lest your servant knows and takes it and flees; here you fear lest your servant takes it from you. There you do not fear, because your Lord keeps it well for you. "But," you say, "I have a faithful servant, who knows and does not betray and does not take." Compare him to your Lord. If you have found a faithful servant, when has your Lord deceived you? And if your servant cannot take it, he can yet lose it. Your Lord can neither take nor lose it, nor permit it to perish. He keeps it for you, remains for you, delivers you, makes you abiding. He will not lose you, nor lose what you have entrusted to Him. "Come," He says, "receive what you have placed with Me." God forbid. God does not say this. "I," He says to you, "who forbade you to lend at interest, have been lent by you. For you wished to grow by interest, and you gave to man so that he might return more to you, and when he received it, rejoicing, and when he repaid it, weeping. This you wanted, and I forbade it. For I said: He who does not give his money at interest. I forbade you from usury. I command you interest, lend to Me." This your Lord says to you: "Do you want to give little and receive more? Leave the man who weeps when you demand. Find Me, who rejoices when I repay. Behold," He says, "here I am. Give and take. At the time of repayment, I will repay you. And what will I repay? You gave little, take more; you gave earthly things, take heavenly things; you gave temporal things, take eternal things; you gave what is mine, take Me Myself. For what have you given, unless from what you received from Me? Therefore, will I not repay what you have given, I who gave you from what to give? I who gave you yourself to give, I who gave you Christ to whom to give, who said to you: When you did this to one of the least of these, you did it unto Me." Behold to whom you give. He feeds and hungers for you; He gives and needs. When He gives, you wish to receive; when He needs, you do not wish to give. Christ needs, when the poor need. He who is prepared to give eternal life to all His own, has been deemed worthy to receive temporarily in each poor person. Our laborers are poor. And he gives advice on where to depart. For he indeed gave the advice on where you should depart. Depart from the earth to heaven, so that you do not lose. For how many have lost what they were maintaining, and even so, having not learned to correct themselves, they did not learn to place it in heaven. Thus, he who might perhaps say to you: “Transfer your wealth from the West to the East if you do not want it to perish,” you would be anxious, laborious, eager, considering how great the things you have are, you would see that due to the multiplicity of your possessions, you could not easily transfer them to distant places. And perhaps you would be made so, because you would be compelled to go, and you would not find how to take with you what you had gathered. He commanded you to depart to more distant places, who did not say: “Transfer from the West to the East,” but: “Transfer from the earth to heaven.” You are anxious, as if you are suffering a greater difficulty, and say to yourself: “If I could not find beasts of burden and ships, by which I could transfer from the West to the East, how will I find ladders to transfer from the earth to heaven?” “Do not,” says God to you, “labor, do not labor. I, who made you rich, who gave you what to give, made the poor your carriers.” If, for instance, you found someone impoverished across the sea, or where you wanted to go, you found a citizen there afflicted by necessity, you would say to yourself: “This citizen is from there where I want to go. He is in need here. I give him what he may return to me there.” Behold, this poor person is in need here. He is a citizen of the kingdom of heaven. Why do you hesitate to make a transfer? For those who do this give in such a way as to receive more when they arrive at those places from where he who received it is. Let us do likewise.

God will give what He has promised. This happens if we believe, if we stir up faith. For we are troubled in vain. Why are we troubled in vain? Because when Christ was sleeping in the ship, the disciples were nearly shipwrecked. Jesus was sleeping, and the disciples were troubled. The winds were raging, the waves were stirred up, the ship was being submerged. Why? Because Jesus was sleeping. Likewise, when the storms of temptations rage in this world, your heart is troubled, as if your ship. Why, except because your faith is sleeping? For thus the Apostle Paul says, because Christ dwells through faith in our hearts. Therefore, awaken Christ in your heart, let your faith be vigilant, let your conscience be calm, and your ship will be liberated. Realize that He who promised is truthful. He has not yet shown, because it is not yet time to show. However, He has already shown many things. He promised and gave His Christ; He promised and gave His resurrection; He promised and gave His Gospel; He promised and gave His Church to be spread throughout the whole world; He foretold and showed these very tribulations and the heaps of calamities in human affairs. How many things remain? What was promised is being fulfilled, what was foretold is being fulfilled. And do you falter lest what remains shall not come? Then you ought to fear if you did not see what was foretold. There are wars, famines, devastations. One kingdom rises above another, there are earthquakes, exaggerations of calamities, abundance of scandals, coldness of charity, abundance of iniquity. Read all these, they were foretold. Read, see that all you see was foretold, and believe that you will see what has not yet come, counting how many have come. But seeing God show what He foretold, do you not believe He will give what He promised? There you must believe, where you begin to be troubled. The labor passes, rest will come.

If the end of the world is, we must migrate from the world, not love the world. Behold, the world is disturbed, and the world is loved. What if the world were peaceful? How would you cling to the beautiful, who so embrace the foul? How would you gather flowers rightly, who do not withdraw your hand from thorns? You do not wish to leave the world, the world leaves you, and you follow the world. Therefore, let us cleanse our heart, dearest ones, and let us not lose endurance but attain wisdom and hold steadfastness. Labor passes, rest will come; false delights pass away, and the good that the faithful soul has desired will come, for which every pilgrim in the age burns and sighs: a good homeland, a heavenly homeland, a homeland with the peoples of the angels, a homeland where no citizen dies, where no enemy is admitted, a homeland where you will have God as an eternal friend, where you fear no enemy.

Sermons - Sermon 380

SERMO 380 On the Birth of John the Baptist The birth of John, not his passion, is celebrated in the Church. A quiet and small voice suffices. But if you wish, brothers, to listen quietly, do not have a heart in your ears, but ears in your heart. The Church hands down and believes that today dawned the solemnity of blessed John the Baptist. It is necessary, however, to believe this about this very day, which the entire world recognizes without variation: but because no one doubts that it is the day of John, not of John who wrote the Gospel, but of John the Baptist, the forerunner of the Lord, who appeared so great because he presented himself as humble, saying, when he was thought to be the Christ himself, that he was not worthy to untie the strap of the sandal of Him whom he recognized as the Lord, so that he might merit to be His friend. Some, however, think that today the day of his martyrdom is celebrated. Let Your Holiness first know that it is the day of his birth, not of his martyrdom. Indeed, it is found from the gospel reading that his birth preceded by six months the birth of the Lord. And since the day of the Lord's birth is given by the consensus of the Church on the eighth day before the calends of January, it remains that today is understood as the day of John's birth.

Two births of Christ, one eternal, the other temporal.

Therefore, John preceded the Lord, not as a teacher before a disciple, but as a precursor before a judge; not to assume authority, but to provide service. The testimony of John himself concerning this is as follows: "He who comes after me has surpassed me because he was before me." After John, the Lord came by being born of the Virgin Mary, not of the substance of the Father. For we acknowledge two births of the Lord: one divine, the other human; however, both are miraculous—one without a mother, the other without a father—one eternal, to create the temporal; the other temporal, to bestow the eternal. He of whom John speaks, not John the Baptist, but the Evangelist says, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God," and that "all things were made through Him, and without Him nothing was made." He so great in the form of God, equal to the Father, He creating time without being bound to time, He, antecedent to all ages, became so small as to be born of a woman, yet remained so great that He was never separated from the Father. Offering service and testimony to Him, as a lamp to the coming day, all the Prophets foretold Him, appeared before Him in their birth, and adhered to Him in their faith. It was fitting that He should be proclaimed as coming, to perform miracles: by which miracles, He would be recognized as God by the understanding, and appear as man to human sight; small to the small, but humble to the proud: teaching man in His smallness to recognize himself as small; that he might not, by failing to grow but by puffing up, believe himself to be great. For pride is not greatness but swelling. So, to heal this swelling of the human race, the physician himself, being both the medicine and administering the medicine, appeared among humans as a human, offering his humanity to those who saw and preserving His divinity for those who believed. For the sight of His humanity healed the sick; the contemplation of His divinity sought the strong. And men were not yet capable of seeing God in man, nor could they see except as man; yet they should not place their hope in man. What then could be done? Man could see a man; man should not follow another man. God was to be followed, who could not be seen; man should not be followed, who could be seen. Therefore, to present to man both someone who could be seen and whom man could follow, God became man. O man, for whom God became man, you must believe something great about yourself: but descend so that you may ascend; because even God, by descending, became man. Cling to your medicine, imitate your teacher, acknowledge your Lord, embrace your brother, understand your God. This He, so great and so little, a worm, not a man; but through whom man was made. This therefore is He; what about John, except what the Lord says about him, except what truth says about him? For if we ought to believe John about the truth, shall we not believe the truth about John?

Against the Arians, it is demonstrated that the Word was in the beginning, and therefore was not created.

Let the first witness to the truth be one who participates in the truth itself; and let the Creator of man bear witness to man. First, let us hear what John says about Christ, and then what Christ says about John; let us hear the former, but understand the latter: let him speak first who was born first, but let him be confirmed by him through whom he was made. After me, he says, he comes, and he was made before me. Here now, those who believe that he was made before all things through whom all things were made, attack us by these words or through these words, and they say: Behold, he was made: John says: He comes after me, and he was made before me. Explain to me what it means: he was made before me. I speak their words, and I propose them for discussion. They often say, when something of this kind is said about Christ, showing that he is lesser than the Father, that the statement should be referred to the human nature; so that what is in the form of God is equal to the Father, but what he emptied himself taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men, and being found in appearance as a man, the Father is greater. So what will you say to what John says: he was made before me? Hear what we say: but first observe that the Apostle, distinguishing both, and yet commending the same one in both, did not say: Taking the form of God. But what did he say about the form of God? When he was in the form of God: looking back at the one who was called before him, in whose Gospel it is: In the beginning was the Word; indeed looking back at that light, whence also he spoke this. For John did not say: In the beginning God made the Word: he could have said so, as Moses said, because he was speaking of the creature made by the Lord God: In the beginning God made heaven and earth. Since then, if he felt what the Arians feel, he could have said: In the beginning God made the Word; he did not say this: but he said: In the beginning was the Word. What was in the beginning, was not made. For nothing preceded the made Word. For all things that God made, He made by the Word: He spoke, and they were made; He commanded, and they were created. There is a great difference between the one saying let it be made, and what was made by saying; but if He is saying, He has the Word; if He has the Word, He made by the Word; if He made by the Word, He did not make the Word. A certain sophism of the Arians is refuted.

Why, they say? Have you not heard also about the earth: The earth was invisible and unformed? If for this reason, they say, you assert the Word was not made, because it is said: The Word was; neither was the earth made, because it was said: The earth was. O blind and heretical madness! Pay attention, if there is where you should pay attention; listen, if there is where you should listen: let not the sound strike the ear in vain, whose heart is enlightened by the truth. I will state the words of the same Scripture, which you found there when you read, and overlooked when you argued. Indeed, for this reason you think something similar was said about the Word of God, when it was said: In the beginning was the Word; as it was said about the earth, because it was said: The earth was invisible and unformed.

I will recite to you the earlier words in this book of Genesis, that before the servant of God's writer said: The earth was; so that it appeared it was made, he first said: In the beginning, God made heaven and earth. Behold, I have first shown you the earth made; and undoubtedly made by God, with Scripture sounding and bursting into the ears of the one refusing: In the beginning, God made heaven and earth. These had been made; but not yet adorned, not yet declared: the earth not yet distinct, but nevertheless already made. However, lest you suppose the earth was made continuously in such a manner that there was nothing to be adorned on it, he next said: It was indeed made, because in the beginning God made heaven and earth; but the earth which God made was still invisible and unformed. He showed you what kind it was, which was made; not because it was, what was not made.

Therefore John could say: In the beginning God made the Word, but the Word was; as: In the beginning God made heaven and earth; but the earth was: so that this would be the order of the words: In the beginning God made the Word, and the Word was with God; that we might understand that this Word was with God, what Word God had made. Now, however, you hear: In the beginning was the Word. Why do you seek what was made earlier, being later in your error? For you have become later in your error: you speak from the low, and look to the low. I wish, if you were to speak from the low, that you would lift your heart upward, and cry out from the depths to the Lord: He would break the clouds of the darkness of your flesh, the light which comes in humility would open your eyes; you would see: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God; this was in the beginning with God.

Let Paul also say: Who, being in the form of God. What does John say about human birth? And the Word was made flesh. Let Paul also say: He emptied himself, taking the form of a servant. What then were you saying about the words of John the Baptist? Now repeat those same words to me, now speak them. What does John the Baptist say? After me comes. I recognize the birth. One from a barren woman, the other from a virgin. Sterility was turned into fruitfulness: virginity remained after fruitfulness.

Christ, made before John, preceded him in honor. But John, he says, if he had said "made" in the sense that he was born of the Virgin, he would not have said "he was made before me"; for he was made from the Virgin after him. Therefore, "he was made before me" — what does it mean except that in the beginning the Word was made? For so he was before John; indeed, he was born from the Virgin after John. Understand, and if you do not quarrel, pay attention. For perhaps what you wish to understand is somewhat obscure, so that by quarreling you increase the smoke, which hinders you from understanding. Look at that Scripture first, which teaches you to be teachable. Be meek in hearing the word, so that you may understand. Endure, therefore, for a little while; perhaps we will find how it was said: "he was made before me"; yet let us not understand the Word to be made by which all things were made. How, he says? If I can, I will say: if I cannot say, yet it is not that there lacks someone who can say it. But I believe and hope that the majesty of the Only Begotten, who, although He was the Word, was made an infant, will open the infancy of my tongue, and will make in my mouth the birth, who made the conception in the heart. Behold, I will say as I can: understand as you can; and what you cannot understand, do not blame, as if you are already great; but defer, so that you may deserve to grow. Certainly, this moves you: how it was said, "He who comes after me has been made before me." Let it move you plainly as a seeker, not as a quarreller. Certainly, I too seek with you: we will find together if we seek together; we will both receive if we both ask; it will be opened to both of us if we both knock. He comes after me, he says: recognize the birth from the Virgin Mary. He was made before me: what is this, "He was made before me"? Understand, he was put before me. He who came after me was made before me. How is it if two walk on a path, and one is slower, the other faster, and the slower precedes somewhat, but after a little while the faster follows; the preceding slower one looks back at the faster follower, and says: He comes after me. And behold, as he quickens and approaches and adheres and passes, the former sees the one before him, whom he looked back upon behind him: certainly if he somehow dreads and marvels at his speed, could his words not be: Behold, the man who was after me was made before me? What is this: "He who was after me was made before me"? He who walked behind me, by his speed was made to be before me. For if you understand wherever you read "was made," except that it signifies "formed" who was not: will you also say that the Lord God was made, about whom it is said: "The Lord has been made my refuge." "The Lord has been made a helper"; and: "He has been made my salvation." How many times "made"? And He Himself made all things. Therefore, understand with me the words. For John did not fail to mention also that He was the Word; lest you think he indicated the Word when he said: "He was made before me": so that you may know that this pertains to "He was made before me," because He surpassed me, because He was glorified more than me, because when men considered me forerunner, they recognized the Lord, whom I preceded by birth, whom I announced by serving; and their hope, their gathering was made towards the Lord; he was glorified as the Son of God, made before me, according to that which the Apostle says: "Therefore God exalted him, and gave him the name which is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, in heaven and on earth and under the earth." Therefore, His glory did not begin, but was made known. He was made before John because He surpassed John in honor.

Let us humble ourselves and exalt God: the glory of God is our glory. But see whether justly. Ask John himself: He who comes after you, why was he made before you? He who followed you, why was he preferred to you? He answers: Because he was before me. This is: In the beginning was the Word. Therefore, he was justly made before me, because he was before me. Before John, before Abraham, before Adam, before heaven and earth, before angels, thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers. Why before? Because all things were made through him. Let the servant acknowledge his humility: let the Lord show His majesty. Let John say: I am not worthy to undo the strap of His sandal. He would humble himself greatly if he said: I am worthy. For what if he said worthy? Should he sit in judgment at the right hand of the Father? Should he come to judge the living and the dead? What if he said worthy to undo the strap of His sandal? Great humility, if he is worthy as a friend of the bridegroom. For he was to say that he was a friend of the bridegroom: and lest equality in that friendship be by chance understood by some imprudent person; he says he is a friend because of love, lowers himself to the feet because of reverence. And it is little that he lays himself down at the feet; he does not even say he is worthy to undo the strap of the sandal. Truly humble, if he were worthy to undo; but because he does not even say he is worthy to undo, he is worthy to be exalted from humility. Let him also say more openly, let him say more distinctly, what it is: After me comes, who was made before me. For he also gave the reason: because he was before me. Because: In the beginning was the Word; and: Being in the form of God, he did not consider equality with God something to be grasped. He must increase, but I must decrease. It was necessary for him who came later to grow, and for him who came earlier to decrease. If he who came later increased, he was made before him by growing. He must increase, but I must decrease. This is, he was made before me. And how did Christ grow, and John decrease? John preceded the Lord in human birth; they both grew in age, in bodily stature, and reached a certain measure as men. But John was a man, Christ God and man. If we understand that Christ grew in divinity, we are absurd, and greatly mistaken. For something grows so that it may advance. God has no where to grow: if He has where to grow, He was less before He grew. Let us return to the form of the flesh. It grew along with John, not because John diminished. Therefore, let us perhaps refer to glory; and understand: He must increase, but I must decrease, according to what is said, that he comes after me, and he was made before me. For John bore the person of man, and was speaking from the type of the human race, to which Christ came to save. But, brothers, we had said that a humble God came to a proud man. Let man acknowledge himself a man, let God appear to man. Even if Christ came for this reason, that man might be humbled, and from humility man might grow; it was necessary for the glory of man to now cease, and for the glory of God to be commended: that the hope of man be in the glory of God, not in his own glory, as the Apostle says: Let him who glories, glory in the Lord. Rightly, therefore, it is said to man: What do you have that you did not receive? But if you received it, why do you boast as though you did not? John, showing this type of human humility, because as much as the opinion and fame of Christ grew, not the stature of Christ, not the majesty of Christ, not the wisdom, not the Word of God; but that fame, which began from the least, and now holds the whole world: the glory of Christ, not the glory of man, so that man may acknowledge his humility, may God impart His divinity. For indeed, brothers, the glory of God is our glory. As much as God is more sweetly glorified, so much it benefits us. For God will not be higher because we honor Him: let us humble ourselves, and exalt Him. For it is written: I will exalt You, O Lord. What is it: I will exalt You? Was He on earth, and you placed Him in heaven? And does man exalt God? What is it: I will exalt You? I will confess You as lofty. Therefore, let man confess himself a man; let him first decrease, so that he may grow. Let John, by decreasing to humility, say that he is not worthy to loosen the strap of His sandal, and understand that he is enlightened by participating.

John was not the true light, but a lamp illuminated. For John the Evangelist said about him: "He was not the light." Perhaps he wronged John, because he said: "He was not the light"; whereas it was said by the Lord to the Apostles: "You are the light of the world." Did the Apostles put themselves above John? They do not, lest they judge the Lord himself as a liar, who said: "Among those born of women, none has arisen greater than John the Baptist." Not certainly greater in bodily stature, but in the grace of partaken wisdom, in the grace of partaken salvation. Therefore, what does he mean by: "He was not the light, but came to bear witness to the light"? Why did he say this? I know, he says, what to say: to bear witness to the light. For the true light was distinct from John, yet John was not entirely without light, but it should be understood that in comparison to this light it is said: "He was not the light"; as it was said because he was the true light. How do you distinguish this true [light]? "That enlightens every man coming into this world." If it enlightens every man, then also John. But lest it seem that we infer from the words what is not said, though it is consequently to be understood, let John himself say: "We all have received from his fullness." Therefore, the true light was indeed. John, illuminated light; Christ, illuminating light. For that you may know that John was light, let the Lord himself bear witness. He himself bore witness to his Lord, the witness of truth about his Lord, which he received from his Lord. For he had received from his Lord to speak about his Lord: but for him to speak about his servant, he had not received from his servant: and in himself, Christ about John, and in John, Christ about himself. Therefore, let the truth itself bear witness, let us hear that John is light. It is said to the Jews about John: "He was a burning and shining lamp." And certainly a lamp is light, not like the day, but still, it is light. Therefore, a lamp is lit to shine, and John was illuminated to speak. If John was illuminated to speak, let him recognize himself as a lamp, lest he be extinguished by the wind of pride. But perhaps the light of the disciples and John the lamp? For the Lord said of John: "He was a burning and shining lamp"; but of the disciples: "You are the light of the world." Did he prefer his disciples to John? And are those faithful ones to whom Paul speaks to be preferred to John, to whom he says: "For you were once darkness, but now you are light in the Lord"? Therefore, the Apostles are light, and the faithful justified from sinners, made faithful from unbelievers: yet the disciples were not called lamps. Pay attention, perhaps they were called so, and not in another place, but there: to show how he called them light; because not the true light, which enlightens every man coming into this world; follow the words of the Gospel: "You are the light of the world. A city set on a hill cannot be hidden." But did he speak of the city, not of the light? Follow further: "Nor do they light a lamp and put it under a bushel." You are such light as John: an illuminated lamp. As whose voice, or whose voice preceded: "You will light my lamp, O Lord; my God, illuminate my darkness." What darkness in the Apostles? "We were also once," etc., as of those reproachful and blasphemous: "Who was formerly a blasphemer, a persecutor, and an insolent man. Behold, darkness, let the lamp be lit: But I obtained mercy." And to know it was said of them: "Nor do they light a lamp and put it under a bushel, but on a lampstand, so that it gives light to all who are in the house; immediately follows: So let your light shine before men, that they may see your good works," but in humility, for a man must decrease. But how does God increase? "And glorify your Father who is in heaven." The Father is glorified, the Son is glorified: for the Father glorifies the Son, and the Son glorifies the Father. Therefore, let man recognize himself as humble, let him recognize the exalted God humbled for him, so that man, who was humbled in the confession of sin, may be exalted in the attainment of righteousness. These two: the Lord and John, humility and clarity: God humble in clarity, man humble in infirmity; God humble for man, man humble for man. For God is humble to benefit man, man humble not to harm himself.

John's martyrdom for the truth. Christ increases, John diminishes.

Let us, therefore, recognize these two and the very difference in their sufferings. We read that John suffered martyrdom for the truth: but was it for Christ? Not for Christ, if Christ is not the truth. Not entirely for the name itself, but still for the truth itself. For John was not beheaded because he confessed Christ. But he was admonishing temperance, he was admonishing justice: he said, "It is not lawful for you to have your brother's wife." For the law that had commanded this, had commanded concerning those who would die without children, that the brothers should take the wives of their brothers and raise up seed for their brothers. Where this cause was not, there was nothing but lust. John was reproving this lust, a chaste man reproving incest: because what it prefigured was also such: "He must increase, but I must decrease." It had already been commanded that if anyone died without seed, the one who was closer should take his wife and raise up seed for his brother. For what else had God commanded this, except that in this way the seed to be raised for the brother's name would be signified? For this command was that whoever was born from this, would bear the name of the deceased. Christ died, and the Apostles took his wife, the Church. Those whom they begot from her, they did not name Paulinians or Petryans, but Christians. Therefore, let these two sufferings speak: "He must increase, but I must decrease." He grew on the wood, he was diminished by iron. The passions also spoke this mystery; let the days also speak. Christ is born, and they increase; John is born, and they decrease. Therefore let the honor of man decrease, let the honor of God increase; that the honor of man may be found in the honor of God.

Sermons - Sermon 381

SERMO 381 On the Birthdays of the Apostles Peter and Paul A great sign of concord that they are both celebrated on one day. In the apostle Peter, the weak things of the world were chosen. Paul, having become a witness of Christ, teaches the mercy of God. The day of the apostles Peter and Paul, on which they deserved the triumphal crown after defeating the devil, as the Roman faith testifies, is today. For them, a solemn festival is celebrated, and a solemn sermon should also be given. Let them hear praises from us, let them pour out prayers for us. According to the tradition of the fathers, it is remembered that they were not martyred on the same day during the passage of time. Therefore, Paul suffered on Peter's birthday, not the day he was born from his mother's womb into the number of men, but the day he was born from the bond of flesh into the light of Angels; and thus single days were given to both, so that now one is celebrated for both. This seems to me to be a great sign of harmony: the last called to the same day as his co-apostle, crowned on the same day he was called. He was chosen before the Lord's passion, the other after His ascension. Unequal in the order of time, equal in the eternity of happiness: one from a fisherman, the other from a persecutor. In the former, the weak things of the world were chosen to confound the strong; in the latter, sin abounded so that grace might abound. In both, the great grace and glory of God have manifested, who made their merits, not found them. For what else did He aim to demonstrate, who first wished to call fishermen to the kingdom and was later to call emperors, except that he who glories may glory in the Lord? For indeed, He did not despise the salvation of the noble, learned, and powerful, but placed the lowly, unlearned, and weak above them. But unless the lowliness of the weak had first been chosen, the pride of the lofty would not be healed. If the rich had first been called by Christ, they would think and say that nothing but wealth, eloquent doctrine, the splendor of knowledge, nobility, and royal power was chosen. And thus, swollen with temporal and secular felicities, they would think they were first contributing these things to Christ, so that He would seem to return to them what they would become by God's grace, neither understanding nor holding it tightly. How much better, how much more orderly is it then that He first raises the poor from the earth and lifts the needy from the dungheap to set them with the powerful of His people; so that the gift of understanding and doctrine is not only from God but also appears to be from God? How great then is the joy and glory of God when we see the scorn of the wealth of an emperor by the soul of a fisherman? The prayers of the emperor are poured out at the memory of the fisherman? so that the former is not cast down by what he did not have, nor the latter puffed up by what he had? And what Christ worked in Paul, making him from a persecutor into a preacher, how much this may contribute to human salvation, let the Apostle himself speak that no one conscious of great sins may despair of God's mercy. Human speech, he says, is worthy of full acceptance, because Christ Jesus came into this world to save sinners, among whom I am the first. But for this reason, I received mercy, that in me first Christ Jesus might show all long-suffering, as a pattern for those who are going to believe in Him for eternal life. Who, then, being inspired by such a great example, could despair of salvation under the hand of the Almighty Physician, considering that he who once ravaged the faith he now preaches, not only escaped the punishment of the persecutor but also deserved the crown of the teacher, and whose blood he sought in his members to shed in his rage, he poured out his own blood in faith for His name? Therefore, Rome has the head of the nations, two lights of the nations kindled by Him who illuminates every man coming into this world: one, in which God elevated humble weakness; the other, in which He healed condemnable sin. In the one, let us learn not to boast; in the other, not to despair. How briefly the great examples set before us teach, how beneficial they are; which we should always remember, and in their praise magnify the true light. Therefore, let no one exalt himself in the lofty status of this world: Peter was a fisherman. Let no one flee from God's mercy by thinking of their own sinfulness: Paul was a persecutor. The former says: The Lord became a refuge for the poor; the latter says: I will teach the wicked Your ways, and sinners shall be converted to You.

Sermons - Sermon 382

SERMO 382 SERMON ON THE FEAST OF SAINT STEPHEN THE FIRST MARTYR It is commanded that we love our enemies. The Lord and our Savior Jesus Christ commands us something and promises something. What he commands is here. What he promises is elsewhere. What he commands is finite, because it is temporal. What he promises is not finite, because it is eternal. What he commands is work. What he promises is reward. Here your Holiness should observe how great is his mercy towards us, that he has placed toil here with an end, and a reward in heaven without end. And therefore we should first labor here and afterward receive the reward in heaven rather than wish to receive the reward here and afterward toil. For concerning some, the Lord says: Truly I say to you, they have received their reward. But perhaps you are slow to receive the reward from labor. With what face do you ask for what God promises and not do what God commands? First fulfill the precept and thus demand the promise. First, I say, listen to the one commanding and then demand from the one promising. For he commands us to love our enemies. Love, he says, your enemies, do good to those who hate you and pray for those who persecute and slander you. A grave precept, but a great reward. Love your enemies. It is work. Do good to those who hate you and pray for those who persecute and slander you. And lest you fear the toil, he immediately subjoined the reward: So that you may be, he says, the children of your Father who is in heaven, who makes his sun rise on the good and the evil and sends rain on the just and the unjust. The example of Christ who prayed for his murderers.

Pay attention to the Lord Himself who commanded this, for He did it. After all the impious Jews had done to Him, those who repaid Him evil for good, did He not, while hanging on the cross, say: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do? He prayed as a man, who was heard with the Father. For even now He prays in us, prays for us, is prayed to by us. He prays in us as our priest, prays for us as our head, is prayed to by us as our God. Therefore, when He was praying while hanging on the cross, He saw and foresaw: He saw all His enemies, but foresaw that many of them would become friends. Hence, He sought pardon for all of them. They were raging; He was praying. They said to Pilate: Crucify; He cried out: Father, forgive. And though He was hanging with harsh nails, He did not lose His gentleness. They were raging; they were barking all around; they were shaking their heads, which were not sound, and like madmen around a singular physician set in the midst, they were raging all around. He was hanging and healing. He was hanging and yet expending. He did not come down, for He was making medicines for the mad from His blood. Indeed, after the resurrection, He healed those whom He had endured as most insane while hanging. Behold why Christ came: so that He might not lose what He had found but might seek and save what had perished, so that by loving raging enemies He might make them believing friends.

Stephen's example for praying for the stoners. But lest perhaps you say that it is too much for you to imitate your Lord, who suffered for you, leaving you an example so that you might follow in His footsteps, consider Stephen, your fellow servant. He was a man like you, born of the mass of sin like you, redeemed by the same price as you, he was a deacon as you know. When he was being struck by a shower of stones from the Jews, he not only did not threaten, but moreover prayed for pardon for his stoners. "Lord," he said, "do not hold this sin against them." As if he said: "I will die in the flesh, let them not perish in mind." They were throwing stones, he was sending prayers ahead.

How much the prayer of Stephen availed in the conversion of Paul. As your Holiness knows how powerful the prayer of the holy martyr was, let us recall together that young man named Saul who, when Saint Stephen was being stoned, kept the garments of all those stoning him, so that he seemed to be stoning with everyone's hands. Afterwards, as you know - for I speak to those who know, to my brothers, to the sons of my Father, to fellow disciples - afterwards he received letters from the chief priests, so that he could bring back to Jerusalem in chains any followers of the Christian way, men and women, to be tortured and punished. As he was on his way, suddenly a light from heaven shone around him. He fell and heard a voice saying to him: Saul, Saul, why are you persecuting me? It is hard for you to kick against the goad, because you will wound not the goad but the feet with which you kick. And he said: Who are you, Lord? Although you fell once, you acknowledged the Lord: Who are you, Lord? And He answered: I am Jesus of Nazareth, whom you are persecuting. Why do you rise against me to your harm and not rather humble yourself for your good? Saul, Saul, what is between you and me? Despite all the wrongs you commit against me, I could indeed have destroyed you long ago, but my Stephen prayed for you. When he was cast down he was raging, when he was lifted up he believed. Cast down as a wolf, lifted up as a lamb. Cast down as a persecutor, lifted up as a preacher. I say plainly, I say more explicitly: cast down as the son of perdition, lifted up as the vessel of election. For if Saint Stephen had not prayed in this way, the Church would not have Paul. But Paul was lifted up from the ground because on the ground the prayer of Saint Stephen was heard.

God does not want the death of the sinner, and teaches us to pray for our enemies. But against such things, so you, whoever you are, who does not love. Bend the knee, strike the forehead on the ground, cry out and say: God, kill the evil. Even you who pray thus, that a man may die, pray badly against evil and you have already become two evils. You cry out and say: God, kill the evil. He will answer you: Which one of you? Let your Holiness take heed, I speak a known truth. A human judge does not kill the criminal by himself, but orders it and the executioner kills. And you, when you say: Lord, kill the enemy; you make yourself a judge and you seek God to be the executioner. And God will answer you: I will not be the torturer of the sinner but the liberator, because I do not desire the death of the sinner but that he may be converted and live. Before you came invited, did you not blaspheme me? did you not provoke me with evil deeds? did you not wish to wipe my name from the earth? did you not despise me in my precepts or in my servants? If I had killed you then, the enemy, whom would I now make a friend? Rather God says to you: I will teach you to imitate me. Hanging on the cross, I said: Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing. I taught this to my soldiers, I taught this to the holy martyrs. Be you also my soldier against the devil. Otherwise, you will fight invincibly in no other way, unless you pray for your enemies.

Sermons - Sermon 383

SERMO 383 ON THE ANNIVERSARY DAY OF EPISCOPAL ORDINATION How he still carried the burden of the episcopate with himself must be investigated.

Indeed, on every day and at every hour, and with continuous care, most beloved, the bishop ought to ponder the weight of the stewardship he bears and how he will render account to his Lord. Nevertheless, when the anniversary of our ordination arises, then the burden of this office is especially considered as if it were newly imposed. It is significant that on the day we first received this, we thought only about how it should be carried out. But on subsequent days, especially on the one where its solemnity is observed, we counsel not only with cautious foresight about its future conduct but also with careful remembrance, we recall how past actions were conducted: so that we may imitate ourselves in good deeds, and if any blameworthy things have occurred, we take care that they are not repeated, pray that they are forgiven; and flee the accusation of the devil with diligence in doing right where we can; and where we cannot, overcome him with the piety of confession. For just as future sins are committed by neglecting justice, so past ones are reinforced by defending injustice. Therefore, just as charity prevents them from happening, humility erases those that have; so that what can no longer be avoided by doing right can at least be forgiven by not being prideful. Indeed, we have learned to say to our Father, who is in heaven: “Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors.” So that we may say this truthfully, we must also love our enemies, though we ought to have them only if justice compels us. For if people are our enemies due to the merits of our evildoings, we should not be concerned to forgive them their debts but rather fear that we might repay them. For if they hate us for our iniquity, they are our debtors, not we theirs.

He forgives his debtors, but he urges them to conversion. On this solemn day of my episcopate, I will first address briefly my debtors, who unknowingly intercede for me before God, while they commit debts that I remit, so that I may also deserve to have my debts forgiven. Therefore, I say to you whether present or absent, to whom I become an enemy by preaching the truth, to whom I seem burdensome by advising, whose interests I seek and am compelled to offend their will: Do not be like the horse and the mule, which have no understanding. For these beasts especially attack with kick and bite those who treat them, so that their wounds might be tended. I do not spare you, do not spare me: I oppose you, you oppose me: you resist, I resist. Wrestling brings us together, but the cause separates us. You are an enemy to the healer, I am an enemy to the disease: you to my diligence, I to your pestilence. They returned, he said, evil for good; but I prayed. What did he pray, except: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do? When they, he said, revile you, and say all manner of evil against you falsely for my sake, rejoice and be glad, for your reward is great in heaven. Yet you should correct your perversion, acknowledge our love; return love for love: we do not wish a greater reward with your perdition. This, to my debtors, to whom I remit, so that it might be remitted to me, may now suffice.

He entreats those whom he may have accidentally offended to forgive him his debts and testifies his love to them.

Next, even those to whom I am a debtor must be addressed somewhat. For as the Apostle says: "I am a debtor both to Greeks and to barbarians, both to the wise and to the unwise." For such a debtor am I also, due to the smallness of my strength and the portion of stewardship, not to some but to all. But now I speak of those debts which I desire to be forgiven me, not demanded from me. For I am not puffed up with such vanity of mind to dare say that since I have borne the burden of this office, no man has been wrongfully harmed by me. For anyone occupied and stretched with so many and so troublesome duties, if not impossible, it is certainly difficult: how much more for me, who know my weakness, which I offer with yours and for me in your prayers to be healed by our Lord God by day and night? Therefore, disturbed by the storms and difficulties of various cares, if perchance I did not listen as I should have when requested, if I looked at someone more bitterly than was necessary, if I sent forth harsher words than I should have, if I disturbed a heart that was saddened and in need of assistance with an unsuitable response, if I overlooked, postponed, or even with a harsh gesture saddened a poor man pressing me urgently when my mind was on something else; if to anyone suspecting something false about me as a man from a man, I was unjustly excessively indignant, if anyone did not recognize in his conscience what I humanly suspected of him; you to whom I admit I am a debtor for these and similar offenses, at the same time believe me to be your lover. For the mother often steps on her chicks in straits, but with not her whole weight of the foot, and does not therefore cease to be a mother. Forgive, so that you may be forgiven. Forgive a debtor of difficulty loving you, who ought not to hold debts against enemies out of cruelty. In short, I beseech you all, commend you to the Lord my care for you: from this rightly I seek your care for me; so that whatever in the past was of my offenses, He may mercifully forgive and not severely recognize. That whatever time will be mine henceforth under this burden, let Him guide the traveler, and make pleasing to His eyes and useful to you; so that the sight of Him may find you not in my horror and punishment, but in my joy and crown.

Sermons - Sermon 384

SERMO 384 On the Trinity, or On the Old and New Scriptures AGAINST THE ARIANS

What God is.

Holy and divine words, brothers, are recited to us continually, indeed daily, for our benefit, so that our souls may be nourished: and in the future age may be filled with eternal feasts; as the prophet says: I shall be satisfied when Your glory is revealed. But what this future glory is, with what riches it blossoms, and with what splendor it shines, we can praise, but we cannot explain. Why? Because we read: Eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor has it entered into the heart of man, what God has prepared for those who love Him. If therefore such and so great are the eternal and heavenly goods which the Almighty Lord has prepared for His holy, catholic, and faithful people; what is God Himself, who has prepared such and so great things? What is, I say, Almighty God? What, except immeasurable, ineffable, incomprehensible, above all, beyond all, besides all? For He transcends all His creation, surpasses all His works, excelling all. For if you ask about greatness, He is greater; if beauty, more beautiful; if sweetness, sweeter; if splendor, more radiant; if justice, more just; if strength, stronger; if mercy, more merciful. For no reason permits that any creation should be equal to its creator, or a work be compared to its artist: as it is read in the prophet: He who made strong things is stronger; and He who made beautiful things is more beautiful than them. The Trinity in unity, and unity in the Trinity consists.

Thus we proclaim the lofty distinctions of this unique deity, not as Jews, but as Christians, we equally confess the mysteries of the divine Trinity. For just as the Father is almighty and ineffable, so the Son is almighty and incomprehensible: thus also the Holy Spirit, indiscriminately connected in the Father and the Son, is ineffable and immense. For the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are one almighty God, one in trinity, one in power, unity, trinity, eternal majesty, one powerful in all things, and the trinity in unity, and unity in trinity subsists: yet neither is the trinity divided, nor is the unity separated. Armed and instructed with this catholic faith, dearest ones, let us briefly question the impious Arian heretics, who brazenly assert themselves at this time and corrupt and deceive many of our Christians by seduction, how they pray to the Lord when they believe against the Lord. They respond to us, saying: We pray to the Lord indeed in trinity, but as we read, the Father is greater, the Son lesser, the Holy Spirit inferior, because Christ himself says: The Father is greater than I.

We respond to this: Do you thus, I ask, pray to and worship God? Thus, certainly; thus we read, thus we worship, thus we pray. To these we say: If therefore you worship and pray to God thus, this is not to worship and beseech one great God, but to make three gods: and where is it that in divine law it is read: Hear, O Israel; the Lord your God, is one God? And again elsewhere it says: You shall worship the Lord your God, and him only shall you serve. For if the Father is one thing, the Son another, the Holy Spirit another; it is no longer one Trinity, but a divided power. But how can a differing power stand, when according to what we read in the Gospel: A house divided against itself, or a kingdom divided, cannot stand? And how can divinity be distinguished from itself, when splendor of light or heat of the sun can in no way be separated? Behold, for as we see, in the sun there are three things, and they absolutely cannot be separated. But let us see what three things there are: motion, splendor, and heat. We see indeed the sun running in the sky, shining, warming. Therefore, divide, if you can, Arian, the sun, and only then divide the Trinity. But perhaps the reasoning about discerning the sun is difficult because it is in the sky and far from us. Behold, we propose another element which is lesser and is with us on earth: I speak of fire, which is held in our hands, and yet is not divided. And fire indeed has three things and cannot be divided: that is, motion, light, and heat. If therefore, impious heretic, you cannot divide the created sun and fire, how can you divide God, the creator of all?

Testimonies of the Scriptures about the Divine Trinity. Praise of the Catholic Faith. But hear and learn that this great and singular Trinity was shown from the beginning of the human race. Hear it in the Law and the Prophets, in the Psalms and in the Gospel, hear it undoubtedly declared in the Apostle. Hear it, I say, in Genesis: God made man in the image of God. To simultaneously show the inseparable Trinity, it says in that book: And the Spirit of God was hovering over the waters. Hear the prophet speaking from the person of Christ: The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because He has anointed me, He has sent me to evangelize the poor. Hear it in the Psalms: By the word of the Lord the heavens were made, and all their host by the breath of His mouth; and again: Restore to me the joy of Your salvation, and uphold me with Your free Spirit. Hear this same confirmation in the Gospel: The Lord Christ says to the Apostles: All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me: go therefore and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Hear the Apostle: O the depth of the riches and wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are His judgments and how inscrutable His ways! For who has known the mind of the Lord, or who has been His counselor? Or who has given a gift to Him that he might be repaid? For from Him and through Him and to Him are all things. To Him be glory forever. If, therefore, it has been sufficiently and openly proved by both the old and the new Scriptures that the divine unity is an inseparable Trinity, let us utterly despise heretics, according to the Apostle who says: After a first and second warning, have nothing more to do with a heretic. And let us now confirm our faithful people concerning this same catholic faith. There are indeed no greater riches, no treasure, no honors, no greater substance in this world than the catholic faith, which saves sinners, enlightens the blind, heals the sick, baptizes catechumens, justifies the faithful, restores penitents, increases the righteous, crowns martyrs, preserves virgins, widows, and the chaste modesty of the married, ordains clerics, consecrates priests, prepares for the heavenly kingdoms, and grants an eternal inheritance with the holy angels. As the Lord Himself promises by confirming: In the resurrection, they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are like the angels of God; through Christ our Lord.

Sermons - Sermon 385

SERMO 385 This admonition of Saint Augustine shows that there are many degrees in perfect charity and love, useful and very necessary. The loves of men are some right, some perverse. Not only in the New, but also in the Old Testament, we are reminded, most beloved brothers, how we ought to hold perfect love. For the Lord Himself said in the Gospel: You shall love your neighbor as yourself. Therefore, let us treat somewhat of the love of a man for a man, because there are perverse loves of men. He who loves another perversely, also loves himself perversely; but he who loves himself rightly, also loves another rightly. For instance, there are disgraceful, detestable loves: the loves of adulterers, loves of the corrupt, unclean loves. All human and divine laws detest evil loves. Therefore, remove these illicit ones, let us seek the licit ones. The degrees of lawful love.

Permitted love begins with marriage; but it is still carnal. You see that it is common with beasts: and those sparrows, who sing, have marriages, and make nests, brood over eggs together, and nourish their young together. This love, which is lawful among humans, you see is still carnal. The second love is for children, but even this is still carnal: for one is not to be praised for loving children, but condemned if one does not love them. For should I greatly praise in a man what I see in a tiger? Serpents love their children, lions and wolves love their children. Do not, therefore, think it a great thing that you love your children: in this love you are still comparable to serpents; if you do not love them, you are surpassed by serpents. I am now speaking of honest loves: for I have excluded those disgraceful ones. Another love, which is for relatives, seems already proper to humans, if it is not just customary. For greater is the love which extends beyond relatives, than that which remains among relatives. He who loves his relatives, still loves his own blood. Let him love others who are not relatives, let him receive a stranger: already this love has greatly expanded. It grows so much that from spouse to children, from children to relatives, from relatives to strangers, from strangers to enemies it reaches. But to reach there, it has many steps. From the friendship of habit to the friendship of reason.

Therefore, see what I say about friendship. There are friendships—excepting that friendship, which should not even be called friendship, which evil conscience makes: for there are people who commit evil together, and therefore seem joined to each other because they are bound by an evil conscience—so, excepting this nefarious friendship, there is a certain carnal friendship through the habit of living together, chatting, and conversing together, so that a person is saddened when deserted by a friend with whom he is used to talking and having connections. Two people may meet, walk together for three days, and already they do not want to part. And this certain sweetness of friendship is indeed honest: but let us still analyze it, because we seek the degrees of this love; and let us see how far we have progressed to such a friendship as I have mentioned. Therefore, this friendship is of habit, not of reason: animals also have it. Two horses eat together, they miss each other; if one goes ahead the next day, the other hastens, longing as if for its friend; it is hardly managed by the rider, and urges itself forward until it reaches its companion. When it reaches the one who went ahead, it calms down: it was driven by weight, urged by the weight of love; it comes as if to its place, and rests. This friendship of habit is also in animals: let us rise still higher. There is another, higher friendship, not of habit, but of reason, by which we love a person for faith and mutual goodwill in this mortal life. Whatever we find above this is divine. Let a person begin to love God, and he will love nothing in a person but God. The love of friendship ought to be gratuitous. For your Charity, first it must be seen how the love of friendship ought to be freely given. You should not have a friend or love him for what he provides to you; if you love him for money or some temporal benefit, you do not love him, but what he provides. A friend must be loved freely, for his own sake, not for anything else. If friendship's rule urges you to love a human freely, how much more should God be freely loved, who commands you to love humans? Nothing is more delightful than God. For in humans there are things that displease; through friendship, however, you compel yourself to tolerate even those things in humans that displease for the sake of friendship. Therefore, if you should not dissolve a human friendship because of certain things you must tolerate, by what things should God's friendship be compelled to be dissolved by you? You find nothing more delightful than God: God has no way to offend you, if you do not offend Him; nothing is more beautiful, nothing is sweeter than Him. But you will say to me, "I do not see Him; how shall I love one whom I do not see?" Behold how you learn to love one whom you do not see: I will now show you how you try to see what you cannot see with these eyes. Behold, you love a friend: what do you love in him? You love him freely. But perhaps this friend of yours is an old man: it is possible to have an old friend. What do you love in an old man? His bent body, white hair, wrinkles on his forehead, contracted cheeks? If you see the body, there is nothing more deformed due to old age: and yet you love something, and you do not love the body you see, because it is deformed. From where do you see what you love? If I ask you: Why do you love? you will answer me: He is a faithful man. Therefore, you love faith. If you love faith, with the eyes by which faith is seen, God is seen with those same eyes. Therefore, begin to love God, and you will love humanity for the sake of God.

God is not to be loved for the sake of reward.

Hear the great testimony. The devil is surely the accuser of the saints: and because he does not contend before such a judge whom he can deceive, he cannot speak false accusations against us. He knows before whom he speaks. Therefore, since he cannot speak falsehoods against us, he seeks true things to speak. That is why he tempts, so that he may have something to say. This, therefore, is our adversary, who envies us the kingdom of heaven, who does not want us to be where he himself has been cast down from: "Does Job fear God for nothing?" Hence we are provoked by the adversary so that we may worship God freely, when he, seeking what to accuse us of, thought he had found something significant because he said: "Does Job fear God for nothing?" Not because he had seen his heart, but because he saw his riches. We must be careful not to love God for a reward. For what, will you love God for a reward? What kind of reward is it that God will give you? Whatever else He gives you, it is less than He Himself. You do not worship freely if you worship to receive something from Him. Worship freely, and you will receive Him: for God keeps Himself for you, to enjoy. And if you love what He made, how great is He who made them? If the world is beautiful, how great is the Creator of the world? Therefore, tear your heart from the love of the creature, so that you may adhere to the Creator, and say what is written in the psalm: "But it is good for me to cling to God."

We should adhere to God alone with love; a friend, however, must be loved by us so that he may love God with us.

If, however, you abandon him who made you, and love those things which he made, abandoning the one who made you, you are an adulterer. Thus the epistle of James cries out, calling them adulterers: Adulterers. And why adulterers? Do you ask why? Do you not know, he says, that friendship with this world is enmity with God? Therefore, whoever wants to be a friend of this world becomes an enemy of God. He has expressed what he said: Adulterers. A soul that loves the creature and abandons the Creator is an adulteress. For of his love, nothing is more chaste, nothing more delightful: when you abandon him and embrace this, you become unclean. O soul, to be worthy of his embrace, let go of these things and cling to him freely. For thus the psalm says: But for me, it is good to be near God. In the previous verse, it said: You have destroyed all who are unfaithful to you. And as if to show what unfaithfulness is, it added: But for me, it is good to be near God. I want nothing else but him: to cling to him, that is my good, that is my free good; therefore it is also called grace, because it is freely given. When you begin to love God freely, there is security: because you love a friend freely, and you love him so that he may love God with you. Consider, indeed, ordinary friendship itself, from which we began, through which we have progressed; consider it. A husband loves his wife, and a wife her husband; without a doubt both want the other to be safe and happy. He wants her to be healthy, he wants her to be happy. He loves her because he himself wants to be healthy and happy: what he wants for himself, he also wants for her. He loves his children: who wouldn't want his children to be safe? He loves his friend: who doesn't want to have him safe? So much so that if something happens to him, he is anxious, he is sad, he is distressed, he runs to prevent it: when it happens, he weeps. What, then, does he want? To have him safe. Therefore, whoever loves, wishes to have safe that which he loves, if he understands what true safety is, he begins to love it in himself, and is compelled to love the same true safety also in his friend.

Salvation in this world should be used, eternal salvation should be loved.

If you seek God with fleshly eyes, see the three boys delivered from the fire; if you seek God with faith, see the Maccabees crowned in the fire. Therefore, that salvation is to be loved, this to be used: for this indeed is necessary for use, for it will pass away. For it is not true health, brothers, what the doctors say. We are comforted in some way: for perpetual sickness is in this frailty of flesh. For do you think a man is sick only when he has a fever, and is healthy when he is hungry? Healthy he is said to be. Do you want to see how much evil hunger is? Leave him without food for seven days, he will die; but because you apply daily food, he lives. However, the medicine for hunger is food; the medicine for thirst is drink; the medicine for fatigue is sleep; the medicine for sitting is walking; the medicine for walking is sitting; the medicine for weariness is rest; the medicine for rest is vigilance. And see how weak the human body is: this very aid, which I mentioned, if he persists in it, fails. You sought help from food for hunger: behold the help of food: you eat, you are refreshed; if you are refreshed too much, you are defeated too much. You sought help from drink for thirst: by drinking much you are choked, who were gripped by thirst. You were tired by walking, you want to sit: sit perpetually, see if you do not get weary. Therefore, whatever he takes up to drive away something else, if he persists in it, he fails.

True salvation is eternal life; for this reason, anyone is to be loved so that they may hold true salvation with us.

What, therefore, is this salvation, brothers, that is transient, fragile, perishable, vain? Truly, as it is written: "What is your life? It is a vapor that appears for a little while." He who loves his life in this world will lose it. But he who hates his life in this world will keep it for eternal life. What is eternal life? True salvation. And if you see your friend, whom you loved in this world so that he might be safe, because you now desire such a salvation that is eternal, you love your friend toward that very salvation; and whatever you wish to do for your friend, you wish to do so that he may hold to that salvation with you. For you love righteousness, you want him to be righteous: you love to be under God, you want him to be under God: you love eternal life, you want him to reign with you there forever. You see your enemy persecuting you: it is iniquity that persecutes you. You should be angry with mercy for him: he is fevered in his soul. Therefore, just as a friend of this world, loving according to the world, wants to expel the fever from his friend, whom he similarly loves as himself for present safety, so you, whoever you love, love for eternal life: when you find anger, indignation, hatred, iniquity, strive to expel the disease of the soul, just as a worldly friend does with bodily disease. Love for this purpose, so that you may do what you are, and love will be perfected in you. If you find this, love your spouse for this, love your child for this, love your relative for this, love your neighbor for this, love a stranger for this, love an enemy for this, and love will be perfected in you. If this happens, you conquer the world, and the prince of this world is driven out. For you have heard what the Lord says: "The prince of this world has been driven out"; because he was about to suffer, and through his suffering he would bring about love in humans. No one has greater love than this, than to lay down one’s life for his friends. Therefore, to be loved, he loved first; so that in his name no one would fear to die, he died for all. Therefore, to build love in the hearts of men, he sent the devil away. Where to? Out of the hearts of men. Greed sends him in, love drives him out.

Emptied of all evils, let us strive to be filled with abundant goods. But we, brothers, reflecting with great diligence on the aforementioned degrees of charity, let us not repay the Lord evil for good. And because He, coming, bound the strong man, that is, the devil, and took us all, who were his vessels, away from his power, emptied of all evils through His grace, let us strive to be filled with abundant goods, fearing what the Lord Himself said: When the unclean spirit goes out of a man, it walks through dry places seeking rest, and finds none; after this, returning and finding the house from which it had gone out empty, it brings with it seven spirits worse than itself; and the last state of that man is worse than the first. Therefore, lest we also suffer such a thing, as much as we can, let us strive to introduce virtues in place of vices, so that we may reach God's mercy.

Sermons - Sermon 386

SERMO 386 On the Love of Enemies How enemies are to be loved.

Pay attention, my brothers, to the love which Divine Scripture praises so highly that it equals nothing to it. When God encourages us to love one another, does He only urge that you love someone who loves you? This is mutual love and it does not suffice for God: He wanted us to reach even to loving our enemies, saying: Love your enemies, do good to those who hate you, and pray for those who persecute you; that you may be children of your Father in heaven, who makes His sun rise on the good and the evil, who sends rain on the just and unjust. What do you say? Do you love your enemy? You might respond: Due to weakness, I cannot. But improve and act so that you can: especially because you are about to pray to the Judge, whom no one can deceive, who will handle your case. Therefore, appeal to this Judge, where no interpreter disturbs, no official removes, no advocate is bribed who can pour out prayers for you, nor say words you have not learned: but the very Only Son of God, equal to the Father, sitting at the Father's right hand, His counselor, your judge, taught you a few words that any simple person can hold and say, and in them, He established your cause; He taught you the heavenly law on how to pray. But perhaps you will respond: Through whom do I ask? Through myself or through another? He who taught you to pray Himself pleads for you because you were guilty. Rejoice, because He who is now your advocate will then be your judge. Therefore, because you are about to pray, you are about to handle your case with a few words, coming to the words: Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors. For God says to you: What do you give Me that I may forgive you your debts? What gift do you offer, what sacrifice of your consciousness do you place on My altars? Immediately, He taught you what to ask and what to offer. You ask: Forgive us our debts: and you offer, what? As we also forgive our debtors. You owe to Him who cannot be deceived; you also have a debtor. God says to you: You are my debtor, he is your debtor; I do for you, my debtor, what you will do for your debtor. You offer Me a gift by sparing your debtor. You ask Me for mercy, do not be lazy in showing mercy yourself. Pay attention to what Scripture says: I desire mercy, not sacrifice. Do not offer a sacrifice without mercy; because your sins will not be forgiven unless you offer mercy. But perhaps you say: I have no sins. However cautious you are, brother, while living in the world in the flesh, you act amidst pressures and distresses, and you are involved in countless temptations; you cannot be without sin. Surely God says to you: Be assured of sin, do not forgive if there is nothing that I should forgive you, but rather demand if you owe nothing: however, if you are a debtor, rejoice more that you have a debtor, in whom you can do what should be done to you. Listen to me and scrutinize yourself, because even among the few who can truly pray the Lord's Prayer, say truly: Lord, forgive me, as I also forgive. Not falsely, not feignedly, but truly from the heart, so that it may be true also for you. For if he who has wronged you, who has sinned against you, asks for forgiveness, and you forgive; then you can securely say: Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors. For if you resist the one asking, you will also be disregarded when you ask. You closed yourself against the one knocking, you will find it closed when you knock. For if you open the bowels of mercy to the one asking you, so will God open to you when you ask Him. Now I speak to those who ask forgiveness from their Christian brothers and are not granted it. Behold, if you grant it, you will pray securely. But the one who asks you, and if you do not grant it, how will you be secure? For anyone who has sinned and has not been meritorious of forgiveness, do not fear, appeal to God Himself and your own: for they are debts: can a servant demand debts which the Lord has forgiven? If perhaps he did not ask who sinned against you, if he does not seek forgiveness; if he has sinned and also is still angry, what will you do? Will you forgive or not forgive? Behold, you did not forgive. Why? Because he did not ask. If you did not forgive because he did not ask, do not hesitate in the Lord's Prayer, say it securely, do not strike your breast because you did not forgive the one who did not ask. Therefore, the one who did not ask, remains: it is demanded, it is absolutely demanded from him: nonetheless, let perfect love be in you, pray for the one not asking: because you pray for someone in great danger. The example of Christ praying for those insulting and killing. The example of Stephen.

Here now, attend to your Master and Lord, not sitting on a throne, but hanging on a tree, surrounded on all sides by crowds of enemies and saying: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. See the Master, hear the imitator. Did the Lord Christ then pray for those who were asking, and not rather for those insulting and killing Him? Did the physician abandon his office because the madman was raging? Say indeed: Forgive them, for they know not what they do. They kill the Savior, because they do not seek salvation. And contrariwise, perhaps you will say: And when can I do what the Lord could? Why do you say this? Take note of where he does this; observe that he did this on the cross, not in heaven. For God is always in heaven with the Father: but on the cross, he was a man for you, where he offered Himself as an example to all. For He indeed uttered this voice for you, so that it might be heard by all. For He could have prayed for them in silence, but then you would not have the example. But if the Lord is too much for you, let not the servant be too much. Can you not imitate your Lord when he hung on the cross? Attend to Stephen, His servant, when he was being stoned. First, he said as a servant to the Lord: Lord Jesus, receive my spirit; and after this, kneeling down, he said: Lord, do not hold this sin against them: and when he had said this, he fell asleep in the rest of love. He found the richest peace because he wished peace for his enemies. Did he then pray for those who were asking, and not for those who were raging, those who were stoning and killing him? You have the example, learn, see how he stood praying for himself, and kneeled for them. Brothers, do we think that he loves them more than himself? Indeed, standing as a just man for himself, he was easily heard. For the wicked, it was necessary to kneel. Therefore, he showed love even to enemies by asking for forgiveness. Therefore, brothers, for the sake of the security of the Lord’s prayer, forgive those who ask from the heart, and so that the Lord may forgive you your sins in this mortal body and in the future unto eternity, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 387

SERMO 387

Warning of Saint Augustine concerning what is written: "Agree with your adversary quickly while you are on the way with him" and about the speck of anger, which, nourished by false suspicions, becomes a beam Sinners are to be rebuked by the priests. Your Beloved Charity, dearest brothers, has often heard in the Holy Scriptures the danger in which priests are placed if they do not wish to fulfill what the Apostle testifies: Preach the word; be instant in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort with all patience and doctrine. And because so grave a burden hangs over our shoulders, to whom it is said: If you do not warn the wicked of their wickedness, I will require their blood at your hand, it is necessary for us to chastise the negligent, whether secretly or publicly. But when we correct, the one whom we correct, if he is evil, observes by whom he is corrected; and more easily acknowledges gladly what he should correct in his corrector than in himself. And if he finds true things to say against the one who corrects him, he rejoices. How much better would it be if he rejoiced in his correction and health, rather than in another’s ailment! Behold, suppose that what you say is true, you have found something in the man who has reproved you; yet through him, truth was being spoken to you, the truth was speaking to you through a wicked man, an unjust man. You seek what to reprove in the man: rather find what to reprove in the truth. Whether you like it or not, it is your adversary, in which you find nothing to accuse. Make it your friend if you can. Your adversary is the Word of God: whether a sinner speaks it, or a righteous person speaks it, it is the Word of God and is beyond reproach. It is your adversary: agree with it while you are on the way with it. The way is this life; the Word of God is the adversary of all the wicked. It is little to you that, though it remained in its most blessed and secret seat, it has come to you, to be with you on the way, and it wished to accompany you so that, while you walk, and have it in your power, you may settle your case and say, “When will you finish your way?” And when you finish your way, there will be no one with whom you may resolve your case; and the adversary will hand you over to the judge, the judge to the officer, and the officer to the prison. You will not leave until you have paid the last penny. The Word of God is with you as an adversary on the way: you have it in your power, settle. What does this adversary seek from you? To agree with it. What else but your salvation? It walks with its adversaries and tells them to agree with it. Let it happen: the way is not yet finished. What was not done yesterday, may be done today. The way is not yet finished: why do you wait until it is finished? When it is finished, there will be no other way to agree with your adversary. The judge remains, the officer, and the prison. This way has ended suddenly for many who promised themselves many more years upon it. But behold, suppose that your way will be long, and your adversary will always walk with you: are you not ashamed to be in discord with such an adversary for so long? The Word of God, as far as it is concerned, is your friend; you make it your adversary. For it wishes well for you, but you, on the contrary, wish ill for yourself. It commands: Do not steal; you steal; it commands: Do not commit adultery; you commit adultery; it commands: Do not defraud; you defraud; it forbids you to swear falsely; you swear falsely; you do everything contrary to what it says, you make the Word of God your enemy. It is no wonder, then, that you are your own enemy: For he who loves iniquity hates his own soul. If, therefore, by loving iniquity you have hated your own soul, do you wonder that you have hated the Word of God, which wishes well for your soul?

Let us first correct ourselves so that we may be able to correct a brother.

Therefore, shall we be silent and not rebuke anyone at all? Indeed, let us rebuke, but first ourselves. You wish to rebuke your neighbor: there is nothing closer to you than yourself. Why look far away? You have yourself before you. For what does the Lord say through Scripture? "You shall love your neighbor as yourself." If, therefore, you do not love yourself, how do you love your neighbor? You received the rule of love for your neighbor from yourself. "I love him," you say. Therefore I say, first love yourself, and then speak to yourself. And if you truly speak out of love, it is clear that the word has worked something within you. But it is to be feared, lest you do not love yourself, and wish to rebuke another, doing this with hatred. For if you hate your brother, you commit less than what you do. Whoever hates his brother is a murderer. You have heard, today the epistle of John was read. Scripture says, lest men despise what they have within their hearts and accuse what is done by the body, "Whoever hates his brother," it says, "is a murderer." The hand is not yet armed, the throat is not yet seized, the ambush is not yet prepared, the poison is not yet sought, and already with the conceived hatred he is held guilty in the eyes of God. The one whom he seeks to kill still lives, and yet he is already judged as having killed. Therefore, if you rebuke with hatred, do you dare to rebuke anyone, murderer that you are? Or because men do not hold you and lead you to the judge, therefore do you not recognize your crime in the eyes of the supreme God and judge? If you do not wish to recognize your crime, you will recognize your punishment: for He does not spare murderers. "But I correct myself," you say, "when I am on the way." Therefore correct yourself, and then you will be able to rebuke your brother. You accuse lesser offenses, you commit greater ones: "You see the speck in your brother's eye, but do not notice the beam in your own eye." For the Lord said this concerning men who rebuke with hatred. You rebuke an angry man, and you waste away with hatred? Weigh in the balance of consideration anger and hatred. What is anger? A certain fervor of the mind. It displeases you at present. Your anger has now grown old in you, hence it has become hatred. Anger is a speck, a beam in future by growing: for just as a speck grows into a beam, so anger inveterate becomes hatred. Now you hate, and you rebuke someone angry: now in him the speck displeases, in you the beam still pleases. Do you want to know how much difference there is? Often we find fathers being angry with their sons: a father hating his son is difficult to find. A father can be angry with a son whom he loves: he can be angry and love, it can be said; he can hate and love, it cannot be said. I have said this for the sake of men, who punish lesser things in others and do not punish greater things in themselves.

Let us agree with the Word of God while we are still on the way.

Therefore, dearest brothers, thinking of these things healthily, let us make friends with our adversary, while we are on the way with him: that is, let us consent to the word of God, while we are still in this life; because afterward, when we have crossed over from this world, no settlement or any satisfaction will remain. The judge stands, and the officer, and the prison. Therefore, that we may be able to fulfill all these things with the help of the Lord, let us love with our whole heart not only friends but also enemies; so that in us may be fulfilled that which is written: The whole law is fulfilled in one word: You shall love your neighbor as yourself; and that: Charity covers a multitude of sins. May He who is true charity deign to grant us this, who lives and reigns with the Father and the Holy Spirit for ever and ever. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 388

SERMO 388 ON GIVING ALMS Only alms are mentioned in the Last Judgment. This reading, brothers, which we have just heard from the holy Gospel, exhorts us to give alms: and it exhorts us in such a way that in his judgment the Lord imputes only these deeds to the right hand, and imputes only the hitherto done deeds to the left hand. Not that the other deeds of men, whether good or bad, will not come into judgment; for it is written that all things will come to judgment: and yet our Lord Jesus Christ did not choose, foretelling to us his coming judgment; he chose nothing to admonish us of, except alms alone. Would it not be said to the right hand: Because you have lived chastely, because you have not seized the goods of others, because you have confessed my faith even unto blood? For all these good deeds must necessarily be honored in the judgment of Jesus Christ. Again, do you think it will not be said to the left hand: Because you have been impudent, because you have fornicated, because you have seized the goods of others, because your pride and bad morals have led to my name being blasphemed, and other such things as he mentions? Nevertheless, our Lord, foretelling his judgment to us, was silent on all other righteous deeds of the just, and deigned to mention only alms. He was silent on all the evil deeds of the wicked, and judged that only the sterility of alms should be reproached, in order to admonish us. Why is this? Because all crimes are redeemed by alms. Therefore, he praised this fecundity and blamed and condemned that aridity.

Alms for more serious sins are of no benefit unless habits are changed. But what you have heard, that all evil deeds are redeemed by alms, do not understand in such a way as some perverse individuals understand it. For alms can benefit you in erasing past sins, if you change your ways. But if you persist in the same evils, you do not corrupt the judge with your alms. I say this because of those crimes and wickednesses, which everyone must now avoid, who receive the body and blood of Christ. Furthermore, I am not unaware that this mortal life, set in corruptible flesh, cannot be without sins; but those daily and slight ones also have their daily washings. This is why we beat our chest, and say in prayer to the Lord our God: Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. For we do not say this for no reason, nor would the heavenly master teach us this prayer, unless he foresaw that we would be sinners. For he saw what we ought to beware of, and he saw what it is difficult to beware of. However, he judged it impossible to beware of everything, and he taught this daily prayer not to any Christians, but to the very rams, the Apostles. But where the Apostles beat their chest, and say: Forgive us our debts, that is, our sins, would any little sheep dare to take pride in its righteousness? See what kind of man the Apostle John was: he reclined on the Lord’s chest, he drank in secret from that high fountain of wisdom. For he drank there what he erupted in the Gospel: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. And the Gospel continually testifies that the Lord particularly loved him. And yet he says: If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. However, since these things are said, no murderer should be relaxed, if he should come to say: Forgive us our debts, because of his daily fornications and robberies. For what God has established to be said daily for slight sins, he thinks can help him with those grave sins, from which he does not want to depart, but wishes to remain in them perpetually. Let him also beat his chest for these, let him also do alms for these, but with a changed life: let him depart from those, and come to this. But if he says in his heart: If I commit daily robberies, and if I stain myself with daily adulterous corruptions, and if I seek out sorcerers, sacrifice to idols, consult astrologers, and altogether do not depart from such a life, but by doing daily alms I extinguish all sins: you indeed extinguish, but when you are extinguished. For thus will your evil change be for you, that there will not be lacking someone who will say about you: And yet a little while, and the sinner shall be no more; and you will look for his place, and shall not find it. I saw the wicked exalted like the cedars of Lebanon: and I passed by, and behold, he was no more; and I sought him, but his place was not found. Therefore, your sins perish, but with you. For you are not permitted to sin in hell, nor when the eternal fire begins to torture you, will you think about satiating lusts. Therefore your sins perish, but with you. But if you change your life, they perish, you are found, and it will be said about you: He was dead, and revived; was lost, and was found.

Sermons - Sermon 389

SERMO 389 Treatise on Obtaining Heavenly Bread or On Giving Alms and Mercy Of obtaining the heavenly bread which our soul needs in this world. The Lord admonishes us through the reading of the Gospel to speak to you about obtaining the heavenly bread. For this earthly bread is necessary for the earth because our flesh is earth. However, it could not be that our flesh has its bread, and our soul does not have its bread. Indeed, our soul also, in a certain destitution in this world, needs its bread, just as the flesh needs its own. For who does not need bread? Therefore, God alone, the bread, does not need bread: for He is the bread of our soul, who needs no other bread, but, being self-sufficient, nourishes both Himself and us. Therefore, the heavenly bread by which our soul is fed is manifest. The plan on giving alms must be followed. You ask by praying, you seek by knocking, you knock by giving. But how do we reach Him, so that we may be filled by Him, from whom now we barely collect crumbs, lest we perish in this famished desert? How, then, do we reach the nourishment of this bread of which the Lord said, "Whoever eats this bread shall not hunger, and whoever drinks the drink I give shall never thirst," promising a certain nourishment and satisfaction without disdain? How, then, do we reach this satisfaction of bread, far removed as we are in this hunger? Strategy is needed. If we neglect this strategy, we knock in vain for that bread. Indeed, the strategy which I am about to say, or rather remind you of—for I will not say what I have learned from you—is this: I do not say that whoever disregards it knocks in vain, but whoever disregards it does not knock at all. For to follow and act according to this strategy is to knock. What do you think, my brethren, that God truly has some physical door which He closes against humans, and therefore tells us: "Knock, so that we come and pound the door until knocking we reach the ears of the master of the house located in some hidden place, and he commands it to be opened to us by saying: Who is this who knocks? Who is making a nuisance of themselves to my ears? Give him what he asks and let him leave here." It is not so. However, there is something similar. Certainly, when you knock at someone’s door, you do so with your hands. There is something you act on with your hands when you knock at the Lord’s door. Indeed, act with your hands, knock with your hands. If you do not act in this way, I do not say you knock in vain, but I say you do not knock at all. Therefore, you will not deserve, you will not receive because you do not knock. How, he says, do you want me to knock? Behold, I pray daily. You do well to pray, you do excellently, for it has also been said: "Ask and it shall be given to you, seek and you shall find, knock and it shall be opened to you." Everything has been said: ask, seek, knock. You ask by praying, you seek by acting, you knock by giving. Therefore, let your hands not idle.

You receive from where man does not hunger for a time, you take from where you do not suffer hunger for eternity. The Apostle, when he was advising the people about alms, said, "I give advice on this. For it is beneficial for you, because you not only began to do but also to will from the previous year." And Daniel said to King Nebuchadnezzar, "Accept my counsel, king, and redeem your sins with alms." Therefore, if it is advice that we receive when we are commanded or advised to give something of what we have to the needy, let us not be proud when we give. For if it is advice that you have received, it benefits you more than the one to whom you gave. Therefore, let us not exalt ourselves over our works and as if we please ourselves by providing good deeds to those to whom we give. Whoever wants to accept advice wants to accept what benefits themselves, and whoever gives advice is advising. If they advise, it benefits the one they advise. A humble poor person receives from you as a supplicant—for if it is not fitting for you to give proudly, how much less is it fitting for him to receive proudly. He receives humbly, he receives giving thanks. However, you must know and remember not only what you give but also what you receive. For if this poor person had the freedom to respond to you, if he perhaps sensed you being proud over him, he might say to you: "Why are you proud, why do you exalt yourself? Because you gave to me? What did you give to me? Bread. If you placed this bread in your house and neglected it, it would go to rust, from rust to rot, from rot to earth: earth would return to earth. And you, who extended your hand to give to my outstretched hand to receive, remember from what your hand was made, and from what mine. You placed earth from earth into earth. Then what do I do with your bread? I eat, I alleviate the bother of hunger. I receive a benefit, I am not ungrateful. Nevertheless, you think about what the Lord, the Savior himself, reminded you, that everything entering the mouth goes into the stomach and is expelled into the latrine." And again, what did the Apostle Paul say to you? "Food is for the stomach and the stomach for food: but God will destroy both it and them." Therefore the bread, as I said, is earth from earth into earth, to support earth and to refresh earth. You consider what you gave, you do not consider what you are to receive. Therefore, see to it that I may benefit you more by receiving than you by giving. For if there were no one to receive from you, you would not distribute earth and buy heaven. I knock on your door and you hear me, you command to be given to me that my hunger may be sustained, and the bother which it imposes on me may be alleviated. You have done well. Dare not listen to me knocking if you dare. If you are not about to ask, scorn the one asking. Scorn me if you seek nothing from Him who made both you and me. But if you will ask that which you give to me, because you have heard me, you provide for yourself so that you may be heard. Give thanks to Him who made you buy something so precious at such a low price. You give what perishes in time, you receive what remains eternally. You give what, if you did not give, you would soon throw away, you receive what you will enjoy forever. You give what sustains human hunger, you receive that which makes you a companion of angels. You give that a man may not be hungry for a time, who will soon suffer hunger again, you receive that you may never suffer hunger, thirst, or famine. When, therefore, you see what you give and what you receive, do not give if you dare. Let us see who bears the greater loss: I, to whom you do not give earth, or you who do not come to Him who made heaven and earth. Therefore, if we have accepted counsel, let us do it for ourselves and let no one say that he is providing for the poor: for he provides more for himself than for the poor.

How can we preserve perishable goods for eternity, and ourselves migrate from earth to heaven?

If we think truly, my brothers, and are wise according to the words of our Lord - for if we think otherwise we perish - if we live not by our own counsel, but by His, then we truly live. If we have anything to give to the poor, if we do not give it, we leave it here or perhaps we lose it while we live here. For how many have suddenly lost all their goods, which they had most diligently stored! By one hostile attack, the entire treasures of the wealthy perished. No one said to the enemy: I keep this for my children. Surely you see that if there is any faith in them - for we must speak of those who were Christians; of those ignorant of God there is no mention: for they lost in this life what they valued greatly, they did not hope for another life: outer darkness, inner darkness, poverty in the chest, greater misery in the conscience; therefore, as I said, we should not speak of them but of those who have some Christian faith: that is why I said some, not strong or full, for if it were strong and full, they would not have spurned the counsel of the Lord - nevertheless, dear ones, when they saw their homes empty, or perhaps were not even allowed to see the emptiness of their homes, when taken captive from there, and flames followed them as they departed, when therefore they found themselves empty, how they regretted not having heard the counsel of the Lord. For what did our Lord Jesus Christ say to that rich man seeking counsel on attaining eternal life? What did He say to him? Did He say to him: Destroy what you have? Indeed, if He had said that: Destroy temporal things to gain eternal ones. Yet He did not say: Destroy what you have. For He saw he was a lover of his possessions. He did not say: Destroy, but: Move where you will not lose. Do you love your treasures? Do you love your money? Do you love your riches? Do you love your lands? Whatever you love, you have on earth. There you have what you love, where you will both lose and perish. I give counsel: move to heaven. Here if you have it, you will lose what you have, you will perish with what you lose; but there if you have it, you have not lost it, but you follow where you have sent it. Therefore, I give this counsel: Give to the poor and you will have treasure in heaven. You will not be without a treasure, but what you anxiously have on earth, you will securely have in heaven. So move. I give a counsel of saving, not losing. You will have a treasure in heaven, and come, follow me, and I will lead you to your treasure. It is not a loss, but a gain. Let men wake up, hear even from experience what they fear, do what ensures they do not fear, and move to heaven. What kind of advice is it to plant grain on lower ground? A friend who knows the nature of grain and soil teaches your ignorance: What did you do? You placed grain on lower ground; it is a damp place, what you planted will rot, you will lose your effort. So what should I do? Move it to higher ground. You hear a friend giving advice about your grain, and you disdain God giving advice about your heart. You fear to place your grain on the ground, and lose your heart in the ground. Behold your Lord God, when He gives you counsel about your treasure, He gives counsel also about your heart. For where, He says, your treasure is, there will your heart be also. Lift, He says, your heart to heaven, so it does not rot on earth. It is the counsel of One who wishes to save you, not to lose you. If it is so, how do those who did not obey now regret it? Now what do they say to themselves? We would have what we lost on earth in heaven. The enemy invaded the house, but would he invade heaven? He killed the servant guarding it, but would he kill the Lord guarding it, where the thief does not come, nor the moth corrupts? How many say: We would have it there, we would store our treasures there, where we would safely follow them a little later. Why didn’t we hear our Lord? Why did we disregard the Father warning us, and feel the enemy invading us? Many therefore repent. For some, as it is truly said, that a man, not rich, but still from a modest means fattened with the wealth of charity, when he sold a solid for a hundred pouches, from the price of the solid he ordered to be given to the poor. It was done. Then that ancient enemy, the devil, made him regret his good work, and by murmuring, erased the right obedience. He sent a thief and took away everything, of which a small part was given to the poor. The devil awaited the voice of the blasphemer, found the voice of the praiser. He awaited stumbling, found confirmation. The enemy indeed wanted him to regret, and he did. But see what he did. “Woe to me,” he said, “that I did not give all! For I lost what I did not give. For I did not place it where the thief does not approach.” So if this counsel is sound, let us not be lazy in so good a counsel. If we must move what we have to a place where we do not lose it. What are the poor to whom we give, if not our carriers, by whom we move from earth to heaven? You give to your porter; he carries what you give to heaven. How, he says, does he carry it to heaven? I see that by eating he consumes it. Indeed, by not holding but by eating he transports it. Or have you forgotten: Come, blessed of My Father, receive the kingdom. For I was hungry and you gave Me food. And: When you did it to one of the least of these My brothers, you did it to Me. If you did not disdain the beggar before you, attend to whom that which you gave has arrived. When you did it to one of the least of these My brothers, you did it to Me. Christ received what you gave; He received it, who gave you whence to give; He received it, who at the end will give Himself to you. In the judgment, there will be a distinction in good works, which Christ says have been done or refused to Him. For I have also, brothers, sometimes reminded your Charity of this which I confess has greatly moved me in the Scripture of God, and I ought to remind you more frequently. I ask you to consider what our Lord Jesus Christ himself says when he comes to judgment at the end of the world: He will gather all nations before him and will divide men into two parts, placing some on the right, others on the left. And to those on the right, he will say: Come, blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world; but to those on the left: Go into the eternal fire, which is prepared for the devil and his angels. Ask for the reasons for such a great reward or such a great punishment: Inherit the kingdom, and: Go into the eternal fire. Why are these to inherit the kingdom? I was hungry and you gave me food. Why are these to go into the eternal fire? For I was hungry and you did not give me food. What is this, I ask? I see that those who are to inherit the kingdom did so because they gave, like good faithful Christians, not despising the words of the Lord and hoping for the promises with confidence. They did this because if they had not done so, their good lives would not have fittingly lacked such actions. For they might have been chaste, not deceivers, not drunkards, abstaining from evil deeds. If they had not added this, they would have remained sterile. For they would have done: Depart from evil; they would not have done: And do good. Nevertheless, to them he did not say: Come, inherit the kingdom, for you have lived chastely, committed no frauds, oppressed no poor person, invaded no one's boundary, deceived no one by swearing falsely. He did not say these things, but: Inherit the kingdom. Why? For I was hungry and you gave me food. How excellent this is, that he remained silent on other matters and mentioned only this! Again to those: Go into the eternal fire, which is prepared for the devil and his angels. How many things he could say to the wicked if they asked: Why are we going into the eternal fire? Why do you ask, you adulterer, murderer, deceiver, sacrilegious, blasphemer, unbeliever? None of these, but: because I was hungry, and you did not give me food. I see that you too are moved and marvel. And indeed it is a wonderful thing. But I gather the reason for this wondrous matter as best I can, which I will not conceal from you. It is written: As water extinguishes fire, so almsgiving extinguishes sin. Again it is written: Store up almsgiving in the heart of the poor, and it will plead for you before the Lord. Again it is written, which I mentioned a little earlier: Hear my counsel, O king, and redeem your sins with almsgiving. And there are many other teachings of divine eloquence, which show that almsgiving has great power to extinguish and obliterate sins. Therefore, to those whom he is about to condemn, or rather first to those whom he is about to crown, he will credit only the alms themselves, as if saying: It is difficult if I examine you, weigh you, and scrutinize your deeds thoroughly, not to find something from which to condemn you, but: Go into the kingdom: for I was hungry and you gave me food. Therefore you do not go into the kingdom because you have not sinned, but because you have redeemed your sins with almsgiving. Again and to those: Go into the eternal fire, which is prepared for the devil and his angels. And they, like culpable criminals trembling too late, considering their sins, when would they dare to say, they are unjustly condemned, this sentence being pronounced upon them by so just a judge? Considering their consciences, considering all the wounds of their consciences, when would they dare to say: We are unjustly condemned? About whom it was said in Wisdom: Their iniquities will accuse them to their face. Without a doubt, they will see that they are justly condemned for their crimes and wicked deeds. And as if he were saying to them: Not for what you think, but because I was hungry and you did not give me food: for if you had turned away from all those your deeds and turned to me, had redeemed all those crimes and sins with almsgiving, those same alms would now free you and absolve you from the guilt of such crimes: blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy; but now: Go into the eternal fire: for judgment without mercy to him who has shown no mercy.

Worthy fruits of repentance must be given and sins must be redeemed by alms.

I recommend to you, my brothers: give earthly bread, and knock for the heavenly. The Lord is bread. "I am," he says, "the bread of life." How will he give to you who do not give to the needy? Another is in need of you, and you are in need of another. And when you are in need of another, and another is in need of you, He needs the needy, to whom you are in need, needs nothing. Do what happens around you. For it is not as if friends are accustomed somehow to reproach each other with their benefits: "I have rendered you this," is answered: "And I to you this," so too God wishes that we bestow to Him, because He has also bestowed to us: he needs nothing. Therefore He is the true Lord: "I said to the Lord: You are my God, because You do not need my goods." Therefore since He is the Lord, and the true Lord, and does not need our goods, yet so that we might do something towards Him, He deigned to hunger in His poor: "I was hungry," he says, "and you gave me to eat." "Lord, when did we see You hungry?" "When you did it to one of the least of my brothers, you did it to me." Also to those: "When you did not do it to one of the least of mine, neither did you do it to me." So briefly let men hear and consider worthily, how much merit it is to have fed a hungry Christ, and what a crime it is to have despised a hungry Christ. Indeed, repentance for sins changes a man for the better; but even repentance itself does not seem to be of any use, if it is sterile from works of mercy. Truth testifies this through John, who said to those coming to him: "You brood of vipers, who warned you to flee from the wrath to come? Therefore, produce fruits worthy of repentance. And do not say: 'We have Abraham as our father.' For I tell you that God can raise up children of Abraham from these stones. For the axe is already laid at the roots of the trees. Every tree that does not produce good fruit will be cut down and thrown into the fire." About this fruit he surely said previously: "Produce fruits worthy of repentance." Therefore, whoever does not produce these fruits thinks in vain that he merits repentance for sins through sterile repentance. But he himself subsequently shows what these fruits are. For after these words of his, the crowds were asking him, saying: "What then should we do?" That is, what are these fruits which you urge us and frighten us to produce? While responding, he was saying to them: "He who has two tunics, let him give to him who has none; and he who has food, let him do likewise." What is clearer, my brothers, what is more certain, what is more expressed? What else then does it sound like what he said previously: "Every tree that does not produce good fruit will be cut down and thrown into the fire," unless that the left will hear: "Go into the eternal fire: for I was hungry, and you did not give me to eat"? It is therefore not enough to turn away from sins if you neglect to care for past ones, as it is written: "My son, have you sinned? Do not add again." And lest he thinks himself secure in this alone, it says: "And pray for past ones that they may be forgiven you."

But what will it profit to pray if you do not make yourself worthy to be heard by not producing fruits worthy of repentance, lest you be cut down like a sterile tree and thrown into the fire? Therefore, if you want to be heard when you pray for your sins: "Forgive, and it will be forgiven to you; give, and it will be given to you."

Sermons - Sermon 39

SERMO 39 ABOUT THAT WHICH IS WRITTEN "Do not delay to turn to God."

"Nor defer from day to day" The last day is hidden so that all days may be observed.

We have heard, Brothers, through the prophet saying to God: Do not delay in turning to the Lord, nor postpone from day to day. For suddenly His wrath will come, and in the time of vengeance He will destroy you. He has promised you that on the day you turn back, He will forget your past wickedness. But has He promised you the life of tomorrow? Or perhaps God has not promised it to you, and a mathematician has promised it to you, so that God may condemn both you and him? God has wisely ordained the uncertainty of the day of death. Each one should wisely contemplate his last day. It is the mercy of God that man does not know when he will die. The last day is hidden, so that all days may be observed. But the world holds us, enticements flatter us on every side. The greatness of wealth delights, the splendor of honor delights, the terror of power delights. These things delight, but let the Apostle be heard: "We brought nothing into this world, and we can take nothing out of it." Honor ought to seek you, not you yourself. For you must recline in a lower place, so that he who invited you may make you ascend to a more honorable place. But if he does not wish, eat where you recline, because you brought nothing into this world. Is it little to you because you eat another's? Recline wherever and eat. Will he say, "From mine"? Hear the Apostle: "We brought nothing into this world." You came into the world, you found a full table. But the earth and its fullness are the Lord's. For those who desire, he says, to become rich. He did not say: Those who are rich, but: Those who desire to become rich, he blamed the desires, not the wealth: Those who desire to become rich fall into temptation and many foolish and harmful desires, which plunge people into ruin and destruction. Money delights. Do you not fear this? Money is a good thing, great wealth is a good thing. They fall into temptation. Do you not fear? They fall into many foolish and harmful desires. Do you not fear? Where do desires lead? They plunge people into ruin and destruction. And are you still deaf? Do you not fear ruin and destruction? Thus God thunders, and you snore? The worm of riches is pride.

Moreover, the Apostle gave advice to those who are already rich: Command, he said, the rich of this world not to be proud. Pride is the worm of riches. It is difficult for a rich man not to be proud. Remove pride, and riches will not harm. But attend to what you should do with what God has given you, so that it is not idle in your hands. Do not be proud. Remove that vice. Nor place your hope in the uncertainty of riches. Remove this vice as well. When you have done this, perform good works as you hear. Let them, he said, be rich in good works. Do not place your hope in the uncertainty of riches. But in what should they place their hope? In the living God, who provides us all things abundantly to enjoy. God provides the world to the poor and to the rich. Should a rich man fill two stomachs because he is rich? Observe and see that the poor sleep satisfied with what God has given. He who feeds you, feeds them through you. When you die, you will be able to take nothing away from here.

Therefore, let not money be loved. But if it is already possessed, let this be made from it. Be rich, those who have it. But where rich? In good works. Easily, he says, distribute, share. Here now avarice contracts. Listen to what follows: Easily distribute, share. Just as cold water pours out, it stiffens, tightens the bosom, and says: "I do not lose my labors." Unfortunate one, do you not want to lose your labors? Behold, you will die, and having brought nothing here, you can take nothing from here. When you have taken away nothing, have you not lost all your labors? Therefore listen to the counsel of God. Do not be alarmed because he said: Easily distribute, share. Listen to what follows. Wait, do not shut the door against me, nor the hearing of your heart, wait. Do you wish to know: Easily distribute, share, because you will not lose, and is this only not lost? Let them lay up, he says, a good foundation for the future, so that they may seize true life. Therefore that which delights you is a false life. As if in a dream you live here. If here you live as if in a dream, you will wake up when you die, and thus you have nothing to find in your hands. How, if a beggar sleeps and in a dream an inheritance comes to him, nothing is more fortunate for him before he rises. He sees himself handling in dreams fine clothes, precious golden and silver vessels, entering the most pleasant and spacious estates, great families serving him. He wakes up and weeps. And just as when awake he accuses a man who stripped him, so he accuses the one who woke him up. The psalm speaks very clearly of this: They have slept their sleep, he says, and all the men of wealth found nothing in their hands, after they finished their sleep. For our sake Christ willed to be poor.

Since you brought nothing, you will take nothing away from here. Send up what you have found, and you will not lose it. Give to Christ: for Christ willed to receive here. Do you give to Christ, and lose? You do not lose if you entrust to your servant, and do you lose if you entrust to your Lord? You do not lose if you entrust to your servant what you have acquired, and will you lose if you entrust to your Lord what you received from your very Lord? Christ willed to be needy here, but for our sake. All the poor, whom you see, He could feed. Christ could have fed them, as He fed Elijah through a raven. Yet He also withdrew the raven from Elijah, so that he might be fed by a widow, not for Elijah's sake, but for the widow's. When therefore God makes the poor, it is because He wills them not to have, and when He makes the poor, He tests the rich. For it is written: "The poor and the rich met together." Where did they meet? In this life. That one was born, and this one was born; they found each other, they met together. And who made them? The Lord. The rich man, to help the poor; the poor man, to prove the rich man. Let everyone act according to their strength. Let them not act in such a way that they suffer distress themselves. We do not say this. Your surplus is necessary for others. You have just heard, when the Gospel was read: "Whoever gives a cup of cold water to one of these little ones because he is my disciple, will not lose his reward." He offered the Kingdom of Heaven for sale, and willed the price of it to be a cup of cold water. But when a pauper makes alms, then his alms should be a cup of cold water. Let him who has more, do more. That widow with her two mites did much. Zacchaeus gave half of his goods, and reserved the other half to return his frauds. Alms benefit those who have changed their lives. For you give to Christ in need to redeem your past sins. For if you give in order that you may always sin with impunity, you do not feed Christ, but you try to corrupt the judge. Therefore, perform alms so that your prayers may be heard, and God may help you to change your life for the better. And you who change the same life for the better, and through alms and prayers, let past evils be blotted out, and everlasting future goods come.

Sermons - Sermon 390

SERMO 390 CONCERNING GIVING ALMS The counsel of the Lord must be followed so that riches are stored in heaven. To engage in almsgiving, we wish, as much as the Lord grants, to exhort your Charity, which are accustomed to be companions of fasting in holy faithful men, so that to one who does not have may be added what is taken from one who has; so that, when you defraud your soul for your gain, you take away from the flesh what you establish in heaven. For you have a storehouse there, you have your guardian. For where do people most safely place what they love on earth? They hire the most fortified places for themselves and strive as much as they can to keep it safe from thieves. And while they wish for and keep this, when can it be securely on earth? Perhaps the guardian himself will be the thief. The Lord Jesus Christ, observing what people want and attempt when they keep their things on earth, gave advice: “Store in heaven, commend to me.” Therefore, He who commanded you to give did not want you to lose, but to migrate. Let your belongings go ahead, for you will follow. What you do not send ahead to where you will not be for long, where someone else could possess what you saved after you, you do not know. Therefore lift what you love from here, lest you cling to it by loving it here and lose it by clinging to it, and perish. Your Lord Himself is your guardian and the guardian of your possessions. If perhaps a close friend advised you on preserving grain, to lift it from lower to higher places where it would be better guarded, wouldn’t you take his advice? Your Lord gives you such advice: He doesn’t want you or your possessions to perish. Place it here if you do not want to lose it. Do you want to know what is being done? I know that no one can give better advice about this structure than the one who made it. You say: “Where should I store it?” He responds: “In heaven,” for He said: “Store up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust destroys, and where thieves do not break in or steal. For where your treasure is, there your heart will be also.” Accept the advice, presented to you with the option of such a great storehouse, from which you do not have a suspended plaque to possess forever.

What is given to the poor is given to the Lord; He Himself will repay with interest.

Perhaps you are wondering how to transfer your wealth there? Do not be anxious, and search for ladders or some contraptions through plotting. But just as it usually happens for citizens living abroad, make a transfer. Many indeed do this, when they find suitable persons, they give eagerly. Your Lord Christ did this, rich up above, poor here. He hungers here: He asks for a transfer from you, He will repay fairly. Why then do you hesitate, why do you delay giving? Or is He not capable of repaying? Give to the poor, you will not lose, do not fear: you give to Him, when you give to one of His least ones. Hear the Gospel. When those positioned on the right side were frightened, with certain needs listed, saying: 'When did we see you in these?' the Lord replies: 'When you did it to one of my least, you did it to me.' I, I say, received, when the poor received: in him I was hungry, in him I was satisfied. Give confidently: the Lord receives, the Lord asks. You would not have what to give to Him, unless you first received from Him. If you were lending to men, you would burden: He is not such a one to be burdened by a loan. If you want to be a lender, be so with me, says God to you, give to me: I will repay with interest. Now lift yourself up; extend your greed. Perhaps for a single coin, you will receive not ten, not a hundred, not a thousand, not the earth, but heaven. If you would give a pound of bronze and receive silver, or a pound of silver and receive gold, you would joyfully celebrate yourself as fortunate. What you give will indeed be changed; not gold, not silver, but eternal life will be done for you. It will be changed, because you will be changed. He who gave will become an angel. What he gave will become an angelic throne. There is no remedy that frees from death, except almsgiving. It is difficult for any man to lead this life without sins. Therefore, distribute, my brothers, distribute your resources: make for yourselves purses that do not grow old, a treasure remaining in heaven. Hear the Psalm: 'Although man walks in an image, he is vainly disturbed; he treasures, and does not know for whom he collects.' Give and it will be given to you.

Sermons - Sermon 391

SERMO 391 TO THE YOUNG MEN No age is free from temptations, not even childhood. My address is to you, young people, the flower of age, a danger to the mind. All time, indeed, and every age during which that corruptible flesh is carried, cannot be free from temptations. And for as long as each good person struggles in the contest, lest they be overcome by the adversary, they are in peril, as long as they contend with him, as if in some sandy arena, so in this mortality, they wrestle. For as soon as a person is born into the world, and enters a life full of misery, like a prophet of his future labor, with the proclamation of a grieving voice, even if not yet in his own mind, still in the mind of his parents or any other people, in whose hands his weakness lies to be nourished, he can already be tempted and seized by the devil's circumventions, either through the bindings of abominable remedies, or through the sacrilegious rites of the Gentiles, or if death presses hard, through the negligence of renunciation in Salvific Baptism. And, to summarize briefly, that age is tempted when it is loved by its own in the world, and neglected in Christ. For it carries with it the progeny of death, and is rooted in that wound of sin, which was inflicted on the first man, from whom we derived the origin of corruption, by the venomous tooth of the serpent. Whence holy Job says that no one is clean, certainly from the filth of sin, not even an infant whose life is one day upon the earth. But what can I say of one already born, when David cries out with a mournful voice and says: "In iniquities I was conceived, and in sins my mother conceived me"? For the baptisms of newborn infants might seem superfluous, unless all died in Adam, and original sin, through the bowels of parents, reaches the offspring by the path of mortality: since Almighty Lord forms the mortal creature by the law of His order, and the best Father of mercy supplies the immortality of renewal by grace. And old age yields to temptations. But if even the infancy of a mortal man on account of the bond of corruption is not free from temptations, what shall I say about the other ages? Or perhaps the old age is excepted, and in a body now close to a corpse the blood and limbs have grown cold to illicit desire, and in a body weary and nearly dead the material for temptation has withered away? On the contrary, so great is the whirlpool of greed and the insatiable abyss of the belly and throat in wicked old men, that as much as righteous old men are made serene by their wisdom, so much are these buried by their drunkenness: as though their parched and juice-drained internal organs are bowed down to be irrigated by the flood of drunkenness to restore their former vigor. What about avarice, which is the root of all evils, does it not burn all the more fervently in cold old men for acquiring as much as it will soon leave behind? Truly a remarkable madness. For it hastens to burden itself with heavier expenses, when it has already reached the end it aimed for.

Youth is especially shaken by the storms of temptations.

If therefore, the childish and old age are not free of temptations, of which one, that is childish, has not yet nearly entered, and the other already exits this life; and one was not existing a little before, and the other will not be a little later: what should be thought, what should be said about the fervor of youthful age, which is placed in the middle of both, and has already departed from the weakness of childhood, and has not yet reached the torpor of old age? This is shaken by more and greater storms of temptations, it is covered by the more frequent assault of worldly waves overflowing. It presumes upon its strength, is boasted of with the dignity of form, with the splendor of temporal matters either desires to shine or rejoices. And so, to youth the venom of wrongs is whatever the truth has commanded, food is whatever the devil has suggested: but the bitterness of justice is the medicine for the ulcer of age; the sweetness of injustice, however, is a snare of rashness. To this pertains what is written: The wounds of a friend are sweeter than the voluntary kisses of an enemy; and that which David says: The righteous shall strike me in mercy, and reprove me; but the oil of the sinner shall not anoint my head. Let truth burn, and yet heal: for the oil of the sinner, the flattery of the adulator soothes, but deceives. For there indeed pride is softened; but life slips away. For the Prophet speaks from the person of him who already seeks a physician, who endures the hand of the healer even with the bitterness of pain, who desires his sickness to be cured rather than to be praised. But the ulcer of youth is truly dangerous, which ignites with desires, swells with hope, wastes away with pleasures. But this hope is of the desperate, the hope of perishable things, which does not release the wretched soul, but inflates its desire, and makes it unable to bear the touch of truth; so that even despairing of its immortality, it loves to say, and loves even those who say to it: Let us eat and drink; for tomorrow we die: but it hates to say and to hear: Be sober, righteous, and do not sin. It loves the pernicious gentleness of the enemy, it hates the healthful harshness of the physician. This perversion, this madness in youthful age is most to be feared. From luxury, cruelty is born. From this comes the speech of men dissolving into vices, and then growing hardened in crimes: For they said thinking not rightly among themselves: The time of our life is short and tedious, and in the end of man, there is no refreshment, and no one has been known to return from the dead. And shortly after: Come, therefore, let us enjoy the good things that are present and let us use the creature as in youth swiftly. Let us fill ourselves with precious wine and ointments; and other words of reveling in luxury, following in the same place, of men despairing of eternal life, and placing their hope like in the sand of a torrent, in the corruption of the flesh that is temporal. But from this intemperance of lusts and of filthy crimes festering with worms, see into what crimes and into what enormous wickedness it rushes forth. For being exhausted and subverted by the corruptions of shameful and intemperate sins, while they hate the severity of the truth contradicting them, they say: Let us oppress the poor just man, and not spare the widow, nor honor the old man with many years. Let our strength be the law of justice; for that which is weak is found to be useless. Therefore, let us entrap the just man, for he is useless to us, and contrary to our works. Such were the thoughts of the impiety of the Jews concerning our Lord Jesus Christ. This is found more clearly in the subsequent words: For shortly after they say: He promises to have the knowledge of God, and he calls himself the Son of God. Then again shortly after they say: Let us test him with insult and torture, that we may know his reverence. Let us condemn him to the most shameful death, for there shall be respect from his words. But consider what judgment the Holy Spirit bears on them, when he immediately adds: They thought these things, and erred; for their malice has blinded them. Therefore, consider from what source all the horrendous crimes feared in wicked men arise. For what is softer than that luxury? What is harsher than that cruelty? Long ago, they said: Let us enjoy the good things that are present, and use the creatures with youthful zeal; and let not the flower of time pass by us, and let us leave signs of joy everywhere; now they say: Let us oppress the poor, not spare the widow, nor respect the elderly. Let us entrap the just man, test him with insult and torture, and condemn him to the most shameful death. Wine follows fury, ointments torment, blood roses, anger joy. Bound, beaten, and killed by such as these was the Lord. Who would fear bloody bonds from blooming crowns? Who would foresee most severe pains from sweet cups? Who would predict so dire a wood of the cross from soft meadows? And yet no age in that luxury, except youth, is compared to the flower of time. For they said: Let us use the creature as in youth swiftly.

Exhortation to young men to turn themselves to wisdom.

Therefore, we strongly urge and exhort you, O young men, to be captivated by the beauty of true virtue. No earthly appearance, no shine of metals, no pleasantness of groves, no purples of flowers, no ornament of flesh either natural or applied, no sound of any strings or flutes, no pleasantness of scents, no sweetness of tastes, no embraces should be compared to the beauty, inspiration, sweetness, and comfort of wisdom. For we do not forbid you from those things which are to be shamefully loved, but not from love itself. Do you want to love? Love wisdom, strive to reach it. So that its appearance does not horrify you, compose yourselves within your inner man. Just as lascivious eyes seek the adornments of the body, so does wisdom seek the heart's adornments. Nor should you bring forth these ornaments from your wealth, for it hates the proud and those who wish to boast as if from their own. And what do you have that you did not receive? Therefore, it itself gives what pleases it. Love it only, and it will keep you; surround it, and it will exalt you; honor it, and it will embrace you: so that it gives your head a crown of graces. Wisdom is bright and never withers, and is easily found by those who love it. Aim to join it to you, sigh for it, burn for it, be mad for it. Deny yourself to yourself; lest you deny yourself to it while you please yourself. Its companionship is not bitter. If you are lovers, love this; if you are beautiful, please God; if you are young, conquer the devil. Daniel was called "man of desires" by the angel. What were these desires of his, except those where he ardently yearned for the beauty of wisdom; for even in youthful age he trampled down lust, pressed the pride of the kingdom as a captive, and closed the mouths of lions when confined? And younger women are admonished, with Susanna, Anna, Mary being presented as examples. Do not think, young women, that this discourse is irrelevant to you. For I say these things to you, not to shame you, but to advise you as my dearest daughters: Flee youthful desires. Think of the married Susanna, the widow Anna, the virgin Mary. Do not go out in public seeking to display the flower of your vanity to the eyes of men, thereby seeking death in the house of life. For all flesh is grass, and the glory of man is like the flower of grass. What then will you do when the grass withers, the flower falls? Do you think the word of the Lord, which remains forever, will not easily find your ashes, which you now scorn with the proud greenness of your age? Behold, I say again and testify: flee youthful desires. If you hear this, if you obey, if you receive it as the word of God with honor and fear, you will be not only beautiful before the eyes of God, but also healthy. But if you make perhaps love jokes about this admonition of ours, you will inflict deadly wounds on yourselves with the very tools of the physician. Certainly, when we think of the Jews who crucified the Lord (we shudder and pursue them with great execration), nevertheless, as they contemplated their own luxury, they meditated on the desolation of the luxurious fields, saying: "Let there be no meadow that our luxury does not traverse." How then would they spare Christ if they found Him on earth, when indeed, not desolate meadows to provoke their lusts, but the most crowded churches were chosen by Him who reigns in heaven? Behold, for the third time I testify and say, flee youthful desires. Burn with the desires of Daniel. Children, choose doctrine from your youth, and you will find wisdom until your gray hairs.

Sermons - Sermon 392

SERMO 392 TO THE MARRIED Of the human race inclined to temporal goods.

We have heard the Apostle saying to us: "We act as ambassadors for Christ, exhorting you to be reconciled to God." He would not exhort us to be reconciled unless we had been enemies. Therefore, the whole world was an enemy to the Savior, a friend to the captor: that is, an enemy to God, a friend to the devil. And the whole human race, like that woman, was bent towards the earth. Once a certain person understood these enemies, he calls out against them and says to God: "They have curved my soul." The devil and his angels have bent the souls of men towards the earth, that is, so that they inclined towards temporal and earthly things and did not seek the heavenly. For surely the Lord speaks of this woman, whom Satan had bound for eighteen years; and now it was time for her to be released from her bond and to be released on the Sabbath day. But they accused the one who straightened her up, who else but the bent? Since even those things which God had commanded, not understanding them, they looked at with an earthly heart. For they celebrated the mystery of the Sabbath carnally, not seeing it spiritually.

It is not permitted to keep concubines, nor to marry women who have been separated or divorced by a husband.

Listen, beloved, members of Christ and sons of the Catholic mother. What I say to those preparing for baptism, let the faithful hear; what I say to the faithful, let those preparing for baptism hear; what I say to both the preparing and the faithful, let the penitents hear; what I say to the faithful, the preparing, and the penitents, let the catechumens hear, let all hear: let all fear, let no one disdain. Let your listening be a consolation to me, lest my sorrow be a testimony against you. To those preparing for baptism, I say: Fornication is not permitted to you. Let either wives or no wives suffice for you: you are not permitted to have concubines. Let God hear, if you are deaf; let His angels hear, if you disdain. You are not permitted to have concubines. And if you do not have wives, you are not permitted to have concubines, whom you would later dismiss to take wives; how much more will your condemnation be if you wish to have both concubines and wives?

You are not permitted to have wives whose first husbands are alive; nor you, women, to have men whose first wives are alive. These marriages are adulterous, not by the law of the courts, but by the law of heaven. Nor is it permitted for you to take a woman who has left her husband through divorce while her husband is still alive.

Only for the cause of fornication is it allowed to dismiss an adulterous wife: but while she lives, it is not allowed to take another. And you, women, it is not permitted to take as husbands those men whose wives have left them through divorce; it is not permitted: they are adulteries, not marriages. Augustine may be disdained, but let Christ be feared. Do not imitate the crowd of the wicked, of the unbelievers, my sons: do not follow the wide paths, whose end leads to destruction.

Whoever has been baptized, let him either vow continence to God, or remain with his wife, or if he does not have one, let him take a wife.

If anyone has fallen from the resolve of continence, public penance is to be done by him.

Listen to me, faithful ones, that is, those who are baptized. Why do you die again, having been reborn? When, being baptized, you go through tortuous, slippery, and unclean ways, do you not know that you perish? You perish, my children, believe it. Do you not wish to believe? What can I do for you? Those who are faithful, and hear me, if perhaps you have committed such things, do not add to them; and pray so that God may forgive you. If you could not maintain, or did not wish to maintain, marital chastity or continence, and deviated from the purpose of either marital bond or devoted continence, let there be in you the pain and humility of penitence. I say more plainly: let no one say, "I did not understand." If, after your wives, you have defiled yourselves with illicit intercourse, if you have slept with someone other than your wives; do penance, as it is done in the Church, so that the Church may pray for you. Let no one say to himself, "I do it secretly, I do it before God: God knows who will forgive me, because I do it in my heart." Therefore, is it said in vain: "What you bind on earth will be bound in heaven"? Therefore, were the keys given to the Church of God in vain? Do we nullify the Gospel, nullify the words of Christ? Do we promise you what he denies? Do we not deceive you? Job says: "If I have been ashamed to confess my sins in the presence of the people." Such a just man, the gold of divine treasure, tested by such a furnace, says these things; and the son of pestilence resists me, and is ashamed to bend the knee under the blessing of God, with a proud neck, a crooked mind? Perhaps, indeed what is not doubted, for this reason God willed that Emperor Theodosius do public penance in the presence of the people, especially because his sin could not be hidden; and does a senator feel ashamed, what the emperor did not feel ashamed? Does he feel ashamed, not a senator, but only a curial, what the emperor did not feel ashamed? Does a plebeian or merchant feel ashamed, what the emperor did not feel ashamed? What pride is this? Would it not alone suffice for hell, even if there were no adultery? The adultery of men is not to be tolerated, just as that of women.

Finally, my brethren, listen to me, men, listen to me, women. Why are you angry with me? Would that you do what is written: "Be angry, and do not sin." I should fear that it happens to me what happened to the apostle Paul, which you have heard being read just now, if you were attentive: "So, have I become your enemy by telling you the truth?" And if it is so, let it be. If it is necessary that I am your enemy, I would rather be your enemy for your sake, than justice. I commend you to be guarded even by your wives. They are my daughters, just as you are my sons. Let them hear me: let them be zealous for their husbands; let them not reserve for themselves vain glory, in which wives are accustomed to be praised by their unchaste husbands because they bear with patience the unchastity of their husbands. I do not want Christian women to have such patience: let them be entirely zealous for their husbands; not for their own flesh, but for the souls of their husbands. Entirely, I advise, I urge, I command: the bishop commands, Christ in me commands. He knows in whose sight my heart burns. I, I say, command. Do not allow your husbands to commit fornication. Appeal against them to the Church. I do not say, to public judges, not to the proconsul, not to the vicariate, not to the count, not to the emperor; but to Christ. In all other matters, be the servants of your husbands, submissive in obedience. There should be no forwardness in you, no pride, no stiff neck, no disobedience at all: completely serve as servants. But when it comes to this matter, where the blessed Apostle has made you equal, saying: "The husband should give to his wife her conjugal rights, and likewise the wife to her husband"; he added: "The wife does not have authority over her own body, but the husband does." Why do you exalt yourself? Listen to what follows: "Likewise, the husband does not have authority over his own body, but the wife does." When it comes to this, cry out for your right. If your husband sells your gold for his necessity: bear it, woman; bear it, servant; do not quarrel, do not object. The contempt of your gold is the love of your husband. If he sells your estate for his necessity, which is also yours (for it cannot be his, which is not yours, if there is charity in you, which should be in a wife), bear it patiently; and if he hesitates, you offer it: despise everything for the love of your husband. But desire chastity, quarrel for chastity. Let your estate perish patiently, do not let his soul perish while you are patient. A man ought to lead a woman to good; but she should follow.

I do not tell men to be jealous of their wives in this matter. I know that they do it, I am aware. Who would tolerate an adulterous wife? And it is demanded of a woman that she tolerate an adulterous husband! Oh justice! Why, I ask you? Why? Because I am a man. Are you a man? Prove it in your strength, that you are a man. Are you a man? Conquer lust. How is it that the wife is stronger than the man? You are the head of the woman, man, it is true. If you are the head, lead, the wife should follow. But where the household is right, the husband is the head of the woman. If you are the head, lead: let her follow her head. But see where you go. Do not go where you do not want her to follow: do not go where you fear the follower to go, lest you both together fall into the pit of adultery: lest, when you do it, you teach what you do. It pains your soul if you both together fall into the pit of adultery: let it pain you if you alone fall. You are jealous, you do not want her to fall: fear, do not fall yourself. And you, most chaste women, do not imitate your unchaste husbands. Let it be far from you. Either let them live with you, or let them perish alone. A woman does not owe chastity to an unchaste husband, but she owes it to God, she owes it to Christ. Let her do it for Christ, not for him who does not deserve it; but let her do it for Christ. Let her pay attention to her value, read her agreements. Finally, let whoever perhaps feels indignant because I argue such things think what they will: for I know that those who are wise love me for this; because it is written not without reason: Rebuke a wise man, and he will love you: rebuke a fool, and he will increase his hatred for you. It did not say: He will begin; but, he will increase: because he already hated. Therefore, I know that the wise love me in this. Let those who know that I know their sins refrain from communion; lest they be thrown out of the enclosure. As for those whose sins I do not know, I address them before God. Let them also do penance, and thereafter abstain from the uncleanness of their fornications.

Let the penitents change their life; let the catechumens choose those whom they will imitate in the Church. To the penitent I say: what is it that you do? Know that you do nothing. What does it profit you to humble yourselves, if you do not change? To the catechumens I say: burn with the will to receive grace. But choose for yourselves in the Church of God those whom you may imitate. If you do not find them: woe to me, my God! What is it that I say: If you do not find them? Therefore, in the community of the faithful, is there no one whom you may find? For so many years, have we baptized so many people in vain, if there are not those who keep what they have received, who guard what they have heard. Far be it from me to believe this. It would be better if I were not your bishop if this were so. But I hope there are, I believe there are. This, however, is the miserable condition of my situation, for I am often compelled to know the adulterers, but I cannot know the chaste. What brings me joy is hidden, what torments me is public. Therefore, desire the grace of God, choose those whom you may imitate, with whom you may live, and with whom you may have sweet conversations of charity. Do not admit evil whispers. Evil conversations corrupt good morals. Live like wheat among the tares: bear the tribulations of this world, like grains on the threshing floor. The winnower will come: let no one be a separator at this time.

Sermons - Sermon 393

SERMO 393 On the Penitents He is not truly penitent who does not change his life.

Penitents, penitents, penitents (if indeed you are penitents, and not mockers), amend your life, be reconciled to God. For you also feed with a chain. With what chain, you ask? What you bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven. Do you hear the binding and think you can deceive God? You do penance, kneel, laugh, and mock the patience of God? If you are penitent, be penitent; if you are not penitent, you are not a penitent. If you are penitent, why do you do what you have done wrong? If you are sorry for what you did, do not do it. If you still do it, certainly you are not penitent. Indeed, dearest, men are sick, they send to the church, or they are carried to the church, and they are baptized, and renewed, and will be happy thenceforth. But this is not the cause of repentance. He who has not yet received Baptism has not yet violated the Sacrament: but he who has violated the Sacrament by living badly and desperately, and for this reason has been removed from the altar, lest he eat and drink judgment on himself; let him change his life, correct himself, and be reconciled, while he lives, while he is healthy. Does he also expect to be reconciled then, when he begins to die? We have known many who expired, waiting to be reconciled. Then also I say in the sight of God, to your fear, my fear. But he who does not fear, despises me who fear, but to his own harm. Listen then. I am certain that a baptized man, if he leads a life, I do not dare to say without sin, for who is without sin? but leads a life without crime, and has such sins as are daily forgiven in the prayer saying: Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors; when he finishes the day, he does not finish life, but passes from life to life, from labor to rest, from misery to blessedness: whether he runs to Baptism by his will, or is baptized in danger and leaves this life, he goes to the Lord, he goes to rest. But a baptized deserter and violator of such a Sacrament, if he does penance from his whole heart, if he does penance where God sees, who saw the heart of David, when rebuked by the prophet, and seriously rebuked, after the terrible threats of God he exclaimed, saying: I have sinned; and soon heard: The Lord has taken away your sin. Such is the value of three syllables. They are three syllables: I have sinned; but in these three syllables, the flame of the sacrifice of the heart ascends to heaven. Therefore, who truly does penance, and is loosed from the binding by which he was restrained and separated from the body of Christ, and lives well after penance, as he ought to have lived before penance, whenever he dies after reconciliation, he goes to God, he goes to rest, he will not be deprived of the kingdom of God, he will be separated from the people of the devil. But if anyone, placed in the last necessity of his illness, wants to do penance, and does it, and is immediately reconciled, and goes from here; I confess to you, we do not deny him what he asks, but we do not presume that he leaves well. I do not presume: I do not deceive you, I do not presume. A faithful man living well, leaves here securely. A baptized man at the hour, leaves here securely. Doing penance, and reconciled while healthy, and living well afterward, leaves here securely. Doing penance at the last and reconciled, if he leaves here securely, I am not secure. Where I am secure, I am secure, and give security: where I am not secure, I can give penance, I cannot give security. (But someone may say: Dear priest, you say you do not know and cannot give us any security if he is saved, and deserves to go to Christ, to whom penance is given when dying, who while he lived, while he was healthy, was not penitent; so teach us, please, how we should live well after penance. I say: abstain from drunkenness, lust, theft, and evil-speaking, from immoderate laughter, from idle talk, for which men will give account on the day of judgment. Behold how light I have said. Yet all are serious and pestilent. And I say further: Not only after penance should a man keep himself from these vices, but also before penance, while healthy; because if he stands at the last of life, he does not know if he will be able to receive penance and confess his sins to God and the priest. Behold why I said that we must live well even before penitence, and better after penitence). Consider what I say: I need to explain it more clearly, lest anyone misunderstand me. Do I say: He will be damned? I do not say. But neither do I say: He will be freed. And what do you say to me? I do not know: I do not presume, I do not promise; I do not know. Do you want to free yourself from doubt? Do you want to avoid what is uncertain? Do penance while you are healthy. For if you do true penance, while you are healthy, and the last day finds you, run to be reconciled; if you do so, you are secure. Why are you secure? Because you did penance at the time when you could sin. But if you then want to do penance when you can no longer sin; your sins have left you, not you them. But how do you know, you ask, perhaps God may forgive me? You speak the truth. How, I do not know. That I know, this I do not know. Therefore, I give you penance because I do not know. For if I knew it would not profit you, I would not give it to you. Again, if I knew it would profit you, I would not admonish you, I would not frighten you. There are two things: either it is forgiven you, or it is not forgiven: which of these will happen to you, I do not know. Therefore, leave the uncertain, hold the certain.

Sermons - Sermon 394

SERMO 394 On the Birthday of Saints Perpetua and Felicity Perpetua and Felicitas one solemnity.

Two gems have shone today in the Church, and one brightness: because Perpetua and Felicitas share one festivity; nor can it be doubted about Felicity, which possesses perpetual dignity. The custody of the prison joined them, grace also joined them: because there is no discord between them. They sang together in prison, they went together to meet Christ in the air; they fought together against the cow, they will enter together into the eternal homeland; they bore martyrdom together; one nursed, the other gave birth. Perpetua said when she handed over her infant and removed the nursing one: Who will separate us from the love of Christ? Felicitas, groaning from childbirth, followed her companions fearlessly; and after being freed by groaning, what did she say to Christ? You have broken my chains; I will offer you the sacrifice of praise. And blessed David, to console her groaning, said: May the Lord give you according to your heart, and confirm all your plans. Oh frailty! The darkness was fleeing, and the human condition was not passing. But He who conquered death, both delivered her from the danger of childbirth, and lifted the burden of nursing from Perpetua. For when they ascended the steps of that ladder, and trod the deceitful necks of the dragon, they came to the verdant garden of heavenly meadows, and found there the Good Shepherd laying down his life for his sheep, and seeking the milk from His flock. For, it is said, the shepherd was seated, young and old, green in age, white in hair, who does not know old age. The youth in his countenance was shining, because he himself is the same, and his years will not fail. His head was whitening, because the just Lord loved justice, and acknowledged equity in the Martyrs. Around him, inclined sheep were resting, he milked them with a pastoral finger, in which he found an abundance of milk and a fertile conscience of piety. He milked with his fingers and addressed them with paternal consolations, with prepared heavenly promises, saying: Come, blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. And he showed them vessels of milk foaming with a pure heart through clear almsgiving, and said: I was hungry, and you gave me to eat; I was thirsty, and you gave me to drink. Perpetua received new milk from the sweet shepherd before she shed her precious blood. They answered: Amen, and began to seek piety. They prayed in prison, secure now of the shepherd. O Lord, they said, let not our confession be barren, so that we also may be worthy to be joined with your precious flocks, and not be separated from your martyrs. In a vision, the arena was set before them in the amphitheater with pompous sand. There is that Egyptian, who was in heaven Lucifer in beauty: he, about to fight, wallows in the dust, and Perpetua, about to triumph with the Lord the Savior, extended her hands on the cross, having before her the Lord’s defender. She received triumph from victory, and obtained the branch from the crown. Let us also offer our gifts to them: others at the time were offering the visits of the prison; let us offer them the vow of solemnity, that we may be worthy of the kingdom with all the saints.

Sermons - Sermon 395

SERMO 395 ON THE ASCENSION OF THE LORD On Christian hope.

Today we celebrate the Ascension of the Lord into heaven: Let us not hear in vain "Lift up your hearts," and let us ascend with Him with whole hearts, as taught by the Apostle who says: "If you have been raised with Christ, seek the things that are above, where Christ is seated at the right hand of God; set your minds on things that are above, not on things on earth." Let the necessity of action be on earth; let the will of ascension be in heaven. Hope here, reality there. For a time will come when the reality will be there. When, however, the reality is there, hope will be neither here nor there: not because hope is in vain, but because it is ended when the reality has come. Indeed, hear what the Apostle said about hope. "In hope," he says, "we were saved. Now hope that is seen is not hope; for who hopes for what he sees? But if we hope for what we do not see, we wait for it with patience." Consider in human affairs themselves, that if someone hopes to marry, he does not yet have her; for if he has her, what does he hope for? Therefore, he marries the woman he hoped for; and then he will no longer hope. Thus, hope happily ends when the reality comes. Someone who is a foreigner hopes to come to his homeland: as long as he is not there, he hopes; when he arrives, he no longer hopes. For the reality has succeeded hope. Hope happily ends when what was hoped for is held. Therefore, beloved ones, now that you have heard that we should have our hearts on high, it is by the heart itself that we think of that future life. Let us live well here, so that we may live there.

About the mystical body.

Behold then the great regard of our Lord: who made us, descended to us; because we had fallen away from him. And in order to come to us, he did not himself fall, but descended to us. Therefore, if he descended to us, he lifted us up. Already in his own body he has lifted us up, our head: where the head is, the members will follow. For where the head has gone before, the members will follow. He is the head, we are the members. He is in heaven, we are on earth. Is he far from us as if by distance? God forbid. If you inquire about distances, he is far: ask charity, he is with us. For if he were not with us, he would not say in the Gospel: Behold, I am with you even unto the end of the age. If he is not with us, we lie when we say to you: The Lord be with you. He would not have cried from heaven to Saul persecuting, not himself, but his saints, his servants; and to speak more familiarly, his members: Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me? Behold, I am here in heaven, you on earth, and in the persecutors. Why me? Because they are my members: by which members I am there. For if the foot is trodden on, the tongue does not cry out. He therefore through whom heaven and earth were made, for the sake of the one whom he made from earth, descended to earth, and from here lifted earth to heaven. Therefore what has gone before in him, we hope for in the end. He will give back to us what he promised: we are secure, he has given us a pledge, he wrote the Gospel; he will give back to us. He has already bestowed more on us. For do we suppose that he will not give back his life, who has already given his death for us? He bore the humility of suffering, injuries, insults, all indignities on earth for us: will he not give us the kingdom, happiness, immortality, eternity? He bore our evils, will he not give us his good things? For this hope, because the promiser is truthful, let us walk securely: but let us live in such a way, that with good conscience we may say to him: We have done what you commanded, give what you promised.

Sermons - Sermon 396

SERMO 396 On the Assumption of the Bishop He who lives well does not live a short life.

You indeed, brothers, seek a comforter: but we too need to be consoled; and our consolation is no human being, but He who makes man; for He who made us remakes, and He who created re-creates. We can only be sorrowful through weakness; but through hope, we ought to be consoled. We wish all good people to live longer with us, and in this very harsh life, we do not want to be deserted by our companions; but those who have gone ahead of us, who have lived well, encourage us by their example, so that whether we live long here or leave soon, we may live in such a way that we come to them. Because living long here is nothing else than enduring troubles for a long time. But living with God and with God is to live without any trouble, and without any fear that happiness may perish, which has no end. Nor should we consider that your bishop, our brother, has gone from here quickly and lived little. For rightly there, one does not live little, where, even when much is said, it is not ended. For here, even what is much, when it has ended, will be considered as nothing. Nor did he live little here if we think of his deeds, not count his years. How many others, perhaps, have not completed in many years what he fulfilled in a few years? Therefore, it was nothing else to want to hold him here but to envy his happiness. The memory of the bishop in the heart of the faithful. For in this we have sorrow for the man as human beings. What then shall we do, so that we may not be human? Therefore, as human beings, we are sadly grieved by the departure of a man: but as we have heard the divine reading, that he who is perfected in a short time filled long times? Therefore, let us count time there, as a day is counted. Whatever he did among you by exhorting, speaking, setting himself up as an example to be imitated, to praise and worship God, hold onto; and with the most adorned memory of him, you will be honored. For it is not a great thing for him to be buried in marble tombs; but to be placed in your hearts. Let him live buried in living tombs. For his burial is your memory. He lives with God, to be happy; let him live with you, that you may be happy. We might be able to exhort you to faithful prudence with many words, were we not also scarcely permitted to speak because of human grief. Therefore, because God has granted us to be present at his death for a time; because He has granted us to lead his funeral: the leading which belongs to charity adds nothing to his happiness: He has also granted to us to see your holiness, and to speak to you, that we might with our small measure, offer you some consolation: whatever our grief does not allow us to say, supply by thinking; and although our soul in the remembrance of such a man has human sorrow, it does not have unfaithful despair.

Sermons - Sermon 4

SERMO 4 Of Esau and Jacob A reading that sounds carnal must be received spiritually.

We remember that we owe the discourse of yesterday's reading. But just as we owe the discourse, so you owe the attentiveness. And indeed that reading sounds in a carnal manner. However, he who has received the Spirit of God comprehends spiritually. For the Apostle said: "To set the mind on the flesh is death." And for this, the Lord promised the Paraclete, the Spirit of truth. Therefore, just as He promised and sent, so that everyone who has now received that Spirit may not be a slave to temporal pleasures but become the master of the body and a servant of the Creator, let him direct himself in the way of God's commandments. Let neither his footsteps waver, nor his eyes flinch, but let him advance with the intent of faith, so that he may come to that which now neither eye has seen, nor ear heard, nor has it entered into the heart of man. That which is believed before it is seen, so that when it comes, the one who believed is not put to shame. Therefore, let him walk in hope, hoping for what he does not yet hold, believing what he does not yet see, loving to whom he has not yet adhered. The exercise of the soul in faith, hope, and charity makes it fit to grasp what is to come.

All the martyrs filled with the confidence of the Spirit.

While Peter was still thinking carnally, disturbed by the maid's question, he denied the Lord three times. For the physician had foretold to the sick man what was going to happen to him. The sick man, unaware of his own sickness, had presumed too much about himself, but the true physician saw. For he had said he would die with the Lord and for the Lord. But he could not yet, because he was weak. However, when the Holy Spirit was later sent from heaven and strengthened those upon whom He came, he was filled with spiritual confidence and then was truly prepared to die for Him whom he had previously denied. Filled with this confidence, all the martyrs, holding the true faith, did not die nor suffer for a false faith, for an empty phantom, for vain hope, for something uncertain, but for the promise of truth, having certain knowledge that He who promised is powerful to deliver, they despised all present things and burned with desire for future things, which, when present, will not be past.

"Those who live according to the flesh pertain to Esau."

Remember therefore, those who were present yesterday, the two sons of Isaac, Esau and Jacob; how the younger is preferred over the elder, that you may belong to Jacob and not love Esau. Now Esau is one who wishes to live carnally or to hope for carnal things in the future age. Whether therefore living carnally and rejoicing in such things at this time, and hoping from God for such things as the wicked have, and placing all his happiness in the very thing that the wicked rejoice in, or certainly despising the present life and hoping for such in the future, is carnal, having a carnal faith, a carnal hope, a carnal love. But spiritual faith is: to believe that your Lord is your protector temporally, so that you may come to that which will not be temporal, and to hope to have the life of the angels, not in the corruptions of the flesh, not in pleasures and allurements, not in fornications and drunkenness and the joy of carnal feasts, not in the pride of the possession of earthly dominion, but only in the way the angels live. The joy of the angels is the vision of the Creator. But the angels live in joy, not of the creature, but of the Creator. For the joy of the creature is whatever is seen. The joy of the Creator is what is not seen by the eyes of the body, but by the purified gaze of the mind. Blessed are the pure in heart. To what vision are they blessed? Because they shall see God. Do not think, brothers, that the angels rejoice because they see the earth or the heaven or whatever is in them. They do not rejoice because they see the heaven and the earth but because they see Him who made the heaven and the earth.

God inhabits unapproachable light. But He who made heaven and earth is neither heaven nor earth, nor can anything earthly be imagined, nor anything heavenly, nor can you imagine anything corporeal or spiritual. This is not God. Do not make for yourself a grand and beautiful man. God is not circumscribed by human form. He is not contained in a place, nor held in space. Do not make for yourself a golden God. This is not God. For the gold from which you wish to make a god, God Himself made, and it is weak because it is in the earth. Do not propose to yourself that God is something like what you see in the heavens, neither the moon nor the sun nor the stars nor anything that shines and glitters in the sky. This is not God. But neither should God seem to you to be like the sun, for the sun is like a certain wheel, not an immense space of light; and you may say to yourself, "Therefore God is of infinite and immense light," so that, as it were, you extend the sun itself and make it not have an end, neither here nor there, neither upward nor downward, and yet set before yourself an immense light as God. This is not God either. For God indeed inhabits in inaccessible light. But such a light is not a wheel, nor can it be known to the eyes of the flesh.

True light is God. But if you can see what truth is, what wisdom is, what justice is, how it is said: Approach him and be enlightened, how it is that true light of which John says: There was the true light, which enlightens every man coming into this world, how John the Baptist himself was not the true light. For John the Evangelist says: He was not the light, but came to bear witness about the light. Not only was John the Baptist not the true light, but neither was Paul the true light, nor Peter the true light, nor any of the Apostles the true light. For indeed the true light is what enlightens every man coming into this world. They, however, were lights, because they were enlightened. For even the eyes of our flesh are called lights, and everyone swears: "By my lights." What are these lights? If the sun is absent, if the moon or lamp is absent, surely they remain in darkness. Where are the lights? Let them see before themselves, let them give guidance to the feet, if they are lights. And yet they are lights. Why are they lights? Because they can receive the light. For indeed, when the light has been brought in, the light itself is not felt by your forehead, nor by your ear, nor by your sense of smell, nor by your hand, nor by your foot. Only the members in you which are called eyes alone feel the brought-in light. In the absence of light, they are darkened, but with the light brought in, they alone are enlightened, that is, because they alone feel the light. Indeed all your other members are enlightened, but so that they can be seen, not so that they can see. For the light which rises or is brought in suffuses all your members: the eyes to see, the others to be seen. Thus all the saints are enlightened so that they may see, and that what they see they may proclaim. Therefore it was said to them: You are the light of the world. But light, not true light. Why? Because the true light was what enlightens every man. He said every man. If he were speaking of this sun, he would not say: Every man, because this sun is not only seen by men. Cattle and the smallest animals see this sun. And flies see this sun. But that light which is God no one sees, except those of whom it is said: Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. The light of virtues is present to all.

Try to think, brothers, of the light of truth, the light of wisdom, how it is present everywhere to all. Try to think of the light of justice: for it is present in every thinking person. For what is it that thinks? He who wishes to live unjustly sins, abandons justice. Is it diminished? He turns to justice. What? Is it increased? He abandons it, leaves it intact. He turns to it, finds it intact. What then is the light of justice? Does it rise from the East and go to the West? Or is there another place from where it rises or to which it goes? Is it not present everywhere? Indeed, a man who is in the West, if he wishes to live justly, that is, according to justice, is he lacking what he should look at and see according to justice itself? Again, if he is in the East and wants to live justly, that is, according to the same justice, is it lacking for him? For justice is there; it is present to one living justly. According to its rule, they see how they should live justly as well. Just as the righteous see it by living well, so the unrighteous do not see it by living badly. For the one lives justly when he sees it, and he sees it to direct his actions according to it, because unless he directs his actions according to the rule of justice, he is thrust into the error of iniquity. Because therefore it could be present to him standing there, it is in no place and is everywhere. Thus justice, thus wisdom, thus truth, thus chastity. Therefore try to see such a light. But you cannot. The eye of the mind falters, let it be purified to see. But in order to be purified and see, let it believe so that it may deserve to be purified. Therefore, what you cannot see, defer it, so that you may be healed and can see it. The spiritual rest of the future age. Do not, however, imagine anything in the future age like what you see now. Because if you imagine and love such a thing, you want to go beyond the world with the world itself, you want to take the world with you. Those things will not be there. There will be a certain light from which something now drips, which we now understand and rejoice in. But if we have a blessing from the dew of heaven, we have abundance from the fertility of the earth: for thus Jacob is blessed. Let us belong to him and not live carnally. For anyone who begins to live carnally is therefore called Esau the greater. Two Testaments are mentioned in the Law, one Old, the other New. The Old had temporal promises, but spiritual significations. Let your Charity attend. If the "land of promise" is promised to the Jews, it spiritually signifies something by the land of promise. If the city of peace, Jerusalem, is promised to the Jews, the name of the city Jerusalem spiritually signifies something. If circumcision of the flesh is given to the Jews, it signifies a certain spiritual circumcision. If the Jews are commanded to observe one Sabbath day out of seven days, it signifies a spiritual rest, which has no evening. For in those seven days, in Genesis it is said in all the days: There was evening; on the seventh day it does not say: "There was evening." The seventh day, which does not have an evening, signifies for us eternal rest, where there is no setting. If carnal sacrifices are given to the Jews, through the victims of animals all signify spiritual sacrifices. Therefore, those who have understood in this way as if something present was given to them for greatness and sought nothing for the future, nor were able to understand spiritually the things that were done carnally, belong to the elder son, belong to the Old Testament. The Old Testament is a figure of the New. For the Old Testament is a figurative promise. The New Testament is a promise understood spiritually. For while the Jerusalem which was on the earth pertains to the Old Testament, it has an image toward the Jerusalem which is in heaven, and pertains to the New Testament. Bodily circumcision pertains to the Old Testament; heart circumcision pertains to the New Testament. The people are liberated from Egypt according to the Old Testament; the people are liberated from the devil according to the New Testament. The Egyptian persecutors and Pharaoh pursue the Jews leaving Egypt; their sins and the devil, the prince of sins, pursue the Christian people. But just as the Egyptians pursue the Jews up to the sea, so sins pursue Christians up to baptism. Pay attention, brothers, and see, the Jews are liberated through the sea, the Egyptians are submerged in the sea; Christians are liberated in the forgiveness of sins, their sins are erased through baptism. They exit after the Red Sea and walk through the desert; likewise, Christians after baptism are not yet in the land of promise, but are in hope. However, this age is a desert, and truly for a Christian it is a desert after baptism, if he understands what he has received. If not only bodily signs happen in him, but also a spiritual effect in the heart, he understands that this world is a desert for him, he understands that he lives in pilgrimage, desires his homeland. As long as he desires, he is in hope. For we are saved by hope. But hope that is seen is not hope. For what one sees, why does he hope for? But if we hope for what we do not see, we wait for it with patience. This patience in the desert makes one hope. If he already thinks he is in his homeland, he does not reach the homeland. If he already thinks he is in his homeland, he remains on the way. But so he does not remain on the way, let him hope for the homeland, desire the homeland lest he should stray. For temptations occur. And just as in the desert temptations occur, so after baptism they occur. For just as the Egyptians were not the only enemies of the Jews who pursued them from Egypt (they were past enemies, just as each one's past life and past sins with their prince the devil pursue him), but there arose also in the desert those who wanted to impede the way, and they fought with them, and were defeated. So after baptism, when the Christian begins to walk the path of his heart in hope of God's promises, let him not stray. For temptations occur suggesting something else (the delights of this world, another kind of life) to twist each one from the way and lead him away from his purpose. But if you overcome these desires, these suggestions, the enemies on the way are defeated, and the people are brought to the homeland.

Hear the Apostle, for these things were our examples: For I do not want you to be ignorant, brothers, that all our fathers were under the cloud. If they were under the cloud, they were under gloom. What does it mean, they were under gloom? It means they did not understand spiritually the things that were happening to them physically. And all passed through the sea, and all were baptized into Moses, and all ate the same spiritual food. For manna was given to them in the desert, as the sweetness of the Scriptures is given to us so that we endure in this wilderness of human life. And Christians know what kind of manna they receive, to whom the psalm itself says: Taste and see how sweet the Lord is. And all, he says, ate the same spiritual food. What does same mean? Signifying the same. And all drank the same spiritual drink. And notice how he explained one thing and kept silence about the others: For they drank from the spiritual rock that followed them; the rock, however, was Christ. These things were our examples. They were shown to them, but they were our examples, because they were shown to them physically, but they were signified to us spiritually. Therefore, those who physically held them belonged to the Old Testament. In Isaac two peoples are in his sons.

Now see that Isaac had grown old. Whose role did Isaac represent when he wished to bless his elder son? He had already grown old. Where there is old age, there is antiquity. For by old age, I understand antiquity, and by antiquity, I understand the Old Testament. Therefore, this Old Testament, because they did not understand it who were under the cloud, is said to have caused the eyes of Isaac to be dim. The dimness of Isaac's bodily eyes signifies the obscurity of the minds of the Jews. The old age of Isaac signifies the antiquity of the Old Testament.

What then, brothers? He still wished to bless his elder son Esau. The mother loved the younger, and the father loved the elder as if he were the firstborn. For justice is equal towards both, but there was greater affection towards the firstborn. He wished to bless the elder because the Old Testament promised first to the people. It speaks the promises only to the Jews. It seems to promise to them, it seems to promise everything to them. They are called out of Egypt, delivered from enemies, led through the sea, fed with manna, receive the Testament, receive the Law, receive the promises, receive the very land of promise. It is no wonder that he wished to bless the first son. But under the figure of the elder, the younger is blessed. For the mother bears the type of the Church. Understand the Church, brothers, not only in those who began to be saints after the advent and birth of the Lord, but all the saints who were before pertain to the same Church. For it is not that Father Abraham does not pertain to us, because he was before Christ was born of the Virgin, and we, so much later, that is, after the passion of Christ, became Christians; when the Apostle says that we are sons of Abraham by imitating the faith of Abraham. Therefore, we are admitted to the Church by imitating him, and shall we exclude him from the Church? This Church is signified in Rebecca, the wife of Isaac. This Church was also in the saints, even the Prophets, who understood the Old Testament because those carnal promises signified something spiritual. If spiritual, then spiritual to the younger son, because the carnal is first, and afterward the spiritual. The Jewish people and the Christian people.

Yesterday, we already mentioned to your Holiness that Esau is called the elder son because no one becomes spiritual unless they first are carnal. But if one persists in the wisdom of the flesh, he will always be an Esau. However, if he becomes spiritual, he will be the younger son. Yet the younger will be greater: for he precedes in time, this one in virtue. For when Jacob had cooked pottage, Esau desired to take it before coming to this blessing. And he said to him: Give me your birthright and I will give you the pottage that I cooked. He sold his birthright to the younger. The one took away temporary pleasure, the other took away eternal dignity. Therefore, those who serve temporary pleasures in the Church are eating pottage. Indeed, Jacob cooked the pottage, but Jacob did not eat it. For idols had more power in Egypt. Pottage is the food of Egypt. By pottage, all the errors of the nations are signified. Because therefore the Church, more eminent and manifest, was signified as coming in the younger son from the nations, it is said that Jacob cooked the pottage and Esau ate it. Indeed the nations have abandoned the idols they once worshiped. But the Jews were serving idols. For being turned in heart to Egypt, they were led through the wilderness. And when their enemies were slayed in the sea, and their foes were drowned in the waves, they desired to make idols since they could not see Moses. And they did not understand that God was present with them, but having hope in a man's presence, when they did not see a man with their eyes, they began to think that God was not there, although He alone through Moses did so many great things. They sought a man with the eyes of the flesh because they did not have the eyes of the heart wherewith to see God in Moses. Therefore, they lost their primacy because, turned in heart to Egypt, they ate the pottage. Receive it. The Christian people are. But in the Christian people, those hold the primacy who belong to Jacob. But those who live carnally, believe carnally, hope carnally, love carnally, still belong to the Old Testament, not yet to the New. They are still in the lot of Esau, not yet in the blessing of Jacob. The blessing reaches the lesser.

Let your Holiness attend. Therefore, the old Isaac, with dimmed eyes, wanted to bless the elder son because the Old Testament was directed to the Jews. But the Old Testament was not understood by them; hence it is said that his eyes were dim. As I said, brothers, he speaks to the elder one, but the blessing reaches the younger. Indeed, this mother, understood in all the saints, that is, the Church, which understood the prophecy, gives advice to the younger son and says to him: I myself heard your father saying to your brother: Go, and bring me venison, so that I may eat and bless you before I die. Now therefore, my son, listen to me. And she gave him advice to go and bring two kids from the nearby flock, and his mother would prepare them as his father liked, so that he could eat and bless his younger son while the elder one was absent. But he was afraid and said: My brother is hairy, and I am smooth; lest my father feel me and know that I am Jacob, and instead of a blessing, I draw upon myself a curse. But she said: Go, my son, and listen to me; let your curse be upon me. He went and brought two kids. They were prepared, and presented to his father. And as foretold, because he did not recognize him by his voice, he touched him, and found the hair, for his mother had covered his arms with the skins of the kids. He believed him to be the elder, and blessed him. In the blessing, he intended the elder, and the blessing reached the younger. What then is it that the younger is blessed under the guise of the elder, except that under the figures of the Old Testament promised to the Jewish people, the spiritual blessing reaches the Christian people? Attend, brothers. They hear of the Promised Land, and we also hear. Scripture seems to speak to the Jews about the Promised Land, and the understanding of the Promised Land reaches us, who say to God: You are my hope, my portion in the land of the living. But so that we might say this, the mother taught us, that is, the Church itself teaches us through the saints and prophets how to understand the very carnal promises spiritually.

Two kinds of Christians are born in the womb of the Church. But the blessing could not reach us unless, already cleansed from sins through the birth of regeneration, we bear the sins of others through tolerance. For the mother bore both sons. Pay attention, brothers. She bore one hairy, the other smooth. Hair signifies sins, while smoothness signifies meekness, that is, cleanliness from sins. The two sons are blessed because the Church blesses two kinds. Just as Rebecca bore two, two are generated in the womb of the Church: one hairy, the other smooth, whose differences we have explained. For there are people who, even after baptism, do not want to abandon their sins and wish to do the things they did before. For example: if they committed frauds, they want to defraud again; if they swore false oaths, they want to perjure again; if they deceived the innocent with tricks, they still want to deceive; if they contemplated homicides, they contemplate the same; if they fornicated, if they got drunk, they do these things no less. Behold, Esau was born hairy. What does Jacob do? He is told by his mother: "Go, your father will bless you." And he says: "I fear, I will not approach." For there are people in the Church who fear to mingle with sinners, lest by associating with sinners they be defiled in unity and perish through heresies and schisms.

Jacob came with deceit.

What then is said of hairy Esau, who did not behave well in the house? For this too is said of them. He was a rustic hunter, but Jacob lived without deceit in the house. And therefore his mother loved him, feeling his sweet conversation. He is Jacob, who was later called Israel, after wrestling with the angel: and this in a great mystery. Blessed, he was called Israel, and because he was without deceit. Listen carefully, my brothers, and see how he was without deceit. When the Lord saw Nathanael, because He knew what kind of man he was, He said, "Behold, truly an Israelite, in whom there is no deceit." If therefore this one is an Israelite because there is no deceit in him, certainly there was no deceit in Israel himself. Then what does it mean when it is said: "Your brother came with deceit; and took your blessing." Scripture commends him living without deceit in the house. The Lord also bears witness, because he was without deceit, when He speaks of Nathanael: "Behold, truly an Israelite, in whom there is no deceit." Then what does it mean when it is said: "He approached with deceit, and took the blessing?" The deceit of Jacob, what it is. In the meantime, let us consider what "deceit" signifies, and let us see what Jacob must do. He carries the sins of others, and he carries them with patience even though they are not his own. For this is to have the skins of goats, that is, he patiently bears the sins of others, not adhering to his own. Thus, all who for the unity of the Church endure the sins of others imitate Jacob. For Jacob himself is in Christ, since Christ is in the seed of Abraham. For it has been said: In your seed all nations will be blessed. Therefore, our Lord Jesus Christ, who did no sin, carried the sins of others. And does one disdain to carry the sins of others, to whom his own sins have been forgiven? If, therefore, Jacob transitions to Christ, he carries the sins of others, that is, the skins of goats. And what is deceit?

Those two men were two peoples. For he comes late and brings what the father commanded, and he finds his brother blessed instead of him, and he is not blessed with another blessing. Because those two men represent two peoples. One blessing signifies the unity of the Church. However, those same two peoples are represented by Jacob. But in another way, two peoples are figured as belonging to Jacob. For indeed, our Lord Jesus Christ, who had come to the Jews and the Gentiles, was rejected by the Jews, who belonged to the elder son. Yet he chose some who belonged to the younger son, who had begun to desire and understand the promises of the Lord spiritually, not carnally desiring to receive another land, but spiritually desiring that city, where no one is born carnally; because there no one dies carnally, nor spiritually. In many places of the Scriptures, two peoples are understood.

Therefore, when they began to desire this, they began to belong to Jacob, who believed in Christ, and the flock of the Lord was made in Judah itself. But what does the Lord say about this flock? I have other sheep that are not of this fold; I go to bring them, and there will be one flock and one shepherd. What other sheep does the Lord Jesus Christ have, if not from the gentiles? The sheep from the gentiles were joined to the Jewish sheep. For from the Jews were the Apostles. There were also five hundred brethren who saw the Lord after the resurrection. From there was Nathaniel himself, of whom the Lord testified that there was no deceit in him. There were one hundred and twenty who, when they were in the house, the Holy Spirit came to fill them, whom He had promised to the disciples. There were so many thousands of people we read about in the Acts of the Apostles baptized in the name of Christ, even those who crucified Christ. Therefore, there were sheep from there, and many sheep. But not only those. The Lord had others from the gentiles. These two peoples, coming as if from different paths, are also signified by the two walls. Indeed, the Church of the Jews came from circumcision. The Church of the gentiles came from the uncircumcision. Coming from different paths, they were united in the Lord. Therefore, the Lord was called the corner stone. For the psalm says: The stone which the builders rejected, this became the head of the corner. And the Apostle says: Christ Jesus himself being the chief corner stone. Where there is a corner, two walls are joined; two walls do not meet at the corner unless they come from different directions; for if they come from one direction, they do not form a corner.

Therefore, the two kids, these are the two peoples, these are the two folds, these are the two walls, these are the two blind men who were sitting by the road, these are the two boats in which the fish were hauled up. In many places of the Scriptures, the two peoples are understood, but they are one in Jacob.

Kids and lambs.

Why kids, someone might say? You know that kids are sinners, for kids will be to the left, and lambs to the right. But those who persist as kids will be to the left. For if they were not first kids, the Lord would not say: I did not come to call the righteous, but sinners. For when the Lord was associating with sinners and eating with tax collectors, the Jews, as if they were lambs, that is, as if they were righteous, and more so, goats due to pride, reproached the Lord as if it were a crime, and indeed said to his disciples: Why does your master eat with tax collectors and sinners? The Lord, responding, how did he defend himself? It is not the healthy who need a physician, he said, but the sick: I did not come to call the righteous, but sinners. Therefore, he calls the kids, but so they do not persist as kids. For Jacob killed them and prepared a feast for his father from them, that is, for the spiritual understanding, which was to be understood in that blessing, although it was depicted in the elder son. The kids were killed for this, and they were eaten, and transferred into one body. Thus sins are killed in sinners, and transferred, slain, into the one body of the Church, the Church whose figure Peter bore when it was said to him: Kill and eat. Therefore, that one wild, this one tame in the home; that one older, this one younger; the blessings seemed to regard that one, but reached this one. They regarded that one, because carnal promises were being promised to the Jews; but they reached this one, because they were to be understood spiritually, and received by Christians. The blessing would not come to this one, unless he carried the sins, which he no longer committed.

Love the sinner not insofar as he is a sinner but insofar as he is a human being.

Therefore, let your Holiness understand how sins should be borne. For there are those who seem to bear sins for themselves and remain silent to sinners. Now, this hypocrisy is detestable. Bear the sinner, not so that you love the sin in him, but so that you may persecute the sin because of him. Love the sinner, not in so far as he is a sinner, but in so far as he is a human being. Just as if you love the sick person, you pursue the fever; for if you spare the fever, you do not love the sick person. Therefore, say what is true to your brother, do not remain silent. For what else do we do but tell you what is true? Do not lie: say what is true with open truth, but until he is corrected, he should be borne. Killing of goats and bearing of skins could be done at different times; yet they signify something that can happen at one time. For at the same time, the righteous both rebukes sinners, which is to kill goats, and mercifully tolerates their sins, which is to bear skins. As much as it was in him, he killed the goats, he killed the sinners. But he bore the sins of others and bore them with tolerance. He deserved to be blessed because charity bears all things. Charity itself was in the mother, and the mother carried the figure of charity itself. The figure of all saints was that she carried the figure of charity, because the saints are only those who have had charity. For what good will it do, if I speak with the tongues of men and of angels but do not have charity? I have become a sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal. And if I have all faith, so as to move mountains, but do not have charity, I am nothing. And if I know all mysteries and all prophecies and give my body to be burned, but do not have charity, it profits me nothing. What kind of charity, then, is it that alone profits greatly, without which the rest profit nothing! Therefore, charity itself gives advice, and the son of charity obeys.

Isaac was acting figuratively.

What counsel does he give? That he should take the goatskins and approach the father. The father seeks the elder and blesses the younger. The Old Testament regards the Jews through the letter and through its spiritual understanding the Christians are blessed in it. Let Your Holiness attend to the great mystery, a great sacrament. Isaac says, “Your brother has come with deceit,” about the man without deceit. Without a doubt, that Isaac, as he was in the prophetic spirit, knew what was happening, and he himself acted figuratively. He places everything in the great height of the mysteries. For if he did not know what he was doing, he would be angry at the son deceiving him. The elder comes and says, “Behold, father, eat; as you commanded me, I have done.” He says, “Who are you?” He responds, “I am your elder son Esau.” And he says, “Who then is he, from whom I have already eaten and blessed him, and he will be blessed?” He seemed to be angry. He expected some curse from the mouth of Esau upon his brother. While he expects a curse, he confirms the blessing. Oh, to be angry, oh, to be indignant! But he knew the mystery. And the darkness of his bodily eyes signified the darkness of the mind of the Jews. However, the eyes of his heart saw the height of the mysteries.

Some figures of Christ. And he said, "Your brother came with deceit and took away your blessing." We were saying to see what it means with deceit. Deceit here is not deceit. How is deceit not deceit? How is a rock not a rock? Just as the sea is said and it is not the sea because it signifies something else. Thus, the land is said and it is not the land because it signifies something else. Thus, a rock is said and it is not a rock because it signifies something else. Thus, a mountain is said and it is not a mountain. Thus, the lion from the tribe of Judah is said to be the Lord Jesus Christ, and the Lord Jesus Christ is not a lion. Thus, a lamb is said and it is not a lamb. Thus, cattle are said and it is not cattle. Thus, a calf is said and it is something else. Thus, deceit is said and it is not deceit. Why, then, is it called deceit, let us inquire. Why all those things are so called, let us inquire. Why was he called a lion? Because of strength. Why was he called a rock? Because of firmness. Why was he called a lamb? Because of innocence. Why was he called a calf? Because of the sacrifice. Why was it called a mountain? Because of greatness. Why was it called manna? Because of sweetness. Why, then, deceit? Now let us see what deceit is, and we will find why it was called deceit. For we know what a rock is; and yet it is said of a foolish and hard person that he is a rock, and of a strong and immovable person, it is said he is a rock. And you led firmness to praise, and hardness to blame. We know firmness in a rock, and we accepted Christ as the rock: But the rock was Christ. In a lion, we know strength, and yet the devil is also called a lion. What do we know in deceit, that we may accept deceit in a figure, just as we accept a mountain, just as we accept a lion, just as we accept a lamb, just as we accept a rock, and others?

There was not true deceit in Jacob.

What then is deceit? Deceit is when one thing is done and another feigned. Therefore, when something else is in intention, something else in deeds, it is called deceit. Deceit, then, in its own right, is reprehensible, just as a stone in its own right. Whoever says that the stone in its own right was Christ blasphemes, just as he blasphemes who says that the calf in its own right was Christ. The calf in its own right is cattle, in figure it is a victim. The stone in its own right is hardened earth, in figure it is firmness. Deceit in its own right is fraud, in figure it is the figure itself. For every figurative and allegorical reading or speech appears to sound one way carnally, another way spiritually. Therefore, he called this figure by the name of deceit. What then does it mean: He came with deceit and took away your blessing? Because what was done was figured, therefore it is said: He came with deceit. For he would not confirm the blessing to the deceitful man, to whom justly a curse was due. Therefore, that was not true deceit, especially since he did not lie by saying: I am your elder son Esau. For he had already agreed this with his brother and had sold his birthright. He said this to his father, having what he had bought from his brother; what the other had lost had passed to him. For the honor of the first-born was not excluded from the house of Isaac. The honor of the first-born was there. It was not in him who had sold it. Where was it, if not in the younger? Therefore, knowing this in mystery, Isaac confirmed the blessing and says to his son: What shall I do for you? And he said: Bless me also, father, for you have not only one blessing. Isaac, however, knew there was only one.

What sort of blessing did Jacob receive?

Why only one? The Spirit will be present in order for me to explain and for you to understand. Let us see the blessings themselves, what kind of blessing Jacob received, and what kind of blessing Esau received. Isaac himself to Jacob: Are you my son Esau? He replied: I am. And he said: Bring it to me, and I will eat of your game, my son, so that my soul may bless you before I die; but bring me a kiss. He did not kiss him. The blessing began with peace. Why did he confirm peace with a kiss? Because he too carried others' sins for the sake of peace. And he approached, and kissed him. And he smelled the scent of his clothing. For he was wearing his brother's robe. That is, the dignity of the firstborn which he had lost, this one had. In him it already smelled good, what that one had lost disgracefully. He smelled the scent of his clothing, and blessed him, and said: Behold, the scent of my son is like the scent of a field which the Lord has blessed. He received the scent of the garment, and he spoke of the scent of the field. Understand Christ in the inner mystery, and understand the garment of Christ as the Church. The Church is signified in many ways. May Your Holiness understand. For one thing is signified in many ways. That is, the Church which those two kids signify, the same is signified by this garment, because one thing is signified in many ways, which is none of these things by evidence, all by figure. A lamb cannot be a lion; a lion cannot be a lamb. However, our Lord Jesus Christ could be both lion and lamb. But because he is neither lion nor lamb by evidence, but both lion and lamb by figure. Thus the kids cannot be a garment, and the garment cannot be kids. The Church, however, because it is neither kids nor garment by evidence, is both kids and garment by figure. And whatever else can be said. The field is the Church, whose farmer is God.

He smelled his garments and said: Behold, the smell of my son is like the smell of a field which the Lord has blessed. This field is the Church. Let us prove that the field is the Church. Hear the Apostle speaking to the faithful: You are God’s field, God’s building. Not only is the Church a field, but also God is the farmer. Hear the Lord Himself: I am the vine, you are the branches, and My Father is the farmer. Therefore, the Apostle, working in this field and hoping for an eternal reward, arrogates nothing to himself, except what befits a worker. I, he says, planted, Apollos watered, but God gave the increase. Therefore, neither he who plants is anything, nor he who waters, but God who gives the increase. How he retained humility, so that it might belong to Jacob, so that he might not lose the robe, the smell of which was like the smell of a full field, to the Church, and transfer to the pride of Esau, understanding carnally and full of vanity! Therefore, the field smells of the son's garment. But that field is nothing of itself. Therefore, he added: which the Lord blessed. And may the Lord give you of the dew of heaven above, and of the fatness of the earth, and an abundance of grain and wine. And nations shall serve you, and you shall be lord over your brothers, and your father's sons shall bow down to you. Cursed be he who curses you, and blessed be he who blesses you. This is the blessing of Jacob. If Esau were not also blessed, there would be no question. He too is blessed, but not with the same blessing, nor entirely alien to this one.

What kind of blessing did Esau receive?

Let us hear, then, how Esau is blessed, and let us see what difference there is between the spiritual children of the Church and the carnal ones; between those who bear others' sins and those who bear their own; between those who always live spiritually and those who always delight in carnal joys. But Isaac, answering, said to Esau: "Who then hunted game for me and brought it to me? Blessed be he." And it happened when Esau heard the words of his father Isaac, he cried out with a great voice and said: "Bless me also, father." And he said to him: "Your brother came deceitfully and took away your blessing."

Jacob supplanted Esau. And Esau said: Justly is his name called Jacob. For Jacob is called Supplantation. And this supplantation is not meaningless, because it is taken in a figurative manner, as deceit. For there was not so much malice in the brother, that he would want to supplant his brother. For he was called supplanter when he held the heel of his brother being born by the hand: then he was called supplanter. But the supplantation of the carnal is the life of the spiritual. For all the carnal, when they envy the spiritual in the Church, are supplanted and become worse. Listen to the Apostle saying the same thing, especially because there he mentioned the scent, which Isaac expressed here, saying: Behold, the scent of my son is like the scent of a full field, which the Lord has blessed. Therefore, the Apostle says: We are the good odor of Christ in every place, and he says: To some indeed the odor of life, unto life; to others the odor of death, unto death. And who is sufficient for these things? That is, to understand how we are the odor of death unto death for men, through no fault of ours. For they walk their spiritual paths, knowing nothing other than to live well. And those who envy the innocent living, commit serious sins, by which God punishes them. And that scent becomes unto death for them, which is unto life for others. For the Lord Himself was first made a good odor unto life for the believers, and a bad odor unto death for the persecutors. For because many believed in Him, the Jews envied, and committed such a great crime by killing the innocent, the Holy of holies. For if they had not done this, the good odor of Christ would not avail them unto death. Therefore, Esau was supplanted in the blessing of the father.

Isaac answered and said to him: "I have made him your lord. For Esau could receive nothing else of what has been said: 'And all his brothers will serve him.' But what can I do for you, my son?" And Esau said to his father: "Still, bless me too." When Isaac was constrained; that is, when he was forced. A great thing, a great mystery: may we grasp it! He blesses under compulsion, and yet he blesses. And what he blesses is true, but still he blesses under compulsion. Consider what this means. Let us see the blessing itself and understand what it means to bless under compulsion.

Proper in the blessing of Jacob and in the blessing of Esau.

Isaac replied - indeed the father did not kiss Esau - and said to him: Behold, your dwelling will be from the fertility of the earth, and from the dew of heaven above. He said this also to him: From the abundance of the earth, and from the dew of heaven: this therefore is common to Jacob and Esau. What is proper to Jacob? Nations will serve you. What is proper to Jacob? All your brothers will serve you, and he who blesses you will be blessed, and he who curses you will be cursed. He also has something of his own, which was not said to Jacob: And by your sword you will live, and you will serve your brother. But lest he took away free will - as we said already here and yesterday - he added: But it will be, when you break free and remove the yoke from your neck. What is: But it will be, when you break free and remove the yoke from your neck? It is free for you, if you wish, to convert; not as if you will be two, but one Jacob. For all who convert from Esau, belong to Jacob. Likeness makes one, unlikeness makes diversity. What then? From the dew of heaven, and from the fertility of the earth, both have. Nations and your brothers and the sons of your father will serve you, only Jacob has. But by your sword you will live, only Esau. They have something in common, some things individually. The Word of God waters both the wicked and the good in the Church.

There are evil ones in the Church belonging to Esau, for they too are sons of Rebecca, sons of the mother Church, born from her womb, and persevering in fleshly sins like those who are hairy, yet still born from that womb. Therefore, they have from the dew of heaven and from the fertility of the earth: from the dew of heaven all Scriptures, all divine preaching; and from the fertility of the earth, all visible sacraments: for a visible sacrament pertains to the earth. All these things are common in the Church to both the good and the evil. For they too have and participate in the sacraments, and - as the faithful know - from the wheat and wine. They have from the dew of heaven, for the word of God descends upon all from heaven. The word of God comes and waters. But observe who waters, and what is watered. For it waters both the evil and the good. Yet those evil ones convert the good rain to the root of thorns; while the good draw the rain to good fruit. For the Lord rains upon both the crop and the thorns: but he rains on the crop for the granary, on the thorns for the fire; and yet the rain is the same. Thus the word of God waters all. Let each one see what kind of root he has; let each one see to where he draws the good rain. If he draws it to produce thorns, should the rain of God be blamed for this? Before it comes to the root, that rain is sweet. The word of God is sweet, until it reaches an evil heart, and that heart converts the rain of God to its own deceit, converts it to hypocrisy, converts it to the roots of evil desires, to its own perversities and depravations. It indeed begins to produce thorns, but from good rain: for it has from the dew of heaven. And because not all evil ones are excluded from the sacraments of God, it has from the fertility of the earth, as known to those who have already become willing participants in the mysteries of the faithful.

Among all nations, sinners are mixed with the spiritual ones.

These matters pertain to both, but not to all nations, only to the spiritual ones, because they pertain to the Church which has filled the entire world. Pay attention, brothers, and discern as much as you can, or as much as the Lord gives you. Every spiritual person sees that the Church throughout the whole world is one, true, catholic. And it arrogates nothing to itself, and bears the sins of men whom it cannot cleanse from the Lord's threshing floor until that last winnower comes, who cannot be deceived, to cleanse his floor, and gather the wheat into his barn, but give the chaff to be burned. For he will exclude the chaff and separate it from the wheat, and prepare the barn for the grain, and the fire for the chaff. So, since he knows, he bears the sinners to be separated at the end. Throughout all nations, sinners and all carnal ones are mixed with the spiritual ones and serve them. But the spiritual ones do not serve, because they profit from them, while they themselves fail. Pay attention, my brothers. I will say if I can, and I will not be afraid. I will not be silent. For I am urged to speak. And if some perhaps become angry with me, let them forgive. For I am afraid, as I said. Let them forgive my fear. Christ feared no one. But we, fearing Christ, spare not, lest, while we do not wish to sadden such, he does not spare us. Be willing to hear what I want to say, and heed attentively. Jacob and Esau both received from the dew of heaven and the fatness of the earth. Both have what we already mentioned, what we know, what you know. But that nations might serve him, only Jacob received, because in the Church throughout the whole world, the carnal do not serve except the spiritual. Why? Because the spiritual profit from them. For this reason, carnal men are called slaves. And even if they do what they do not want, the evil conversation of the carnal benefits the spiritual, because they profit from that conversation, and are crowned through endurance.

All the carnal ones in the Church belong to Esau. Your Holiness, pay attention to what we say. But the nations were not given to Esau, because all the carnal ones who are in the Church are either divided or easily prone to division. Behold, the part of Donatus was made from there, from those carnal ones thinking carnally. They were carnal, but because they sought their own honor, or they lost patience, they found an entryway, and were divided. They loved their own honor, they valued it greatly, they were swollen with the pride of arrogance, they did not have tolerance, that is, they did not have charity. For it is written: Charity endures all things, sustains all things. It does not envy, it is not inflated, it does not act improperly. Thus, whatever else they might have had, because they did not have that through which it benefits whatever is possessed, they divided themselves. And as many heresies or divisions and schisms were made, they were made through these carnal ones. For either they thought carnally, and made images of their own fantasies, and erred, and the Catholic faith reproved them; and when they were argued with, they were cast outside by their own weight. Or, finding disputes and hatreds with men, they divided themselves. Therefore, who divided themselves, but those to whom belongs that sword of which it is said: By your sword you shall live? Not that the sword is not understood in a good sense. For just as those higher things are said, that is, how that stone is received both for firmness because of Christ and for offense because of the fool; how the lion is called Christ for one thing and the lion is called the devil for another: so the sword is sometimes understood in a good sense, sometimes in a bad sense. But here the sword was not given to Jacob without reason, but was given to Esau, unless something mysterious is signified in the bad sense. Just as servitude itself is not alien to the mystery; that is, what was said: You shall serve your brother, for this too was said in a great mystery.

Part of Donatus is chaff.

Therefore, brothers, those who divide themselves have the sword of division, and in their sword they die, and in their sword they live. But because the Lord had truly said: "He who strikes with the sword will die by the sword," see them, my brothers, who have cut themselves off from unity, in which they are cut off in vain. You know how many parts the party of Donatus made, and I do not think it escapes your Holiness that he who strikes with the sword dies by the sword. It was said to him: "You will live by your sword." So also those who have not departed from the Church, and are like this, as if they were outside. For those who love their honors in the Church are entirely like those who love their secular comforts in the Church. And they themselves are chaff. But the wind is absent, therefore they do not fly from the threshing floor. This is what I say briefly, the trial is absent, for they would fly from the threshing floor. Finally, when the Church does something against them, how easily they cut themselves off! How easily they gather outside, and yet do not want to relinquish their rule! How they want to die for that rule! How they want to hold the people under themselves, and not let the people unite with Christ! How they want to make their own sheep, which they did not buy with their own blood, and thus they hold them as worthless, because they did not buy them! What need is there to argue about this further? Look at them throughout the entire Church, see such men, both those who are within, and those who, finding an occasion, have flown from the threshing floor and want to draw the grains with them. But the true and full grains tolerate the chaff and remain on the threshing floor until the end, until the final winnower comes: just as he tolerated the sins of others with the skins of goats, and deserved to receive the paternal blessing. The wicked should be tolerated out of necessity for the peace of the Church.

Why then did Isaac bless him who was despised? For already in necessity, already compelled, his father said to him: Behold, your dwelling shall be of the fatness of the earth and of the dew of heaven. And do not therefore think yourself good: By your sword you shall live, and you shall serve your brother. But do not despair for yourself, because you can correct yourself: But it shall be when you release and break the yoke from your neck. Behold, he shall receive of the fatness of the earth and of the dew of heaven. But Isaac, being despised, throws him the blessing, does not give it. Is it not now in the Church for wicked men who want to disturb the Church to be tolerated for the necessity of its peace, to be admitted, to have the common sacraments? And sometimes it is known that they are wicked, and perhaps they cannot be convicted. So that they may be corrected and degraded, so that they may be excluded, so that they may be excommunicated, they cannot be convicted. If someone insists, sometimes it leads to the disruptions of the Church. The governor of the Church is compelled to say, as it were: "Behold, your dwelling shall be of the fatness of the earth and of the dew of heaven; use the sacraments; you eat judgment for yourself, you drink judgment for yourself: For he who eats and drinks unworthily eats and drinks judgment to himself. You know that you are admitted out of the necessity of the Church's peace, you have nothing in your heart but disturbances and divisions. Therefore by your sword you shall live. For in that which you receive of the dew of heaven and the fatness of the earth, you shall not live there. For this does not please you, nor is the Lord sweet to you." For if this pleased you, and the Lord were sweet to you, you would imitate the humility of the Lord, not the pride of the devil. Therefore, though he receives the mystery of the Lord's humility from the dew of heaven and the fatness of the earth, yet he does not renounce the pride of the devil, who does nothing for him who always delights in seditions and dissensions. Although you have this communion from the dew of heaven and the fatness of the earth, yet by your sword you live, and you either delight in or are terrified by seditions and dissensions. Therefore change yourself, and remove the yoke from your neck. The hidden persecutor urges the soldier of Christ with the allurements of the flesh.

These things, brothers, have been said to you, few perhaps due to the magnitude of the mysteries, but many considering the time, our strength, and yours. And if by chance this question has not been discussed in detail, nonetheless some great mysteries, which if later examined, will be found. Pardon the constraints of time, our strength, and your capacity. If you wish to grasp more, grow; if you wish to grow, live well. For he who does not wish to live well does not wish to grow. The holy Lord our God has provided these feasts for you through the natal celebrations of His martyr Vincent. The name signifies victory. Love, however, in order to conquer. For persecution does not lack. The devil is the persecutor, the occasion for the crown never ceases. Only let the soldier of Christ understand the fight and know whom to conquer. Is it because a manifest enemy of the body does not press upon you, that a hidden persecutor does not press upon you with the allurements of the flesh? How many evils he suggests, how many through desire, how many through fear! By such allurements he persuades to go to sorcerers, to astrologers, when one has a headache. Those who forsake God and go to the devil's bindings are conquered by the devil. On the other hand, if someone has been suggested, perhaps in terms of the body to procure remedies from the devil through which another is said to have been healed, because having received that from him, he then ceases to pursue the body since he has won the heart; therefore to anyone for whom these wicked remedies have been suggested and who said, "I would rather die than use such remedies; if God wills, He chastises and liberates me; if He knows it is necessary, let Him free me; but if He knows I should depart from this life, whether I am sad or rejoice, I follow the will of the Lord; behold, for in a little while with what face shall I go out to the Lord; for these remedies of the devil do not provide me with what God provides, eternal life, thus why should I lose my soul, to purchase a few days for my body?" Whoever says this and does not go nor sets his heart to employ evil remedies, surely conquers. One thing I have mentioned as a sample. Certainly, you see already how many things the devil suggests. But where is he? You see him certainly languishing, you see him panting on the bed, you see him scarcely moving his limbs, scarcely moving his tongue: this tired one conquers the devil. Many have been crowned in the amphitheater fighting beasts. Many on their beds conquering the devil are crowned. They seem unable to move, yet within their hearts they have such strength, they engage in such a fight! But where there is a hidden fight, there is a hidden victory.

Know that you have an emperor who has already gone ahead into heaven.

Why have we said these things, brothers? So that when you celebrate the birthdays of the martyrs, you may imitate the martyrs, and not think that opportunities for a crown can be lacking to you, because such persecutions are now lacking. For neither are there daily persecutions lacking now from the devil, whether through suggestion, or through some bodily annoyances. You only need to know that you have an emperor, who has already preceded you into heaven. He has given you the way to follow, hold onto him. Do not, when you have conquered, attribute it to yourself out of pride, as if you had wrestled with your own strength. But presume upon him who gave you the strength to conquer, because he conquered the world. And you will always be crowned and go out from here a martyr, if you overcome all the temptations of the devil.

Sermons - Sermon 40

SERMO 40 From the same place of Ecclesiasticus:

"Do not delay to turn to God."

"Do not put off from day to day."

Endure the Lord because you are sustained by Him.

Frequently, Brothers, we have sung with the Psalmist, Wait for the Lord, act manfully; and let thy heart take courage, and wait for the Lord. What does it mean: Wait for the Lord? So that you receive when He gives; do not demand then, when you want. The time of giving is not yet: He waited for you, wait for Him. What does it mean that I said: He waited for you, wait for Him? If you are already living righteously, if you have already turned to Him, if you are displeased with your past deeds, if you have now decided to choose a new good life; do not hasten to demand. He waited for you, so that you would change your bad life: wait for Him, so that He may crown your good life. For if He had not waited, there would be no one to whom He could give. Wait therefore, because you have been waited for. But you, who do not wish to be corrected, o whosoever you are who still do not wish to be corrected; as if there were only one: rather I should say: Whoever you are here. You, however, who are here, who have not decided to be corrected: I will speak as if to one: Whoever does not wish to be corrected, what promise do you make to yourself? Do you perish by despairing, or by hoping? Whoever perishes by despairing, this you say in your mind: My iniquity is upon me, I am wasting away in my sins; what hope is there for my living? Hear the Prophet saying: I do not desire the death of the wicked; only let the wicked turn from his evil way and live. Whoever perishes by hoping, this you say in your mind: God is good, God is merciful, He forgives all, He does not repay evil for evil. Hear the Apostle saying: Do you not know that the patience of God leads you to repentance?

Most people perish by hoping badly.

What then remains? Since if we have achieved anything with you, if what I said has entered your heart, I see what you will answer me: It is true, nor do I despair, that by despairing I should perish; nor do I hope wrongly, that by hoping I should perish. I do not say to myself: "My iniquity is upon me, now I have no hope." Nor do I say to myself: "God is good, He recompenses evil to no one." Nor do I say this, nor do I say that: "The Prophet oppresses me, the Apostle oppresses me." And what do you say? Still, for a little while, I will live as I want. These are those who tire us: they are many, they are troublesome. Still, for a little while, I will live as I want, afterwards, when I correct myself, it is certainly true what the Prophet said: I do not want the death of the wicked; but let the wicked turn from his evil way, and live. When I have turned, He will blot out all my evils; why should I not add something to my pleasures, and live as much as I want, how I want, afterwards turning myself to God?

Why do you say this, brother? Why? Because God has promised forgiveness if I change myself. I see, I know, God has promised forgiveness; He promises this through the holy Prophet, and through me, His least servant, He promises it. It is true that He promises this, He promised this through His only Son. But why do you wish to add evil days to evil days? Sufficient for the day is its own evil. Yesterday was an evil day, today is evil too, and tomorrow will be evil. Do you think there are good days when you are indulging your desires, when you nourish your heart in luxuries, when you lie in wait for another's chastity, when you distress your neighbor with deceit, when you deny what was entrusted to you, when you swear falsely for money? When you lay out a good meal for yourself, do you think you are having a good day because of it? How can it be possible for the day to be good, when man is evil? Do you wish to add evil days to evil days? No one promised you would be alive tomorrow.

I ask, somewhat, he said, that it be granted to me. Why? Because God promised me pardon. But no one promised you that you will live tomorrow. Or read to me, how you read the Prophet, the Gospel, the Apostle, that when you are converted, God deletes all your iniquities: read to me where tomorrow is promised to you, and live wickedly tomorrow. However, my brother, I ought not to have said this to you. Perhaps your life will be long: if it will be long, let it be good. Why do you want to have a long and wicked life? Or if it will not be long; and that long life ought to delight you, one which has no end: or if it will be long; and what evil will there be, because you lived well for a long time? You want to live wickedly for a long time, not well? And yet no one promised you tomorrow. Correct yourself, listen to Scripture: Do not delay converting to God. These words are not mine: but they are mine. If I love, they are mine: love, and they are yours. The sermon I am now speaking is of Holy Scripture: if you despise it, it is your adversary. But hear the Lord saying: Be reconciled quickly with your adversary. Let all hear, I recite the words of divine Scripture. O wicked delayer, o wicked desirer of tomorrow, hear the Lord speaking, hear the Holy Scripture proclaiming. From this place I am a watchman. Do not delay converting to God, nor defer from day to day. See if He did not see them, see if He did not inspect them who say: Tomorrow I will live well, today I will live wickedly. And when tomorrow comes, you will say this. Do not delay converting to God, nor defer from day to day. For suddenly His wrath will come, and in the time of vengeance He will destroy you. Did I write this? Can I erase it? If I were to erase, I fear being erased. I can remain silent: I fear being silent. I am compelled to preach: afraid, I make afraid. Fear with me, so that you may rejoice with me. Do not delay converting to God. Lord, see that I speak: Lord, You know that You have terrified me, when Your Prophet was being read. Lord, You know my fear on that chair, when Your Prophet was being read. Behold, I say, Do not delay converting to God, nor defer from day to day. For suddenly His wrath will come, and in the time of vengeance He will destroy you. But I do not want you to be destroyed. The Lord commands us to be watchful.

I do not want you to tell me: "I want to perish," because I do not want that. Therefore, my "I do not want" is better than your "I want." If your father were lethargic and sick in your hands, and you, a young man, were present with the sick old man, and the doctor said: "Your father is in danger; this sleep is a certain lethal sluggishness; watch him, do not allow him to sleep; if you see him sleeping, wake him; if waking is not enough, pinch him; if this is still not enough, prick him, so that your father does not die," you would be a young man burdensome to the old man. He, having relaxed into a sweet illness, would close his eyes pressed by that heaviness, and you would cry out against him to your father: "Do not sleep." But he would say: "Let me be, I want to sleep." And you would say: "But the doctor said: if he wants to sleep, do not let him." And he would say: "Please, let me be, I want to die." But I do not want that, says the son to the father. To whom? Certainly to the one wishing to die. And yet you intend to delay the death of your father and to live somewhat longer with your dying old father. The Lord calls to you: "Do not sleep, lest you sleep forever; wake up, so that you may live with me and have a father whom you will not bear out." You hear, and you are deaf.

Security granted by a steward is worth nothing.

What have I done as a watchman? I am free, I do not burden you. I know some will say: What did he want to tell us? He terrified us, he burdened us, he made us guilty. Indeed, I wanted to free you from guilt. It is vile, it is shameful: I do not want to say evil, I do not want to say dangerous, I do not want to say ruinous; it is shameful that I should deceive you if God does not deceive me. The Lord threatens death to the impious, the most wicked, the fraudsters, the criminals, the adulterers, the seekers of pleasures, the despisers of Him, the murmurers about the times and those not changing their ways: the Lord threatens them with death, with hells, with eternal destruction. What do they want, that I should promise what He does not promise? Behold, the steward offers you security: what good is it to you, if the master of the house does not accept it? I am a steward, I am a servant: do you want me to say to you: Live as you wish, the Lord will not destroy you? The steward gave you security: the security of the steward is worth nothing. Would that the Lord gave it to you, and I would make you concerned! For the Lord's security is valid, even if I am unwilling; indeed, mine is worth nothing, if He is unwilling. But what is security, Brothers, either mine or yours, except that we attentively and diligently listen to the Lord's commands, and faithfully await the promises? In these, we weary ourselves, for we are humans: let us implore His help, let us groan to Him. Let our prayers not be for passing, transient, and vanishing worldly matters: but let our prayers be for fulfilling righteousness itself, and sanctification for God's name: not for defeating a neighbor, but for conquering lust: not for healing the flesh, but for restraining greed. Let our prayers be for this: let them aid us in struggling within, so that they may crown us as victors.

Sermons - Sermon 41

SERMO 41

To God, which is written in Ecclesiasticus:

"Hold faith with your neighbor in his poverty."

"That you may also enjoy His blessings"

Faith to a poor friend must not be broken. When the divine Scriptures were read, from whose meanings we cannot now speak of all, I noticed one little sentence, very short in the number of words but very ample in the weight of its sense. I chose from there, with the Lord's help, to serve this great expectation of your Love, as much as our strength can, and to minister to you from the Lord’s cellar from which I also live with you. This is the sentence about which I speak: Keep faith with your neighbor in his poverty, so that you may also enjoy his goods. Let us take this first as it simply sounds, so that all may understand it, even those who do not delve into the more secret things of the divine Scriptures. Keep faith, he says, with your neighbor in his poverty, so that you may also enjoy his goods. "It is true," says he who has simply heard it, "that when a friend is poor, faith should not be broken with him; one should remain with him, and the friendship should not be changed by the change of his wealth, but faith should be kept, strengthened by will. For my friend, if he was a friend when he was wealthy, is he not a friend when he is poor? He was not a friend to me, but his gold was. But if my friend was the man himself, he remains the same whether the gold remains or is lost. Why then should he now not be a friend, who, even if he lost his treasure, did not lose his spirit? If I were to buy a horse, after stripping it of ornaments and saddle, I would perhaps not despise it when naked. And my friend pleased me when clothed, does he displease when stripped? Well then does the divine Scripture instruct, healthily and very suitably to human morals: Keep faith with your neighbor in his poverty. That you may also enjoy his goods. What then? Shall we proceed to the second part of this sentence and have such a thought about a friend that we say: "We must stay with him and keep faith with him in his poverty, so that we may also enjoy his goods"? For he who is now poor will become rich, and he will not admit you to his riches, whose poverty you previously scorned out of pride. Therefore, keep faith with him even when he is poor, so that you may also enjoy his goods when wealth comes to him, and rejoice with him in them. Keep faith with him. He is poor, but he has a great possession: faith. If you were preparing to possess land with him and wished to own land if he had land for you both to possess together, how much more firmly will you possess faith with him? For such, indeed, is your friend, that an unscrupulous person might take away his possessions. But can they take away his faith? What then does it mean: that you may also enjoy his goods? Certainly because from poverty he might become rich, and you will enjoy his riches who did not scorn his poverty. The interpretation of the text of Sirach 22:28 rejected by Augustine. The former part of this sentence, according to that popular understanding, pleases me. But the latter part, I confess to you, offends me. For if you stay with a friend in his poverty so that when he becomes rich you might enjoy his riches, you still do not love the friend, but something else in the friend. Faith and hope are two good friends, and greater than these is charity. In divine matters, the Apostle says, three remain: faith, hope, charity. But the greatest of these is charity. Pursue charity. Therefore, I ask a friend about a friend: “Tell me, please, do you have faith with this one in his poverty?” Clearly, he says, for I have heard this in the holy Scripture, and I commended it to my heart and stored it in my memory. I gladly recall it, and more gladly do it. For I have heard the sacred word: Keep faith with your neighbor in his poverty. And I: “Why do you do this? Is it for the reason that follows: so that you may enjoy his goods as well? What then do you expect?” “So that when,” he says, “he becomes rich and goods come, he may admit me to his goods, because I did not despise his evils.” “Therefore, allow me to ask a little more. What if this man, with whom you hold faith in poverty, never becomes rich? What if he remains poor until death? Does faith perish because hope is deceived? Because you do not endure possessing gold with a rich man, will you regret having held faith in poverty?” If he is wise humanly, or rather if he is truly wise, he will be disturbed by this question and say to me: “You speak truth. It is good to keep faith with a neighbor. But if faith is kept with a poor neighbor with the hope of reaching his riches, to have communion in them with him, without a doubt when this poor man dies, not having received the riches that were hoped for, we will regret all that good, and what we have mixed well, we will pour badly.” You see, therefore, that this sentence is to be scrutinized more deeply, not as it can be commonly understood, but as it is established by divine authority, to suggest something great, to instruct, to command us, where our hope is not deceived so that we do not regret having held faith. For you cannot thus arrive at the sentence. On the Poor Man and the Rich Man in Luke 16.

Therefore, observe that poor Lazarus lying before the rich man's door. This poor man was wretchedly infirm, nor did he even hold the health of his body, which is the patrimony of the poor. He was also ulcerous, and the dogs licked his sores. Now there was a rich man in that house. He was clothed in purple and fine linen, and feasted sumptuously every day, and he did not wish to have faith together with the poor man. Deservedly, the Lord Jesus, lover and giver of faith, paid more attention to the faith itself in the poor man than to the gold and luxuries in the rich man. He paid more attention to the possession of the poor man than to the arrogance of the rich man. For this reason, He named the poor man; however, He judged that the name of the rich man should be silent. There was, He said, a certain rich man who was clothed in purple and fine linen, and feasted sumptuously every day. And there was a certain poor man named Lazarus. Does it not seem to you as if He recited from a book, where He found the name of the poor man written, but did not find the name of the rich man? For indeed that book was of the living and the just, not of the proud and the unrighteous. That rich man was named by men, but the poor man remained unspoken. Conversely, the Lord named the poor man and was silent regarding the rich man. Therefore, the rich man did not want to have faith together with the poor man. Both died. It happened that the poor man died and was carried away by angels to the bosom of Abraham. The rich man also died and was buried - for perhaps he was not even buried - and when he was in torment in Hades, as we read, he lifted up his eyes from afar and saw the poor man in the bosom of Abraham, whom he had despised at his door. He could not have a common rest with the one with whom he did not wish to have common faith. Father Abraham, he said, send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water and cool my tongue because I am in anguish in this flame. The response was: Remember, son, that you received your good things in your lifetime, and Lazarus in like manner bad things. Now, therefore, he is comforted here, and you are in anguish. And besides all this, a great chasm has been fixed between us and you, so that no one can cross over from here to you, nor can anyone cross over from there to us. He saw mercy denied to himself because he had denied it. He saw how true it was: Judgment without mercy to him who has shown no mercy. And he who did not wish to pity the poor man during his time, belatedly pitied his brothers. Therefore, he said, send Lazarus. I have five brothers there. Let him warn them, lest they also come into this place of torment. And to this, the response was: If they do not want to come to this place of torment, they have Moses and the Prophets, let them listen to them. He who used to mock the Prophets, surely together with his brothers - for I believe, indeed I do not doubt, that talking with his brothers about the Prophets warning about good things, forbidding bad things, frightening about future torments, and promising future rewards, he mocked all these things, saying with his brothers: "What life after death? What memory of decay? What sense does the ash have? All are brought there, and buried. Who has been heard to return from there?" - recalling these words of his, therefore he wished Lazarus to return to his brothers so that they would not say: "Who has returned from there?" And to this, there was a very fitting and appropriate response. For he seemed to be a Jew, and therefore he said: Father Abraham. Therefore, very excellently and appropriately, it was said: If they do not listen to Moses and the Prophets, neither will they be convinced if someone rises from the dead. It was fulfilled among the Jews, for they did not listen to Moses and the Prophets, nor did they believe in Christ risen. Did He not predict this to them beforehand: If you believed Moses, you would believe Me? That rich man deserved damnation. So the rich man remained without help, his temporal delights having ended, in eternal punishments. He did not do what was right, he heard what was deserving: "Remember, son, that you received your good things in your life." Therefore, this life, which you see, is not yours. You received your good things. Therefore, those things which you desire from afar, sighing, are not yours. Where are the words of the rich and those flattering the rich when they see someone flourishing with temporal delights, abundant on earth, seizing the earth to possess and expanding, drawing to himself the lead with which he is submerged? For indeed, a great weight led that rich man to hell, and a heavy burden pressed him down to the depths. For he had not heard: "Come to me, all you who labor." My yoke is easy, my burden is light. The burden of Christ is feathers. With these feathers, that poor man flew into the bosom of Abraham. Therefore, the rich man did not want to hear these things. For he listened to the tongues of flatterers. With these tongues, he became deaf to the Prophets, tongues of those giving false praise and saying: "You are the only ones; you live alone." Hence, "You received your good things in your life." For you considered these to be your good things. You did not believe in others, you did not hope for others. You received those in your life. For you thought only that was your life. When you hoped for nothing after death, you feared no sorrow. Therefore, you received your good things in your life, but Lazarus evil things. He did not say: his, but evils, which men think, which men fear, which men avoid as great things. Lazarus received these evils. He did not then receive his good things. Yet he did not lose them. But just as it is not said: his, so it is not said: in his life. For the other life was that of his, which he hoped for in the bosom of Abraham. For here he was dead, here he did not live. He was dead with that death mentioned by the Apostle: For you have died, and your life is hidden with Christ in God. The poor man bore temporal evils. But God deferred his good things, not took them away. Therefore, why do you, rich man in hell, desire late what you did not hope for to enjoy with delights? Aren't you the one who despised the one lying at your gate? Aren't you the one who ridiculed Moses and the Prophets in the contempt of the poor man? Therefore, you did not wish to possess faith with your neighbor in his poverty, now you do not enjoy his good things.

For you mocked when you heard: "Possess faith with your neighbor in his poverty, so that you may also enjoy his good things." Now you see his good things from afar, and do not possess them with him. For those good things were coming, coming invisibly. When they were not seen, they had to be believed, lest when they are seen, it should remain for you to mourn and not to be able to hold them. Do not despise the poor.

Therefore, Brothers, as it seems to me, this sentiment is clear. For it must be understood in a Christian manner by Christians. We should not possess faith with our poor neighbor in such a way that we hope for temporal riches to come to him and preserve our faith so we may possess these with him. Not so at all, not so. But how, unless according to the command of our Lord: Make friends for yourselves by means of unrighteous wealth, so that they may receive you into the eternal dwellings? For here there are poor who do not have dwellings where they might receive you themselves. Make them friends by means of unrighteous wealth, that is, from gains that iniquity calls gains. For there are gains that justice calls gains: these are in the treasures of God. Do not despise the poor, who have nowhere to return, who have nowhere to enter. They have dwellings, and they have eternal ones. They have places where you will vainly wish to be received, as that rich man did, if you do not now receive them into yours, because he who receives a righteous man in the name of a righteous man will receive a righteous man's reward; he who receives a prophet in the name of a prophet will receive a prophet's reward; and whoever gives one of these little ones even a cup of cold water in the name of a disciple, truly I say to you, he will by no means lose his reward. For he possesses faith with his neighbor in his poverty, therefore he will enjoy his goods. For the name of your neighbor, accept the name of Christ. Your Lord also speaks to you, the very Lord who, though He was rich, became poor. He will explain this truth to you better and more solidly. For perhaps sometimes your mind hesitates and doubts whether that poor man whom you received into your home is truthful, or rather a deceitful pretender, a hypocrite. The mind wavers in showing mercy because you cannot see the heart. Therefore, if you cannot see it, act with both the good and the bad, so that you may reach the good. The one who feared that his seeds might fall on the path, among thorns, or upon stones, and was lazy in sowing in winter, went hungry in summer. Nevertheless, your Lord, whom you certainly do not doubt if you are a Christian, says to you: “I became poor for your sake when I was rich.” For when He was in the form of God – what is richer than that form? – He did not consider being equal to God something to be grasped, but emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant – what is richer than the form of God? What is poorer than the form of a servant? – made in the likeness of men, found in human form, He humbled Himself, becoming obedient to the point of death, even death on a cross. Add this too. He thirsted on the cross, received drink not from one who felt pity but from one who mocked Him, and drank vinegar at His death, the fountain of life. Do not spurn this, do not despise it, do not say: “So my God was made man? So my God was killed, crucified?” Yes, certainly, indeed, He was crucified. His poverty is commended to you. It was far from you. He approached you in poverty. Hold faith with the neighbor in His poverty. Certainly, here this truth never wavers, never clouds. For the name of the neighbor, take the name of Christ and humbly receive it. The humble indeed fits the humble; the humble takes on greatness. Humbly accept and understand the neighbor – For the Lord is near to the brokenhearted – so that you may say in your prayer: As our neighbor, as our brother, so we were pleased. Therefore, when the Prophet added one word, naming the neighbor – for prophetic speech had to be somewhat clothed with the veil of mystery, so that it might be sought more desirably, found more sweetly – where he named the neighbor, you name Christ, because he too prophetically named Christ, and see that clear truth running like a stream from the fountain of truth quenching your thirst. Hold faith with Christ in His poverty, so that you may also enjoy His goods. What does it mean to hold faith with Christ? In that He was made man for your sake, in that He was born of a Virgin, in that He endured insults, was scourged, was hung on a tree, was wounded by a spear, was buried, do not spurn these things, do not let them seem unbelievable to you, and thus you hold faith with your neighbor. For this is indeed His poverty. But what does it mean: That you may also enjoy His goods? Hear why He willed this, hear why He came to you in poverty, hear the voice of the poor Lord your God for your sake enriching you, see how you may enjoy His goods if you keep faith with Him in His poverty: Father, He said, I want that where I am, they also may be with me.

Sermons - Sermon 42

SERMO 42 ON WHAT IS WRITTEN IN ISAIAH:

"Why do I need the multitude of your sacrifices?" AND FROM THE CHAPTER OF THE GOSPEL WHERE IT SAYS:

"FORGIVE AND YOU WILL BE FORGIVEN, GIVE AND IT WILL BE GIVEN TO YOU"

What good we have, let us distribute; what evil, let us remit.

I, Brothers, have little strength, but the word of God has great strength. May it prevail in your hearts. Therefore, what I say slowly, you greatly hear if you obey. The Lord thundered through his prophet Isaiah as through a cloud. If you have understanding, you have shuddered. For he spoke clearly, nor do these things need an expositor but a doer. "To what purpose is the multitude of your sacrifices to me?" he says. "Who has required this from your hands?" God seeks us, not ours. But the sacrifice of a Christian is almsgiving to the poor. From this, God is made propitious to sins. Unless God becomes propitious to sins, who remains except guilty? From those offenses and sins, without which this life is not led, people are purified through alms. These are of two kinds: giving and forgiving; giving what good you have, forgiving the harm you suffer. These two kinds of alms the Lord, the good master, who shortened the word on earth so that it would be fruitful and not burdensome, briefly encompassed as follows: "Forgive, and you will be forgiven; give, and it will be given to you." "Forgive, and you will be forgiven" pertains to forgiving; "Give, and it will be given to you" pertains to giving. From that alms whereby you forgive a person, you lose nothing. Behold, he immediately asks for forgiveness, you forgave, and you lost nothing. You returned home more loving. The other kind of alms, where we are commanded to give to the needy, seems heavy because what one gives, he will no longer have.

God gives in heaven, on earth He receives.

Indeed, the Apostle reassures us here as well, who said: "As each one has, not that others may have relief and you distress." Therefore, let each one measure their strength, not aim to store up riches on earth. Give, what you give does not perish. I do not say: This does not perish, but I say: This alone does not perish. But the other things which you do not give and which abound to you, either you lose them while living or you leave them when you die. Then, my brothers, who would this great promise not encourage? "Forgive," he says, "and it will be forgiven you; give, and it will be given to you." When he says, "Give and it will be given to you," consider to whom he speaks, who speaks. God says to man, the immortal says to the mortal, such a great father of the family says to the beggar. For he will not take back what we have given. We have found one to whom we may lend. Let us give to God, not to man. We give to him who abounds, we give to him who gives us what to give. And in place of small things, for trifles, for mortal things, for perishable things, for earthly things, he returns eternal, incorruptible, everlasting things. What more can I say? He promises himself, who promises. If you love him, buy him from him. And to know that you give to him, hear him saying: "I was hungry, and you gave me food; I was thirsty, and you gave me drink; I was a stranger, and you took me in; naked, and you clothed me; sick, and you visited me; in prison, and you came to me." And they will say to him: "When did we see you in these needs and minister to you?" And he: "When you did to one of the least of my brothers, you did it to me." He gives from heaven, he receives on earth. He himself gives, he himself receives. It is as though you make a remittance across. Here you give, there you receive; here you give perishable things, there you receive things that last forever. And whenever you say to God: Deliver me, Lord, from the evil man - for this is how we sang - I know indeed with what groan you say: Deliver me, Lord, from the evil man. For who in this age does not suffer some evil man? When, therefore, you say this to God: Deliver me, Lord, from the evil man, just as you say it with all your heart, so also look attentively at yourself first. Deliver me, Lord, from the evil man. Suppose God answered you: "From whom?" You will say from Gaius, from Lucius, from some unknown person whom you suffer. And He responds to you: "You say nothing about yourself to me? If I deliver you from the evil man, you must first be delivered from yourself. You yourself suffer as an evil, do not suffer yourself as evil." Let us see if another evil finds something to do to you. What can an evil person do to you? You do not be evil. Let not your greed rule over you, let not your lust trample you, let not your wrath break you. Who are these inner enemies of yours? You yourself. They can do nothing to you. Let us see what your evil neighbor, evil patron, or evil powerful person does to you. Let us see what he does to you. Let him find you just, let him find you faithful, let him find you Christian: what will he do to you? What did the Jews do to Stephen? By doing evil they sent him to good. Therefore, when you pray that God may deliver you from the evil man, pay attention to yourself. Do not spare yourself. Let Him deliver you from yourself. How does He deliver you from yourself? By forgiving sins, granting merits, giving you the strength to fight against your desires, inspiring virtue, granting your mind heavenly delight by which all earthly delight is surpassed. When God grants these to you, He delivers you from yourself, and you await securely in the evils of this world which will eventually pass, as you anticipate the coming of your Lord with the good things that cannot pass. This should suffice for you all. You certainly see, because somehow I approach weak, and by speaking I become strong. So great is my spirit, so great is my zeal for your progress. For the worker in the field hoping for fruits feels less labor. You know what my fruits are, that I may be with you, and we all may be fruits of God. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 43

SERMO 43 ABOUT WHAT IS WRITTEN IN ISAIAH:

"UNLESS YOU BELIEVE, YOU WILL NOT UNDERSTAND" AND CONCERNING THE WORDS OF THE BLESSED APOSTLE PETER:

"We have heard the voice brought from heaven" etc.

We have the more certain prophetic word. The beginning of a good life is correct faith. The beginning of a good life, which also has eternal life owed to it, is right faith. Now faith is to believe what you do not yet see, the reward of which faith is to see what you believe. Therefore, in the time of faith, as in the time of sowing, let us not fail, and let us not fail until the end, but let us persevere, until we reap what we have sown. For when humankind had turned away from God and lay in its sins, just as we needed the Creator to exist, so we needed the Savior to come back to life. A just God condemned man, a merciful God frees man. The God of Israel himself will give strength and power to his people. Blessed be God. But believers receive, the scornful do not receive. Nor should we glory in that faith itself, as if we could do anything on our own. For faith is not nothing, but something great; if you have it, you have surely received it. For what do you have that you did not receive? See, beloved, from what source you should give thanks to the Lord God, lest you remain ungrateful for any of his gifts, and on account of this ingratitude, lose what you have received. The praise of faith can in no way be explained by me, but can be conceived by the faithful. Furthermore, if it is rightly considered in any part as it deserves, who can worthily think how many of God's gifts it surpasses? And if we ought to recognize the lesser gifts of God in us, how much more ought we to recognize that which surpasses them?

Man was created in the image of God. From God we must be what we are. Since we are not nothing, from whom do we have this if not from God? But there are also trees and stones; from whom, if not from God? So what more do we have? Trees and stones do not live; but we live. Yet that life itself is common to us with trees and shrubs. For vines are also said to live. For if they did not live, it would not have been written, "He slew their vines with hail." It lives when it is green; it withers when it dies. But this life does not have perception. What do we have more? We perceive. A fivefold sense of the body is known. We see, we hear, we smell, we taste, by touch we even discern through our entire body soft and hard, rough and smooth, hot and cold. So there is a fivefold sense in us. But animals also have this. So we have something more. And yet, brothers, when we consider those things we have enumerated in us, how great a thanksgiving, how great a praise do we owe to the Creator? But what more do we have? Mind, reason, counsel, which animals do not have, birds do not have, fishes do not have. In this, we are made in the image of God. Finally, where Scripture narrates that we were made, it adds that we might not only be put before animals but also be set over them, that is, that they may be subject to us: "Let us make man in our image and likeness, and let him have dominion over the fish of the sea and the birds of the sky and all cattle and the reptiles that creep on the earth." From where does he have dominion? Because of the image of God. Hence it is said to some by way of rebuke, "Do not be like the horse and mule, who do not have understanding." But understanding is one thing, reason is another. For we have reason even before we understand, but we cannot understand unless we have reason. Therefore, a rational animal is capable, indeed to better and more quickly say, a rational animal, to whom reason is intrinsically given, has reason even before it understands. For it wants to understand because reason precedes.

Faith seeking understanding.

Therefore, we ought to cultivate and, in a certain way, reshape and reform above all in ourselves that by which we surpass the beasts. But who can do this unless it is the artist who formed us? We could deform the image of God in us, but we cannot reform it. Therefore, to briefly recount everything, we have existence with woods and stones, life with trees, sensation with animals, and understanding with angels. We discern colors with our eyes, sounds with our ears, odors with our noses, tastes with our palate, heat with our touch, and morals with our intellect. Every person wants to be understood; there is no one who does not want to understand; not everyone wants to believe. A man says to me: "I will understand so that I may believe." I reply: "Believe so that you may understand." Therefore, since such a controversy is born between us that he says to me: "I will understand so that I may believe," and I respond: "Rather believe so that you may understand," with this controversy, let us come to a judge, and neither of us should presume to pass judgment on his own behalf. What judge are we to find? After evaluating all men, I do not know whether we could find a better judge than a man through whom God speaks. Therefore, let us not go in this matter and in this controversy to secular writings, let not a poet judge between us, but a Prophet.

We have a more certain prophetic word. The blessed apostle Peter, with two other disciples of Christ the Lord, James and John, being with the Lord Himself on the mount, heard a voice brought from heaven: This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased. Listen to Him. Recalling this, the said Apostle in his epistle wrote: We heard this voice brought from heaven when we were with Him on the holy mountain. And when he had said: We heard this voice brought from heaven, he added and said: And we have the more sure prophetic word. That voice sounded from heaven, and the prophetic word is more certain. Attend, beloved, may the Lord aid both my will and your expectation that I may speak what I desire, as I desire. For who among us would not marvel that the voice brought from heaven is said by the Apostle to be surpassed by the more certain prophetic word? He indeed said more certain, more certain, but not better, not truer. For as true was the voice from heaven as the prophetic word, as good, as useful. What then is more certain, except that in which the hearer is more firmly established? Why is this? Because there are unbelieving people who so disparage Christ as to say He performed what He did by magical arts. They could even thus refer that voice brought from heaven—through human conjectures and illicit curiosities—to magical arts. But the Prophets were beforehand, not before that voice, but before Christ's flesh. Christ was not yet man when He sent the Prophets. Whoever says He was great, if thus He performed wonders to be worshiped even after death by magical arts, was He a magician before He was born? Hence why the apostle Peter said: We have the more certain prophetic word. The voice from heaven, for the faithful to be admonished; the prophetic word, for the unbelievers to be convinced. We understand, as it seems to me, beloved, why the apostle Peter said: We have the more certain prophetic word, after the voice brought from heaven. The fisherman should come before the emperor. And what a remarkable condescension of Christ! This Peter who speaks in such a manner was a fisherman, and nowadays an orator boasts greatly if he is able to be understood by that fisherman. For this reason, the apostle Paul, speaking to the first Christians, says: "Consider your calling, brothers, for not many are wise according to the flesh, not many are powerful, not many are noble. But God chose the weak things of the world to confound the strong, and God chose the foolish things of the world to confound the wise, and God chose the lowly and despised things of the world, and those things that are not, to reduce to nothing those things that are." For if Christ had first chosen an orator, the orator would say, "I was chosen because of the merit of my eloquence." If He had chosen a senator, the senator would say, "I was chosen because of the merit of my dignity." Finally, if He had first chosen an emperor, the emperor would say, "I was chosen because of the merit of my power." Let these rest and be deferred for a little, let them rest, not be omitted, not be despised, but deferred for a short while, where they can glory in themselves. "Give me," He says, "that fisherman, give me the simple, give me the unlearned, the one with whom a senator does not deign to speak, not even when he buys fish. He says, "give him to me. If I fill him, it will be evident that it is I who do it. Even though I will also make a senator, an orator, and an emperor, whenever I make a senator, but I will more surely make a fisherman. A senator can glory in himself, an orator can, an emperor can. Only a fisherman cannot, unless in Christ. Let him come to teach a wholesome humility. Let the fisherman come first. Through him, the emperor is better brought to faith."

Unless you believe, you will not understand.

Remember therefore the holy, just, good fisherman, full of Christ, at whose mass through the world this people, to be caught with others, also belonged. Therefore, remember him having said: We have a more certain prophetic word. Give me therefore a judge Prophet for that controversy. What was being conducted between us? You were saying: "I will understand so that I may believe." I was saying: "Believe so that you may understand." A controversy was born, let us come to the judge, let the Prophet judge, indeed truly let God judge through the Prophet. Let us both be silent. What we both said, has been heard. "You say, I will understand so that I may believe." "I say, believe so that you may understand." The Prophet answers: Unless you have believed, you will not understand. But do you think, beloved, that even he who says, "I will understand so that I may believe" says nothing? For what are we doing now, if not to ensure that they believe, not those who do not believe, but those who still believe too little? For if they had not believed at all, they would not be here. Faith has brought them to listen. Faith has made them present to the word of God, but that very faith which has sprouted needs to be watered, nourished, and strengthened. This is what we are doing. "I," he says, "planted, Apollos watered, but God gave the growth. Therefore, neither he who plants is anything, nor he who waters, but God who gives the growth." By speaking, urging, teaching, persuading, we can plant and water, but not give growth. However, he knew with whom he was speaking, who was praying for a helper for his faith which was sprouting and still tender and still weak and largely faltering, yet not without faith, but with some faith, to whom he said: "I believe, Lord."

I believe, Lord; help my unbelief. When the Gospel was read, you heard: “If you can believe,” said the Lord Jesus to the boy's father, “if you can believe, everything is possible for the one who believes.” And he, looking at himself and placed before himself, not having rash confidence but first examining his conscience, saw in himself some faith, and saw also hesitation. He saw both. He confessed to having one, and asked for help with the other. “I believe,” he said, “Lord.” What followed, if not: “Help my faith”? He did not say, “I believe, Lord.” I see something here where I do not lie. I believe, I speak the truth. But I also see here something I do not know, which displeases me. I want to stand firm, but I still waver. I speak standing, I did not fall, because I believe. But yet I still waver: Help my unbelief. Therefore, beloved, even the one I set against myself, and for whose controversy a prophet judge between us, says something himself when he says, “I understand so that I may believe.” For surely now what I speak, I speak so that those who do not yet believe may believe. And yet, unless they understand what I speak, they cannot believe. Therefore, in some part, it is true what he says: “I understand so that I may believe,” and I who say, as the prophet says: “Rather, believe so that you may understand,” we speak the truth, let us agree. Therefore, understand so that you may believe, believe so that you may understand. Briefly, I say how we can accept both without controversy. Understand, so that you may believe, my word; believe, so that you may understand, God's word.

Sermons - Sermon 44

SERMO 44

OF WHAT IS WRITTEN IN ISAIAH:

"He shall grow up like a tender plant" etc. From this root is the beauty of the Church. Of our Lord and Savior, most beloved brothers, it was prophesied long ago: He shall grow up like a shoot, and like a root in dry ground. Why like a root? Therefore: He has no form or majesty. He suffered, he was humbled, he was spat upon: he had no beauty; he appeared as a man, though he was God. But just as a root is not beautiful, yet inwardly possesses the power of its beauty. Pay attention, my brothers, behold the mercy of God. You look at a beautiful, pleasing tree, green with leaves, abundant with fruits, and you praise it. You delight to pluck something of the fruit, to sit under its shade and rest from the heat: you praise all that beauty. If the root is shown to you, there is no beauty in it. Do not despise what is lowly: from it has come what you wonder at. Like a root in dry ground. Pay attention now to the brightness of the tree. From this root comes the beauty of the Church. The Church has grown, the nations have believed, the princes of the earth have been conquered under the name of Christ, so that they could be victors in the world. Their necks have been placed under the yoke of Christ. They used to persecute Christians because of idols, now they persecute idols because of Christ. Everyone flees to the help of the Church, in every distress, in every tribulation of theirs. That mustard seed has grown, it has become greater than all the vegetables; the birds of the air come, the proud of the world, and rest under its branches. Whence comes this great beauty? It has risen from some unknown root: and this beauty is in great glory. Let us seek the root. He was spat upon, he was humiliated, he was scourged, he was crucified, he was wounded, he was despised. Behold, here there is no appearance: but in the Church, the glory of the root prevails. Therefore it describes the bridegroom himself, that despised, dishonored, rejected one. But now you must see the tree, which has risen from this root, and filled the world. The root is in the thirsty land.

What is the nature within of the Savior?

There is no appearance to him, nor honor: and we saw him, and he had no appearance nor beauty. Is this not the carpenter's son? He did not have beauty, so that it was said, Are we not right in saying that you have a demon? In his name demons were fleeing; and it is alleged against him, that he had a demon. But why this? We saw him, and he had no appearance nor beauty. What is his appearance within, where it was not visible? In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. What is his appearance? Who, being in the form of God, did not consider it robbery to be equal with God. The bridegroom is dearer to the bride the more deformed he is on her account. And where he was seen as having neither form nor beauty? And he had no form: but his face was despised, and his appearance was deformed by all men. A man in a plague. In the plague a man, before the plague God, after the plague a man God. A man in a plague, and he who knows how to bear infirmities. Infirmities of whom? Those by whom he was suffering. The physician bore the infirmities of the mad; and when he himself was being crucified, he prayed and said: Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they do. Pay attention: let us love the bridegroom. The more he is commended to us as deformed, the dearer he is made to the bride, the sweeter he is to her. Therefore he also turned away. He turned away so that those who were crucifying him would not understand him. His face was injured, nor was he highly esteemed. The blindness of the Jews concerning Christ is astonishing.

He carries our infirmities, and is burdened with our sorrows: and we have thought of him as being in pain, and afflicted, and punished. But he was wounded for our sins, and weakened for our iniquities. The chastisement of our peace is upon him, and by his bruises we are healed. We all like sheep have gone astray, and the Lord has laid upon him the iniquity of us all. Is this Gospel, or prophecy? What do the Jews say against this? Is it not amazing to hear them, to see them have these words, to read them, and not find out to whom they could pertain, except to that one who is proclaimed in the Gospel throughout the world, and yet they are not Christians, but are so blind against the most clear words of the Prophets? Do not be amazed at the blindness of the Jews concerning Christ. Behold, what is said about the bridegroom passes, and it begins to be said also about the bride; and just as you were amazed at the blindness of the Jews regarding the bridegroom, so you will be amazed at the blindness of heretics regarding the bride. In Christ, both natures are wondrous.

We now marvel at the blindness of the Jews. The Lord was delivered up for our sins; and he, because he was badly treated, did not open his mouth. He was led as a sheep to the slaughter; and as a lamb before its shearer is silent, so he did not open his mouth. In his humiliation, his judgment was taken away. And do not scorn, who will declare his generation? Which generation? I have begotten you before the morning star. Behold, one generation: Before the morning star, before all that was made, before all the angels, before all creation. Why? Because all things were made through him. But perhaps his second generation is narrated. Who will narrate it? It is conceived by faith, no man approaches, the womb of the Virgin swells: he emerges like a bridegroom from his chamber. This generation is miraculous. The human is miraculous, because it is without a father: that one is miraculous, because it is without a mother. He was led as a sheep to the slaughter, as a lamb before its shearer, so he did not open his mouth. In his humiliation, his judgment was taken away. Who will declare his generation? Because his life will be taken up from the earth. He announces his resurrection. You see truly that the Lord (as if the Truth could say anything but truly) was saying this: What was written in the Law, and the Prophets, and the Psalms concerning me? Because it was necessary for the Christ to suffer and rise again, you heard. And rise again, you heard now: Because his life will be taken up from the earth. And it will be preached in his name repentance and forgiveness of sins to all nations, beginning from Jerusalem: you will hear it also from this Prophet; not because we ought to put the Prophet before the Lord. The herald preceded, the judge followed. The herald spoke not his own words, but the words of the judge, and the judge following affirmed his own words in the herald. Because his life will be taken up from the earth. From the iniquities of my people, he was led to death. You were just hearing him say to them, What did I do to you? If you found sin in me, accuse me. And they, Crucify, crucify: thinking him a man, yet innocent. Therefore: From the iniquities of my people, he was led to death. The rich and evil in the death and burial of Christ.

I will therefore give the wicked for his burial. What does this mean: I will give the wicked for his burial, and the rich for his death? The wicked for burial, the rich for death. That rich man, Joseph of Arimathea, when the Lord was hanging on the cross, went to Pilate and asked for his body: he allowed him to take it for burial. The rich were given for his death: he buried the poor, in whom he sought riches. Therefore, the rich for his death. What was said later happened first: what was said first happened later. The wicked for his burial. How do we show this? The Jews went to Pilate and said to him: Lord, we have heard that that deceiver (■ πλ■νος, that is, that impostor) told his disciples that he would rise after being killed: order that the tomb be guarded, lest his disciples come by night, take him away, and the deception be worse than the first. Pilate said to them, You have soldiers, go, guard it as you wish. They took soldiers and placed them there. These are the wicked: they were given for his burial to guard it. But how do we prove they are wicked? The soldiers were innocently sent: the judge commanded them; they came to the tomb, they guarded it. Hear why they are wicked: read the Gospel. After the Lord resurrected, and they saw the angel, they were terrified and dismayed. While it was said to others, Do not be afraid, these were struck with fear, because they were not lifted by faith. And yet knowing these things, they went to the Jews, told them all these things. The Jews said: We give you money. Thus they were wicked: they hid the truth, sold the lie. And how did they sell the lie? No wonder, they sold the lie, the lie to the blind for the blind. Say (they were told) that while we were sleeping, his disciples came and took him away. O vanity selling vanity to vanity! The vain will hear and believe. Even today this is among the Jews, so the fame goes, so vain, so false, so empty. They do not want to hear the testimony of the martyrs, to live; and they hear the testimony of the sleepers, to perish. If the guards were sleeping, how could they have known who took him from the tomb? Or why were you watching, wicked one? O wicked one, concerning whom the Prophet said not without reason, I will give the wicked for his burial. O wicked ones, O most wicked: either you were watching and should have guarded, or you were sleeping and do not know what happened. It is indeed fulfilled what the Holy Spirit had predicted long before through the Psalmist: They devised a plan which they could not establish.

He will judge you with justice, who redeemed you with mercy.

Therefore, most beloved brothers, for whose salvation all these things have both been foretold and fulfilled, let us give thanks to divine mercy, and as much as we can, let us labor with all our strength so that the blessings of God may not bring us judgment, but improvement: so that when the dreadful day of judgment and the time for rendering account comes, whatever our Lord and Savior has entrusted to us in judgment, He may find intact when He judges. And indeed, when He comes, He will render what He promised, but He will also require what He redeemed: and what He bestowed at His first coming, He will demand at His second. Although we must highly presume upon God's mercy, we must not negligently fear His justice. For He will judge you with justice, who redeemed you with mercy. For the reason that He spares us as we sin for such a long time is not negligence, but patience. He has not lost His power, but has reserved us for repentance. Let us therefore fear the justice whose mercy we desire. For He spares now, but is not silent: and if He is silent, He will not always be silent. Let us then heed Him while He speaks in command, if we wish Him to spare us when He is not silent in judgment. For now mercy is extended to us, then justice will be required from us, and He will render to each one according to his works; and what the Apostle said will be fulfilled: Judgment without mercy to him who has not shown mercy.

Sermons - Sermon 45

SERMO 45

ABOUT WHAT IS WRITTEN IN ISAIAH:

"But those who are devoted to me will inherit the land."

"And they shall inhabit my holy mountain" And from the Apostle:

"Therefore, having these promises, beloved, let us cleanse ourselves"

Perfecting from all defilement of flesh and spirit "Sanctification in the fear of God" The flesh and spirit must be purified. In all the readings we have heard recited, if your Charity noticed the first reading from the prophet Isaiah—because we cannot either remember or mention all that was read—I think the most recent part may have lingered in your hearts, where the reader concluded: But those who are dedicated to me shall possess the land and live on my holy mountain. Then the apostolic reading began and started from there: Therefore, having these promises, beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all defilement of flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God. By the divine mercy, that governs us and that prepares food for us who hunger—not only for the replenishing of our bodies, for which it makes the sun rise over the good and evil and rains upon the just and unjust—but also for the hunger of our hearts that we suffer in this wilderness and we die unless manna rains down, the Lord preparing his table for us, with no human industry providing, what he knows, it happened that the readings followed each other in such a way, that in Isaiah something was promised to us, and in the Apostle it was said: Therefore, having these promises, beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all defilement of flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God, as if it were one reading of the Prophet and the Apostle. For what does the Apostle say? Therefore, having these promises, beloved, and it is not said there what promises, not because they are not there, but because the reader did not start from there, and as the listener's mind was asking about what promises does the Apostle say: Therefore, having these promises, beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all defilement of flesh and spirit. For a great task is laid upon us, and not a small effort, to cleanse ourselves from all defilement of flesh and spirit. And no one undertakes this effort, unless they hear the reward of the promise. Since then, the effort of the cleansing of flesh and spirit no one undertakes, unless invited by the reward, somehow it happened that the reader began with the order of the work and not with the promise of the reward, but God, who did not want to defraud the attentive listener. If perhaps he was hesitating to undertake the effort of the cleansing of flesh and spirit because he had not heard the reward, let him turn to the beginning of the apostolic reading. And if he seeks the promises, let him pay attention to the end of the prophetic reading. For where the prophetic reading ended, there is the promise; from where the reading of the Apostle began, there is the command of the work.

Most people seek their own interests.

Let us therefore rise, and cleanse ourselves from all defilement of flesh and spirit, having these promises. What promises? "Those who are dedicated to me," says the Lord through Isaiah, "will possess the land and inhabit my holy mountain." Therefore, having these promises, let us cleanse ourselves from all defilement of flesh and spirit. Someone might say: "And for this reason I will cleanse myself from defilement of flesh and spirit, that I may possess the land and inhabit the mountain?" Undoubtedly, it must be asked what is meant by the possession of the land and dwelling on the mountain, lest people mistakenly hope to receive vast possessions and not end their desire but postpone it, or even increase it, and despise little things thinking they will receive greater ones of the same kind. For who would not despise a single centuria if he is promised that he will possess a hundred? Or who would not despise the delights of one meal, perhaps poorer and more frugal, if it is said to him: "Unless you restrain yourself, you will not come to that very lavish and sumptuous feast?" Those who thus restrain from certain present things do not end their desires. But because their desires are greater, fearing lest they lose what they desire more, they despise the lesser things. Yet, it is still greed. Is he not avaricious who despises a hundred coins to obtain a thousand? Do not think that he has ended his greed because you find him despising a hundred coins. He is thinking of a thousand, which is why he despised the hundred. There are people who often serve elderly people without children, and they despise many things in them but hope for greater things from them. Do we think these are merciful or greedy? Therefore, the children of the poor are more commendable when they serve their poor parents because piety leads them, not reward. But when the children of the rich serve their parents, their piety is not tested, and if it exists, it is hidden because even if it is seen by God, it cannot be seen by humans. Thus, even these parents often think badly of their children, believing that their children serve them for money, and when it might be convenient for their children to emancipate from their parents, perhaps demanding some benefit before getting married or achieving some honor, they say: "I will not give, for then he will no longer serve me." What kind of judgment has he made of his son, thinking he serves money and not considering fatherly love! If you fear that once the money is received, your son will no longer serve you, piety is not loving but for sale. How much better is the son of the poor, sometimes the son of an ailing and needy old man, who, expecting nothing from his father because he has nothing to bequeath, feeds his father with his labor and sweat! Sometimes even the children of the rich, in fear of God, not because they expect something from their parents, but because they are parents, gave birth to, and raised them, and God commanded, saying: "Honor your father and your mother," therefore, they serve. But their affection is hidden when a reward is proposed. But these are more acceptable to God, because humans cannot see their mind, and God alone sees, and they cannot be praised by humans, just as Job who worshipped God. For the demons thought that he worshipped God for a reward. When was it proven that he worshipped freely? Because having lost everything, he said: "The Lord gave, the Lord took away; as it pleased the Lord, it has been done; blessed be the name of the Lord." The divine page sometimes speaks obscurely.

Why did I say these things, Brothers? Because every day the Scripture does not cease to admonish us to love the eternal by despising the temporal. Every divine page does not cease to speak to us, sometimes openly, sometimes hidden in mystery. But no one should think they are being cheated when the divine page speaks obscurely. Where the will of God emerges to you, that is where it is clear, there love it. There love it, where it openly admonishes. And as it is in the open, so it is in the obscure; as it is in the sun, so it is in the shadow. You will follow it as such, if you read it as such. For it is obscure, as I said: “He will possess the land and inhabit my holy mountain." For if we take it carnally, we will not cleanse ourselves from all defilement of flesh and spirit, and God has procured for us the end of the prophetic reading joined with the beginning of the apostolic reading in vain, if for the sake of possessing a terrestrial mountain we prepare ourselves for greed, not for piety. But what ought we to understand as the mountain? It is obscure what he meant by "the mountain." But if God had abandoned us, He would never say clearly what the mountain is. However, where He says it clearly, there love the mountain. Where He clearly commends the mountain to you, and the Scripture itself reveals what it says about the mountain, there love it. Even where you hear such a mountain promised, follow it. Understand in the obscure what you loved in the open. Where do we consider the mountain to be mentioned, so that we can cleanse ourselves from all defilement of flesh and spirit? Which mountain is promised to us? The land of the living is promised to us.

First, let us understand the nature of the earth that is promised to us, which the prophet David longs for in a certain place and says: "You are my hope, my portion in the land of the living." Without a doubt, therefore, there is a certain land of the living, for this land is the land of the dying. If any person were born on this land except to die, he would not call that land the land of the living, unless by comparing this land and finding that one to be the land of the dying. Therefore, there is a land of the living. For though it is eternal and heavenly, it is called land because it is possessed, not because it is plowed. For it has a possessor without labor, because even this land exercises its possessor with labor and tires him with fear. What is said to you? "Rise, plow the land so that you may have means to live." And whether you like it or not, groaning and sighing, you rise and work, because the sentence of condemned Adam follows you: "In the sweat of your face you shall eat your bread." But when all labor and groaning has passed away, we shall be in the land of the living. Nothing is born or grows there. Whatever exists there, exists in the same manner, always remaining thus. There, winter and summer, night and day do not alternate. Here it is sown so that it may be reaped there, if indeed it is sown. For who is it that sows here so that he may reap there? He who gives to the poor. Giving to the poor is sowing in the land. You sow here, and there you will find the harvest. In summer it is not cut down to pass away, but it is eaten and remains with joy. For there you shall be nourished by righteousness. That land has its bread. Who is this bread? The one who came down to us from there. "I am the living bread that came down from heaven." What kind of bread is that? "Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness, for they shall be satisfied."

Christ, the mountain of God...

We have heard of the bread from that land, let us also hear of the mountain. "They will dwell," he says, "in my holy mountain." For I think we find in another holy Scripture that the mountain itself is also Christ. He who is the bread is also the mountain. But he is the bread because he nourishes the Church, and the mountain because his body is the Church. The Church itself is the mountain. And what is the Church itself? The body of Christ. Attach the head to it, and it becomes one man. The head and the body, one man. Who is the head? He who was born of the Virgin Mary, who took on mortal flesh without sin, who was slain by the Jews, scourged, despised, crucified, who was delivered up for our offenses, and rose again for our justification. He is the head of the Church, he the bread from that land. But what is his body? His spouse, that is, the Church. For the two shall be one flesh. This is a great sacrament; but I speak concerning Christ and the Church.

Thus also the Lord in the Gospel, when speaking of the man and the woman: "Therefore they are no longer two, but one flesh." Therefore he wished Christ and the Church to be one man. There the head, and here the members. He did not wish to rise with the members, but before the members, that the members might have hope. But he wished the head to die, in order to rise first; the head to ascend into heaven first, that the other members might have hope in their head, and expect to be fulfilled in themselves what was promised in the head. For what need was there for Christ to die, the Word of God, through whom all things were made, of whom it is said: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. All things were made through him"? And he is crucified, mocked, pierced with a lance, and buried. And all things were made through him. But because he deigned to be the head of the Church, the Church would despair of itself resurrecting, if it did not see that the head rose. Therefore the head rose, and the head was seen to rise. First it was seen by the women, and announced to the men. The first to see the risen Lord were women, and the Gospel was announced by women to the future Evangelists, the Apostles, and through the women Christ was announced to them. For "Gospel" in Latin means "good news." Those who know Greek understand what Gospel means. Therefore Gospel means "good news." What better news can we say than that our Savior has risen? Or what greater thing were they to preach than what the women announced to them? But why did a woman announce the Gospel? Because death was corrected through a woman. Therefore, the woman announcing life consoled the woman who had announced death, because death was brought by a woman. Adam was seduced by a woman to fall into death; through a woman Christ was announced, now risen, never to die again. So we too will rise, and we will be the holy mountain of God. In this mountain dwells he who is dedicated to God. And those who are dedicated to me will possess the land and dwell on my holy mountain: that is, they will not depart from the Church. Now let us labor in the Church, later we will inherit the Church. For where our eternal joy will be, there we will be only possessors, not laborers.

... and likewise the mountain of God, the Church. But let us clearly find this mountain elsewhere, for it seems rather obscure. Someone may say: "Where is the mountain Church? And when is the mountain Christ? And when is the mountain the body of Christ?" Daniel speaks very clearly; no one doubts this. Daniel saw the vision; does it need an interpreter now? Let your Charity see. Some words there may perhaps need an explanation, which will be opened to you in the name of Christ. See if it can be said to refer to anything other than Christ. Daniel said, "I saw, and behold, a stone cut out of the mountain without hands." He did not say: the stone was without hands, but the stone was cut out of the mountain without human work. Human hands did not approach to cut the stone out of the mountain. Your Charity knows that stones are not cut out of the mountain unless human hands approach. But it was cut out of the mountain without hands, and it came and crushed all the kingdoms of the earth. I do not know if it appears before your eyes anything other than Christ, of whom it is said: "All the kings of the earth will worship him." He crushed all the kingdoms of the earth. A proud king does not want to have any king before him. Now all kings have Christ as their king. Therefore, He crushed all the kingdoms of the earth, so that He may reign. And what does it say? This stone grew and became a great mountain, so that it filled the whole face of the earth. I think you now recognize Christ. You have heard about the earth: "Those who have been handed over to me will possess the earth." And you have heard about the mountain: "And they will inhabit my holy mountain." Therefore, having these promises, beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all defilement of flesh and spirit. But perhaps you wish to know what it means to be cut without hands. For this is placed there somewhat obscurely. Indeed, it occurs to some already, before I say it. But let them endure some delays for the sake of others, who cannot think of it unless they hear something from us. What does "without hands" mean? Without human work. And let your Charity, Brothers, consider the stone cut from the mountain, and that it became a mountain. Cut from the mountain, and it became a mountain by growing. But what kind of mountain did it become? Not like the one from which it was cut. For of that mountain, from which it was cut, it was not said: "It grew and filled the whole earth." Therefore, there are two mountains. The first mountain is the Synagogue; the second is the Church. The first is the Jewish people; the second mountain is the Christian people. But to make the Christian people a great mountain and to fill the whole earth, the stone was cut from that mountain, because Christ came from the Jews. Why, then, without hands? Without human work. For Christ was born of a Virgin, conceived without marital union.

They are not on the mountain who are in the part.

Therefore, it is evident that we have this mountain. Let us not propose for ourselves mountains, whether it is the type of Giddaua, or whatever type is named to us. For sometimes people, taking things carnally, read: "He will hear him from his holy heaven." Sometimes indeed from the mountain, and He speaks of Christ. And people rush to the mountain to pray, as if God hears there. Carnally wise, because they often see clouds clinging to the sides of mountains, climb the mountains to be close to God. Do you want to reach God with your prayer? Humble yourself. Again, because we said: "Do you want to reach God? Humble yourself," do not take it carnally, descending into the hypogeas, to pray to God there. Neither search for hypogeas, nor a mountain. Have humility in your heart, and God will give you height. He will come to you, and be with you in your room. Therefore, what kind of mountain do we have in Christ, we have the Church, let us love the Church. This mountain has grown and filled the entire world. It is evident, for those who are not on this mountain are in part, and do not hold the whole world with us. Remember, Brothers, because every writing arms and fills us against the tongues of men, which we endure daily. If he had said: "That mountain grew, and filled the whole of Africa," would they say anything other than that the part of Donatus is in this? It has silenced their tongues by growing. It has grown so much as to shut the mouths of the verbose. For how has it grown? Throughout the whole earth. For that mountain from which it was cut did not grow to fill the entire earth. For even if the Jews filled the entire earth, because they were conquered and lost their land, they were scattered over the earth as a punishment of their deserts, not by the magnitude of their growth. But the Lord Christ, the cornerstone, subdued the kingdoms of men, broke the kingdoms of demons, and humbled all kings so that He might grow, and He grew and filled the whole face of the earth. I dare to say: He is still growing, there are still places that He fills. From all defilement of flesh and spirit...

Therefore, you should love the mountain itself and prepare yourself to inhabit the mountain forever; and cleanse yourself from all defilement of flesh and spirit, having these promises. What promises? If you wish to possess the land and inhabit the holy mountain, cleanse yourself from all defilement of flesh and spirit. What are the defilements of the flesh? Let your charity attend, and this we must say. What are the defilements of the flesh? It is not when a man passes by chance and touches something with his foot or even with his face, or if it happens that a man slips with his foot and thus falls, so that he comes into mud or dirt, his face is defiled. This defilement is easy, as the saying goes: "He washes and walks away, it's nothing." But the defilement of the flesh that must be avoided does not stem from this, unless it comes from the defilement of the spirit, and so it defiles the flesh. What is the defilement of the spirit? Lust. Defilement of the flesh? Committing adultery. You have two. Lust arises, the spirit is already defiled. Adultery has not yet been committed, the flesh is not yet defiled. But what is the use if the flesh is clean, and the inhabitant of the flesh is unclean? He who perhaps is clean in the flesh, if God sees an adulterer in his heart, is not yet a husband, as the Lord says: Truly I say to you, whoever looks at a woman with lust has already committed adultery with her in his heart. This is the defilement of the spirit. But when does perfect sanctification happen? When both flesh and spirit are sanctified. For there are men who refrain from deeds but do not refrain from evil thoughts. They cleanse the flesh, but they do not cleanse the spirit. Such persons do not do so out of fear of men. Lust burns, fear recalls. What do you fear? Being found out and condemned, being found out and put to shame. Therefore the flesh appears undefiled, but it is not perfect sanctification, because what does the Apostle say? Let us cleanse ourselves from all defilement of flesh and spirit, so that just as you refrain from evil deeds, you may also refrain from evil will and evil thoughts. Refrain from the evil deed, and you cleanse yourself from the defilement of the flesh; abstain from evil will, and you cleanse yourself from the defilement of the spirit. And it follows: Perfecting holiness in the fear of God. He magnificently added: In the fear of God. Behold, a man does not perfect holiness except in the fear of God. What is perfect holiness? Both of body and spirit. If it is of the body and not of the spirit, it is imperfect. For it cannot be the holiness of the spirit without also being of the body. It can be of the body and not of the spirit. It cannot be of the spirit and not of the body. For he who is pure in spirit cannot commit flagrant acts. Where does this come from? For from the heart, says the Lord, proceed adulteries, murders. For a man cannot commit with his members what he has not decided in his heart. The word is conceived in the heart, and is accounted as a deed. Thus, in a certain place the Lord says: Cleanse what is inside, and the outside will be clean. He did not say: Cleanse what is outside. If he were to begin with the body, it would remain necessary to advise us to cleanse also the soul; but if from the soul, there is no need to cleanse the body, because the purity of the soul brings about the purity of the body. Therefore, the apostle Paul, having begun with the flesh, it was necessary for him to also speak of the spirit: Perfecting holiness. Let us cleanse ourselves from every defilement of flesh and spirit, because the flesh can be undefiled, not committing adultery, fornications, and such; but yet there can be lusts, thoughts, and evil desires in the soul. And he added: Perfecting holiness in the fear of God. Who then achieves the sanctification of the body and not of the soul? He who fears men, and not God. For he who is in the fear of God perfects holiness. Certainly, you refused to commit adultery, lest a man should know. Through the fear of men, you kept the flesh from committed evils; therefore you refused to commit where man sees. But if you fear God, do not do so even where God sees, and you have perfected holiness. Consider: "Oh, if I could reach that woman!" says someone. "But I cannot, she is diligently guarded, has a vigilant husband, I have no accomplice. If I dare, I will be caught." He pretends to cleanse the body; but internally, because he wills it, he does not cleanse the spirit. Thus he feared to do it in the body lest man see, and does not fear to do it internally where God sees. He avoids the eyes of man, and does not fear God's eyes. Who then perfects holiness? He who is in the fear of God. Perfecting holiness in the fear of God. The fear of men might possibly temper the body from impurity; but the soul, only the fear of God can. Has he sanctified the soul? He is secure about the body. Let the one who is clothed be pure, and the clothing itself will be clean. Let the inhabitant be good and healthy, and he will not fear the ruin of his house.

God makes an angel out of a man.

What, then, is this flesh? We ought not to despise it. What is it - this? Grass, but it will be gold. Do not despise the grass. And it is changed into gold. For He who was able to change water into wine is able to change grass into gold, and to make an angel out of flesh. If He made man out of filth, will He not make an angel out of man? For let your Love attend to how man was made, and see if we even want to think about it. He made man out of this filth, and set him over the other animals. Will He not make an angel out of man? He absolutely will. He made men His friends, will He not make them angels? I no longer call you servants, but friends. To those still bearing flesh, still dying, still dwelling in this poverty and frailty of life, He said, I no longer call you servants, but friends. And what will He give to His friends? What He showed in Himself when He rose again. They will be crowned and converted into heavenly glory and will be equal to the angels of God. There will be no corruption, no temptation. There we will not be told: Cleanse yourselves from all defilement of flesh and spirit. We will not labor, nor will we be promised a reward, because we will have already received it. Nor will we be told to groan, because we will already be praising. Thus, mortal flesh will be converted into the body of an angel. Thus, will groans be converted into praises. Here, penance, distress, and groans; there, praises, joy, and gladness. Afterward, therefore, now there is no joy. But where? In hope. You do not yet hold it, but you rejoice in hope, because He who promised cannot deceive, because He who promised has and gives.

Sermons - Sermon 46

SERMO 46 OF THE SHEPHERDS In Ezekiel 34, 1-16:

1 The word of the Lord came to me: 2 "Son of man, prophesy against the shepherds of Israel; prophesy and say to them, even to the shepherds: Thus says the Lord God: Ah, shepherds of Israel who have been feeding yourselves! Should not shepherds feed the sheep? 3 You eat the fat, you clothe yourselves with the wool, you slaughter the fat ones, but you do not feed the sheep. 4 The weak you have not strengthened, the sick you have not healed, the injured you have not bound up, the strayed you have not brought back, the lost you have not sought, and with force and harshness you have ruled them. 5 So they were scattered, because there was no shepherd, and they became food for all the wild beasts. 6 My sheep were scattered; they wandered over all the mountains and on every high hill. My sheep were scattered over all the face of the earth, with none to search or seek for them. 7 Therefore, you shepherds, hear the word of the Lord: 8 As I live, declares the Lord God, surely because my sheep have become a prey, and my sheep have become food for all the wild beasts, since there was no shepherd, and because my shepherds have not searched for my sheep, but the shepherds have fed themselves, and have not fed my sheep, 9 therefore, you shepherds, hear the word of the Lord: 10 Thus says the Lord God, Behold, I am against the shepherds, and I will require my sheep at their hand and put a stop to their feeding the sheep. No longer shall the shepherds feed themselves. I will rescue my sheep from their mouths, that they may not be food for them. 11 For thus says the Lord God: Behold, I, I myself will search for my sheep and will seek them out. 12 As a shepherd seeks out his flock when he is among his sheep that have been scattered, so will I seek out my sheep, and I will rescue them from all places where they have been scattered on a day of clouds and thick darkness. 13 And I will bring them out from the peoples and gather them from the countries, and will bring them into their own land. And I will feed them on the mountains of Israel, by the ravines, and in all the inhabited places of the country. 14 I will feed them with good pasture, and on the mountain heights of Israel shall be their grazing land. There they shall lie down in good grazing land, and on rich pasture they shall feed on the mountains of Israel. 15 I myself will be the shepherd of my sheep, and I myself will make them lie down, declares the Lord God. 16 I will seek the lost, and I will bring back the strayed, and I will bind up the injured, and I will strengthen the weak, and the fat and the strong I will destroy. I will feed them in justice." Our entire hope, since it is in Christ, and because all our true and healthy glory is He Himself, your Charity has not now learned for the first time. For you are in His flock, who tends and feeds Israel. But as there are shepherds who want to hear the names of shepherds but do not want to fulfill the duty of shepherds, let us recount what He says to them through the Prophet, as we heard read. Listen with intention, let us hear with trembling.

Christians because of us, set over because of you. And the word of the Lord came to me, saying: Son of man, prophesy against the shepherds of Israel and say to the shepherds of Israel. We heard this reading just now, as it was being read; from this we have decided to speak something with your Holiness. He himself will help us to speak the truth, if we do not speak our own words. For if we speak our own words, we will be shepherds feeding ourselves, not the sheep; but if they are his words which we speak, he himself will feed you through anyone. Thus says the Lord God: O shepherds of Israel, who feed only yourselves! Should not shepherds feed the sheep? That is, shepherds do not feed themselves, but the sheep. This is the first reason why these shepherds are reproved, because they feed themselves, not the sheep. Who are those who feed themselves? Of whom the Apostle says: For all seek their own, not the things of Jesus Christ. For us, whom the Lord has appointed in this place, from which a dangerous account must be given, according to his grace, not according to our merit, we have two things clearly to be distinguished: one that we are Christians, the other that we are placed over you. The fact that we are Christians is for ourselves; that we are placed over you is for you. In that we are Christians, our own benefit is considered; in that we are placed over you, only yours is considered. And there are many who, being Christians and not placed over others, reach God, perhaps by an easier path and walking perhaps more quickly, as they carry a lighter burden. But we, in addition to being Christians, for which we will answer to God for our life, are also placed over you, for which we will answer to God for our stewardship. I propose this difficulty so that, sympathizing with us, you may pray for us. For the day will come when all things will be brought to judgment. And that day, if far from the world, is near for each person at the end of their life. However, God wanted both to be hidden: when the end of the world will come and when the end of each person's life will be. Do you want not to fear the hidden day? Let it find you prepared when it comes. Therefore, as those placed over you are meant to care for those they oversee, and not to look at their own benefit in their position but only that of those whom they minister to, whoever is placed over others in such a way as to rejoice in their position and seek their own honor and look only at their own interests, feeds themselves, not the sheep. To these, the word is directed. Listen as the sheep of God and see how God has made you secure, no matter how those who are placed over you may be, that is, no matter how we may be, he who feeds Israel has given you security. For if God does not desert his sheep, both the bad shepherds will pay the due penalties and the sheep will receive the promised rewards.

Let us see, therefore, what the divine word, flattering no one, says to shepherds feeding themselves and not the sheep. Behold, you consume the milk, and clothe yourselves with the wool, and you kill what is fat, but you do not feed my sheep. What is weak, you have not strengthened; and what is sick, you have not healed; and what is broken, you have not bound up; and what has strayed, you have not brought back; and what was lost, you have not sought; and what was strong, you have destroyed; and my sheep are scattered, because there is no shepherd. It is said about shepherds feeding themselves and not the sheep, what they love, what they neglect. What, then, do they love? You consume the milk, and you clothe yourselves with the wool. Wherefore the Apostle says: Who plants a vineyard and does not eat its fruit? Who feeds a flock and does not drink of the milk of the flock? We find, therefore, that the milk of the flock is whatever is given by the people of God to the leaders for sustaining temporal sustenance. For the Apostle was speaking of this when he said these things which I have mentioned.

Paul preached the gospel freely.

Indeed the Apostle, although he chose to be occupied by his own hands and did not seek any milk from the sheep, still said that he had the power to receive milk and that the Lord had arranged it so that those who preach the Gospel would live by the Gospel. He says that other co-apostles had used this power, not usurped but given. He did more by not taking what was owed. Therefore, he gave away even his due, but another did not demand the undue; he did more. Perhaps he signified him who, when he brought the sick man to the inn, said: "Whatever more you spend, I will repay you when I return." About those who do not need the milk of the flock, what more should we say? They are more merciful or rather exhibit the work of mercy more extensively. They can, and what they can, they do. Let these be praised, nor let those be condemned. For even the Apostle did not seek what was given. However, he desired the sheep to be fruitful, not sterile, without the abundance of milk. Thus, when he was at a certain time in great need, bound in the confession of the truth, it was sent to him from the brethren to minister to his necessity and need. He responded, giving thanks to them, and said: "You did well to share in my troubles. For I have learned to be content in whatever state I am in. I know how to abound, I know how to suffer want. I can do all things through him who strengthens me. Nevertheless, you did well to send to my needs." But to show that in what they did well, it was not so much his own need that he sought to be relieved but rejoiced in their fruitfulness. What then did he seek there? "Not that I seek the gift," he said, "but I seek the fruit." Not that I, he said, may be filled, but that you may not remain empty.

Therefore, those who cannot do as Paul did, to sustain themselves with their own hands, should take from the milk of the sheep to support their necessity, but they should not neglect the infirmity of the sheep. They should not seek this as their own benefit, as if they seem to be preaching the Gospel out of the necessity of their own poverty, but rather they should prepare the light of the word of truth to illuminate people. For they are like lamps, as it is said: "Let your loins be girded and your lamps burning"; and: "No one lights a lamp and puts it under a bushel, but on a lampstand, so that it may give light to all in the house. In the same way, let your light shine before men, that they may see your good works and glorify your Father who is in heaven." Therefore, if a lamp were lit for you in the house, would you not add oil to prevent it from going out? Moreover, if a lamp, having received oil, did not shine, it would clearly not be worthy of being placed on the lampstand, but would be immediately broken. Therefore, to live, it is necessary to receive, it is charity to give. Not as though the Gospel were for sale, with it being the price for what those who announce it take to live from. For if they sell it in this way, they sell a great thing cheaply. Let them receive sustenance for their necessity from the people, compensation for their stewardship from the Lord. For the people are not worthy to repay the reward to those who serve them in the charity of the Gospel. They should not expect reward except where they also expect salvation. But why are they rebuked, what are they accused of? Because when they were taking milk and clothing themselves with wool, they were neglecting the sheep. Therefore, they were only seeking their own interests, not those of Jesus Christ. But since we have said what it means to consume milk, let us inquire what it means to cover oneself with wool. He who provides milk provides sustenance, and he who provides wool provides honor. These are the two things that those who feed themselves, not the sheep, seek from the people: the convenience of supplying necessities, and the favor of honor and praise. Indeed, clothing is well understood to mean honor, because it covers nakedness. For every man is weak. And what is anyone who presides over you, but what you are? He carries flesh, he is mortal, he eats, he sleeps, he rises; he was born, he is to die. Therefore, if you consider what he is in himself, he is a man. By honoring, you nonetheless cover what is infirm.

Paul did not seek his own advantages.

See what kind of garment the same Paul had received from the good people of God, when he said: "You received me as an angel of God." For I testify to you that, if possible, you would have plucked out your eyes and given them to me. But even though such honor had been shown to him, did he, on account of the honor shown to him, spare those who were in error, lest he be denied and praised less when he rebuked? For if he had done this, he would be among those who feed themselves, not the sheep. He would then say to himself: "What does it matter to me? Let everyone do what they want; my sustenance is safe, my honor is safe: and milk and wool are enough for me; let each go their way as they can." So, is everything intact for you if each may go their way as they can? I do not want to make you a superior, I appoint you as one from the same people: "If one member suffers, all members suffer with it." Therefore, the Apostle himself, even though he recalled how they had acted toward him, lest he seem to have forgotten their honor, testifies that they had received him as an angel of God and would have plucked out their eyes and given them to him if possible. Yet he still approached the sick sheep, cut into the wound, and did not spare the rot. "So," he says, "have I become your enemy by telling you the truth?" Behold, he took from the milk of the sheep, as we recalled a little earlier, and was clothed in their wool, yet he did not neglect the sheep. For he did not seek his own, but those of Jesus Christ. The shepherd wandering from the truth is described by preaching.

Far be it from us to say to you: "Live as you wish, be secure, God will not let anyone perish, only keep the Christian faith. He will not lose what he has redeemed, he will not lose those for whom he shed his blood. And if you wish to entertain your minds with spectacles, go ahead. What harm is there? And these feasts which are celebrated throughout the entire city in the joy of those feasting together, and the public tables of those who think they are rejoicing, but are truly perishing, go, celebrate securely. Great is the mercy of God, which forgives everything. Crown yourselves with roses before they wither. In the house of your God, feast whenever you wish; fill yourselves with food and wine with your own. For this creature is given so that you may enjoy it. For God has not given it to pagans and impious people, but he has given it to you." If we were to say these things, we might indeed gather larger crowds. And if there are some who think that by saying these things we are not speaking rightly, we offend a few, but we win over the multitude. But if we do so, saying not the words of God, not the words of Christ but our own, we would be shepherds feeding ourselves, not the sheep. The wicked overseer kills strong sheep. But when he had said what those shepherds love, he also tells what they neglect. For the vices of the sheep are widespread. The healthy and fat sheep are very few, that is, those solid in the food of truth, using the pastures well from the gift of God. But those bad shepherds do not spare such ones. It is not enough that they do not care for those languishing, weak, wandering, and lost. Even the strong and fat ones they kill, as much as is in their power. And those live. They live by the mercy of God. Nevertheless, as far as the bad shepherds are concerned, they kill. "How," you ask, "do they kill?" By living badly, by providing a bad example. Was it said in vain to the servant of God, eminent among the members of the highest Shepherd: "Providing yourself as an example of good works in all things"; and: “Be a model for the faithful”? For often, even a strong sheep, looking at its leader living badly, if it turns its eyes away from the rules of the Lord and focuses on the man, begins to say in its heart: "If my leader lives like this, who am I that I should not do what he does?" He kills the strong sheep. If therefore he kills the strong sheep, what will he do to the others, who by living badly killed that which he did not himself strengthen, but found already strong or robust? I say to your Charity, I say again, even if the sheep live, and even if they are strong in the word of the Lord and hold fast to what they heard from their Lord: “What they say, do; but what they do, do not do,” nevertheless, he who lives badly before the people, as much as it is in him, kills the one who watches him. Let him not flatter himself because that one is not dead. And he lives, and he is a murderer. Just as when a lustful man looks at a woman to desire her; behold, she is chaste, and he is an adulterer. For the true and open sentence of the Lord is: “Whoever looks at a woman to desire her, has already committed adultery with her in his heart.” He did not reach her bedroom, and he is already rolling in his interior bedroom. So, everyone who lives badly before those to whom he is appointed, as far as it is in him, kills even the strong. He who imitates, dies; he who does not imitate, lives. However, as far as he is concerned, he kills both. "And what is fat," he says, "you kill, and you do not feed my sheep."

It must not be kept silent about the narrow life of the Christians.

You have now heard what they love. Hear what they neglect. What was weakened you have not strengthened; and what was ill, you have not healed; and what was broken, that is, what was crushed, you have not bound up; and those who strayed, you have not brought back; and what was lost, you have not sought; and what was strong, you have destroyed, that is, you have killed and slain. The sheep is weakened, that is, it carries a weak heart, so that it may yield to temptations if they come upon it unprepared and unguarded. The negligent shepherd, when he believes someone is like this, does not tell him: “My son, if you come to serve the Lord, stand in righteousness and fear, and prepare your soul for temptation.” For he who speaks these things strengthens the weak and makes the weak strong, so that when he believes he does not hope for the prosperity of this world. If he has been taught to hope for the prosperity of the world, he is corrupted by that very prosperity; when adversities come, he is wounded, or perhaps destroyed. Therefore, he does not build upon the rock who builds in this way, but places upon the sand. But the rock was Christ. The sufferings of Christ are to be imitated, not the delights of Christians to be sought. The weak is strengthened when he is told: "Indeed, expect the temptations of this world, but the Lord will deliver you from all if your heart does not turn back from Him. For He came to suffer for your strengthening, He came to die, He came to be smeared with spit, He came to be crowned with thorns, He came to hear reproaches, He came finally to be nailed to the wood. He did all these things for you, you did nothing. Not for Him, but for you."

Christians become partakers of the cross of Christ.

What sort, then, are these people who, fearing to hurt those whom they address, not only do not prepare them for imminent temptations but even promise them the happiness of this age, which God Himself did not promise to this age? He foretells labors upon labors coming to this age until the end, and you want the Christian to be exempt from these labors? Because he is a Christian, he will suffer something more in this age. For the Apostle says: All who desire to live piously in Christ will suffer persecution. Now if it pleases you, you who seek your own not the things of Jesus Christ, let him say: All who desire to live piously in Christ will suffer persecution, and you say: "If you live piously in Christ, all good things will abound for you. And if you do not have children, you will receive and nurture strangers, and none of them will die to you." Is this your edification? Pay attention to what you are doing, where you are laying the foundation. It is on sand that you are establishing them. Rain will come, a stream will flow in, the wind will blow, they will strike that house, and it will fall and its ruin will be great. Lift them from the sand, place them on the rock: let the one whom you wish to be Christian be in Christ. Let them attend to the undeserved sufferings of Christ, let them attend to Him who, having no sin, repaid what He did not seize, let them attend to the Scripture saying to him: He scourges every son whom He accepts. Either prepare to be scourged or do not seek to be accepted. He scourges, it says, every son whom He receives. And you say: "Perhaps you will be excepted?" If you are excepted from the suffering of scourges, you are excepted from the number of sons. "Indeed, you say, does He really scourge every son?" Certainly, He scourges every son to make them like the Only Son. That Only Son, born of the substance of the Father, equal to the Father in the form of God, the Word through whom all things were made, had no place where He could be scourged. For this He was clothed in flesh so that He could not be without scourging. Therefore, does He who scourges the Only One without sin leave the adopted one with sin unsworn? The Apostle says we are called to adoption. We received the adoption of sons so that we might be co-heirs with the Only One, even His inheritance: Ask of me, and I will give you the nations as your inheritance. He set an example for us in His sufferings. The sick man must neither be deceived with false hope nor crushed with fear. But certainly, so that the weak may not fail in future temptations, he must neither be deceived by false hope nor broken by terror. Say to him: "Prepare your soul for temptation." But perhaps he begins to waver, to tremble, and not to want to approach. You have another: "God is faithful, who will not allow you to be tempted beyond what you are able to bear." For to promise that and to preach about future sufferings is to strengthen the weak. To one who fears excessively and is deterred because of this, when you promise the mercy of God, not because there will be no temptations, but because He does not allow one to be tempted beyond what he can bear, is to bind up the broken. For there are those who, when they hear of coming tribulations, arm themselves more and almost thirst after them as their drink. For they consider the medicine of faith too small for themselves but seek also the glory of martyrs. There are others, however, who, upon hearing of forthcoming and necessarily arriving temptations, which properly ought to come to a Christian, which no one feels unless he wishes to be truly a Christian, therefore when some approach them, they are broken and stumble. Offer the binding of consolation, bind that which is broken. Say: "Do not fear, He in whom you have believed will not abandon you in temptations. God is faithful, who will not allow you to be tempted beyond what you can bear. You do not hear this from me, the Apostle says it, who also says: "Do you wish to take the test of Him who speaks in me, Christ?" Therefore when you hear these things, you hear from Christ Himself, and you also hear from that shepherd who feeds Israel. For it was said to them: "You will drink our tears, in measure." For what the Apostle says: "He does not allow you to be tempted beyond what you can bear": this the Prophet says: "In measure." Only do not abandon the one who corrects and exhorts, terrifies and consoles, strikes and heals."

Let us do good works and endure evils.

What is weakened, he says, you have not strengthened. He speaks to bad shepherds, false shepherds, shepherds seeking their own interests, not those of Jesus Christ, rejoicing in the gain of milk and wool, wholly not caring for the sheep, and not strengthening what is sick. Between the weak, that is, not strong— for those who are sick are also called weak— but between the weak and the sick, that is, the ill, it seems to me this should be distinguished. Indeed, brethren, these things which we try to distinguish, maybe we ourselves can distinguish better with greater diligence, and another more skilled or more enlightened in heart, lest you be deceived, as far as the words of Scripture go, what I feel, I speak. It must be feared lest temptation befall the weak and break them. However, the languishing one already sick with some desire, is hindered by some desire from entering the path of God, from taking on the yoke of Christ. Pay attention to those people wanting to live well, already determined to live well, and less capable of enduring evil as they are prepared to do good. It pertains to Christian strength, not only to do good works but also to endure evil ones. Therefore, those who seem to fervently perform good works but do not want or cannot endure looming sufferings are weak. However, those who are called back from good works by some evil desire, lovers of the world, lie languid and sick, for by this very languishing, as if without any strength, they can do no good. Such a paralytic in the soul was he, who, when they could not bring him to the Lord by those carrying him, opened the roof and lowered him. That is, as if in the soul you want to do this to open the roof and lower the paralytic soul dissolved in all its members and vacant of all good work, weighed down indeed by its sins and languishing with the disease of its desire. If therefore all the members are dissolved and there is an interior paralysis, that you may reach the doctor—for perhaps the doctor is hidden and is inside; this means: this true understanding is hidden in the Scriptures—by exposing what is hidden you open the roof and lower the paralytic. Those who do not do this and who neglect to do this, you have heard what they hear: What is sick you did not strengthen. And what is crushed you did not bind up: from now on certain temptations. Something is added whereby what is broken may be bound, that comfort: Faithful is God, who will not let you be tempted above what you are able to bear, but will make with the temptation also a way out, that you may be able to endure. A good shepherd does not allow a heretic to perish. And what was straying you did not bring back. Behold where we are endangered among heretics. And what was straying you did not bring back; and what was lost you did not seek out. Here we are somehow tossed among the hands of robbers and the teeth of raging wolves, and we pray that you pray for us regarding these dangers. And the sheep are stubborn. Because when they are sought while straying, they declare they are separated from us by their error and destruction: "What do you want from us? Why do you seek us?" As if there is not itself a cause why we would want and seek them, because they are straying and perishing. "If I am in error," they say, "if I am perishing, why do you want me? Why do you seek me?" Because you are in error, I wish to bring you back; because you are lost, I wish to find you. "I wish to err, I wish to perish." Do you wish to err that way, do you wish to perish that way? So much the better I do not wish it. Indeed, I dare to say, I am importunate. I hear the Apostle saying: Preach the word, be prepared in season and out of season. To whom in season? To whom out of season? Certainly in season to those willing, out of season to those unwilling. Indeed, I am importunate, I dare to say: You want to err, you want to perish, I do not want it. Ultimately, He who frightens me does not want it. If I wanted, look at what He says, look at what He reproaches: What was straying you did not bring back; and what was lost you did not seek out. Shall I fear you more than Him? All of us must appear before the judgment seat of Christ. I do not fear you. For you cannot overthrow the judgment seat of Christ and establish the judgment seat of Donatus. I will bring back the straying one, I will seek the lost one. Willing or unwilling, I will do it. And if the thorns of the forest tear me while I seek, I will press through all narrow ways; I will shake off every hedge; as much as the Lord who frightens me grants me strength, I will traverse all. I will bring back the straying one, I will seek the perishing one. If you do not want me to suffer, do not stray, do not perish. A shepherd indifferent towards the wicked is the reason why the good perish.

It is not enough that I grieve over you being lost and going astray. I fear that neglecting you, I might also destroy what is strong. For see what follows: And what was strong, you have destroyed. If I neglect the one going astray and perishing, even he who is strong will delight in going astray and perishing. I desire outward gains, but I fear more the inward losses. If I regard your error indifferently, the one who is strong pays attention and thinks it is nothing to fall into heresy. When some advantage from the world shines forth from where it is changed, immediately that perishing strong one will say to me, since I do not seek you who are lost: "And here and here is God, what does it matter? Men disputing among themselves did this. God should be worshipped everywhere." If perhaps some Donatist says to him: "I will not give you my daughter unless you are on my side," he needs to attend and say: "If there were nothing wrong in being on their side, our pastors would not speak so strongly against them, nor would they be so concerned for their error." Therefore, if we cease and stay silent, he will speak contrary: "Certainly, if it were bad to be in the party of Donatus, they would speak against it, refute them, strive to win them over. If they are mistaken, they would call them back; if they perish, they would seek them out." Therefore it is not in vain that, when he had already said above: What was fat, you killed, here he again placed in the last: And what was strong, you have destroyed. For it is indeed the repeated sentence, except that it arises from what he said above: What went astray, you did not call back; and what perished, you did not seek; and, by doing this, what is strong, you have killed.

Therefore, listen to what follows about the neglect of these evil, indeed false shepherds: And my sheep were scattered, because there was no shepherd, and they became food for all the wild beasts of the field. Wolves lying in wait steal, roaring lions seize, since the sheep do not cling to the shepherd. For the shepherd is present, but for those acting badly, he is not a shepherd. And they cling to shepherds who are not shepherds, feeding themselves and not the sheep. And a deadly error follows: they turn into ravaging beasts, desiring to satisfy themselves from their deaths. For such are all who rejoice in the errors of others: they are beasts being fed by deaths.

About good and bad mountains. And they were scattered, and my sheep wandered over every mountain and every high hill. Beasts from the mountains and hills, earthly arrogance and worldly pride. The pride of Donatus has risen up, making a division for itself. Following him, Parmenianus confirmed that error. That mountain is, that hill is. Thus, every author of error, swelling with earthly pride, promises rest and good pastures to the sheep. And sometimes the sheep find pastures there from the rain of God, not from the hardness of the mountain. For they too have Scriptures, they have sacraments. These are not of the mountains, but when found in the mountains, one remains poorly in the mountains. Wandering in the mountains and hills, they desert the flock, they desert unity, they desert the fortified troops against wolves and lions. So God will call them back from there, He Himself will call them back. Now you will hear Him calling them back: My sheep have wandered, He says, over every mountain and every high hill, that is, in every swelling of earthly pride. For there are also good mountains: I lifted my eyes to the mountains, from where my help will come. And see, for your hope is not in the mountains: My help is from the Lord, who made heaven and earth. Do not think you insult the holy mountains when you say: My help is not from the mountains, but from the Lord who made heaven and earth. These mountains cry this out to you. There was a mountain that cried out: I hear divisions among you, and each of you says: I am of Paul, I am of Apollos, I am of Cephas, I am of Christ. Lift your eyes to this mountain, listen to what it says, and do not remain even on that mountain. For listen to what follows: Was Paul crucified for you? So after lifting your eyes to the mountains, from where your help will come, that is, to the authors of divine Scriptures, observe with all their marrow, all their bones crying out: Lord, who is like You? so that safely without any insult to the mountains you may say: My help is from the Lord, who made heaven and earth. Not only will the mountains then not be angry with you, but they will then love you, they will favor you more; if you place your hope in them, they will grieve. An angel showing many divine and wonderful things to a man was worshiped by the man, as if he lifted his eyes to the mountain. But he redirected from himself to the Lord: Do not do it, he said; worship Him, for I am your fellow servant and the brothers of yours.

Heretics are branches cut from the one vine. On every mountain, and on every hill, and on every face of the earth, they are scattered. What is: they are scattered on every face of the earth? Pursuing all earthly things, they love and cherish those things that shine on the face of the earth. They do not want to die so that their life may be hidden in Christ. On every face of the earth, with a love of earthly things, and as they are wandering sheep all over the face of the earth. Not all heretics are all over the face of the earth, but still, heretics are all over the face of the earth. Some here, some there, but they are not absent anywhere. They do not know each other: one sect in Africa, another heresy in the East, another in Egypt, another in Mesopotamia, for example. They are in different places: but one mother, pride, has given birth to them all just as our one Catholic mother has given birth to all the faithful Christians spread throughout the world. Therefore, it is no wonder if pride produces division, love produces unity. Yet the Catholic mother herself, the shepherd himself in her, seeks out the wandering everywhere, strengthens the weak, heals the sick, binds up the broken, some from these, some from those, not knowing each other. But she knows them all, because she is spread with all. For example, in Africa there is the part of Donatus, the Eunomians are not in Africa, but here the Catholic is with the part of Donatus. In the East, there are Eunomians, but the part of Donatus is not there; yet the Catholic is with the Eunomians there. It is like a vine, growing and spreading everywhere; they are like useless branches, rightly cut off by the farmer's sickle because of their barrenness, to be pruned, not cut off. Therefore, those branches remained where they were cut off. But the vine, growing through everything, knows its branches that remained in it and those near it that were cut off from it. Nevertheless, it calls back the wandering, because the Apostle says of the broken branches: “For God is able to graft them in again.” Whether you speak of sheep wandering from the flock or branches cut off from the vine, God is no less able to call back the sheep or re-graft the branches, for He is the supreme shepherd, the true farmer. And they are scattered on every face of the earth; and there was no one to seek them, no one to call them back, except among those bad shepherds; there was no one, but a man, who sought them.

God swearing by His own life.

Therefore, hear the word of the Lord, O shepherds: As I live, says the Lord God. Behold where it begins. It is as if it were an oath of God, a testimony of His life. As I live, says the Lord. The shepherds are dead, but the sheep are safe; the Lord lives. As I live, says the Lord God. But which shepherds are dead? Those who seek their own, not the things of Jesus Christ. Therefore, will there be and will be found shepherds who seek not their own, but the things of Jesus Christ? There will certainly be and surely will be found, neither lacking nor will lack. Let us see then what the Lord, who claims to live, says: whether He says He will take away the sheep from the bad shepherds, feeding themselves and not the sheep, and will give them to good shepherds feeding the sheep and not themselves. As I live, says the Lord God, unless because My sheep have been made a prey to all the beasts of the field, because there was no shepherd. Again He speaks of the shepherd, both a moment ago and now. He does not say: because there are no shepherds. For even if there are such erring badly, perishing badly, there is no shepherd, even if the shepherd is present, because even when light is present, it is not light to the blind. And the shepherds did not seek My sheep, and the shepherds fed themselves, but did not feed My sheep.

"It pertains to bishops not to be silent."

Therefore, shepherds, hear the word of the Lord. But which shepherds should hear? Thus says the Lord God: Behold, I am against the shepherds, and I will require My sheep at their hands. Hear and learn, O sheep of God: God inquires about His sheep from the evil shepherds, and He demands their deaths at their hands. For He says elsewhere through the same Prophet: Son of man, I have made you a watchman for the house of Israel. You will hear a message from My mouth and warn them from Me. When I say to the sinner: You shall surely die, and you do not speak to warn the wicked from his way, that wicked man shall die in his iniquity, but I will require his blood at your hand. But if you warn the wicked man to turn from his way, and he does not turn from his way, he shall die in his iniquity, but you have delivered your soul. What is this, Brothers? Do you see how dangerous it is to keep silent? He dies, and rightfully so; in his impiety and sin, he dies; for his negligence kills him. For he would find a living shepherd who says: I live, says the Lord; but when he is negligent, not admonished by the one who is appointed for this purpose as a watchman to admonish, and he rightfully dies, the other is justly condemned. But if you say, He says, to the wicked, You shall surely die, to whom I have threatened a sword, and he neglects to avoid the imminent sword and the sword comes and kills him, he dies in his sin, but you have delivered your soul. Therefore, it is indeed our duty not to keep silent; and for you, even if we are silent, to hear the shepherd's words from the Holy Scriptures.

Blind leading the blind, both fall into a pit.

Let us see, therefore, because I had thus proposed whether he would take away the sheep from the bad shepherds and give them to the good shepherds. I see him taking away the sheep from the bad shepherds. For he says this: Behold I am against the shepherds, and I will require my sheep at their hands, and I will turn them away, so that they do not feed my sheep; and the shepherds shall no longer feed themselves. For when I say: They should feed my sheep, they feed themselves, not my sheep. I will turn them away so that they do not feed my sheep. How does he turn them away, so that they do not feed his sheep? Do what they say; but do not do what they do. As if he were saying: "They say my things, but they do their own things." If he were to say: "Do confidently what they do, I will condemn them for living badly; but I will spare you because you have followed your leaders," if he were to say this, he would deter the bad shepherds, who do not feed the sheep, but themselves. But since he does not only terrify the blind man leading, but also the blind man following - for he did not say: The one leading falls into the pit, and the one following does not fall, but: The blind man leading the blind, both fall into the pit - he warned the sheep and said: Do what they say; but do not do what they do. For when you do not do what the bad shepherds do, they do not feed you; but when you do what they say, I feed you. For they say my things and do not do them. "We confidently, they say, follow our bishops." The heretics often say this when they are most clearly convicted by the truth: "We are the sheep, they will render an account for us." They will indeed render a bad account for your death. For the death of an evil sheep, the bad shepherd will render a bad account. Does a sheep live because its skin is presented? The shepherd is reproved because he neglected the wandering sheep, and on that account, it fell into the jaws of the wolf to be devoured. What good does it do him to bring back the marked skin? The master of the house wants the life of the sheep. But behold, the bad shepherd brought the skin: Let him render an account for the skin. Is he perhaps going to lie? He who later judges was watching from above: to whom words mean, he counts facts, he looks into thoughts. Let the bad shepherd render an account for the skin of the dead sheep. "I shouted your words to him and he did not want to follow; I took pains to keep him from straying from the flock, and he did not obey": indeed, if he says this and says the truth - but he knows whether he speaks the truth - he renders a good account for the bad sheep. But if God sees that he neglected the wanderer, that he did not seek the perishing one, what good does it do that he found the skin to bring back? He should have brought back the sheep itself, so as not to show the skin of the dead one. Therefore, if he who did not seek the wandering one does not render a good account, what kind of account will he render who caused the wandering? This is what I say: If a bishop appointed in the Catholic does not render a good account for a sheep if he has not sought the wandering one from the flock of God, what kind of account will the heretic render, who not only will not call back from error but even compelled into error? The sheep of Christ hear His voice. But let us see, as I said, how God recalls the sheep from the bad shepherds. I have already mentioned: "Do what they say; but do not do what they do." And they do not feed you, but God does, because whether the shepherds want it or not, they will speak the words of God so that you may reach the milk and wool. "You who preach not to steal, do you steal?" says the Apostle to those who say good things but do bad things. You listen to the preacher, so do not steal; do not imitate the thief. If you want to imitate the thief, he himself feeds you with his deed; he supplies you with poison, not food. But if you hear from him that which he does not say of himself, but of God - for a grape cannot be gathered from thorns; for even the Lord’s saying is: "No one gathers a grape from thorns and figs from thistles" -, however, do not therefore slander your Lord and say: "Lord, you did not want me to, because it is not possible to gather grapes from thorns; and again you said to me about some: 'Do what they say; but do not do what they do,' indeed those doing bad things are certainly thorns. How do you want me to gather the grape of the word from thorns?" He will answer: "That grape is not of the thorns, but sometimes a growing vine entwines itself in the hedge, and the grape hangs among the thick thorns, but it does not arise from the root of the thorns. If you are hungry and have nothing else from where to take it, carefully reach out your hand, so not to be torn by the thorns, that is, not to imitate the deeds of the wicked; and pick the grape hanging among the thorns, but born of the vine. The nourishment of the cluster will come to you, the thorns will keep the fire of torment." The sheep of Christ hear his voice. And I will rescue my sheep, He says, from their mouth, and from their hands: and they shall no longer be food for them. This is also said in the psalm: Do not all those who work iniquity know, who devour my people as they eat bread? And they shall no longer be food for them: because thus says the Lord God: Behold, I myself. I have taken the sheep away from the evil shepherds, warning as I have said so that they do not do what the evil shepherds do, that is, so that the incautious and negligent sheep do not do what the evil shepherds do. And what does He say? To whom does He give what He has taken from them? Perhaps to good shepherds? This does not follow. And what shall we say, Brothers? Are there not good shepherds? Is it not said in another place in the Scriptures: And I will set shepherds over them according to my heart, who will feed them with discipline? How then does He say of the sheep, which He takes from the evil shepherds, that He does not give them to the good, but as if there were no good left at all, says: I will feed them? He had said to Peter: Feed my sheep. What then do we do? When the sheep are entrusted to Peter, the Lord does not say there: I will feed my sheep, not you, but:

Peter, do you love me? Feed my sheep. Or perhaps because Peter is no longer found, since he has already been taken up to the rest of the Apostles and martyrs, there is no one to whom the Lord can securely say of the sheep: Feed my sheep, and in a certain way He Himself takes over the duty of feeding His sheep, having no one to whom He can entrust them, and yet not abandoning them? This seems to follow: Thus says the Lord God: Behold, I myself, to whom we used to say: You who shepherd Israel, give ear; you who lead Joseph like a flock, the people established in Egypt: Israel, now spread among the nations, is Joseph himself. For you know that Joseph migrated to Egypt: it was done by the selling of his brothers. The Jews sold Christ; it is not without reason that among the Apostles it was Judas himself who was the seller. Christ began to be in the nations, there He was honored, there His people grew, His shepherd did not abandon Him. He says: Stir up your might and come to save us. Indeed He does and will do so. He says: Behold, I myself, and I will seek out my sheep, and I will visit them, as a shepherd visits his flock. The evil shepherds did not care; for they did not redeem with their own blood. As He says, a shepherd visits his flock on the day? In what kind of day? When there shall be cloud and thick darkness, that is, rain and fog. Rain and fog are the errors of this world; great darkness arising from the desires of men, and a dense fog covering the earth. And it is difficult for the sheep not to go astray in this fog. But the shepherd does not abandon them. He searches for them, penetrates the fog with very keen eyes, is not hindered by the darkness of the clouds. He sees, he calls back those wandering from every side, so that it may be done as it is said in the Gospel: My sheep hear my voice, and they follow me. In the midst of the scattered sheep, so I will seek out my sheep, and I will bring them out from all places where they are scattered on a day of clouds and thick darkness. When it is difficult to find them, now I will find them. Dense fog, thick darkness: nothing escapes His eyes.

Mountains of Israel, authors of the divine Scriptures. And I will bring them out from the peoples, and I will gather them from the countries, and I will bring them to their own land, and I will feed them on the mountains of Israel. He has established the mountains of Israel, the authors of the divine Scriptures. There feed, so that you may feed securely. Whatever you hear from there, let it be to your benefit; whatever is outside of that, reject. Do not wander in the fog, listen to the voice of the shepherd. Gather yourselves to the mountains of the holy Scripture. There are the delights of your heart, there is nothing poisonous, nothing foreign; the most abundant pastures are there. You only come healthy, be fed healthily on the mountains of Israel. And in the streams, and in every dwelling place of the land. For from the mountains that we have shown, the streams of evangelical preaching have flowed, as their sound has gone out into all the earth, and the habitation of the whole land has become joyful and fruitful for feeding the sheep. In good pastures I will feed them, and on the high mountains of Israel. And their fold shall be there, that is, where they may rest, where they may say: It is well, where they may say: It is true, it is clear, we are not deceived. They will rest in the glory of God, as in those folds. And they will sleep, that is, they will rest, and they will rest in good delights. And in rich pastures they shall graze on the mountains of Israel. I already said the mountains of Israel, good mountains, where we lift up our eyes so that help may come to us from there. But our help is from the Lord, who made heaven and earth. Therefore, lest our hope be even in the good mountains, when he said: I will feed my sheep on the mountains of Israel, again, lest you remain in the mountains, he immediately added: I will feed my sheep. Lift up your eyes to the mountains, from where help will come to you, but listen to him saying: I will feed them. For your help is from the Lord, who made heaven and earth. And I will make them rest, says the Lord God. But in order to make them rest, what did He first take care of? For what He first took care of, He later says: Thus says the Lord God: What was lost, I will seek; and what strayed, I will bring back; and what was broken, I will bind up; and what is weak, I will strengthen; and what is fat and strong, I will watch over: which the evil shepherds did not do, feeding themselves, not the sheep. The Lord does not say: I will appoint other good shepherds, to do these things, but I, He says, will do; I will commit my sheep to no one. Be secure, Brothers; you sheep, be secure. To us it seems we should fear, as if a good shepherd were lacking.

Christ nourishes with judgment those whom He has redeemed.

He concludes thus: And I will feed them with judgment. See, because in this way he alone feeds, feeding with judgment. For what man judges a man? All things are full of rash judgments. He whom we have despaired of suddenly turns and becomes the best. He whom we have greatly presumed on suddenly fails and becomes the worst. Neither is our fear certain, nor is our love certain. What any man is today, scarcely even the man himself knows. Yet, somehow, he knows what he is today. But what he will be tomorrow, not even he himself knows. Therefore, he feeds with judgment, distributing what is proper to each: these things to these, those things to those, what is due to whom it is due, this or that. For he knows what he does. He feeds with judgment those whom he has redeemed by judgment. Therefore, he himself feeds with judgment. The devil wants all who are wandering to be led astray by any errors. For in the prophet Jeremiah, a certain partridge cried out, "It gathered what it did not lay, making its riches without justice." Against this partridge making its riches without justice, this shepherd feeds with justice. Why is that one without justice? Because it gathered what it did not lay. Why is this one with justice? Because it nurtures what it laid. However, we speak of the good shepherd. Good shepherds either do not exist, or they are hidden. If they do not exist, what do we do? If they are hidden, why is there silence about them? That partridge understood by some ancients and interpreters of the Scriptures before us as the devil, gathering what it did not lay. For he is not a creator but a deceiver, making his riches without justice. For it does not matter to him in what way someone errs. He wants everyone erring, with any errors. How diverse the heresies, how diverse the errors! He wants men to err in all things. The devil does not say: "Let them be Donatists and not Arians." Whether here or there, they belong to him, gathering without justice. "Let them worship idols," he says, "they are mine; let them remain in Jewish superstition, they are mine; let them go astray from unity into this or that heresy, they are mine." Thus, he gathers without justice, making his riches. But what follows? In the middle of his days, they will forsake him, and in his last days, he will be foolish. That one comes gathering his sheep from everywhere. In the middle of his days, sooner than he hoped, before he thought, they will forsake him, and he will be foolish in his last days. Why was he wise in his beginnings, and in his last days will be foolish? Listen, brethren. Sometimes in the Scriptures wisdom is said for cunning, by abuse of the word, not by its proper meaning. For where is it said: "Where is the wise? Where is the scribe? Where is the disputer of this age? Did not God make foolish the wisdom of this world?" And this partridge, the same dragon, the same serpent, was as if wise, when he deceived Adam through Eve. It was thought he spoke the truth, he was considered to give good counsel, he was believed against God. Which indeed is called wisdom by abuse of the word and in evil, by the custom of our Scriptures though as the authors of the world speak, what is that to us? you have in the same book: "The serpent was more cunning than all beasts." This one more cunning than all the beasts was known to be sharp and shrewd to deceive. Later, he is not believed. It is said to him: "We renounce you, it is enough that you first deceived the unwary." Therefore, thus in his last days, he will be foolish. His frauds will be exposed, and therefore no longer frauds. In his last days, he will be foolish, who gathered what he did not lay, and made his riches without justice. Against him, our Redeemer feeds with justice.

Heretic, helper, and son of the devil.

Let also some heretic arise, if not a brother of the devil, certainly his helper and son. And I would call him a quarrelsome partridge. For this animal, as fowlers know, is also captured by the eagerness for quarreling. They quarrel against the truth, and they have quarreled since they divided from it. Now they say: "We do not want to quarrel," because they have already been captured. He does not have to say: "I do not want to quarrel." O captive, at least at times you were the one who in the first periods of your sedition accused the traitors, condemned the innocent, sought the judgment of the Emperor, did not agree with the judgment of the bishops, and when defeated, you appealed so many times, litigated most eagerly before the Emperor himself. You gathered what you did not bear. Where is your neck now? Where is your tongue? Where is your hissing? Certainly in your latest acts you have become foolish, you graze without judgment. For you do not wish to judge truly, whether about your error or about the truth. Christ grazes against you with judgment, He separates His sheep from those that are not His. My sheep, He says, listen to my voice and follow me.

Good shepherds will never be lacking.

Here I find all good shepherds in one shepherd. For truly good shepherds are not lacking, but they are in one. There are many who are divided. This one is proclaimed, because unity is commended. Nor indeed are the shepherds now silent, and it is said "shepherd," because the Lord has not found one to whom He might entrust His sheep. But then He commended, because He found Peter. Moreover, even in Peter himself, He commended unity. There were many Apostles, and it is said to one: Feed my sheep. Let it not be that good shepherds are now lacking, let it not be that they are missing from us, let it not be that by His mercy, He does not beget and establish them. Surely, if there are good sheep, there are also good shepherds, for from good sheep come good shepherds. But all good shepherds are in one, they are one. They feed, Christ feeds. For the friends of the bridegroom do not speak their own voice, but they rejoice greatly because of the voice of the bridegroom. Therefore, He Himself feeds, when they feed; and He says: I feed, because His voice is in them, His love is in them. For even Peter himself, to whom He was entrusting His sheep as one to another, He wanted to make one with Himself, and thus to commend the sheep to him, so that he would be the head, he would bear the figure of the body, that is, of the Church, and as if the bridegroom and bride were one in one flesh. Therefore, that He might commend the sheep, what does He first say to him, not as to another he might commend? Peter, do you love me? And he responded: I love you. And again: Do you love me? And he responded: I love you. And thirdly: Do you love me? And he responded: I love you. He affirms love, so that He might strengthen unity. Therefore, He Himself feeds as one in them, and they in one. And it is silent about the shepherds, but it is not silent. The shepherds glory, but let he who glories, glory in the Lord. This is to feed Christ, this is to feed in Christ, this is to feed with Christ, and not apart from Christ to feed oneself. For indeed, the Prophet did not say due to the lack of shepherds, as if predicting future bad times: I will feed my sheep, I do not have anyone to whom I may commend them. Even when Peter himself was there, and when the Apostles themselves were still in this flesh and in this life, then that one said, in whom all are one: I have other sheep, which are not of this fold; I must bring them also, that there may be one flock and one shepherd. Therefore, let all be in one shepherd, and let them say the one voice of the shepherd that the sheep hear, and follow their shepherd, not this one or that one, but the one. And let all in him say one voice, not have diverse voices. I beseech you, Brothers, that you all speak the same thing, and there be no divisions among you. Let the sheep hear this voice purged from all division, cleansed from all heresy, and follow their shepherd saying: My sheep hear my voice, and they follow me. The voice of Christ is not heard among the Donatists. For do you want to know, heretic, how you do not have the voice of the shepherd, and that sheep follow you perilously, covered in a sheep's garment, but inwardly a rapacious wolf? Let them hear your voice and let us see if it is Christ's. A stray sheep separated from the flock seeks the Church, not knowing where the flock is. It seeks where to go, where to enter. Give your voice: let us hear if it is Christ's. Let us hear whether it is of the lamb, or of the partridge. The sheep of God is seeking its flock. Imagine a sheep coming from the East to Africa seeking its flock. It chances upon you, it chances upon your basilica and wants to enter. You are disturbed by the unfamiliar face, either you or your minister. Standing or sitting at the door, it asks the sheep seeking its flock, indeed the flock of God. It wants to enter with its flock, it thinks it is there. You ask: "Are you a pagan, or a Christian?" It responds: "A Christian", for it is the sheep of God. You ask whether perhaps it is a catechumen, and may rush to the sacraments. It responds: "Faithful". You ask of what communion it is. It responds: "Catholic". You reject the Christian, faithful, catholic. Who are those inside whom you keep? Indeed, cast them out, reject them. Rejected by you, they are approved by Christ. Would that even those who are with you recognize you, and in the middle of your days abandon you. Some of our brothers went yesterday to their basilica. Though to bad brothers, yet to brothers. Attend, my Brothers, to what the difference is between the confidence of truth and the fear of falsity. When you recognize some of them among this people, how you rejoice! Because He who seeks what was lost is in you. Sometimes it is suggested to you: "He will hear and depart". And you: "Let him hear and depart". "He will hear and mock". "Let him hear and mock. Sometimes he becomes wise and sometimes he knows. Sometimes he is abandoned by his people, he remains with his heart. He renounces his error. He gives thanks to his God." But what about them? "Who are you?" "We are Christians." "No, but spies." And they: "We are Catholics." They tried to insult; with better counsel they repented. And would that they repented thus as to remain, as those repented who entered to insult. However, those whom they cast out are Christians, faithful, catholics; whom they kept, I do not wish to say. Whom they cast out, I see; whom they kept, let them say themselves.

Therefore, let them speak their voice. Let us see whether it is the voice of Christ, or the voice of the shepherd, which the sheep follow. Whether this voice is through a good man or through an evil man, let us consider whether it is the voice of the shepherd. The sick one seeks the Church, the wandering one seeks the Church. What do you say? "The Church is of the party of Donatus." I seek the voice of the shepherd. Read this to me from the Prophet, read to me from the Psalm, recite from the Law, recite from the Gospel, recite from the Apostle. From there I will recite to you the Church spread throughout the whole world and the Lord saying: My sheep hear my voice and follow me. What is the voice of the shepherd? And repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. Behold the voice of the shepherd, recognize it, and follow if you are a sheep. The Scriptures testify to a Church spread throughout the whole world.

"But they handed over the codices, and they placed incense for idols, this person and that person." What is it to me about this person and that person? If they did this, they are not shepherds. You should proclaim the voice of the shepherd, because you do not even announce the voice of the shepherd regarding them. You accuse, not the Gospel; you accuse, not the Prophet, not the Apostle; from whom does this voice speak to me, I believe about him; others I do not believe. But you will bring forth Acts; I bring forth Acts. Let's believe yours; you also believe mine. I don't believe yours; don't believe mine. Let human papers be taken away, let divine voices sound. Proclaim to me one voice of Scripture for the part of Donatus; listen to countless others, throughout the world. Who counts them? Who limits them? However, to mention a few, consider the Law, the first Testament of God: "In your seed all nations will be blessed." And in the Psalm: "Ask of me and I will give you the nations as your inheritance and the ends of the earth as your possession." All the ends of the earth will remember and turn to the Lord, and all the families of the nations will worship before Him, for the kingdom is His and He shall rule over the nations. "Sing to the Lord a new song, sing to the Lord all the earth." And all the kings of the earth will worship Him, all nations will serve Him. Who could suffice to enumerate them? Almost every page sounds nothing else but Christ, and the Church spread throughout the entire world. Let one voice for the part of Donatus come forth for me: is it such a great thing that I seek? They say the Church spread throughout the whole world was going to perish. Was it predicted to perish by so many lasting testimonies? Not even one voice of these through the Law, the Prophets, the Songs, is from the shepherd - for they could not speak the truth without the Word of God, which is Christ - listen to the voice of the Word, and from the mouth of the Word.

Amazed at the faith of the centurion: "Amen," he said, "I tell you, I have not found such great faith in Israel. Therefore, I tell you that many will come from the East and from the West and will sit down with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven. Many will come from the East and from the West. Behold the Church of Christ, behold the flock of Christ. See if you are a sheep. For the flock which is everywhere does not hide from you. You will not have what to answer to your judge, whom you do not want to be your shepherd; you will not have, I say, what to answer to your judge: 'I did not know, I did not see, I did not hear.' What is it that you did not know? Nor is there anyone who can hide from his heat. What is it that you did not see? All the ends of the earth have seen the salvation of our God. What is it that you did not hear? Their sound has gone out into all the earth, and their words to the ends of the world."

Abandon the voice of the wolf, follow the voice of the shepherd. But rightly from you is sought the voice of Christ, the voice of the shepherd, which the sheep hear and follow. You do not find what to say, you do not have the voice of the shepherd. Hear and follow. Leave the voice of the wolf, follow the voice of the shepherd. Or give the voice of the shepherd. "We give it," they say. Let us hear: "We also give the voice of the shepherd." Let us hear. "In the Song of Songs," they say, "the bride speaks to the bridegroom, the Church to Christ." We know the Song of Songs, holy Songs, love Songs, of holy love, of holy charity, of holy sweetness. Indeed, I want to hear from there the voice of the shepherd, the voice of the sweetest groom. Say, if you have it. Let us hear. "The bride," they say, "says to the bridegroom: Announce to me whom my soul loves, where you pasture, where you lie down. And he, they say, responds: In the midday." I was bringing forth clear testimonies for you; there was no other way you could interpret: Ask of me, and I will give you the nations as your inheritance, and the ends of the earth as your possession. All the ends of the earth will remember and turn to the Lord. Why do you bring me something from the Song of Songs? Perhaps you do not understand it. For those songs are riddles, known to few who understand, opened to few who knock. Retain and devoutly take the clear words, so that the obscure may rightly be opened to you. How will you be a discerner of the obscure, a despiser of the clear? The words of Song of Songs 1:6-7 are discussed.

Behold, however, as we are able, Brothers, let us discuss these words. The Lord will be present so that you may see a sound understanding therein. First, what is easily judged by all, even the unlearned, the words themselves are poorly distinguished. Now you will hear, now you will test. For thus the text of the reading itself holds. The bride speaks to the bridegroom: Announce to me whom my soul has loved where you feed, where you rest. That the bride speaks to the bridegroom, that the Church speaks to Christ, neither we doubt nor do they. But all the words of the bride listen. Why do you wish to attribute to the bridegroom a word which still belongs to the bride? Let the bride say everything she says. Then the bridegroom will respond. Hear more clearly with this distinction which I am about to dictate: you will not find anything more. Announce to me whom my soul has loved where you feed, where you rest at midday. She still says: Where you feed, where you rest at midday. And see, because she still speaks. For it follows: Lest I become as one who is veiled over the flocks of your companions. I think all the learned and unlearned can distinguish masculine and feminine. I ask to which gender "veiled" belongs. I ask from any person: Is it masculine or feminine? Announce, she says, to me whom my soul has loved. Whom, when she says, she is addressing a male, she is addressing the bridegroom. Because indeed a female addresses a male, subsequent words indicate: Announce to me where you feed, where you rest at midday, lest I become as one who is veiled. Listen to “veiled,” so that these may become clear to you. Announce to me whom my soul has loved where you feed, where you rest at midday, lest I become as one who is veiled over the flocks of your companions. Up to this point are the words of the bride. Now begin the obvious words of the bridegroom: Unless you know yourself—recognize yourself manfully, woman, know yourself: he says, unless you know yourself; listen also to the following: O beautiful among women— Unless you know yourself, O beautiful among women, go forth in the footsteps of the flocks and feed your kids beside the shepherds' tents, not in the shepherd's tent. See how the bridegroom threatens; see how, while she is in danger, although he is sweet, he removes the endearments from the scene. How sweetly she entreats! "Announce to me whom my soul has loved where you feed, where you rest at midday. For indeed midday comes, when the shepherds gather at their resting places; and perhaps I shall hide from where you feed and where you rest; and I want you to announce to me, lest I become as one who is veiled, that is, as one who is hidden, and not recognized. For I am manifest, but lest as one who is veiled, as one hidden, I fall among the flocks of your companions." For all heretics have departed from Christ; all those who have become evil shepherds, having their own flocks under the name of Christ, were his companions, they received his banquet. For they are called companions, as if partakers of one banquet. In the Latin language, companions are thus called, as if those who eat together, because they eat together. Hear him in the psalm reproving the evil companions, that is, of one banquet: If my enemy, he says, had reviled me, I would surely have endured it, and if he had spoken great things against me. But you, my equal, my acquaintance, my guide, who took sweet foods together with me. Therefore, many ungrateful companions of the Lord’s table went outside; the evil companions have made their own tables, they have raised altars against the altar:

in them, she fears to fall. The overseas Church is concerned about the re-baptizers. And if you think that the south is Africa - although I could insist that it is more the southern part of the world, parts of Egypt, and those regions scorched by the sun where rain does not appear, because it is the south where the midday great heat is. But there the desert is full of thousands of servants of God. Hence if we wish to turn to the south of the places, why does he not more feed and rest there, when it was previously predicted: The breasts of the desert will be fruitful? - But behold, I agree, let Africa be the south, let Africa be the south. Here are the wicked comrades. The overseas church, concerned lest it errs in any of its own journeying to Africa, invokes her spouse, and says to him: "I hear that heretics abound in Africa, I hear that rebaptizers abound in Africa. But I hear that yours are there also. And I hear that, and I hear that. But who are yours, I wish to hear from you. Announce to me, whom my soul loves, where you pasture, where you lie down at midday, at that midday, where I hear there are two parties, one part with Donatus, the other adhering to your entire body. You tell me where I should go lest by chance I become, as it were, hidden, that is, unknown above the flocks of your comrades, and fall into the flocks of the heretics, who attempt to set stone upon stone which should be destroyed, lest I rush into the rebaptizers, announce to me." And he who commends the unity of the shepherd, who in this reading says: I shall shepherd, but reproves the shepherds who wished to be many, who lost the unity, responding most sternly, not gently, but because of the greatness of the danger: Unless you know yourself, he says, O fairest among women: you are beautiful among women, but acknowledge yourself. Where do you recognize yourself? In the whole world. For if you are beautiful, there is unity in you. Where there is division, there is ugliness, not beauty. Unless you know yourself: you believed in me, acknowledge yourself. How did you believe in me? Just as those wicked companions agreed the Word was made flesh, born of a Virgin, crucified, risen, ascended into heaven: you believed in me such as this, they also proclaim the same. Recognize yourself and me: me in heaven, you in the whole world." Christ addresses any one of the Church as the Church. - For how does the Church seek the Church? I speak according to themselves. Announce to me whom my soul loves, where you pasture, where you lie. What does she seek? The Church. And he as if showing the Church says: At midday, as they wish. Let them answer me, how the Church seeks the Church. Announce to me whom my soul loves. Who speaks? The Church. What does she want announced to her? Where you pasture, where you lie, that is, where the Church is. The Church speaks and asks where the Church is; and he answers, as they think: In the south. If it is only in the south, as they say in Africa, how does she ask where she herself is? Surely the portion of the overseas Church rightly asks about the south, lest she errs here. - Christ addresses each member of his Church, as his Church. And what does he say? Unless you know yourself, O fairest among women, go out. Going out is characteristic of heretics. Either know yourself, or go out, because if you do not know yourself, you will go out. Go out where? In the footsteps of the flocks, following the bad flocks. Lest you think you follow the sheep, if you go out, hear what follows: Go out in the footsteps of the flocks, and pasture your kids, no longer sheep. You know, Brothers, where the kids will be. On the left will be all who have gone out from the Church. To Peter who remains is said: Feed my sheep; to the heretic who goes out: Feed your kids. The Donatists interpret Habakkuk 3:3 incorrectly.

"There is also, they say, another testimony." Nonetheless, it is against you. Speak, let us hear. It will be against you, just as this which you thought was for you. - "If you interpret the south, they say, as Egypt?". We indeed interpret the south in many ways; we can understand Egypt as a place in the world, and Africa itself as well. Hear what I understand by the south; I understand it as the fervor of the spiritual, burning with the fire of charity, shining with the light of truth. For it is said in a certain psalm: Make known to me your right hand, and teach the wise-hearted in wisdom, the right hand not the goats; and the wise-hearted in wisdom, they are the south. Hence it is said to the Prophet: And your darkness will be as the south. Therefore, we can understand the south in many ways. But I entirely understand Africa, absolutely, I understand Africa. I accept something from you perhaps better than I would have known, unless I recalled it from you. Let Africa be the south. The transmarine Church fears falling into re-baptizers; it fears falling as if unknown into the flocks of sectarians, it seeks from its spouse for him to announce to it where he feeds, where he lies down at noon, for he feeds in some places at noon, and does not feed in others; he lies down in some places, and does not lie down in others. - Let her hear the advice, let her come to the Catholic Church, let her not fall into the flocks of sectarians, let her not feed her goats there. - But say what else you said you would say. "The Prophet, he says: God will come from the south; and now where is the south, surely it is Africa". O testimony! God will come from the south, and from Africa God will come! Heretics announce another Christ is born in Africa and will go throughout the world! I ask what this means: God will come from Africa? If you said: God remained in Africa, for sure you would be speaking shamefully. But now also: You say: He will come from Africa. We know where Christ was born, where he suffered, where he ascended into heaven, where he sent his disciples, where he filled them with the Holy Spirit, where he commanded them to preach throughout the world, and they obeyed, and the world is filled with the Gospel. Of the origin of the Donatists.

"Therefore, explain to me, he said, what it means: God will come from the South. Speak the whole, and perhaps you will understand. God will come from the South, and the holy one from the shady mountain. Explain to me, if already from Africa, how from the shady mountain? Part of Donatus was born in Numidia. They themselves were first sent into dissension and tumult and scandal, seeking a great wound. The Numidians sent them. Secondarily, the Tigisitanus sent them. Where Tigis is, it is known. Those clerics who were sent were gathered outside from the Church, to approach the clerics of Carthage they did not want, they set up a visitor, they were received by Lucilla. The author of all this evil was the Numidian heretic. In Numidia, whence this evil came here, scarcely a fly is found, they dwell in hutches. How is there a shady mountain in Numidia? Tell me then. Do not recite up to here: God from the South, I demand the following: And the holy one from the shady mountain. But show me part of Donatus coming from Numidia from the shady mountain. You find all bare, indeed the fields are fertile, but in grains, not fertile with olive groves, not pleasant with other groves. Where then is the shady mountain in parts of Numidia? From where did this scandal come?"

Augustine explains the prophecy of Habakkuk 3:3.

"You, he said to me, then explain what it is: God will come from the South, and the holy one from the shady mountain." See how easily I will explain. First, listen to what the Lord says: It was necessary for Christ to suffer and to rise from the dead on the third day, and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. Behold whence he will come: when he said, beginning, he indeed foretold that he would come to other nations through his saints. Read the division of the land of the sons of Israel to all the tribes in the book of Joshua. It is clearly stated there: Jerusalem from the South. Read, seek, and you will find. Would that when you found it, you would believe; would that you would lay aside pride. Jerusalem from the South. And the Lord: beginning at Jerusalem: that is, God will come from the South. How then from the shady mountain? Read the Gospel already. Christ ascended to heaven from the Mount of Olives. Follow. And what is clearer? You hear: from the South; you have heard: from the shady mountain. We recite the Law. We recite the Gospel. You have heard: beginning at Jerusalem; hear: among all nations. In the same Prophet follow those words you have despised, those words you have overlooked: God will come from the South, and the holy one from the shady mountain; his shadow will cover the mountains, and his glory fills the earth. Therefore, among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. How, beginning at Jerusalem? God will come from the South, and the holy one from the shady mountain, that is, from the Mount of Olives, where he ascended to heaven, from where he sent his disciples, where, when he was about to ascend, he also said: It is not for you to know the times or the seasons, which the Father has put in his own authority, but you shall receive power from on high, and you shall be my witnesses – see how the Gospel begins – and you shall be my witnesses in Jerusalem, and in Judea and Samaria, and to the uttermost parts of the earth. Therefore, with God coming, Christ, and his name, and the preaching of his Gospel from Jerusalem, that is, from the South, and from the shady mountain, that is, from the Mount of Olives, because the Gospel has been spread among all nations, his shadow covers the mountains, that is, his coolness, his protection, and the earth is full of his praise. Therefore sing a new song with the whole earth, not an old song with a corner of the earth."

About the man from Cyrene and Joseph of Arimathea.

They also say something else. "A certain Simon of Cyrene", they say, "was compelled to carry the cross of the Lord." We read it, but I want to know how it helps you. "Cyrene", he says, "is an African. Wherefore he was compelled to carry the cross." Perhaps you do not know where Cyrene is: it is in Libya, it is Pentapolis, it is contiguous to Africa, and it pertains more to the East. Even in the distribution of the provinces of the Emperors, recognize: the Eastern Emperor sends a judge to Cyrene. I briefly respond. Where the part of Donatus is, Cyrene is not found; where Cyrene is, the part of Donatus is not found. Manifest truth convicts error. Let him give me Cyrene, where the part of Donatus is; let him give me the part of Donatus, where Cyrene is. For it is clear, Brothers, in Pentapolis the Catholic Church is present, and the part of Donatus is not there. But let us securely mock the pitiable, and pity the laughable. What do you say? You honor this Cyrenian greatly because he carried the cross of the Lord and say he was an African. He is Eastern. For Libya is called in two ways, either that which is properly Africa, or that part of the East which is contiguous to Africa, and entirely bordering on it. But let the Cyrenian be African. Do you consider him blessed because he was compelled to carry the cross? How much better perhaps would another say that the Church of Christ remained in Arimathea? Because that rich Joseph from Arimathea, having the kingdom of God before his eyes, not compelled, not forced, came to the Lord’s cross. When others were afraid, he asked Pilate to bury the Lord’s body, took it down from the wood, attended to the funeral, laid it in the sepulchre, and was praised in the Gospel. Because therefore this pious man from Arimathea exhibited such devotion to the Lord’s body, did the Church remain in Arimathea? Or if you are more pleased by being compelled, that is, being forced to carry the cross, then the Catholic Emperors rightly compel you to unity.

Sermons - Sermon 47

SERMO 47

DE OVIBUS In Ezekiel 34:17-31

17 "As for you, my flock, thus says the Lord GOD: Behold, I judge between sheep and sheep, between rams and male goats. 18 Is it too little for you to have eaten up the good pasture, that you must tread down with your feet the rest of your pasture? And to have drunk of the clear waters, that you must muddy the rest with your feet? 19 And must my sheep eat what you have trodden with your feet, and drink what you have muddied with your feet?

20 "Therefore thus says the Lord GOD to them: Behold, I myself will judge between the fat sheep and the lean sheep. 21 Because you push with side and shoulder, and thrust at all the weak with your horns, till you have scattered them abroad, 22 I will rescue my flock; they shall no longer be a prey. And I will judge between sheep and sheep. 23 And I will set up over them one shepherd, my servant David, and he shall feed them: he shall feed them and be their shepherd. 24 And I, the LORD, will be their God, and my servant David shall be prince among them; I, the LORD, have spoken.

25 "I will make with them a covenant of peace and banish wild beasts from the land, so that they may dwell securely in the wilderness and sleep in the woods. 26 And I will make them and the places round about my hill a blessing; and I will send down the showers in their season; they shall be showers of blessing. 27 And the trees of the field shall yield their fruit, and the earth shall yield its increase, and they shall be secure in their land; and they shall know that I am the LORD, when I break the bars of their yoke and deliver them from the hand of those who enslaved them. 28 They shall no more be a prey to the nations, nor shall the beasts of the land devour them; they shall dwell securely, and none shall make them afraid. 29 And I will provide for them renowned plantations so that they shall no more be consumed with hunger in the land, and no longer suffer the reproach of the nations. 30 And they shall know that I, the LORD their God, am with them, and that they, the house of Israel, are my people, says the Lord GOD. 31 And you are my sheep, the sheep of my pasture, and I am your God, says the Lord GOD."

God made for Himself sheep which He might pasture. The words we have sung contain our profession because we are the sheep of God. Nor do we improperly ask with tears for His mercy, whose sheep we are. For we have said: Let us weep before the Lord who made us, for He is the Lord our God. Let no one despair, thinking they cannot be heard when they are weeping, for a certain necessity of Him hearing us is recalled: Because He is the Lord our God, who made us. He is our God; we are the people of His pasture and the sheep of His hands. Human shepherds, or even heads of families who are masters of the sheep, did not themselves make the sheep they have, nor did they create the sheep they feed. But our Lord God, because He is God and creator, made for Himself the sheep He possesses and feeds. Nor does another establish those He Himself feeds, nor does another feed those He Himself established. Therefore, let us weep before Him. For we are not in a good state when we are in this world. For when we please the Lord in the land of the living, then our tears will be wiped away, and we will praise Him who has freed us from the bonds of death, our feet from stumbling, our eyes from tears, that we may please the Lord in the land of the living, because it is difficult to please Him in the land of the dead. But there is also a way to please Him here, by imploring His mercy upon us, abstaining from sins as much as we can, and confessing and lamenting where we cannot. Thus we are in this life hoping for another life, weeping in hope—in fact, weeping in experience—and rejoicing in hope. The overseers of the church are sheep and shepherds.

Therefore, having confessed in this song that we are his sheep, the people of his pasture, the sheep of his hands, let us hear what he speaks to us as to his sheep. Recently, in the previous reading, he was speaking to shepherds. But in the present and today's reading, he speaks to the sheep. Thus, in those earlier words of his, we listened with trembling, and you with security. What, then, in these words of today? Shall we, in turn, hear with security, and you with trembling? By no means. First, because even if we are shepherds, a shepherd not only listens with trembling to what is said to shepherds, but also to what is said to the sheep. For if he listens securely to what is said to the sheep, he has no care for the sheep. Moreover, as we already mentioned to your Charity, there are two things to be considered in us: one, that we are Christians, and the other, that we are appointed leaders. As appointed leaders, we are counted among the shepherds, if we are good. But as Christians, we too are sheep with you. Therefore, whether the Lord speaks to shepherds or to sheep, we ought to listen to everything with trembling, and let not anxiety depart from our hearts, so that we may weep before the Lord who made us.

Let us hear then, Brothers, from where the Lord rebukes the wicked sheep, and what He promises to His sheep. And you, He says, are my sheep, thus says the Lord God. First, how great is the happiness to be the flock of God, if anyone considers, Brothers, even in these tears and in these tribulations he conceives great joy. For indeed he is not in that flock, whom wolves can ravage, or whose slumber robbers can capture. For it is said to him: You who shepherd Israel, of whom it is said: He who keeps Israel will neither slumber nor sleep. He therefore watches over us while we are awake, and watches while we sleep. If then, for a human shepherd, the flock of a human is secure, how great should our security be, with God shepherding us, not only because He shepherds us, but also because He made us?

Let us heed the judgment of the judge. Our one concern that is imposed upon us: to hear the voice of the shepherd. And now is the time to listen, because he has not yet taken up the time of judging. He who speaks, now remains silent. For he speaks in commandment, he is silent in judgment. Therefore, he says in a certain place: "I was silent, will I always be silent?" How did he remain silent when he said this very thing by speaking? He who says, "I was silent," is not silent, because even to say this itself: "I was silent," is not to be silent. Therefore, I hear you speaking in so many commandments, in so many sacraments, in so many pages, in so many books. Finally, I hear in this very thing that you say: "I was silent, will I always be silent?" How then did you remain silent? Because I do not yet say: "Come, you blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom." And I do not yet say to others: "Depart into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels." And these very things I do not yet say, as now I proclaim. The last sentence which the judge will pronounce, writing with his own hand in the scroll, beyond which sentence nothing more will be judged, the parties do not hear: it is written as they go out. Both parties are astonished and uncertain, wondering which side or for whom the sentence of the judge will proceed. A great secret of the judge, from which the term 'secretarium' is derived. Great fear for those who are involved in the case; what he thinks and what he writes is unknown. And he is a man, and those about whom he judges are indeed men. But He is our God, and we are the people of His pasture and the sheep of His hand. And though He is the Creator, we the creature; He immortal, we mortal; He invisible, we visible; He did not wish to hide from us in this life what ultimate sentence He will declare in the end. No one says beforehand "I condemn" who wishes to condemn; no one says beforehand "I strike" who wishes to strike. The patience of God leads us to repentance.

Great is therefore his gentleness, great is his mercy, great is his meekness. But if we do not abuse his patience to our wickedness, and, while he bears our sins, we increase sins upon sins as if to make a burden for him; as if he who does not labor while he bears should bear more. Our sins, which he still spares because he still endures, show his patience and accumulate our burden. Do you not know, he says, that the patience of God leads you to repentance? That is the patience which he calls taciturnity, about which he says: I have held my peace, will I always be silent? Therefore, when he reproved some and said: You who preach not to steal, do you steal? You who say not to commit adultery, do you commit adultery? And so forth, he said: Or do you despise the riches of his goodness and forbearance? Because he is good, because he is patient, because he sees and is silent, because he sees and endures, do you think him unjust? Do you not know that the patience of God leads you to repentance? And see if he will always be silent who is now silent. But you, he says, according to the hardness of your heart and your impenitent heart, are treasuring up for yourself wrath in the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God, who will render to each according to his works. Therefore, he is silent, but will he always be silent? Again, after enumerating some sins, he says: You have done these things, and I have been silent, that is: you have done these things and I have not avenged; you have suspected iniquity, that I will be like you. And truly, many think this, when they have done many evils and see nothing bad happen to them; not only do their evil deeds please them, but they also think they please God: impiety proceeds so far that an impious contemptor considers God to be like himself. And when God admonishes, teaches, exhorts, reproves, to bring to his likeness, not only does he not follow the likeness of God, but he wants to lead God to his own likeness. This is an iniquity greater than the sins themselves, from which he does not correct himself. You have suspected iniquity, that I will be like you. And what follows? I will reprove you. Why this? I have kept silent, will I always be silent? Therefore, brothers, since this sermon, which proceeds from the mouth of God, terrifies both me and you—for we all have one good hope in him, and we must all equally fear that if we offend him, we may not find what we hoped for, but experience what we have despised—let us all hear as the sheep of God, while he speaks who is silent, while he admonishes us, and not yet judges us who made us, while there is still time to listen, while it is permitted to read.

Let us endure the tares mixed with the wheat. And you, he said, my sheep, this says the Lord God: Behold, I judge between sheep and sheep, and rams and goats. What do goats do here in the flock of God? In the same pastures, at the same fountains, and yet goats destined for the left mix with the right, and first endure before being separated. And here the patience of the sheep is exercised in the likeness of the patience of God. For the separation will be by Him, of some to the left, of others to the right. But now He is silent, you want to speak. But how do I say: You want to speak? Because He is silent. From the vengeance of judgment, not from the word of reproof. He does not yet separate, you want to separate. He tolerates mixtures who sowed. If you want the wheat to be purified before the threshing, by your wind, you will be badly winnowed. It was allowed for the servants to say: Will you, we go, and gather them? For they were upset, seeing the tares, and grieved that tares were mixed with the good seed. And they said: Did you not sow good seed? Where then did the tares come from? He gave the reason where they came from; yet he did not allow them to be pulled up before the time. Although the servants were indignant against the tares, they sought counsel and command from the lord. They displeased in the midst of the crop, but the servants saw that if they did something of their own will in plucking the tares, they would themselves be numbered among the tares. They waited for the Lord's command, they sought the command of their king: Will you, we go, and gather them? And He said: No. And He gave the reason: Lest while you gather the tares, you root up also the wheat with them. He calmed them from their indignation, nor left them in pain. For it seemed grave to the servants to have tares among the wheat, and indeed it was grave. But there is one condition of the field, another of the barn at rest. Endure, for you were born for this. Endure, for perhaps you were endured. If you have always been good, have mercy; if you were once bad, do not lose understanding. And who is always good? More easily, if God diligently examines you, He will find you even now bad rather than you always good. Therefore, these tares among the wheat must be endured, goats among the rams, kids among the sheep. But what about the wheat? At the time of the harvest, He says, I will say to the reapers: Gather first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them, but gather my wheat into the barn. Therefore, the conjunction of the field will pass, the harvest separation will come. Now the Lord requires patience from us which He proposes in Himself, saying to you: "Surely if I wanted to judge now, would I judge unjustly? If I wanted to judge now, could I be deceived? If I, who always judge rightly and cannot be deceived, defer my judgment; you, ignorant of how you shall be judged, dare to judge so hastily?" Brothers, see how, to the servants wanting to uproot the tares before the time, this work was not granted even at the harvest. For He says: At the time of the harvest I will say to the reapers. He did not say: I will say to you. But what, if the servants themselves shall be the reapers? No. For explaining everything individually: The reapers, He says, are angels. Therefore, man enclosed in flesh, carrying flesh, or perhaps entirely flesh, that is, flesh in body, carnal in mind, do you dare to usurp a foreign office which will not be yours even at the harvest? This about separating the tares. What about the goats? When the Son of Man comes, and all the angels with Him, He will sit on the throne of His glory, and all the nations will be gathered before Him, and He will separate them, as a shepherd separates sheep from kids. And He will come, and He will separate. The harvest will come, and the separation will occur. Now, therefore, is not the time for separation, but for endurance. We do not say these things, Brothers, so that diligence in correction may sleep. Indeed, so that we do not come to that judgment incautiously, and, blinded by negligence, suddenly find ourselves on the left, discipline must be exercised, judgment must not be expedited.

Let us fear judgment.

What then does the Lord say? Behold, I will judge between one sheep and another, and between rams and goats. I judge. Great security, He Himself judges, let the good be secure. No adversary corrupts their judge, no advocate deceives Him, no witness mocks Him. But as much as the good are secure, so should the wicked fear. He judges in such a manner that nothing is hidden from Him. For does God, in judging, seek witnesses through whom He may learn who you are? From where can He be deceived about who you are, who knew what you would be in the future? He questions you, not another about you. The Lord, He says, interrogates the righteous and the wicked. He questions you, not to learn from you, but to confound you. Therefore, having such a judge, whom no one can deceive against us, nor anyone for us, let us act so that we may not fear His coming judgment, but await and desire it. For do crops fear being put into the granary? Rather, they long for it and desire it earnestly. Do sheep fear being placed on the right? Rather, nothing seems as slow to them as when it is done. Truly, they say from the heart and with complete sincerity, when they pray: Thy kingdom come. But in these words, the wicked man's heart trembles and his tongue stammers. How then do you say: Thy kingdom come? Behold, it will come. What kind of person will it find you to be? Therefore, act in such a way that you pray with confidence. And if there is any error and sin in your conscience, you have in the prayer itself a cure: Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. For God wished for you to be a debtor in such a way that you have a debtor. Indeed, by sinning you make yourself an enemy of God, but pay attention lest you perhaps have an enemy. Forgive, and you will be forgiven. What you do who can be found in sin, He who can judge no one of sin will do to you. But if as a man in sin, you do not spare your sinner, you neither consider your own condition in them, nor dread the future fall of your own frailty; what will He do to you, who judges so securely, like one who never sins?

Let us anticipate the face of God in confession.

Therefore, effort must be made for a pure conscience. And if perhaps any scruple is present, let us prevent His face by confession. Now in the psalm, when it was sung, we heard: "Let us prevent His face by confession." Let us prevent Him, lest He prevent us Himself. After confession, vengeance will not follow, if even you do not repeat iniquity after confession. Prevent before you are prevented. For it is certain that He is coming. You will perish if you do not desire what is to come. For even if you are unwilling, He will come. Will you delay Him by refusing to have Him come? Just as He knew the hour when He ought to be judged, so He knows the hour when He ought to judge. He will come, you see to what you will become. Today there is a scruple, today let there be confession, today let the scruple be renounced. Today it is forgiven, today it is released. It is not for you to say: "God defers forgiveness." You do not defer your medicine. For you have something in your soul that torments you. And if it torments, it also troubles. Surely, if there were any stone in your home that offends your eyes, you would command it to be removed, especially if you were about to receive a somewhat greater guest in your home. So when you invoke God, you call Him within you. How will He come to you, to whom you have not cleansed the place where you will receive Him? But are you less able to remove from your heart what you have made for yourself? Invoke Him to cleanse it; invite Him to enter it. However, do now what you are going to do, while He speaks by advising and remains silent by judging.

God judges between sheep and sheep.

He mentions goats, he mentions rams, and he judges between them. And what does he say to them? Is it not enough for you that you fed on good pasture? And you trampled the rest of your pasture with your feet, and you drank the water that settled - that is, which was pure and tranquil - and you disturbed the rest with your feet: and my sheep fed on what was trampled by your feet, and drank the water disturbed by your feet. What does this mean? The pastures of God are good, and the springs of God are pure. We have these in the Holy Scriptures. So who are those who drink from what is tranquil and feed from what is clean, and trample the remnants and disturb the water so that other sheep take the trampled grass and drink the disturbed water? And surely you see that this displeases the shepherd, who says as these things are done: I judge between one sheep and another, surely so that these things may not happen. There are many who learn quietly, teach disruptively, and while they have a patient teacher, they become fierce with the learner. For who does not know how quietly the Scripture itself teaches us? So then someone comes, reads the precepts of God, reads and understands, understands quietly drinking from what is tranquil, feeding from what is green and clean. Someone else comes to hear something from him. He becomes indignant, disrupts, accusing the slowness of someone understanding later, making the disturbed one understand less what he could have heard quietly. May God remove delay, grant truth. And I do not say this, Brothers, because there is never a time when hardness must be corrected, which such great tranquility of truth itself corrects, saying: O foolish and slow of heart to believe! If these things are done with that love by which we wish to instill care in people, to incite diligence of attention, and perhaps to clear the cloud of their mind, which they have contracted from worldly cares, and perhaps while thinking about other useless things, they cannot hear what is useful. Then also, if anyone sees tardiness in themselves, it is not without reason that they are accused, so that they may ask God and dissolve the tardiness, grant the truth. For if by our negligence we understand less of what we have heard, negligence must indeed be corrected. Or if it is tardiness, when it has been accused, there will be a reason to pray to God. Therefore, such teachers should not be blamed, but those who do this with a bitter mind, with an envious mind, they trample the pastures and disturb the fountains. Whatever they may know, they want to know it in such a way that others do not know it. Men of malign mind, full of Tartarean zeal, envying not in body but in heart, they read and understood. When asked: "Does this matter much to you, should I believe these things from you? And are you worthy to read or hear these things?" Why do you disturb the water? The fountain flows for both. Why do you trample the common herbs? It did not rain because of you that they grew.

Care must be taken for good conduct before men.

There is another thing in these words; which can not be understood absurdly. There are men who think that a good conscience is sufficient for living well and do not care much about what others think of them, unaware that when a person sees a person of good conscience living carelessly, associating freely with anyone and everywhere, knowing that an idol is nothing, and yet reclining in an idol temple, that person's conscience, being weak, is built up not to what it examines, but to what it suspects. For your peer, your brother, cannot enter into your conscience, which God knows. Your conscience is before God, your behavior is before your brother. If he, suspecting something bad about you, is disturbed and built up to do something he thinks you are doing, while you live like that, what good is it that the stomach of your conscience drew pure water, and he has a disturbed behavior from your negligence?

Sometimes nothing remains to be sought except the testimony of conscience. And you hear such people, when they are reproached not to do these things, respond to us and say: "The Apostle said: If I wished to please men, I should not be the servant of Christ." And here you stir the water, trample the pastures. Consider better, lest you also stir the water for yourself, what the Apostle says: If I wished to please men, I should not be the servant of Christ. I accept it excellently, I gladly acknowledge the apostolic sentiment. But have you not read something else in the Apostle?

Please all men in all things, even as I also please all men in all things, not seeking that which is profitable for myself, but for many, that they may be saved. Have you not heard the same Apostle again? Be without offense to Jews and Gentiles, and to the Church of God. Have you not heard the same Apostle a third time? For we provide good things, not only in the sight of God but also in the sight of men. Therefore, he says: "Explain to me, then, how I should understand different and contrary things, with the Apostle saying: If I wished to please men, I should not be the servant of Christ; saying: Please all men in all things, even as I also please all men in all things; saying: This is our glory, the testimony of our conscience; saying: We provide good things not only in the sight of God but also in the sight of men." If you listen calmly, if you do not disturb the water of your mind, as much as I can, perhaps I will explain. There are rash judges, detractors, whisperers, murmurers, seeking to suspect what they do not see, even seeking to spread what they do not even suspect: what remains against such, but the testimony of our conscience? For indeed, Brothers, even in those we wish to please, we do not seek our glory, nor should we seek our glory, but their salvation, so that if we walk well, by following us they may not err. Let them be imitators of us if we are of Christ; but if we are not of Christ, let them be imitators of Christ. For he feeds his flock, and with all good pastors, he alone is, because all are in him. Therefore, we do not seek our own profit when we wish to please men, but we wish them to rejoice, and we rejoice to please them in what is good, for their benefit, not for our dignity. Against whom the Apostle said: If I wished to please men, I should not be the servant of Christ, is clear. And for whom he said: Please all men in all things, even as I also please all men in all things, is clear. Both things are clear, both things are tranquil, both things are pure, both things are undisturbed. You only feed and drink, do not trample and disturb.

Let us not place the end of good works in the praise of men. For you have surely heard the Lord Jesus Christ himself, the teacher of the Apostles: "Let your works shine before men, that they may see your good deeds and glorify your Father who is in heaven," that is, who made you as you are. For we are the people of His pasture, and the sheep of His hands. Therefore, let Him be praised who made you good if you are good, not yourself who by yourself could only be evil. Why then do you want to drive truth in the opposite direction, so that when you do something good, you want to be praised, but when you do something bad, you want the Lord to be blamed? For the one who said, "Let your works shine before men," also said in the same sermon, "Do not do your righteousness before men." Just as these seemed contradictory to you in the Apostle, so too in the Gospel. But if you do not disturb the water of your heart, here too you will recognize the peace of the Scriptures, and with them you will have peace. If, however, you do not want to have peace with them, you are complicating your own argument; they will not lose their peace. For because of those who commend themselves by boasting to men, and thus flaunt their good works so as to place the end of their good works in the praise of men, and consider the praise of men as a kind of reward for their good works, it is said of them: "Amen I say to you, they have received their reward." Against them it is said: "Beware of doing your righteousness before men." Consequently, it follows: "to be seen by them." He does not extend his intention further; here he ends. Do not do any good thing before men in such a way that you may be seen by them, so that the seeing by them is the end of your good work. Therefore, do not act so that you may be seen by them. But he does not end there, but he wants our good deeds to be seen by men, about which he says: "Let your works shine before men, that they may see your good works." He did not pause, nor did he remain here, but he led you upward from here and took you away from yourself—for you would fall if you were in yourself—and placed you where you would be safe. "Let them see," he says, "your good works, and glorify your Father who is in heaven." Do not be angry, for He is glorified. Be with Him, and you will be glorified in Him. So that no flesh might boast before Him, the Apostle says. Will we then remain without glory? No. For he himself says, "Let him who boasts, boast in the Lord." For the witness of our conscience is glory to us because it is in Him. For if our glory is such that we are pleased with ourselves and become pleasing to ourselves, a very foolish man is pleased with himself.

Therefore, let us care, Brothers, not only to live well, but also to behave well before men, and not only to strive to have a good conscience but, as much as our weakness can, as much as human frailty's vigilance allows, let us care also to do nothing that would come into evil suspicion by a weak brother, lest by eating pure herbs and drinking pure waters, we trample the pastures of God, and the weak sheep eat what is trampled and drink what is troubled. And woe to him on account of this who says: I judge between sheep and sheep. The goats will be separated from the sheep at the end. For these things the Lord God says to them: Behold, I judge between the strong sheep and the weak sheep. Let something else be said. We have already heard about those who trample the grass and disturb the waters. Let us hear another kind of evil, and a great kind of evil. Afterwards he makes no mention of the goats. He mentioned them once, so that we would know they exist. For he knows them well. Afterwards he speaks as though all are sheep. First, how he himself sees, then how we see, he has spoken. For the goats are present, and because in the end they will be separated, let it be known to the sheep: now I am discerning between sheep and sheep. Only he who could predestine, who could foresee, knows by predestination and foreknowledge the sheep and the goats. Now, because all are under the sign of Christ and all come to the grace of God, you think you are a sheep, perhaps God knows you are a goat. But listen as a sheep to what you hear: Behold, I judge between the strong sheep and the weak sheep.

Heretics scatter the sheep of God.

Since you thrust with sides and shoulders, and butted with your horns, and scattered all the weak ones, until you drove them away. Who does not understand this? Who does not shudder at it? If there are no sheep outside, the deed has not been done. But if we lament that many sheep are wandering outside, woe to those by whose sides and shoulders and horns it was done. For they would not have done these things if they were not strong sheep. Who are the strong? Those who presume on their own strength. Who are the strong? Those who glory in their own righteousness. They did not scatter the sheep, they did not send them outside except those who said they were righteous. Bold with their shoulders to thrust, because they do not bear the burden of God; wicked at the sides, conspiring friends, a company of stubbornness; horns lifted high, elevated pride. Thrust with sides and shoulders, scatter with horns, send outside what you did not gather. Indeed, the whole reason is because you are righteous and others are unrighteous, and it was unworthy for the righteous to be with the unrighteous, plainly unworthy for the wheat to be among the tares, unworthy for the sheep to graze among the goats, until the shepherd comes who will not err in separating. Are you then an angel rooting out the tares? I would not recognize you as an angel rooting out the tares, not even if the harvest had already come. Before the harvest, it is not you, but whosoever it might be, is not true. He who designated the reapers also designated the time. Men might also call themselves angels. We may perhaps find in Scriptures that men have been called angels, but I still look to the time of harvest. You can call yourself an angel, but you cannot shorten the time of the harvest. Therefore, you falsely claim that you are, because the time has not yet come when you are. Hence, when it comes, and the true reapers have been sent, I do not know where they will find you, whether to be gathered into the barn or to be bound and cast into the fire. Therefore, I say “perhaps”, because I do not dare to judge. Now I grieve for you being outside. Whether you will be inside in the future, I do not know. The pride of the Donatists must be condemned.

Listen instead to another testimony of Scripture, written about you while you live, and do not desire to uproot the weeds when it is not the time, but you yourself return inward when the time is right. Another Scripture of God says: "A wicked son declares himself righteous." These are your shoulders and flanks and horns. Wickedly strong, how much better you would be if you were weak. Wickedly strong, but not healthy. Wickedly strong, the frenzied man strikes and kills even the doctor. You say you are perfect in order to create an imperfection. How much better, how much more useful you would be if you were weak so that He who knows the imperfect may perfect you. The Apostle Paul, the chosen vessel, lest he be too elated by revelations - which we would not dare to say unless we believed him saying it - said, "To prevent me from being too elated by the abundance of revelations, there was given to me a thorn in my flesh, a messenger of Satan to buffet me." He said that he was buffeted so that he would not lift up horns. Therefore, he said, "Three times I pleaded with the Lord to take it away from me. But He said to me, 'My grace is sufficient for you, for my power is made perfect in weakness.' So then, how much more useful is the weakness which is perfected than that strength which drives away and excludes the sheep. You are a wicked son, you declare yourself righteous. A wicked son declares himself righteous but does not cleanse his departure.

Take heed, my brothers, to a brief sentence in number of words, but immense in weight of truth. He declares himself righteous in order to depart and exclude. He declares himself righteous, but he is wicked: therefore, he does not cleanse his departure. What does it mean that he does not cleanse? He does not purify, he does not defend, he does not excuse. Why did you separate? Why did you leave? Why does your heart tremble when you hear from the divine books: "They went out from us, but they were not of us," if indeed that wicked strength by which you push, strike, and scatter the sheep of God allows trembling to reach your heart? For certainly, when you hear: "They went out from us, but they were not of us," he was speaking who was in the Church. The Church is spread throughout the whole world; what are you doing outside? For not I, but the prophets, the apostles, and the Lord Himself announced the Church spread throughout the whole world. Just now, when a Psalm was being read, we heard: "The Lord will not reject His people" - as if being asked - "for the ends of the earth are in His hand." He does not reject them, and you drive them away. You push, you scatter, you exclude. You accuse traitors but do not prove it. These are the horns of one who scatters, not the meekness of one who tends.

Behold, the people of God at the ends of the earth. Behold, the people of God groaning and weeping before God who made them, saying in the Psalm to the Lord before whom they weep: "From the ends of the earth I cried to You when my heart was anguished." See how he humbles himself in the anguish of his heart. And what does he say has been done for him? "You have exalted me on the rock." You have exalted me on Christ the Rock, not cast me down from Mount Donatus.

Go now, and toss your horns, spread your flanks, inflate your shoulders and push the sheep, and say: "I am righteous." The Scripture will answer you: "Wicked, not righteous. A wicked son declares himself righteous." If you are righteous, why do you go outside? Why do you throw out others? What do you do with those you throw outside? Did you flee the goats like a sheep? It is better to be separated to the right by the shepherd than to be confuted on the left with them. They were goats, you were a sheep, you would graze with the goats. What did the pastures, the waters offend you? Finally, what did the shepherd himself offend you, who for a time mingled both flocks, who, even when He does good to each at will, has reserved separation for the end?

Even if He were to separate now, He would not err. He defers separation to the end, you separate before the time. You do not await the end, not knowing when your end shall be. Why is this unless that those you accused as goats, you falsely accused? For if you had truly accused, you would not have separated. Your separation is their purification. They were weeds, why did you want to separate them before the time? Being mixed with them, you would be wheat, rooted in the same field, watered by the same rain. Why did you leave then? Do you find a reason? Whom you accuse, you do not convict. By going out before the time and separating yourself, you convict yourself. See that you are a wicked son. You declare yourself righteous, but you do not cleanse your departure. I do not say to you: You are rather a traitor. If I say it, I can easily prove it. Yet I refuse to say it because your actions, not you, did it. I do not attribute to you the deeds of others, even of your people. I look at your deed. I accuse that you are outside; I accuse your departure. I remove all other things that can be said against you. I omit your drunkenness, usury, and interest upon interest. I omit the throngs and furies of the Circumcelliones. I omit all these and whatever other things I cannot enumerate. Not all among you may do these things. Let him who does not do these there, who disapproves of what is done there come forward, let him speak. I do not impute to him the crime of another; let him cleanse his departure. You see rightly that you are told: "A wicked son declares himself righteous." For the Lord says, who speaks the truth: "A wicked son declares himself righteous." Not I, but He. However, does He want me to call you righteous? Let him come, let him bring forth good fruits in the peace of the Catholic Church, let him keep them in the peace of the Catholic Church, because also...

There is no fruit where there is no endurance. And, he says, they will bear fruit with endurance. Do you want to see how you have been struck by hail? Listen from another place: Woe to those who have lost endurance. The true marks of the Church of Christ are not found among the Donatists.

Just imagine someone thinking, as it often happens, where a Christian might be. He is moved to be a Christian, he notices that humankind converges upon the name of Christ. Proposing no temporal benefit, he wishes to be a Christian, not to gain a greater friend, not to obtain the wife he desires, not to escape some worldly pressure, although many even entering for such reasons are corrected once they enter. But let us consider someone thinking about his soul, and wanting to be a Christian. He notices where he sees two parties, he inquires the reasons why they have separated themselves from the others. They respond: "We have separated ourselves as the righteous from sinners," as if speaking to a blind man, hearing what they say, not seeing what they do. So if, observing their behavior, and those things I mentioned just a moment ago, he says to them: "I ask you, you call yourselves righteous, and therefore you contend that you rightly separated yourselves. Why are such and such people among you?" And they perhaps because they do not dare to deny, because those things are pointed out which are visible to the eyes say:

"Indeed, there are such people among us, but are we all like that?"

Excellent. Therefore I see you outside with sinners. Why not inside? For the reward of your separation was to not live with a sinner. If you were outside in such a way that you did not have those you claim to have fled from, I would bear your separation in some way. Therefore, let him who desires to be a Christian take heed where he is a Christian. He sees those separated as if from sinners, yet full of sinners. Again, let him take heed to the Church of Christ according to the commendable life of human morals, according to which morals he can even, coming from the world, somewhat judge. Let him see here some sober, some drunken, some patient poor, some eager for the plunder of other people's goods, and other such things. He sees this here, he sees that there. Let him now attend to God, what He says about His Church. He finds the Lord saying through all nations His Church. He also finds God in that parable of the tares saying: The field is this world. Not the field is Africa, but this world. Throughout the whole world is the wheat, throughout the whole world are the tares - yet the field is the world, the sower is the Son of Man, the reapers are angels, not the leaders of the Circumcellions - both to grow until the harvest, not the tares to grow and the wheat to decrease, but both to grow until the harvest. What harvest? Listen to him: The harvest is the end of the world. Hearing these things clearly, and rightly judging, what does he say? "I will not be in that division. I will be here, and I will be good in the name of him to whom I belong. And I will be good, not making myself good, but expecting to be made so by Him, not calling myself good and just, but desiring to be called so by Him." He enters, becomes Catholic. Behold, he washes away his entrance, you also wash away your exit. You cannot: for the evil son himself calls himself just, yet does not wash away his exit. The bridegroom is in heaven, the bride in the whole earth.

You pushed with side and shoulder, and with your horns you struck, and you scattered all that was weak, until you had driven them away. And I will save my sheep. Just as their wickedness and cruelty are detestable, so is the mercy of our shepherd, truly our God, praiseworthy: He will save His sheep. Perhaps, my Brethren, although through his least servants, perhaps through unworthy ones, He does this, when we say this: Let Him save His sheep, let them hear the voice of their shepherd and follow Him. Do not seek the Church from the mouth of men. Seek it from the mouth of God, seek it from the mouth of Christ. He who says that someone is impious is impious, he who says that someone is just is just, he who says that someone is a sheep is a sheep, he who says that someone is a goat is a goat. He is the truth, let Him speak, let the Church be sought from Him. Tell us, Lord, where is your Church? And He to all: "You know where I am." Let all respond: "In heaven at the right hand of the Father." "Whole faith: this I taught, this I sowed, but I sowed through the world. When you, He says, confess me in heaven, that Psalm surely comes into your mind: Be exalted above the heavens, O God. Are you seeking the Church? Read what follows: And your glory above all the earth." There, Brethren, where it is said: Be exalted above the heavens, God, concerning Christ rising and ascending, there it immediately follows: And your glory above all the earth. The bridegroom is in heaven, the bride is on earth. He is above all the heavens, she is above all the earth. O heretic, you believe what you do not see in heaven, you deny what you see on earth! Therefore, let this be said, let this be heard: Let Him save His sheep. And I will save, He says, my sheep, and they shall no longer be a prey, and I will judge between sheep and sheep.

Christ, whom David foretold, is the true shepherd. And I will raise up over them one shepherd. Had He not said earlier in the reading: I shall shepherd? Now He raises up one shepherd, the one who shepherds. Was He perhaps weary of shepherding within such a short interval of reading and raised a shepherd to whom He entrusted the care of the sheep, that He Himself might be secure? Let us hear whom He calls a shepherd; and there we understand why even He, the shepherd, even with the raising of this shepherd, shepherds and shepherds alone. I will raise up over them one shepherd, and my servant David will shepherd them, he will shepherd them. It quickly becomes clear to you, Brothers, if you recognize the times, that this is a prophecy about Christ coming to humanity from the seed of David. This prophet Ezekiel was during the time of the captivity which occurred with the migration of the people to Babylon. There are fourteen generations from the time of David until the time of this migration. Look how long afterward it says: And David will shepherd them. If this were said in the time of Noah, or in the time of Abraham or in the time of Moses, or at least in the time of Saul himself, whom David succeeded in the kingdom, we would rightly understand this to be said of David the son of Jesse, that he would be the shepherd of God's flock, to whom the people were entrusted during his reign. But now David had already reigned, he had already left this life, he had already been gathered to his fathers, he was already resting for his merit. What does it mean when He says: I will raise up David and make him their one shepherd, if not that David is the one who comes from the seed of David? So how does God raise up a shepherd for us? Which one shepherd? And my servant David will shepherd them. He has already been shepherding us for a long time. Now His servant David shepherds us. Why as if another? For when He Himself was shepherding, God was shepherding. And when God was shepherding, the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit were shepherding. Now He is raised up and becomes as another shepherd. But not another. Not another according to the form of God, because in the form of God He and the Father are one God. But in the form of a servant He is raised up as another to shepherd, because the Father is greater. Hear one shepherding, and Christ shepherding: I and the Father are one. Hear Christ shepherding being raised up: The Father is greater than I. Therefore, one shepherds; because when He was in the form of God, He did not consider it robbery to be equal with God. But He is raised up to shepherd because He emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant. This is what the words themselves testify here: My servant David will shepherd them. A servant, in the form of a servant. A servant, because He emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men, and being found in appearance as a man. He humbled Himself, becoming obedient unto death, even death on a cross. Therefore let Him be raised up to shepherd. For which reason, it says, God exalted Him from the dead and gave Him the name which is above every name. Now having raised up His servant David, having raised up the form of a servant which He placed at His right hand, He gave Him the name which is above every name. See how He shepherds, how broadly He shepherds: That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of those in heaven, on earth, and under the earth. To what narrow part are you casting the wide possessor with heretical vanity? Do you trust so much in your proud shoulders and horns that you do not gather to the shepherd, but also endeavor to exclude the shepherd from the flock? My servant David will shepherd them. Listen, sheep, to David shepherding you. Hear the voice of your shepherd David, not the voice of robbers, not the howls of wolves. My servant David will shepherd them. He will shepherd them. Oh commendation! He will shepherd them. Let no one say they shepherd except Him: He will shepherd them. Whoever wishes to shepherd, let them shepherd in Him, because He will shepherd them. God was saying a little earlier: I shall shepherd. Now He says: He shall shepherd them. Let the Son reply and say to us: "Both are truly said. I and the Father are one. The one who says, 'I shall shepherd,' does not lie in saying, 'He shall shepherd,' and when He says, 'He shall shepherd,' He does not lie in saying, 'I shall shepherd.' Do you not believe, He says, that I am in the Father and the Father is in Me? Philip, whoever has seen Me has seen the Father. It is rightly said: I shall shepherd, it is rightly said: He shall shepherd. There is a distinction, not a separation, He shall shepherd them. Do not be frightened, sheep. He does not abandon you who said, 'He shall shepherd them.' God shepherds, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, He Himself shepherds. But the form of a servant had to be distinguished, not separated and alienated and constituted as a different person. The Creator received the creature into Himself; the Creator was not changed into the creature. He took on what He was not, without losing what He was. The shepherd is Christ, the shepherd is also the Father. My servant David will shepherd them. He will shepherd them, and he will be their shepherd, and I, the Lord, will be their God. Pay attention, brothers. Observe the unity of the Godhead and the distribution of persons, so that we do not say that the Son is He who is the Father, or that He is the Father who is the Son. Behold, He said: He will shepherd them: who had just said: I will shepherd them. And he says, He will be their shepherd, and I, the Lord, will be their God. Explain to us, Lord. Let no one disturb the water; what is pure springs from a pure source, let us drink. For why do you say each individually: He will be our shepherd, and I will be their God, as if He is our shepherd, you are our God? Why, Lord, are you not our shepherd and He is not our God? Listen calmly, be meek in hearing the word so that you may understand. For perhaps now some ear, perceiving differently and corroded by heretical venom, hears me and mocks me for saying that the Father and the Son are one God, while it does not mock the thousands of brothers having one soul. And it says to me: "See, God openly says: My servant David will be their shepherd, whom you yourself understood to be Christ, nor can it be understood otherwise. For you gave the reason that these things were said when David was already asleep. Therefore, Christ will be their shepherd; I, the Lord, He says, will be their God. He [David] will be the shepherd, He [God] will be the God. So explain to me what: I will shepherd." Who said: I will shepherd? Certainly, it was God speaking, saying: I will shepherd. How did He not separate Christ in shepherding, when He said: I will shepherd so He did not separate Christ from the deity when He said: I am God. Behold, Christ is shepherd, the Father is shepherd. Thus the Father is God, Christ is God. Just as you do not separate the Father from shepherd Christ, so you do not separate Christ from God the Father. The Father has compassion in shepherding with the Son, the Son has equality of divinity with the Father. But unless He spoke thus, you would think that He is the Father who is the Son. Therefore, He reminded you both of the unity of the Godhead and the distribution of persons, so that what He says: He will shepherd, and I will be their God; not separating Himself from the Son shepherding, nor separating the Son from Himself ruling, and you understand God the Father in the Son, and you understand the shepherd Father in the Son. I, He says, the Lord will be their God, and my servant David will be the prince among them. Why: among them? Because the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us. The prince among them. Hence also the mediator of God and men, because He is God with the Father, because He is man with men. Not a man mediator without deity; not God mediator without humanity. Behold the mediator. Divinity without humanity is not a mediator, humanity without divinity is not a mediator. But between sole divinity and sole humanity, the human divinity and divine humanity of Christ are mediators. And my servant David will be the prince among them. I, the Lord, have spoken: not some heretic. I, the Lord, have spoken. The testament of God must prevail altogether. And I will establish with them a covenant of peace: through Him indeed who said: My peace I give to you, my peace I leave with you. This is our Father's covenant, it is a covenant of peace. Any inheritance is divided among co-inheritors; the inheritance of peace cannot be divided. Our peace is Christ. Peace makes both one, not two out of one. For He Himself is our peace, who made both one. The covenant of God is peace as an inheritance. It should be possessed by harmonious partners, not divided among those who quarrel. And I will establish with them a covenant of peace. Be watchful, heretics, listen to the shepherd's covenant of peace, come to peace. You are angry with Christian Emperors, because your testaments were not considered valid in your homes. Behold how fitting the punishment is. And why is your testament not valid in your home? What is it? How much is it? This pain is a warning, not yet a condemnation. For God wished to sympathize with the testament of His peace. You lament for your testament if it does not stand in your home. Certainly, you will die, and you will not know what will happen in that house afterward. For on that day, all his thoughts will perish, and he will no longer know his place. Therefore, you will not know what will happen in your house when you are dead; yet you lament that your testament does not stand in your house. Christ died and rose again, looked down from heaven so that His testament might stand. Wake up from your pain, correct yourself from your torment. You know that heat is usually applied to a badly bent piece of wood. Let this pain correct you. It is not yet the flame of eternal fire. The heat of a hearth is applied to your curved heart, that it may be warned and corrected. You lament, you rightly lament, that your testament does not stand in your house. The house of God is your heart. If you want your testament to stand in your house, why do you not want God's testament to stand in His house? You leave your walls to your children, and if you knew your children would divide them differently from how you arranged, you would lament. For one most vile house, for a roof about to collapse, how much care you have, how much anxiety you feel. In your burning fever, pressing illness, you resist impending death as much as you can, gasping your last words to fulfill your testament. How many legal experts do you consult, how many deceits do you inquire into, so that your testament stands against the law of the Emperor itself? From nearby, God answers you: Do not seek deceits, do not pursue litigious formulas. Do you want your testament to stand? Then let Mine stand in you. You lament because another takes your acquisition, whom you did not want. What concerning my inheritance so wide, so pious? In your seed all nations will be blessed, I said to my servant, God says to you, and he believed when he did not yet see these things. You see, and you deny. Behold, he kept the covenant made, you tear it apart when it is open. For then the covenant was kept, when it was heard. Then it was open, when it was fulfilled. The covenant has been kept up to your hands. Certainly, you wish to be an heir. Does your co-heir so contend with you as to say to you: "Take this…"

"A part for me, that one," or: "Take the smaller and I the larger"? It does not say: "Let us divide it together," but: "Let us have it together." For this indeed he who made the will wanted. Open and read. And you cry: "So that it would not be burned, I did this; so that it would not be burned, I saved it." You saved it so it would not be burned? Open and see because you saved it from being burned, even though I refuse to believe that you saved it whom I see not keeping what is commanded. And I shall make with them a covenant of peace.

Let us ask if there is love within the heart. And I will exterminate the evil beasts from the land. Beasts, enemies of the covenant of peace. It is said of these beasts in another psalm: Rebuke the beasts of the reed. What does it mean: beasts of the reed? It refers to beasts opposed to the holy Scripture, because it is written by a reed. I will exterminate the evil beasts from the land: and they will inhabit the desert in hope. What does it mean: in the desert? In solitude. What does it mean: in solitude? Within the conscience. Great solitude, where not only does no human pass, but not even sees. There let us dwell in hope, because not yet in reality. For indeed everything that is ours externally fluctuates with the storms and temptations of the world. There is an inner desert; there let us question our faith. Let us question whether love is there within. Let us see if not the lips speak, but also the heart, when we say: Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors. If it truly sounds, if truly we speak where no human sees, there is the desert where we rest in hope. Because all this tribulation passes, and what was hope will become reality, and all that is ours will be in reality. For we will then be visible to ourselves and our thoughts will not be hidden, and conscience will no longer be a desert, because all will be known to each other and they will not have their thoughts unknown, when the Lord comes and illuminates the hidden things of darkness; and he will manifest the thoughts of the heart, and then praise will be to each one from God. Now you see two men in tribulation, you cannot see their heart. Perhaps one is tormented in conscience, another rests in conscience, just as in the desert, in hope. And they will inhabit the desert in hope: and they will have rest, that is, peace as if their senses are alienated from all the noise of the world, they will rest within themselves, in streams. In that very inner desert, there are certain streams flowing from memory, divine liquids gushing from the mind of one holding and recollecting the Scripture. For what you have read, what you have heard, if you have committed it to memory pure and clear and holy, when you begin to rest in that inner desert, that is, in good conscience, it will be distilled from the inner parts of your mind, and in some way, the memory of God’s word will flow, and you will rest with others in hope and say: "It is true, it is well with me, this is my hope, this God has promised me, He does not lie, I am secure." And this security is rest in the streams. And they will have rest in the streams. And I will give them the blessing around my hill. Although it is a mountain, although it is a hill, around it may it be well with us. The hill itself is Christ. For thus He Himself is in our midst, we are around Him. For He had long ago said: David a ruler in their midst. And because He is a ruler, therefore He is a hill: gentle, not steep and difficult to ascend, but only if one does not place his feet from on high. And I will give them the blessing around my hill: and I will send rain in its season, the rain of the word of God. For there is also a bad rain, which brings down a house established on sand and for which it is great that a house founded on rock may resist. For it is the rain of temptation, seeking ruin, not watering the earth. Such will not be the rain which the Lord says He will send. For what does He say? Showers of blessing shall be. The mentioned rain made you suspicious: the showers will be of blessing, not of temptation. Showers of blessing shall be. Our land will yield its fruit. And see where that rain benefits. And the trees that are in the field will give their fruit. In the field, on a certain plain not arduous, in a certain ease of life. A certain ease of this life, having nothing arduous in it, laborious, difficult, he called a field. Such is the life of many faithful in the Church of God, having spouses, children, their homes. They are like trees in the field, able to ascend nothing arduous. But when they receive the rain, these trees also will give their fruit. The fruit of these trees is: Break your bread to the hungry, and bring the needy without shelter into your house. To such trees, the Apostle was saying: Not because I seek the gift, but I seek the fruit. And the trees that are in the field will give their fruit: and if they do not have greater fruit, yet they do have their own fruit. And the earth will yield its offspring: the whole earth. And they shall inhabit their land. Now fields, hills, mountains will give their offspring. What can the field do? What can the hill do? What can the mountain do? Let only the farmer be recognized. And they shall inhabit their land in hope. You see that he promises those things which he gives us in this time. As long as he says, in hope, I still understand it in this time. For when we have arrived at the promises, there will no longer be hope, but the reality itself will be. And they shall know that I am the Lord, when I break the yokes of their burden: the yokes which press upon their necks. Lord, break the yokes with which the heretics press the necks of the weak. For what is so narrow and pressed by a yoke, as: "Do not listen to Christ, listen to me"? Remove the yoke, allow to breathe. I do not know what you are saying. I hear the voice of my shepherd: Through all nations, beginning from Jerusalem. Allow me to follow the shepherd. Why do you press? Take the yoke from my neck, I will take up the gentle yoke of my Lord. He hears this and presses. Lord, the heretic does not want to suspend the yoke, you break the yoke. The cross of the Lord lifts up, the yoke of the heretic presses down. But they shall be broken: When I break the yokes of their burden. For they wish to impose their dominion upon men, wanting them to be under them, not under God. When I break the yokes of their burden: and I will rescue them from the hands of those who subjugated them to slavery. What is: subjugated to slavery? They forced them to sin. For everyone who commits sin is a slave to sin. See what they have persuaded them, brothers, to say: "They will give account for us. We are sheep. Wherever they lead, we follow." Are you a sheep? Listen to the shepherd, not the wolf.

Errors, differing among themselves, all agree against unity. And they will no longer be a devastation to the nations. For among all the nations, some are here, some are there. Not those there who are here, but nevertheless there are not lacking those who, pressing the necks of the faithful with forks, neither here nor there. They disagree among themselves, they all agree against unity. But unity does not disagree with itself, but everywhere fights against all who disagree with it, everywhere it labors. But there is rest in the desert. And they will no longer be a devastation to the nations, and the beasts of the land will no longer devour them. Hearing the voice of the shepherd, they will be rescued from the jaws of wolves. Those beasts of the reed will not devour them, wishing to interpret the Scriptures according to their own sense, turning their ears away from the open Scriptures, wanting to be heard themselves, and not to hear the Scriptures. And the beasts of the land will not devour them, and they will dwell in hope. Observe how many times it shows, because what he now promises, he promises here: he speaks of things which he still exhibits here. And there shall be none to terrify them. How will there be none to terrify them? There will be absolutely none. I trust in the Lord. Now when a man begins to say: In God I will praise the word, in the Lord I will praise the word, not in myself; they praise the word in themselves, saying: "Believe what we tell you." We praise the word in the Lord, saying: "Let us believe what is told to us by the Lord." There will be none to terrify us, because: In God I will praise the word, in the Lord I will praise the word: in God I have hoped, I will not fear what man can do to me: There will be none to terrify them. The Gentiles accuse the Christians of the discord among Christians. And I will raise up for them a plant of peace. The covenant of peace, the planting of peace. Let what God plants grow and what the heretic sows be uprooted. What God planted from Himself, from His Church; from Himself in heaven, from the Church on earth; from Himself above all heavens, from the Church through all lands; this God planted. "Come here, be in the part of Donatus, the Church is only in Africa": God did not plant it, I do not recognize the plant of God. What you speak must be uprooted, not watered. And I will raise up for them a plant of peace: and there will no longer be those who are exterminated by famine in the land. Truly, brothers, because there is famine, seek and see how great a famine they endure. And what is worse, they have food around their mouth but do not eat; indeed, just as the sick often die from aversion, not because there is no food, but because they do not want to eat and disdain it. For surely the Scriptures speak of this, and here, and surely the psalm sounds here too: All the ends of the earth will remember and turn to the Lord, and all the families of the nations will worship before Him. Behold, food is placed in the vessel. If you were healthy and ate, would you remain there? And there will no longer be those who are exterminated by famine in the land, and they will no longer bear the curse of the nations. Truly, brothers, the Church has been raised to such a height in the name of Christ that now all the revilers are confounded, nor do they dare to revile. Only this remains for them, that they say against us: "Why do you not agree among yourselves?". Pagans who remain, having nothing to say against the name of Christ, throw the dissension of Christians at the Christians. Therefore, whoever crosses over from the heretics to the Catholic Church will not bear this reproach of the nations. Nor will they bear the curse of dissension, because they remain in the root of unity, in the planting of charity: They will not bear the curse. And they shall know that I am the Lord their God, and they are my people, the house of Israel, says the Lord God. Behold, there are sheep, and behold, there is a vineyard. Just as when Isaiah spoke of the vineyard, reproving a certain bad vineyard lest he should say: "I did not understand"; he explained at the end, saying: But the vineyard of the Lord of hosts is the house of Israel, lest they should say: "It was not spoken to us, but to some unknown vineyard." So also here, when he had spoken about the sheep, at the end lest anyone should say: "Perhaps there are some sheep of God somewhere, which God cares for, and I do not know them," although it is exceedingly absurd to human sense to think such things, yet that Shepherd, compassionate to the weak, descended to such thoughts, and he explained most clearly which were his sheep. And you are my sheep, the sheep of my flock, you are men. But which men? All men? No. Blessed is he whose Lord God is his hope. And: How good is God to Israel, to those who are upright in heart! Blessed is the man whose Lord God is his.

God gives Himself to all in common for enjoying.

Above all is God. However, somehow no one easily dares to say: "My God," except those who believe in Him and love Him. They alone say: "My God." You have made Him yours, whose you are. He loves this. Indeed, with sweetness and secure and confident affection, say: "My God." You say this securely, you speak the truth, for He is yours, and you have not made it so that He is not another's. For you do not say: "My God," as you would say: "My horse." Your horse is yours, not another's. God is both yours and His who likewise says: "My God," just as you say. Each says: "My God," and: "My God." He is of all, offering Himself to all to be enjoyed, whole in all, whole in each. Those who individually say "My God" do not divide Him among themselves. If this speech which I cast with my tongue, and with sound consisting of letters and syllables, reaches each person in its entirety, and those who hear it do not divide it among themselves; if a speech that sounds physically to the ears of the body, clearer when near, fainter when far, is nevertheless received whole by all who listen, without dividing it syllable by syllable, but each receiving it whole, how much more so with God who is present everywhere, filling all things, not clearer when near and fainter when far, but extending mightily from end to end and disposing all things sweetly, equally possessed by all! This light, my brothers, is certainly physical, shining from the sky, rising, setting, moving from place to place. Yet all eyes proceed in it and are directed. And the eyes of all hold it equally, not dividing it. No one in it, rich or poor, has set a limit, nor has anyone by first seeing it excluded or narrowed the eyes of the poor. Let the poor say: "My God"; let the rich say: "My God." The poor has less, the rich has more, but both have silver, not God. To reach God, Zacchaeus the rich gave half of his possessions; Peter left nets and boat; the widow gave two mites; the poorer person offered a cup of cold water; the perfectly poor and needy gave only good will. They gave different things, but they reached the same one, because they loved not different things. So also you, people, sheep of God, sheep of the flock of God, do not be disturbed by your temporary differences, some in honor, some without honor, some with money, some without money, some beautiful in body, some less beautiful, some aged and weary, some young, some children, some men, some women. God is equally present to all. He who brings more to Him, not of silver, but of faith, has more place with Him. And you, He says, are my sheep, and the sheep of my flock, you are humans; and I am your God, says the Lord God. Oh, blessed are we with such possession and such possessor! For He both possesses us, and we possess Him. He possesses us that He may cultivate us, and we possess Him that we may worship Him. But we worship Him as God, and He cultivates us as a field. He cultivates us that we may bear fruit, we worship Him that we may give fruit. It all returns to us, He does not need us. I will give you, He says, your inheritance and your possession to the ends of the earth: behold, we are His possession. The Lord, he says, is the portion of my inheritance, and my cup: behold, He is our possession. But nevertheless, with distinction: You are humans, I am the Lord your God, says the Lord our God.

Sermons - Sermon 48

SERMO 48 SERMON DELIVERED ON SUNDAY IN THE BASILICA OF CELERINA ON THE WORDS OF THE PROPHET MICAH WHERE IT IS SAID "What worthy thing shall I offer to the Lord?"

"I WILL BEND THE KNEE TO THE MOST HIGH GOD?" AND SO FORTH

We have heard the readings of the divine scriptures when they were recited. This is the subject matter proposed for us to speak. From there we must gain wisdom, from there sow what we understand, with the help of Him in whose hand, as it is written: "Both we and our words." Nor is it written in vain elsewhere: "In the Lord I will praise the word, in the Lord I will praise the saying." This is praised in the Lord which the Lord gives. Therefore, although we are weak, yet we are His vessels. We grasp as much as we can, we share without envy what we grasp. May He fill up in your hearts what we have less done, because even what we work in your ears, what is it unless He does everything in your hearts? On right and perverse judgment. The first prophetic reading reminds us of what it commended to us, as I recall. What worthy thing, he says, can I offer to the Lord? The man was seeking a sacrifice with which to appease God or to please God. Shall I bow my knee to the Most High God, he says, shall I appease Him with thousands of bulls or with ten thousands of fat goats, or shall I offer the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul? Shall I, he says, offer my firstborn to my God for the sin of my soul? It is answered to you, O man. O man, from whom else is it answered, if not from Him by whom man was made? Therefore, it is answered to you, O man, seeking what you should offer to God, and by what means you might please or be pleasing to God. It is answered to you what is good, or what else the Lord requires of you, but to do judgment and justice and to love mercy and to be ready to go with the Lord your God. You were seeking what you might offer for yourself. Offer yourself. For what does the Lord seek from you, if not you? Because among all earthly creatures, He made nothing better than you. He seeks you from yourself, because you had lost yourself. But if you do what He commanded, He finds in you judgment and justice: judgment first in yourself, justice towards your neighbor. How is there judgment in yourself? So that you dislike what you were and can become what you were not. Judgment, I say about yourself in yourself without acceptance of your own person, so that you do not spare your sins, nor do they please you because you do them, nor praise yourself in your good deeds, and accuse God in your bad deeds. For this is perverse judgment, and therefore not judgment at all. For to show that perverse judgment is not judgment, God did not say: What does the Lord seek from you, if not to make correct judgment, but He says to do judgment. For if it is correct, then it is judgment; but if it is perverse, it is not judgment, but a fault. Therefore, what were you doing when you lost yourself and were going after your own loss, going and not returning? What were you doing? I know what you were doing. You praised yourself in your good deeds, you blasphemed God in your bad deeds. This is perverse judgment, and therefore, as I have said, not judgment. Do you want to make correct judgment, that is judgment? Correct what you were doing; invert it, and it will be correct. What does that mean: Correct? Praise God in your good deeds, accuse yourself in your bad deeds. Therefore, when you dislike yourself perverse, and, with the help of Him who created you, have corrected yourself, being correct, you will hold to justice. For God will be pleasing to you if you are correct. You will not differ from the just unless you are crooked and perverse. The just, however, will agree with the just, and without a doubt, God will be pleasing to you. For whenever He was displeasing, it was your perversion that made Him displeasing.

Hear the holy psalm: How good is God to Israel, to those who are upright in heart! The one who says this in the psalm, was God displeasing to him? Far be it from me to criticize and not rather to believe the one confessing. Behold, listen with me, and consider what he said: How good, he says, is God to Israel! To whom? To the upright in heart. But I, he says, when I was not upright in heart, my feet almost stumbled, my steps had nearly slipped. What is it: my feet almost stumbled, that is: my steps had nearly slipped. What is it: almost, that is: nearly. What then does he say: almost, my feet had nearly stumbled, my steps had slipped? He says, almost I fell, I nearly collapsed. From where did you come to such a danger? Because, he says, I was envious of the wicked, seeing the peace of sinners. He says, I was envious of the wicked, seeing the peace of sinners: that is, by seeing wicked men happy, I faltered before God, I almost fell away from God. Behold why God was displeasing to him: why do the wicked have good things? The words of a certain wavering person are recited.

Finally, observe the words of the wavering one, which he spoke to himself: Behold, the sinners themselves—these are the words of the wavering one in the psalm itself—behold, the sinners themselves have obtained riches forever. And I said: How does God know? He himself speaks in the psalm, he himself speaks, to whom God had not yet become displeasing because the wicked prospered over the good. How, he says, does God know, and is there knowledge in the Most High? See yet what he adds, see how by wavering he approaches a fall, and is close to destruction. See, I say, what he adds: Did I in vain purify my heart, and wash my hands in innocence? I lost, he says, all that I lived well for. I purified my heart, I washed my hands in innocence, to this end, that the wicked may be happy, and I troubled. And I was, he says, scourged all day. They rejoice, and I am scourged. They who blaspheme God rejoice, I who worship God am scourged. How does God know? From this he wavered, from this he almost fell, from this he thought that human affairs did not pertain to God. When therefore he thought this, not with a right but a perverse heart, and was led by an apparently plausible reasoning to believe that the governance of human affairs did not pertain to God because of that inconvenience, it pleased him to preach thus, to assert this, to teach this. He was recalled by the authority and preaching of the saints. For behold his words: "If I said," he says, "if I said I will declare thus, I will preach thus, I will teach thus, I will say to men that the governance of human affairs does not pertain to God. If I said I will declare thus: behold, I have rejected the generation of your children." How then will I declare thus? Moses did not declare thus, nor did Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob declare thus, nor did Jeremiah declare thus, nor did Isaiah, nor the other Prophets. But all these are your children. Therefore, if I declare thus, I will reject the generation of your children.

What then shall I do? I have undertaken to understand. I have undertaken, he says, to understand. But it is great to understand, it is difficult to understand. This, he says, after he said: I have undertaken to understand, this is a labor before me, how I may understand both that God is just, and that he knows human affairs, and that it goes well for the wicked, and sometimes badly for the righteous. How it is just I have undertaken to understand, and labor is before me.

It must be believed that God cannot be perverse.

How long must I labor? Until I enter the sanctuary of God and understand the end. Therefore, enter into the sanctuary of God, faithful soul, enter into the sanctuary of God, pious soul, to whom it does not displease that God is in your difficulties, and to whom it does not displease that God is in the good things of the wicked. And if you do not know by what reason it happens, believe that it is not unjust what God permits or does. You were led by human reason, recall divine authority, and believe there to be something hidden from you. For that God cannot be perverse and unjust must be believed with the utmost certainty of faith. Thus, entering by faith into the sanctuary of God, entering by believing, you learn by understanding. For thus he says: Until I enter the sanctuary of God, where faith enters. And after faith, what? And I will understand the end. The end will come, when it will not be bad for any good person, nor good for any bad person. The end will come, I say, when the pious will be separated from the impious, the just from the unjust, the praisers of God from the blasphemers of God. The end will come when they will be separated, so that, as it is said, it will not be bad for any good person, nor good for any bad person. Why, then, is it not so now? Perhaps it is already so even now. But what is now hidden will later be revealed. Have good things which make you good.

Enter with me, if you can, into the sanctuary of God. Perhaps there, if I can, I will teach you. Rather, learn with me from Him who teaches me, that even now it is not well with the wicked, and it is better for the good than the wicked; although the full happiness of the good has not yet come, nor has the final punishment of the wicked yet come. Perhaps you understand with me, that it is not well with the wicked. For I ask you and inquire from you, why is it bad for you? You will answer: "Poverty oppresses, hardship weighs down, perhaps the pain of limbs, fear from the enemy." It is bad for you because you suffer evils; and is it well for him, who is himself wicked? There is a great difference between suffering evil and being evil. You are not what you suffer. You suffer evil, but you are not wicked. I say you suffer evil, but you are not wicked. But he does not suffer evil, and he is wicked. Do not be deceived, do not be deceived. It cannot be that it is bad for you who suffer evil, and well for him who is wicked. For when he is wicked, you think he does not suffer evil, when he suffers himself? It is bad for you because you suffer another's evil in your body. And is it well for him, who suffers wickedness himself in his heart? It is bad for you because you have a bad estate. And is it well for him, who has a bad soul? Be good, you who have good things. Wealth is good, gold is good, silver is good, good households, good possessions, all these are good, but from which you make good, not which make you good. Have good things which make you good. What are they, you ask? Do justice, do righteousness. Are the things you have good? Do justice, do righteousness. Be good among your good things. Be ashamed of your good things: be good dwelling among perishable goods. Be ashamed of your good things: do not be wicked with them, lest you perish with them. For everything else, my Brothers, how justice should be preserved, how mercy should be loved, and how each one should be ready to go with the Lord his God, we will discuss with you another time, with the Lord granting. Hold me as debtor, so that you do not have a wearisome teacher for a long time.

Sermons - Sermon 49

SERMO 49 The habit at the table of Saint Cyprian on Sunday. ON THE WORDS OF THE PROPHET MICAH:

"What worthy thing shall I offer to the Lord?"

How justice must be observed and mercy loved Introduction of the discourse.

We have heard several holy readings being recited, and it is fitting for us to say what the Lord has deigned to grant. But every listener of the readings remembers better what was read more recently, and expects that something will be said by the speaker of the word from that. Therefore, when the Holy Gospel is recited last, I do not doubt that your love is looking to hear something about that vineyard, and about the workers, and about the wage of a denarius. But I recall what I promised the previous Sunday. For when I wished to explain something about what had been read from the holy Prophet, but it was read that it had been declared to the man inquiring by what sacrifices he might please God, that God sought nothing from him except to do justice and righteousness and to love mercy, and to be ready to walk with the Lord, his God, I treated, as far as I could, on justice, and the discourse was extended so that there remained no time to discuss the others. Therefore, I promised myself that I would speak about righteousness today. But those who were expecting to hear about the Gospel, do not think yourselves deceived. For the work in that vineyard is itself righteousness. On justice and faith.

Therefore, consider yourselves as hired. Let those who came at the first hour think of themselves as having been brought at that time; those who are adolescents, at the third hour; those who are young men, at the sixth; those who are older, at the ninth; those who are elderly, at the eleventh. Do not complain about the time. Listen to the work you are to do, and confidently await the reward. And if you pay attention to what kind of Lord you have, do not envy if the reward is the same. You know what the work is, but I will remind you. Hear what you know, and do what you have heard. We have said that God's work is justice. But the Lord Jesus, when asked what God's work is, answered: "This is the work of God, that you believe in Him whom He has sent." Our pious Lord could have said: "Justice is the work of God." But would we contractors dare to presume anything against the head of the family? If justice is the work of God, as I have said, how can it be the work of God which the Lord said to believe in Him, unless it is justice itself to believe in Him? "But behold," you say, "we have heard from the Lord: 'This is the work of God, that you believe in Him.' From you we have heard that the work of God is justice. Prove to us that believing in Christ is this justice." It seems to you, since I now respond to the one asking and asking rightly, it seems to you that believing in Christ is not justice? What then is it? Assign a name to this work. Without a doubt, if you consider well what you have heard, you will answer me: "This is called faith. Believing in Christ is called faith." I accept what you say, that believing in Christ is called faith. Listen also to another place from Scripture: "The just shall live by faith." Do justice, believe: "The just shall live by faith." It is difficult for someone who believes well to live badly. Believe with all your heart, believe without wavering, without hesitating, without arguing against the very faith with human suspicions.

Faith is so named because what is said is done. When 'faith' is said, two syllables sound. The first syllable is from the deed, the second from the saying. Therefore, I ask you whether you believe? You say: "I believe." Do what you say, and it is faith. For I can hear the voice of the one answering, I cannot see the heart of the believer. But am I the one who hired you to the vineyard, I who cannot see the heart? Neither do I hire, nor do I prescribe the work, nor do I prepare the denarius as a reward. I am your fellow worker. As much as He grants me the strength, I labor in the vineyard. The one who hired me sees with what spirit I labor. For, as the Apostle says, it matters very little to me to be judged by you. And you can hear my voice, but you cannot see my heart. Let us all present our hearts to God to be seen, and let us do our work from the heart. Let us not offend the one who hires us, so that we may receive our reward with a clear conscience. A Christian can be called darkness and light. And we, dearest ones, will see each other’s hearts, but later. Now, however, we still carry around the shadows of this mortality and walk by the lantern of Scripture, as the Apostle Peter says: We have a more sure prophetic word, to which you do well to heed as a light that shines in a dark place, until the day dawns and the morning star rises in your hearts. Therefore, dearest ones, because of the very faith by which we believe in God, compared to the unbelievers we are day. In unbelief, we were night with them, now light, as the Apostle says: You were once darkness, but now you are light in the Lord. Darkness in you, light in the Lord. Again in another place: For you are all children of light and children of the day; we are not of night nor of darkness. Let us walk honestly as in the day. Therefore, in comparison to the unbelievers, we are day. But in comparison to that future day when the dead shall rise and this corruptible shall put on incorruption, and this mortal shall put on immortality, we are still night. The Apostle John says to us, as if already in the day: Beloved, we are now children of God. And yet, because it is still night, what follows? It has not yet been revealed what we shall be. We know that when he is revealed, we shall be like him, because we shall see him as he is. But that is the reward, not the work. We shall see him as he is, that is the reward itself. Then it will be day, a day that cannot be brighter. Now, therefore, let us walk honestly in this already day; in this still night, let us not judge each other. For notice even the Apostle Paul who said: Let us walk honestly as in the day, is not contradicting or differing from his fellow apostle Peter who said: To which you do well to heed, namely to the divine word, as a light that shines in a dark place, until the day dawns and the morning star rises in your hearts.

We cannot penetrate the hearts of our neighbors.

See this very thing being said by the Apostle Paul: Therefore do not judge anything before the time. And when will the time be? Until the Lord comes, and brings to light the hidden things of darkness, and makes manifest the thoughts of the heart, and then each one will receive praise from God. What does it mean: before the time, if not before you see each other’s hearts? Pay attention if this is what I said. Listen to all the words of his sentence for a little while. Do not judge anything before the time. And when will the time be? Until the Lord comes and brings to light the hidden things of darkness, and makes manifest the thoughts of the heart, and then each one will receive praise from God. How will darkness reprove you, when you will be praised by the light? Then the hearts will be open, but now they are hidden. Someone is suspected as an enemy, and perhaps he is a friend. Another appears as a friend, and perhaps he is a hidden enemy. O darkness! He rages and loves; he flatters and hates. If I judge by voices, I avoid a calm rock and run aground: I flee from a friend, I cling to an enemy. This was done by the hidden heart. There it must be believed, there inside where it is hidden, where it is concealed. You are brought to this for cultivation. There cooperate by believing, where your fellow worker does not see you, but your Lord does. The just man lives by faith. Do this.

Judge yourself, do not spare yourself.

I have already spoken about the previous judgment of the Lord, so that you may judge yourself, and when you find yourself perverse, you do not flatter yourself but correct yourself, and become righteous, and God, who is righteous, will please you. For a righteous God does not please one who is perverse. Do you want the righteous God to please you? Be righteous. Judge yourself, do not spare yourself. Whatever you find that rightfully displeases you in yourself, chastise, amend, correct. Let the holy scripture be to you like a mirror. This mirror has a pure, unlying, flattering splendor, favoring no one's appearance. If you are beautiful, you see yourself as beautiful there; if you are ugly, you see yourself as ugly there. But when you approach it ugly and see yourself as ugly, do not accuse the mirror. Turn back to yourself, the mirror does not deceive you, do not deceive yourself. Judge yourself, grieve over your ugliness, so that when you go away and depart sad, you may return beautiful, corrected from your ugliness. Therefore, when you judge yourself without flattery, judge your neighbor with love. For you judge that which you see. It is possible that you see in him an evil from which you become stained, it is possible that your neighbor confesses his sin to you, and reveals to a friend what he had hidden in his heart. Judge as you see. What you do not see, leave to God. But when you judge, love the person, hate the sin. Do not love sin for the person's sake, nor hate the person for the sin's sake. The person is your neighbor; the sin is an enemy to your neighbor. Then you love your friend if you hate what harms your friend. If you believe, you act, because the just lives by faith. The vices of friends are not to be loved.

What abounds in human affairs, I say this: Sometimes, one who was a friend of both becomes an enemy of your dearest friend. Two out of three friends begin to be enemies of each other; what should the one who remains in the middle do? He wishes, demands, insists that you hate the one whom he has begun to hate, and he says these words to you: "You are not my friend if you are a friend of my enemy." The voice of this one to you is the same as that one's to you. For you were three. You were three; two began to be discordant, and you remained. If you join this one, you will have the other as an enemy; if you join that one, you will have this one as an enemy; if you join both, both will murmur against you. Behold the temptation; behold the thorns in the vineyard where we are hired. Perhaps you expect to hear from me what you should do. Remain a friend to both. Let those who are discordant with each other reconcile through you. If you hear any ill-speaking from one about the other, do not betray it to the other, lest they afterward become friends again who now are enemies, and they might expose their betrayers to themselves. But I said this because of men, not because of the eyes of Him who hired us. Behold, no one betrays you. God sees and judges you. You heard a word from one who is angry, from one who is suffering, from one who is offended. Let it die within you. Why is it betrayed, why is it brought forth? For if it remains within you, it will not burst you. Indeed, say truly to your friend, who wants to make you an enemy of your friend; address him and gently treat his troubled mind with the softness of medicine. Say to him: "Why do you want me to be an enemy of that one?" He will respond: "Because he is my enemy." "Do you therefore want me to be an enemy of your enemy? I ought to be an enemy of your vice. This person whom you want me to make an enemy is a man. There is another enemy of yours whom I ought to be an enemy of if I am your friend." He will respond: "Who is this other enemy of mine?" "Your vice." He will respond: "What is my vice?" "The hatred with which you hate your friend." Therefore, be like a doctor. The doctor does not love the afflicted if he does not hate the affliction. To free the sick, he pursues the fever. Do not love the vices of your friends if you love your friends. Of the speck and the beam in the eyes. But what I say, do you think I do what I say? My brothers, I do, if I first do it in myself. However, I do it in myself, if I receive it from the Lord. I hate my vices, I offer my heart to be healed to my doctor. I pursue them as much as I can, I groan about them, I confess that they are in me, and behold, I accuse myself. You who reproach me, correct yourself. This is justice, lest it be said to us: "You see the speck in your brother's eye, but you do not see the beam in your own eye? Hypocrite, first take the beam out of your own eye, and then you will see to remove the speck from your brother's eye." Anger is a speck; hatred is a beam. But nurture the speck and it becomes a beam. Anger aged becomes hatred, a nurtured speck becomes a beam. Therefore, so that the speck does not become a beam, do not let the sun go down on your anger. Do you see, do you feel yourself bruised with hatred, and you reproach the angry? Remove hatred, and you rightly reproach anger. The speck is in his eye, the beam in yours. For if you hate, how do you see to detract? The beam is in your eye. Why is the beam in your eye? Because you neglected the speck born there. You slept with it, you rose with it. You cultivated it in yourself, you watered it with false suspicions, by believing the words of flatterers and of those who bring bad words about your friend, you nurtured the speck, you did not pluck it out. By your diligence, you made it a beam. Remove the beam from your eye, do not hate your brother. Are you afraid, or are you not afraid? I tell you: Do not hate, and you are safe. And you answer me and say to me: "What is it to hate? And what harm is it that a man hates his enemy?" Do you hate your brother or not? But if you despise hatred, listen to what you do not heed: Whoever hates his brother is a murderer. Whoever hates is a murderer. You have not prepared poison. Can you now say: "What does it matter to me if I am a murderer?" Whoever hates is a murderer. You did not prepare poison. You did not proceed to strike the enemy with the sword. You did not prepare an instrument of crime, nor a place, nor a time. Lastly, you did not commit the very crime. You only hated, and you killed yourself before him. Therefore, learn justice so that you do not hate except the vices, love men. If you hold this, and do this justice, so that you also prefer the men even the vicious to be healed rather than condemned, you have done a good work in the vineyard. But practice this, my Brothers. On forgiving offenses and laying aside hatred.

Behold, after the sermon, the dismissal of the catechumens takes place; the faithful will remain. We will come to the place of prayer. You know what we are going to approach. What shall we first say to God? Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors. Act so that you may forgive, act. For you will come to these words of the prayer. How will you say them, how will you not say them? Finally, I ask: Will you say them, or will you not say them? Do you hate, and say them? You will answer me: "Therefore, I do not say them". Do you pray, and not say them? Do you hate, and say them? Do you pray, and not say them? Behold, respond quickly. Therefore, if you say them, you lie. If you do not say them, you deserve nothing. Observe yourself, attend to yourself. You are about to pray, forgive from the whole heart. You want to contend with your enemy, first contend with your heart. Contend, I say, contend with your heart. Say to your heart: Do not hate. Yet your heart, your mind still hates. Say to your soul: Do not hate. "How will I pray, how will I say: Forgive us our debts? Indeed, I can say this, but how will I say what follows? As we also". What? As we also forgive. Where is faith? Do what you say: As we also. But your soul does not wish to be released and is sorrowful, because you say to it: "Do not hate." Respond to it: Why are you sorrowful, my soul, and why do you disturb me? Why do you disturb me? Or else: Why are you sorrowful? Do not hate, so that you do not destroy me. Why do you disturb me? Hope in God. You languish, you pant, you are wounded by sickness. You cannot remove hatred from yourself. Hope in God; He is the physician. For you, He hung on the wood, and He is not yet avenged. What do you want to be avenged? It is for this reason that you hate, so that you may be avenged. Look at your Lord hanging, look at Him hanging and as if from a wooden tribunal commanding you. Look at Him hanging, and for you, languishing, making a medicine from His blood. Look at Him hanging. Do you want to be avenged? Do you want to be avenged? Look at Him hanging, hear Him praying: Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing.

Let us imitate Saint Stephen.

"But you might say to me, 'He could do this; I cannot. For I am human, He is God.' Therefore, He was human; that human God was a human. Why then was God human, if not to set right the human condition? But behold, I speak to you. O human, it is too much for you to imitate your Lord; look to Stephen, your fellow servant. Surely, holy Stephen was a man. Was he God and man? Plainly, he was a man. He was what you are. But what he did was only by the grace of Him whom you also implore. Yet see what he did. He spoke to the Jews, he was fierce, and he loved. I must show both, because I said: he was fierce; I said: and he loved. I must demonstrate both, both his fierceness and his love. Hear the fierceness: 'Stiff-necked.' These are the words of Saint Stephen when he addressed the Jews: 'Stiff-necked, and uncircumcised in heart and ears, you always resist the Holy Spirit. Which of the prophets did your fathers not kill?' You have heard the fierceness. I owe you the other part, so hear also the love. They became angry at him, grew more inflamed and, repaying evil for good, ran to the stones and began to stone the servant of God. Here, Holy Stephen, prove your love. Here, let us see you, here let us watch you, here let us perceive the victor over the devil. We heard you being fierce against the silent ones; let us see if you love those who are fierce. You were fierce against the silent ones; let us see if you love those who stone you. For if you hated and could have hated, now is the time when you are being stoned. Now, you ought to hate the most. Let us see if you repay the hardness of heart with hard stones, with the stones of those who stone you. For they send stones, hard men sending hard stones. Those who received the law on stone, send stones."

Let us see, beloved, let us see, let us behold the great spectacle. Let us behold what is to be proposed for tomorrow. Let us see. Behold, Stephen is being stoned. Let him be set as if before our eyes. Behold, a member of Christ, behold an athlete of Christ, look upon him who hung on the wood for you. He was crucified, you were stoned. He said: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. What do you say? Let me hear. Let me behold you, perhaps I might imitate you. First, blessed Stephen standing prayed for himself, and said: Lord Jesus, receive my spirit. Having said this, he knelt down, and kneeling he said: Lord, do not hold this sin against them. Having said this, he fell asleep. O blessed sleep, and true rest! Behold what it is to rest, to pray for the enemies. But for a little while I beseech you, holy Stephen, explain this to me, I do not know what it is, why you prayed standing for yourself, and knelt praying for your enemies. Perhaps he will respond what we understand: "For myself I prayed standing, because for me, who rightly served God, I did not labor in praying and obtaining. For myself, I did not labor." He who prays for the righteous does not labor. Therefore, he prayed standing for himself. It had come to pray for the Jews, for the murderers of Christ, for the murderers of the saints, for his own stoners, he considered that their impiety was exceedingly great, which could scarcely be forgiven, and he knelt. Fasten your knee in this vineyard, strong worker. Fasten, I say, your knee in the work of this vineyard, bravest worker. Your great work, distinguished and much to be praised. You dug very deep, who cast out the hatred of enemies from the heart. Turned to the Lord.

Sermons - Sermon 49A

SERMON 49/A FROM THE SERMON ON PROPHETIC WORDS:

"That man may love justice and mercy and judgment"

"And be ready to walk with the Lord your God."

[FRAGMENT] But when the fullness of time had come, God sent His Son, made of a woman, made under the Law. But it offends to say made of a woman, because we confess that He was born of a Virgin. We do not confess made unless as human; but God is always making, He does not know how to be made. God does not know how to be made; but it is made that He may be something to someone, as it is said: Lord, you have been our refuge; and: The Lord has been my helper. How great is He who has never been made? But the Lord Christ was made man, so that He might be, that He who was always the Creator might be a creature. For remaining God, He was made man, so that He might become what He was not, not so that He might perish what He was. Therefore, what was made of the Virgin, why from a woman? Because among the Hebrews, where the first language of the Scriptures is, "woman" is a term signifying sex, not lost integrity. Read: when the woman was formed, God took, He says, one of his ribs, that is, of the man, and built it into a woman. Thus, woman Mary; so it was said to her, before she bore, before she conceived: Blessed are you among women.

Sermons - Sermon 4A

SERMO 4/A FROM THE SERMON ON THE THREE RODS

[FRAGMENT]

Why did the Lord first choose the lowly, the few, the unskilled, and the unrefined, when he had before his eyes a large crowd, fewer in comparison to those poorer ones, but in their kind many wealthy, noble, learned, and wise, whom he also later gathered? The Apostle explains the mystery: "God chose the weak things of the world to shame the strong; and God chose the foolish things of the world to shame the wise; and God chose the lowly things of this world and the things that are not, that is, things not counted, to nullify the things that are." For He came to teach humility and to conquer pride. A humble God had come: in no way would He first seek the high, who came so humbly. First, because He chose to be born of that woman who was betrothed to a carpenter. Therefore, He did not choose grand birth, lest nobility on earth boast. He did not even choose to be born in a very large city, but He was born in Bethlehem of Judah, which is not even called a city. To this day, the inhabitants of that place call it a village: so small, so insignificant, almost nothing, unless it were ennobled by the birth of the Lord Christ. Therefore, He chose the weak, the poor, the unlearned: not because He forsook the strong, the rich, the wise, the noble; but if He had chosen them first, they would seem to be chosen on account of their riches, their substances, their birth, and being puffed up by these things, they would not receive the salvation of humility, without which no one can return to that life wherefrom we have fallen through pride.

Therefore, he did not say "mother," because sometimes mothers are either too delicate or hand over their children to others for nurturing once they have given birth. Again, if he had only said: Like a nurse cherishing, and not added: her own children, it would seem as if they were received from another for nurturing. And he called himself "nurse" because he was nourishing; and his own children, because he himself had begotten them, saying: My children, of whom I travail in birth again until Christ be formed in you. But he begets, just as the Church begets, with its own womb, not with its own seed.

Sermons - Sermon 5

SERMO 5 On the Wrestling of Jacob with the Angel The word of God ought always to be repeated to you. This rule of discipline is most necessary for a Christian man, that he should listen to the word of God while he is in this world, so that he may attend to Him who came to save the world first by mercy and afterward by judgment with discernment. And therefore, our Lord Jesus Christ presented Himself to us as one to be imitated; so that, since we are Christians, we either imitate Him or others who imitated Him. For there are some who are called Christians and are not, whom the Church has partly expelled like dung, as are all heresies and all schisms, which are also compared to fruitless branches cut off from the vine and to chaff which the wind carries away from the threshing floor before winnowing. But there are others who are evil within and are contained by the Catholic communion itself, whom a good Christian must tolerate until the end, because the winnowing of this harvest and threshing floor will not occur until the day of judgment. We have always sung these things to you, and we believe in the name of Christ that they stick in your hearts. These lessons that are read to you, are they now read to you for the first time, and are they not the same ones repeated daily? Just as the lessons of God need to be repeated daily, so that worldly evils and thorns do not grow in your hearts and choke the seed that has been sown there, so must the word of God always be repeated to you, lest you forget and say you have not heard what we say we have said.

Love your enemy.

Many are coming, and now it is time to hasten in the name of God to receive the grace of baptism, believing that all sins they have previously committed are forgiven, absolutely all, departing henceforth owing nothing to the Lord; just as that servant who was accounting to his lord found that he owed ten thousand talents, yet departed owing nothing, not because he owed nothing, but because the merciful lord forgave all and absolved the debtor. And yet, brothers, how vehemently did that same servant terrify us! Because he refused to forgive his fellow servant or defer the payment of a hundred denarii, the lord imposed upon him again the ten thousand talents which he had forgiven. Thus, those who are coming out from baptism, owing nothing and absolved from all sins, must take care lest if anyone sins against them and they refuse to forgive him, not only will they not be forgiven thereafter, but also all things that had been forgiven will be reinstated. Let no one say: "Who does this or that?" By saying this, men bring death upon themselves. Love your enemy, says the Lord. And you say, "Who does this?" Because they do not do it themselves, they think that no one can do it. The matter is in the heart. How can you see who does this? Do you think that one who cries out does not forgive? Sometimes, indeed, someone may cry out and command a man to be beaten, and you think he has not forgiven. Why? When you beat your son, do you harbor hatred in your heart? So, the matter is in the heart. Only God sees if it is forgiven. Sometimes someone does not beat another, seeming to spare with their hand, but rages inwardly and wishes harm and death to him. They hold ill will against him, although they seem to give nothing back physically. Conversely, there are those who seem physically to return blows, but this physical correction is love. They want to bring him to a good life and so much the more wish to correct him as they love him. So too with God. Does He not love us? Does He not urge us to love our enemies, that we might be like Him as much as we can? For He said: Be you therefore perfect, as your Father who is in heaven; who makes his sun rise on the good and the evil, and rains on the just and the unjust. Therefore, how great is the love in the Lord, that He sent Christ to be crucified for sinners and the wicked and redeemed us by the price of His blood, we who were His enemies by loving things He made rather than Him who made them! While we were doing these things, God sent, as the Apostle says, His Son, and gave him over to be killed by the wicked for the wicked. And if such a gift is not yet given to the faithful, what then is reserved for the faithful? See how God loves humans. Brothers, let us consider, does He not also chasten them? Does He not also correct them? If He does not correct them, where do famine, sickness, plague, and disease come from? All these are corrections of God. Therefore, if He loves and yet corrects, so must you, if you have anyone in your power, though you preserve the affection of love, not deny the lash of correction. For if you deny it, you do not hold love; because he would die in his sins, who might perhaps leave them upon being corrected; and the true hatred is more imputed to you.

Imitate the humility and footsteps of your Lord.

Let no one therefore say, "Who can do that?". Strive to fulfill these things in your hearts. Hold onto love. Fight and you will conquer. For there Christ conquers. Against what do you fight? You fight against sin, against the words of people speaking ill: "So you do not avenge yourself? So you will remain undefended and not show them? Oh, if you had it with me!". Fight and conquer. For if Christ wished to command the earth, when he suffered so much from the Jews, so that it would swallow His persecutors, could He not? If therefore He who had the power, endured them this way until He was lifted on the cross, and hanging on the cross said: "Father forgive them, for they know not what they do," you, a servant redeemed by the blood of your crucified Lord, will you not imitate your Savior? For what need did He have to suffer so greatly when it was possible for Him not to? For He said thus: "I have the power to lay down my life and the power to take it up again. No one takes it from me, but I lay it down and take it up again." And so He did. What happened, Brothers? He hung on the cross, as we read in agreement. But when He saw all the Scriptures fulfilled in Himself, even that they gave Him vinegar: He said, "It is finished," and bowing His head, He gave up the ghost, as if He stood to fulfill this. When He wanted, therefore, He laid down His life. And thus He was God, while those men crucified next to Him were human. He dies sooner, they later. And when it was sent to take the bodies down from the cross because of the Sabbath, to bury them, they found those thieves alive and broke their legs; however, the Lord was already dead. And yet, one of them struck His side with a spear and blood and water flowed out. Behold your price. For what flowed from His side but the sacrament that the faithful receive? The Spirit, the blood of the Passover. The Spirit He emitted, and the blood and water which flowed from His side. It is signified by that blood and water that the Church was born. And when did blood and water flow from His side? When Christ was already sleeping on the cross, for even Adam in Paradise took sleep, and so Eve was produced from his side. Behold therefore your price. Imitate the humility and footsteps of your Lord, and do not say: "Who does that?". There may be around you those who do not do it. But in that crowd, if you do it, it will count for you as if you found one grain and countless chaff on the threshing floor. It's hard to find two grains joined together, but among the grains, chaff is mixed. Thus, among those who want to serve God, there is the noise and multitude of wicked people surrounding them everywhere, for wherever they turn, they find nothing but evil counselors. Be therefore like the grain, and do not care about the chaff. The time will come when they will be separated. Therefore, we sang: "Judge me, O God, and discern my cause from an unholy nation." The Church says this mourning among sinners. Do you think, Brothers, that the Church wants to be discerned for this, to be separated from heresies as if from pruned branches? It is already separated from them. Does the Church say this: "Judge me, O God, and discern my cause," to be segregated from the party of Donatus, or from Arians, or Manicheans? It does not ask to be discerned except from those who are mixed with it, whom it must tolerate until the end. But it says this: "Judge me, O God, and discern my cause," that is, do not let me be judged and perish with them on the day of judgment. For now it is said: "Let the weeds grow," and the wicked are tolerated with the good, to be separated on the day of judgment.

Jacob represents the Christian people, Esau the Jewish. And thus Jacob, who has just been read, signifies the Christian people. For he is the younger son; because the Jewish people are Esau. Indeed, the Jewish nation was born from Jacob, but in figure, the Jews are understood more as Esau, because the greater people were rejected, while the lesser people received the primacy. Even when they were struggling in the womb, and their mother was suffering distress because of the commotion of her insides, she said: Why is this happening to me? It would have been better for me to be barren than to endure this. She was told by the Lord that two nations were in her womb and two peoples were fighting, and because the greater would serve the lesser. What was said when they were in the womb was said again in the blessing of Isaac, when he blessed the younger, though he thought he was blessing the elder. Isaac bore the persona of the Law. The Law seems to have been given to the Jews, and the kingdom itself given to Christians. Note that the Law seems to promise the kingdom. It says to the Jews: Therefore, the kingdom will be taken from you and given to a people producing its fruits. It will be taken from Esau and given to Jacob. Esau was born rough and hairy, that is full of sins; sins were clinging to him. In order to receive the primacy, Jacob took the skins of the goats on his arms, and thus his father blessed him, touching his arms and finding them hairy. But those hairs and sins were carried by Jacob, not clinging to Jacob. Thus also the Church of God bears alien sins, not her own, enduring till the end, just as the Lord Jesus Christ bore alien sins. And the father blesses the younger. And how did he bless? A holy mystery, in what kind of men they were. Indeed, the scripture wants keen eyes. He blessed his younger son, and he seems deceived as though he blessed one instead of the other. The one who had gone hunting came, bringing what his father had ordered, and said: Father, eat, as you desired. He says to Isaac: Who are you? And he replies: I am Esau, your elder son. And he says: So you are Esau? Who then brought me food and I ate, and I blessed him, and he is blessed? Oh, to be angry with the deceiver! Oh, to be angry with the imposter! Rather, say: Why did he deceive me? Why did he trick me? Let his brother take that blessing, and let it be in vain. Does not this act cry out in mystery, that the greater will serve the lesser? He then also receives a similar blessing. But he added: You will be a servant to your brother. When he said: Are the blessings finished? Bless me also, he said: Since I have made him such, what do I have to give you? And he said: Bless me too, father. And he extorted and received a blessing almost similar from the dew of heaven and the fertility of the earth, all abundance. And he immediately added: And you will serve your brother. And it will be thus for you, when you free his yoke from your neck. What does it mean: And it will be thus for you, when you free his yoke from your neck, except that it shows those whom Esau prefigured to be sinners such that they have it in their power and free will to change themselves and join their brother? The Jew is a servant of the Christian.

Attend to the mystery. Behold, a Jew is a servant of a Christian. And this is evident and has filled the whole world, as you see, Jacob. And so that you may know that these things were spoken of the future, consider the history itself and see that they are not fulfilled in these two: "The elder will serve the younger." For Esau is read to have been greatly enriched and began to reign in all abundance, but Jacob, however, to feed others' sheep. And when he began to return and fear his brother—as has now been read—he sends gifts of some unknown number of livestock, and he sends a servant to say: "Behold the gifts of your brother." He did not want to see him before he was appeased with gifts, and after accepting the gifts, he saw him. And when Jacob had come to him, he worshipped him from afar. How therefore: "The elder will serve the younger," when the younger seems to worship the elder? But therefore these things were not fulfilled in the history, so that the sayings of Jacob may be understood about the future. The younger son received the preeminence, and the elder son, the people of the Jews, lost the preeminence. Behold, Jacob has filled the earth, held both nations and kingdoms. The Roman Emperor, already a Christian, ordered that the Jews not approach Jerusalem itself. And scattered throughout the world, they have become as if custodians of our books. Just as servants, when they go into the master's hall, carry books behind them and sit outside, so the elder son has become to the younger son. For sometimes they move certain things in the Scriptures, and something certain is known from the books of the Jews. Therefore they are scattered to preserve the books for us. Therefore the elder serves the younger. See indeed with how much dignity the Christian people are, and in how much defection the Jewish people are. When they perhaps dared to move even a little against Christians, what happened to them, you heard in recent times. Therefore now it is true that the elder will serve the younger. How therefore that blessing: "There will be for you from the dew of heaven and from the fertility of the earth"? Just as he blessed the younger, so also the elder. But it was said to the elder: "And you will be a servant to your brother. And this will be, when you shake his yoke from your neck." How many are there who have shaken the yoke from their neck and have become our brothers? How many Jews have believed, pay attention. And now, if you find a Jew and proclaim to him the Lord Jesus Christ, and he believes, will he not shake the yoke from his neck? And how many did this in the early times of faith? Thousands. Certainly those who believed then, as we read, and became from servants brothers and co-heirs.

Struggle like Jacob to hold onto Christ.

Therefore, the Church which says, "Judge me, O God, and discern my cause from an unholy nation," does not wish to be distinguished from Esau, from whom it is already separated, but from bad Christians. For this Jacob, in whom the Christian people are figured, you heard how he wrestled with the Lord. The Lord appeared to him, that is, an angel bearing the person of God, and wrestled with him and wanted to hold and seize him. He wrestled, prevailed, and held him. When he held him, he did not let him go unless he was blessed. May the Lord grant, brothers, to explain such a great mystery. He wrestles, prevails, and wants to be blessed by him whom he has prevailed over. What is it then that he wrestles and wants to hold? The Lord says in the Gospel: "The kingdom of heaven suffers violence, and the violent take it by force." This is what we were saying a while ago: Wrestle, that you may hold Christ, that you may love the enemy. For you hold Christ here, if you love the enemy. And what does the Lord himself say, that is, the angel in the person of the Lord, when he prevailed and held him? He touched the hollow of his thigh, and it dried up, and hence Jacob limped. It is said: "Let me go, for it is now day." And he replied: "I will not let you go, unless you bless me." And he blessed him. How? By changing his name: "You shall not be called Jacob, but Israel: for you have prevailed with God, and you shall prevail with men." This is the blessing. See one man: he is touched on one part and it withers, and on another part he is blessed. This one man on one part had withered and limped, and on another part he is blessed to thrive. To understand the Word equal to the Father. But what is it - as much as the Lord suggests we say, without prejudice to a better understanding -, what is: Behold, the morning has now come, let me go? This is what the Lord says after the passion to the woman who wanted to hold his feet: Do not touch me, for I have not yet ascended to the Father. What does this mean? For when that reading was being read, I discussed it at some point, on how it might be said: Do not touch me, for I have not yet ascended to the Father. Why? Did no one touch him corporeally, unless he ascended to the Father? He was still here, the disciple who did not believe touched the scars. So why did he refuse to be touched, unless because this was said figuratively? That woman was the Church. And this is: Do not touch me, do not touch me carnally, but as I am equal to the Father. For as long as you do not understand me as equal to the Father, do not touch me, because you do not touch me, but my flesh. For Paul says in the progression of his elevation: And if we knew Christ according to the flesh, but now we know him no longer. And: The old things have passed away, behold they have become new; but all things are from God. What does: And if we knew Christ according to the flesh, but now we know him no longer mean? Because when we knew him carnally, we thought he was only a man. But truly after his grace shone upon us, we understood the Word equal to the Father. Therefore he held and wrestled, as if Jacob wanting to embrace him in a carnal manner. But he was saying: Let me go, carnally, because behold it is now morning, that you may be illumined spiritually: that is, Do not think me a man. Let me go, because the morning is now here. In the light of truth and wisdom, through which all things were made, we understand the morning. You will enjoy it, when this night has passed, that is, the iniquity of this age. For then it becomes morning, when the Lord comes, so that he may be seen by us as he is seen by the angels. For now we see through a mirror in a dark manner, but then face to face. Therefore, brothers, let us hold to what has been said: Let me go. Behold, the morning is now here. But what did he say? I will not let you go unless you bless me. Because the Lord blesses us first through the flesh. The faithful know what they receive, that they are blessed through the flesh. And they know that they would not be blessed unless that flesh crucified was given for the life of the world. How then is he blessed? Because he prevailed against God, because he held firmly and persevered and did not let go of what Adam had lost. Therefore, let the faithful hold onto what we receive, so that we may deserve to be blessed. The dry part of Jacob signifies bad Christians. The dry part of Jacob signifies the bad Christians, so that in Jacob himself there is both blessing and lameness. He is blessed on the part of those living well, he limps on the part of those living poorly. But still both are in one man. There will, however, be separation and distinction afterwards. This is what the Church wishes in the psalm, saying: Judge me, O God, and distinguish my cause from an unholy nation. Certainly because the Gospel says: If your foot causes you to stumble, cut it off and throw it away from you. It is better for you to enter into the Kingdom of God with one foot than to have two feet and be thrown into eternal fire. Therefore, the wicked are to be cut off at the end. Now the Church limps. It sets one foot strongly, the other it has weak. Consider the pagans, brothers. Sometimes they find good Christians serving God and they marvel and they are led and believe. Sometimes they see those living poorly, and say: “Behold the Christians.” But these who live poorly belong to the breadth of the touched thigh of Jacob, who have withered. The touch of the Lord is the hand of the Lord correcting and giving life. Therefore, he is blessed on one part and withers on the other. And the Lord shows those living poorly in the Church, for that is what is written in the Gospel, for when the grass grew, the weeds appeared; for when men begin to profit then they begin to feel the wicked. These things are known to you, it is by the gift of God that they are recognized. But now the weeds must be tolerated until the end of the harvest, lest perchance by uprooting the weeds, the wheat be uprooted at the same time. But the time will come when the Church will be heard saying: Judge me, O God, and distinguish my cause from an unholy nation, when the Lord comes in his glory with his holy angels, and all nations will be gathered before him, and he will separate them, as a shepherd separates the sheep from the goats, and the righteous will be placed on the right, and the goats on the left. And it will be said to them: Come, you blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom; but to the others: Go into eternal fire, which has been prepared for the devil and his angels.

Sermons - Sermon 50

SERMO 50 SERMON AGAINST THE MANICHAEANS Of what is written in the prophet Haggai:

"My gold is mine and my silver is mine." The Manichaeans slander the prophet Haggai, enviously accusing him of speaking from the person's voice of God: "The gold is mine, and the silver is mine," and because they diligently strive to compare the Gospel with the Old Law, so that both Scriptures seem to them as if adversarial and contradictory, they propose the question in this way: "In Haggai, they say, the prophet has written: 'The gold is mine, and the silver is mine'; however, in the Gospel, our Savior has called this kind of mammon an iniquitous type, of whose use the blessed Apostle, writing to Timothy, says: 'For the love of money is the root of all evils, which some coveting have erred from the faith and have pierced themselves through with many sorrows.'" This is their proposition of the question, or rather the accusation of the old Scriptures, through which the Gospel was foretold, from the very Gospel which was foretold through them. For if they proposed a question, perhaps they would ask; if, however, they asked, perhaps they would find.

Why do the wretched not understand that the Lord, speaking through Haggai, said: "The silver is mine, and the gold is mine," so that even he who does not wish to share what he has with the needy, when he hears the commandments to perform acts of mercy, might understand that God commands to give not from the giver’s possessions but from His own, and he who gives something to the poor might realize he is not giving from his own, lest he be puffed up with the vanity of pride rather than confirmed in the name of mercy? "The silver is mine," He says, "and the gold is mine," not yours, O wealthy of the earth. Why then do you hesitate to give the poor what is mine, or why do you exalt yourselves when you give what is mine?

God wisely distributes wealth. And do you wish to see how the matter of gold and silver belongs to the just judge? The greedy are tormented by it, the merciful are helped by it. By divine justice distributing its own matter, good deeds are manifested by it, and sins are punished by it. For gold and silver and all earthly possessions are both the exercise of humanity and the punishment of greed. When God grants such things to us humans, He shows in them how much the soul, whose riches are the very one who grants them, disdains them. For no one can appear as a despiser unless he becomes the possessor of that thing. For even those who do not have them can disdain these things. But whether they pretend or truly disdain, God sees, who is the inspector of the heart. For to men to imitate him, the thought of the despiser is only seen in the hands of the distributor. But when God grants these things to evil men, He shows in them how even in the good things that God bestows, the soul is tormented, to whom the one who bestows such things has become worthless. For He supplies good men with opportunities for benefits; He torments the evil with the fear of losses. And therefore, if both lose gold and silver, the former will retain heavenly riches with a joyful heart, but the latter will remain with an empty house of temporal goods and an emptier conscience of eternal goods.

Gold and silver must be rightly used.

Therefore, the gold and silver belong to him who knows how to use gold and silver. For even among men, one is considered to possess something only when he uses it well. For what is not justly handled is not rightfully held. But if he claims to own what he does not rightfully hold, it is not the voice of a just owner, but the audacity of an impudent squatter. Therefore, if a person claims something as his own, not because he has seized it with unjust and foolish greed, but because he has handled it with the most prudent power and most just moderation, how much more does God rightfully and truly call gold and silver His own, which He created with supreme goodness and governs with the most just authority, so that without His nod and command, neither the wicked can have gold and silver for the punishment of their avarice, nor the good for the use of their mercy! Yet they cannot establish its existence, nor distribute and arrange it so that some have it and others do not. But if gold and silver were given only to the power of the wicked, it would rightly be thought evil. If only to the good, it would rightly be considered some great good. Again, if only the wicked were lacking, poverty would seem a great punishment. But if only the good were lacking, poverty would seem the greatest happiness. Now if you wish to know that gold can be well held, good people also possess it. If you wish to know that they are not made good by gold, wicked people also possess it. Likewise, if you wish to know how poverty is not misery, there are certain blessed poor. If you wish to know how poverty is not happiness, there are certain miserable poor. Thus, therefore, the Creator and administrator God distributes gold and silver to humans, so that it in itself, by nature and kind, is good, although not the highest and greatest good, and shows the praiseworthy Creator of the universe by the degree of its order, yet its abundance does not exalt the good nor does lack of it crush them, but with the wicked, it blinds when offered and torments when taken away.

There is a saying about the mammon of unrighteousness in the Gospel.

Therefore, created things cannot in any way be rightly blamed for the praise of the Creator, the testing of the good, and the punishment of the wicked. And God very truly calls them His own, not only because He created them with overflowing goodness, but also because He dispenses them with most provident moderation. However, when the Lord in the Gospel calls this kind of thing the mammon of unrighteousness, He signifies that there is another mammon, that is, other riches, which only the just and good can possess, and that the mammon of unrighteousness is called such because unrighteousness calls them riches. But justice knows that there are other riches by which a person is adorned inwardly, as blessed Peter says: "Who is rich before God." Those are called righteous riches because they are granted for good and just merits. Those are called true riches because whoever has them will not lack anything. But these are unrighteous riches, not because gold and silver are unrighteous, but because it is unrighteous to consider them riches, which do not remove poverty. For the more one burns with poverty, the more he will want them the greater he has. So how are they riches, by which, as they increase, poverty increases, which bring not satisfaction to their lovers but inflame desire the more they grow? Do you think someone is rich who would suffer less from poverty if he had less? For we see some who, having had little money, were content with small gains. But after their stock of real gold and silver began to increase, but yet false riches, when you offer a small amount, they now refuse it. Do you believe they are now satisfied? But it is false. For greater wealth does not close the jaws of greed, but extends them; it does not irrigate but inflames. They spurn a cup because they thirst for a river. Therefore, is he to be called richer or poorer, who, while wanting to have something to avoid need, has more so as to need less? No creature is to be called evil in itself. But this is not the fault of gold and silver. Suppose a merciful person finds a treasure. Surely, through the operation of mercy, hospitality is provided to strangers, the hungry are fed, the naked clothed, the needy helped, captives redeemed, churches built, the weary refreshed, litigants pacified, shipwrecked sailors restored, the sick cured; earthly wealth is distributed, and spiritual wealth is stored in heaven. Who does this? The merciful and good. From what do they do this? From gold and silver. For whom do they perform these acts? For Him who says: "Mine is the gold and mine is the silver." You see now, brothers, as I believe, how great and foolish an error it is to transfer the guilt of those who misuse to the things themselves which are used poorly. For if gold and silver are to be blamed because men corrupted by greed, neglecting the commands of the Almighty Creator, are seized by detestable desire for what He made, then let all of God's creations be blamed. For as the Apostle says, some perverse men worshipped and served the creature rather than the Creator, who is blessed forever. Let even this sun be blamed, for the same Manicheans, since they do not understand it to be a creature, do not cease to worship and adore it, as though it were the Creator himself or some part of him. Why then do they not blame it, since men often provoke most unjust disputes over the use of sunlight in their buildings, and frequently attempt to tear down other people's homes so that the rays can freely and abundantly flow into their windows, and pursue with the most bitter animosity those who contradict them, even if they contradict with the most rightful justice? If then some more powerful person oppresses an innocent one unjustly and wickedly over the use of the sun, takes away their belongings, forces them into exile or even death, is it the fault of the sun, which that person wishes to use more abundantly, or rather the injustice of the one who improperly uses it, who, while desiring to acquire more of the temporal light for the eyes of the body, does not open the room of the heart to the light of justice? On True and False Riches. From this, let them understand, if they can, that they ought not to accuse gold and silver, even though men often quarrel greedily over gold and silver; or that their accusations should be transferred from earth to heaven and from glittering metals to the stars and the sun itself, when unrighteous men often clash with irreconcilable discord over the possession of sunlight. At the same time, let them learn what the difference is between this visible light and the light of justice. For it may happen that the more one desires to enjoy this light, the more he may be blinded and deprived of the light of justice. For no human creature can justify himself, but to use all creatures justly, he must be justified by the Creator.

Thus the Lord Himself, although He condemns greed everywhere as a just judge, shows the use of earthly wealth as a true teacher in the very place which they wish to oppose to the prophet. For He says: "Make friends for yourselves from the mammon of iniquity." This means to say, what is mammon of iniquity should not be your mammon. Then you can justly use the abundance of earthly things and make friends who will receive you into eternal tabernacles, if this mammon is not yours, that is, if you do not think yourselves rich from it. For your riches, which are true riches and will free you from all want, are not to be compared with earthly wealth. But to be worthy to enjoy those, you must first use well these things, which are not true riches, nor yours, because they are called riches unjustly. These do not take away poverty, and the unrighteous consider them riches. For they think they will be freed from want by them. But you ought to desire other riches, that is, true and yours. But if you have not been faithful in unjust mammon, who will give you the true thing? And if you have not been faithful in what is another's, who will give you what is yours? A certain greedy man is praised in the Gospel.

Although it is evident that the Manichaeans, according to their custom, slander prophetic sayings. For anyone who has even modestly examined the context of the same Scripture will find that the Prophet did not speak of this silver or gold, with which imprudent greed madly raves, but rather of that gold and silver which the Apostle also mentions, saying: If anyone builds upon the foundation with gold, silver, precious stones. With which gold and silver, that rich treasure, which the Lord himself testified to be found in a field and marvelously and laudably purchased by a certain avaricious person after selling all his possessions. For predicting the Lord himself and figuratively designating, as usual, the times of the new age, that is, the Church, the Prophet says thus: "Yet once, it is a little while, and I will shake the heavens, and the earth, and the sea, and the dry land; and I will shake all nations, and the Desired of all nations will come, and I will fill this house with glory," says the Lord of hosts. "The silver is mine, and the gold is mine," says the Lord of hosts. "The glory of this later house will be greater than that of the former," says the Lord of hosts. "And in this place, I will give peace," says the Lord of hosts. The Desired One will come to all nations.

If they wish not to be dogs and swine, to whom we are prohibited from giving the holy and casting pearls, but to ask to receive and to seek to find and to knock that it may be opened to them, then perhaps they could, even without any interpreter, with the Holy Spirit Himself as their guide, understand what has been said, certainly pertaining without any obscurity to the new people, that is, the Christian people, whose great priest is Jesus, the Son of God, especially in that passage where it is said: "Yet once more, in a little while, I will shake the heavens and the earth and the sea and the dry land, and I will shake all nations. And the desired one of all nations shall come." For this verse is proclaimed concerning the last of the Lord's, that is, the second coming, in which He will come in glory, as the Prophet says: "And the desired one of all nations shall come." For when He first came in mortal flesh through the Virgin Mary, He was not yet desired by all nations, because they had not yet believed. But with the dissemination of the Gospel among all nations, His desire is kindled in all nations. For among all nations, His elect are and will be, who say with all their heart in prayer: "Your kingdom come." But the first coming spread mercy before judgment, in which judgment the glory of the second coming will shine forth. Therefore first, it had to shake the heaven when the angel announced to the Virgin who was to conceive Him, when the star led the Magi to worship Him, when again the angels announced His birth to the shepherds; shake the earth when it was disturbed by His miracles; shake the sea when this world raged with persecutions; shake the dry land when the believers in Him hungered and thirsted for righteousness; finally, shake all nations when His Gospel spread everywhere. Then, thereafter, the desired one would come to all nations, as prophesied. And this house, that is, the Church, shall be filled with glory. The house of God's glory will shine in the end.

Consequently, he then added: "Mine is the silver and the gold." For all wisdom, which is figuratively signified by the name of gold, and the words of the Lord, pure words, silver tried by fire from the earth, purified sevenfold, all such silver and gold are not human but the Lord's, so that since the house will be filled with glory, he who glories, let him glory in the Lord. For that great priest, the inhabitant of this house, our Lord Jesus Christ, for the sake of the return of man who had left paradise out of pride, deigned to present himself as an example of humility, which he testifies in the Gospel, crying: "Learn from me, for I am meek and humble of heart," lest anyone, in his house, that is, in the Church, should be puffed up desiring to seem his own whatever he can think or say wisely, see what a great remedy is said to him by the Lord God: "Mine is the gold and mine is the silver." Thus follows that the glory of this latter house will be greater than that of the former. For the first house, that is, the citizens of earthly Jerusalem, as the Apostle says, being ignorant of God's righteousness and seeking to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted to the righteousness of God. See if these, while saying that their gold and silver are theirs, were not able to attain the eternal glory of the latter house. Nevertheless, when the prophet says: "The glory of this latter house will be greater than that of the former," he shows that the first was not without some glory. For the Apostle spoke of that one too, when he said: "For if what is being annulled came through glory, much more will that which remains be in glory." But the last verse, with which this speech of the Prophet is concluded: And in this place, he says, I will give peace, says the Lord of hosts. What is: In this place, unless he is perhaps pointing to some earthly thing with his finger? For what can be contained in a place, if not a body? Therefore, it is not absurd to understand the ultimate resurrection of the body by which the most perfect beatitude is brought to an end, when the flesh no longer desires against the spirit, nor the spirit against the flesh. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. There will not be another law in the members waging war against the law of the mind, because in this place I will give peace, says the Lord of hosts. The Manicheans deceive the unskilled with their doctrines. For who is so deaf to divine voices as to be ignorant of what the Prophets say about the disdain for earthly gold and silver? For they bring forth from the Apostle, in order to deceive men, what he says: "The love of money is the root of all evil, which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows," as if you could easily find some book of the ancient Scriptures where avarice is not blamed and condemned as worthy of execration. But since the question now is about gold and silver, why do they not listen to the Prophet saying: "Their silver and their gold shall not be able to deliver them in the day of the wrath of the Lord"? If only someone would hear this eagerly and infuse it into the marrow of their soul, would they not, distancing themselves entirely from the enticements of false happiness, call upon God in embrace, having stripped off the old man to be clothed in immortality? But why should we treat this question any longer? I believe it is clear to your Charity that the sect of the Manichaeans does not operate with truth but with fraud when dealing with the unlearned, so that they prefer the new scriptures to the old, not in their entirety but by excerpting certain sentences, which they try to show as being contrary to themselves in order to deceive the unlearned. However, there is no new Testament or epistle of the Apostles or even a book of the Gospel from which such things cannot be done, so that by certain sentences one book might seem to be contrary to itself, unless its entire context is examined with the most diligent intention of the reader.

Sermons - Sermon 51

SERMO 51 On the Harmony of the Evangelists Matthew and Luke In the Generations of the Lord The proposed question is taken up for discussion on the birthday of Christ. May He who stirred up your love fulfill its expectation. For even though what we are to say to you, we presume to be not ours, but God’s; still, we speak all the more because, as the Apostle humbly says: We have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellence of the power may be of God and not of us. Therefore, we do not doubt that you remember our promise. We made the promise in Him, through whom we now fulfill it. For even when we promised, we asked from Him, and when we render, we receive from Him. Your love recalls that we postponed the question that we proposed to be solved in the morning of the Lord's Nativity, because many who were with us, even those to whom the word of God is usually burdensome, were celebrating the solemnity due to that day. But now I believe no one is present except those who desire to listen. Therefore, we do not speak to deaf hearts, nor to disdainful minds. But your expectation is a prayer for me. Something else has been added, because even the days of gift-giving have passed many by, for whose salvation we strive as much as we urge you, brothers, to strive; and for those who are not yet attentive to the spectacles of the truth, but are given to the spectacles of the flesh, pray to God with an attentive mind. For I know, and certainly I know, that there are now among your number those who have today despised; but they break away from what they are accustomed to. For people are changed, both for the better and for the worse. Through daily experiences of this kind, we alternately rejoice and grieve; we rejoice with those corrected, we grieve for the depraved. And therefore the Lord did not say that he who has begun will be saved, but: He who endures to the end, He said, will be saved. The spectacles of the pagans are frivolous and carnal; but those of the Christians are spiritual. But what more admirable could the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, who is also the son of man because he deigned to be that as well, grant to us; what more magnificent than not only to gather spectators of frivolous shows to His fold, but also some of those who are usually watched there? For He hunted not only lovers of hunters but also the hunters themselves for salvation: because He too was watched. Listen how. He said it, He foretold it before He was watched, and announced what would happen as if it had already been done with prophetic eloquence, saying in the Psalm: "They pierced my hands and my feet, they numbered all my bones." Behold how He was watched, so that His bones were numbered. And He speaks more openly about the spectacle itself: "They looked and stared at me." He was watched to be mocked, watched by those who would not even favor Him in that spectacle, but rage against Him: just as He let His martyrs be watched first, with the Apostle saying: "We have been made a spectacle to the world, both to angels and to men." But two kinds of people watch such spectacles; one of the carnal, the other of the spiritual. Carnal people watch, thinking those martyrs who were subjected to beasts, who were beheaded, who were burned by fires, to be miserable, detesting and abhorring them. But others, like the holy angels, watch, not paying attention to the manglings of bodies, but marveling at the integrity of faith. A great spectacle is presented to the eyes of the heart by a whole mind, even with the body torn apart. You eagerly watch these things with the eyes of your heart when they are read in church. For if you were watching nothing, you would hear nothing. Therefore, you see that today you did not despise spectacles but chose them. So may God be present, granting that you sweetly recount your spectacles to your friends whom you lament today have run to the amphitheater and were unwilling to come to the church: so that those things which they have loved to their disgrace may begin to become worthless to them; and they may love God with you, of whom no lover can be ashamed, because they love Him who cannot be conquered. They may love Christ with you, who, even when He seemed to be defeated, conquered the world. For indeed, He conquered the world as we see, brothers: He subjected all powers, He subjugated kings, not with a proud army, but with a mocked cross; not by fierce iron, but by hanging on wood; by suffering physically, acting spiritually. His body was raised on the cross: He was subjecting minds to the cross. Finally, what gemstone is more precious in the diadem than the cross of Christ on the foreheads of rulers? Loving Him, you are never ashamed. For how many return conquered from the amphitheater, defeated for those whom they frenzy over? They would be more conquered if they conquered. For they would be subjected to vain joy, subjected to the exultation of perverse desire: for in this very thing by which they run there, they are conquered. For how many do you think, brothers, hesitated today whether to go here or there? And those who, in that hesitation, considering Christ, ran to the church, conquered not just any man, but the devil himself, the worst hunter of the whole world. But those who in that hesitation chose rather to run to the amphitheater were certainly conquered by him whom these conquered. But they conquered in Him who said: "Rejoice, because I have conquered the world." For the Emperor allowed Himself to be tempted, so that He might teach the soldier to fight.

Christ wished to be born of a virgin. Through a woman came the poison, through a woman came the salvation.

Therefore, in order for our Lord Jesus Christ to accomplish this, by being born of a woman, He indeed became the son of man. But if He had not been born of the Virgin Mary, what would have been lacking? Someone might say: He wanted to become a man: He would be a man, yet not born of a woman: for the first man whom He created was not made from a woman. To this, see what response is given. You say, why did He choose to be born from a woman. The answer to you is: Rather, why should He avoid being born from a woman? Suppose I cannot show why He chose to be born from a woman: you show why He ought to avoid being born from a woman. But it has already been said, because if He avoided a woman's womb, it would be as if He indicated that He could have been stained by it. However, the more immaculate He was by His own substance, the less He should fear the womb of the flesh, as if He could be stained by it: but being born of a woman, He ought to show us something of great sacrament. Indeed, brothers, we admit that if the Lord wanted to become a man in such a way that He was not born from a woman, it was certainly easy for His Majesty. For just as He could be born from a woman without a man, so could He be born without a woman. But He showed us this, so that in no sex of human creation should there be despair about Himself. For the human sex is male and female. If, therefore, being a man, which He indeed ought to have been, He was not born of a woman; women would despair about themselves, remembering their first sin, because the first man was deceived by a woman; and they would think they had no hope in Christ at all. Therefore He came to prefer the male sex by being born of a woman to console the female sex, as if to speak and say: "So that you may know that it is not the creature of God that is evil, but perverse pleasure that corrupts it, in the beginning when I made man, I made them male and female. I do not condemn the creature which I made.

Behold, I was born a man, behold, I was born of a woman. Therefore I do not condemn the creature which I made; but the sins, which I did not make. Let each sex see its honor, and let each confess its iniquity, and let each hope for salvation. By deceiving, poison was offered to man through a woman: by repairing, salvation is offered to man through a woman. Let a woman compensate for the sin of the man deceived through her, by giving birth to Christ. Hence, also, women first announced the resurrection of God to the Apostles. A woman announced death to her husband in paradise: and women announced salvation to men in the Church. The Apostles were to announce the resurrection of Christ to the nations: women announced it to the Apostles. Therefore, let no one reproach Christ born of a woman, of whom the Savior could not be stained, and whom the Creator ought to commend." The faith of the Gospel received throughout the whole world.

But, they say, how are we to believe that Christ was born of a woman? I answer: From the Gospel which has been preached and is being preached to the whole world. But the blind, attempting to blind others, try to introduce doubt into what has already been believed by all nations, and, not seeing what should be seen, they attempt to overturn what should be believed. They reply and say: Do not press us with the authority of the world; let us consider Scripture itself. Do not act in a popular way: the deceived multitude favors you. First, I reply here: Does the deceived multitude favor me? This multitude was once a small number. Where did this multitude come from, which in such growths was foretold long ago? It did not appear to grow, that which was not foreseen. I do not say, It was a few: there was one Abraham. Consider, brothers, there was one Abraham throughout the whole world at that time, throughout the whole world among all men, among all nations, to whom it was said: In your seed all nations will be blessed. What one believed in his singularity was manifested to many from the multitude of his seed. Then it was not seen, and it was believed; now it is seen, and it is opposed: and what was then said to one and believed by one; now it is opposed by a few, since it is shown among many. He who made his disciples fishers of men, included within his nets all kinds of authority. If belief is to be given to the multitude, what is more abundant than the Church spread throughout the whole world? If belief is to be given to the rich, let them see how many rich it has taken: if to the poor, let them see the thousands of poor: if to the noble, almost all nobility is now within: if to kings, let them see all subjects of Christ: if to the more eloquent, learned, or prudent, let them see how many orators, how many skilled, how many philosophers of this world have been ensnared by those fishermen, so that they might be drawn to salvation from the depths; considering him who, descending to heal the great evil of the human soul, that is, pride, by the example of his humility, chose the weak things of the world to confound the strong; and chose the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; not those who truly are, but those who seem to be: and chose the ignoble things of this world and the things that are not, to bring to nothing the things that are.

It is believed that there is no disagreement in the Gospels, as long as they are understood properly.

Say whatever you wish, they say, we have found that where you read that Christ was born, the Gospels contradict each other, and that it is impossible for both to be true, which are in discord. For when I show, he says, the discord, I rightly disprove the faith; but you who accept the faith, show the agreement. What discord, I pray, will you demonstrate? An evident one, he says, which no one can contradict. How securely you listen, because you are faithful. Attend, dearest ones, and see how beneficially the Apostle advises, saying: As therefore you have received Christ Jesus our Lord, walk in him, rooted and built up in him, and confirmed in the faith. For with the same simple and certain faith, we must firmly remain in him, so that he may reveal to the faithful what is hidden in him: because as the same apostle says: In him are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. These are not hidden to deny, but to excite the desire for the hidden things. This is the utility of the secret. Honor in what you do not yet understand; and honor all the more, the more veils you see. For the more honorable a person is, the more veils hang in his house. The veils create the honor of the secret: but to those who honor, the veils are lifted. To those mocking the veils, they are driven away from the vicinity of the veils. Therefore, because we have passed on to Christ, the veil is removed.

Pious faith in the Scriptures. Augustine, not bringing a pious mind to the divine Scriptures sometimes, is deceived.

Some bring forth their slanders and say: Is Matthew certainly an evangelist? We answer, yes, with a pious mouth, a devoted heart, doubting in no way at all: we clearly answer, Matthew is indeed an Evangelist. Do you believe him, they ask? Who would not respond, I believe? How has it resounded so piously from your murmur? Yes, brothers, if you believe securely, there is no reason for you to be ashamed. I speak to you, sometimes deceived, when as a boy, I first approached the divine Scriptures with more sharpness for disputing than with piety for seeking: I myself was closing the door of my Lord against me with perverse behavior: when I ought to be knocking so it would be opened; I was adding to close it. For in my pride, I dared to seek what cannot be found unless one is humble. How much more blessed are you now! How securely you learn, how safe you are, whoever you are, still little ones in the nest of faith, and you receive spiritual food! But I, wretched as I am, when I thought myself fit to fly, left the nest; and I fell before I could fly. But the merciful Lord lifted me, so that I would not be trampled and die, and placed me back in the nest. For these things disturbed me, which now securely in the name of the Lord I both propose and explain to you.

How Christ is Abraham and David. As I was saying, this is how they malign: "Matthew," they say, "is an evangelist, and you believe him?" Clearly, we necessarily believe the one whom we acknowledge as an evangelist. Look at the genealogies of Christ that Matthew has set forth: "The book of the generation of Jesus Christ, the son of David, the son of Abraham." How is he the son of David? How is he the son of Abraham? For unless through the succession of lineage, it cannot be shown. Indeed, it is known that when the Lord was born of the Virgin Mary, neither Abraham nor David was alive among men. And you say he is the son of David, and the same you say is the son of Abraham? It is as if we say to Matthew, "Then prove what you say. For I expect the succession of the lineage of Christ." "Abraham begat Isaac, Isaac begat Jacob, Jacob begat Judah and his brothers, Judah begat Phares and Zarah of Thamar, Phares begat Esrom, Esrom begat Aram, Aram begat Aminadab, Aminadab begat Naasson, Naasson begat Salmon, Salmon begat Booz of Rahab, Booz begat Obed of Ruth, Obed begat Jesse, Jesse begat David the king." Now observe how from David it comes to Christ, who is said to be the son of Abraham and the son of David. "David begat Solomon of her that had been the wife of Urias, Solomon begat Roboam, Roboam begat Abia, Abia begat Asa, Asa begat Josaphat, Josaphat begat Joram, Joram begat Ozias, Ozias begat Joatham, Joatham begat Achaz, Achaz begat Ezekias, Ezekias begat Manasses, Manasses begat Amon, Amon begat Josias, Josias begat Jechonias and his brothers, in the exile to Babylon. And after the exile to Babylon, Jechonias begat Salathiel, Salathiel begat Zorobabel, Zorobabel begat Abiud, Abiud begat Eliakim, Eliakim begat Azor, Azor begat Sadoc, Sadoc begat Achim, Achim begat Eliud, Eliud begat Eleazar, Eleazar begat Matthan, Matthan begat Jacob, Jacob begat Joseph the husband of Mary, of whom Jesus was born, who is called Christ." Thus, through the order and succession of their parents and ancestors, Christ is found to be the son of David, the son of Abraham.

Generations from Abraham to Christ. To this matter faithfully recounted, they bring forth this first calumny, because the same Matthew follows and says: "All the generations from Abraham to David are fourteen generations; and from David to the deportation to Babylon, fourteen generations; and from the deportation to Babylon to Christ, fourteen generations." Then he added to narrate how Christ was born of the Virgin Mary, appending and saying: "Now the birth of Christ was thus." For indeed he enumerated the order of the parents to explain why Christ is called the son of David, the son of Abraham. The conception of Christ by the Holy Spirit. But how he was born and appeared among men must now be told; and the narration itself is in order, by which we believe that our Lord Jesus Christ was not only born of the eternal God, co-eternal with him who begot before all times, before all creation, by whom all things were made; but also now born of the Holy Spirit from the virgin Mary, which we equally confess. For you remember and know (I speak to my Catholic brothers) that this is our faith, that we profess and confess this. For this faith, thousands of martyrs have been killed throughout the entire world.

"Justice" Joseph sincere, not feigned. For those who wish to ridicule this matter that follows, seeking to undermine faith in the evangelical books, they might show us as those who believed rashly in what is said: "When his mother Mary was betrothed to Joseph, before they came together, she was found to be with child from the Holy Spirit. Joseph her husband, being a righteous man and unwilling to disgrace her, decided to divorce her quietly. Because he knew that the child was not his own, he consequently thought her to be an adulteress. As the Scripture says, since he was righteous and did not want to expose her, that is, to make it public, for many manuscripts have this; he decided to divorce her quietly. The husband is indeed troubled, but the righteous man does not act harshly. Such great justice is attributed to this man that he neither wanted to keep an adulteress nor dared to punish her publicly. He decided, it says, to divorce her quietly: because not only did he not want to punish her, but neither did he want to expose her. Observe the pure justice. He did not wish to spare her because he desired to keep her. Many, out of carnal love, spare adulterous wives, wishing to keep them as adulteresses to enjoy them through carnal desire. But this righteous man does not want to keep her: therefore he does not love her carnally. Yet he does not want to punish her: therefore he spares her mercifully. What kind of righteous man is this? He neither keeps an adulteress nor seems to spare her out of lustful love: and yet he neither punishes nor exposes her. Deservedly, he was clearly chosen as a witness to the virginity of his wife. Thus, he who was disturbed by human weakness was made firm by divine authority.

What does the name Jesus mean. For the Evangelist follows and says: While he thought on these things, behold, an angel of the Lord appeared to him in a dream, saying: Joseph, do not be afraid to take Mary as your wife. For that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Spirit. And she shall bring forth a son, and you shall call his name Jesus. Why Jesus? For, he says, he shall save his people from their sins. Therefore it is understood that Jesus in the Hebrew language is interpreted in Latin as Savior, which we notice from the very explanation of the name. For as if it were asked, why Jesus? He immediately added, explaining the reason for the name: For he shall save his people from their sins. This we devoutly believe, this we most firmly hold, that Christ was born of the Holy Spirit from the Virgin Mary. The usefulness of heretics and of Judas the betrayer. So what do they say? If I find, he says, falsehood, surely you do not believe everything. I have found it, let us see. I count the generations. For by their slanders they invite us to this point, and they bring us. If we live piously, if we believe in Christ, if we do not desire to fly from the nest before the time, they bring us to this point, that we may know the mysteries. Therefore let Your Holiness attend to the usefulness of heretics; and indeed the usefulness according to God, who uses even evil well. According to them, however, this is rendered, which they wanted; not what God does well through them. How much good did God make out of Judas? By the passion of the Lord the nations were saved. But in order that the Lord might suffer, Judas betrayed him. Therefore God both frees the nations by the suffering of the Son, and punishes Judas for his crime. For the sacraments which lie hidden there, no one would discuss, content with a simpler faith; and therefore no one would find out, because no one would discuss, unless the slanderers knock. For when heretics slander, the little ones are disturbed: when they are disturbed, they inquire: their inquiry is like a striking from the head on the mother's breast, so that they may suck as much as is enough for the little ones. They, disturbed, seek; but those who know and have learned, because they have searched, and God opened to them knocking, they open also to the disturbed ones. And thus it happens that they are useful for finding the truth, while slandering to lead into error. The truth would indeed be sought more negligently, if it did not have deceitful adversaries. For, it is necessary, he says, that there be heresies. And as if we sought the cause, he immediately added: That those who are approved may be made manifest among you. The generations of fourteen three times, with Jeconiah counted twice, are found in Matthew.

What then do they say? Behold, Matthew counts the generations and says that from Abraham to David there are fourteen, and from David to the Babylonian captivity fourteen, and from the deportation to Babylon to Christ fourteen. When you add up three times fourteen, you get forty-two. However, they count and find forty-one generations and raise an objection, and mockingly insult. What then does it mean when it is said in the Gospel that there are three sets of fourteen, yet all counted are found to be not forty-two, but forty-one? Without a doubt, it is a great mystery. And we rejoice, giving thanks to the Lord, because even through the occasion of the detractors, we discover something that delights us the more the more it was concealed. As we have previously stated, we present a spectacle of the mind. Therefore, from Abraham to David, there are fourteen. Then the count starts from Solomon: for David begot Solomon. The count starts from Solomon and reaches Jeconiah, during whose life the deportation to Babylon took place; and these are another fourteen generations, with Solomon counted at the beginning of the second interval, and also Jeconiah, to whom the number closes, fulfilling the fourteen. The third interval begins from Jeconiah himself.

Why Jechoniah is counted twice. May Your Holiness attend to a mystical and sweet matter: I confess to you the taste of my heart; from this, I believe that when I express it and you taste it, you will proclaim the same thing. Therefore, pay attention. From Jeconiah, beginning the number of the third interval, up to the Lord Jesus Christ, there are fourteen: because Jeconiah is counted both as the final of the previous interval and as the initial of the subsequent interval. But someone might say: Why is Jeconiah counted twice? Nothing happened previously in the people of Israel that was not a mystery of future things. Jeconiah is indeed not unreasonably counted twice: for if there is an end between two fields, or a stone, or some wall of separation, and he who is on this side measures up to that wall, and he who is on the other side begins measuring again from the same place. But why was this not done in the first connection of the interval, where we count fourteen generations from Abraham to David, and another fourteen without repeating David, but we begin counting from Solomon? The reason must be given, which contains a great sacrament. May Your Holiness attend. Then the migration into Babylon happened, when Jeconiah the king was established in place of his deceased father. The kingdom was taken from him, and another was established in his place. But yet, migration to the Gentiles happened while Jeconiah was still alive. For no fault is attributed to Jeconiah for which he was deprived of the kingdom: but rather the sins of those who succeeded him are brought forward. Therefore, captivity follows, they go to Babylon. Not only the wicked go; but also the saints go along with them. In that captivity was the prophet Ezekiel, in that was Daniel; there, three boys were ennobled among the flames. They went according to the prophecy of the prophet Jeremiah. The transition of the Gospel to the nations is figured in the migration to Babylon.

Remember Jecoiachin, reproached without any fault, then ceased to reign, and made the transition to the Gentiles, when he was taken to Babylon: and consider the prefigured image of future things in the Lord Jesus Christ. For the Jews did not want our Lord Jesus Christ to reign over them, whom they found no fault in. He was rejected in Himself, and also rejected in His servants; and the transition was made to the Gentiles, as if into Babylon. For this is what Jeremiah also prophesied, commanding the Lord to go into Babylon. And whoever other prophets told the people not to go into Babylon, Jeremiah accused them as false prophets. Let those who read the Scriptures remember with us: those who do not read, believe us. Therefore Jeremiah, from the Lord's perspective, threatened those who did not want to go to Babylon: but to those who went, he promised peace there, and a certain happiness in renewing vineyards and planting gardens and the abundance of fruits. How therefore does the people of Israel now not go to Babylon in a figure, but in truth? From where were the Apostles? Were they not from the Jewish people? From where was Paul himself? For he also says, "I am an Israelite, from the seed of Abraham, from the tribe of Benjamin." Therefore many Jews believed in the Lord. From there the Apostles were chosen: from there were the more than five hundred brothers who were worthy to see the Lord after His resurrection: from there were the one hundred and twenty in the house, when the Holy Spirit came. But what does the Apostle say in the Acts of the Apostles when the Jews rejected the word of truth? "It was necessary that we should first speak the word of God to you; but since you reject it, behold, we turn to the Gentiles." Therefore the transition to Babylon was made according to the spiritual dispensation of the time of the Lord's Incarnation, which was prefigured at the time of Jeremiah. But what does Jeremiah say to those who migrate to Babylon about these Babylonians? "For in their peace," he says, "shall your peace be." Therefore, when Israel was migrating even through Christ and the Apostles to Babylon— that is, the Gospel came to the Gentiles—what does the Apostle say as if from the voice of Jeremiah at that time? "I exhort therefore, that, first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks be made for all men; for kings, and for all that are in authority; that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty." There were not yet Christian kings, and he prayed for them. Therefore, Israel praying in Babylon was heard. The voices of the Church were heard, Christians were made: and you see fulfilled what was said figuratively: "In their peace shall be your peace." For they received the peace of Christ, and ceased to persecute Christians; so that now the churches might be built in the security of peace, and the people planted in the agriculture of God, and all nations might bear fruit in faith, hope, and charity that is in Christ.

Christ is portrayed as a cornerstone between Jews and Gentiles in Jeconiah.

There was a migration to Babylon then under Jehoiachin, who was not allowed to reign over the people of the Jews, as a type of Christ, whom the Jews did not want to reign over themselves. Israel transitioned to the Gentiles, that is, the preachers of the Gospel passed to the peoples of the Gentiles. Why, then, do you marvel that Jehoiachin is counted twice? Indeed, if he bore the figure of Christ transitioning from the Jews to the Gentiles, consider what Christ is among the Jews and Gentiles. Is he not that cornerstone? Consider at the corner the end of one wall and the beginning of the other wall. Up to that stone you measure one wall, and from it the other. Therefore, the cornerstone is counted twice, which connects both walls. Therefore, Jehoiachin, bearing the figure of the Lord, as a type of the cornerstone, foreshadowed. And just as Jehoiachin was not permitted to reign over the Jews, but was exiled to Babylon, so Christ, the stone which the builders rejected, became the head of the corner, so that the Gospel might reach the Gentiles. Therefore, do not hesitate to count the head of the corner twice, and the written number comes to you; and so there are fourteen, and fourteen, and fourteen: and yet they are not forty-two generations, but forty-one. Because just as the order of stones, when it is directed in a straight line, all are counted individually; but when the order is twisted to form an angle, that stone where it twists must be counted twice; because it belongs to both the order that ends at it and the order that begins from it: thus the order of generations, as long as it remained in that people, did not form an angle at the interval of twice seven, that is, fourteen; but when the order was twisted, so as to be exiled to Babylon, it was as if an angle was made by Jehoiachin; so that it was necessary to count him twice as a type of that venerable cornerstone.

Why the genealogy of Christ is traced through Joseph.

Another one of their accusations is this: they say that the generations of Christ are counted through Joseph and not through Mary. Let Your Holiness observe this briefly. They say it ought not to be through Joseph. Why ought it not to be through Joseph? Wasn't Joseph the husband of Mary? They say, "No." Who says this? For the Scripture says by angelic authority that he was. "Do not be afraid," it says, "to take Mary as your wife. For what has been conceived in her is from the Holy Spirit." He is also commanded to give the child a name, although he was not born from his own seed. "She will bear a son," it says, "and you shall name him Jesus." But the Scripture intends to show that he was not born from Joseph's seed, when it says, with concern regarding her pregnancy: "It is from the Holy Spirit." And yet the paternal authority is not taken away from him; he is commanded to give the child a name. Moreover, the virgin Mary herself, well aware that she conceived Christ not from his embrace and intercourse, still calls him the father of Christ.

Joseph called the father of Christ by Mary. Christ does not deny being the son of Joseph.

Pay attention in what manner. When the Lord Jesus Christ was twelve years old according to his humanity, who according to God is before time and without time, he remained with them in the temple, and was disputing with the elders, and they marveled at his teaching. But they, returning from Jerusalem, sought him among their companions, namely among those who were traveling with them; and not finding him, they returned to Jerusalem troubled, and found him disputing in the temple with the elders, when he was, as I have said, twelve years old. But why marvel? The Word of God never remains silent, but is not always heard. Therefore he is found in the temple, and his mother said to him: Why have you done this to us? Your father and I have been seeking you sorrowing. And he replied: Did you not know that I must be in what is my Father's? He said this because he was the Son of God in the temple of God. For that temple was not of Joseph but of God. Behold, someone says, he did not allow himself to be called the son of Joseph. Be more patient, brothers, because of the shortness of time, so that the sermon may suffice. When Mary said: Your father and I have been seeking you sorrowing; he answered: Did you not know that I must be in what is my Father's? For he did not wish to be their son in such a way as not to be understood as the Son of God. For the Son of God, always the Son of God, creating even them themselves. But the Son of Man from time, born of a virgin without marital seed, yet he had both parents. How do we prove this? Mary already said: Your father and I have been seeking you sorrowing. The modesty and humility of Mary should be imitated by women.

First, brothers, above all for the discipline of women, our sisters, the holy modesty of the Virgin Mary should not be overlooked. She had borne Christ, an angel had come to her and said to her: "Behold, you will conceive in your womb, and you will bear a son, and you shall call his name Jesus. He will be great and will be called the Son of the Most High." She had merited to bear the Son of the Most High and was most humble: she did not put herself before her husband, nor did she take precedence in order or name, to say, "I and your father"; but she said, "Your father and I." She did not pay attention to the dignity of her womb, but regarded the marital order. For a humble Christ would not have taught his mother to be proud. "Your father and I were sorrowing seeking you," she said. "Your father and I," she said, because the man is the head of the woman. How much less ought other women to be proud? For even Mary herself was called a woman, not having lost her virginity, but by the proper designation of her people. For the Apostle also said of the Lord Jesus Christ: "Born of a woman"; yet he did not disrupt the order and context of our faith, in which we confess that he was born of the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary. For she conceived as a virgin, gave birth as a virgin, and remained a virgin. But all the Hebrews called women "feminas." Hear the most evident example. The first woman, whom God made from the side of the man before they had intercourse, which is written to have happened after they left paradise, was already called a woman, with Scripture saying: "He made her into a woman."

Christ does not deny Joseph as a father.

Therefore, the Lord Jesus Christ replies: "It was necessary for me to be in the things of my Father"; He does not indicate the Father as God in such a way as to deny Joseph as father. How do we prove this? According to the Scripture, which says thus: "And he said to them: Did you not know that I must be in the things of my Father?" But they did not understand what he said to them. And when he came down with them, he went to Nazareth, and was subject to them. He did not say: "He was subject to his mother"; or, "He was subject to him"; but, "he was subject to them," he says. To whom was he subject? Were they not parents? Both were parents to whom he was subject, in the dignity by which he was the son of man. The obedience of the child Jesus is to be imitated by children. For a long time women were receiving the commandments: now let children receive them, so that they may obey their parents and be subject to them. The world is subject to Christ, Christ is subject to parents.

Christ is both the son and Lord of David.

You see, therefore, brethren, that he did not say: "I must be about my Father's business," so that we would understand it as if he had said, "You are not my parents." But those parents are temporal, that Father is eternal. Those parents are of the Son of Man, that Father is of the Word and His Wisdom, Father of His Power, through whom all things were formed. If all things are formed through Him, who reaches from one end to the other mightily and arranges all things gently, then through the Son of God even those were formed to whom later that same Son of Man would be subject. And the Apostle says that he is the son of David: Who was made to him, it says, of the seed of David according to the flesh. But the Lord Himself proposes a question to the Jews, which in these very words the Apostle solves. For when he said: Who was made to him of the seed of David; he added to this, according to the flesh, so that it might be understood that according to divinity, He is not the son of David, but the Son of God, the Lord of David. For in another place, the Apostle says so, when he commended the lineage of the Jews: Whose are the fathers, he says, of whom is Christ according to the flesh, who is over all, God blessed forever. What is according to the flesh is from there the son of David: but what is over all, God blessed forever, is from there the Lord of David. Therefore, the Lord says to the Jews: Whose son do you say the Christ is? They responded: David. For they knew this, as it was easily understood from the preaching of the Prophets. And indeed he was of the seed of David, but according to the flesh through the virgin Mary betrothed to Joseph. So when they responded that Christ is the son of David, Jesus said to them: How then does David in spirit call him Lord, saying, "The Lord said to my Lord, Sit at my right hand until I put your enemies under your feet"? If then David in spirit calls him Lord, how is he his son? And the Jews could not answer. Thus, we have it in the Gospel. He did not deny being the son of David; so that they would not be ignorant that he is the Lord of David. Indeed, they held in Christ what was made in time: they did not understand in Him what is in eternity. Therefore, wishing to teach them about his divinity, he posed a question about his humanity: as if he were saying, "You know that Christ is the son of David; answer me, how is he also the Lord of David." But lest they say, "He is not the Lord of David"; he interposed David himself as a witness. And what does he say? Surely he speaks the truth. For you also have it in the Psalms as speaking to David: From the fruit of your body I will set one upon your throne. Behold the son of David. How is he also the Lord of David, who is the son of David? He said, he says: The Lord said to my Lord, Sit at my right hand. Do you marvel that David has his son as Lord, when you see Mary has given birth to her own Lord? The Lord of David, because God; the Lord of David, because of all: but the son of David, because the son of man. The same is Lord, the same is son: the Lord of David, who being in the form of God did not consider it robbery to be equal to God: but the son of David, because he emptied himself, taking the form of a servant.

Marriage is made, not by carnal union, but by conjugal love.

Therefore, Joseph was not any less the father, even though he did not have relations with the mother of the Lord. It is not lust that defines a wife, but marital love. Let Your Holiness pay close attention. In a short while, the Apostle of Christ will say in the Church: “It remains that those who have wives be as though they had none.” And we know many of our brothers, fruitful in grace, who, in the name of Christ, abstain from carnal desire by mutual consent, but do not abstain from marital love. The more that desire is restrained, the more firmly this love is established. Are there not spouses who live in such a manner, not seeking the fruits of the flesh from each other, not demanding the debt of bodily desire from each other? Yet, she is still subject to her husband because it is fitting; and the more so, the more chaste she is. And he loves his wife truly, as it is written: “In honor and sanctification,” as a co-heir of grace, as Christ loved the Church. Therefore, if there is a union, it is a marriage. It is not any less a marriage because they do not engage in what can happen even outside of marriage, and illicitly so. If only everyone could live that way; but many cannot. Therefore, let us not separate those who can, nor deny the status of husband or wife to those who do not unite carnally, but are connected in heart. The limit of carnal union "for the sake of begetting children" is established by matrimonial records; venial sin in its transgression. From this, understand, my brothers, what Scripture felt about those of our parents who were married in such a way that they sought only offspring from their spouses. For they held themselves with such chastity, those who according to the custom and manner of their nation even had several [wives], that they approached carnal intercourse only for the purpose of procreation, truly holding them in honor. But whoever desires the flesh of a wife beyond that defined limit, for the purpose of begetting children, acts against the very contract by which he has taken her as a wife. The contract is read publicly in the sight of all the witnesses and it is read, "for the purpose of procreation of children"; and they are called marriage contracts. If wives are given and received for this purpose, who with a sound mind would give their daughter to another's lust? But so parents may not be embarrassed when giving, the contracts are read; so they are matchmakers, not pimps. What then is read from the contracts? "For the purpose of begetting children." The father's face is wiped and cleared, upon hearing the word of the contract. Let us observe the face of the husband receiving the wife. Let the husband be ashamed to take her otherwise, if the father is ashamed to give her otherwise. But if they cannot (as we have sometimes said before), let them demand the due; let them not go beyond what is due. Both the woman and the man must console themselves over their infirmity. Do not let him go to another, nor her to another: from which it is called adultery, as if with another. And if they go beyond the bounds of the marriage agreement, let them not go beyond the bounds of the matrimonial bed. Is it not a sin to demand from a spouse beyond the necessity for procreation of children? It is indeed a sin, but a venial one. The Apostle says: "But I say this by way of concession," when he said: "Do not deprive each other except by mutual consent for a time, so that you may devote yourselves to prayer; then come together again so that Satan will not tempt you because of your lack of self-control." What is this? Do not impose on yourselves more than you can bear; do not abstain from each other so long that you fall into adultery. Let Satan not tempt you because of your lack of self-control. And lest it seem he was commanding what he permitted (for it is one thing to command virtue, another to permit infirmity), he immediately adds: "I say this as a concession, not as a command." For I wish that all men were as I am. As if he said: I do not command you to act this way; but I forgive you if you do. The human race stands on two supports.

Therefore, my brothers, pay attention. Those great men who had wives for the sake of procreating children, as we read the Fathers to have been, and we find by many proofs, the pages of Holy Scripture altogether undoubtedly declaring: if then there are men who have wives solely for the purpose of having children, if it could be given to them to have children without intercourse, would they not embrace such a benefit with ineffable joy? Would they not receive it with great happiness? For there are two bodily deeds by which the human race subsists: in which two deeds the wise and holy descend out of duty; the imprudent, however, rush into them out of desire. For it is one thing to descend into something out of duty, another thing to fall into something out of desire. What are these by which the human race subsists? First, in ourselves, what pertains to taking sustenance (which indeed cannot be taken without some delight through the flesh), eating and drinking: if you do not do this, you will die. Therefore, the human race stands by this one support, according to the measure of its nature, by eating and drinking. But by this support humans are sustained as far as it pertains to themselves: they do not ensure succession by eating and drinking; but by taking wives. For thus the human race consists, first so that men live: but because no care, however great, applied to the body can make them always live; the consequent provision is that those being born should succeed the dying. For so it is with the human race, as it is written, just as the leaves on a tree: but on an olive tree, or laurel, or some such tree, which is never without foliage; but still it does not always have the same leaves. For, as it is written, it generates some, and sheds others: because those which are newly sprouting, succeed the falling others. For it always sheds leaves, it is always clothed with leaves. Thus the human race daily does not feel the loss of the dying, due to the supplements of the newborn: and thus, according to its measure, the entire species of the human race subsists; and just as the leaves on a tree always seem to appear, so the earth full of humans is beheld. But if they only died, and were not born; like some trees stripped of all their leaves, so the earth would be stripped of all humans. To the necessities of life, some are led by desire, others by reason.

Therefore, since the human race subsists in such a way that two supports are necessary, about which enough has been said; the wise, prudent, and faithful one descends to each duty, not falls due to lust. How many rush voraciously to eating and drinking, placing their whole life there, as if it were the very cause of living? For while they eat to live, they think they live to eat. Every wise person rebukes such people, especially the divine Scripture, calling them gluttons, drunkards, revelers, whose god is their belly. They are led to the table not by a desire for nourishment but by the lust of the flesh. Thus, they fall into food and drink. But those who descend due to the duty of living do not live to eat; rather, they eat to live. Therefore, if it were offered to these prudent and temperate ones to live without food and drink, with what joy would they embrace this favor, so that they would not be forced to descend or fall, but always remain uplifted in the Lord? Would not the necessity of sustaining the body's ruins cease to burden their intentions? How do you think the holy Elijah felt when he received the cup of water and the cake of bread, which was enough for him for the nourishment of forty days? Certainly, with great joy, for he ate and drank for the duty of life, not for the servitude of lust. Try to afford this, if you can, to a man who places all his happiness and bliss in feasting, like cattle in a stable. He hates your favor, rejects it, considers it a punishment. Thus also in that marital duty, lustful men seek wives for no other reason: and therefore they are scarcely content with even their own wives. And if they cannot or will not remove lust, they should not let it exceed what is prescribed by marital duty, even that which is conceded to weakness. But clearly, if you said to such a man, "Why do you take a wife?" he perhaps would answer you bashfully, "For the sake of children." If someone said to him, whom he would believe without any doubt, "God is able to give you children and will certainly give you children, even without performing that act with your wife," he would certainly be concluded and admit that he did not seek a wife for the sake of children. Let him therefore confess his weakness: let him accept what he pretended to accept for duty.

It was permitted for the fathers to have many wives for this reason only, that they might beget children.

Thus those former saints, men of God, sought sons, and wished to receive sons. For this purpose alone they joined with women; for this purpose they mingled with women, so that they might beget children. For this reason, it was permitted for them to have many [wives]. For if immoderate desire pleased God, it would be permitted at that time, so that one woman might have many husbands, just as one man could have many wives. Why did all chaste women not have more than one husband, and a man many wives: if not because one man having many wives is pertinent to the number of offspring; but one woman, no matter how many husbands she had, could not bear more children? Therefore, brothers, if our Fathers were joined and mingled with women for no other reason than to beget children; it would be a great joy for them, if besides that carnal work they could have children, for whose sake they did not rush into it out of lust, but descended from duty. For this reason, Joseph was not a father, because he received a son without carnal desire? Let it not be that Christian chastity thinks this, which even Judaic chastity did not think. Love your wives, but love them chastely. Seek the carnal work only to the extent that you may beget children. And because you cannot have children otherwise, descend to it with pain. For it is the punishment of that Adam, from whom we have descended. Let us not be proud about our punishment. It is the punishment of him who deserved to beget mortally; because through sin he became mortal. God did not take away that punishment; so that man would remember from where he is recalled, and to where he is called; and would seek that embrace, where no corruption can exist. In that people, therefore, because an abundant propagation had to occur up to Christ, through the multitude of the people in which all the teachings that were to prefigure the Church were prefigured, they had the duty of taking wives through whom the people would grow, in which people the Church would be foreordained. The dignity of virginity began from the Mother of the Lord. Joseph, how truly the father of Christ. But when the King of all nations himself was born, the dignity of the virgin began with the Mother of the Lord, who both deserved to have a son and did not deserve to be corrupted. Thus, therefore, was that marriage, both a marriage without any corruption: thus the chaste wife gave birth, why wouldn't the husband also receive chastely? For just as that wife was chaste, so was that husband chaste: and just as that mother was chaste, so was that father chaste. Therefore, he who says: he should not be called father because he did not beget the son in that way; seeks lust in the procreation of children, not the affection of love. He more nobly fulfilled in spirit what another might desire to fulfill in the flesh. For those who adopt children also more purely generate them in their heart, whom they cannot in the flesh. See, brothers, see the laws of adoption, how a man becomes a son whose seed he was not born from; so that the will of the adopting exceeds the nature of the begetting. Therefore, Joseph not only ought to have been a father, but most certainly ought to have been. For even of women who are not wives, men generate children, and they are called natural children; and conjugal offspring are preferred to them. As far as the work of the flesh is concerned, they are equally born: wherefore do these offspring surpass the others, if not because the love of a wife from whom children are procreated is purer? There, the mingling of flesh is not regarded, which is equal in both women. Where does a wife surpass, if not in the affection of faith, the affection of marriage, the affection of purer and more chaste love? Therefore, if one could receive children from a wife without intercourse, would he not be all the more joyous, as she is chaster, whom he loves more?

Two fathers of Joseph are rightly admitted to reconcile Matthew and Luke.

Hence, now also see that it is possible for one man not only to have two sons, but also two fathers. For, with the mention of adoption, it may occur in your thoughts that it can happen. For it is said, "A man can have two sons, but he cannot have two fathers." Rather, it is found that he can also have two fathers; if one generates by seed, the other by adoption through affection. If then, one man can have two fathers, Joseph could have had two fathers, generated by one, adopted by the other. If this is possible, why do they criticize those who say that Matthew follows one genealogy, and Luke another? And indeed, we find that one follows one genealogy, the other another. For Matthew named Jacob as the father of Joseph. But Luke named Heli. And it can seem indeed that one man, whose son was Joseph, had two names. But because they enumerate different ancestors and forefathers and other progenitors, and in the very number one enumerates more, the other fewer; it is clearly shown that Joseph had two fathers. Now, the slander of the question removed, because clear reason demonstrated that it is possible for one father to generate and another to adopt; with two fathers established, it is not surprising if forefathers and great-grandfathers and other parents upwards are counted differently by different fathers.

Adoption in the Holy Scriptures. How intercourse with maidservants among the ancients was without adultery. Nor should the right of adoption seem foreign to our Scriptures to you, as if observed in the practice of human laws, it cannot be congruent to the authority of divine Books. For it is an ancient matter, and customary in ecclesiastical sayings themselves, that not only the origin of seed generates a son, but also the grace of will. For even women adopted as sons those born from the seed of their husbands by handmaids, if they themselves had not given birth; indeed, they even commanded their husbands to father children for them: as Sarah, as Rachel, as Leah. In which duty, husbands did not commit adultery: because they obeyed their wives in that matter which pertains to conjugal duty; according to what the Apostle says: "The woman does not have authority over her own body, but the husband: likewise the husband does not have authority over his own body, but the wife." Moses also, born of a Hebrew mother and exposed, was adopted by Pharaoh's daughter. Indeed, those formulas of law which are now did not exist then: but the will's arbitration was held as the rule of law; as the Apostle also says elsewhere, because the Gentiles, not having the law, naturally do what is of the law. But if women were allowed to make sons of those whom they had not borne themselves; why not also men, of those whom they had not begotten themselves from carnal seed, but from the affection of adopting? For we read that Jacob the patriarch, the father of so many sons, nevertheless made his grandchildren, the sons of Joseph, his own sons, saying: "These two shall be mine, and they shall receive land with their brothers; those you shall have after them shall be yours." Unless perhaps someone should say that the very word 'adoption' is not found in the holy Scriptures. As if it matters by what term it is called, when it is the thing itself, that a woman should have a son whom she has not borne in the flesh; or a man someone whom he has not begotten in the flesh. And indeed, with me not opposing, let him not call Joseph adopted, provided he concedes that he could be indeed a son even of him from whose flesh he was not born. Although the Apostle Paul mentions even the name of adoption frequently, and in great sacrament. For when Scripture testifies that our Lord Jesus Christ is the only Son of God, it says that the brothers and co-heirs whom He deigned to have, are made by a certain adoption through divine grace. "But when the fullness of time had come," he says, "God sent forth his Son, born of woman, born under the law, to redeem those who were under the law, so that we might receive adoption as sons." And elsewhere: "We ourselves groan inwardly while we wait for adoption, the redemption of our bodies." Again, about the Jews he said: "I could wish that I myself were accursed and cut off from Christ for the sake of my brothers, my kinsmen according to the flesh. They are Israelites, and to them belong the adoption, the glory, the covenants, the giving of the law, the worship, and the promises; to them belong the patriarchs, and from their race, according to the flesh, is the Christ, who is God over all, blessed forever." Here he shows that the name or the thing itself of adoption was ancient among the Jews; like the testament and the giving of the law, which he mentions together. The generations of the Lord are variously enumerated by the Evangelists without falsehood, considering the adoption or natural lineage. To this it is added, because there was another method proper to the Jews by which someone would become the son of someone from whom he was not carnally born. For the relatives of their relatives who died without children used to take wives to raise up offspring for the deceased. Thus, he who was born was both the son of the one from whom he was born and the son of the one into whose succession he was born. These things are said so that no one might think it impossible, that the fathers of one man could be rightly mentioned by two people, and so accuse any one of the Evangelists who narrated the generations of the Lord with blasphemous slander as if accusing them of falsehood: especially as we see ourselves admonished by their very words. For Matthew, who is understood to mention him from whom Joseph was born, enumerates the generations in such a way, "He begat him," that he could arrive at what he says at the end: "Jacob begat Joseph." But Luke, because he is not properly called born who is made a son either by adoption or by birth in the succession of the deceased from her who was his wife, did not say, "Heli begat Joseph"; or, "Joseph whom Heli begat": but said, "Who was the son of Heli"; whether by adoption, or born from a relative in the succession of the deceased.

Why the generations are reckoned through Joseph and not through Mary. But indeed, that question should not disturb us as to why the generations are counted through Joseph and not through Mary, has been sufficiently explained: because just as she was a mother without carnal desire, so he was a father without carnal union. Therefore, let the generations descend and ascend through him. Nor should we separate him for lack of carnal desire. The greater purity confirms his fatherhood: lest holy Mary herself reproach us. For she did not wish to place her name before her husband's, but said: “Your father and I have been looking for you sorrowing.” Therefore, let not the perverse murmurers do what the chaste spouse did not do. Let us count therefore through Joseph: because as he is a chaste husband, so is he a chaste father. But let us place the man before the woman by the order of nature and God's law. For if we set her in place, removing him, he would say, and rightly: “Why have you separated me? Why do not the generations ascend or descend through me? Will it be said to him, 'Because you did not beget by the work of your flesh?' But he will reply, 'Did she give birth by the work of her flesh?' What the Holy Spirit worked, He worked for both. 'Since he was a just man,' he says. A just man therefore, a just woman. The Holy Spirit resting in the justice of both, gave a son to both. But He worked in the sex that it was proper for giving birth, such that it would also be born to the husband. Thus, the angel says to both that they should name the child; where the authority of the parents is declared. For Zachariah, though still mute, the mother was naming the born son. And when those present signaled to the father what he wanted him to be called, having received writing tablets, he wrote what she had already said. It was said to Mary: “And behold, you will conceive in your womb and bear a son, and you shall call his name Jesus.” It was also said to Joseph: “Joseph, son of David, do not fear to take Mary as your wife, for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Spirit. She will bear a son, and you shall call his name Jesus, for he will save his people from their sins." It is also said: "And she bore a son to him," where the father is firmly established not by the flesh, but by love. Thus he is a father. The Evangelists most cautiously and wisely count through him, whether Matthew, descending from Abraham to Christ, or Luke, ascending from Christ through Abraham to God. The one counts descending, the other ascending, both through Joseph. Why? Because father. Why father? Because the more firmly the father, the more chastely the father. Otherwise indeed, it was thought that he was the father of our Lord Jesus Christ, namely like other fathers begetting by flesh, not receiving children only by spiritual affection. For Luke also said: "He was supposed to be the father of Jesus." Why was it supposed? Because human supposition and estimation led to what is usually done by humans. Therefore, the Lord is not from Joseph's seed, although this was supposed: and yet from the piety and love of Joseph, a son was born to Mary the virgin, who is also the Son of God.

Why does Matthew count descending, but Luke count ascending? But why does he descending count, and why does the other ascending? Which, I ask, may you listen attentively, as much as the Lord has helped, now with a calm mind and free from all annoyance of knotty objections. Matthew descended through generations to signify our Lord Jesus Christ descending to bear our sins, so that in the seed of Abraham all nations might be blessed. Therefore, he does not begin from Adam: for all mankind is from him. Nor from Noah: because from his family, after the flood, all mankind sprang. Jesus Christ the man could not pertain to the fulfillment of prophecy from Adam, from whom all men are; nor from Noah, from whom all men again are; but from Abraham, who was then chosen in whose seed all nations would be blessed, when already the earth was full of nations. However, Luke ascends, not beginning to enumerate generations from the very origin of the birth of the Lord but from where he narrates him being baptized by John. Just as in the Lord's incarnation he takes on the sins of mankind to bear them, so in the consecration of Baptism for purification. Therefore, the one counting descending signifies descending to bear sins, enumerating generations downward: the other ascending, signifying the cleansing of sins, not his own certainly, but ours, enumerating generations upward. But the one descends through Solomon, in whose mother David sinned: the other ascends through Nathan, another son of the same David, by whom he was purified from sin. For we read that Nathan was sent to him, to rebuke him, and through repentance he was healed. Both met in David; he descending, the other ascending: and from there up to Abraham, or from Abraham up to David, in no generation are they different. Thus, Christ, both son of David and son of Abraham, goes to God. For to God indeed it is fitting that we, being renewed in Baptism from the abolition of sins, be brought back. On the number forty in the generations of the Lord

Indeed, in the genealogies that Matthew enumerates, the number forty stands out. For divine Scriptures have this custom, that things which exceed certain numerical terms are sometimes not counted. Thus, also, it is said that four hundred years passed after which the people of Israel went out of Egypt, although it was four hundred and thirty. Similarly, one generation which exceeds the number forty does not take away the primacy of this number. This number, however, signifies the life in which labor is undergone on this earth, as long as we sojourn away from the Lord, in which the dispensation of proclaiming the truth temporally is necessary. For the number ten, which signifies the perfection of blessedness, multiplied four times for the reason of the fourfold time and the fourfold world, makes the number forty. Therefore, a fast of forty days was undertaken by Moses, by Elijah, and by our Mediator the Lord Jesus Christ himself, because in this time abstinence from bodily temptations is necessary. The people also sojourned in the desert for forty years; the flood occurred for forty days. For forty days after the resurrection, the Lord conversed with the disciples, persuading them of the truth of the risen body: where He signified in this life, in which we sojourn away from the Lord, what the number forty mystically suggests, as it has been said—namely, the necessary remembrance of the Lord's Body, which we observe in the Church until He comes. Therefore, because our Lord descended into this life, and the Word was made flesh, to be delivered for our offenses and to rise again for our justification, Matthew followed the number forty: so that one generation which there exceeds the number forty, either does not impede, just as those thirty years do not impede the perfection of four hundred; or also signifies this, that the Lord himself, who when added makes forty-one, thus descended into this life to bear our sins, yet in this life, unique and singular in excellence, He is found to be set apart, as He is thus man while also being God. For it is said of this one alone, which could not or cannot be said of any other holy man, however perfect in wisdom and justice: the Word was made flesh.

Why does Luke count seventy-seven generations?

Luke, however, who ascends through generations from the baptism of the Lord, completes the number seventy-seven, beginning at our Lord Jesus Christ Himself, ascending through Joseph, and reaching God through Adam: that is, because in this number the abolition of all sins is signified, which is done in Baptism, not because it was something that needed to be forgiven in the Lord Himself, but because He, by His humility, commended what would be useful for us. And although it was the baptism of John, nevertheless, the Trinity of the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit clearly appeared in it; through which the baptism of Christ Himself was consecrated, with which future Christians were to be baptized: the Father, in the voice that came from heaven; the Son, in the very man the Mediator; the Holy Spirit, in the dove. The number seventy-seven is significant. But why does the number seventy-seven encompass all sins which are forgiven in Baptism? This probable reason seems to come forth because the number ten holds the perfection of justice and happiness when the sevenfold creature adheres to the Trinity of the Creator; hence also the Decalogue of the Law is consecrated in ten commandments. However, the transgression of the ten is signified by the number eleven, and sin is understood to be a transgression when a man, desiring something more, exceeds the rule of justice. Therefore, the Apostle calls avarice the root of all evils. And to the soul fornicating from God, it is said in the person of the Lord: "You hoped that if you departed from me, you would have something more." Therefore, because the transgression, that is, sin, pertains to the one who sins, because he wishes to rejoice in something private to himself; hence those who seek their own, not the things of Jesus Christ, are also reproached, and charity not seeking its own is praised. Therefore, the number eleven itself, by which transgression is signified, is not multiplied ten times, but seven times, and it becomes seventy-seven. For the transgression pertains not to the Trinity of the Creator, but to the creature itself, that is, to man himself, whom the number seven signifies. Three for the soul, where there is a certain image of the Trinity of the Creator; for man was made in the image of God there: and four for the body. For the four beginnings from which the body consists are very well known. And to whom they are not known, he can easily notice that the body of the world itself, in which our body moves through places, has four main parts, which even the divine Scripture continuously mentions: East and West, South and North. And since sins are committed either in the mind, as in the will alone; or also in the works of the body, already visibly: therefore Prophet Amos continuously mentions God threatening and saying: In three and four iniquities I will not turn away, that is, I will not ignore. Three, on account of the mind; four, on account of the nature of the body: by which two man consists.

How the Holy Scriptures are to be read.

Therefore, eleven times seven, as it is said, the transgression of justice related to the sinful man makes the number seventy-seven; by which all sins are signified, which are forgiven through Baptism. Whence Luke ascends to God through seventy-seven generations; showing the reconciliation of man to God through the abolition of all sins. Then the Lord himself answered Peter questioning how many times he should forgive his brother: I say to you, he said, not seven times, but up to seventy-seven times. And if anything else can be revealed about these secrets and treasures of the mysteries of God by those who are more diligent and worthy. However, as much as our capacity allows, as much as the Lord has helped and given, and also considering the constraint of time, we have said what we could. If any of you can grasp more, knock at the one from whom we also receive what we can grasp and speak. Above all, keep this: do not be disturbed by the Holy Scriptures not yet understood; and when understood, do not be arrogant: but what you do not understand, defer with honor; and what you understand, hold with love.

Sermons - Sermon 52

SERMO 52 ON THE TRINITY The triune God is commended in the baptism of Christ. The Gospel reading proposed to us what to speak about to your Charity, as a command of the Lord, and truly the command of the Lord. For my heart awaited from Him as a command the declaration of the discourse, so that I might understand that He was speaking through me, because He willed it to be recited. Let your zeal and devotion then heed this, and may they help my labor with the same Lord our God. For we see and, as if by divine plan, observe before the river Jordan that our God is commended to us in the Trinity. For when Jesus came and was baptized by John, the Lord by the servant (which He did as an example of humility; indeed in that humility He showed that righteousness is fulfilled, when John said to him: I need to be baptized by you, and do you come to me? He replied: Allow it now, for thus it is fitting for us to fulfill all righteousness): when therefore He was baptized, the heavens were opened, and the Holy Spirit descended upon Him in the form of a dove; then a voice followed from above: This is my beloved Son, in whom I have been well pleased. Therefore, we have the Trinity distinct in some way: in the voice the Father, in the man the Son, in the dove the Holy Spirit. Indeed, it was necessary to recall this; for it is very easy to see. For evidently, and without any doubt, this Trinity is commended when the Lord Christ Himself coming in the form of a servant to John is indeed the Son: for it cannot be said that He is the Father, nor can it be said that He is the Holy Spirit. It says, Jesus came: indeed the Son of God. Who can doubt about the dove; or who can say, What is the dove when the Gospel itself most clearly testifies: The Holy Spirit descended upon Him in the form of a dove? Likewise, there is no doubt about that voice being of the Father when it says: You are my Son. Therefore, we have the Trinity distinct.

How difficult it is to speak of the inseparable Trinity. And if we consider the places, I dare to say (although I say it timidly, yet I dare) a seemingly separable Trinity. When Jesus came to the river, from one place to another place; the dove descended from heaven to earth, from one place to another place; the very voice of the Father, sounded neither from the earth nor from the water, but from heaven: these three are seemingly separated by places, separated by roles, separated by works. Let someone say to me: Show the inseparable Trinity. Remember you speak as a Catholic, to Catholics. For our faith, that is, the true faith, the right faith, the Catholic faith, gathered not by presumptive opinion but by the testimony of reading, not uncertain through heretical rashness, but founded on apostolic truth, suggests this; we know this, we believe this. Even if we do not see this with our eyes, nor yet with our heart as long as we are purified by faith; nevertheless with this faith very rightly and very strongly we hold that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, is the inseparable Trinity, one God, not three gods. However, thus one God, that the Son is not the Father, that the Father is not the Son, that the Holy Spirit is neither the Father nor the Son, but the Spirit of the Father and the Son. This ineffable divinity, remaining in itself, renewing all things, creating, recreating, sending, recalling, judging, liberating; therefore this ineffable and inseparable Trinity we both know and believe. The necessity of help to solve the difficulty.

What then shall we do? Behold, separately the Son comes in man, separately the Holy Spirit descends from heaven in the form of a dove, separately the voice of the Father resounds from heaven: This is my Son. Where is the inseparable Trinity? Through me, God has made you attentive. Pray for us, and as if opening your bosom: may He Himself grant that which may fill what you have opened. Collaborate with us. For you see what we have undertaken; not only what, but also who; whence we wish to speak, where positioned, how positioned in the body which is corrupted and weighs down the soul, and the earthly dwelling oppresses the mind thinking many things. Therefore, when I extract this mind from many things and collect it to the one inseparable Trinity, in order to see something to say; do you think, in this body that weighs down the soul, that I will be able to say something worthy to you: Since I have lifted up my soul to you, Lord? Help me, lift it up with me. For I am weak for it, and it is heavy for me. The works of the Father and the Son are inseparable. This question is often proposed by the most diligent brothers, often discussed in the conversation of lovers of the word of God, often much prayed for to God, with people asking: "Does the Father do something that the Son does not do; or does the Son do something that the Father does not do?" Meanwhile, let us speak of the Father and the Son. When our effort has accomplished this, to whom we say: Be my helper, do not abandon me; it is also understood that the Holy Spirit does not separate from the operation of the Father and the Son. Therefore, regarding the Father and the Son, brothers, listen. Does the Father do anything without the Son? We answer, No. Do you doubt it? For what does He do without Him, through whom all things were made? All things, he says, were made through Him. And to impress it upon the slow, the obstinate, the quarrelsome, he added: And without Him was made nothing. The Father through the Son both made and rules all things.

What then, brothers? All things were made through him; we understand that the entire creation was made through the Son, that the Father made it through his Word, God through his Power and Wisdom: shall we then say, "Indeed all things were made through him when they were created, but now the Father does not govern all things through him"? By no means. Let this thought depart from the hearts of the faithful, be driven away from the understanding of the devout, from the intellect of the pious. It cannot be that he created through him, and does not govern through him. Let it not be that what exists is governed without him, when through him it was made to exist. But let us also prove this with the testimony of Scripture, not only that all things were made and created through him, as we have reminded you from the Gospel: All things were made through him, and without him nothing was made: but that also what was made is governed and arranged through him. Therefore, recognize Christ as the Power of God and the Wisdom of God: recognize what is said of Wisdom: She reaches mightily from one end to the other and arranges all things sweetly. Therefore, let us not doubt that all things are governed through him, through whom all things were made. Therefore, the Father does nothing without the Son, the Son does nothing without the Father.

Whether the birth and passion of the Son were also of the Father. A question arises, which in the name of the Lord and His will we have undertaken to solve. If the Father does nothing without the Son, and the Son does nothing without the Father; would it not follow that we should say that the Father was born of the Virgin Mary, the Father suffered under Pontius Pilate, the Father rose again and ascended into heaven? By no means. We do not say this, because we do not believe this. I have believed, therefore have I spoken: and we also believe, therefore we speak. What is in the faith? That the Son was born of the Virgin, not the Father. What is in the faith? That the Son suffered under Pontius Pilate, and died, not the Father. It has come to our attention that some are wrongly called Patripassians, who say that the Father Himself was born of a woman, the Father Himself suffered, the Father Himself is the Son, two names but not two realities. And the Catholic Church has removed these from the communion of saints, so that they would not deceive anyone, and that they would argue separately. The knot of difficulty.

Let us then bring back the difficulty of the question to your senses. Let someone say to me: You have said, the Father does nothing without the Son, nor the Son without the Father; and you have brought forth testimonies from the Scriptures, that the Father does nothing without the Son, because all things were made through Him; nor that the kingdom is ruled without the Son, because He is the Wisdom of the Father, reaching mightily from end to end and disposing all things sweetly. Now you are saying to me, as if speaking against yourself: The Son was born of a virgin, not the Father; the Son suffered, not the Father; the Son rose again, not the Father. Behold, I hold that the Son does something which the Father does not. Therefore either confess that the Son does something without the Father, or confess also that the Father was born, suffered, died, and rose again. Say either one or the other: choose one of the two. I choose neither, nor do I say this or that. Nor do I say that the Son does anything without the Father, because I lie if I say this; nor do I say that the Father was born, suffered, died, and rose again, because I likewise lie if I say this. How, he says, will you extricate yourself from these difficulties? The birth of the Sole Son from the Virgin is indeed from the Father and also from the Son.

It pleases you, the question proposed: May God assist, so that it may please and be resolved. Behold what I say, so that it may free both me and you. For in one faith we stand in the name of Christ, and in one house we live under one Lord, and in one body we are members under one head, and we are invigorated by one spirit. Therefore, that the Lord may deliver us from the difficulties of this most troublesome question, both me who speak and you who listen, this I say: Indeed, the Son, not the Father, was born of the Virgin Mary; but the birth of the Son, not of the Father, from the Virgin Mary, was worked by both the Father and the Son. Indeed, the Father did not suffer, but the Son; yet the suffering of the Son was worked by both the Father and the Son. The Father did not rise again, but the Son; yet the resurrection of the Son was worked by both the Father and the Son. From this question we now seem relieved; but perhaps by my words, let us see also whether by divine words. It pertains to me, therefore, with the testimonies of the holy Scriptures to demonstrate that the birth of the Son was worked by both the Father and the Son; likewise the passion; likewise the resurrection: so that although both the birth and the passion and the resurrection are of the Son alone; these three things which pertain solely to the Son were not done by the Father alone, nor by the Son alone, but by both the Father and the Son. Let us prove each one, judges listen, the case is proposed, let the witnesses come forward. Let your judgment tell me what is usually said to those conducting cases: Prove what you promise. I will indeed prove it with the Lord’s help, and I will recite a reading of heavenly law. You have listened intently to the one proposing, now listen more intently to the one proving. The son's birth made by the Father, Paul, legal expert of the divine.

First, I must teach concerning the nativity of Christ, how both the Father and the Son did it, although it pertains solely to the Son what the Father and the Son did. I quote Paul, a fitting expert of divine law. For even the legal advocates today have Paul dictating the laws of litigants, not of Christians. I quote, I say, Paul dictating the laws of peace, not of strife. Let the holy Apostle show us how the Father worked the nativity of the Son. For when the fullness of time came, he says, God sent His own Son, made of a woman, made under the Law, to redeem those who were under the Law. You have heard, and because it is clear and open, you have understood. Behold, the Father made the Son born of a virgin. For when the fullness of time came, God sent His own Son, indeed the Father sent Christ. How did he send Him? Made of a woman, made under the Law. Therefore, the Father made Him from a woman under the Law.

Christ was born of a woman and a virgin. Or perhaps this troubles you because I said "from a virgin," and Paul says "from a woman"? Do not be disturbed, do not dwell on it: for I am not speaking to the unlearned. Both expressions are used in Scripture, "from a virgin" and "from a woman." How "from a virgin"? Behold, a virgin shall conceive and bear a Son. But "from a woman," as you have heard: it is not contradictory. For the Hebrew idiom calls "women" those who are not defiled in their virginity but simply refers to females. You have clear Scripture from Genesis, when Eve herself was first created: He formed her into a woman. Scripture also says in another place that God commanded the separation of women who have not known the bed of a man. Therefore, this should now be understood; nor let it hold us back, so that with the Lord's help, we may be able to explain other things, which should rightly be understood. From the Son also the birth of the Son was made.

We have proven therefore the birth of the Son made by the Father; let us also prove it made by the Son. What is the birth of the Son from the Virgin Mary? Surely the assumption of the form of a servant. Is it not taking the form of a servant in the womb of the Virgin to be born to the Son? Hear that this too was done by the Son: Who, though he was in the form of God, did not consider it robbery to be equal to God; but emptied himself, taking the form of a servant. When the fullness of time had come, God sent His Son, made of a woman; who was made of the seed of David according to the flesh: therefore, we see the birth of the Son made by the Father; but because the Son himself emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, we see the birth of the Son made also by the Son himself. This has been proven; let us pass from here: attentively receive something else, which follows in order. The Passion is also of the Son and of the Father and of the Son.

Let us also prove the suffering of the Son, both caused by the Father and caused by the Son. The Father causes the suffering of the Son: He who did not spare His own Son, but gave Him up for us all. The Son also causes His own suffering: He who loved me and gave Himself up for me. The Father handed over the Son, the Son handed over Himself. This suffering was effected for one, but by both. Therefore, just as with the birth, so it is with the suffering of Christ; neither the Father did it without the Son, nor the Son without the Father. The Father handed over the Son, the Son handed over Himself. What did Judas do here, except sin? Let us move on, and from here come to the resurrection. The same is proved concerning the resurrection of Christ.

Let us see the Son indeed, not the Father, rising, but both the Father and the Son making the resurrection of the Son. The Father works the resurrection of the Son. For this reason, He exalted Him from the dead and gave Him the name which is above every name. Therefore, the Father raised the Son, exalting Him and rousing Him from the dead. Does the Son also raise Himself? Clearly, He raised Himself. In reference to the figure of His body, He said about the temple: Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up. Finally, just as laying down one's life pertains to the passion, so taking up one's life again pertains to the resurrection: let us see if the Son indeed laid down His life, and the Father restored His life to Him, not He to Himself. For it is evident that the Father restored it. For this reason, the Psalm says: Raise me up, and I will repay them. But because the Son also restored His life to Himself, what do you expect from us? Let Him speak Himself: I have the power to lay down my life. I have not yet said what I promised. I said to lay it down: but now you have cried out because you are eager. Instructed indeed in the school of the heavenly Teacher, as though listening intently to lectures, piously responding, you are not ignorant of what follows. He says, I have the power to lay down my life, and I have the power to take it up again. No one takes it from me: but I lay it down of my own accord, and I take it up again. The explained teaching is set forth again.

We have fulfilled what we promised: we have proved our propositions with the strongest, as I believe, documents of testimony. Hold on to what you have heard. I briefly repeat, and I commend to your minds a matter most useful, as I consider. The Father was not born of a virgin: yet both the Father and the Son brought about this birth of the Son from a virgin. The Father did not suffer on the cross: yet both the Father and the Son brought about the suffering of the Son. The Father did not rise from the dead: yet both the Father and the Son brought about the resurrection of the Son. You have the distinction of persons, and the inseparability of their operation. Therefore, let us not say that the Father works anything without the Son, or the Son without the Father. Or do the miracles which Jesus performed move you, lest perhaps He did some things which the Father did not do? And where is it: The Father who dwells in me, he does his works? What we have said was clear, they only needed to be said: there was no need to labor to understand them, but care must be taken to remember them.

God is not to be thought of in bodily terms with respect to space.

Something I still want to say, where I genuinely require your more acute attention and devotion to God. For indeed, only bodies are confined and occupied by corporal places. Beyond corporal places is divinity. Let no one seek it as though in space. It is invisibly and inseparably present everywhere: not greater in one part, lesser in another; but whole everywhere, divided nowhere. Who sees this? Who comprehends this? Let us restrain ourselves: let us remember who we are, whence we speak. That and that, whatever it is that God is, let it be believed piously, thought of holy; and as much as is given, as much as possible, let it be understood ineffably. Let words fall silent, let the tongue cease; let the heart be stirred, let the heart be lifted there. For it is not such that it ascends into the heart of man, but that into which the heart of man ascends. Let us attend to creation: For the invisible things of Him, from the creation of the world, are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made; lest perhaps in these things which God has made, with which we have a certain familiarity of custom, we may find some likeness, whereby we may prove that there are some three things, which are separately brought forth, inseparably operate.

God is incomprehensible.

Hey, brothers, be present with all your mind. See first what I promise; lest perchance I find it in a creature, because the Creator is exalted above us. And perhaps any one of us, whose mind is struck by some flash of truth, can say those words: "I said in my ecstasy." In your ecstasy, what did you say? "I am cast out from the sight of your eyes." For indeed, it seems to me that the one who said this had lifted up his soul to God and poured out his soul over himself when it was said to him daily, "Where is your God?" He had reached by a certain spiritual contact to that unchangeable light, and because of the weakness of his vision, he could not bear it; and in his own affliction and languor, he again fell back, and compared himself to it, and realized that the sharpness of his mind could not yet be tempered to the light of the wisdom of God. And because he did this in ecstasy, having been taken away from the senses of the body and drawn up into God, when somehow he was recalled from God to man, he said: "I said in my ecstasy." For I saw something in ecstasy, which I could not bear for long; and returned to mortal members, and bound by many mortal thoughts from the body that burdens the soul, I said, "What? I am cast out from the sight of your eyes." You are far above, I am far below. What then shall we say, brothers, about God? For if what you wish to say, if you have grasped it, it is not God: if you could comprehend it, you have comprehended something else instead of God. If you thought you could comprehend it, you deceived yourself with your thought. Therefore, it is not what you have comprehended: but if it is this, you have not comprehended it. What then do you wish to say, which you could not comprehend? The likeness of God is to be sought within ourselves.

Let us see, then, whether we might find something in creation where we may prove that certain three things can be demonstrated separately and operate inseparably. Where shall we go? To the heavens, to discuss the sun and the moon and the stars? To the earth, perhaps to talk about plants, trees, and animals that fill the earth? Or about the very heavens, or the earth itself, which contain all things in heaven and earth? How long will man roam around creation? Return to yourself, see yourself, inspect yourself, examine yourself. You seek certain three things in creation that are to be demonstrated separately and work inseparably; if you seek in creation, first seek in yourself. For you are not without being a creation. You seek a likeness. Will you seek among beasts? For you spoke about God, when you sought some likeness. You spoke about the Trinity of ineffable Majesty; and because you failed in divine matters, and confessed your weakness with due humility, you have come to human matters; examine there. Do you seek among beasts, among the sun, among the stars? For of what among these things is made in the image and likeness of God? Truly, you will seek among men something more familiar and better. For God made man in His image and likeness. Seek in yourself, lest perhaps the image of the Trinity may have some trace of the Trinity. And what is it? An image made far distant: but still a likeness and image far distant, not as the image the Son is of the Father. For the image is different in the son, different in the mirror. There's a great difference. In the son, your image is yourself. For the son is what you are by nature. The substance is what you are, but another person than you. Therefore, man is not an image as the Only-begotten Son, but made to some image and likeness. Let him seek in himself something, if he might find, and certain three things which might be pronounced separately, and operate inseparably. Let me seek, seek with me. Not I in you, but you in you, and I in me. Let us seek together, and together consider the common nature and substance. Our soul is made in the image of God.

See, O man, observe if what I say is true. Do you have a body, do you have flesh? "I do," you say. For how else are you in a place, how else do you move from place to place? How else do you hear words spoken, except through the ear of the flesh? How else do you see a mouth speaking, except through the eyes of the flesh? You possess it, it is evident, and there is no need to labor long over what is manifest. See something else, see what operates through the flesh. For you hear with the ear, but it is not through the ear that you hear. There is another within who hears through the ear. You see through the eye; consider that very eye. Did you recognize the house, but neglect the dweller? Does the eye see by itself? Is it not another who sees through the eye? I do not say that the eye of the dead does not see, of which it is certain that the dweller has left the body: but the eye of one thinking about something else does not see the face of the present. Therefore, look upon your inner man. For there, a likeness is more properly to be sought of certain things shown separately, working inseparably. What does your mind have? Perhaps if I ask, I find many things; but there is something nearby that is more easily understood. What does your soul have? I remind you internally, recall it. For what I am about to say, I do not ask that it be believed in me: do not accept it, if you do not find it within yourself. Therefore, consider. But first, let us see what had been forgotten: whether man is not the image of the Son alone, or the image of the Father alone, but of the Father and the Son; and consequently, of the Holy Spirit as well. Genesis speaks: "Let us make," it says, "man in our image and likeness." Therefore, the Father does not make without the Son, nor the Son without the Father. "Let us make man in our image and likeness." "Let us make," not "I will make," or "make," or "let him make": but "let us make." In our image, not "your" or "my," but "our." The likeness of the Trinity in man.

Therefore I ask, I speak of a dissimilar matter. Let no one say: Behold what he has compared to God. I have already spoken, and forewarned, and rendered cautious, and have been cautious myself. These things are far apart, the lowest from the highest, the changeable from the unchanging, the created from the creator, the human from the divine. Behold, first I commend this, because what I am about to say is far distant, let no one dispute with me. Therefore, lest I perhaps also seek ears and he prepares teeth, I have promised to present this, demonstrating three things separately, acting inseparably. How these are similar or dissimilar to the omnipotent Trinity, I do not discuss now: but in the very lowly and changeable creature we find some three things, which can be demonstrated separately, and act inseparably. O carnal thought, and persistent and unfaithful conscience! Why do you doubt about that ineffable Majesty in that matter, which you could find in yourself? Behold, I speak, behold I ask: Man, do you have memory? If you do not have it, how did you retain what I said? But perhaps now, you have already forgotten what I said a little while ago. This very thing I say, I said; you would not hold these two syllables unless through memory. For how would you know there are two, if, with the second sounding, you forgot the first? Why then further? Why am I thus urged? Why am I thus compelled to convince? It is manifest, you have memory. I ask another: Do you have understanding? You say, I do. For if you did not have memory, you would not hold what I said: if you did not have understanding, you would not recognize what you held. You have this too. You recall your understanding to that which you hold within, and you see, and by seeing you are formed, so that you may be called knowing. I ask a third: You have memory, wherewith you hold what is said; you have understanding, whereby you understand what is held; from these two I inquire of you, did you hold and understand willingly? Clearly, you say. Therefore, you have will. These are the three things which I promised to present to your ears and minds. These three which are in you, which you can count, and cannot separate. Therefore, observe these three, memory, understanding, and will; these, I say, three pronounced separately, work inseparably.

Memory, understanding, and will are shown separately and work inseparably. The Lord will be present, and I see that He is present: I understand from your understanding that He is present. For from these your words, just as you have understood, I notice; I presume that He will help, so that you may understand everything. I promised three things to be separately demonstrated, to operate inseparably. Behold, I did not know what was in your mind, you demonstrated it to me by saying, "Memory." This word, this sound, this voice proceeded to my ears from your mind. For what memory is, you were thinking silently and not saying. It was in you, and had not yet come to me. But so that what was in you might be brought forth to me, you said this name itself, that is, "Memory." I heard: I heard these four syllables in the name of memory. It is the name of four syllables, it is a voice, it sounded, it proceeded to my ear, it insinuated something to my mind. What sounded has passed away, whence it was insinuated and what was insinuated remains. But I ask this, when you said this name "memory," you certainly see that this name pertains only to memory. For the other two have their own names. For one is called intellect, not memory; another is called will, not memory; but one is called memory. But to say this, to produce these four syllables, where did you operate from? This name which pertains solely to memory was operated in you by memory, to hold what you said; and by intellect, to know what you held; and by will, to bring forth what you knew. Thanks to our Lord God. He has helped us, both in you and in us. Truly, I say to your Charity, I approached this with great trepidation to be discussed and insinuated. For I feared lest perhaps I might delight a capable understanding, and cause great tedium for the slower ones. But now I see that you have not only received what was said with the attention of listening and swiftness of understanding, but have even anticipated what would be said: Thanks to the Lord. The mystery of the Trinity is somewhat illustrated by these three abilities.

Therefore, see, I now safely commend what you have understood; I do not inculcate the unknown, but recommending I repeat what has been perceived. Behold, out of those three, one thing has been named, the name of one thing has been spoken: Memory is the name of one of those three, and yet the name of one of those three performed all three themselves. It could not be called "memory" alone except by the working of will, understanding, and memory. "Understanding" cannot be called alone except by the working of memory, will, and understanding. Nor can "will" alone be called except by the working of memory and understanding and will. Those things which were promised are explained, as I think: what I have pronounced separately, I have considered inseparably. One of these names made three: but still, this one thing which the three made does not pertain to three, but to one. The three made the name "memory": but this pertains only to memory itself. The three made the name "understanding": but this pertains only to understanding itself. The three made the name "will": but this pertains only to will itself. Thus the Trinity made the flesh of Christ: but it pertains only to Christ himself. The Trinity made the dove from heaven: but it pertains only to the Holy Spirit himself. The Trinity made the voice from heaven: but the voice pertains only to the Father himself.

What of these three pertains to the Father, what to the Son, what to the Holy Spirit.

Therefore let no one speak to me, let no one slanderously try to press me in my weakness: What then in these three things which you have shown to be in our mind or in the soul, what of these three pertains to the Father, that is, as to a likeness to the Father, what of these to the Son, what of these to the Holy Spirit? I cannot say, I cannot explain. Let us leave something also to those who think, let us grant something also to silence. Return to yourself and take yourself away from all noise. Look within yourself to see if you have there any sweet chamber of your conscience where you do not make noise, where you do not quarrel or prepare disputes, where you do not meditate on dissensions and stubbornness. Be gentle in hearing the word, so that you may understand. You might say: You will give me joy and gladness in hearing, and the humble bones will rejoice, not "the exalted" ones. From this, it is understood that the Persons of the Trinity can both be shown separately and act inseparably.

It is sufficient, therefore, that we have shown that three certain things are demonstrated separately, yet operate inseparably. If you have found this in yourself, if in man, if in a certain person walking on the earth, still bearing a fragile body that weighs down the soul: believe that the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit can be separately demonstrated by certain visible things, by certain forms of assumed creature, and can operate inseparably. This is sufficient. I do not say, the Father is memory, the Son is intellect, the Spirit is will: I do not say, let it be understood as it pleases, I do not dare. Let us keep higher matters for those capable, what we can for the weak, as the weak. I do not say these things are to be equated to that Trinity, as if directed to analogy, that is, to a certain rational comparison: I do not say this. But what do I say? Behold, I found in you three things demonstrated separately, operated inseparably; and each name of the three done by the three, which nevertheless pertains not to three, but to one thing of these three. Believe already in what you cannot see there, if here you have listened and seen and held on to. For what is in you, you can know: what is in Him who made you, whatever it is, when can you know? And if you can, yet you cannot still know. And yet, when you can, will you be able to know God in the way God knows Himself? Therefore, let it suffice for your Charity: what we could, we have said; we have delivered the promises to those demanding them: seek the rest that needs to be added, so that your sense may be improved, from the Lord.

Sermons - Sermon 53

SERMO 53 Concerning the Words of the Gospel, Matthew 5:

"Blessed are the poor in spirit", and so forth Everyone wants to be blessed. By the solemnity of the holy virgin, who bore witness to Christ and merited testimony from Christ, openly killed, secretly crowned, we are reminded to speak to Your Charity of that exhortation, which the Lord now brought forth from the Gospel, saying many causes of the blessed life, which no one does not wish for. For indeed, no one can be found who does not wish to be blessed. But, oh, if men desired the reward as they do, they would not refuse the work of the reward! Who would not run eagerly when it is said to him, "You will be blessed"? Let him listen willingly also when it is said, "If you do this." The struggle is not to be refused if the reward is loved; and the mind is to be kindled to the eagerness of work by the commendation of the reward. What we want, what we desire, what we ask for, will be later: but what we are ordered to do because of what will be later, let it be now. Behold, begin to recall divine sayings, and those evangelical precepts or gifts themselves. "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." Later the kingdom of heaven will be yours, now be poor in spirit. Do you want the kingdom of heaven to be yours later? See now whose you are. Be poor in spirit. You perhaps ask me what it is to be poor in spirit. Anyone who is inflated is not poor in spirit: therefore, a humble one is poor in spirit. The kingdom of heaven is high, but: "He who humbles himself will be exalted."

Someone gentle.

Consider what follows: "Blessed," he says, "are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." Do you wish to possess the earth already? See to it that you are not possessed by the earth. You will possess it if you are meek; you will be possessed if you are harsh. And when you hear the reward set forth, that you may possess the earth, do not stretch forth the bosom of avarice by which you wish to possess the earth now, excluding even your neighbor as best you can: let not this opinion deceive you. Then you will truly possess the earth when you adhere to Him who made heaven and earth. For this is to be meek, not to resist your God: so that in the good you do, He may please you, not you yourself; in the evil you justly suffer, He may not displease you, but you yourself. For it is no small thing that you please Him by displeasing yourself; however, you will displease Him by pleasing yourself.

Those who mourn.

Consider the third: Blessed are those who mourn, for they shall be comforted. In mourning there is labor, in comfort there is reward. For those who mourn carnally, what consolations do they have? Troubling, fearful. There a mourner is comforted, where he fears again lest he mourn. For example, a proud son causes sorrow, a newborn brings joy: he raised that one, he received this one; in that one there is sorrow, in this one there is fear: therefore, in neither is there consolation. Therefore, that will be true consolation, which will be given so that it may not be lost; so that those who now mourn their sojourning may later rejoice in their consolation.

Those who are hungry.

Let the fourth blessing and duty approach: Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness, for they shall be satisfied. You wish to be satisfied. From what source? If the flesh desires satisfaction, having digested the satiation, you will again suffer hunger. And whoever drinks from this water, he says, will thirst again. The remedy that is placed on a wound, if it heals, does not hurt any longer: but what is placed against hunger, that is, food, is placed so as to relieve for a short time. For after satisfaction has passed, hunger returns. Certainly a daily remedy for satiation is available, but the wound of weakness is not healed. Therefore, let us hunger and thirst for righteousness, so that we may be satisfied by righteousness itself, which we now hunger and thirst for. For we shall be satisfied by that which we hunger and thirst for. Let our inner man hunger and thirst: for he has his own food, he has his own drink. I am, he says, the bread which descended from heaven. You have the bread of the hungry, desire also the drink of the thirsty: For with you is the fountain of life.

Blessed are the merciful.

Pay attention to what follows: Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy from God. Do, and it will be done: do with another, so that it may be done with you. Because you are both abundant and needy: abundant in temporal things, needy in eternal things. You hear a beggar, and you yourself are a beggar of God. You are asked, and you ask. What you will do with your petitioner, God will do with His. You are both full and empty: fill the empty from your fullness, so that your emptiness may be filled from God's fullness. Who are the pure in heart.

Pay attention to what follows: Blessed are the pure in heart, that is, those who are pure in heart; for they shall see God. This is the end of our love; an end in which we are perfected, not consumed. Food is finished, clothing is finished: food, because it is consumed by eating; clothing, because it is perfected by weaving. Both are ended: but that end pertains to consumption, the other to perfection. Whatever we do, whatever we do well, whatever we strive for, whatever we fervently desire with praise, whatever we blamelessly desire, when we come to the vision of God, we shall seek no more. For what shall he seek who has God? Or what shall suffice him, to whom God does not suffice? We want to see God, we seek to see God, we yearn to see God. Who does not? But see what is said: Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. Prepare this, from which you may see. To speak according to the flesh, why desire the rising of the sun with sore eyes? Healthy eyes will be a joy in that light: unhealthy eyes will make that light a torment. You are not permitted to see with an impure heart what cannot be seen except with a pure heart. You are repelled, taken away, you will not see. For blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. How many times has he already counted the blessed? What causes of blessedness, what works, what gifts, what merits, what rewards? Nowhere has it been said: They shall see God. Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are the meek: they shall inherit the earth. Blessed are those who mourn: they shall be comforted. Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness: they shall be filled. Blessed are the merciful: they shall obtain mercy. Nowhere has it been said: They shall see God. It has come to the pure in heart, there the vision of God is promised. Not without cause, except because there are the eyes, from which God is seen. Speaking of these eyes, the apostle Paul said: Having the eyes of your heart enlightened. Now therefore these eyes are illuminated by faith because of their weakness: afterwards because of their firmness, they will be illuminated by sight. For as long as we are in the body, we are away from the Lord. For we walk by faith, not by sight. But as long as we are in this faith, what is said of us? Now we see through a mirror in an enigma; then face to face. The "face, hands, feet" of God, what they are. Do not think in this context of a corporeal face. For if, inflamed with the desire to see God, you have prepared your corporeal face to see; you will also desire such a face of God. But if now at least spiritually you have wisdom about God, so that you do not think of God as corporeal (a topic we discussed at length yesterday, if indeed we accomplished anything); if in your heart, as in the temple of God, we have broken the image of human form; if it has now come well into your mind, and possessed your inner depths, where the Apostle detests those who, claiming to be wise, became fools; and they changed the glory of the incorruptible God into the likeness of the image of corruptible man.

If you already detest such evil, if you shun it, if you cleanse the temple of the Creator, if you wish that He may come and make His abode with you: Think of the Lord in goodness, and in simplicity of heart seek Him. Consider to whom you say, if indeed you say, if truly you say: "My heart said to You, 'I will seek Your face.'" Let your heart also say, and add: "Your face, O Lord, I will seek." For you seek well, because you seek with your heart. The face of God is mentioned, the arm of God is mentioned, the hand of God is mentioned, the feet of God are mentioned, the seat of God is mentioned, the footstool of His feet is mentioned: but do not think of human limbs. If you want to be the temple of truth, break the idol of falsehood. The hand of God, the power of God. The face of God, the knowledge of God. The feet of God, the presence of God. The seat of God, if you will, you are. Or perhaps will you dare to deny that God is Christ? No, you say. Do you grant also this, that Christ is the power and wisdom of God? I grant it, you say. Listen: The soul of the just is the seat of wisdom. For where does God have His seat, if not where He dwells? And where does He dwell, if not in His temple? For the temple of God is holy, which you are. See then how you receive God. God is spirit; in spirit and truth it behooves one to worship God. Now let the ark of the covenant enter your heart, if you will, and let Dagon fall. Listen then now, and learn to desire God, learn how you can prepare to see God. Blessed, He says, are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.

Rewards fitting for works in the sayings of the "beatitudes."

Why do you prepare the eyes of the body? If it is seen thus, what will be seen will be in a place. He who is whole everywhere is not in a place. Cleanse whence it will be seen.

Listen and understand, if I might be able to explain with His help: may He assist us to understand all the aforementioned works and duties, how they are fittingly connected. For where was it said about the reward that it does not match the work, that it does not correspond? Because the humble seem to be alien to the kingdom: Blessed, - he says -, are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Because meek people are easily excluded from their land: Blessed, - he says -, are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth. Now the rest are clear, self-evident: they do not need a disputant but a reminder. Blessed are those who mourn. Who does not desire consolation when mourning? They, - he says -, shall be comforted. Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness. Who seeks not satisfaction when hungry and thirsty? And they, - he says -, shall be satisfied. Blessed are the merciful. Who is merciful, if not one who wishes God to repay him from the very act, so that what he does to the poor may be done to him? Blessed, - he says -, are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy. How each specific reward corresponds distinctly to each, and nothing is offered as a reward that does not match the precept? For it is commanded to be poor in spirit: the reward is to have the kingdom of heaven. It is commanded to be meek: the reward is to possess the earth. It is commanded to mourn: the reward is to be comforted. It is commanded to hunger and thirst for righteousness: the reward is to be satisfied. It is commanded to be merciful: the reward is to obtain mercy. Thus it is commanded to cleanse the heart: the reward is to see God. The vision of God is promised especially to the pure in heart.

Therefore do not understand these commandments and rewards in such a way that when you hear: Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God, you think that the poor in spirit will not see, nor the meek, nor those who mourn, nor those who hunger and thirst for righteousness, nor the merciful. Do not assume that only those who are pure in heart will see, with the others separated from vision. For all these are the same. They will see, and they will not see because they are poor in spirit, because they are meek, because they mourn, because they hunger and thirst for righteousness, because they are merciful: but because they are pure in heart. Just as if physical works were assigned to physical members, and someone were to say, for example: Blessed are those who have feet, for they shall walk; blessed are those who have hands, for they shall work; blessed are those who have a voice, for they shall cry out; blessed are those who have a mouth and a tongue, for they shall speak; blessed are those who have eyes, for they shall see. Thus, as if arranging spiritual members, he taught what belongs to what. Humility is suited to possessing the kingdom of heaven; meekness is suited to inheriting the earth; mourning is suited to consolation; hunger and thirst for righteousness are suited to satisfaction; mercy is suited to obtaining mercy; a pure heart is suited to seeing God. The heart is purified by faith to see God.

If therefore we desire to see God, how shall this eye be cleansed? For who would not care, who would not seek how to cleanse it, so as to be able to see whom he longs for with all his affection? Divine testimony has expressed this: By faith, it says, cleansing their hearts. Faith in God cleanses the heart, a clean heart sees God. But because that very faith is sometimes determined by men, who deceive themselves, as if it were sufficient only to believe (for some even promise themselves the vision of God and the kingdom of heaven by believing and living badly); against these, the Apostle James, inflamed and somewhat indignant with spiritual charity, says in his Epistle: You believe that there is one God. You applaud yourself for your faith: for you see that many impious people think there are many gods, and you rejoice in yourself by believing that there is one God. You do well. Even the demons believe, and tremble. Shall they see God too? They will see who are pure in heart. But who would call unclean spirits pure in heart? And yet they believe, and tremble. The faith of Christians is to be distinguished from the faith of demons. Our faith must be distinguished from the faith of demons. For our faith cleanses the heart: but their faith makes them guilty. Indeed, they act wickedly, and therefore they say to the Lord: What have we to do with you? When you hear the demons say this, do you think they do not recognize him? We know, - they say -, who you are. You are the Son of God. Peter says this and is praised: the demon says this and is condemned. Whence this difference, except because the voice is alike, but the heart is different? Let us therefore distinguish our faith, nor is it enough to believe. Such faith does not cleanse the heart. By faith, he says, cleansing their hearts. But what faith, by what kind of faith, except that which the Apostle Paul defines, where he says: Faith which works through love? This faith distinguishes itself from the faith of demons, distinguishes itself from the flagitious and lost manners of men. Faith, he says. What faith? The faith which works through love, hopes for what God promises. Nothing more weighty than this definition, nothing more perfect. Therefore, there are these three things. It is necessary that in whom is faith, which works through love, hopes for what God promises. Hope is therefore the companion of faith. Hope indeed is necessary, as long as we do not see what we believe; lest, perhaps, by not seeing and despairing, we fail. It saddens us, because we do not see: but it consoles us, because we hope to see. Therefore, hope is present, and it is a companion of faith. Then also charity, by which we desire, by which we strive to reach, by which we burn, by which we hunger and thirst. This, therefore, is also added: and there will be faith, hope, and charity. For how will there not be charity, since charity is nothing else but love? But faith itself is defined, which works through love. Take away faith, what you believe perishes; take away charity, what you act perishes. For it pertains to faith that you believe; to charity, that you act. For if you believe and do not love, you do not move toward good work: and if you move, you move as a servant, not as a son: fearing punishment, not loving righteousness. Therefore, that faith, I say, cleanses the heart, which works through love.

God is not to be thought of as a body. And now what does faith itself do? With such great testimonies of the Scriptures, with so manifold a reading, with so various and abundant an exhortation, what does it do but that we now see through a mirror in a riddle, and then face to face? But do not return again to that face of yours. Think of the face of the heart. Compel your heart to think of divine things, compel, urge. Whatever resembles the body that occurs to you thinking, cast it away. You are not yet able to say: "This is it"; at least say: "This is not it." For when will you say: "This is God"? Not even when you see it: because it is ineffable what you will see. The Apostle says he was caught up into the third heaven, and heard ineffable words. If the words are ineffable, what of that to which the words belong? Therefore, as you think about God, some grand and very large human shape perhaps occurs to you: you have placed it in the sight of your thought, as if it were something great, very large, grand, spread out with a very immense bulk. You have delimited it somewhere. If you have delimited it, it is not God. If you have not delimited it, where is the face? You are thinking of bulk, and to distinguish the parts, you set limits to the bulk. For otherwise you cannot distinguish the parts, unless you give the bulk an end. What are you doing, foolish and carnal thought? You made a great bulk, and all the greater as you thought you were honoring God more. Another one adds a cubit, and makes it greater. A passage of Isaiah seems opposed. But you say you have read. What have you read, who understood nothing? And yet tell, what did you read? Let us not repel the little one playing in the heart. Tell what you have read? Heaven is my throne, but the earth is the footstool of my feet. I hear, I have also read: but perhaps you think yourself superior because you have read and believed. I also believe what you said. Let us believe together. What do I say? Let us seek together. Behold, hold to what you read and believed: Heaven is my throne, that is, a seat; for ‘throne’ in Greek is ‘seat’ in Latin: but the earth is the footstool of my feet. Have you not also read this: Who has measured the heavens with the span of his hand? I think you have read: you recognize, and you confess to believe. For there indeed we read both, we believe both. Now already think, and teach me: I employ you as a teacher and make myself a little child. Teach me, I beseech you. Who is it that sits in the palm of his hand? The passage mentioned above is being examined.

Behold, you have derived the figures and outline of the members of God from the human body. But perhaps it slipped your mind, that we were made according to the body in the image of God.

Meanwhile, I accept this for consideration, examination, questioning, and being tested in dispute. If it pleases, listen to me: because in that which pleased you, I have listened to you.

God sits in heaven, and measures the heaven by his palm. Does this same heaven become wide when he sits, and narrow when he measures? Or is God himself as extensive in sitting as in the palm? If this is so, God did not make us in his likeness: for we have a palm that is much narrower than the part of the body on which we sit. But if he is as wide in his palm as he is in his sitting, he made for us members that are uneven. This is not a likeness. Therefore, let such an idol be ashamed in the Christian heart.

Accordingly, take heaven to represent all saints. For the earth is also said to represent all who are on earth: All the earth worships you. If we rightly speak according to those who dwell on earth: All the earth worships you: we rightly speak also according to those who dwell in heaven, All heaven bears you. For even the saints themselves who dwell on earth tread the earth with their flesh, but in their heart they dwell in heaven. For they are not admonished in vain to have their heart above, and when admonished, they respond accordingly: nor is it said in vain: If you have risen with Christ, seek what is above, where Christ is sitting at the right hand of God; think on what is above, not what is on earth. Therefore, inasmuch as they converse there, they also carry God, and are heaven; because they are God's seat; and when they announce the words of God: The heavens declare the glory of God.

Width, length, height, and depth.

Return therefore with me to the face of the heart: prepare it itself. Within is where God speaks. The ears, eyes, and other visible members are the dwelling or organ of something interior. The inner person is where Christ resides for now through faith: there He will dwell with the presence of His divinity when we understand what is width, length, height, and depth; we will also understand the love of Christ that surpasses knowledge, so that we might be filled with all the fullness of God. Now therefore, if this understanding does not displease you, endeavor to comprehend the width, length, height, and depth. Do not wander with the imagination of thought through worldly spaces and the comprehensible magnitude of this great mass. Attend to what I say within you. Width is in good works; length is in the long-suffering and perseverance of good works; height is in the expectation of heavenly rewards; for this height you are told to lift up your heart. Do good works and persevere in good works for the blessings of God. Esteem worldly things as nothing, lest when this world is disturbed with some scourge from that wise one, you say that you worshipped God in vain, did good works in vain, and persevered in good works in vain. For by doing good works, you have, as it were, had width: by persevering in them, you have, as it were, had length: but by seeking earthly things, you did not have height. Attend to the depth: the grace of God is in the hidden will of His purpose. For who has known the mind of the Lord? Or who has been His counselor? And: Your judgments are like a great abyss. The four dimensions of the cross. This conversation of doing good, persevering in it, expecting the heavenly, giving the grace of God secretly, wisdom, not foolishness; nor reproaching why one is thus, another otherwise; for there is no injustice with God. Therefore, if it pleases, fit this conversation also to the cross of your Lord. For it was not in vain that he chose such a death, in whose power it was to die or not to die. If it was in his power to die and not to die, why not in his power to die thus or thus? Therefore, he did not choose the cross in vain, where he might crucify you to this world. For the width is in the cross's transverse wood, where the hands are fixed: for the signification of good deeds. The length is in that part of the wood which extends from the transverse to the ground. There indeed the body is crucified, and in a certain way stands: and that station signifies perseverance. The height, however, is in that wood, which from the same transverse rises upwards towards the head: so that by it, the expectation of heavenly things is signified. Where is the depth, except in that part which is fixed in the earth? For the grace is hidden, and lies concealed in the secret. It is not seen, but from there what is seen emerges. After this, if you comprehend all these things, not only by understanding but also by acting (for a good understanding is for all those who do it); then now extend yourself, if you can, to recognize the love of Christ which surpasses knowledge. When you reach it, you will be filled with all the fullness of God. Then it will be face to face. You will be filled with all the fullness of God, not so that God will be filled with you, but that you will be filled with God. Seek there, if you can, the corporeal face. Now let trivialities be removed from the sight of the mind. Let the little boy discard trifles, let him learn to handle greater things. And we are little ones in many things: and when we were more than we are, we were tolerated by those greater. Pursue peace with all, and holiness, without which no one will see God. For this also purifies the heart: because there is faith, which works through love. Hence: Blessed are the merciful, for they shall see God.

Sermons - Sermon 53A

SERMON 53/A About the Eight Beatitudes from the Gospel No one should praise the word of God with the tongue alone, but despise it with their life. Your Charity has heard the Holy Gospel with us: may the Lord help us talking to you about that very chapter which was just recited, so that what we say may be suitable for you, and may bear fruit in your conduct. For every listener of the word of God ought to consider that what he hears should come to pass; neither should he seek to praise the word of God with his tongue, and despise it with his life. For if what is said is sweet when heard, how much sweeter should it be when done? For we are like those who are sowing, but you are the fields of God: let the seeds not perish, let the harvest bear fruit. You have heard the Lord Christ with us, when His disciples came to Him: Opening His mouth, He was teaching them saying: Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven, and the rest. When His disciples approached Him, one true teacher was teaching these words briefly, which we have just recalled. And you have approached us so that, with His help, we speak to you, and teach you. What better thing do we do than when we teach those things which such a great teacher, while explaining, has said?

Many rich men, no rich man is secure.

Therefore, be poor in spirit, so that the kingdom of heaven may be yours. What are you afraid of being poor? Consider the riches of the kingdom of heaven. Poverty is feared: let iniquity be feared instead. For after the poverty of the righteous will come great happiness, because there is full security; here, however, the more the so-called riches increase, which are not really riches, both fear and desire increase and never end. Can you give me many rich people? Can you give me one who is secure? He burns to acquire; he trembles to lose. When is such a servant free? He is a servant who serves any kind of mistress: and is he free who serves avarice? Blessed therefore are the poor in spirit. What does it mean, poor in spirit? Poor in desires, not in possessions. For he who is poor in spirit is humble: and God hears the groans of the humble and does not despise their prayers. Hence the Lord began to commend his sermon, starting with humility, that is, with poverty. You find a religious man, abundantly endowed with these earthly things, yet not puffed up with pride. You find a needy man, having nothing, and sitting in no circumstance. This one does not have more hope than that one: for that one is poor in spirit because he is humble; but this one is poor, and not in spirit. Therefore, when the Lord Christ said: Blessed are the poor, he added: in spirit. Therefore, whoever of you have heard us and are poor, do not seek to be rich. With which words the Apostle addresses those who are not rich.

Hear the Apostle, not me; see what he said: "But godliness with contentment is great gain." For we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out. And having food and raiment, let us be therewith content. But they that will be rich—he did not say "those who are", but "those who will be"—but they that will be rich fall into temptation, and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is the root of all evil, which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows. The name "riches" seems sweet when it is heard. Do they not fall into temptation? Is that a sweet name? Many foolish and hurtful lusts—is that a sweet name? Destruction and perdition—is that a sweet name? Piercing themselves with many sorrows—is that a sweet name? Don't let one false good deceive you, causing you to cling to many true evils. Because the blessed Apostle addressed these words not to those who are rich, but to those who are not, urging them not to desire to be what they are not, let's also see to whom it pertains, those whom he finds already rich. We have said what needed to be said; you who are poor have heard; and if any of you here are rich, listen to that same blessed Apostle.

What Paul says to those whom he finds rich. The proud rich man does not possess but is possessed.

Writing to Timothy, his disciple, among other things he advised him, he also said this: Command the rich of this world. The Word of God has already found them wealthy: for if it had found them poor, it would have said those things which I have already mentioned. Therefore, command the rich of this world not to be haughty, nor to trust in the uncertainty of riches, but in the living God, who provides us all things abundantly to enjoy. They should do good, be rich in good works, be generous and ready to share, storing up for themselves a good foundation for the future, so that they may take hold of the life that is truly life. Let us consider these few words for a moment. First of all, he says, command the rich not to be haughty. For nothing generates arrogance like wealth. If a rich man is not haughty, he has subdued his wealth, he has pined himself on God; a haughty rich man does not possess but is possessed. A haughty rich man is similar to the devil. What does a haughty rich man have when he does not have God? He also added: Nor to trust in the uncertainty of riches. He should thus possess wealth, knowing that what he has can perish. Therefore, let him hold what he cannot lose. When he has said: Nor to trust in the uncertainty of riches, he added: but in the living God. For riches can indeed perish: and would that they so perish without destroying you. The psalm addresses and mocks the rich man who trusts in riches: Although man walks in the image of God. For man was certainly made in the image of God; but let him acknowledge what he was made, let him lose what he made himself, and remain what God made him. Although man walks in the image of God, he will still be troubled in vain. What does it mean, he will be troubled in vain? He gathers riches, not knowing for whom he amasses them. Those living observe these things about the dead: they see that the possessions of many deceased are not possessed by their children, but are either squandered through living in excess or lost through deceit; and, what is worse, while what is owned is sought after, the owner perishes. Many are killed because of their wealth. Behold, they leave behind what they have here: when they did not do what they were commanded with them, with what face will they depart to Him? Therefore, let true riches be yours: God Himself, who provides us everything abundantly to enjoy. An example of a farmer trusting the seeds to the earth.

Let the rich, he says, be rich in good works. There the riches will appear, there let them sow. For the same Apostle was speaking of such works when he said: Let us not grow weary of doing good, for in due season we shall reap. Let them sow: he does not yet see what he is going to gain: let him believe and scatter. Does the farmer who sows already see the gathered crop? He casts and scatters the grain, which he has stored with such labor and care. He trusts his seeds to the earth: do you not trust your works to Him who made heaven and earth? Therefore, let them be rich, but in good works. Let them give freely, share. What does it mean to share? Not to keep it to oneself.

You said, O Apostle, and you taught us to sow: show us also the harvest. He shows it. Listen also to the harvest. O miser, do not be reluctant to sow: listen, I say, also to the harvest. For when he said, “Let them be rich in good works, let them give freely, share,” because he only said this so that they might scatter, he must say what they will gather. Let them, he says, store up for themselves a good foundation for the future, that they may take hold of true life. The false life will pass away, where riches delight. Therefore, after this life, we must come to the true life. You love what you have: place it in a safer place, lest you lose it. Certainly, your whole concern, whoever loves riches, is nothing except not to lose what you have. Listen to the counsel of your Lord. There is no safe place on earth: move to heaven. You wanted to entrust what you gathered to your most faithful servant: entrust it to your faithful Lord. Your servant, although he may be faithful to you, can lose it, even unwillingly; your God cannot lose anything: whatever you entrust to Him, you will have with Him, when you also have Him. The poor bearers migrating into heaven.

Because I said, "Migrate and place it in heaven," do not let a carnal thought creep in and say to you: "And when do I dig out from the earth or take away what I have from the earth and place it in heaven? How do I ascend? By what machines do I lift what I have there?" Consider the hungry, consider the naked, consider the needy, consider the strangers, consider the captives: these shall be your carriers to heaven. Perhaps you think here and say to yourself: "How will they be carriers? Just as I was thinking about how I could lift what I had to heaven and did not find a way, so I think about how they will lift to heaven what I give, and similarly I do not find a way." Listen then to what Christ says to you: "Make friends for yourself; give it to me there, and I will return it here for you." Christ says: "There on earth where you have, give to me, and I will return it to you here." You might still say here: "How do I give to Christ? Christ is in heaven, sitting at the right hand of the Father: when He was here in the flesh, He deigned to hunger, to thirst, to be in need of hospitality because of us: all these things were offered to Him by the devout, who were worthy to receive their Lord into their home; now Christ needs nothing, having placed His incorruptible flesh at the right hand of the Father. How do I give to Him here who needs nothing?" It escapes you what He said: "What you did for one of the least of these, you did for me." The head is in heaven, but He has members on earth: let the member of Christ give to the member of Christ, let the one who has give to the one in need. You are a member of Christ, and you have something to give; he is a member of Christ, and he needs what you can give. You both walk the same path, you both are comrades: the poor man is light on his shoulders, you the rich are weighed down with burdens: give from that with which you are oppressed, from that which burdens you give to the needy; and you relieve yourself, and uplift your comrade. The holy scripture says: "The poor and the rich meet together; the Lord is the maker of them all." A most pleasing sentiment: the poor and the rich meet together. Where do they meet if not in this life? That one is well-dressed, the other ragged, but when they meet. Both were born naked, for indeed the rich man was born poor: let him not consider what he found, but let him reflect on what he brought. What did the poor man bring when he was born, except nakedness and tears? Thus the Apostle says: "We brought nothing into this world, and we cannot take anything out of it." Therefore, let him send ahead of himself what he may find when he leaves. Therefore, there is a poor man, and there is a rich man, and they have met; and the Lord made them both: the rich man, so that he might aid the other; the poor man, so that he might test him. Blessed, therefore, are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. They may have riches, they may not have riches: let them be poor, and theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Who the meek are.

Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth. The meek. Those not resisting the will of God, they are the meek. Who are the meek? Those who, when things are well, praise God, and when things are bad, do not blaspheme God; in their good works they glorify God, in their sins they accuse themselves. They shall inherit the earth. What earth, unless it is the one of which the psalm says: You are my hope, my portion in the land of the living? By mourning, the sinner comes back to life.

Blessed are those who mourn, for they shall be comforted. My brothers, mourning is a sorrowful thing when it is the groaning of the penitent. For every sinner ought to mourn. Who is mourned over, if not the dead? And what is so dead as the unjust? It is a great thing: let him mourn for himself, and he revives; let him mourn in repentance, and he will be consoled by forgiveness. In the land of justice, hunger; in heaven, fullness.

Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness, for they shall be filled. This means to hunger for righteousness in our land. The fullness of righteousness will be in another place, where no one will sin, such as the fullness of righteousness in the holy angels. But we, who hunger and thirst for righteousness, say to God: Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven. Your poor beggar, you are a beggar of God.

Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy. In the best order, having said: Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness, for they shall be filled, he added: Blessed are the merciful, for they shall receive mercy from God. For you hunger and thirst for righteousness. If you hunger and thirst, you are a beggar of God. Therefore, you stand as a beggar before the door of God; another beggar stands before your door: what you do with your beggar, God does with his.

Receive God in a pure heart and He will enlarge you and feed you from Himself.

Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. Let him do all those things which are said above, and his heart will be purified. He has a pure heart, because he does not feign friendships, nor does he harbor enmities in his heart. For where God sees, there He crowns. Whatever it is that delights you in your heart, let it not be approved, nor praised: and if evil desire tickles, let it not be consented to: and if it burns strongly, let God be prayed against it, so that something may be done within and the heart purified, where God Himself is prayed to. For certainly when you wish to pray to God in your room, purify your room, so that God may hear; purify your inner room. Sometimes the tongue is silent, and the soul groans, certainly God is prayed to inwardly in the chamber of the heart: let there not be anything there that offends God's eyes, let there not be anything there that displeases God. But perhaps you labor in purifying your heart: call upon Him who will not disdain to purify the place for Himself, and will deem it worthy to dwell with you. Do you fear to take in so great a power, and does it trouble you; as ordinary and narrow people are accustomed to fear lest they should be compelled to take greater ones passing into their house? Certainly nothing is greater than God: do not fear narrowness, take Him in, and He enlarges you. Do you not have what to set before Him? Take Him in, and He feeds you; and, to hear more sweetly, He feeds you with Himself. He Himself will be your food, for He said: I am the living bread who came down from heaven. Such bread restores and does not fail. Therefore blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.

How the minister of peace should conduct himself. What the order of true peace in us should be.

Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called sons of God. Who are peacemakers? Those who make peace. Do you see those who are in discord? Be among them a minister of peace. Speak well of one to the other, and of this one to that one. Do you hear bad things about one of them from the other as from one who is angry? Do not betray: suppress the insult heard from the angry one, give faithful counsel for concord. But also, if you wish to be a peacemaker among your two discordant friends, begin by being at peace yourself: you must pacify yourself within, where perhaps you daily quarrel with yourself. Did not he have a quarrel within himself, who said: The flesh lusts against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh; for these are opposed to each other, to prevent you from doing what you would? These are the words of the Holy Apostle. For I delight in the law of God according to the inward man; but I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and making me a captive to the law of sin which is in my members. If, therefore, there is within the inner man a certain daily quarrel, and the commendable fight is engaged, lest the superior be overcome by the inferior, lest desire conquer the mind, lest lust conquer wisdom, that is the true peace which you must make within yourself, so that what is better in you commands the inferior. That which is better in you is where the image of God is. This is called the mind, it is called intelligence; there faith burns, there hope is strengthened, there charity is kindled. Does your mind wish to be capable of overcoming your lusts? Let it be subjected to the greater, and it will conquer the lesser; and there will be true, certain, and most orderly peace within you. What is the order of this peace? God commands the mind, the mind commands the flesh: nothing is more orderly. But still the flesh has its weaknesses. It was not so in paradise: it became such through sin, it has the bond of discord against us because of sin. One came without sin to reconcile our soul with our flesh, and deigned to give us the pledge of the Spirit. For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, these are sons of God. Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called sons of God. But this whole battle, which wears us down through infirmity - and even when we do not consent to evil desires, we are still somewhat occupied by the struggle itself, not yet secure - this whole battle will not be there when death is swallowed up in victory. Hear how it will not be: The corruptible body must, says the Apostle, put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. But when this mortal has put on immortality, then shall come to pass the saying that is written: Death is swallowed up in victory. The war is finished, and ended with peace. Hear the voice of the triumphant: Where, O death, is your struggle? where, O death, is your sting? Now this voice is of the triumphant: no enemy will remain at all, no fighter within, no tempter without. Therefore blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called sons of God. Not the punishment but the cause makes a martyr.

Blessed are those who suffer persecution for justice's sake. This distinction separates the martyr from the thief: for even the thief suffers persecution for his wrongs, not seeking a crown but paying a due penalty. It is not the punishment that makes a martyr, but the cause: let him first choose the cause, and confidently endure the punishment. In one place there were three crosses when Christ suffered: He in the middle, and on either side two thieves. Consider the punishment, nothing is more similar: yet one of the thieves found paradise on the cross. He in the middle, judging, condemns the proud and helps the humble. That wood was a tribunal for Christ. What will the judge do if he, judged, could do this? He said to the confessed thief: Verily I say unto thee, today shalt thou be with me in paradise. For he delayed himself. What had he said? Remember me, Lord, when you come into your kingdom. "I know my wrongs," he says, "surely I am tormented until you come." And because whoever humbles himself shall be exalted, he immediately pronounced the sentence, granted forgiveness: Today, he says, you shall be with me in paradise. But was the whole Lord buried that day? According to the flesh, He was to be in the tomb; according to the soul, He was to be among the damned, not to be bound, but to free the bound. If therefore He was to be among the damned that day according to the soul, and according to the flesh to be in the tomb, how did He say: Today you will be with me in paradise? But is not Christ wholly spirit and flesh? Did you forget, In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. Did you forget, that Christ is the Power of God and the Wisdom of God? Where then is the Wisdom of God not? Is it not said of it: It reaches from end to end mightily and orders all things sweetly? Therefore, according to the person of the Word, he says: Today you will be with me in paradise. "Today," he says, "according to the soul I descend to the damned, but according to divinity I do not depart from paradise."

Listeners, although eager, Aug. does not wish to burden.

I have explained all the beatitudes of Christ, as much as I was able, to your Charity. I see indeed that you are so eager that you still wish to hear. Your Charity has incited us to speak much, and perhaps we could say more: but it is better that you thoroughly chew over what you receive, and healthily digest it.

Sermons - Sermon 54

SERMO 54 ON WHAT IS WRITTEN IN THE GOSPEL MT 5, 16:

"Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father who is in heaven." And in reply, Matthew 6:1:

"Take heed that you do not do your righteousness before men, to be seen by them."

Rules seemingly contradictory.

It often moves many, dearest ones, that our Lord Jesus Christ in the Gospel Sermon, after first having said: "Let your light shine before men, that they may see your good works and glorify your Father who is in heaven," later said: "Take heed that you do not do your righteousness before men, to be seen by them." For the mind of one who understands little, and who certainly wishes to obey the precept, is disturbed and stretched by diverse and opposing things. For as no one can obey even one master that commands contradictory things, so no one can serve two masters: which the Savior himself attested to in the same Sermon. What, therefore, will a wavering soul do, when it thinks that it cannot obey, and fears not obeying? For if he places his good works in the light for men to see, so that he may do what is commanded: "Let your light shine before men, that they may see your good works and glorify your Father who is in heaven," he will consider himself guilty, because he acted against the precept where it is said: "Take heed that you do not do your righteousness before men, to be seen by them." And again, if fearing and avoiding this, he hides the things he does well, he will not think he is serving the one commanding and saying: "Let your light shine before men, that they may see your good works." The Apostle fulfills each commandment.

Whoever understands correctly fulfills both and will serve the most universal Lord, who would not condemn a lazy servant if He commanded things that could by no means be done. For listen to Paul, the servant of Christ Jesus, called to be an Apostle, separated for the Gospel of God, both doing and teaching. See how his light shines before men, so that they see his good works. "We commend ourselves," he says, "to every man's conscience in the sight of God": and again: "For we are taking pains to do what is right, not only in the eyes of the Lord but also in the eyes of man": and again: "Please everyone in everything, just as I try to please everyone in everything." See again how he is careful not to do his righteousness before men, to be seen by them. "Let each one test his own work," he says; "and then he will have glory in himself alone, and not in another": and again: "For our boast is this, the testimony of our conscience": and that which nothing is clearer: "If I were still trying to please men," he says, "I would not be a servant of Christ." But lest anyone of those who are troubled by what seem like conflicting precepts of the Lord Himself should bring up the question even more, and say: "How do you say: please everyone in everything, just as I try to please everyone in everything: and yet say: if I were still trying to please men, I would not be a servant of Christ?" May the Lord Himself be present, who also spoke in His servant and Apostle, and open to us His will, and grant us the capacity to obey. The two precepts are reconciled. The very words of the Gospel indeed carry their own expositions along with them; nor do they close the mouths of the hungry, because they feed the hearts of those who knock. Indeed, the intention of the human heart, where it is directed and to what it is focused, must be considered. For if someone who wants his good works to be seen by men places his glory and advantage before men, and seeks this in their sight, he has fulfilled none of the things the Lord commanded concerning this matter: because he also does justice in front of men to be seen by them, and his light did not shine before men in such a way that they would see his good works and glorify his Father who is in heaven. For he wanted to glorify himself, not God; and he sought his own benefit, not the will of the Lord. About such people the Apostle says: For all seek their own interests, not those of Jesus Christ.

Therefore, the sentence does not end there where he says: Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works: but immediately adds why it should be done, so that they may glorify, he says, your Father who is in heaven: so that when a man’s good deeds are seen by men, he has the intention of the good deed in his conscience, but the intention of being known only in the praises of God, for the benefit of those to whom it is known; to whom it is beneficial that God may be pleasing, who granted this to man; and thus they may not despair, but even believe this can be granted to them if they will it. Therefore, another sentence, where he says: Take heed that you do not your righteousness before men, ends nowhere else than when he said, to be seen by them: nor did he add: And glorify your Father who is in heaven; but rather added: Otherwise, you have no reward with your Father who is in heaven.

Thus, he shows that those who are such, whom he does not want his faithful to be, are seeking their reward in the fact that they are seen by men, placing their good in this; delighting their vanity of heart there, being emptied and inflated there, swelling and pining away there. For why was it not sufficient to say, Take care not to do your righteousness before men; but added, to be seen by them: unless because there are some who so do their righteousness before men, not to be seen by them, but that the works themselves may be seen, and the Father who is in heaven be glorified, who deigned to grant these to the justified ungodly? Who indeed truly fulfilled both commandments.

Those who are such do not reckon their own righteousness, but that of Him by whose faith they live. Hence the Apostle says: "That I may gain Christ and be found in Him, not having my own righteousness, which is from the Law, but that which is through faith in Christ—the righteousness which is from God by faith." And in another place: "That we might be made the righteousness of God in Him." Hence he also reproves the Jews thus: "For they, being ignorant of God's righteousness and seeking to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted to the righteousness of God."

Therefore, whoever wishes in this way that his works may be seen by men so that He may be glorified from whom those things seen in him are received, and thus the same ones who see may be incited to imitate the good in the devotion of faith, truly his light shines before men: because the light of charity is radiated from him, not the smoke of pride spewed. And in this very thing, he is cautious not to do his righteousness before men to be seen by them; because he neither reckons that righteousness his own, nor does he do it to be seen by them, but so that He who is praised in a justified man may be understood, so that He may also perform in the praiser what is praised in another, that is, so that He may make the praiser to be praiseworthy.

Consider also the Apostle, when he said: "Please all men in all things, just as I also please all men in all things," how he did not remain there, as if he had thus established the end of his intention to please men; otherwise, he would have falsely said: "If I were still pleasing men, I would not be a bondservant of Christ." But he immediately adds why he pleased men. "Not seeking my own profit," he says, "but the profit of many, that they may be saved." Thus, he was neither pleasing men for his own benefit, lest he would not be a servant of Christ, and he was pleasing men for their salvation, so that he might be a fitting steward of Christ; because both his conscience before God sufficed him, and what in him was to be imitated before men shone forth.

Sermons - Sermon 55

SERMO 55 ON THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL MT 5, 22:

"WHOEVER SAYS TO HIS BROTHER, 'FOOL,' SHALL BE IN DANGER OF HELL FIRE" AND SO ON

Useful fear. The chapter of the Holy Gospel, which we just heard being read, greatly terrified us, if we have faith: but it did not terrify those who do not have faith. And because it does not terrify them, they want to be perversely secure, not knowing how to distribute and distinguish the times of fear and security. Therefore, let the one who now leads a life with an end in which he might have security without end in that life be afraid. Therefore, we were afraid. For who would not fear the Truth speaking and saying: Whoever says to his brother, Fool, shall be guilty of hellfire? But no man can tame the tongue. And man tames the wild beast, but he does not tame the tongue: he tames the lion, and he does not restrain his speech: he tames it, and he does not tame himself: he tames what he feared; and to tame himself, he does not fear what he ought to fear. But what happens? A true sentence, and this too proceeded from the oracle of truth: But no man can tame the tongue. The necessity of divine help to tame the tongue.

What then shall we do, my brothers? I see that I am indeed speaking to a multitude: but because we are all one in Christ, let us take counsel as if in secret. No stranger hears us, we are one, because we are in one. What shall we do? Whoever says to his brother, "Fool," shall be liable to the hell of fire: But no human being can tame the tongue. Will therefore all go into the hell of fire? Far be it. Lord, you have been our refuge in all generations. Your wrath is just: you send no one into hell unjustly. Where shall I go from your spirit, and where shall I flee from you, if not to you? Therefore let us understand, dearest ones, that if no human can tame the tongue, we must flee to God, who may tame our tongue. For if you wish to tame it, you cannot, because you are human? No human can tame the tongue. Consider the analogy from the very animals we tame. The horse does not tame itself; the camel does not tame itself; the elephant does not tame itself; the asp does not tame itself; the lion does not tame itself: so too man does not tame himself. But to tame the horse, the ox, the camel, the elephant, the lion, the asp, man is sought. Therefore let God be sought, that man may be tamed.

God, tamer of the tongue.

Therefore: Lord, you have been a refuge for us. We turn to you, and it will be well for us from you. For it is bad for us from us. Because we abandoned you, you abandoned us to ourselves. Let us be found in you, for we were lost in ourselves. Lord, you have been a refuge for us. What then, my brethren, should we doubt, since the Lord will make us gentle, if we offer ourselves to be tamed by him? You tamed the lion, which you did not create; will he not tame you, who created you? From where could you have gained the power to tame such enormous beasts? Is it that you are equal to them in bodily strength? By what power, therefore, could you tame such great beasts? Those animals which are called beasts are not endured unless tamed by humans, and under human control. They are not accustomed to being tame unless through human hands, under human reins, and human power. Do you think they could be born tame? Certainly consider enormous wild beasts. The lion roars, who would not fear? And yet, from what do you consider yourself stronger? Not by bodily strength, but by the inner reason of the mind. You are stronger than the lion because you are made in the image of God. The image of God tames the wild beast; and will not God tame his own image? The scourge of God must be endured by the one who tames. In Him is our hope, let us submit to Him, and pray for mercy. Let us place our hope in Him, and until we are tamed and fully subdued, that is, perfected, let us endure the one who tames us. Oftentimes, indeed, our tamer also brings out the whip. For if you bring out a rod or a whip to tame your animals, does God not bring out such things to tame His animals, which we are, whom He will make His children from being His livestock? You tame your horse; what will you give your horse when it begins to carry you meekly, to bear your discipline, to obey your command, to be your beast of burden, that is, the support of your weakness? What do you give it in return, whom you do not even bury when it has died, but throw out to be torn apart by birds? God reserves an inheritance for you when He has tamed you, which is God Himself: and though you die temporarily, He will resurrect you. He will restore to you your flesh down to the number of your hairs: and will set you with the Angels forever, where you will no longer need to be tamed, but merely to be possessed by the most pious one. For then God will be all in all: nor will there be any unhappiness to afflict us, but only happiness to nourish us. Indeed, our shepherd Himself, our God: He is our drink, our God; our honor, our God; our wealth, our God. Whatever varied things you search for here, He alone will be everything to you.

Into what hope are we being tamed here? To this hope man is tamed, and the tamer is considered unbearable? To this hope man is tamed, and against this useful tamer, if perchance he brings forth a scourge, there is murmuring? You have heard the Apostle exhorting: "If you separate yourselves from discipline, then you are illegitimate and not sons." The illegitimate are adulterers. For who is the son whom his father does not discipline? And, he says, of our flesh, we had fathers as correctors and we respected them; shall we not much more be subject to the Father of spirits, and live? For what could your father have afforded you, because he corrected you, because he beat you, because he brought forth a scourge and struck you? Could he provide that you live forever? What he could not provide for himself, how would he provide for you? For the sake of his small amount of money, which he gathered from usury and toil, he taught you with scourges, lest his labor be lost by you living badly. And he beat his son, fearing his labors would perish: because he left you what he could not keep here, nor take away. For he did not leave you anything here that could be his own: he yielded it, so that you might access it thus. But your God, your Redeemer, your tamer, your chastiser, your Father, instructs you. Why? That you may receive an inheritance, where you will not bury the Father, but will have the inheritance as the Father himself. To this hope you are instructed, and you murmur? And if any sadness befalls, perhaps you blaspheme? Where will you go from His spirit? Behold, he lets you go and does not scourge: He deserts the blasphemer, will you not feel him judging? Is it not better that He scourges and receives you, than He spares you and deserts you? Our refuge, God.

Let us therefore say to the Lord our God: Lord, you have been a refuge for us, from generation to generation. In the first generation and the next generation, you have been a refuge for us. You are a refuge that we might be born, who were not: you are a refuge that we might be reborn, who were evil: you are a refuge that you might feed your deserters: you are a refuge that you might raise and guide your children: you have been a refuge for us. We will not depart from you, when you have delivered us from all our evils, and have filled us with your goods. You give good things, you soothe, lest we grow weary on the way: you rebuke, you scourge, you strike, you guide, lest we stray from the way. Whether, therefore, you soothe, lest we grow weary on the way; or you chastise, lest we stray from the way; Lord, you have been a refuge for us.

Sermons - Sermon 56

SERMO 56 In the Gospel according to Matthew 6 ON THE LORD'S PRAYER TO THE CANDIDATES The Creed and Prayer are handed down to Christians. The blessed Apostle, showing that these times, when it would happen that all nations would believe in God, were foretold by the Prophets, put forth this testimony which is written: "And it shall come to pass that everyone who calls on the name of the Lord shall be saved." For previously, the name of the Lord who made heaven and earth was invoked only among the Israelites; the other nations called upon mute and deaf idols, from whom they were not heard, or demons, by whom they were heard to their harm. But when the fullness of time came, what was predicted is fulfilled: "And it shall come to pass that everyone who calls on the name of the Lord shall be saved." Then, because the Jews themselves were envious of the Gospel being offered to the Gentiles, even those who believed in Christ, and said that the Gospel of Christ should not be preached to those who were not circumcised; for against these, the Apostle Paul put forth this testimony: "And it shall come to pass that everyone who calls on the name of the Lord shall be saved." He immediately added to convict those who did not want the Gentiles to be evangelized and said: "How then shall they call on Him in whom they have not believed? Or how shall they believe in Him of whom they have not heard? And how shall they hear without a preacher? And how shall they preach unless they are sent?" Therefore, because he said: "How shall they call on Him in whom they have not believed?" this is why you did not receive the prayer first, and afterwards the Creed; but first the Creed, where you might know what you believe, and afterwards the prayer, where you might know whom you invoke. Therefore, the Creed pertains to faith, the prayer to supplication: because he who believes is heard when he calls.

Two things must be avoided by the one who invokes.

Many, however, ask for what they should not ask, ignorant of what is beneficial for them. Therefore, anyone who prays should avoid two things: that they do not ask for what they should not, and that they do not ask it from whom they should not. From the devil, from idols, from demons, nothing should be asked that ought to be asked: from the Lord our God, the Lord Jesus Christ, the God of the Prophets, Apostles, and martyrs, from the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, from the God who made heaven and earth and the sea and all that is in them, from Him it should be asked, if anything should be asked. But it should be taken care that even from Him, what should not be asked is not asked. Since we should ask for human life, if you ask it from deaf and mute idols, what good does it do for you? Likewise, from God the Father, who is in heaven, if you wish for the death of your enemies, what good does it do for you? Have you not heard or read in the psalm, where the damnable traitor Judas is foretold, how prophecy said about him: "Let his prayer become sin for him"? Therefore, if you arise and pray harm upon your enemies, your prayer will become sin. In the holy Psalms, evils are not wished for the enemies, but are foreseen. In the holy psalms, you have read many times how the one who speaks in the psalms calls down many evils upon his enemies. "And surely," someone says, "the one who speaks in the psalms is righteous: why does he wish such evil upon his enemies?" He does not wish it, but foresees it: it is a prophecy of the foretelling one, not a wish of the one cursing. For in the spirit they knew to whom evil was going to happen, to whom, good: and, through prophecy, they spoke as if they wished what they foresaw. But how do you know that the one for whom you pray ill today shall not be better than you? "But I know he is wicked." And you know yourself to be wicked. Although you may dare to judge the heart of another which you do not know: yet you know yourself to be wicked. Do you not hear the Apostle saying: "I was formerly a blasphemer and a persecutor and an injurious person; but I obtained mercy, because I acted ignorantly in unbelief"? When the Apostle Paul was persecuting Christians, binding them where he found them, dragging them to be heard by the priests and punished; what do you think, brothers, did the Church pray against him or for him? Surely, the Church of God, which had learned from its Lord, who said while hanging on the cross: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do"; prayed such things for Paul, or rather still for Saul, so that what happened to him might happen to him. For Paul says: "I was unknown by face to the churches of Judea which are in Christ; they only were hearing, that he who once persecuted us now preaches the faith he once tried to destroy, and they glorified God in me." Why did they glorify God, unless because they had prayed to God before it had happened?

Loquacity in prayer must be avoided. Our Lord therefore first cut off excessive talking, lest you bring many words to God, as if you wished to teach God with many words. When therefore you pray, there is need of devotion, not verbosity. Your Father, however, knows what you need before you ask Him. Do not therefore speak much: for He knows what you need. But perhaps here someone may say: "If He knows what we need, why do we even say a few words? Why do we pray? He knows: let Him give what He knows we need." But He wanted you to pray so that He may give to one who desires, lest what He gives become cheap: for He Himself has instilled that very desire. Therefore the words our Lord Jesus Christ taught in prayer are the pattern of desires. You are not allowed to ask for anything else than what is written there. The Lord's Prayer is the form of desires.

You, therefore, he says, say: Our Father, who art in heaven. Where you see that you have begun to have God as Father. But you will have Him when you are born. Although even now before you are born, you have been conceived by His seed, as if in the womb of the Church in the font of rebirth. Our Father, who art in heaven. Remember that you have a Father in heaven. Remember that you were born to death from the father Adam, to be reborn to life from God the Father. And what you say, say in your hearts. Let the affection of the one who prays be such that it will be the effect of the one who listens. Hallowed be Thy name. That which you ask to be hallowed, the name of God, is holy. Why do you ask for that which is already holy? Then when you ask that His name be hallowed, do you not ask as if for Him, and not for yourself? Understand, you also ask for yourself. For you ask this, that what is always holy in itself, may be hallowed in you. What does it mean: hallowed be? Let it be held as holy, not be despised. Therefore you see, because when you wish, you wish something good for yourself. For it is bad for you if you despise the name of God, not for God. May your kingdom come. To whom do we say this? And if we do not ask for it, is the kingdom of God not going to come? For it is said of that kingdom that it will be after the end of the world. For God always has a kingdom; and He is never without a kingdom, to which all creation serves. But what kingdom do you desire? It is written in the Gospel: "Come, you blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the beginning of the world." Behold of what we say: "May your kingdom come." We desire that it may come in us; we desire that we may be found in it. For behold, it will come: but what good will it do you, if it finds you on the left? Therefore, you are wishing well for yourself, you are praying for yourself. This you desire, this you yearn for in prayer, that you may live in such a way as to belong to the kingdom of God, which is to be given to all the saints. Therefore, in order to live well, you pray for yourself when you say: "May your kingdom come." May we belong to your kingdom, may it also come to us, which will come to your saints and just ones.

Let your will be done. If you do not say it, will God not do His will? Remember what you declared in the creed: I believe in God the Father Almighty. If He is almighty, do you pray for His will to be done? What then is it: Let your will be done? Let it be done in me, so that I may not resist your will. Therefore, here too you are praying for yourself, and not for God. For the will of God will be done in you, even if it is not done by you. For to those He will say: Come, you blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world, the will of God will be done in them, so that the righteous and holy may receive the kingdom; and to those He will say: Depart into eternal fire, which is prepared for the devil and his angels, the will of God will be done in them, so that the wicked may be condemned to eternal fire. It is another matter for it to be done by you. Therefore, for it to be done in you, you are not praying without reason, except for it to be well with you. So whether it is well with you, or not well with you, it will be done in you; but let it also be done by you. Why then do I say: Let your will be done in heaven and on earth, and not say: "Let your will be done by heaven and by earth"? Because what is done in you, He himself does by you. It is never done by you, which He does not himself do in you. But sometimes He does in you, what is not done by you: yet never is anything done by you, if He does not do it in you.

What does it mean: in heaven and on earth, or: as in heaven, so also on earth? The angels do your will, let us also do it. Thy will be done, as in heaven, so also on earth. The mind is heaven, the flesh is earth. When you say, if indeed you say, what the Apostle said: With the mind, I serve the law of God, but with the flesh the law of sin; the will of God is done in heaven, but not yet on earth. But when the flesh agrees with the mind, and death is swallowed up in victory, so that no carnal desires remain, with which the mind struggles, when the strife on earth is over, when the war of the heart is over, when what was said is over: The flesh desires against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh; for these are opposed to each other, so that you do not do what you want: when this war is over, and all lust is changed into love, nothing will remain in the body that resists the spirit, nothing to subdue, nothing to curb, nothing to tread upon; but all will proceed to justice through harmony; your will is done in heaven and on earth. We wish for perfection when we pray this. Again, Thy will be done in heaven and on earth. In the Church, the spiritual are heaven, the carnal are earth. Let therefore your will be done in heaven and on earth: so that just as the spiritual serve you, so also the carnal, changed for the better, may serve you. Thy will be done in heaven and on earth. There is also another very pious meaning. For we are admonished to pray for our enemies. The Church is heaven; the enemies of the Church are earth. What then is: Thy will be done in heaven and on earth? Let our enemies believe, as we believe in you: let them become friends, end their enmities. They are earth, therefore they are against us; let them become heaven and they will be with us.

We are all beggars of God.

Give us this day our daily bread. And here it is already clear that we pray for ourselves. When you say: Hallowed be thy name, it means you are praying for yourself, not for God. When you say: Thy will be done, this too must be explained, lest you think you are wishing well for God, that His will be done, and not rather praying for yourself. When you say: Thy kingdom come, this too must be explained, lest you think you are wishing well for God, that He may reign. But from this point onward until the end of the prayer, it appears that we are asking God for ourselves. When you say: Give us this day our daily bread, you acknowledge yourself to be a beggar of God. But do not be ashamed: however wealthy one may be on earth, one is a beggar of God. A beggar stands before the house of a rich man: but even the rich man stands before the house of the great rich man. He is asked from, and he asks. If he were not in need, he would not knock on God's ears with prayer. And what does the rich man need? I dare say, the rich man too needs daily bread. Why are all things abundant for him? Whence, unless because God gave them? What will he have if God withdraws His hand? Have not many slept rich, and risen poor? And what is not lacking to them is due to God's mercy, not their own power.

Daily bread: bodily and spiritual. But this bread, beloved, with which the stomach is filled, with which the flesh is daily refreshed; you see therefore that God gives this bread, not only to His praisers but also to blasphemers, who makes His sun rise on the good and the evil, and sends rain on the just and the unjust. You praise, He feeds you; you blaspheme, He feeds you. He waits for you to repent; but if you do not change, He condemns you. Therefore since both the good and the evil receive this bread from God, do you think there is no other bread which the children ask for, of which the Lord said in the Gospel: It is not good to take the children's bread and cast it to the dogs? There certainly is. What is this bread? And why is it called daily along with this? For it is necessary: without it, we cannot live, just as we cannot live without bread. It is impudence to ask God for riches: it is not impudence to ask for daily bread. One thing is for pride, another is for living. However, because this visible and tangible bread is given to both the good and the bad; there is daily bread which the children ask for; it is the very word of God, which is daily dispensed to us. It is our daily bread: with it live not our stomachs, but our minds. It is necessary for us, even now laborers, in the vineyard; it is food, not a reward. For the worker due to him, who hires him into the vineyard, are two things: both food so that he does not fail, and a reward from which he might rejoice. Our daily bread in this world is the Word of God, which is always dispensed to the Churches: our reward after the labor is called eternal life. Again in this our daily bread if you understand what the faithful receive, what you who are baptized are about to receive; we rightly pray and say: Give us this day our daily bread: so that we may live in such a way that we are not separated from that altar.

Here we are all debtors to God. And forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. And this petition is not to be explained, because we ask for ourselves. For we ask that our debts be forgiven. For we are debtors, not of money, but of sins. You might now say: And you? We answer: And us. And you, holy bishops, are you debtors? And we are debtors. And you? God forbid, do not do yourself an injury. I do not injure myself, but I speak the truth: we are debtors. If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. And we are baptized, and we are debtors. Not because something remained that was not forgiven to us in baptism: but because by living we contract something that is to be forgiven daily. Those who are baptized and go out, ascend without debt, proceed without debt; but those who are baptized and remain in this life, due to mortal weakness they contract something from which, even if shipwreck is not suffered, nevertheless it must be bailed out: because if it is not bailed out, gradually it enters through which the whole ship is sunk. And praying this is bailing out. But we must not only pray, but also give alms: because when the ship is bailed out so that it does not sink, both with voices and with hands it is done. We act with voices, when we say: Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors; we act with hands, when we do: Share your bread with the hungry, and bring the homeless poor into your house. Place alms in the heart of the poor, and it will pray for you to the Lord.

Daily sins must be cleansed.

Therefore, having been forgiven all sins through the washing of regeneration, we would be crushed into great anguish if we were not given the daily cleansing of holy prayer. Almsgiving and prayers cleanse sins; only let such things not be committed, from which it is necessary for us to be separated from the daily bread; avoiding debts, to which a certain and severe condemnation is owed. Do not call yourselves just, as if you do not have anything from which you can say: Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors. Abstaining from idolatry, from the consultations of astrologers, from the remedies of enchanters; abstaining from the deceptions of heretics, from the schisms of schismatics; abstaining from murders, from adulteries and fornications, from thefts and robberies, from false testimonies: and if perhaps other things, I do not say those which have deadly outcomes, from which it is necessary to be cut off from the altar, and bound on earth so that it is bound in heaven: very dangerously and mortally, unless it is loosed on earth that it may be loosed in heaven: therefore, with these excepted, man does not lack a reason to sin. By what he ought not to willingly see, he sins. And who can restrain the swiftness of the eye? Seeing that it is said the eye received its name from swiftness. Who can restrain the ear or the eye? The eyes, when you wish, can be closed, and quickly closed: the ears, you close with effort; you raise your hand, you reach them: and if someone holds your hands, they remain open; nor can you close them against cursed, impure, flattering, and deceiving words. When you hear something that you ought not, and even if you do not do it, do you not sin with the ear? You listen to evil willingly. How many sins does the deadly tongue commit! Sometimes such as those by which man is separated from the altar. To it pertains the matter of blasphemies. Many and meaningless things are spoken, which do not pertain to the matter. Let the hand do nothing evil; let the foot not hurry to anything evil; let the eye not be directed toward wantonness; let the ear not willingly be open to baseness; let the tongue not be moved to what is indecent. You say: Who holds thoughts? My brothers, we often pray, and think of other things, as if we forget before whom we stand, or before whom we lie prostrate. If all these things are gathered against us, do they not weigh us down because they are small? What difference does it make whether lead weighs you down or sand? Lead is a single mass, sand is tiny grains, but they weigh you down by their abundance. Sins are small: do you not see rivers being filled with small drops, and their banks being eroded? They are small, but they are many.

Agreement to forgive debts.

Therefore, let us say every day, and let us say with a true heart, and let us do what we say: Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors. We make a pledge with God, an agreement and covenant. This is what your Lord God says to you: Forgive, and I forgive. Did you not forgive? You hold it against yourself, not I. Indeed, my beloved children, because I know what is necessary for you in the Lord's prayer, and especially in that entire sentence: Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors, listen to me. You are about to be baptized, forgive everything: whoever has something against someone in his heart, let him forgive from his heart. Thus enter, and be assured, that everything whatsoever is forgiven to you, whatever you have contracted, and from being born from parents according to Adam with original sin, for the sake of which you run to the grace of the Savior with the little one, and whatever you have added by living, in words, deeds, thoughts, all are forgiven: and you will come out from there as if from the presence of your Lord with the assurance of all debts.

Encourages the love of enemies.

Now, on account of those daily sins of which I have spoken, because it is necessary for you to say, as in daily cleansing, this: Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors; what will you do? You have enemies: for who lives on this earth without having an enemy? Pay attention to yourselves: love them. In no way can a raging enemy harm you as much as you harm yourself if you do not love the enemy. For he can harm either your house, or your cattle, or your home, or your servant, or your maidservant, or your son, or your wife, or at most, if he is given the power, your flesh: but can he, like you, harm your soul? Strive for this perfection, dearest ones, I exhort you. But did I give it to you? He who you say to: Your will be done, as in heaven, so also on earth, gave it to you. Yet let it not appear impossible to you: I know, I have known, I have proven that there are Christian men who love their enemies. If it seems impossible to you, do not do it. First believe it can be done: and pray that the will of God be done in you. For what benefit is there to you from the evil of your enemy? If he had no evil, he would not be your enemy. Wish good for him, end his evils, and he shall no longer be an enemy. For it is not the human nature in him that is your enemy, but sin. Is he your enemy because he has a soul and body? This is what you are: you have a soul, he has a soul; you have a body, he has a body. He is of the same substance as you: you were made together from the earth by the Lord, you were given life. He is what you are: look at your brother. First, our two parents were Adam and Eve; that father, that mother: therefore, we are brothers. Let us omit the first origin; God is the father, the Church is the mother: therefore, we are brothers. But my enemy is a pagan, a Jew, a heretic; and so, as I said, Your will be done, as in heaven, so also on earth. O Church! Your enemy is a pagan, a Jew, a heretic: he is earth. If you are heaven, call upon the Father who is in heaven, and pray for your enemies: for Saul was also an enemy of the Church; thus, prayer was made for him, he became a friend. He not only ceased to be a persecutor, but labored to be a helper. And if you seek the truth, prayer was made against him: but against his malice, not his nature. Pray also against the malice of your enemy: let it die, and let him live. For if your enemy dies, you lose an enemy, but do not find a friend; but if his malice dies, you find a friend.

Enemies are to be loved by all, although few perform this.

Still say: Who can? Who does that? God does it in your hearts. And I know: few do it, they are great who do it, the spiritual do it. Are all the faithful in the Church approaching the altar and taking the body and blood of Christ such? Are all such? And yet all say: Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors. If God answers them: Why do you ask me to do what I promised, when you do not do what I commanded? What did I promise? To forgive your debts. What did I command? That you also forgive your debtors. How can you do these things if you do not love your enemies? What then shall we do, brothers? Is the flock of Christ reduced to such fewness? If only they ought to say: Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors, who love their enemies, I do not know what to do, I do not know what to say. For I will say to you: If you do not love your enemies, do not pray? I dare not: rather, pray so that you may love. But what shall I say to you? If you do not love your enemies, do not say in the Lord’s prayer: Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors? Suppose I say: Do not say it. If you do not say it, they are not forgiven: if you say it and do not do it, they are not forgiven. Therefore it must be said and done, so that they may be forgiven.

Let forgiveness at least be given to an enemy who asks for it.

I see something, from which I can console not a small number of Christians, but a multitude: and I know that you desire to hear this. "Forgive, that you may be forgiven," Christ said. And what do you say in prayer? from where we now discuss: "Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors." Forgive, Lord, as we forgive. You say this: "Forgive us our debts, Father who art in heaven, as we also forgive our debtors." For you should do this: for if you do not do this, you will perish. But what? When you hear: The enemy seeks pardon, immediately you should forgive. Is this much to you? It was much for you to love your enemy, who was raging: is it much for you to love a man who asks for pardon? What do you say? He was raging, and you hated him. I would prefer that you had not even hated then: I would prefer that even then, when you were suffering from his rage, you would recall the Lord saying: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." Therefore I greatly wish that even at that time, when the enemy was raging against you, you would look to the Lord your God saying this. But perhaps you will say: "He did it, but as Lord, because He is Christ, because He is the Son of God, because He is the Only Begotten, because the Word was made flesh: what about me, a wicked and weak man?" If your Lord is too much for you, let your fellow servant be considered by you. Saint Stephen was being stoned: and amid the stones, he knelt in prayer for his enemies, and said: "Lord, do not hold this sin against them." They were throwing stones, not seeking pardon: and he was praying for them. I want you to be like him: extend yourself. Why do you always drag your heart to the earth? Listen, extend your heart upward, love your enemies. If you cannot love someone who is raging, at least love someone who is asking. Love the man who says to you: "Brother, I have sinned, forgive me." Then if you do not forgive, I do not say: Erase the prayer from your heart; but: You will be erased from the book of God.

Discipline without hatred. But if even then you forgive, or then from the heart you release hatred: hatred, I say, release from the heart, not discipline. What if the one who asks for forgiveness must be punished by me? Do what you will: for I think that you love your son, even when you strike him. You do not care about the tears of the one being flogged, because you preserve the inheritance. I say this, that you release hatred from the heart when your enemy asks you for forgiveness. But perhaps you say: "He lies, he pretends." O judge of the heart, tell me the evil thoughts of your father, tell me your thoughts from yesterday. He asks, he seeks forgiveness: release, completely release. If you do not release, you harm not him, but yourself. For he knows what he will do. Do you not want to release your fellow servant to your fellow servant? He will go to your Lord and say to Him: "Lord, I asked my fellow servant to release me, and he did not want to release: you release me." Is it not allowed for the Lord to forgive the debts of His servant? He, having received forgiveness, departs from the Lord absolved: you remain bound. How are you bound? The time for prayer will come, the time will come that you say: Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors. The Lord will answer you: By no means; when you owed me so much, you asked me, and I forgave you: should you not also have had mercy on your fellow servant as I had mercy on you? These words are from the Gospel, not from my heart. But if, having been asked, you forgive the one who asks for forgiveness, now you can say this prayer. And if you are not yet able to love the one raging, nevertheless you can say this prayer: Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors. Let us move on to the rest. Do not lead us into temptation. Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors, for past sins we say, which we cannot undo, so that they are not done. You can act, so that you do not do what you did: what do you do, so that what you did is not done? For those things which have already been done, this sentence of healing helps you: Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors. For those things which you may encounter, what will you do? Do not lead us into temptation, but deliver us from evil. Do not lead us into temptation, but deliver us from evil: this is, from the very temptation.

Three requests regard eternal life, three regard the necessities of this life. And there will be those three requests: Hallowed be your name, Your kingdom come, Your will be done on earth as it is in heaven, these three petitions are for human life. For the name of God must always be hallowed in us, we must always be in his kingdom, we must always do his will: this will be for eternity. Daily bread is necessary now; from this point on, the rest of what we pray for pertains to the needs of the present life. Daily bread is necessary in this life, it is necessary in this life that our debts be forgiven: for when we have come to that life, we will have ended debts; in this land there is temptation, in this land sailing is perilous, in this land something enters through the cracks of fragility, which must be bailed out. But when we have been made equal to the angels of God, let it not be that we say, let it not be that we ask God to forgive our debts, which will be none. Here then is daily bread, here that debts may be forgiven, here that we may not enter into temptation: because in that life temptation does not enter; here that we may be delivered from evil; because in that life there will be no evil, but eternal good will remain.

Sermons - Sermon 57

SERMO 57

AGAINST ON MT 6 ON THE LORD'S PRAYER, TO THE CATECHUMENS The Creed first, then the Prayer to be delivered. The order of your edification is that you may first learn what you believe, and afterwards what you ask for. For thus says the Apostle: "It shall be: everyone who calls on the name of the Lord shall be saved." Blessed Paul placed this testimony from the prophet, because these times were foretold by the prophet, when all would call upon God: "Whoever calls on the name of the Lord shall be saved." And he added: "How then will they call on Him in whom they have not believed? And how will they believe in Him whom they have not heard? And how will they hear without a preacher? And how will they preach unless they are sent?" Therefore, preachers were sent, they preached Christ. The people heard them preaching, by hearing they believed, by believing they called upon [Him]. Because it was rightly and truly said: "How will they call on Him in whom they have not believed?" Therefore, you first learned what you should believe: today you learned whom to call upon, in whom you have believed. The Son of God wanted us to be his brothers. The Son of God, our Lord Jesus Christ, taught us prayer: and although He is Himself the Lord, as you have received and returned in the Creed, the only Son of God, still He did not wish to be alone. He is the only one, and yet He did not wish to be alone: He deigned to have brothers. For to whom does He say: Say: Our Father, who art in heaven? Whom did He want us to call Our Father, if not His own Father? Did He begrudge us? Parents sometimes, when they have begotten one, two, three children, fear to beget more, lest they make others impoverished. But because the inheritance He promises us is such that however many obtain it, no one suffers deprivation; therefore, He called the peoples of the nations into His brotherhood, and the Only One has countless brothers who say: Our Father who art in heaven. Those who were before us have said these things: those who will come after us will say them. See how many brothers the Only One has in His grace, sharing the inheritance with them, for whom He endured death. We had a father and mother on earth, that we might be born to toil and death: we found other parents, God the Father and the mother Church, by whom we might be born to eternal life. Let us think, dearest ones, whose children we have begun to be: and let us live in such a way that befits those who have such a Father. Behold, our Creator deigned to be our Father.

What ought to be asked from the Father.

We have heard whom we should invoke, with what hope of eternal inheritance we have begun to have the Father in heaven: let us hear what we should ask from Him. From such a Father, what are we to ask? Is it not rain that we ask from Him today, yesterday, and the day before yesterday? What we have asked from such a Father is nothing great: and yet you see with what groaning, with what desire we ask for rain, when death is feared, and that is feared which no one can avoid. For every man sooner or later is destined to die: and we groan, we pray, we labor, we cry out to God, that we might die a little later. How much more ought we to cry out to Him, that we might come where we shall never die?

First petition.

Therefore: Hallowed be your name, it is said. This we also ask of Him, that His name may be hallowed in us: for it is always holy. How is His name hallowed in us, unless it makes us holy? For we were not holy, and through His name we are made holy: but He is always holy, and His name is always holy. We pray for ourselves, not for God. For it is not that we wish well for God, to whom nothing evil can ever happen. But we wish the good for ourselves, that His holy name may be hallowed: which is always holy, it may be hallowed in us.

Second petition.

Let your kingdom come. Whether we ask or not, it has to come. Indeed, God's kingdom is eternal. For when has He not reigned? When did He begin to reign? When His kingdom has no beginning, nor will it have an end. But know that we ask this for ourselves, not for God (for we do not say: Let your kingdom come, as if wishing that God should begin to reign); we will be His kingdom if, believing in Him, we progress in Him. All the faithful, redeemed by the blood of His Only Begotten, will be His kingdom. However, the kingdom itself will come when the resurrection of the dead has taken place: then He will come. And when the dead have risen, He will divide them, as He Himself says, and place some on the right, and others on the left. He will say to those on the right: Come, blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom. This is what we wish and ask for, when we say: Let your kingdom come, that it may come to us. For if we are reprobate, that kingdom will come to others, not to us. But if we are among the number who belong to the members of His only begotten Son, His kingdom will come to us: and it will not be delayed. For are there as many ages remaining as have passed? The Apostle John said: Little children, it is the last hour. But for that great day, an hour is long: and see how many years that last hour leads. Nevertheless, let it be thus for you as if one who watches, sleeps, rises, and reigns. Now we watch, in death we sleep, in the end we shall rise, and reign without end.

Third petition. The interpretation of this petition is manifold.

Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven. Thirdly, we ask: Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven. And we wish this well for ourselves. For it is necessary that the will of God be done. The will of God is that the good should reign, the evil be damned. Can this will not be done? But what do we wish well for ourselves when we say: Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven? Listen. For in many ways this petition can be understood, and there are many things to think about in this petition; when we ask God: Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven. Just as your Angels do not offend you, so may we not offend you as well. Again, how is it understood: Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven? All the holy Patriarchs, all the Prophets, all the Apostles, all the spiritual as if heavens to God: we, in comparison to them, are earth. Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven: just as in them, so also in us. Also: Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven. The Church of God is heaven, its enemies are earth. We wish well for our enemies, that they too may believe and become Christians: and the will of God be done, on earth as it is in heaven. Again: Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven. Our spirit is heaven, the flesh is earth, just as our spirit is renewed by believing, so the flesh is renewed by rising again: and the will of God be done, on earth as it is in heaven. Likewise, our mind with which we see the truth and delight in the very truth, is heaven. Behold the heaven: I delight in the law of God according to the inward man. What is the earth? I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind. When that battle subsides, and there is full harmony of flesh and spirit, the will of God will be done, on earth as it is in heaven. When we say this petition, let us think of all these things, and ask all these things from the Father. But all these things, dearest, which we have mentioned, these three petitions pertain to eternal life. For what is sanctified in us, the name of our God, shall be eternal. For His kingdom will come, where we shall always live, will be eternal. For His will be done, on earth as it is in heaven, in all the ways I have explained, will be eternal.

Eternal goods as well as temporal ones are to be sought. The daily bread is twofold: corporal and spiritual. The requests remaining for this life of our pilgrimage follow: Therefore it continues: Give us this day our daily bread. Give eternal, give temporal. You promised the kingdom, do not deny support. You will give everlasting adornment with you, give on earth temporal nourishment. Therefore daily, therefore today, that is, at this time. When this life shall have passed, shall we ask for daily bread? Then indeed it will not be called daily; but today. Now it is called daily, when the day passes, and another day comes. Will it be called daily, when there shall be an eternal one day? Indeed, this petition for daily bread is to be understood in two ways: either for the necessity of bodily sustenance, or even for the necessity of spiritual nourishment. The necessity of bodily food, for daily sustenance, without which we cannot live. Food is also clothing, but the whole is understood by the part. When we ask for bread, we receive everything there. The faithful also know the spiritual nourishment, which you too will know, receiving from the altar of God. The bread will also be daily, necessary for this life. For shall we receive the Eucharist, when we have come to Christ himself, and begin to reign with him forever? Therefore the Eucharist is our daily bread: but let us receive it in such a way, that we may be refreshed not only in the belly, but also in the mind. For the virtue itself which is understood there is unity, so that being brought into his body, made members of him, we may be what we receive. Then it will truly be our daily bread. And what I discuss with you, it is daily bread: and what you hear daily in the readings in Church, it is daily bread: and what you hear and say in hymns, it is daily bread. For these are necessary for our pilgrimage. When we shall have come there, shall we hear a book? We shall see the Word itself, we shall hear the Word itself, we shall eat the Word itself, we shall drink the Word itself, as the Angels do now. Do the Angels need books, or disputers, or readers? By no means. They read by seeing: for they see the very Truth, and they are satisfied with that source, from which we are sprinkled. Therefore it is said about daily bread; because this petition is necessary for us in this life.

All sins are forgiven by baptism.

Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors. Is it necessary except here? For there we will not have debts. For what are debts, but sins? Behold, you will be baptized, all your sins there will be wiped away: not one will remain there at all. If you have ever done, performed, said, desired, thought anything evil, it will all be wiped away. And yet if there was security in this later life, we would not learn such a prayer, where we would say: Forgive us our debts. But surely let us do what follows: As we also forgive our debtors. Therefore especially you who are about to receive the full indulgence of your debts, see that you do not hold anything in your hearts against another, so that you may proceed securely from there, as if free and absolved from all debts; and you may begin to want to take revenge on your enemies, who previously did you wrong. Forgive, just as you are forgiven. God has done no injury to anyone, and yet He forgives who owes nothing. How should he who is forgiven forgive, when He forgives everything who owes nothing that He should be forgiven?

Double temptation. Do not lead us into temptation, but deliver us from evil. Will this also be necessary in that life? It is not said, "Do not lead us into temptation," unless where there can be temptation. In the book of holy Job, we read: "Is not the life of man upon earth a temptation?" What then do we ask? What, listen. The Apostle James says: "Let no man say when he is tempted that he is tempted by God." He called that temptation evil by which anyone is deceived and subjected to the devil; that he called temptation. For there is another temptation which is called a trial: concerning that temptation it is written: "The Lord your God is testing you, to know whether you love him." What does it mean, 'to know'? To make you know: for He knows. In that temptation by which anyone is deceived and seduced, God tempts no one: but certainly, by His high and hidden judgment, He abandons some. When He has deserted, the tempter finds what to do. For he does not find a wrestler against him but immediately presents himself as a possessor if God abandons. Therefore, let Him not abandon us, hence we say: "Do not lead us into temptation." For each one is tempted, says the same Apostle James, by his own desire, being drawn away and enticed: then, desire when it has conceived gives birth to sin; and sin when it is fully grown brings forth death. What did He teach us? That we fight against our desires. For in holy Baptism you are going to be forgiven sins: desires will remain, with which, being reborn, you may fight. Conflict remains in you yourselves. No enemy should be feared from outside: conquer yourself, and the world is conquered. What will the foreign tempter do to you, whether the devil or the devil's minister? Whoever proposes gain to seduce, let him not find greed in you: what does the proposer of gain do? But if greed is found in you, seeing gain, you ignite, and you are caught in the snare of a harmful lure. But if he does not find greed in you, the trap remains futilely extended. The tempter proposes to you a very beautiful woman: let chastity be within, and iniquity outside is conquered. So to prevent you from being taken by the proposed beauty of another’s woman, fight within yourself against your own desire. You do not feel your enemy, but you feel your desire. You do not see the devil, but you see what delights you. Conquer within what you feel. Fight, fight; for he who has reborn you is the judge: he proposed the struggle, he prepares the crown. But because without doubt you will be conquered if you do not have him as a helper, if He deserts you; therefore, you propose in the Prayer: "Do not lead us into temptation." The wrath of the judge has delivered some to their desires: and the Apostle says that: "God gave them over to the desires of their hearts." How did He deliver? Not by compelling, but by deserting.

Deliverance from evil.

Deliver us from evil: it can pertain to the same sentiment. Therefore, it is so that you may understand one sentiment: Do not lead us into temptation; but deliver us from evil. Thus, he added "but" to show that this whole pertains to one sentiment: do not lead us into temptation; but deliver us from evil. How? I will propose each part: Do not lead us into temptation; but deliver us from evil. By delivering us from evil, he does not lead us into temptation: by not leading us into temptation, he delivers us from evil. A great temptation, a terrible temptation, to want vengeance.

Indeed, it is a great temptation, beloved, a great temptation in this life, when that which we possess, whereby we earn pardon if we falter when tempted, is put to the test. Dreadful is the temptation when that is taken from us, by which we can be healed from the wounds of other temptations. I know that you have not yet understood: be attentive in order to understand.

Suppose, avarice tempts, someone is overcome (because even a good wrestler and an experienced fighter is sometimes wounded) in a particular temptation: avarice has conquered the man, even a good wrestler, and led him to commit some wrong driven by greed. Passion might pass by, it might not lead to debauchery, nor reach the point of adultery. For when that happens, the man must also be prevented from committing adultery. But he has seen a woman with lust, he has thought something more pleasing than he ought; he has faced a struggle, even the best fighter has been struck; yet he has not consented, has repelled the lustful impulse, has chastised it with the bitterness of regret, has repelled and conquered it. Yet, because he has faltered in this, he has grounds to say: Forgive us our debts. Likewise for all other temptations, it is difficult not to have grounds to say: Forgive us our debts. What, then, is that dreadful, burdensome, and fearful temptation, that great necessity to be avoided with all strength and virtue? What is this? When we are moved to seek vengeance for ourselves. Anger is exacerbated; and man gnashes his teeth for revenge: dreadful temptation. For in seeking pardon for other offenses, you lose it here. If you have sinned through other senses, other desires, it could be healed by saying: Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors. He who urges you to seek revenge, will take from you what you were about to say: As we forgive our debtors. With that lost, all else is held bound: nothing at all is forgiven.

Daily debts.

Knowing this dangerous temptation in this life, our Lord, Master, and Savior, when teaching us this Prayer with six or seven petitions, took none aside to treat on and earnestly commend to us, except this one. Did we not say: Our Father, who art in heaven, and the rest following? Why, after ending the Prayer, did He not deal with something either from the beginning, or what He concluded with, or what He placed in the middle? For if God’s name is not sanctified in you, or if you do not pertain to God's kingdom, or if God’s will is not done in you as in heaven, or if God does not guard you that you do not enter into temptation: why none of these? But what? Amen, I say to you, that if you forgive the sins of others : because of this: Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. Passing by all the petitions He taught us, He especially taught that one. Those were not greatly to be commended, in which, if a sinner recognizes where he is to be cured: this must be commended, wherein if you sin, there is nothing else from which to be healed. For you ought to say this: Forgive us our debts. What debts? There is no lack: we are humans. I have spoken a little more than I ought, I have said something I ought not, I have laughed more than I ought, I have drunk more than I ought, I have eaten more than I ought, I have listened willingly to what I ought not, I have seen willingly what I ought not, I have thought willingly what I ought not: Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. You are lost if you lose this.

Hortatio.

See, my brothers; see, my sons; see, children of God; see, for I say to you. Fight with your heart, as much as you can. And if you see your anger standing against you, pray to God against it: may God make you victorious over yourself; may God make you victorious, not over an external enemy, but over the inner enemy of your soul. For He will come and He will do it. He wants us to ask this of Him more than rain. For you see, dearest ones, how many petitions the Lord Christ taught us, and scarcely there do we find one that sounds concerning daily bread: so that we think of all things for the sake of the future life. For why do we fear that He will not give to us who promised and said: Seek first the kingdom and the righteousness of God, and all these things will be added to you? For your Father knows that these things are necessary for you before you ask Him. Seek first the kingdom and the righteousness of God, and all these things will be added to you. For many have been tempted by hunger and found gold, and not deserted by God. They would perish with hunger if the inner daily bread of their heart deserted them. Let us hunger for it most of all. For blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness, for they shall be filled. But He can mercifully look at our weakness and see us, as it is said: Remember that we are dust. He who made man from dust and animated him, for this creation gave His only-begotten to death. How much He loves us, who can explain, who can even worthily think?

Sermons - Sermon 58

SERMO 58 In this manner, therefore, you shall pray: Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. On the Lord's Prayer, to the Competent. The Creed and the Lord's Prayer.

You have recited the Creed, in which the faith is briefly comprehended. I have also previously told you what the apostle Paul said: How will they call on him in whom they have not believed? Therefore, since you have received, held, and recited how to believe in God: receive today how God is to be invoked. The Son himself, as you have heard, when the Gospel was read, taught his disciples and his faithful this Prayer. We have hope of obtaining our cause, when such a legal expert has dictated our prayers to us. The Assessor of the Father, as you have confessed, who sits at the right hand of the Father: he is our advocate, who will be our judge. For from there he will come to judge the living and the dead. Therefore also hold this Prayer, which you will recite in eight days. But whoever among you has not well recited the Creed, have time, hold it: because on the Sabbath you will recite it in the hearing of all who are present, on the last Sabbath, on which day you will be baptized. And in eight days from today you will recite this Prayer, which you have received today. The one father of all. Whose beginning is: Our Father, who art in heaven. We find the Father in heaven: let us take heed to how we live on earth. For so must he live, who has found such a Father, that he may be worthy to come to his inheritance. However, we commonly say: Our Father. What condescension! The emperor says this, the beggar says this; the servant says this, his master says this. Together they say: Our Father, who art in heaven. Therefore, they understand that they are brothers, when they have one Father. But let not the master disdain to have a servant as his brother, whom the Lord Christ chose to have as his brother.

Hallowed be thy name, we say: Thy kingdom come. The sanctification of the name of God is that by which we are made holy. For His name is always holy. We also wish for His kingdom to come: it will come, even if we do not wish it; but to wish and pray for His kingdom to come is nothing other than to wish from Him that He may make us worthy of His kingdom, lest, heaven forbid, it comes, and it does not come to us. For it will not come to many, though it will indeed come. For it will come to those to whom it will be said: Come, you blessed of My Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. It will not come to those to whom it will be said. Depart from me, you cursed, into the eternal fire. Therefore when we say: Thy kingdom come, we pray that it may come to us. What does it mean for it to come to us? It means that it may find us good. Therefore we pray for this, that it may make us good: for then His kingdom will come to us.

Threefold interpretation of this petition.

We add: Thy will be done, as in heaven, so also on earth. The angels serve you in heaven, let us serve you on earth. The angels do not offend you in heaven, let us not offend you on earth. As they do your will, so let us also do. And here, what do we pray for, except to be good? For when we do the will of God (for undoubtedly He does His own), then His will is done in us. And we also understand well in another way: Thy will be done, as in heaven, so also on earth. We receive the command of God, and it pleases us, it pleases our mind. For we delight in the law of God according to the inner man. Then His will is done in heaven. For our spirit is compared to heaven, but our flesh to the earth. What then is: Thy will be done, as in heaven, so also on earth? That as your command pleases our mind, so let our flesh consent to it; and let that strife be taken away from the midst, which is described by the Apostle: For the flesh lusts against the spirit, but the spirit against the flesh. When the spirit lusts against the flesh, then His will is done in heaven: when the flesh does not lust against the spirit, then His will is done on earth. There will be full concord when He wills it: let there be strife in the world, so that there can be victory. It can also be well understood in this way: Thy will be done, as in heaven, so also on earth: that we regard the Church as heaven, because it bears God; but unbelievers as the earth, to whom it was said: You are earth, and to earth you shall go. Therefore, when we pray for our enemies, the enemies of the Church, the enemies of the Christian name, we pray this, that his will be done, as in heaven, so also on earth, that is, as in your faithful ones, so also in your blasphemers; so that all may become heaven.

What is daily bread.

It follows: Give us this day our daily bread. This can simply be understood as us praying for daily sustenance, so that it may abound for us; and if it does not abound, it may not be lacking for us. He said "daily" as long as it is called today. Daily we live, daily we rise, daily we are filled, daily we hunger. Give us our daily bread. Why did he not say "and covering"? For our sustenance is in food and drink, covering in clothing and shelter. Man should desire nothing more. Since the Apostle says: We brought nothing into this world, nor can we take anything out; having food and covering, with these we shall be content. Let avarice perish, and nature is rich. Therefore, if it pertains to daily sustenance, because it is also well understood, that we say: Give us this day our daily bread; let us not be surprised, if other necessary things are understood by the mentioned bread. Just as when Joseph invited his brothers: Those men, he said, will dine with me on bread today. Why were they to eat bread alone? But by bread alone other things were understood. Thus, when we ask for daily bread, we ask for whatever is necessary for our flesh in this world. But what did the Lord Jesus say? Seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things will be added to you. This is also very well understood: Give us this day our daily bread, Your Eucharist, the daily food. For the faithful know what they receive, and it is good for them to receive the daily bread necessary for this time. They pray for themselves, that they may become good, that they may persevere in goodness and faith and good life. This they wish, this they pray for: because if they do not persevere in a good life, they will be separated from that bread. Therefore: Give us this day our daily bread, what does it mean? Let us live in such a way that we are not separated from Your altar. And the Word of God that is daily opened to you, and in a certain way broken, is daily bread. And just as their stomachs hunger for that bread, so do minds hunger for this one. And so, we simply ask for it, and whatever is necessary for our soul and our flesh in this life is concluded in daily bread.

Forgiveness of debts.

Forgive us our debts, we say, and let us say it; because we speak the truth. For who lives here in the flesh, and does not have debts? Who is the man living in such a way that this Prayer is not necessary for him? He can inflate himself, he cannot justify himself. It is good for him to imitate the Publican and not swell with pride like the Pharisee, who went up to the temple and boasted of his merits, hid his wounds. But that one knew why he had gone up, who said: Lord, be merciful to me, a sinner. This the Lord Jesus: consider, my brothers: this the Lord Jesus taught his disciples to pray, those great first Apostles of his, our rams. If therefore the rams pray for the forgiveness of their sins, what ought the lambs to do, of whom it is said: Offer the sons of the rams to the Lord? Therefore you know that you have given back in the Creed because among other things you have named the remission of sins. There is one remission of sins, which is given once; another, which is given daily. There is one remission of sins, which is given once in holy Baptism; another, which is given as long as we live here, in the Lord’s Prayer. Therefore, we say: Forgive us our debts.

There we leave off, where God sees. And God made a covenant and agreement with us, a firm document, so that we might say: "As we also forgive our debtors." Whoever wants to say effectively, "Forgive us our debts"; let them say truthfully, "As we also forgive our debtors." If they do not say what follows, or say it falsely; they say the preceding sentence in vain. We especially tell you, forgive everything from your hearts, those of you who approach holy Baptism. And you, faithful ones, who hear this Prayer and our exposition because of this occasion, forgive entirely whatever you have against anyone from your hearts: forgive there, where God sees. For sometimes a person forgives with their mouth, and holds onto it in their heart: they forgive with their mouth for the sake of people, and hold onto it in their heart, not fearing the eyes of God. Absolutely forgive; whatever it is that you have held onto until these days, at least in these days forgive it. The sun should not set on your anger, and many suns have passed. Let your anger pass at some point, we now celebrate the day of the great sun: of that sun of which the Scripture says: "The sun of righteousness will rise for you, with healing in its wings." What does it mean, "in its wings?" In its protection. Hence, it is said in the Psalm: "Protect me under the shadow of your wings." But others, who in the day of future judgment will be late to repent and regretting fruitlessly, foretold by Wisdom, what will they then say while repenting and groaning from spiritual distress? "What did our pride benefit us? And what did the boasting of wealth bring us?" All these things passed like a shadow. And among other things: "Therefore, we have strayed from the way of truth, and the light of righteousness did not shine on us, and the sun did not rise upon us." That sun rises for the just: but God makes this visible sun rise every day over the good and the evil. The just belong to that sun to see it: now in our hearts this sun dwells through faith. Therefore, if you are angry; let this sun not set in your heart on your anger: Do not let the sun set on your anger; lest you be angry, and the sun of righteousness sets for you, and you remain in darkness.

Against anger and hatred. Do not think, however, that anger is nothing. The prophet says, "My eye has been troubled by anger." Certainly, he whose eye is troubled cannot see the sun: and if he attempts to see it, it is a punishment for him, not a pleasure. What is anger? A desire for vengeance. A man desires to be avenged; and Christ has not yet been avenged, the holy martyrs have not yet been avenged! God's patience still awaits that Christ's enemies, the enemies of the martyrs, might be converted: who are we, then, to seek vengeance? If God sought vengeance upon us, where would we remain? He who has done us no harm does not wish to avenge himself upon us: and we seek to be avenged, we who offend God almost daily! Therefore, forgive: forgive from the heart. If you are angry, do not sin: "Be angry, and do not sin." Be angry as men, if you are overcome; and do not sin by keeping anger in your heart (for if you keep it, you keep it against yourself), lest you fall into that light. Therefore, forgive. What is anger? A desire for vengeance. What is hatred? Anger that has grown old. If anger has become old, it is now called hatred. This seems to be admitted by the one who said, "My eye has been troubled by anger"; and added, "I have grown old among all my enemies." What was anger when it was new has become hatred; because it has turned into oldness. Anger is a speck; hatred is a beam. Sometimes we reprove someone who is angry, and we hold hatred in our hearts; and Christ says to us: "You see the speck in your brother's eye, and you do not see the beam in your own eye." Whence did the speck grow to make a beam? Because it was not immediately plucked out. Because you allowed the sun to go down and rise upon your anger so many times, you made it old; you drew in evil suspicions, and watering, you nourished it, and by nourishing, you made it a beam. Be frightened, even when it is said: "He who hates his brother is a murderer." You did not draw a sword, did not inflict a wound on the flesh, did not butcher a body with any blow: the mere thought of hatred in your heart makes you a murderer; you are guilty before the eyes of God. He lives, and you have killed him. As far as you are concerned, you have killed the one you hated. Amend yourself, correct yourself. If there were scorpions or asps in your houses, how hard would you labor to cleanse your houses so you could live securely? You are angry, and angers grow old in your hearts, becoming so many hatreds, so many beams, so many scorpions, so many serpents; and you do not wish to cleanse the house of God, your heart? Therefore, do what is said: "As we also forgive our debtors": and securely say, "Forgive us our debts." For you cannot live on this earth without debts. But there are those great crimes that it is good for you to be released from in Baptism, and from which you should always remain separate: there are also daily sins, without which man cannot live here, for which daily prayer is necessary, with its condition, with its plea: that just as it is said cheerfully, "Forgive us our debts," so it may be said truthfully, "As we also forgive our debtors." Then we have said these things about past sins, what next?

One must resist desires. Do not lead us into temptation: forgive what we have done, and grant that we do not commit other sins. For whoever is overcome by temptation commits sin himself. For indeed, the apostle James says: No one, when tempted, should say that he is tempted by God. For God is not a tempter of evils: but he himself tempts no one. But each one is tempted, drawn away and enticed by his own desire. Then when desire has conceived, it gives birth to sin: and when sin is fully formed, it brings forth death. Therefore, do not be led away by desire: do not consent to your desire. There is no source from which it can conceive except from you. If you have consented, it is as if you have lain with it in your heart. Desire has arisen: deny yourself to it, do not follow it. It is illicit, it is wanton, it is shameful, it alienates you from God. Do not give the embrace of consent, lest you grieve the outcome: because if you consent, that is, if you have embraced it, it conceives. When desire has conceived, it gives birth to sin. Are you not yet afraid? Sin brings forth death: at least fear death. If you do not fear sin, fear where sin leads. Sin is sweet: but death is bitter. This is the misfortune of men: because of what they sin, dying they leave it here, and they carry those very sins with them. You sin for money, it must be left here: you sin for a house, it must be left here: you sin for a woman, she must be left here: and whatever it is for which you sin, when you close your eyes in death, you leave it here, and you carry the very sin you commit with you.

Small sins should not be despised.

Forgive sins: forgive the past, cease the future. But you cannot live here without them: let them be lesser or smaller, or let them be light. But do not despise those light and small ones. Rivers are filled with tiny drops. Do not despise even the smaller ones. Through narrow cracks, water sweats into the ship; the bilge is filled, and if the bilge is neglected, the ship sinks. But sailors are not idle, their hands are at work: they work so that the bilge is drained daily. So let your hands work, so that you may drain the bilge daily. What does it mean for the hands to work? Give, do good works, let your hands work. Break your bread for the hungry and bring the homeless poor into your house; when you see the naked, clothe them. Do as much as you can, do it where you can, do it cheerfully, and confidently send up your prayer. It will have two wings, twin alms. What are twin alms? Forgive, and you will be forgiven; give, and it will be given to you. One alms is done from the heart when you forgive your brother’s sin. The other alms is done from your substance when you extend bread to the poor. Do both, so that your prayer does not remain without one wing.

Deliverance from evil.

Therefore, when we have said, "Lead us not into temptation," it follows, "but deliver us from evil." He who wishes to be delivered from evil testifies that he is in evil. This is why the Apostle says, "Redeeming the time, because the days are evil." But who is there who wishes for life and loves to see good days? When every man in this flesh has only evil days, who would not wish for it? Do what follows: "Keep your tongue from evil, and your lips from speaking deceit; turn away from evil and do good; seek peace and pursue it." And you will be free from evil days, and it will be fulfilled what you prayed for: "Deliver us from evil." The distinction of petitions of the Lord's Prayer which is said daily at the altar.

Therefore, the first three petitions—Hallowed be Thy name, Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven—are eternal. The following four, however, pertain to this life. Give us this day our daily bread: shall we ask for daily bread every day when we have reached that satiety? Forgive us our debts: shall we say this when we have no debts in that kingdom? Lead us not into temptation: shall we be able to say this when there is no temptation? Deliver us from evil: shall we say this when there is nothing from which we need to be delivered? Therefore, these four are necessary for our daily life, but those three are for eternity. Yet let us ask for all, so that we may reach the eternal; and let us here pray that we may not be separated from it. The prayer is to be said daily by you when you have been baptized. For in the church, at the altar of God, this Lord's prayer is said every day, and the faithful hear it. Therefore, we do not fear that you might hold it less diligently: because even if one of you should not be able to hold it perfectly, by hearing it daily, he will hold it. A symbol to be kept in memory.

Therefore, on the day of the Sabbath, when we are to watch in God's mercy, you will recite, not the Prayer, but the Creed. For if you do not hold fast to the Creed, you do not hear the Creed in the church, among the people daily. But when you hold fast to it, so that you do not forget it, recite it daily; when you rise, when you prepare yourselves for sleep, recite your Creed, recite it to the Lord, remember yourselves, do not be reluctant to repeat it. For repetition is good, lest forgetfulness creep in. Do not say: I said it yesterday, I said it today, I say it daily, I know it well. Recall your faith, examine yourself: let your Creed be as a mirror to you. See yourself there, if you believe all that you profess to believe, and rejoice daily in your faith. Let these be your wealth, let these be as your daily garments of your mind in some way. Do you not, when you rise, clothe yourself? Thus, by recalling your Creed, clothe your soul, lest forgetfulness strip it, and you remain naked, and what the Apostle says happens to you, may it not happen: If indeed we are found unclothed, not naked. For we will be clothed with our faith; and this faith is both a tunic and a breastplate: a tunic, against shame; a breastplate, against adversity. But when we come to that place where we will reign, it is not necessary to recite the Creed: we will see God, God Himself will be our vision; the vision of God will be the reward of this faith.

Sermons - Sermon 59

SERMO 59 IN THE SAME WAY IN MT 6:9-13 On the Lord's Prayer TO THE COMPETENT Symbol of the rule of faith.

You have rendered what you believe, you have heard what you should pray. For you could not call upon Him in whom you did not believe, as the Apostle says: How shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? Therefore, you first learned the Creed where the rule of your faith is concise and grand; concise in the number of words, weighty in the significance of the concepts. The prayer, however, which you received today to be kept and given back in eight days, as you heard when the Gospel was read, was handed down by the Lord Himself to His disciples and from them has come down to us, because their sound has gone out into all the earth. The one Father of all.

Therefore do not cling to earthly things, you who have found the Father in heaven. For you will say: Our Father who art in heaven. You have begun to belong to a great lineage. Under this Father, brothers are rich and poor; under this Father, brothers are lord and servant; under this Father, brothers are emperor and soldier. All faithful Christians have different fathers on earth, some noble, others ignoble; but they invoke one Father, who is in heaven. If our Father is there, an inheritance is being prepared for us there. Such indeed is this Father, with whom we may possess what he grants. For he gives an inheritance, but it is not by dying that he leaves it to us; he does not depart so that we might succeed him, but he remains so that we might join him. Since we have heard from whom we should ask, let us also know what we should ask, lest by asking for wrong things we offend such a Father. The first request.

What then did our Lord Jesus teach us to ask from the Father who is in heaven? Hallowed be your name. What benefit is it that we ask from God, that his name be hallowed, why cannot it be that his name is not holy? The name of God is always holy; why then do we pray that it be hallowed, except that we may be hallowed through him? Therefore, what is always holy, we pray that it be hallowed in us. The name of God will be hallowed in you when you are baptized. Why will you pray for this even when you have been baptized except that what you have received may remain in you?

Second petition. The next petition follows: Thy kingdom come. Whether we ask or do not ask, the kingdom of God will come; why then do we ask except that it may come to us as well as to all the saints, so that God may also count us among His saints to whom His kingdom will come? The third petition.

We say in the third petition: "Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." What does this mean? That just as the angels serve you in heaven, we too should serve you on earth. The holy angels obey him, they do not offend him; they carry out his commands by loving him. Therefore, we pray that we too may carry out God’s command with love. Again, these words are understood in another way: "Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." Heaven within us is the soul, earth within us is the body. So what does it mean: "Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven?" Just as we have heard your commandments, so let our flesh consent to them, lest while the flesh and the spirit contend, we may be less able to fulfill the commandments of God. However, dearest ones, when the flesh lusts against the spirit, as if earth against heaven, let the spirit lust against it so that earth does not overthrow heaven. And if we cannot remove this contention, let us deny assent. These words are also understood thus: "Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." Heaven signifies the faithful, who have put on the image of the heavenly man, which is, of Christ. The unfaithful, however, since they bear the image of the earthly man, are called earth. Therefore, when we say: "Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven," we say this to our good Father: "As the faithful believed in you, so let the unfaithful believe." And so we learn to pray for our enemies. The fourth petition.

Following in the prayer: Give us this day our daily bread. Whether we ask for what is necessary for the body from the Father, symbolizing in the bread whatever is necessary for us, or we understand that daily bread which you are to receive from the altar, we rightly ask that he give it to us today, that is, at this time. For it is necessary at this time when we are hungry; but when we are in the other life, hunger will cease, will we have a need to ask for bread? Or if it is that bread which I said we receive from the altar, we rightly pray that he gives it to us. For what are we praying for if not that we should not commit any evil whereby we might be separated from such bread? And the word of God which is preached daily is bread. For even if it is not the bread of the stomach, yet it is the bread of the mind. But when this life has passed, we will neither seek that bread which hunger seeks, nor will we have the sacrament of the altar to receive, because there we will be with Christ whose body we receive; nor will we need to speak these words to you that we say now, nor read the codex, when we shall see that which is the Word of God, by whom all things were made, by which the angels are fed, by which the angels are enlightened, by which the angels become wise, not seeking the words of circuitous speech but drinking the unique Word and from it filled, they belch praises and do not fail in praises. For blessed, as the psalm says, are those who dwell in your house; forever and ever they will praise you. The Fifth Petition.

Therefore, in this life we also ask for what follows: Forgive us our debts. In baptism, all your debts, that is, sins, will be forgiven entirely. But because no one can live here without sin, and even if it is not a great sin whereby one is separated from that bread, no one can be without sins on this earth, and we cannot receive baptism more than once; yet in prayer we receive that which washes us daily so that our sins are forgiven daily, but only if we do what follows: as we also forgive our debtors. Therefore, my brothers, I advise you: you shall be children of God, not of any great man. Would your count even deign to adopt any of you? Divine grace has made all into children. Therefore, because you will say this daily even after baptism and more so after baptism (for you will not pray this prayer except after baptism, in eight days you will not return it but will pray it; after baptism you will pray it. For how can one say "Our Father" who has not yet been born?) Thus, because you will say this prayer daily, I advise you, my children in God's grace and my brothers under that Father, that when someone offends you and sins against you and comes and confesses and asks for your forgiveness, you should immediately forgive from your heart, so that you do not block the forgiveness coming to you from God. For if you do not forgive, neither will He forgive you. And God says this to you: Justly you ask forgiveness from me, who cannot sin, and although no sin can be found in me, nevertheless I forgive, and you do not want to forgive. Behold,

I permit you, do not forgive. Act so that I do not find in you what I must avenge. You are allowed to avenge yourself on the man who offended you. But he asks for forgiveness. He was an enemy but by asking for forgiveness, he breaks the enmity. But you say, I do not want to, I want to avenge. Beware that you are not avenged upon. You want to avenge the sin, you who have sin. Beware that He does not avenge Himself on you in whom sin cannot be found. Therefore, we also ask for this in this life: because here sins can be forgiven, where sins can be committed. However, in that life, they are not forgiven because they are not possessed. The sixth petition. But then we ask, saying: lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. He is led into temptation who consents to the tempter. For in this life, it is useful to be tempted, but it is not expedient to be led into temptation. Therefore, when he who wishes to corrupt you with money so that you do something evil with the received money tempts you, you are tempted but proven. If you do not consent, you will be found pure. And I give you advice: despise avarice and do not let money corrupt you; against temptation, close the door and place the bolt, the love of God. And who can do this unless he assists who is asked by us? And men are tempted in various ways, they are tempted by rewards, they are tempted by threats, so that he who cannot seduce by corrupting may seduce by terrifying. But a man who is fixed in God and whom God hears saying: lead us not into temptation, conquers evil passions, conquers vain terrors. Therefore, it is also necessary for us in this life to ask not to be led into temptation (because here are temptations, so that we may be delivered from evil) because here is evil. And henceforth all these seven petitions are: three pertain to eternal life, four pertain to the present life. Hallowed be thy name: it will always be. Thy kingdom come: this kingdom will always be. Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven: it will always be. Our daily bread give us today: it will not always be. Forgive us our debts: it will not always be. Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil: it will not always be, but where there is temptation and where there is evil, there it is necessary to ask. Prayer strengthens you so that you may not only learn to ask from God, the Father who is in heaven, what you desire but also learn what you ought to desire. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 6

SERMO 6 On that which the Lord appeared to Moses IN THE BURNING BUSH God appeared to His saints in many ways. When the holy readings were read, we focused our attention on what was written in the first reading that was recited to us, and we take care to briefly share with your Holiness what the Lord suggests, lest receiving the divine mysteries carnally, you not only fail to profit but also decline. It appeared first to our sight from that divine reading that God appeared to Moses. However, God does not deign to appear by His substance as He is, except to pure hearts. For it is written in the Gospel: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." But God, when He wished to appear to the bodily eyes of the saints, did so not by Himself but by a visible and sensible creature, as much as this flesh can perceive, either by a sounding voice, that is, to the ears, or by fire to the eyes, or by an angel appearing in some visible form but bearing the person of God. Thus let us understand, brothers, that God appeared to Moses. For that majesty which made heaven and earth, which rules the entire world, to which angels always adhere contemplating its beauty with pure minds, could not appear to mortal human eyes, except by assuming a visible and sensible creature pertinent to these visible eyes of the body, since even the Wisdom of God, by whom all things were made, would not appear to human eyes unless it assumed mortal flesh. Did the Angel of God appear to Moses or God Himself?

Just as the Word of God, that is, the Son of God, took on flesh so that He might appear to human eyes, so God always, in order to appear to the eyes of men, deigned to appear in some visible creature. For you have it most clearly in the Acts of the Apostles that an angel appeared to Moses in the burning bush. Is this Scripture true, and the other false? Or is the other false and this one true? But what? If we are Christians, if we believe rightly, both are true. Therefore, if both are true, how did God appear here, and how is it said that an angel appeared there, except that the Spirit who acted and spoke in the Acts of the Apostles, saying that an angel appeared, explained this text on how God appeared? That explanation is an exposition of this obscurity. So that you do not understand that God appeared by Himself, it is explained there to you how God appeared through an angelic creature. But why do you wonder that it is said, when an angel appears: "God spoke," and "God called Moses," and he approached the place, and "The Lord said to Moses"? Because the angel is not considered as a temple, but the inhabitant of the angel. For the angel himself was the temple of God. For if He deigns to dwell and speak in a man, as when a prophet speaks and it is said: "God said," how much more through an angel? And when it is said: "God spoke through Isaiah," what was Isaiah? Was he not a man bearing flesh, born of a father and mother like all of us? And yet he speaks, and what do we say in his utterances? "Thus says the Lord." So how is it God, if it is Isaiah, except that God [speaks] through Isaiah? Thus, when the angel speaks here, it is said that God speaks. Why, except because it is God through an angel? The bush signified the people of the Jews.

Therefore, given the resolved question, also note this: the symbol of the matter seems to be that which appeared in the bush, and the bush was not consumed, was not burning, and appeared as if it were fire, and did not burn the bush. Do we think the bush signifies something good, when it consists of thorns? Thorns signify sinners. Therefore, the bush signified the people of the Jews full of thorns, full of sins. And although the great majesty of God appeared among the people, their sins were not consumed, just as this fire did not burn the thorns. For if the fire had consumed the thorns, it would signify that the word of the Lord spoken to the Jews would have consumed their sins, and that law would have ended their iniquities. Thus the fire is in the bush, just as the law is in the Jews; thus are the thorns of the bush, just as are the sins of the Jews; thus this fire did not burn the thorns, just as the law did not consume the sins there. The Name of God. But God speaks to Moses (you already know those things, and we should not keep you longer, because of the scarcity of time): I am who I am; He who is has sent me. For when he asked the name of God, this was said: I am who I am. And you shall say to the children of Israel, He who is sent me to you. What is this? O God, O Lord of ours, what are you called? "I am called" He said. What is, "I am called"? Because I remain forever, because I cannot be changed. For those things which are changed are not, because they do not remain. For what is, remains. But that which is changed, was something and will be something; yet it is not, because it is changeable. Therefore, the immutability of God has deigned to intimate itself with this expression: I am who I am.

Another name of God.

What is it, then, that he later said another name for himself again, when it was said: And the Lord said to Moses, I am the God of Abraham and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob: this is my name forever? How is it that I am called that because I am, and behold here another name: I am the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. Because as God is unchangeable, he did everything through mercy and deigned himself, the Son of God, to take on mutable flesh, remaining what the Word of God is, to come and to help man. Therefore, he clothed himself in mortal flesh he who is, so that it could be said: I am the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob.

What signs were given by God to Moses?

Then observe the signs that God gave to Moses. When he said, "If the people say to me, 'God did not send you,' by what signs shall I show that you have sent me?" It was said, "Cast the rod that you have in your hand." He cast the rod, and it became a serpent, and Moses was afraid. Again the Lord said, "Take it by the tail." And it became a rod as it was. He gave another sign: "Put your hand into your bosom." And he put his hand in. "Take it out." He took it out, and it became white like snow, that is, leprous. For the white color on human skin is defective. "Put it back into your bosom." He put it in, and it regained its color. He gave him a third sign: "Take water from the river, and pour it on dry ground." He took it, poured it, and it turned into blood. With these signs, the people will listen to you. If they do not listen to the first sign, they will listen to the second or third.

What is the sign of the serpent?

We shall strive to explain, as much as the Lord aids us, what these signify. The rod signifies the kingdom, the serpent mortality. For death was presented to man by the serpent. The Lord deigned to assume that very death. Therefore, the rod coming to earth had the appearance of a serpent, because the kingdom of God, which is Christ Jesus, came to earth. He was clothed in mortality, which He also fixed on the cross. However, your Holiness knows that when that people in the wilderness, stiff-necked and proud, murmured against God, they began to be bitten by serpents and to fall from these bites. In His mercy, God gave a remedy which provided present healing to some, but proclaimed future wisdom. He said to Moses: Hang a bronze serpent in the midst of the wilderness on a wooden pole, and tell the people: Whoever has been struck should look at this serpent. And those struck men looked at the serpent and were healed. And the Lord bears witness to this sign in the Gospel. For when He was speaking to Nicodemus, He said: Just as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so must the Son of Man be lifted up, so that everyone who believes in Him may not perish but have eternal life. This means whomever has been struck by the serpents of sins should look at Christ and will have healing in the remission of sins. Therefore, brothers, this is the mortality that was assumed by the Lord, which the Church, His body, must possess, of which man is the head in heaven. Thus, the Church has mortality, which was inflicted by the serpent's persuasion. For we owe our death to the sin of the first man, but afterward, we shall attain eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord. But when does it come to life and return to the kingdom? At the end of the age. For this reason, he held the tail, where the end is, to call it back to its former state.

All things are signs of the future people.

What about that hand? It is certain that that hand also signifies the people themselves, the bosom of men. What is the bosom of Moses? The secret of God. When a man was in the secret of God, he was safe and of good color. He went out from the secret of God, Adam advanced from paradise, offended God, and became corrupt. Therefore, that hand became white; but it returned to the bosom, through the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and received its color back. But what about that water? That water signifies wisdom. Often indeed water is placed in the similitude of wisdom, and it is said: It will become in him a spring of water welling up to eternal life. But that water is wisdom, which on earth has been transformed into blood; does it not show us the Word made flesh and dwelling among us? Indeed, it shows us. Therefore, all these are signs of the future people, and mysteries concerning our Lord Jesus Christ. And if there are any other sacraments in the old Books, whether we understand them or not, they desire the seeker, not the critic. Therefore, let us ask, seek, and knock so that it may be opened to us. To them, the future sacraments were foretold; we see the present ones in the Church. sermo 7

Sermons - Sermon 60

SERMO 60 TREATISE ON PSALM XXXVIII WHERE HE SAYS:

"Although man walks in an image, yet in vain"

"He is troubled, he stores up wealth, and does not know for whom he gathers it." AND FROM THE GOSPEL OF MATTHEW ABOUT STORING TREASURE IN HEAVEN In tribulation, counsel should be taken from Christ.

Every man placed in some tribulation, and failing in his own cause, seeks a wise person from whom he may receive counsel and know what to do. Let us therefore consider the entire world as if it were one man. He seeks to avoid evils, but is reluctant to do good: and thus, with his tribulations increasing, and failing in his own cause, whom can he find more prudent from whom to receive counsel, than Christ? Let him find someone better, and do what he wishes. But if he does not have someone better to find, let him come to this one whom he finds anywhere, consult him, receive true counsel, keep the good commandment, and escape great evil. For the present temporal evils, which men greatly dread and grieve over, under which they murmur greatly and by murmuring offend the reformer, lest they find the Savior: the present evils therefore are without doubt going to pass away. Either they pass by us, or we pass by them; either they pass while we live, or they are left behind when we die. It is not a great thing in tribulation which is brief in time. Whoever thinks about tomorrow does not call back yesterday. When the day after tomorrow comes, yesterday will be and tomorrow. Nevertheless, if men are so heated by cares to avoid temporal and passing, or rather flying tribulations, what is to be devised that man may avoid the remaining and endless ones?

Life is laborious here. The life of mortals is a hard cause. What else is it to be born here, except to enter into a laborious life? Of the greater future labor, the very crying of the infant is a witness. From this troublesome banquet no one excuses himself. We must drink what Adam has offered. We were made by the hands of truth, but because of sin, we were cast into days of vanity. We were made in the image of God, but we wore it down through the transgression of sin. Therefore, the psalm admonishes us about how we were made, and to where we have arrived. For it says: Although man walks in an image; behold what he has become. To where has he arrived? Hear what follows: Nevertheless, he is troubled in vain. He walks in the image of truth and is troubled by the counsel of vanity. Finally, see his trouble; see and dislike yourself as if in a mirror. Although, it says, man walks in an image; and therefore man is a great thing, nevertheless he is troubled in vain. And as if we were asking: From where, I ask you, from where is he troubled in vain? He stores up and does not know for whom he is gathering these things. Behold, there is that man, the entire human race, as if one man who has failed in his cause, lost his counsel, erred from the path of a sound mind. He stores up and does not know for whom he is gathering these things. What is more foolish? What is more unfortunate? Surely for himself? No. Why not for himself? Because he is going to die, because man's life is short, because the treasure lasts, and quickly passes he who gathers it. Therefore, pitying the man walking in an image, confessing the truth, pursuing vanities:

In vain, it says, he is troubled. I grieve him: He stores up and does not know for whom he is gathering. Therefore for himself? No, because man dies, the treasure remaining. For whom, then? Do you have counsel? Give it to me. You do not have counsel that you can give to me? Then you too do not possess it. Therefore, if we both do not have it, let us both seek, let us both receive.

He who hoards is troubled in various ways.

Therefore, let us discuss. You are troubled, you hoard, you think, you labor, you stay awake. By day you are vexed with labors, by night you are agitated with fears. So that your purse may be filled with coins, your soul burns with cares. I see, I grieve: you are troubled, and as He who is incapable of deceit says, you are troubled in vain. You hoard wealth. Even supposing that everything you do turns out well, let us not speak of losses, of so many dangers, where each gain brings a particular death (I speak not of bodily deaths, but of evil thoughts; as gold increases, faith perishes; as you are clothed outwardly, you are stripped inwardly), therefore let us omit these things, let us be silent about other matters, let us pass over adversities, let us only consider prosperity, behold you are hoarding, behold wealth flows from all sides, and like streams, coins rush; everywhere poverty burns, from every side abundance flows. Have you not heard: If riches increase, do not set your heart on them? Behold you acquire, you are not troubled without profit, yet you are troubled in vain. Why, you ask, am I troubled in vain? Behold, I fill sacks, my walls can scarcely hold what I acquire: why am I troubled in vain? Because you hoard and do not know for whom you gather. Or if you know for whom, I beg you, tell me too. I will hear you. For whom? If you are not troubled in vain, tell for whom you hoard. For myself, you say. Do you dare to say this as one who will die? For my children, you say. Do you dare to say this about those who will die? Great piety: a father hoards for his children; but rather great vanity: one who will die hoards for those who will die. If not for yourself, because you will leave behind whatever you gather, then this is also true of your children; they will succeed, not endure. I refrain from saying for which children, lest what greed gathered, luxury may waste. One person loses through excess what you gathered through labor. But I omit this. Perhaps your children will be good, they will not be luxurious; they will keep what you left behind, increase what you kept, they will not waste what you gathered. Your children are equally vain if they do this, if they imitate you in this. I say to them what I said to you, I say to your child for whom you keep these things, I say to him: You hoard and do not know for whom you gather these. Just as you did not know, so he does not know. If vanity remained in him, did truth ever fail in itself concerning him? A thief by chance amasses wealth.

I omit to say that, perhaps when you are alive, you store up for a thief. One night he comes and finds collected all that was gathered over days and nights. You may be storing up for a robber, perhaps for a plunderer. I do not wish to say more, lest I recall and refresh the pains of sufferers. How many things that empty vanity collected were found ready by hostile cruelty! It is not for me to wish but for all to fear. May God avert this. May His scourges be sufficient. Let us all pray, may God avert this. May He spare us, whom we beseech. But if He asks, why, what do we answer? Therefore you, O man, O every man, you who vainly store up, how do you answer me, examining with you and seeking counsel with you on the common cause? For you used to say and answer: I store up for my son, for my children, for my descendants. I mentioned how much there is to be feared even for those children. But suppose the children live differently than the enemy thinks: let them live as the father wishes. Many in these causes have failed, I said, I mentioned: you shuddered, and you did not correct yourself. For what will you answer me, unless you say this:

Perhaps not? And I have spoken thus: Perhaps, I say, for a thief, perhaps for a robber, perhaps for a plunderer. I did not say: " certainly ", but: " perhaps ". Between " perhaps it will happen ", " perhaps it will not happen ": therefore you do not know what will happen, you are vainly disturbed. You see how true the Truth speaks, how vainly vanity is disturbed. You have heard, at last you have become wise, because even when you say: Perhaps for my children; you do not dare to say: I am certain because for my children. Therefore you do not know for whom you are gathering these things. Therefore, as I see it, you have failed in your cause, as I said before; you do not find what to answer me: but neither do I (know) what to answer you.

Counsel must be sought from Christ.

Let us both seek, let us both seek counsel. We have, not the wisdom, but the Wisdom itself. Let us both listen to Christ, a scandal to the Jews and foolishness to the Gentiles; but to those who are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the Power of God and the Wisdom of God. Why do you prepare fortifications with your wealth? Listen to the Power of God: nothing is stronger. Why do you prepare arguments with your wealth? Listen to the Wisdom of God: nothing is more prudent. Perhaps when I speak, you are scandalized, you will be a Jew, because Christ is a scandal to the Jews. Perhaps when I speak, it will seem foolish to you, you will be a Gentile, because Christ is foolishness to the Gentiles. You are a Christian, you are called; but to those who are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ is the Power of God and the Wisdom of God. Do not be grieved when I speak; do not be scandalized, do not insult me mockingly as if from my mouth comes folly. Let us listen. For what I am about to say, Christ has said. Do you despise the herald? Fear the judge. What then shall I say? The reader of the Gospel has already somewhat freed me from this burden. I do not read, but I recollect what was read. You sought counsel in your failing cause: look at what the source of right counsel says, the source from which whatever you fill, you do not fear poison: Do not store up for yourselves treasures on earth, where moth and rust destroy, and where thieves break in and steal; but store up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth destroys nor rust corrodes. Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also. What more do you expect? The matter is clear. The counsel is plain, but greed remains hidden; rather, it is not hidden, but what is worse, it is revealed. For robbery does not cease, greed does not cease to defraud, malice does not cease to perjure. All for what purpose? To store up treasure. And where to place it? On earth. Rightly indeed from earth to earth. For to the man, to whom I said labor was imparted to us, it was said to the sinner: You are dust, and to dust you shall return. Rightly is the treasure on earth, because the heart is on earth. Where then is what we have with the Lord? Grieve those who understood, correct yourselves if you have grieved. How long to praise and not to act? It is true, nothing is truer. Let what is true be done. We praise God alone, and are not changed, so that in this too we are vainly troubled. The wealth is to be transferred to heaven.

Therefore: Do not store up for yourselves treasures on earth, whether because you have experienced how what is stored on earth perishes, or have not experienced it but fear to experience it from others. Let those who are not corrected by words be corrected by experiences. We do not rise, we do not proceed, unless so that it may be said with one voice by all: Woe to us, the world is collapsing. If it is collapsing, why do you not depart? If an architect were to tell you that your house was going to collapse, would you not move out before you grumbled? The builder of the world tells you the world is going to collapse. There is no one to contradict. Hear the voice of the preacher, hear the counsel of the admonisher. The voice of the preacher is: Heaven and earth will pass away. The voice of the admonisher is: Do not store up for yourselves treasures on earth. Therefore, if you believe the preacher, if you do not despise the admonisher, let it be done as he says. For he who gave such counsel did not want to take away what you have, but rather warned you so that you may not lose it. Why is it not heard so that there is a migration to heaven? For the migration will not be to that heaven of which it is said: Heaven and earth will pass away. Otherwise, who would hear the counsel of one advising from ruin to ruin? There are heavens of heavens, just as the holy of holies, just as the ages of ages. Store up for yourselves treasures in heaven. The heavens declare the glory of God. Perhaps when you give to the righteous, you give to heaven. But if you give to the unrighteous — because if your enemy is hungry, you give him food — you do not err even then: for indeed you obey Him who made heaven and earth. Therefore, eagerly migrate. Do you have many possessions which you have accumulated? All the more, migrate. I do not want sanctity to lose what vanity has gathered. Migrate. You have that by which the poor of Christ may be enriched. The calamity of the world has made many porters for you. We have spoken and you have heard, rather, He has spoken and we have listened together. May He provide the help to do what He has counseled to correct. Turned towards the Lord. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 60A

SERMON 60/A Here begins the sermon on the gospel where the Lord says:

"Do not give what is holy to the dogs, neither cast your pearls before swine"

"That which is holy to the dogs and your pearls before the swine " and other matters which follow He who seeks and knocks is no longer a dog and a pig. Your Charity knows, since you are children of the Church of Christ, rooted and founded in the Catholic faith, that the mysteries of God are not hidden to begrudge those learning, but so that they are not revealed except to those who seek. For this reason, they are recited as if enclosed from the Holy Scriptures, to elevate the spirit to seek. Just now, the evangelical reading was recited to us, where the Lord commands not to throw pearls before swine. When the Lord advised His servants and disciples saying: "Do not give what is holy to the dogs, nor throw your pearls before swine," indeed he warned them of this; but because they could not easily recognize who were the dogs and swine to be avoided, so that the pearls would not be thrown before them, nor what is holy be given to such, and much less to exclude the deserving, he immediately added and said: "Ask, and you shall receive; seek, and you shall find; knock, and it shall be opened to you; for everyone who asks receives, and the one who seeks finds, and to the one who knocks it will be opened." Therefore, "Do not give what is holy to the dogs, nor throw your pearls before swine," he commands to the stewards, his disciples, whom he was making preachers of the Gospel. What he added: "Ask and you shall receive, seek and you shall find, knock and it shall be opened to you," he commanded the people; so that when one asks, seeks, and knocks, then it may be understood that he is no longer a dog or swine, to whom pearls should not be thrown. The example of the Canaanite woman is demonstrated. This is clearly evident in another place of the gospel when the Lord went into the region of Tyre and Sidon. A Canaanite woman from those territories began to plead for the healing of her daughter. The Lord did not listen to her: He seemed to ignore her so that her faith might become evident. See how he delays: He pretends not to give what he intends to give, in order to draw forth from her heart the voice by which she would be worthy to receive it. For when even the disciples said to the Lord, "Send her away, for she cries after us," the Lord replied, "It is not right to take the children's bread and throw it to the dogs." Look, it is similar to that command, "Do not give what is holy to dogs, nor cast your pearls before swine." "I was sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." For she was from the gentiles. The time was coming when the Gospel would also be preached to the gentiles: the Apostle Paul was especially sent to the gentiles, he himself was mainly sent; but after the passion and resurrection of the Lord, the Gospel had to be preached among the gentiles. However, the Lord came in bodily presence to those sheep of the house of Israel who were lost, because many of them also believed. For from that number were the Apostles; from that number were those one hundred and twenty upon whom the Holy Spirit descended on the day of Pentecost, whom the Lord promised in the Gospel when He said, "I will send you the Spirit of truth"; and whatever He promised about that Spirit, He fulfilled after His passion and ascension on the day of Pentecost. There were about one hundred and twenty there, upon whom the Holy Spirit came, and they were filled, to be sure, from the number of the Jews. I thus point out to your

Holiness how the sheep of the house of Israel who were lost are chosen. The apostle Paul also says that the risen Lord was seen by more than five hundred brothers at one time: they were from that number. When the Lord was preached after His ascension, many thousands of Jews also believed. Likewise, to those who crucified the Lord was given the blood of the Lord; in raging they poured out their price: for by that very blood they were redeemed, which they shed. And because the voice of the one hanging on the cross was not in vain, when He said, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do," they first shed the blood that was their price, and afterward drank. Therefore, He said He was sent to these sheep. But still, He foretold that the gentiles would believe. For nothing was happening as if it were new, which had not been foretold before. For the prophets also announced the faith of the gentiles; and He Himself, while He was still here before His passion, said, "I have other sheep that are not of this fold: I must bring them also, and there will be one flock and one shepherd." Therefore, He was also called the cornerstone: for in the corner, two walls are joined together, nor do they form a corner unless they come from different directions. For if both come from one direction, they do not form a corner. Therefore, the people coming from the Jews, that is, from the circumcised; coming from different directions, that is, from idols and the uncircumcised, the gentiles indeed came from different backgrounds, but were united on one stone. "The stone that the builders rejected has become the cornerstone." Therefore, the gentiles had not yet come, and yet already that Canaanite woman from the gentiles prefigured the Church of the gentiles. The Canaanite woman considers herself a dog and the Jews her masters.

He therefore asked, and it was said: It is not right to take the children's bread and throw it to the dogs. When she asked strongly, she was called a dog. If she, upon hearing the word that seemed like an insult, which had come from the mouth of truth, had gotten angry and departed with indignation, saying in her heart: I came to seek a favor; if it is given, let it be given; if it is not given, why am I a dog? What wrong have I done, because I asked, because I came to receive a favor? She knew from whom she sought the favor; she accepted what had proceeded from His mouth, did not reject it, and insisted more strongly in asking, confessing herself to be what she had heard. For she said: Yes, Lord; that is, you have spoken the truth, because I am a dog. And since he had said the children's bread, it is not enough that she confessed herself to be a dog; she also confessed her masters, whom He had called children. For it is not right, he said, to take the children's bread and throw it to the dogs. And she replied: Yes, Lord; for even the dogs eat the crumbs that fall from their master's table. What do you see, brothers? She asked eagerly, sought eagerly, knocked intensely. Now therefore, because she asked, sought, and knocked, she is no longer a dog. Therefore, now the Lord does not give the holy thing to the dog. For He showed that she was not a dog, because she sought eagerly, knocked intensely: to confirm what He had said. For when he commanded His stewards: Do not give what is holy to the dogs, nor throw your pearls before swine, he condemned those who wanted to receive so that they would not be dogs, if they were dogs before: Ask, he said, seek, knock. This he thus showed in the Canaanite woman, whom he first called a dog; who, upon hearing the insult, did not get angry, but upon receiving the insult, confessed her humility, and now the Lord Himself removed the insult from her. He himself had called her a dog; he Himself had commanded: Do not give what is holy to the dogs. Why did He remove the insult, which He had said Himself, except that she, upon receiving the insult, was changed by humility, and moreover, because she confessed what she had heard, ceased to be what she had heard?

Just as the publican ceased to be a sinner by declaring himself a sinner.

What is it that I said, because she confessed what she heard, she ceased to be what she heard? Just like the publican who was in the temple; however, the Pharisee, who boasted of his merits, and insulted as if to a sinner standing afar. That one, with eyes cast down to the ground, did not dare to lift his face to heaven, because he did not dare to lift his conscience to God; but he struck his breast saying: Be merciful to me, a sinner. And what did the Lord say? Amen I say to you, this publican went down justified more than that Pharisee: because everyone who exalts himself will be humbled, and who humbles himself will be exalted. By saying he is a sinner he is justified, by saying he is a sinner he ceased to be already a sinner. Why? Because the publican descended justified more than the Pharisee. How then did this one, admitting himself a sinner, cease to be what he was, so that woman, admitting herself a dog, ceased to be what she was. What does she hear from the Lord? No longer, dog; but what? O woman, great is your faith: let it be done for you as you wish. He cast forth bread: rather he gave, he did not cast away; because now he was giving not to a dog, but to a human. For he gave to the faith of the one asking, the faith of the one seeking, the faith of the one knocking; and therefore he praised the faith, because she did not reject humility. Let your Holiness heed the words of the Lord saying: Do not give what is holy to dogs, nor cast your pearls before swine. And what dogs does he mean to understand? Dogs are calumnious barkers; however, swine are those stained with the mire of carnal pleasures. Therefore let us not be dogs and swine, that we may merit to be called sons by the Lord; just as that Canaanite woman merited to be called a woman from a dog by the Lord saying: O woman, great is your faith: let it be done for you as you wish.

[Explicit speech where he says to his disciples: "Do not give holy things to dogs," and so forth].

Sermons - Sermon 61

SERMO 61 OF THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL MT 7, 7-11:

"Ask, and it will be given to you," and so forth.

"An Exhortation to Give Alms." Our Father is God. In the reading of the Holy Gospel, the Lord exhorted us to pray. "Ask," He says, "and it shall be given to you; seek, and you shall find; knock, and it shall be opened to you. For everyone who asks receives, and everyone who seeks finds, and to everyone who knocks it shall be opened. Or which one of you, if his son asks for bread, will give him a stone? Or if he asks for a fish, will give him a serpent? Or if he asks for an egg, will give him a scorpion? If you then, being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more will your Father who is in heaven give good things to those who ask Him?" When you, He says, are evil, you know how to give good gifts to your children. A marvelous thing, brethren: we are evil, and we have a good Father. What could be clearer? We have heard our own name: When you, He says, are evil, you know how to give good gifts to your children. And to those He called evil, see what kind of Father He points out: "How much more your Father?" Whose Father? Certainly of the evil ones. And what kind of Father? No one is good, except God alone. A man does not become good from evil except by God.

Therefore, brothers, we have a good Father even when we are evil, so that we do not always remain evil. No evil person does good. If no evil person does good, how does an evil person make himself good? He who is always good makes good out of evil. Heal me, Lord, and I shall be healed; save me, and I shall be saved. What do vain people say to me in vain: "You can save yourself if you wish"? Heal me, Lord, and I shall be healed. We were created good by the good: for God made man upright; but by our own will we have become evil. We could have become evil from being good, and we could become good from being evil. But He who is always good makes good out of evil: for a man could not heal himself by his own will. You do not seek a doctor in order to wound yourself: but when you have wounded yourself, you seek one who will heal you. Therefore we know how to give our children good things according to time, temporal, bodily, and carnal good things, even though we are evil. For these are good things too, who would doubt it? Fish, egg, bread, fruit, wheat, this light, this air that we breathe, these are good things: even the riches in which men are exalted, and they do not recognize other men as their equals: in which, I say, men are exalted, loving more a shining garment than thinking about the common skin; therefore these very riches are good: but all these good things which I have mentioned can be possessed by both good and evil people; and though they are good, they cannot make people good. The good is twofold.

Therefore, it is good that one should do good: and there is good from which to do good. The good that does good is God. For no one makes a person good except Him who is always good. Therefore, to be good, call upon God. But there is another good from which to do good: that is, whatever you possess. It is gold, it is silver; it is good, not such that it makes you good, but from which you do good. You have gold, you have silver; and you covet gold and you covet silver. And you have, and you covet; and you are full, and you thirst. It is a sickness, not prosperity. There are people in sickness, filled with fluid, and they are always thirsty. They are filled with fluid, and they thirst for fluid. How then do you delight in wealth when you have the hydropic desire? Therefore, you have gold, it is good: you have, not that it makes you good, but from which you do good. What good, you ask, will I do with gold? Have you not heard the Psalm? "He has distributed, he has given to the poor; his righteousness endures forever." This is good, this is the good from which you are good, righteousness. If you have the good from which to be good; do good from the good from which you are not good. You have money, spend it. By spending money, you increase righteousness. For he has distributed, given to the poor; his righteousness endures forever. See what is diminished and what is increased. Money is diminished, righteousness is increased. That is diminished which you were going to let go of, that is diminished which you were going to leave behind: that is increased which you will possess forever.

Money must be distributed so that justice may be maintained.

I offer advice for profits, learn to trade. For you praise the merchant who sells lead and acquires gold; and do you not praise the merchant who spends money and acquires justice? But you say, I do not spend money because I do not have justice. Let him spend money who has justice: if I do not have justice, let me at least have money. Therefore, because you do not have justice, do you not wish to spend money? Rather, spend money, so that you may have justice. For from whom will you have justice, if not from God, the source of justice? Therefore, if you wish to have justice, be a beggar of God, who just a little while ago from the Gospel was advising you to ask, seek, knock. He knew his beggar, and behold the head of the household and the great rich man, that is indeed rich in spiritual and eternal riches, encourages, and says to you: "Ask, seek, knock. Whoever asks receives: the one seeking finds: to the one knocking it will be opened." He encourages you to ask: will he deny what you ask? The likeness of an unjust judge.

Attend to the contrary comparison or analogy, as with that unjust rich man, urging us to pray, when the Lord said: There was a certain judge in a city, who neither feared God nor respected man. A certain widow appealed to him daily and said, Avenge me. He refused for a time: she did not cease to appeal; and he did out of frustration what he would not do out of kindness. Thus indeed He admonished us by contrary example to ask. The parable of the troublesome friends.

He came, he says, to his friend to whom a guest had come; and he began to knock and say: A guest has come to me, lend me three loaves. He replied: I am already resting, and my servants are resting with me. He does not stop, he stands, he insists, he knocks; and as a friend begs from a friend. And what does he say: I tell you, he gets up, and not because of their friendship, but because of his persistence, gives him as many as he wishes. Not because of friendship, although he is a friend, but because of persistence. What is it, because of persistence? Because he did not stop knocking: because even when he was denied, he did not turn away. The one who did not want to give, did what was asked because the one asking did not give up. How much more will the good one give, who encourages us to ask; who is displeased if we do not ask? But when sometimes he gives slower, he commends the gifts, he does not deny them. Long desired things are obtained more sweetly: things given quickly become cheap. Ask, seek, insist. By asking and seeking you grow, so that you may receive. God keeps for you what he does not wish to give quickly; so that you may also learn to desire great things greatly. Hence it is necessary always to pray, and not to give up.

Who, from whom, what we should ask. So therefore, my brothers, God made us his beggars, admonishing us, and urging and ordering us to ask, seek, knock; let us also consider those who ask from us. We are asking. From whom are we asking? who are we who ask? what are we asking? From whom, or who, or what are we asking? We ask from a good God: we ask as evil men: but we ask for righteousness, so that we may be good. Therefore we ask for that which we may possess for eternity: so that when we have been satisfied with it, we may not need further. But in order to be satisfied, let us hunger and thirst; by hungering and thirsting let us ask, seek, knock. For blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness. Why blessed? They hunger and thirst, and are blessed? Is hunger sometimes blessed? They are not blessed because they hunger and thirst; but because they shall be satisfied. There will be blessedness in satisfaction, not in hunger. But let hunger come before satisfaction, lest satiety does not lead to fullness.

Who, from whom, or what these our beggars ask.

Therefore, we have said from whom we should ask, who should ask, what we should ask. But we are also asked. For we are beggars of God: so that He may recognize His beggars, let us also recognize ours. But let us also consider, when we are asked, who asks, from whom they ask, what they ask. Who asks? Humans. From whom do they ask? From humans. Who asks? Mortals. From whom do they ask? From mortals. Who asks? Frail ones. From whom do they ask? From frail ones. Who asks? Wretched ones. From whom do they ask? From the wretched. Except for the substance of their wealth, those who ask are the same as those from whom they ask. What face do you have in asking from your Lord when you do not acknowledge your equal? "I am not like that," he says; "may it be far from me to be such." The puffed-up wealthy speaks thus of the ragged. But I ask the naked. I do not ask what clothes you are wearing, but how you were born. Both naked, both weak, starting a miserable life, both therefore crying. The rich and the poor are equal in birth and death.

Behold, recall, rich man, your beginnings: see whether you brought anything here. You have already come, and you have found so much. Tell me, I ask you, what did you bring? Tell what you brought. Or if you are ashamed to say, listen to the Apostle: We brought nothing into this world. Nothing, he says, we brought into this world. But perhaps because you brought nothing and found many things here, will you take something from here with you? And this too you may hesitate to admit because of your love of riches: listen to this as well. And the Apostle says this too, he who does not flatter you. We brought nothing into this world, certainly when we were born; but we can take nothing out, certainly when we will leave this world. You brought nothing, you will take nothing from here: why do you boast against the poor? When infants are born, let the parents, servants, and clients step aside; let the crowds of attendants step aside, and let the crying rich children be recognized. Both the rich and the poor are born together, the rich woman and the poor woman give birth together: let them not observe what they give birth to, let them step away briefly, return, and recognize. Behold, rich man, you brought nothing into this world: but neither can you take anything from here. What I said about the born, I say about the dead. Surely when ancient tombs are broken by some chance, the bones of the rich can be recognized. Therefore, rich man, listen to the Apostle: We brought nothing into this world. Recognize, it is true. But neither can we take anything away. Recognize, this too is true.

It is one thing to be rich, another to want to become rich.

What then follows: Having food and clothing, with these we shall be content. For those who desire to be rich fall into temptation and into many harmful desires which plunge men into ruin and destruction. For the root of all evil is avarice; which some having followed, have strayed from the faith. Consider what they have abandoned. You grieve because they abandoned this; see where they have inserted themselves. Listen: They have strayed from the faith, and have inserted themselves into many pains. But who? Those who want to be rich. It is one thing to be rich; another, to want to become rich. Rich is the one who is born from rich parents: not because he wished it, but because many have left him inheritances. I see wealth, I do not question pleasures. Here, greed is accused, not gold, not silver, not riches, but greed. For those who do not want to be rich or who do not care or are not burning with desires, are not kindled by the torches of avarice, but are rich, let them hear the Apostle. Today it was read: Command those who are rich in this world. Command. What? Command above all, not to be high-minded. For there is nothing that so generates pride as wealth. Every fruit, every grain, every wheat, every tree has its worm. And there is one worm of apples, another of pears, another of beans, another of wheat. The worm of riches is pride. The life of the rich man is to be compared to eternal life.

Therefore, instruct the rich of this world not to be arrogant. He has excluded the vice, let him teach its use. Do not be arrogant. But how not to be arrogant? From what follows: Nor to hope in the uncertainty of riches. Those who do not hope in the uncertainty of riches are not arrogant. If they do not think highly, let them fear. If they fear, they do not think highly. How many were rich yesterday, are poor today? How many sleep rich, and when robbers come and take everything, wake up poor? Therefore, do not hope in the uncertainty of riches, but in the living God, who provides us with everything abundantly to enjoy: temporal and eternal. But more to enjoy, the eternal; to use the temporal. The temporal, as for travelers; the eternal, as for inhabitants. The temporal, from which to do good; the eternal, from which we may become good. Therefore, let the rich do this: not be arrogant, nor hope in the uncertainty of riches, but in the living God, who provides us with everything abundantly to enjoy: let them do this. From what they have, what should they do? Hear what: Let them be rich in good works, be generous. For they have the means. Why do they not do it? Poverty is a difficulty. Let them be generous, they have the means. Share, that is, recognize their fellow mortals. Share, store up for themselves a good foundation for the future. For when I say, he says: Be generous, share, I do not mean to strip them, to expose them, to leave them empty. I teach gain, when I show: Store up for themselves. For I do not want them to remain poor. Store up for themselves. I do not say to lose, but show where to invest. Store up for themselves a good foundation for the future, to take hold of the true life. Therefore, this is a false life: to take hold of the true life. Vanity of vanities, all is vanity. What is the abundance of man in all his labor, which he labors under the sun? Therefore, the true life must be taken hold of, our possessions must be migrated to the place of true life; so that we may find there what we give here. He changes there, who changes us here.

How the rich ought to use their superfluities.

Therefore give to the poor, my brothers. Having food and clothing, let us be content with these. The rich man has nothing from his wealth except what the poor man asks of him: food and clothing. What then do you have more from all that you possess? You have received food, you have received necessary clothing. I say necessary, not empty, not superfluous. What more do you take from your wealth? Tell me. Certainly, all your surplus goods will be. Let what is superfluous to you be necessary to the poor. But I, you say, receive precious banquets, I eat precious foods. What about the poor? He eats cheap foods. The poor man eats cheap foods; I, he says, eat precious ones. I ask you, when you both are satisfied, the precious food enters into you; what happens when it enters? Would we not be ashamed of all the precious foods with which you are filled if we had mirrors in our stomachs? The poor man is hungry, the rich man is hungry: the poor man seeks to be filled, the rich man seeks to be filled. The poor man is filled with cheap foods, the rich man is filled with precious foods. Satisfaction is equal: possession is the same, where both wish to arrive; but one reaches it by a shortcut, the other by a longer route. But better, you say, do the precious things taste to me. You are hardly satisfied when full. You do not know how it tastes that hunger kindles. Nor did I say this in order to compel the rich to eat the meals and foods of the poor. Let the rich use the habit of their weakness: but let them be sorry that they cannot do otherwise. For indeed, they could do better if they could do otherwise. If, therefore, the poor man is not exalted by his beggary, why are you exalted by your weakness? Use selected, precious foods, because you are accustomed to it, because you cannot do otherwise; because if you change your habit, you fall ill. It is granted to you: use superfluous things, give necessary things to the poor; use precious things, give cheap things to the poor. He awaits from you, you await from God: he awaits the hand that was made with him, you await the hand that made you. But he not only made you, but also the poor with you. He gave you both one way, this life; you found companions, you walk one way: he carries nothing, you are excessively burdened: he carries nothing with him, you carry more with you than is needed. You are burdened: give to him from what you have; and you will both feed him and lessen your burden.

He urges toward alms.

Give, therefore, to the poor: I ask, I advise, I command, I order. Give whatever you want to the poor. For I will not hide from your Charity why I needed to address this matter with you. Since we have been here, going to church and returning, the poor have been asking us, and requesting that we tell you to give them something. They asked us to speak to you; and when they see they are not receiving from you, they think our efforts with you are in vain. They expect something from us as well. We give what we have, we give as best as we can: but are we able to meet their needs? Because we are not able to meet their needs, we become their emissaries to you. You have heard, you have praised: thanks be to God. You have received the seed, you have returned the words. These praises of yours rather burden us and put us in danger: we tolerate them and tremble among them. However, my brothers, these praises of yours are the leaves of the trees: the fruit is sought.

Sermons - Sermon 61A

SERMON 61/A ON THE WORDS OF THE LORD:

"Ask and you shall receive"

Since the Lord willed me not to depart as a debtor, I recognize the time to render what I promised. And for that reason, we also ordered today to be read the same chapter of the Gospel, which was read when I excused myself, so that what we then kept back out of necessity, we may now return out of love. And although there is neither enough time nor sufficient strength on our part to consider and treat all the words of the same chapter, we say, with the Lord granting what we can, what is most necessary to be said from it.

How is it that everyone who asks receives, when many ask and do not receive? The Lord has encouraged us to ask, seek, and knock, saying: Ask and you will receive; seek and you will find; knock and it will be opened to you. For everyone who asks receives, who seeks finds, and to the one who knocks it will be opened. Firstly, these things bring forth the question which must be resolved to the best of our abilities. We know many who ask and do not receive, who seek and do not find, who knock and it is not opened to them. How then does everyone who asks receive? For the whole of this, although it appears to be said three times and in three words, refers to one request: Ask, seek, knock, this whole thing is ask. We recognize this from that conclusion where he says: If you, being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more will your Father who is in heaven give good things to those who ask him? He did not say: "seek and knock," but concluded all three in one term, asking.

Paul does not accept, demons accept.

Why then do many ask and not receive, if everyone who asks receives? Are we mistaken in thinking we ask and do not receive? Besides the daily examples which we know, the Scripture itself testifies that the apostle Paul asked that the angel of Satan should depart from him, and he did not receive. And we find that the wicked asked and received, and the good asked and did not receive. For what is worse than demons? And yet they asked for the pigs and received them. And it is found that God did not fulfill the desire of the Apostles, yet He fulfilled the desire of demons. Do we doubt that these belong to God and will reign especially with Christ, but the demons will burn forever with their prince the devil? What then do we say except that: The Lord knows who are his, and of them, everyone who asks receives?

God hears all His own for eternal salvation, not for temporal desire. But still, there remains some doubt about the Apostle. For he was not among those who belong to Him, who made this statement: "The Lord knows who are His." Therefore, all who are His ask and receive, and none of them ask and do not receive. But we seek: "What?" Indeed, those things that are sought for this temporal life sometimes benefit, sometimes harm. And when God knows they will harm, He does not give them to His desires and petitioners, just as a doctor does not give anything a patient has asked for, and by loving he denies what he would grant by not loving. Therefore, He hears all of His own for eternal salvation. Not all are heard for temporal desire. And thus He does not hear for this, so that He may hear for that. Indeed also consider even the words themselves. When he did not receive what he had asked the Lord thrice for, it said to him: "My grace is sufficient for you, for my power is made perfect in weakness." What do you desire from me that the thorn in the flesh be taken away from you, which you received so that you would not be exalted by your revelations? Surely you are asking this because you do not know what benefits you. Trust the physician. What he imposed is bitter, but useful; it causes pain but brings forth health. See the end, and rejoice in what is denied, and understand what is given. What is the end? Power is made perfect in weakness. Therefore, endure weakness if you desire health. Endure weakness if you desire perfection. Because power is made perfect in weakness. For know that you are not deserted, "my grace is sufficient for you."

He arms you for eternal life, who now denies something. For this reason, I first advise your Charity, because I know, and we all know and cannot pretend otherwise—since the miracles of healings that occur here daily through the memory of the most blessed and glorious martyr present in this place strike the eyes even of those unwilling to see them—but without a doubt, some ask and do not receive. Let them not think themselves abandoned. Let them first question their heart, whether they ask faithfully. Whoever asks faithfully, receives usefully, and also sometimes does not receive usefully. When He does not heal the body, He wishes to heal the soul. Therefore, believe that it benefits you whatever He wills, who has called you to the eternal kingdom. For what is this that you desire greatly? He has promised you eternal life, promised you a kingdom with angels, promised you rest without end. What is it that He does not give now? Is not human health vain? Do not all who are healed undoubtedly die? When death comes, all those past things vanish like smoke. But that life which has been promised, when it comes, will indeed have no end. He who denies you something now arms you for this, prepares you for this, instructs you for this. But if you do receive healing, because you believed and asked—for it is not improperly asked for, even if it is sometimes usefully not given—receive it and use it well. For he who, healed, begins to indulge, would it not be better for him to be sick? Therefore, when you receive temporal healing, convert it to good use, so that from what is given, He who gave it may be served. And do not prefer yourself over another who perhaps asked and did not receive, and say in your heart, "I am more faithful than he." For this reason, you have heard in the Gospel: Do not judge, lest you be judged. What does it mean: Do not judge, except about what is hidden? For who is prohibited from judging what is manifest, when Scripture says elsewhere: What is manifest is for you. But what is hidden is for the Lord your God? This means: what is manifest, permit to be judged by you; what is hidden, leave to your God. For how do you know whether perhaps the reason he who asked and did not receive was denied this temporal health is because he is stronger than you? He asked and did not receive. But what did he ask for? Bodily health. Perhaps his faith is stronger than yours, and therefore you received because, if you did not receive, you would fail. Neither did I confirm this, but I said "perhaps," so that I may not do what I prohibit, to dare passing judgment on what is hidden. For sometimes he did not receive because he asked unfaithfully; sometimes he did not receive because he is stronger than you, to exercise patience in him, as we said about the Apostle. He was stronger and yet not perfect, such that he heard: Strength is perfected in weakness.

Other examples of Paul not obtaining what he prayed for.

We know them - their letters proclaim - to have healed the sick with a word. The apostle Paul himself said to a certain man: Aeneas, rise, make your bed for yourself. The very old sick man immediately rose healed and made his bed for himself. And yet the same apostle says about a certain disciple of his: But Trophimus I have left sick at Miletus. You heal the unknown where you arrive, and leave your own disciple sick where you depart? What does he say about Epaphroditus? He says, He was distressed because you heard that he was sick; for indeed he was sick near unto death. What great thing was it for the apostle Paul to heal him also with a word, and not permit him to reach the point of near death? But God, says Paul, had mercy on him, and not only on him but also on me, lest I should have sorrow upon sorrow. It seems that he wanted him to become healthy. If he wanted, surely he also prayed, and yet praying did not obtain it. Hardly, however, when he obtained it, he gave thanks because he had at least obtained it. To blessed Timothy he gives medical advice. He raised a long-time paralytic with a word, but he could not heal the stomach of his beloved and like-minded and, as he himself calls him, the most genuine disciple with the same word. And yet he says: Do not still drink water, but use a little wine for your stomach and your frequent infirmities. Let this suffice concerning this matter which I wanted to admonish your Charity, lest you either mock them and think ill of those who perhaps have asked and not received, or become discouraged when you have perhaps asked and not received, or proudly prefer yourselves who ask and receive over those who do not receive.

We are the bad children of a good Father.

What is that, which all who are of Him ask and receive, seek and find, knock and it will be opened to them? For if it were not something of this kind, Truth would not say: For everyone who asks receives. What is this? Where is it found? Let us seek in the very chapter, in case there we find what we seek. There you have it, indeed there you have it. Let us acknowledge ourselves when we hear that we are evil. For He says: You, being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children. How much more will your heavenly Father give good things to those who ask Him? And He called our Father good, and us evil. What then? Is that most high good God the Father of the evil? We cannot deny this, although it seems absurd. Truth speaks: If you, being evil - what do we contradict in Truth? - know how to give good gifts to your children. We give those good things to our children, which however do not make them good. If therefore we can give good things, which do not make [us] good, but they are good, what else remains that we might ask from God, except the good things by which we might be made good? For we have been reproved when it was said: being evil. And yet our highest good Father has been shown to us, who is in heaven. Do we not blush to be evil under such a Father? Or would that Father of evils wish to leave us alone, if He wished us to remain evil forever? If therefore we are evil, and have a good Father, let us ask this, let us seek this, let us knock for this, that He may make us good, so that He may not have evil children. And how is anyone made good now? To what extent? However much he progresses, he will contend against desires, he will contend against lusts. However much he progresses, and even if he has peace from those things which are inside or outside, he will have a battle within himself, he will engage in a struggle within himself, nor will he cease to engage in the struggle, with He who watches ready to help the struggling and to crown the victor. But when every dissension and every quarrel which we are passes; for our complaint and our quarrel is not another nature contrary to us, but somehow our ingrained nature is our complaint. We were not thus in paradise; nothing within us resisted us. We deserted Him with whom we had peace, and war began for us with ourselves. And this is our misery. And it is a great thing in this life not to be defeated in this war. For we cannot be without an enemy in this life. But there will be a last life, when we will have no enemy either outside or within: for the last enemy to be destroyed is death. Then we will happily dwell in the house of God, and praise Him forever and ever. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 62

SERMO 62 On the Words of the Gospel of Matthew 8:8 "I AM NOT WORTHY THAT YOU SHOULD ENTER UNDER MY ROOF," AND SO FORTH NOT ALSO FROM THE WORDS OF THE APOSTLE, 1 COR 8, 10:

"For if anyone sees him who has knowledge,"

"Reclining at a pagan feast," and so forth. The humility of the Centurion.

We heard, when the Gospel was being read, that our faith is commended in humility. For when the Lord Jesus promised that He would go to the house of the centurion to heal his servant, the centurion replied: I am not worthy that You should come under my roof: but only say the word, and my servant will be healed. By declaring himself unworthy, he showed himself worthy; not into whose walls, but into whose heart Christ would enter. Nor would he have said this with such faith and humility, unless he carried Him in his heart whom he feared to have enter his house. For it was not a great happiness if the Lord Jesus entered his walls, but was not in his heart. For the Master of humility both by word and example, dined in the house of a certain proud Pharisee named Simon. And when He reclined in his house, He was not in his heart where the Son of Man could lay His head. The proud one was rejected from the discipleship of Christ. For thus he called back from following him a certain proud man who, as can be understood from the Lord's words, wished to follow him of his own accord. "I will follow you, Lord," he said, "wherever you go." And the Lord, seeing the invisible things in his heart, said: "The foxes have their dens, and the birds of the sky have their nests, but the Son of Man has nowhere to lay his head." This is to say, "There dwell in you traps like foxes, there dwells pride like the birds of the sky; but the Son of Man, simple against traps, humble against pride, has nowhere to lay his head." And the very laying down of the head, not the rising, is a teacher of humility. Therefore he recalls this one wishing to go, and draws another who is refusing. For in the same place he says to a certain man: "Follow me." And he replied: "I will follow you, Lord, but first let me go and bury my father." Indeed, he excused himself piously: and for this reason, he was more worthy for his excuse to be removed and his calling to be confirmed. What he wished to do was pious: but the teacher taught what he should prioritize. For the master wanted him to be a preacher of the living word, to bring life to others. There were others through whom that necessity could be fulfilled. "Let," he said, "the dead bury their dead." When the unbelievers bury a corpse, the dead bury the dead. That man's body lost its soul; the souls of those others lose God. For just as the life of a body is the soul, so the life of the soul is God. Just as the body expires when it loses the soul, so the soul expires when it loses God. God lost is the death of the soul; the soul gone is the death of the body. The death of the body is necessary; the death of the soul is voluntary. The faith of the centurion in humility. The Lord was therefore reclining in the house of a certain proud Pharisee. He was in his house, as I said; and he was not in his heart. But He did not enter the house of this Centurion, and He possessed his heart. Zacchaeus, however, received the Lord both in his house and in his heart. Nonetheless, this one's faith is praised in humility. For he said: I am not worthy that you should enter under my roof. And the Lord said: Truly, I tell you, I have not found such faith in Israel: according to the flesh. For this one was already an Israelite according to the spirit. The Lord had come to carnal Israel, that is, to the Jews, to seek first the lost sheep in that people, and from that people he had also taken his body: There I did not find such great faith, he says. We can measure the faith of men, as men: He who sees the interior, he whom no one deceives, bore witness to the heart of man, hearing the words of humility, proclaiming the sentence of healing. In the centurion, the gentiles are represented. But from where did he presume this? He says, "I also am a man under authority, having soldiers under me; and I say to one, 'Go,' and he goes; and to another, 'Come,' and he comes; and to my servant, 'Do this,' and he does it." I have authority over those placed under me, while I myself am placed under a certain authority above me. Therefore, he says, if I, a man under authority, have the power to command; what can you do, to whom all authorities are subject? However, this man was from the Gentiles: for he was a centurion. The Jewish nation already had a soldier of the Roman empire. There he performed the duties of a soldier as far as a centurion could do; both under authority and having authority; obedient as a subordinate, ruling over subordinates. But the Lord (as your dear Charity should especially note), although he was among the Jewish people, was already proclaiming the Church that would be throughout the whole world, into which he was about to send the Apostles: he himself, unseen and believed by the Gentiles, seen and killed by the Jews. For just as the Lord did not physically enter this man's house, yet healed his faith and the house itself while absent in body but present in majesty; in the same way, the Lord was bodily among the Jewish people alone; among other nations, he was neither born of the Virgin, nor suffered, nor walked with feet, nor endured human things, nor performed divine miracles. None of these things among the other nations: and yet it was fulfilled concerning him what had been said: "A people whom I did not know served me." How, if they did not know him? "By the hearing of the ear they obeyed me." The Jewish nation knew, and crucified; the world heard, and believed.

"A woman touching the hem of Christ." This absence of his body and presence of his power in all nations, and in that woman who touched the hem of his garment, he signified when he asked, saying: Who touched me? As if absent, he asks: as if present, he heals. The disciples say to him, The crowds press upon you, and you say: Who touched me? As if he walked in such a way that he was touched by no body's touch at all, he said: Who touched me? And they: The crowds press upon you. And as if the Lord said, I seek the one touching, not the one pressing. Thus also now is his body, that is, his Church. The faith of few touches her, the crowd of many presses upon her. For you have heard that the Church is the body of Christ, as his children; and if you wish, you are they yourselves. The Apostle says this in many places: For his body, he says, which is the Church. And again: You are the body of Christ and members of it. Therefore if we are his body, what the body of his then suffered among the crowd, this his Church suffers. It is pressed by crowds, it is touched by few. The flesh presses upon her, faith touches her. Lift up therefore your eyes, I beseech you, who have the means to see. For you have what to see. Lift up the eyes of faith, touch the hem of the garment, it will suffice for salvation.

It is now fulfilled what was foretold in the Gospel.

See what you heard from the Gospel: what was to be then, is now present. Therefore, He says, I tell you: on account of the praised Centurion's faith, as one alien in the flesh, but domestic in heart. Therefore, He says, many will come from the east and the west. Not all, but many; nevertheless, they will come from the east and the west: the whole world is marked by these two directions. Many will come from the east and the west, and will sit with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven: but the children of the kingdom will be cast out into the outer darkness. The children of the kingdom, namely the Jews. Why the children of the kingdom? Because they received the Law, to whom the Prophets were sent, among whom was the temple and the priesthood, who celebrated the figures of all things to come. For the things whose figures they celebrated, they did not recognize the presence. Therefore, He says, the children of the kingdom will go into the outer darkness; there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth. We see the Jews rejected, we see Christians called from the east and the west to a certain heavenly banquet, to sit with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob; where the bread is righteousness, where the drink is wisdom.

They are censured for dining with pagans in the idol's temple.

Therefore, pay attention, brothers: for you are this – you are from this people, already foretold, now presented. You are indeed from those who were called from the east and the west to recline in the kingdom of heaven, not in the temple of idols. Therefore, be the body of Christ, not a burden on the body of Christ. You have the fringe of the garment, which you may touch, so that you may be healed from the flux of blood, that is, from the flow of carnal pleasures. You have, I say, the fringe of the garment, which you may touch. Think of the garment as the Apostles, clinging to the sides of Christ by the texture of unity. Among these Apostles was, as it were, the fringe, the least and last Paul: as he himself said, "I am the least of the Apostles." The fringe is the latest and least on the garment. The fringe is looked upon with contempt but touched with salvation. Even to this hour, we hunger and thirst, and we are naked, and we are buffeted. What is so marginal, what is so contemptible? Touch, if you suffer the flow of blood: power will come out from Him whose garment it is, and will heal you. The fringe now proposed to be touched was when it was read from the same Apostle: "For if anyone sees him who has knowledge, reclining in an idol's temple; will not his conscience, if he is weak, be emboldened to eat things sacrificed to idols? And through your knowledge shall the weak brother perish, for whom Christ died?" How do you think men can be deceived by idols, which they think are honored by Christians? "God knows my heart," he says. But your brother does not know your heart. If you are weak, beware of greater sickness; if you are strong, take care of your brother's weakness. Those who see this are emboldened to other things, so that they do not only desire to eat there, but also to sacrifice. Behold, the weak brother perishes through your knowledge. Listen, brother: if you despise the weak, do you also despise the brother? Wake up. What if you sin against Christ Himself? For take heed that you cannot in any way despise Him. "But thus, sinning against the brothers, and wounding their weak conscience, you sin against Christ." Now let those who despise these things go and recline in an idol's temple: will they not be oppressive, not touching? And when they have reclined in the idol's temple, let them come and fill the church, not to receive salvation, but to impose a burden.

Reclining in the idol out of fear of some greater thing. But you say, "I fear lest I offend someone greater." Indeed, fear lest you offend someone greater; and you do not offend God. For he who fears lest he offend someone greater, see whether he is indeed greater than the one whom you fear to offend. Certainly, do not offend someone greater. This rule is proposed to you. Is it not manifest that he should not be offended who is the greatest among all? Now examine your superiors. First to you are your father and mother: if they educate you rightly, if they nurture you in Christ; they should be listened to in all things, obeyed in every command; they command nothing against the greater one, and they are to be served. Who, you ask, is greater than the one who begot me? He who created you yourself. For man generates, but God creates. From where man generates, he does not know: what he is going to generate, he does not know. He who saw you to make you, before there was one whom he made, is certainly greater than your father. The country is greater than your parents themselves; so that whatever the parents command against the country, they shall not be heard. And whatever the country commands against God, it shall not be heard. For if you wish to be healed, if after the flow of blood, if after twelve years in that disease, if after consuming all things on doctors, and not having received health at any time, you wish to become healthy, O woman, whom I address as a type of the Church, your father commands this, and your people command that. But your Lord says to you: "Forget your people and your father's house." To what good? To what fruit? With what reward? "For the king has desired your beauty." He desired what he made: for that he might make you beautiful, he loved you ugly. For the unfaithful and ugly, he shed his blood; he rendered you faithful and beautiful; he loved his gifts in you. For what did you confer upon your spouse? What dowry did you receive from your former father and former people? Were they not the luxuries and rags of sins? He cast away your rags, tore off your sackcloth: he had mercy to adorn; he adorned to love. A stumbling block to the brother is a sin against Christ.

What more, brothers? You Christians have heard that by sinning against your brothers, and striking their weak conscience, you sin against Christ. Do not disdain, if you do not want to be erased from the book of life. How long shall we strive to speak clearly and pleasantly to you, while our grief forces us to speak in any way, and does not allow us to remain silent? Whoever wishes to despise these matters, sins against Christ; let them see what they are doing. We wish to gather the rest of the pagans; you are stones in the way; those wishing to come stumble and turn back. For they say in their hearts: Why should we abandon the gods, whom even the Christians themselves worship with us? Far be it from me, they say, that I should worship the gods of the Gentiles. I know, I understand, I believe. What are you doing to the weak conscience, which you strike? What are you doing to the price, if you disdain what is bought? See at what great cost it was bought: The weak brother perishes in your knowledge: which you claim to have, to know that an idol is nothing, and you think of God in your mind, and so you sit down at the idol’s table. In this knowledge the weak perishes. And so that you do not disdain the weak, he added, for whom Christ died. Consider who you wish to disdain, his price, and weigh the whole world with the death of Christ. And lest you think that you only sin against the weak, and consider the sin to be light and of little account: You sin, he says, against Christ. For people are wont to say: I sin against a man, surely not against God? Deny that Christ is God. Do you dare to deny that Christ is God? Have you learned anything else, when you were sitting at the idol’s table? The Christian doctrine does not admit this teaching. I ask where you have learned that Christ is not God. Pagans are wont to say this. Do you see what evil tables do? Do you see that bad conversations corrupt good morals? There you cannot speak about the Gospel, and you listen to those speaking about idols. There you lose what Christ is God: and what you drink there, you vomit up in the Church. Perhaps here you dare to speak, perhaps among the crowds you dare to murmur: Was not Christ a man? Was he not crucified? You have learned this from the pagans, you have lost salvation, you have not touched the fringe. Touch and receive salvation. Just as we have taught you to touch it in what is written: Whoever sees his brother sitting at an idol’s table: touch it also concerning the divinity of Christ. He was speaking of the same fringe concerning the Jews: Whose fathers, and from whom is Christ according to the flesh, who is above all, God blessed forever. Behold the true God against whom you sin, while you recline at the tables of false gods. A foolish excuse of those reclining in an idol.

He says, "There is no God;" because it is the genius of Carthage. As if Mars or Mercury were gods. But consider how they regard it, not what it is. For I also know with you that it is a stone. If a genius is some ornament; let the citizens of Carthage live well, and they themselves will be the genius of Carthage. But if a genius is a demon, you have heard it there too: The things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to demons, and not to God: I do not want you to become partners with demons. We know that it is not God; would that they too knew this: but for the sake of those who do not know this, the weak, their conscience must not be struck. This the Apostle advises. For they too, in what they claim as a divine presence and regard as a deity, that statue, the altar testifies. What is the altar doing there, if that is not regarded as a deity? Let no one say to me, "It is not a deity, it is not God." I have already said: Would that they knew this as we all know. But what they hold, for what purpose they hold it, what they do there, that altar testifies. It convicts the minds of all worshippers, let it not convict those who recline. To press and touch the body of Christ. But let not Christians oppress, if pagans oppress. It is the body of Christ. Did we not say this, because the body of Christ was being oppressed, and not touched? He endured the oppressors, he sought those who touched. And would that, brothers, the body of Christ be oppressed by pagans, by whom it is accustomed to be oppressed; let not Christians oppress the body of Christ. Brothers, it is for us to speak to you, it is for us to speak to Christians. For what have I to do with judging those outside? the Apostle himself says. We address them differently, as the weak; we must be gentle with them, that they may hear the truth: in you the decay must be cut away. If you seek how the pagans may be overcome, how they may be enlightened, how they may be called to salvation: forsake their festivities, forsake their trifles; and if they do not consent to our truth, let them be ashamed of their fewness. A prelate, whether good or bad, cannot harm the pious.

If he who is set over you is good, he is your nurturer; if he is bad, he is your tempter. Willingly receive nourishment, and be approved in temptation. Be gold. Regard this world as a goldsmith's furnace: in one narrow place, there are three things: gold, chaff, and fire. Fire is applied to those two, the chaff is burned, the gold is purified. Someone yielded to threats and was brought to an idol: woe to me, for I mourn the chaff, I see the ashes. Another did not yield to threats, did not yield to torturers; brought before the judge, he stood in his confession, he was not bowed to the idol: what does the flame do? Does it not purify the gold? Stand in the Lord, brothers: more powerful is he who called you. Do not fear the threats of the impious. Endure enemies; you have those for whom you pray; do not be terrified at all. This is health, draw from it at this feast: drink here, where you may be satisfied, not there, where you may go mad. Stand in the Lord. You are silver, you will be gold. This likeness is not from us, it is from divine Scripture. You have read, you have heard: Like gold in the furnace he has tested them; and like a holocaust offering he has accepted them. Behold what you will be to the treasures of God. Be rich in God: not making him rich, but becoming rich by him. Let him fill you, admit nothing else to your heart.

Observance of ordered powers. Do we raise you in pride, or say to you that you should be contemptuous against the ordained powers? We do not say this. You are even sick here, touch even here the hem of the garment. The Apostle himself says: Every soul should be subject to higher powers: for there is no power except from God. The powers that exist are ordained by God. He who resists the power resists the ordinance of God. But what, if it commands that which you should not do? Here indeed you should despise the power, fearing the power. Observe the very degrees of human affairs. If the curator commands something, is it not to be done? Yet, if he commands against the proconsul, you do not despise the power, but you choose to serve the greater. Nor should the lesser be angry if the greater is preferred. Again, if the proconsul commands something, and the emperor commands something else, is there any doubt that, with the former despised, it is to be served? Therefore, if the emperor commands one thing and God another, what do you judge? Pay the tribute, be obedient to me. Rightly, but not in the idol. He forbids the idol. Who forbids? The greater power. Pardon: you threaten prison, he threatens hellfire. Here now your faith must be taken up as a shield, in which you can extinguish all the fiery darts of the enemy. The deceit of the powerful is compared to a razor. But a powerful one lies in wait against you, and a powerful one plots against you: he sharpens a razor to shave off hair, not to cut off the head. What I have said, you have recently heard in the Psalm: "You have wrought deceit as a sharp razor." Why has he compared the deceit of a powerful evil one to a razor? Because it only applies to our superfluities. Just as the hairs on our body seem superfluous and are shaved off without harm to the flesh, so whatever an angry powerful one can do to you, count among your superfluities. He takes away your poverty: does he take away your riches? Your poverty and your riches are in your heart. He could take away your superfluities, he could cause harm, permitted even to injure the body. Even this life, for those considering another life; this life, I say, is to be reckoned among the superfluities. For even the martyrs despised it. They did not lose life, but they gained life. The security of the pious under the protection of God. Be certain, brothers, that enemies are not admitted against the faithful, except as long as it benefits the testing and proving of the faithful. Be certain, brothers, let no one say otherwise. Cast all your care upon the Lord, entirely cast yourselves into Him. He does not withdraw so that you fall. He who created us and gave us assurance regarding even the hairs of our head. "Amen I say to you," He says, "the very hairs of your head are all numbered." Our hairs are numbered by God: how much more our character, of which even our hairs are known to Him? See that God does not despise our smallest things. For if He did despise them, He would not create them. For He certainly created our hairs too and keeps them numbered. But now when they are, you say, perhaps they will perish. And hear His voice from this: “Amen I say to you, not a hair of your head will perish.” Why do you fear man, O man placed in the bosom of God? Do not fall from His bosom; whatever you may suffer there, it will be for salvation, not for ruin. The martyrs endured the laceration of their limbs, and do Christians fear the injuries of the times of Christians? He who injures you now does so out of fear. He does not say openly, "Come to the idol"; he does not say openly, "Come to my altars, dine there." And if he says this, and you refuse, let him complain, let him put this in his petition, let him declare this in his complaint: "He refused to come to my altars, he refused to come to the temple which I revere." Let him say this. He does not dare say it but devises other deceitful schemes. Prepare your hair, he sharpens the razor: he will remove your excess, shave whatever you are to leave behind. Let him take whatever remains, if he can. What did the powerful wrongdoer take? What great thing did he take? What the thief, what the burglar; to rage greatly, what the robber. Even if he is allowed to put this body to death, what does he take except what the robber does? I honored him when I said: a robber. For any robber, of whatever kind, is a man. What fever, what scorpion, what bad fungus. All the power of those who rage is to do what a fungus does. People eat bad fungus and die. Behold in what frailty human life is: which you will someday leave behind, do not fight for it in such a way that you are left behind.

Eternal life is the reward of labor. Our life is Christ: attend to Christ. He came to suffer, but also to be glorified; to be despised, but also to be exalted; to die, but also to rise again. The work terrifies you, but look at the reward. Why do you wish to reach that thing delicately, to which labor alone brings you? But you fear to lose your silver; because you have reached your silver with great labor. If you did not reach the silver, which you will sometime lose even when dying, without labor; do you wish to reach eternal life without labor? Let that be dearer to you, to which you will thus reach after all labors, so that you may never lose it. If that is dear to you, to which you thus reached after all labors, so that one day you will lose it; how much more ought we to desire that perpetual thing?

Idols, unless legitimate power is given, should not be broken. Do not believe their words, nor be afraid. They call us enemies of their idols. Thus may God provide, and give everything into power, just as He gave what is broken. For we say this to your Charity, do not do these things when it is not in your power to do this. It is the behavior of depraved men, of the insane Circumcellions, to be savage where they have no power, and to hasten to die without cause. You have heard what we read to you, all of you who were recently present in the Mappalia. When the land has been given to you in power (first he says, in power, then he says what must be done), he says, you shall destroy their altars, smash their groves, and break all their sacred pillars. When you have received power, do this. Where power has not been given to us, we do not act; where it has been given, we do not neglect it. Many pagans have these abominations on their estates: do we approach and break them? First, we act by breaking the idols in their hearts. When they have also become Christians, they either invite us to such a good work, or they anticipate us. Now we must pray for them, not be angry with them. If great pain moves, it moves against Christians, it moves against our brothers, who wish to enter the church in such a way that they have the body here, but the heart elsewhere. Everything should be inside. If what man sees is inside, why is what God sees outside?

Unjust complaints of idolaters. But know, dearest, that their murmurs align themselves with the heretics, with the Jews. The heretics, Jews, and Pagans have united against unity. Because it happened that in some places the Jews received discipline due to their wickedness; they accuse, suspect, or pretend that we always seek such things about them. Because it happened that somewhere heretics suffered punishments by laws for their impiety and fury of their violences; now they say we seek anything at all times for their inconvenience to their destruction. Again, because it pleased against the Pagans that laws be passed—indeed for the Pagans, if they are wise—as a severe teacher comes when foolish children are playing in the mud and dirtying their hands, and the teacher shakes off the mud from their hands, extends the book—in this way, God wanted to terrify foolish childish hearts through princes subjected to Him, that they could shake off the mud from their hands and do something useful. What is useful from the hands? Break your bread for the hungry, and bring the needy without shelter into your house. And yet the children escape the sight of the teacher and return to the mud secretly; and when they are found out, they hide their hands so they are not seen; because, therefore, God wanted it, they think we seek idols everywhere; which, when we find, we break them in all places. Why? Do not places where they are exist before us? Or do we truly not know where they are? And yet we do not do it: because God did not give it into our power. When does God give it into power? When it is a Christian whose matter it is. He now desired the matter to be done by whose it is. If he did not want to give the place itself to the Church and only ordered that there should not be idols in his matter; I believe it should be done with utmost devotion so that a Christian soul, who wants to give thanks to God on earth and does not want anything there to be an insult to God, would be helped by Christians. To this it is added that He gave the places themselves to the Church. And idols would exist in the matter of the Church? Brothers, see what displeases the Pagans. It is not enough for them that we do not remove those things from their villas, do not break them: and they want them to be kept in ours. We preach against idols, we remove them from hearts: we are persecutors of idols: we profess. Are we their preservers? I do not do it where I cannot; I do not do it where the lord of the matter complains: but where he wants it to be done and gives thanks; I will be guilty if I do not do it.

Sermons - Sermon 62A

SERMON 62/A About the Centurion's Boy The centurion says he is unworthy, into whose heart the Lord had entered. The faith of this centurion signifies the faith of the Gentiles, like a mustard seed, a humble and fervent faith. His servant, as you heard, was ill and lying paralyzed at home; however, this centurion asked the Savior for the health of his servant. The Lord promised that He Himself would come to save his servant. Yet he, as I said, humbly fervent and fervently humble: "I am not worthy, Lord, that you should enter under my roof," he said. The Lord entering under his roof, he declared himself unworthy; and yet he would not have said these words unless the Lord had already entered into his heart. Then he added: "Only say the word, and my servant will be healed." I know to whom I am speaking: speak, and what I wish will be done. He also added a most sweet and truthful comparison. "For I too," he said, "am a man; you are God: I am under authority, you above all powers: having soldiers under me, you also have angels; and I say to this one, go, and he goes; and to another, come, and he comes; and to my servant, do this, and he does it." The whole of creation is your handmaid: what is needed is for you to command, what you command is done. The humility of the centurion was the door for the Lord entering. And the Lord: Amen I say to you, I have not found such faith in Israel. You know that the Lord took flesh from Israel, from the seed of David, from which the Virgin Mary came, who bore Christ; and He came to them, showed His fleshly face to them, the mouth of His flesh sounded in their ears, the appearance of His body was before their eyes. His presence was given to the Jews: it was promised to the fathers, and given to the sons. And yet this centurion was a foreigner, he was of the Romans, he served as a soldier there; and He preferred his faith to the faith of the Israelites, so much so that He said: Amen I say to you, I have not found such faith in Israel. What do we think He praised in this man’s faith? Humility. I am not worthy that You should enter under my roof. This He praised: and because He praised this, by this He entered. The humility of the centurion was the door for the Lord entering, that He might fully possess the one whom He already possessed.

"To come" is to believe. The Lord therefore gave great hope to the nations on this occasion: we were not yet, and already we were foreseen, already we were known beforehand, already we were promised. For what does He say? Therefore I say to you, many will come from the East and the West. Where will they come? Where they may believe. They come there: to come is itself to believe. He believed, he came; he apostatized, he departed. Therefore, they will come from the East and the West; not to the temple of Jerusalem, not to any central part of the earth, not to any certain mountain; and yet they come to the temple of Jerusalem, and to a certain central part, and to a certain mountain. The temple of Jerusalem is now the body of Christ: hence He said: "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up." The central place where they come is Christ Himself: He is in the middle because He is equal to all; whatever is placed in the middle is common to all. They come to a mountain of which Isaiah says: "In the last days, the mountain of the Lord will be made manifest, prepared on the summit of mountains; and it shall be exalted above all hills, and all nations shall flow to it." This mountain was a small stone which grew and filled the world: thus Daniel saw it. Approach the mountain, ascend the mountain; and when you ascend, do not descend. There you will be safe, there you will be fortified: the mountain of your refuge is Christ. And where is Christ? At the right hand of the Father: for He ascended into heaven. He is very far away: who ascends? who touches? If He is far from you, how do we speak the truth: "The Lord be with you?" And He sits at the right hand of the Father, and He does not withdraw from your hearts. The Lord commands worms just as he commands angels.

Turned to the centurion: Go, as you have believed, so let it be done for you; and the boy was healed in that hour. As he believed, so it was done. Say the word, and he will be healed; he said the word, and he was healed. As you have believed, let it be done for you; the worst sickness left the boy's limbs. How the Lord commands all creation with marvelous ease! For he does not labor to command. Or indeed is the Lord of creation who commands angels, and does not deign to command humans? Would that humans would willingly serve! But blessed is he whom he commands inwardly, not in the ear of the flesh, but in the ear of the heart, where he corrects, directs. For understand from this that the Lord commands all things, because he did not overlook even worms in his command. He commanded the worm, and it gnawed the root of the gourd, and the Prophet’s shade perished. The Scripture says, He commanded the worm in the morning, and it gnawed the root of the gourd, and the shadow perished. The morning worm is Christ; Psalm twenty-one of his passion speaks thus: For the morning reception. He rose in the morning time, gnawed the Jewish shadow. Therefore, flattering his bride in the Song of Songs: Until the day breathes and the shadows flee. Do you observe the Sabbath carnally? Do you abstain from the flesh of animals that do not chew the cud or do not have split hooves? Do you offer sacrifices of victims from the livestock to God? You do none of these things. Why? Because the gourd withered, because the shadow ceased, the sun is open. Call for refreshment, lest you labor in the heat of the commandments. It is finished.

Sermons - Sermon 63

SERMO 63 CONCERNING THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL MT 8, 23-27:

"And when he had entered into the boat," and so forth The sleep of Christ is a sign of the sacrament. From the most recent reading of the holy Gospel, granted by the Lord, I speak to you and exhort you in Him, that against the storms and waves of this world, faith may not sleep in your hearts. For indeed, the Lord Christ had death in His power; He did not have sleep in His power; and perhaps sleep overtook the Omnipotent Navigator against His will. If you believe this, He sleeps in you: but if Christ watches in you, your faith watches. The Apostle says: Christ may dwell in your hearts through faith. Therefore, even the sleep of Christ is a sign of the sacrament. Souls are navigating through the wood, passing through the world. That ship also prefigured the Church. For each are indeed temples of God, and each one navigates in his own heart: nor does he shipwreck if he thinks good thoughts.

Vengeance disturbs your heart: forgive, there will be tranquility.

You heard an insult, it is wind: you are angry, it is a wave. Therefore, with the wind blowing, the wave arising, the ship is in danger, your heart is in danger, your heart wavers. Hearing the insult you desire vengeance: and behold you have been avenged, and rejoicing in another's harm, you have made shipwreck. And why is this? Because Christ sleeps within you. What is it, Christ sleeps within you? You have forgotten Christ. Therefore wake Christ up, remember Christ, let Christ awaken in you: consider Him. What did you want? To be avenged. It escaped you, that he when he was crucified said: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. He who slept in your heart did not wish to be avenged. Wake him up, recall him. His memory, his word: his memory, his command. And you will say to yourself, if Christ is awake in you: What kind of man am I, who wants to be avenged? Who am I, who issues threats to man? Perhaps I will die before I am avenged. And when, with a heaving sigh, inflamed with anger, and thirsting for revenge, I go out of the body, He who did not wish to be avenged will not receive me: He who said: Give, and it shall be given to you; forgive, and you shall be forgiven will not receive me. Therefore I will restrain myself from my anger, and return to the tranquility of my heart. Christ commanded the sea, and there was calm.

Let us awaken Christ so that we may sail in tranquility. But what I said about anger, hold regularly in all your temptations. When a temptation arises, it is a wind; you are troubled, it is a wave. Awaken Christ, let Him speak to you. Who is this, that even the winds and the sea obey Him? Who is this, to whom the sea listens? The sea is His, and He made it. All things were made through Him. Rather imitate the winds and the sea: obey the Creator. The sea listens under the command of Christ, and are you deaf? The sea listens, and the wind ceases, and do you blow? What? I say, I do, I pretend: what is it but to blow, and to refuse to cease under the word of Christ? Do not let the wave overcome you in the disturbance of your heart. But still, because we are human, if the wind drives, if it moves the emotion of our soul, let us not despair: let us awaken Christ, so that we may sail in tranquility and come to our homeland. Turned to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 63A

SERMON 63/A On the Woman Who Suffered from a Flow of Blood In the field of God, let us be wheat, not chaff. The Church of God, the holy Church, of which He is the head. For if He is the head, we are the body; provided we are such that we endure pressure from the crowds, and do not put pressure on the Lord. A great multitude flows to the Church spread over all lands, all nations believe; and in all nations one part presses, another is pressed; the part that is pressed endures; the one that endures will receive the reward, reaching the fruit of endurance, about which the Lord says in the Gospel: It bears fruit with endurance. For it is the part of the saints, spread everywhere; for it is wheat, and the wheat had to be sown throughout the whole field, that is, throughout the whole world; for the Lord called the field the world. He calls all His faithful, who approach God not with lips but with heart, wheat; but all who approach in such a way that they do not approach with the heart, He counts as chaff and weeds. Both are in the whole field or the whole threshing floor, both wheat and chaff; but the chaff is the greater part, the wheat smaller but more solid, smaller but heavier, smaller but more precious; because of which labor is undertaken, because of which caution is taken; for which the granary, not the fire, is prepared. Therefore, let no one congratulate themselves simply because they enter within these walls; let them turn their attention back to themselves, examine their own heart; let them be their own strictest judge, so that they may feel Him as a merciful father; let them not flatter themselves, let them not take their own persona; let them sit on the tribunal of their mind, apply the torments of fears to their conscience, confess to God who they are: if they see themselves as wheat, let them be pressed, let them be threshed, let them endure, and not be anxious that they are mixed with chaff: in the threshing floor chaff can be with them, but in the granary it will not be.

What the hemorrhaging woman and her disease signify.

However, since we have said, most beloved brothers, let us belong to the member of him, whose type that woman bore. And truly, your Charity is expecting, whose type that woman bore; for we say that she signified the Church which comes from the Gentiles; for the Lord was going to the daughter of the synagogue ruler to raise her up. The daughter of the synagogue ruler signifies the Jewish people; for the Lord did not come except to the Jews, saying: I am not sent except to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. He came as if to the daughter of the synagogue ruler. Then that woman, as if coming from some unknown direction, unknown, because she was ignorant, and she touched the Lord in faith, saying: If I touch the hem of his garment, I will be saved. She touched, and she was saved. But in her was a detestable disease, a flow of blood. And yet everyone shudders to either hear or endure this; they shudder at the flow of blood in the body, therefore they should not endure it in the heart. The disease must be more avoided in the heart. Somehow the perversity of the inhabiting soul, turned towards its dwelling, left itself. The master wants the flow of the body to be cured, that is, the spirit its body, which inhabits that very house, that is itself. What profit is there in a marble and lacquered house, where the head of the household is not healthy? What did I say? What profit is there in a healthy and safe body, where the spirit is sick and is the inhabitant of the body? So the flow of blood in the spirit is luxury: just as the greedy are like those with dropsy – for they want to drink – so the luxurious are like the flow of blood. For the greedy labor by desiring, the luxurious by spending: there is appetite in one, flow in the other; but both kill. A physician is needed, who comes for the diseases of the souls: but he wanted to heal the diseases of the bodies for this reason, to show himself the Savior of the soul, because he is the creator of both. For he is not the creator of the soul, and not of the body; and therefore, he wanted to admonish the soul, so that it might be healed within. For this reason he healed the body: the soul was intent within, so that it might desire what it saw Jesus performing outside to be performed within. What is it that God performed? He healed the flow of blood, he healed the leper, he healed the paralytic. All these are diseases of the soul. The lame and the blind; for everyone limps who does not walk rightly on the path of life, and he is blind who does not believe in God; the luxurious suffer from the flow of blood, and every varied and deceitful person suffers the spots of leprosy. And it is necessary that he heals inwardly who therefore healed outwardly, so that he might be desired to heal inwardly. The garment of the Lord, the Apostles; the fringe, Paul.

Therefore, this woman was suffering from an issue of blood and is healed from the carnal affliction because all her strength was draining away; in the same way, the soul, by pursuing carnal desires, expends all its strength. And this woman spent all her substance on physicians; thus it is written about her. How the wretched Church of the Gentiles, seeking happiness, seeking to have some strength or seeking medicine, had spent so much on false doctors, on astrologers, on fortune-tellers, on diviners, and prophets of the temples? For all promise salvation, but cannot give it, because they do not have what they promise. She had therefore spent everything and was not healed. She said: I touch the fringe of his garment; she touched, and was made whole. Let us seek what the fringe of the garment is. Let your Charity attend. The garment of the Lord is understood to be the Apostles adhering to him. Seek which Apostle was sent to the Gentiles: you will find Paul the Apostle sent; for most of his work was in the apostleship of the Gentiles. Therefore Paul the Apostle sent to the Gentiles, he is the fringe of the Lord's garment, because he was the last of the Apostles. Is there not another fringe of the garment, both the latest and the least? The Apostle says both about himself: But I am the least of the Apostles, and: I am the least of the Apostles. He is the last, he is the least. He is the fringe of the garment: and the Church of the Gentiles, like the woman who touched the fringe, was suffering the issue of blood; she touched, and was made whole. And we also should touch, that is believe, so that we may be saved.

[An explicit discourse on the woman who suffered from a flow of blood].

Sermons - Sermon 63B

Sermon 63/B OF THE DAUGHTER OF THE CHIEF SYNAGOGUE AND ABOUT THE WOMAN SUFFERING A FLOW OF BLOOD Christ is touched by faith.

Both the mind is enlightened, and hope of future things is added, while the deeds of the past are narrated. Jesus was going to raise the daughter of the synagogue ruler, who had already been reported dead; and while he was going, as if by a side path, a woman afflicted with disease intervened, full of faith, bleeding, to be redeemed by blood. And she said in her heart: If I only touch the hem of his garment, I will be saved. When she said it, she touched: Christ is touched by faith. She approached and touched, it happened as she believed. But the Lord asked, saying: Who touched me? He who knows everything wants to know; he asks by whom it was done, which before it was done, he himself knew. Therefore, it is a mystery: let us look at it, and as much as is granted, let us understand.

What the daughter of the synagogue leader and the woman with a hemorrhage signify. The daughter of the synagogue leader signifies the people of the Jews; but this woman signifies the church of the Gentiles. The Lord Christ, born of the Jews in the flesh, was presented in the flesh to the same Jews; he sent to the Gentiles, he did not go himself. His bodily and visible sojourn was made in Judea. Hence the Apostle says: For I say that Christ was a servant of the circumcision on behalf of God's truth to confirm the promises made to the fathers (for it was said to Abraham: In your seed shall all the nations be blessed); but the Gentiles glorify God for his mercy. Therefore, Christ was sent to the Jews. He was going to raise the daughter of the synagogue leader. The woman intervenes and is healed; first she is healed by faith and is almost ignored by the Savior. For whence is it said: Who touched me? The ignorance of God, the confidence of the mystery; he wishes to signify something, when he who cannot be ignorant is ignorant. What then does it signify? Healing the church of the Gentiles, which Christ did not see in bodily presence, whose voice is in the psalm: A people I did not know served me, in the hearing of the ear they obeyed me. The world heard and believed; the Jewish people saw and first crucified, but afterwards even they approached. The Jews also believe, but at the end of the age. The garment of Christ is the choir of the Apostles, the hem is Paul.

Meanwhile, let this woman be saved; let her touch the hem of the garment. Understand the garment as the choir of the Apostles. There was one certain last and least, a certain hem, the Apostle Paul. He himself was sent to the Gentiles, who says: For I am the least of the Apostles, who am not fit to be called an Apostle. Again he says: I am the last of the Apostles. This last and least hem is necessary for the woman who is not well to be healed. What we have heard has happened, what we have heard happens: every day this woman touches the hem, every day she is made well. For the flux of the flesh is indeed the flux of blood. When the Apostle is heard, when that last and least hem is heard, and says: Mortify your members which are upon the earth, the flux of blood is restrained, fornication is restrained, drunkenness is restrained, worldly delights are restrained, all works of the flesh are restrained. Do not be amazed: the hem has been touched.

When the Lord said: Who touched me? knowing, yet he did not know: he signified and designated the Church, which he did not see in the body, but redeemed with his blood.

Sermons - Sermon 64

SERMO 64 Treatise on the Birthdays of the Holy Martyrs The fate of good and evil.

We celebrate the memory of the martyrs. Therefore, let us admire the praises of the martyrs and imitate their deeds. All these things that you have heard when the Holy Gospel was read: "For they will deliver you up to councils and flog you in their synagogues," and then what was said: "And brother will deliver brother to death, and father his child, and a man's enemies will be those of his own household," these happen to both the good and the bad. For the evils that men suffer on this earth are common to both the good and the bad, just as the good things that men have on this earth are commonly shared by the good and the bad. Therefore, seeing the chorus of martyrs because many wicked endure many evils on this earth, they cried out to God with one voice: "Judge me, O God, and discern my cause from an unholy nation." For when both the wicked and the good are punished, what becomes of the good if the cause is not distinguished? The good man is punished here, but is crowned by God. The wicked man is punished here and is tormented in eternal judgment. Therefore, if we love the holy martyrs, let us choose their cause so that we may please God.

Wolves made into sheep.

See how our Lord Jesus Christ shapes His martyrs with His discipline. "I send you," He says, "like sheep in the midst of wolves." See what happens if one wolf comes among many sheep. No matter how many thousands of sheep there are, if one wolf is sent among them, they are disturbed and, even if not all are torn apart, all are terrified. What kind of reason, what kind of counsel, what kind of power, what great divinity it was, not to admit the wolf to the sheep, but to send the sheep among the wolves! "I send you," He says, "like sheep in the midst of wolves"; not to the borders of the wolves, but in the midst of the wolves. Therefore, there was a host of wolves, a few sheep, so that many wolves might kill the few sheep. The wolves were turned and became sheep. The name of Christ, once despised, is now glorified.

However, it is said to all, both those who were there listening to the Lord and those who would believe in the Lord through them, and those following them in birth even up to us and after us until the end of the age, it is said to all: You will be hated by all nations because of my name. Indeed, the Church was foretold to exist among all nations. Just as we read it promised, so we see it fulfilled. And all nations are Christian, and yet all nations are not Christian. Throughout the field, there are both wheat and weeds. Therefore, when you hear our Lord Jesus Christ saying this: You will be hated by all men because of my name, listen as wheat; this is said to the wheat. Consider with me lest anyone might say in his heart: "This was said to the Lord's disciples when our Lord Jesus Christ sent them to preach his word to the nations. All nations hated them because of his name. But now, all nations glorify his name. Let us not think that we are hated by all nations but rather loved by all nations." O all Christian nations, O the Lord's wheat, O Catholic sprouts spread throughout the world, examine yourselves and you will know that all nations hate you because of Christ's name! As many as remain pagans, as many as remain Jews, as many as have become heretics, do they not all hate us because of Christ's name? But suppose there is even a very wicked man, whether noble, powerful, shining in dignity, or exalted in power, who wishes evil and may have much power, he too is hated by all men, but not because of Christ. The voice indeed is similar but the cause is different. Therefore, our Lord Jesus, knowing that it also happens to wicked men to be hated by all men, when he said: They hate you all, added: because of my name, for he heard those who say: Judge me, O God, and distinguish my cause from an unholy nation.

Whence confidence for the Christian among wolves.

Let us therefore hear what He who promised crowns has admonished. He proposed a contest but assists those who struggle and labor. What kind of contest, then, did He propose? In Latin, agon means contest. What kind of contest, then, did the Lord Jesus Christ declare? This is what He declared: "Be as shrewd as serpents and as innocent as doves." He who understands this, he who holds to this, he who keeps this, dies securely because he does not die. For no one ought to die securely except he who knows himself to die in such a way that death dies in him, and life is crowned.

How the cunning of the serpent is to be imitated.

Therefore, dearest ones, it must be explained to you, although we have often spoken of it here, what it means to be simple as doves, and shrewd as serpents. If the simplicity of the doves is already prescribed to us, what does the shrewdness of the serpent do in the simplicity of the dove? I love in the dove that it has no gall. I fear in the serpent that it has venom. Do not utterly dread the serpent. It has something to hate, it has something to imitate. For the serpent, when burdened by old age and feeling the weight of its antiquity, constrains itself through a narrow cave and sheds its old skin to emerge as new. Imitate it, you Christian, who hears Christ saying: Enter through the narrow gate. And the Apostle Paul says to you: Put off the old man with his deeds and put on the new who is created according to God. Therefore, you have something to imitate in the serpent: do not die because of old age. He who dies for some temporal advantage dies because of old age. He who dies for the advantage of human praise dies because of old age. But when you have shed all these old things, you have imitated the cunning of the serpent. Imitate it more strongly: protect your head. What does it mean to protect your head? Keep Christ with you. If any of you has observed how when a serpent is killed, it protects its head by exposing its whole body to the blows of the attacker? It does not want that part to be struck where it knows it has life. And Christ is our life. For He Himself said: I am the way, the truth, and the life. Listen also to the Apostle: The head of the man is Christ. Therefore, he who keeps Christ in himself keeps his head for himself. The simplicity of the dove is to be imitated.

Now truly, what need is there to commend at length the simplicity of doves? For the poisons of the serpent were to be avoided. There, imitation was endangered where there was something to be feared. But imitate the dove safely. Notice that the doves rejoice in society; everywhere they fly together, they feed together, they do not want to be alone, they delight in communion. They burn with love, murmur with the sighs of love, generate offspring with kisses. However, as long as we are in the body, we are away from the Lord. Blessed are those who mourn! And if you want to be a dove, say to your Lord: My groaning is not hidden from you. Therefore, when doves, for we often notice this too, quarrel among themselves about their places, in a way it is a peaceful contention. Do they separate because they quarrel? They fly together, they feed together, and even this quarrel is peaceful. Observe the quarrel of doves. The Apostle said: If anyone does not obey our word by this letter, mark that one and do not associate with him. Behold the quarrel. But note that it is the quarrel of doves, not wolves. He immediately added: And do not regard him as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother. The dove loves even when she strikes. The wolf hates even when he flatters.

Therefore, having the simplicity of doves and imitating the cunning of serpents, celebrate the solemnities of the martyrs in sobriety of mind, not in drunkenness of the belly. Give praises to God. For He is our God who is also the Lord of the martyrs, He our crowner, if we have fought well, who has crowned those whom we desire to imitate.

Sermons - Sermon 64A

SERMON 64/A ON THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL, MT 10:16 "Behold, I send you as sheep" and so forth. On the Birthday of the Martyrs The final day will not harm him who thinks of every day as his last. The solemnity of the martyrs, most beloved, by which we celebrate the memory of their passion, is proposed to us for imitation, so that if any severe trial happens to occur, we may persevere until the end, so that we may be saved, just as we have heard read together from the Gospel: "He who perseveres until the end will be saved." And indeed, the end of this age is perhaps far away, perhaps near; however, the Lord wished that it should be hidden when it would happen, so that men might always be prepared to await what they do not know when it will come. But as I said, whether the end of the age is near or far, the end of each person, by which he is compelled to pass from this life into another according to his merit, due to the brevity of this mortality, cannot be far off. Each one of us, indeed, ought to prepare for his own end: for nothing will harm the last day for him who lives every day considering it as his last, so that he may die securely; while dying in this way, he may not die eternally. The holy martyrs, thinking of these things (hearing the voice of the Lord saying: "Behold, I send you as sheep in the midst of wolves!") were strengthened with such firmness, that they did not fear this! For it is evident from this how many wolves there were and how few sheep, because the wolves were not sent into the midst of the sheep, but the sheep into the midst of the wolves. Nor did the Lord say: "Behold, I send you as lions into the midst of cattle; but saying sheep into the midst of wolves, he sufficiently showed the small number of the sheep, the flocks of wolves. And while one wolf is accustomed to disturb any large flock, the sheep sent into the midst of innumerable wolves went and were not afraid; because the one who sent them did not abandon them. For why should they fear to go among wolves, when with them was the lamb who conquered the wolf? The cunning of the serpent, how it is to be understood. In that reading we heard: When they hand you over, do not worry about what you are to say; for it is not you who speak, but the Spirit of your Father speaking through you. Hence he says in another place: Behold, I am with you always, to the end of the age. Were those who heard the voice of the Lord then going to be here until the end of the age? But the Lord was considering not only those who were to pass away, but also the others, including ourselves, and those who will come after us in this life, and he saw all in his one body. Therefore, this voice, which says: I am with you always, to the end of the age, was heard not only by them, but also by us; and if we did not hear it then in our knowledge, we heard it in his foreknowledge. Therefore, let us, like sheep among wolves, securely hold his commandments, admonishing us to be as simple as doves and as wise as serpents: as simple as doves, so as not to harm anyone; as wise as serpents, so as to beware from being harmed. But you cannot avoid being harmed unless you understand in what you are being harmed. For there are those who, resisting, fight for temporal affairs: and when you reproach them for resisting so greatly, when they should rather, as the Lord himself commanded, not resist evil, they reply that they are doing what is said: as wise as serpents. Therefore, let them see what the serpent does, how it sets the coils of its body against the blows of attackers to protect its head, in which it feels it has life; how it disregards the rest of its body, however long, so that its head is not struck by the pursuer. So if you want to imitate the serpent's wisdom, protect your head. But it is written: The head of the man is Christ. See then where you have Christ, for Christ dwells in you through faith: He says, That Christ may dwell in your hearts through faith. Therefore, so that your faith may remain whole, oppose all else to the persecutor, so that that in which you live may remain unharmed. For Christ himself, the Savior, head of the whole Church, our Lord, sitting at the right hand of the Father, can no longer be struck by persecutors; yet, sharing in our suffering and demonstrating that he is in us, he cried out from heaven to Saul, who later became the Apostle Paul: Saul, Saul, why are you persecuting me? And indeed no one was touching him; but for his trampled members on the earth, he cried out from above as the head. Therefore, if through faith Christ dwells in a Christian's heart, so that this faith may be safe, that is, so that Christ may remain in the believer, whatever can be beaten or taken away by the persecutor must be disregarded, so that faith may perish for nothing other than faith itself, and not perish for those other things.

How female martyrs imitated the cunning of the serpent. The martyrs imitated this cunning of the serpent, because Christ is the head of the man, for Christ as for their head they opposed to the persecutors whatever they mortally possessed, so that they would not die there, where they lived. They held to this command of the Lord, who advised them to be as shrewd as serpents; lest, when they were ordered to be beheaded, they believed they were losing their head, but with the head of the flesh cut off, they retained the head of Christ intact. For no matter how much cruelty the tormentor may inflict on the members of the body, how much savagery he may reach with lacerated sides and torn intestines to penetrate all the interior parts of the flesh, he cannot reach our head, which he is not permitted even to see. He certainly can reach it, if he wishes, not by raging against us, but by believing as we do. But how could women, in order to deserve the crown of martyrdom, imitate this cunning of the serpent? For Christ is called the head of the man, and the man the head of the woman. Nor did they suffer for their husbands, as they overcame even the blandishments of their husbands who tried to recall them, when they were to suffer. For they also, through the same faith, are members of the Church; thus, Christ, who is the head of the whole Church, is the head of all his members. Therefore, the whole Church is called both female and male: for it is also called one virgin. The Apostle says: "I have betrothed you to one husband, to present you as a pure virgin to Christ." And it is understood as male when the same Apostle says: "Until we all come to the unity of faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, to a perfect man, to the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ." Therefore, if it is a female, her husband is Christ: if it is a male, his head is Christ. Since the head of the woman is the man, and the head of the man is Christ, when even women suffered for Christ, they fought with the cunning of the serpent for their head. Therefore, let us guard our head against the persecutors, let us imitate the cunning of the serpent; and let us groan to God for our persecutors, that we may also hold on to the innocence of doves.

Behold, I send you as sheep in the midst of wolves.

Sermons - Sermon 65

SERMO 65 ABOUT THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL MT 10:28:

"Do not be afraid of those who kill the body," and so forth.

Fear should be driven out by fear. The divine words, which have been read to us, admonish us to fear by not fearing, and not fear by fearing. You have noticed, when the holy Gospel was read, that before our Lord and God died for us, He wanted us to be firm: but admonishing that we should not fear, and admonishing that we should fear. For He says: Do not fear those who kill the body but cannot kill the soul. Behold where He warned that we should not fear. See where He warned that we should fear. But fear Him, He says, who has the power to kill both body and soul in hell. Therefore, let us fear, so that we may not fear. Fear seems to pertain to cowardice: fear seems to be for the weak, not the strong. But see what Scripture says: Fear of the Lord is the hope of strength. Let us fear, so that we may not fear: that is, let us prudently fear, so that we may not fear in vain. The holy martyrs, on whose feast this passage from the Gospel is read, by fearing did not fear: because by fearing God, they scorned men. A human need fear nothing from another human. For what is there to be feared by man from other men? And what is it that one might use to frighten another, a man to a man? He threatens, and he says: I kill you: and he does not fear, lest while he threatens, he might die first. I kill, he says. Who says this? To whom does he say it? I hear two: one threatening, the other fearing; of whom one is powerful, the other weak, but both mortal. Why then does power, puffed up with pride, stretch itself out in honor, equal in the weakness of the flesh? Let him who does not fear death threaten death with confidence. But if he fears what he threatens, let him reflect on himself, and compare himself to the one to whom he threatens. Let him find in the one he threatens an equal condition; and let him ask for mercy from the Lord together with him. For he is a man, and he threatens a man, a creature to a creature: but one is puffed up under the Creator, the other fleeing to the Creator. The persecutor should not terrify the martyr of God.

Let the strongest martyr, standing as a man before a man, say: I do not fear, because I fear. What you threaten, if He does not wish it, you do not do: but what He threatens, to do it is prevented by no one. Moreover, what you threaten, and even if you are allowed, what do you do? You rage up to the flesh, the soul is safe. You do not kill what you do not see: the visible terrifies the visible. We both have an invisible Creator, whom we ought to fear together; who created man himself from the visible and the invisible: He made the visible from the earth, He animated the invisible with His breath. Therefore, the invisible substance, that is, the soul which raised the lifeless earth from the earth, does not fear when you strike the earth. You can strike the dwelling, but can you strike the inhabitant? The link having been struck flees, and will be crowned in secret. So what do you threaten, who can do nothing to the soul? By the merit of him to whom you can do nothing, he will rise up to whom you can do something. For by the merit of the soul both flesh will rise: and will be restored to the inhabitant, now no longer to perish, but to remain. Behold, I speak the words of the martyr, behold, nor even for my own flesh do I fear the threat. My flesh is subject to power: but even the hairs of the head are numbered by the Creator. Why should I fear to lose the flesh, who do not even lose a hair? How does He not attend to my flesh, to whom my trivial things are so well known? This body which can be struck and killed, for a time will be ashes, for eternity will be immortal. But to whom is this? To whom will the body be restored to eternal life even if killed, destroyed, dissipated? To whom will it be restored? To him who did not fear to lay down his soul, since he does not fear that his flesh be killed. The soul in its own manner is immortal.

Indeed, brothers, the soul is said to be immortal, and it is immortal in its own manner: because, there is a certain life that can vivify the flesh with its presence. For the flesh lives through the soul. This life cannot die: and therefore, the soul is immortal. Why then did I say: In its own manner? Hear why. Because there is a certain true immortality, the immortality which is complete immutability: about which the Apostle speaks when talking about God: Who alone has immortality, and dwells in unapproachable light; whom no one among men has seen, nor can see: to whom be honor and glory for ever and ever. Amen. Therefore, if God alone has immortality, certainly the soul is mortal. See why I said the soul is immortal according to its manner. For it can also die. Let your Charity understand, and no question will remain. I dare to say, the soul can die, can be killed. Certainly it is immortal. See, I dare to say, it is both immortal and can be killed: and therefore I said because there is a certain immortality, that is, complete immutability, which God alone has, about whom it is said: Who alone has immortality. For if the soul cannot be killed, how did the Lord Himself say when He warned us: Fear Him who has the power to kill both body and soul in hell?

How can the soul die?

I have still confirmed, I have not solved the question. I have proven that the soul can be killed. The Gospel cannot be contradicted except by an impious soul. Behold, it occurs to me now, and it comes to mind what I will say. Life cannot be contradicted except by a dead soul. The Gospel is life, impiety and infidelity are the death of the soul. Behold, it can die, and it is immortal. How then is it immortal? Because there is always some life in it that is never extinguished. How does it die? Not that there is no life, but by losing life. Indeed, the soul is both the life of something and it also has its own life. Consider the order of creatures. The life of the body is the soul: the life of the soul is God. Just as the life, that is, the soul, is present in the body so that the body does not die: so the life of the soul, that is, God, must be present so that the soul does not die. How does the body die? By the soul departing. The body dies, I say, when the soul departs: and a little earlier the desirable body now lies down despicable. The limbs, eyes, ears are present: but these are the windows of the house, the inhabitant has departed. He who mourns the dead calls in vain to the windows of the habitation: there is no one inside to hear. How much the affection of the mourner says, how much he enumerates, how much he recalls; and through what, so to speak, madness of grief he speaks as if to one who can feel, when he speaks to one who is absent? He enumerates manners, he enumerates signs of benevolence toward himself. You are the one who gave me that; you provided this and that: you are the one who loved me so and so. If you attend, if you understand, if you suppress the madness of grief, the one who loved you has departed: in vain does the house suffer you as a knocker, in which you cannot find a dweller.

Death, both of the body and of the soul, is known by which signs.

Let us return to the issue I mentioned a little while ago. The body is dead. Why? Because its life, that is, the soul, has departed. The body lives, yet it is wicked, unbelieving, hardened to belief, inflexible to correct its morals: with the body living, the soul, through which the body lives, is dead. For the soul is such a significant thing that it is capable of providing life to the body even when dead. Yes, I say, the soul is such a significant, excellent creature that it is capable of giving life to the flesh even when dead. For the soul of the wicked man, the soul of the unbeliever, the soul of the perverse, the hardened, is dead: and yet through this dead soul, the body lives. For that reason, it is there: it moves the hands to work, the feet to walk, directs the sight to see, inclines the ears to hear; it discerns tastes, shuns pains, seeks pleasures. All these are signs of a living body, but because of the presence of the soul.

I ask the body whether it lives. It responds to me: You see it walking, you see it working, you hear it speaking, you observe it desiring and avoiding, and you do not understand that the body lives? Through these actions of the soul established within, I understand that the body lives. And I ask the soul itself whether it lives. It also has its deeds by which it shows its life. The feet walk, I understand the body lives, but through the presence of the soul. I inquire whether the soul lives. These feet walk. Behold, from one motion. I ask about the life of the body and soul. The feet walk, I understand the body lives. But where do they walk? To adultery, he says. Therefore the soul is dead. For the most truthful Scripture says: The widow who lives in pleasure is dead. While there is a great difference between pleasures and adultery, how can the soul, which is said to be dead in pleasures, live in adultery? It is dead. But even acting in this way, it is not truly dead. I hear it speaking; the body lives. For the tongue would not move in the mouth, nor produce articulate sounds unless there was an inhabitant within; and like a musician using this instrument, using its own tongue. Certainly, I understand. In this manner, the body speaks, the body lives. But I ask whether the soul also lives. Behold, the body speaks, it lives. What does it say? Just as I said about the feet, They walk, behold the body lives; and I asked, Where do they walk? to understand whether the soul also lives: so also when I hear it speaking, I understand that the body lives; I ask what it speaks to know if the soul lives. It speaks falsehood. If it speaks falsehood, then it is dead. How do we prove this? Let us ask the truth itself which says: A lying mouth kills the soul. I inquire, Why is the soul dead? What I said a little while ago, I ask, Why is the body dead? Because its life, the soul, has left. Why is the soul dead? Because its life, God, has abandoned it. The death of the soul is to be feared more than that of the body.

Briefly then, having understood these things, know and hold firmly that the body is dead without the soul, and the soul is dead without God. Every person without God has a dead soul. You mourn the dead; mourn more for the sinner, mourn for the impious, mourn for the unbeliever. It is written: The mourning for the dead lasts seven days, but for the fool and the impious, all the days of their life. Do you not indeed have the bowels of Christian compassion, that you mourn a body from which the soul has departed, and do not mourn a soul from which God has departed? Holding to this, a martyr should respond to the intimidator: Why do you compel me to deny Christ? So you compel me to deny the truth? If I refuse, what do you do? You strike my body so that my soul departs from it: but that very soul has its own body. It is not imprudent, it is not foolish. You wish to strike my body: you wish that, while I fear lest you strike my body and my soul departs from it, I should strike my own soul, and my God departs from it? Therefore, do not fear, martyr, the sword of the assailant: fear your tongue, lest you strike yourself, and kill not the flesh, but the soul. Fear for your soul, lest it dies in the fire of Gehenna. The eternal death of the body and soul, what it might be.

Hence, therefore, the Lord: "Who has the power to kill both body and soul in the Gehenna of fire." How? When the wicked is sent to Gehenna, will the body burn there, will the soul burn there? The death of the body, eternal punishment: the death of the soul, the absence of God. Do you want to know what the death of the soul is? Understand the prophet saying: "Let the wicked be taken away, so that he may not see the glory of the Lord." Therefore, let the soul fear its own death and not fear the death of its body. Because if it fears its own death and lives in its God, by not offending and rejecting Him, it will merit to receive its body at the end; not to eternal punishment, like the wicked; but to eternal life, like the just. Fearing that death and loving that life, the martyrs, awaiting the promises of God, scorned the threats of persecutors, deserved to be crowned with God, and left us those solemn celebrations to be celebrated.

Sermons - Sermon 65A

SERMON 65/A Righteous love carries upwards to the divine, impure love plunges down to the depths.

Encouraging us to love Him, the Lord began with the remembrance of those persons whom we justly love. "He who loves father or mother more than me," He said, "is not worthy of me." Therefore, if he who places his father before Christ is not worthy of Christ, how is he worthy of any trace of Christ who places gold before Christ? For there are things that are wrongly loved in the world, and when they are wrongly loved in the world, they make the lover unclean. Great is the defilement of the soul from illicit love and a burden pressing down one who wishes to fly. For as much as just and holy love lifts the soul upwards, so much does unjust and impure love sink it downwards. Every person is carried to where his own weight of love should bear him. For he is not carried to where he should not be, but to where he should be. He who loves well will be borne to where he loves, and where will he be except where the good he loves is? With what reward does the Lord Christ exhort us to love Him, except that His request to the Father be fulfilled: "I desire that where I am, they also may be with me"? Do you wish to be where Christ is? Love Christ and you will be drawn by this weight to the place of Christ. That which draws or carries you upwards does not allow you to sink down. Seek no other mechanisms for going upwards; by loving you strive, by loving you are drawn, by loving you reach your goal. You strive indeed when you struggle with unclean love; you are drawn when you overcome; you reach your goal when you are crowned. "Who will give me wings," said a certain lover, "like a dove, and I will fly and rest?" He was still seeking wings, he did not yet have them, and therefore he groaned; he was not yet rejoicing, he was still struggling, he was not yet being drawn upwards. That many loves may be overcome, one good one is necessary.

Therefore, murmurs of wicked loves surround. They entice and hold back the one desiring to fly from all sides, from all sides visible things seem to compel themselves to be loved. But let them not compel, let them be understood, and they will be overcome. The world is beautiful, it seduces with the variety of its manifold species. It cannot be counted how many illicit loves it suggests daily. With how simple a love is the manifold conquered! To conquer many loves, one love is necessary; one good against all evils. For unity conquers variety and charity conquers cupidity. He used to say: Who will grant me wings, wanting to have the means to fly to rest, because in these goods which are called good in this world one does not find rest who loves something else. A lover of the homeland has a bitter exile even in a delightful place among many things that persuade themselves to be loved. It is a great punishment not to have what you love. But you do not have what you love; you have what you may love, but you do not have what you have already begun to love. What is present that can be loved if what is loved is absent? It is a torment of the heart to love and not have. For example: someone loves their country, they have money. For the love of their country, they do not love money. If they loved money while in exile, which would be abundant for the traveler, perhaps that very money would detain them, impede their return. Say whatever you want, it impedes the return. But that one thing alone, if present, suffices, the rest are reckoned superfluous which do not help in reaching what is loved. However, if it were said to them: Money helps you to be able to return to your country, they would take it, they would use it, they would desire it, but not for itself. A ship helps you, they would desire it, but not for the ship. Sailors help, the captain helps, the one who loads provisions helps: these are taken, desired, but not for themselves. The rest are taken, one thing is loved. The rest are taken for this purpose: to reach that which is loved.

All created goods can by no means be compared with the Creator. Do we think we can say: One thing I have asked from the Lord? Now let us say it, let us say it if we can, let us say it as we can, as much as we can. See how happy is the heart already using that voice inwardly where He alone hears to whom it is said, for many say outwardly what they do not have inwardly because they glory in appearance and not in heart. Let each one see, therefore, how happy is the heart that says inwardly where it knows what it says: One thing I have asked from the Lord, this I will seek. What is that thing? It speaks of one thing either as a object or a request. What is it? That I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life to behold the delight of the Lord. This is one thing, but how good it is! Weigh this against many things. If you understand anything now, if you now seek anything from it, if you know how to yearn for it with holy desire, weigh this against many things, bear the scales of justice, place on one side gold, silver, precious stones, honors, dignities, powers, nobility, the praises of men (when will I count them all?) place the whole world; see if there is any contemplation, see if you can place these two things even for examination, the whole world with the Creator of the world.

Beautiful and good are the creatures, but the Creator is much better.

What does gold say to me? Love me. But what does God say to me? Use it, and use it in such a way that it does not hold onto me and separate from you. Whatever else says to me: Love me, it is a creature. I love the Creator. It is good which He made, but how much better is He who made it! I do not yet see the beauty of the Creator, but I see the extreme beauty of the creatures. What I do not see, I believe; by believing, I love; and by loving, I see. Let the allurements of mortal things be silent, let the voice of gold and silver be silent, let the splendors of gems be silent, finally let the enticements of this light be silent, let everything be silent. I have a clearer voice to follow, which moves me more, which excites me more, which inflames me more warmly. I do not hear the noise of earthly things. What shall I say? Let gold be silent, let silver be silent, let the rest of this world be silent.

Parents are to be loved, but by no means to be placed before Christ. The father says: Love me. The mother says: Love me. To these voices I will say: Be silent. Is it not just what they demand? Shall I not return what I have received? The father says: I begot. The mother says: I bore. The father says: I taught. The mother says: I nourished. Perhaps their voices are just, saying: You wish to be carried on his wings, debtor, do not fly; return what we have given. Let us respond to the father and mother justly saying: Love us; let us respond: I love you in Christ, not for Christ I love. Be with me in him, not I with you without him. But they say - we do not want Christ. But I desire Christ more than you. Shall I regard the parent and lose the Creator? I answer the father: You begot me driven by pleasure, he created with goodness both me and you. Is he despised because we are who he loved before we existed? Let us also say to the mother: Could you conceive, but could you also form? Could you become heavy with my flesh in your womb, but also breathe a soul into the flesh? When you carried me enclosed, did you know whether I was a female or a male? Just as you were ignorant of your burden, was God of his work? Do you dare to say: Let us not go to him, who does not hear me saying: Let us go together. I hear more, and I fear and love more. And you have not done more than he who created me in you except because he was created for me. For he through whom all things were created, was created among all things for us. Do I despise Christ by loving the mother, who as God wished to have a mother for my sake? Perhaps he wished to have a mother for that reason to have someone through whom to teach me to despise father and mother for the kingdom of heaven. The teaching and example of Christ about loving parents and relatives.

Speaking to His disciples, He says: Do not call anyone on earth your father, for One is your Father, God. Then teaching and guiding in prayer, He instructed us to say: Our Father who art in heaven. The father whom I had on earth I have placed in the tomb. I always have a Father in heaven. He said, Do not call anyone on earth your father, for One is your Father, God. It might seem harsh to impose a command without giving an example. A certain thing was said about the kingdom of heaven when His disciples were with Him, and His mother stood outside, she was announced as standing outside. I say, the mother, with her brothers, that is, with her relatives, was announced as standing outside. Which mother? The mother who conceived in faith, the mother who bore Him remaining a virgin, the faithful and holy mother was announced as standing outside. If He had left aside what He was saying and had gone to her, He would have exhibited human, not divine, affection in His heart. Do not listen to your mother calling you away from the kingdom of heaven; He despised even the good Mary for the sake of the word of the kingdom of heaven. Saint Mary, wishing to see Christ, is neglected, hindering those who hear their mother from seeing Christ? Let us recall what He replied when His mother and His brothers, that is, His relatives, were announced as standing outside. What did He respond? Who is my mother, and who are my brothers? And He, stretching out His hand towards His disciples, said: These are my brothers. Whoever does the will of my Father who sent me, he is my brother and sister and mother. He rejected the synagogue from which He was born, He found those He regenerated. If they are mother, brother, sister, who do the will of Him who sent Him, there is Mary, His mother.

Fleshly kinship and spiritual proximity; the Church is the mother and bride of Christ.

Whoever does the will of Him who sent me, he is my brother and sister and mother. You have that which allows you to be a brother of Christ, love the paternal inheritance with Him. You have that which allows you to be a sister of Christ, love the same inheritance with Him. You have that which allows you to be the mother of Christ, if you conceive in your heart what she conceived in her womb. In these names of relationships, human affection is confined. In carnal propagation, anyone cannot be a brother and mother of one person. Who does not know that it cannot be? But charity is not confined. Certainly, the Church is the spouse of Christ, the Church is the bride of Christ. We know by which sacrament the first prophecy of the first man was spoken: "They will be two in one flesh." We know how the Apostle explains this saying: "But I speak in Christ and in the Church." Therefore, if without a doubt, the Church is the spouse of Christ, yet in another way, in another sound understanding, the Church can be the mother of Christ. For if it could be said of any one individual: "Whoever does the will of Him who sent me, is brother, sister, mother," how much more can this be said of the whole Church, which daily conceives the members of Christ in catechumens and gives birth to the members of Christ from unbelievers? But you, says the Apostle, are the body and members of Christ. I ask you, O members of Christ: Who gave birth to you? You answer: Mother Church. How is Mother Church not the mother of Christ who gives birth to the members of Christ? This is the house in which He chose to dwell, who sought only one thing. How does he not honor the spouse, wishing to dwell with the spouse of Christ? How does he not honor the mother, wishing to dwell with the mother of Christ? How does he not honor the father, wishing to have the Father of Christ? Let parents not be angry. Much indeed is afforded to them to whom only God is preferred. Or if they do not want even God to be preferred to them, what do they want, what do they urge? Let us hear them. I think they do not dare to say to us: Prefer us to God. They do not say it. No one says this, not even the insane. Not even he who says in his heart: There is no God says this to his son. Therefore, no father or mother will dare to say this to be preferred to God. I do not say to be preferred, but neither to be compared. What then do they say? God has told you. What has God told me? Honor your father and your mother. I acknowledge, God has told me. Do not be angry when I prefer Him, who said this, to you. I love, I truly love, I love you too entirely. But He who taught me to love you is better than you. Only do not draw me against Him and love Him with me, who taught me to love you but not more than Him.

Parents should be loved, but Christ more.

He who loves father or mother more than me is not worthy of me. But he added: More than me. Love, he says, your parents, but not more than me. His bride cries out to you: Order love in me. Love in order, that you may be ordered. Distribute to things their proper weights and measures. Love father and mother, but you have something to love more than father and mother. If you love them more, you will be condemned, and if you do not love them, you will be condemned. Let us give honor to our parents, but let us prefer our Creator whom we love more, both by fearing and loving and obeying and honoring and believing and desiring. He who loves father or mother more than me is not worthy of me. Let parents therefore step aside a little, not rejected but honored in order. In no way do parents love the children whom they prohibit from following Christ. A man has a wife; a man has children. They cry out: Love us. Respond: I love. Say to the wife: If I did not love you, I would not have married you. Say to the children: If I did not love you, I would not have begotten you, I would not have raised you. But what is it that you want? You want to call back the martyr who is advancing towards Christ, not to abandon you, and you envy the crown of the one whom you love? Return the favor. He loves you, so love him as well. Why does he love and you hate? Behold, he denies Christ and is condemned. See what you have done. Would you wish for him whom you love to be condemned by an earthly judge? If you would will it, surely you do not love. But because you love him, you do not wish him to be condemned by an earthly judge. If he denies Christ, he is not condemned on earth, but he is condemned by Him who made heaven and earth. Why do you not fear his condemnation by a greater judge, the one whom you love? An earthly judge rages unto death. This one rages unto death; thereafter and beyond death. Why then do you act in a way that brings harm to the one you love? From whom do you call back the one you love? So that he may have hell and not have the crown. Is this love? But why do you not want him to suffer these things for Christ, you do not believe. For if you believed, you would not recall him from suffering, but you would want to suffer with him.

If separation is to be feared from a wife, much more so from the Creator.

About the children, it is easy. More compelling is the wife: She says, "Do not leave me. You will depart and I will remain a widow. God has joined us, let no man separate us." Respond to such words. Do not let them break you, do not let them corrupt you. They are unjust, they must be examined. Not because she said to you from the Gospel, "What God has joined, let no man separate," should you fear these things, so that you are separated from God while you wish to be joined to your wife. If separation is to be feared from the wife, how much more from the Creator? God has joined, let no man separate. But neither will you be separated from your wife when you precede to the crown for the name of Christ. The widow whom you desert has you as an advocate for herself, because you have not deserted her whom you left for such reasons. But if apart from the passion for Christ, you had died as human things are, would separation be said? The husband dies first and separation should not happen? Evil woman, this is not to provide for you, but to envy your husband. But you will remain a widow? Happier if you remain a widow. But you are anxious lest she be enticed by a second marriage? Indeed, second marriages are lawful, but perhaps you will also be safe from this. You are ashamed to marry, wife of a martyr. With what measure Christ should be loved beyond one's own blood relations.

Therefore, let no one love father, mother, children, or wife more than Christ. Those very things that are rightly loved, that are piously loved, in which there is sin if they are not loved, let no one love more than Christ, let no one love like Christ. If he loves thus, it is said according to the manner of love, not according to the measure. What does it mean to love according to the manner of love, not according to the measure? This means not carnally, but spiritually. But you should not love thus, that is, as much and equally. For not only is it a sin to love anyone more than Christ, but it is a sin not to love Christ more than anyone. He says, I do not love more. Behold, you do not sin. But let me hear something else. How much do you love? You answer: I love as much as my parents, as much as my spouse, as much as my children, as much as Christ. You still sin. You would have sinned by preferring, now you sin by comparing. Does it seem right to you that Christ should be loved by you as much as your father, mother, wife? Is it right for you to equate the creature with the Creator? Is it right? Where is what is proclaimed: Order love in me? Your father did not die for you, nor your mother, nor your children. If danger threatens you, they want you to live, but more for you to outlive them. If it happens that it is said to a father: Either you will die, or your son, do you think there is anyone who would say: I rather than my son? Do we think such a father, such an old man who would not rather choose a quickly ended life than one expended for his son? There are few days left to an old man, a decrepit man, a tired man, a bent man, and he does not easily want to spend those few days for the many days of his son. Already by the weight of old age he is close to the grave, he chooses to be deprived of the light than to die. What kind of light will there be after the burial of his son? How unpleasant, how sorrowful, how bitter! Yet the light is loved, the son is buried.

Render yourself to God for all His benefits.

Christ loved you before you existed; He created you; before the foundation of the world, He predestined you; already created, He nourished you through father and mother. For it was not the parents who provided you from their own. He loved you, created you, nourished you, delivered Himself for you, endured reproaches for you, received wounds for you, redeemed you with His blood. Do you not tremble and say: What shall I render to the Lord for all He has rendered to me? What will you render to the Lord for all He has rendered to you? Hear Him saying: He who loves father or mother more than Me is not worthy of Me. Hear Him speaking, fear Him terrifying, love Him promising. What have you rendered to the Lord for all He has rendered to you? Behold, now you have rendered. What have you rendered? Did you make safe as yourself? Did you bring into eternal life as yourself? Did you create as yourself? Did you make Him Lord as He made you man? What have you rendered except that it may return to you? If you think truly, you did not bestow upon Him, but you benefited yourself. Nor did you receive even this from yourself. For what do you have that you did not receive? Why do you not find what to render to the Lord? Render yourself there, return what He made to Him. Return yourself, not yours. His creature, not your iniquity.

One thing asked for: to dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of our life.

Thus imbued, thus instructed, thus educated from the law of God, seek one thing from the Lord, seek this. Nothing will be lacking, He will not deprive the good from those who walk in innocence. However, one is not innocent who is guilty in oneself. Why do you expect another to pity you, who perhaps have not yet learned it? Have mercy on your soul, pleasing to God. You wish that God would please you, but you do not wish to please God. In such a way, God cannot be pleasing to you. For then He would please you if He would support your iniquities! You thought wickedly, he says, that I would be like you. Have mercy on your soul, pleasing to God. It is not good that when you are turned away from the right, God should please you. Correct yourself. Do not wish to bend God to your will. Please God and God will please you. Be upright, lest you seek not only yourself but also God perverse. For you sit idly and shape God according to your desires. If God, he says, would do this! Oh, if He would do that! He will do nothing but good. But evildoers dislike God. How good is God to the upright in heart. Therefore let us seek one thing from the Lord, brothers. When I say to you, I say to myself. Let us all seek this one thing. Let us all hear this from the one. Let us seek one thing from the Lord, let us seek to dwell in the house of the Lord for all the days of our lives. All those days are one eternal day. When you hear: for all the days of my life, do not fear that these days will end. These days truly do not end because we do not desire a human day. Neither does one day stand with us, nor does one day last with us, all flee. Before it comes, it departs. Therefore, of this day of which we speak, how much has already passed. Nor do we hold the hour in which we are. It flees, and another comes, but even it does not stand but flees. What do you love? Comprehend what you love, hold what you love, have what you love. It neither stands nor permits standing. All flesh is grass, and all human glory is like the flower of the grass. The grass withers, the flower falls. All these things flee. Do you wish to stand? But the word of the Lord remains forever. Therefore in His Word that remains forever, stand and listen to Him, and with Him you will remain forever.

Sermons - Sermon 66

SERMO 66 On the Words of the Gospel Mt 11, 2-11:

"When John had heard in prison the works of Christ" and so forth The testimony of John about Christ. A reading from the holy Gospel has proposed to us a question about John the Baptist. May the Lord help us to solve it for you, as He solved it for us. John was praised by the testimony of Christ, as you have heard; and praised in such a way that among those born of women, no greater has risen. But greater than he was born of the Virgin. How much greater? Let the herald himself say how much the difference is between himself and his judge, whose herald he is. For John preceded Christ both in birth and in preaching: but he preceded Him by serving, not by preferring himself. For the whole office walks before the judge; and those who walk first are themselves the last. How great then was the testimony that John bore to Christ? So much so that he declared himself not worthy to unloose the strap of His sandal. What more? He said, "Of His fullness we have all received." He confessed himself to be a lamp lit by Him, and therefore fled to His feet, lest in seeking high things he should be extinguished by the wind of pride. For he was so great that he was thought to be the Christ: and if he had not testified to himself that he was not the one, the error would have remained, and he would have been thought to be the one. How humble was he? Honor was conferred upon him by the people, and he refused it. Men were mistaken concerning his greatness, and he humbled himself. He did not wish to grow by the words of men, because he had comprehended the Word of God. The testimony of Christ about John.

Therefore, John speaks thus about Christ: What does Christ say about John? Recently we heard: He began to speak to the crowds about John: "What did you go out into the wilderness to see? A reed shaken by the wind? Certainly not; because John was not swayed by every wind of doctrine. But what did you go out to see? A man clothed in soft garments? No; because John was clothed in rough clothing: for he had a garment made of camel's hair, not of feathers. But what did you go out to see? A prophet? Yes, and more than a prophet. Why more than a prophet? They foretold the coming Lord, whom they longed to see, and did not see: but for this one it was granted what they sought. John saw the Lord, he saw; he pointed his finger at him and said: 'Behold the Lamb of God, behold him who takes away the sins of the world': behold, it is he. He had now come, and was not recognized: and therefore, even in John himself there was error."

"Behold, there is he whom the Patriarchs desired to see, whom the Prophets foretold, whom the Law prefigured. Behold the Lamb of God, behold him who takes away the sins of the world." And he gave good testimony to the Lord, and the Lord to him: "Among those born of women," said the Lord, "there has risen no one greater than John the Baptist: but he who is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he; lesser in time, greater in majesty." By this he meant to be understood as himself. Among men John is very great, with Christ alone among men being greater. It can also be distinguished and resolved thus: "Among those born of women there has risen none greater than John the Baptist: but he who is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he." Not as I said a little before. He who is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater: he called it the kingdom of heaven, where the Angels are; therefore he who is lesser among the Angels is greater than John. He commended the kingdom which we should desire: he proposed the city whose citizens we should long to be. What kind of citizens are there? How great are the citizens! Whoever is least there is greater than John. Than which John? Than whom none greater has arisen among those born of women.

Difficulty: whether John doubted about Christ.

We have heard true and good testimony, both from John about Christ and from Christ about John. What, then, does it mean that John, when he was confined in prison and about to be killed, sent his disciples to Him and said to them: Go, tell Him: Are you the one who is to come, or should we expect another? Is that an entire commendation? Has the commendation turned into doubt? What do you say, John? To whom do you say? What do you say? You say to the judge, you say to the herald. You pointed the finger, you showed Him: you said: Behold the Lamb of God, behold Him who takes away the sin of the world. You said: We have all received from His fullness. You said: I am not worthy to untie the strap of His sandal, and now you say: Are you the one to come, or should we wait for another? Is He Himself not? Who are you? Are you not His forerunner? Are you not the one about whom it was foretold: Behold, I send my Angel before your face, who will prepare your way? How do you prepare the way, and you err? Then John's disciples came: and the Lord said to them: Go, report to John: the blind see, the deaf hear, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, the poor have the gospel preached to them: and blessed is he who shall not be offended in Me. Do not think that John was offended in Christ. Yet the words seem to sound alike: Are you the one who comes? Ask the works: the blind see, the deaf hear, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, the dead rise, the poor have the gospel preached to them: and do you ask if I am? My works, He said, are My words. Go, report. And as they went away, lest anyone might say: John was good at first, and the Spirit of God deserted him; hence he said this after their departure; after the departure of those whom John had sent, Christ praised John. The difficulty is resolved.

What then does the obscure question mean? Let the sun shine, from where that lamp was lit. Clearly, such a solution is evident. John separately had disciples: not separated, but a prepared witness. For it was necessary that he who himself gathered disciples and could envy Him if he could not see, should bear such witness to Christ. Therefore, since John’s disciples regarded him highly as their teacher; hearing John’s testimony about Christ, they were amazed: being about to die, he wanted them to be confirmed by Him. Without a doubt, they would say among themselves: This one says such things about Him, He does not say these things about Himself. Go, tell Him: not because I doubt, but so that you may be taught. Go, tell Him: what I usually say, hear from Him; you heard the herald, be confirmed by the judge. Go, tell Him: Are you the one who is to come, or should we look for another? They went and said; for their sake, not for John’s. And because of them, Christ said: The blind see, the lame walk, the deaf hear, the lepers are cleansed, the dead rise, the poor have the gospel preached to them. You see me, recognize me: you see the deeds, recognize the doer. And blessed is he who is not scandalized by me. But I say this about you, not about John. For that we might know that He did not speak about John: As they went away, He began to speak to the crowds about John: True praises were said by the truthful One, the Truth.

Care of the poor.

I think this question has been answered sufficiently. Therefore, it is enough to have brought the discourse to its conclusion. Keep the poor in mind: do what you have not yet done: believe, you do not lose; rather, you only lose what you do not bring to the cart. Now what you offered must be given back to the poor, you who offered: and we have much less towards the total than you usually offer: shake off laziness. I have become a beggar of beggars: what is it to me? Let me be a beggar of beggars, so that you may be counted among the number of children.

Sermons - Sermon 67

SERMO 67 On the Words of the Gospel, Matthew 11:25 "I CONFESS TO YOU, FATHER, LORD OF HEAVEN AND EARTH,"

Because you have hidden these things from the wise, and so on.

"Confession" is twofold: that of the sinner and that of the praiser. When the Holy Gospel was read, we heard that the Lord Jesus exulted in the Spirit, and said: "I give you praise, Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because you have hidden these things from the wise and prudent, and revealed them to little ones." So far for now the words of the Lord; if we consider them worthily, diligently, and, most importantly, piously, we find first that not always when we read the word "confession" in the Scriptures are we to understand the voice of a sinner. Above all, it must be said, and your Charity must be admonished from this: because soon as this word sounded in the mouth of the Reader, the sound of your breast-beating followed as well, hearing namely what the Lord said: "I give you praise, Father." In the very act that the word sounded: "I give you praise," you beat your breasts. But what is it to beat the breast except to accuse what lies hidden in the breast, and to punish the hidden sin with a manifest blow? Why did you do this, except because you heard: "I give you praise, Father?" You heard: "I give you praise;" you did not pay attention to who was confessing. Now then, note: If Christ said, "I give you praise," from whom all sin is far removed; it is not only the voice of a sinner, but also sometimes of a praiser. Therefore, we confess either praising God or accusing ourselves. Both confessions are pious, whether when you reproach yourself, who are not without sin; or when you praise Him, who cannot have sin. The confession of the sinner is itself the praise of God.

However, if we think well, your reproach is his praise. For why do you now confess in the accusation of your sin? In the accusation of yourself, why do you confess, unless it is because you have been made alive from the dead? For the Scripture indeed says: "From the dead, as if he does not exist, confession perishes." If confession perishes from the dead, he who confesses lives: and if he confesses sin, surely he has come back to life from death. If the confessor of sin has revived from death, who raised him up? No dead person is the raiser of himself. He who could raise himself was the one who was not dead in the flesh. Indeed, he raised what had been dead. He raised himself, who lived in himself, but was dead in his flesh that had to be raised. For the Father alone did not raise the Son, of whom it was said by the Apostle: "Therefore God exalted him"; but also the Lord himself, that is, his body; whence he says: "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up." But the sinner is dead, especially the one whom the weight of custom burdens, as Lazarus was buried. For it was a small thing that he was dead; he was even buried. Therefore, whoever is burdened by the weight of sinful habit, of an evil life, namely the desires of earthly things, so that in him it has already been done, as it is miserably said in a certain psalm: "The fool has said in his heart, There is no God"; such a person becomes as it is said: "From the dead, as if he does not exist, confession perishes." Who will raise him, unless the one who cried out after removing the stone, saying: "Lazarus, come forth"? What does it mean to come forth, if not to bring out what was hidden? He who confesses comes forth. He could not come forth unless he lived: he could not live unless he had been raised. Therefore, in the confession of himself, the accusation is the praise of God. The Church benefits sinners by absolving them.

Therefore, someone will say, "What benefit is the Church, if now a confessor, having been raised by the voice of the Lord, goes forth? What benefit is the Church to the confessor, to whom the Lord says: 'Whatever you bind on earth will be bound in heaven'?" Consider Lazarus himself: he goes forth with bindings. He was already living by confessing; but he was not yet walking freely, being entangled by bindings. What then does the Church, to whom it was said: 'Whatever you loose will be loosed,' do, except what the Lord immediately says to the disciples: 'Loose him, and let him go'?" To praise God: to accuse ourselves.

Therefore, whether we accuse ourselves or praise God, we praise God twice. If we accuse ourselves piously, we certainly praise God. When we praise God, we proclaim Him as the one who is without sin: when, however, we accuse ourselves, we give glory to Him by whom we have been resurrected. If you do this, the enemy finds no occasion to circumvent you before the judge. For when you yourself have been the accuser, and the Lord the liberator; what will he be, except a slanderer? Rightly did he provide protection for himself against enemies, not visible ones, flesh and blood, to be pitied rather than feared; but against those enemies against whom the Apostle urges us to arm ourselves: "For our struggle is not against flesh and blood," that is, against men whom you see rage against you. They are vessels, another uses them: they are instruments, another plays them. The devil entered, it is said, into the heart of Judas to betray the Lord. Someone says: What then did I do? Hear the Apostle: "Do not give the devil a foothold." You gave place to him by your evil will: he entered, possessed, and used it. If you had not given place, he would not have possessed. Our enemies are invisible.

Therefore, admonishing us, he says: We do not have a struggle against flesh and blood, but against principalities and powers. Anyone might think it is against the kings of the earth, against the powers of the age. Why? Are they not flesh and blood? It has been said once, not against flesh and blood. Turn away from all men. Who then remain as enemies? Against principalities and powers of spiritual wickedness, the rulers of the world. As if he gave more to the devil and his angels. He gave more and called them the rulers of the world. But lest you understand wrongly, he explains what the world is, whose rulers they are. Rulers of the world, of this darkness. What is the world of this darkness? The world is full of his ruler, his lovers, and infidels. The Apostle calls these darknesses. Of these rulers, the devil and his angels. These darknesses are not natural, they are not unchangeable: they are changed, and become light; they believe and are illuminated by believing. When this has been done in them, they will hear: For you were once darkness, but now you are light in the Lord. For when in darkness, not in the Lord: and again when in light, not in yourself, but in the Lord. For what do you have that you did not receive? Because therefore there are invisible enemies, they are to be fought invisibly. For you conquer a visible enemy by striking: you conquer an invisible one by believing. A visible enemy is a man; striking is also visible: an invisible enemy is the devil; believing is also invisible. Therefore, it is an invisible fight against invisible enemies.

Whence protection against enemies.

How does a certain person say he is safe from these enemies? For I had begun to say this, and I needed to deal with these enemies with some delay. Now therefore, with the enemies known, let us see the protection. Praising I will call upon the Lord, and from my enemies I will be saved. You have what to do. Praising, call: but praising, call upon the Lord. For if you praise yourself, you will not be saved from your enemies. Praising, call upon the Lord, and you will be saved from your enemies. For what does the Lord Himself say? The sacrifice of praise will glorify me; and there is the way where I will show him my salvation. Where is the way? In the sacrifice of praise. Do not place your foot outside this way. Be in the way: do not depart from the way; not even a nail from the praise of the Lord, let alone a foot. For if you wish to deviate from this way, and to praise yourself instead of the Lord, you will not be saved from those enemies: because it is said of them: They have laid snares for me along the path. Therefore, whatever good you think you have from yourself, you have deviated from the praise of God. Do you wonder, then, if the enemy deceives you, when you are your own deceiver? Listen to the Apostle: For if anyone considers himself to be something, when he is nothing, he deceives himself.

Grace shines forth most greatly in Christ and in the thief.

Therefore, observe the Lord confessing: I confess to You, Father, Lord of heaven and earth. I confess to You, I praise You. I praise You, I do not accuse myself. However, as it pertains to the admission of that man who is Christ, it is all grace, unique grace, perfect grace. What did that man who is Christ deserve, if you remove the grace, and such great grace, by which it was necessary for there to be one Christ, and the one we know? Remove that grace, what is Christ, but a man? What else but you? He took up a soul, he took up a body, he took up the full man: he fits it unto himself, the Lord makes one person with the servant. How great is that grace? Christ in heaven, Christ on earth: at the same time Christ both in heaven and on earth: not two Christs, but the same Christ both in heaven and on earth. Christ with the Father, Christ in the womb of the virgin: Christ on the cross, Christ in the underworld helping certain ones: and on that very day Christ in paradise with the confessing thief. And what did the thief deserve there, except that he held onto that path, where He showed his salvation? May your foot not stray from that. For in that which he accused himself, he praised God, and made his life blessed. He indeed presumed from the Lord, and said to Him: Lord, remember me when you come into your kingdom. For he considered his crimes, and held it as a great thing, if he might even be spared at the end. But the Lord immediately, when he said: Remember me; but when? When you come into your kingdom: Amen, He said, I tell you, today you will be with me in paradise. Mercy offered what misery delayed.

Faith denied to the proud.

Listen then to the Lord confessing: "I confess to you, Father, Lord of heaven and earth." What do I confess? In what do I praise you? For this confession, as I said, contains praise. "Because you have hidden these things from the wise and prudent and revealed them to little ones." What is this, brothers? Understand it from the contrary meaning. "You have hidden these things," he says, "from the wise and prudent": and he did not say: "You have revealed them to the foolish and imprudent": but he says: "You have indeed hidden them from the wise and prudent, and revealed them to little ones." He opposed to the wise and prudent, who are to be mocked, the arrogant falsely grand, but truly puffed up, not fools, not imprudent, but little ones. Who are the little ones? The humble. Therefore: "You have hidden these things from the wise and prudent." By the name of the wise and prudent, he himself explained that the proud are understood, when he said: "You have revealed them to little ones." Therefore, "You have hidden them not from the little ones." What is it, not from the little ones? Not from the humble. What is it, not from the humble, but from the proud? O way of the Lord! Either it was not, or it lay hidden, that it might be revealed to us. Why did the Lord rejoice? Because it was revealed to the little ones. We must be little ones; for if we wish to be great, as if wise and prudent, it is not revealed to us. Who are the great? The wise and prudent. "Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools." You have the remedy from the contrary. If by professing yourself to be wise you have become foolish, then profess yourself to be foolish, and you will be wise. But profess: profess and say it inwardly; because it is as you say. If you profess, do not say it before men and not say it before God. Surely, what pertains to yourself, what pertains to your own, you are in darkness. For what else is it to be foolish, but to be in darkness in the heart? Indeed, concerning those, he says: "Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools." Before they said this, what again? "Their foolish heart was darkened." Say that you are not your own light. At most, you are an eye; you are not the light. What good is an open and healthy eye, if the light is missing? Therefore say, the light is not from yourself; and cry out what is written: "You will light my lamp, O Lord: with your light, O Lord, you will enlighten my darkness." For mine is nothing but darkness: but you, the light driving away darkness, enlightening me: not being light from myself to myself; but a light not participating, except in you.

John is not the light, but the lamp.

Thus John, the friend of the bridegroom, was thought to be Christ, was thought to be the light. He was not the light; but that he might bear witness about the light. But what was the light? It was the true light. What is true? That which enlightens every man. If the true light enlightens every man; therefore also John rightly spoke, rightly confessed: But we have received from his fullness. See if he said anything else, than: You will light my lamp, O Lord. Finally, already illuminated, he bore witness. For the blind, a lamp bore witness during the day. See that the lamp is: You, he said, sent to John, and wanted to rejoice for an hour in his light: he was a burning and shining lamp. He was a lamp, that is, an illuminated thing, lit to shine. That which can be lit, can also be extinguished. But so that it may not be extinguished, let it not endure the wind of pride. Therefore: I confess to you, Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because you have hidden these things from the wise and prudent, those thinking themselves light, and they were darkness; and because they were darkness, and thought themselves light, they could not be illuminated. But those who were darkness, and confessed themselves to be darkness, were little ones, not great; they were humble, not proud. Rightly therefore they said: You will light my lamp, O Lord. They acknowledged themselves, praised the Lord, did not depart from the way of salvation. Praising the Lord they called upon, and were saved from their enemies.

Precatio.

Turned towards the Lord God the Father almighty, let us give Him the greatest and abundant thanks with a pure heart, as much as our smallness can bear; praying with all our soul for His singular meekness, that He may deign to hear our prayers in His good pleasure, expel the enemy from our deeds and thoughts by His power, multiply our faith, guide our mind, grant us spiritual thoughts, and lead us to His blessedness, through Jesus Christ His Son, Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 68

SERMO 68 FROM THE CHAPTER OF THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO MATTHEW WHERE THE LORD SAYS:

"I confess to You, Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because"

You have hidden these things from the wise and prudent.

Great silence was needed for the voice of Augustine to be heard.

We also heard this reading of the holy Gospel yesterday on the Lord's day, as you remember; but today we wished it to be read because yesterday the crowded multitude, somewhat more restless due to narrow spaces, did not grant our voice ease; since it is not such that it is sufficient unless with great silence. Therefore, today with the Lord's help, I think we should discuss what we omitted yesterday and consider it according to our small ability, not because we begrudged yesterday's multitude, but because our weak voice could not suffice for the multitude. Now, therefore, support me with your attention before our Lord God, that He may grant us what we should say, and that you may hear it healthfully.

What the literal meaning is: confession of praise and confession of fault. The Son of God, only begotten of the Father, always God, became man for us, made what He made—indeed, He became man who made man—says to the Father: "I confess to you, Father, Lord of heaven and earth." To me, the Father: Lord of heaven and earth, His Father through whom all things were made. For every creature is briefly explained by these two words, when it is said heaven and earth; therefore, the first book of God's Scripture says, In the beginning, God made heaven and earth; and, my help is from the Lord, who made heaven and earth. But by the name of heaven is understood whatever is in heaven, by the name of earth is understood whatever is on earth; thus, when these two parts of creation are named, no creature is omitted: because it is either here or there. But the Son says to the Father: I confess; and reminds us that confession is not owed to God only for sins. For often when it is heard in the Scriptures, Confess to the Lord, many who hear it strike their breast: it does not seem to them that confession signifies anything else, except that which penitents are accustomed to use, confessing their sins, expecting their merits from God, not what they deserve to suffer, but what He deigns to do mercifully. If there were no confession in praise, He would not say: I confess to you Father, who had no sin to confess. It is also said in a certain book of Scripture: Confess to the Lord, and this you shall say in confession: all the works of the Lord are very good. Here too, confession is of praise, not of guilt. Therefore, when you praise God, you confess to God; when you accuse your sins before God, you confess to God: but all this pertains to the praise of the Creator, both that you proclaim Him, and that you accuse yourself. The wise and prudent of this world, who they are. But since it pertains to his praise that you proclaim him, no one doubts it; however, how it pertains to his praise that you accuse yourself, perhaps you will ask. This is what can be briefly said and understood: when you accuse yourself in sin, you praise him who made you without sin; for if he had made you with sin, you would not blame yourself for sinning, but him for creating. Therefore, in the proclamation of God, there is praise; and your accusation is praise of God: both pertain to confession. We have heard the Son of God saying: I confess to you, Father, Lord of heaven and earth. What does he confess to him? In what does he praise him? Because you have hidden these things, he says, from the wise and prudent, and have revealed them to little ones. Who are the wise and prudent? Who are the little ones? What has he hidden from the wise and prudent, and revealed to the little ones? He refers to those wise and prudent ones whom Paul speaks of: Where is the wise? Where is the scribe? Where is the inquisitor of this age? Has not God made foolish the wisdom of this world? Even now you may still ask who these are. Perhaps they are those who, arguing much about God, have spoken false things; inflated by their own doctrines, they were least able to find and know God. Perhaps someone might say that they were those signified by the apostle Paul, who says: Where is the wise? Where is the scribe? Where is the inquisitor of this age? Indeed, let these be so: let those also be understood who were least able to know God, and for God, whose substance is incomprehensible and invisible, they thought God to be the air, the ether, the sun, or something that eminently exists in creation; for paying attention to the magnitudes and beauties and strengths of creations, they remained there, did not find the Creator, admiring the things that were made. It is not out of place to accept these as also being signified.

Less worthy of ridicule are those who believed the works of God than those who believed the works of men to be gods.

Nevertheless, dearest ones, it is more astonishing that we find in a certain place of the Holy Scripture that even those who knew were reprimanded, and their foolishness was accused, and their false wisdom was mocked. For those who did not discern the Creator from the creation are rebuked in the book of Wisdom, where it says that they thought the gods to be the circle of the stars, the sun, the moon, the rulers of the earth. And concerning these, it is said that, although they are preferred over those who worshiped idols and considered the works of men, not the works of God, to be gods, yet even they are accused so that it might be said: "Again, they are not to be pardoned." For indeed, in comparison to those who considered the works of men to be gods, surely, those who considered the works of God to be gods are better. For the craftsman made the idol; God made the sun: in comparison to someone who considers what the craftsman made to be a god, he who considers what God made to be a god is better. But nevertheless, notice how even they are rebuked, and how rightly they are accused: "Again," it says, "they are not to be pardoned; for if they had the power to understand the world, how did they not more easily find its Lord?" They are accused of spending their time and their efforts in investigating and in a way measuring the creation: they sought the courses of the stars, the intervals of the constellations, the paths of the heavenly bodies; to the extent that they reached a certain knowledge through calculations, to predict the eclipse of the sun, the eclipse of the moon, and when they predicted it would happen, it occurred on that day and at that hour, as much and in that part as they had predicted. Great industry! Great ingenuity! But when scrutinizing the Creator, placed not far from them, they did not find Him; whom if they had found, they would have within themselves. As if someone entering this building counted the columns, measured how many cubits they were, calculated the height of the roof, the width of the pavement, and the stature of the walls, and reported to you all the numbers that you did not know; but you, however, would know by whom the building was constructed, he would not know, and uncertain about the facts, he might not think this building was made by a man, but would believe those columns, that roof, those walls, existed by their own power and nature, with no maker; or he might attribute to some part of this building the power to bring forth the rest. And you, when you said: "A man made this building"; he would say: "Which man? When could a man build this structure? This high roof you see, this very roof constructed all the low things you see." I do not say he would appear foolish or delusional to you. And what would it benefit him that he could calculate the measurements of all the columns and the entire building and tell you what you did not know? A man endowed with better knowledge would know the maker of this building: for it is more significant to know that a man made it, that it was made by reason, that it was constructed by a rational mind, that counsel preceded this structure, than to know how many cubits a column is or how many columns there are, or how wide the pavement or the roof is.

See what the Creator has made; love Him who made it.

I believe that your Charity discerns these sciences. For it is not something great that you know, since you know a man made it, if you ascribe this craft to the body of the man himself. You know something great if you know it was done with counsel, a rational mind, where the craft existed before it could be seen with the eyes. For the counsel of making preceded, and then the effect followed: what you did not see preceded so that what you would see might exist. Now therefore you see the craft, you praise the counsel: you focus on what you see, you praise what you do not see; and what you do not see is greater than what you see. Therefore, they are best and most justly accused, who could investigate the numbers of the stars, the intervals of times, recognize the eclipse of lights, predict: they are rightly accused; since they did not find Him by whom these things were made and ordered, because they neglected to seek Him. But you should not greatly care, if you are ignorant of the circuits of stars and of the heavenly or earthly bodies: see the beauty of the world, and praise the counsel of the Creator: see what He made, love Him who made it. Hold this especially, love Him who made it; because He also made you, His lover, in His image. Therefore, why is it surprising, that to such wise men occupied with the creatures, who did not wish to seek the Creator neglecting Him, neither could they find Him, those things are hidden about which Christ said: You have hidden these things from the wise and prudent? It is more wonderful that you will hear, that even the wise and prudent who could know were reproved. The wrath of God is revealed from heaven, he says, upon all impiety and injustice of men, who hold the truth in iniquity. Perhaps you ask, what truth do they hold in iniquity? Because that which is known of God is manifest in them. From where is it manifest? He follows and says: For God has shown it to them. You still ask how He has shown it to them to whom He did not give the law? How then? For the invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made. Thus He revealed it, because the invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made. The book of the species of creation is great.

Another reads a book in order to find God. There is a great book, namely the very appearance of creation: observe the higher and the lower, attend, read. God did not make letters out of ink, to be known by them: He placed before your eyes the very things He made. Why seek a greater voice? The heavens and the earth cry out to you: God made me. You read what Moses wrote. What did Moses himself, a temporal man, read to write? Attend piously to heaven and earth. There were, therefore, some not like Moses the servant of God, not like the many Prophets who viewed and understood these things, assisted by the Spirit of God; whom they received in faith, drank with the jaws of piety, belched with the mouth of the inner man. Not therefore such as these. But there were others dissimilar, who through the creation were able to arrive at understanding the Creator, and to say about those things which God made: "Behold what He has made, He governs and contains; He Himself, who made, fills with His presence those things which He made." They were able to say this: For these too, the apostle Paul mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, where, when he had spoken about God: For in Him we live and move and have our being, since he was speaking to the Athenians, where these most learned men were found, he immediately added: As also some of your own poets have said. It is not a light matter what they said, for in God we live, and move, and have our being. Whence then are they dissimilar? whence are they reproved? whence rightly accused? Hear the words of the Apostle, which I began to say: The wrath of God is revealed, he says, from heaven upon all ungodliness, namely of those who have not received the law; upon all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who hold the truth in unrighteousness. What truth? Because that which is known of God is manifest in them. How manifest? For God has showed it unto them. How did He show it? For the invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even His eternal power and Godhead. Why did He show it? So that they are without excuse. If He showed it so that they are without excuse, whence then are they culpable? Because, knowing God, they did not glorify Him as God. What does it mean: “They did not glorify Him as God”? Neither were they thankful. Therefore, to glorify God is to be thankful to God. This indeed: for what is worse, if being created in His image, knowing God, you are ungrateful? This is, absolutely, this is to glorify God, to be thankful to God. The faithful know, when and where it is said: Let us give thanks to the Lord our God. But who gives thanks to the Lord except those who have their hearts lifted up to the Lord? To perceive revelation, humility is necessary.

There are among you those who hear and do not hear: but let them not be angry with us, when they differ from themselves. Therefore, they are culpable: who are inexcusable, because knowing God, they did not glorify Him as God, nor gave thanks. But what? But they became futile in their thoughts. Where did they become futile, if not because they were proud? Smoke also vanishes as it rises higher; and fire shines and is strengthened by grasping lower. They became futile in their thoughts, and their foolish hearts were darkened. Even smoke, though higher than fire, is obscure. Finally, attend to what follows, and see whence the whole cause depends: For professing themselves to be wise, they became fools. By arrogating to themselves what God had granted, God took away what He had given. Therefore, He hides Himself from the proud, who by diligently scrutinizing the creature, intimated the Creator to be nothing but Himself. Therefore, the Lord says rightly: You have hidden these things from the wise and the prudent: whether from those who, by multiple disputations and the most skillful inquiry, reached the investigation of the creature, but did not know the Creator; or from those who, knowing God, did not glorify Him as God or gave thanks, and could not see perfectly and healthily because they were proud. You have hidden these things from the wise and the prudent, and revealed them to little ones. Which little ones? the humble. He says: Upon whom shall my Spirit rest? Upon the humble and quiet and trembling at My words. Peter trembled at these words, Plato did not tremble: a fisherman holds what the most noble disputant lost. You have hidden these things from the wise and the prudent, and revealed them to little ones: you have hidden them from the proud, and revealed them to the humble. What therefore are we, no matter how much we are? If we are humble, we will merit to be blessed with the full sight of God, if we merit to be numbered among the little ones. Yes, Father, he says, exulting in the Holy Spirit - he approved, was pleased, praised it to be so, praised it so to have happened - yes, Father, because such was your good pleasure before you. The grace of Christ has eluded all the wise men of this world.

We have heard that he says: You have hidden these things from the wise and prudent and revealed them to little ones; who are the wise and prudent from whom you have hidden them, and who are the little ones to whom you have revealed them? What are these things? For when he said this: You have hidden these things from the wise and prudent and revealed them to little ones, he was not referring to heaven and earth, as if pointing to them with his hand when he said these things. For who does not see these things? The good see them, and the wicked see them too, because he makes his sun rise over the good and the bad. What then are these things, about which he says, because you have hidden these things from the wise and prudent and revealed them to little ones? What, except what he adds later and says: Yes, Father, for such was your gracious will? Here he praised, it pleased him. What then are these things? All things have been handed over to me by my Father. This Christian grace, because all things have been handed over to him by his Father, was hidden from the wise of this world. And not only those who, being overly and intensely occupied with earthly or heavenly creatures, neglected to seek and were unable to find the Creator, but also those who, from the creature and from the things that were seen, that is, from the visible, could not reach in thought to him by whom they were made, did not recognize what was said: All things have been handed over to me by my Father. Moses saw these things, the Prophets saw these things, the Patriarchs saw these things; the great wise men, the sharp disputants, inquirers, profuse thunderous speakers of eloquence, were utterly ignorant of them. This is the mystery that was hidden from ages in God, but now is revealed to his saints, his little ones, therefore his humble ones, upon whom his Spirit rests, to the quiet and those who tremble at his words: All things, he says, have been handed over to me by my Father. The better a person is, the more vehemently they desire to see God. But because among all these things we very much wish and desire to see God Himself, and we desire this as much as we are better, as much as we are more pious, as much as we are more faithful, as much as we are more instructed and firm in mental progress, this desire surpasses all desires; He addresses us gently, as if we were His little ones to whom He has given to know His grace, because all things have been handed over to Christ by His Father, so that they may not endure with difficulty because they do not see now; in order to be prepared for that vision, they endure the medicinal delay. He says, "All things have been handed over to me by my Father." And the little ones were going to say: "We wish to see the Father Himself, as Philip says: Show us the Father, and it is enough for us." As if He would say: "I know what you desire, and how little you are for so great a good: No one knows the Son except the Father. You thought you already knew me: No one knows the Son except the Father. As if, with me known, you sought to see and know the Father: Nor does anyone know the Father except the Son." Yet you will not remain separated from this vision, for it follows: and to whom the Son chooses to reveal Him. To whom will the Son reveal, if not of those of whom it is said: you have revealed them to little ones? Therefore, let us be little ones: let us ask and learn this from the great teacher. Since you are nothing, will you not be a little one, for whose sake so great became a little one? Therefore, the Father reveals the Son to whom He wills, and the Son reveals the Father to whom He wills. For the Son does not reveal the Father, and the Father does not reveal the Son. Here we have heard, here we read: Nor does anyone know the Father except the Son and the one to whom the Son chooses to reveal Him. We have learned the Son as the revealer of the Father:

how do we know the Father as the revealer of the Son? Hear the same Son. When Peter said: You are the Christ, the Son of the living God, he received the response: Blessed are you, Simon Bar-Jona, because flesh and blood did not reveal this to you, but my Father in heaven. Therefore, the Father reveals the Son, and the Son reveals the Father. How indeed do you recognize the Son unless you recognize that He has a Father? And how do you recognize the Father unless you recognize that He has a Son? For He cannot be called Father if He does not have a Son; nor can He be called Son if He does not have a Father. Therefore, if He is not the Father except because He has a Son, the Father reveals the Son. By this very thing that fatherhood is recognized in Him, the offspring is inquired; if He is the Father, you seek whom He begot: it is God Christ. If Christ is the Son, you seek from whom He was begotten: it is God the Father. Therefore, when you direct the eye of your mind, the eye of faith, to the Son, insofar as He is the Son, you recognize that He is begotten, so that He would be the Son; and thus the Son reveals the Father. But to whom, if not the little ones? From seeing God, our sins hinder us.

Why do we not see God now? Because our sins separate us from God. Therefore, if we do not see Him because our sins separate us from God, and He turns His face away from us because of our offenses, let us hear the following call through the sweat of our burdens: Come to me all you who labor. Why do you sweat in vain under sins? Come to me all you who labor. Where do you labor, if not when you desire what is not in the power of the desirer? You desired gold, you loved gold: do you have gold by loving it? What is this? What do you love? In loving, you thirst, in thirsting, you seek, in finding, you are tormented. Behold, before you find what you desire to have, before you seize it, before you have it, before you possess it, you burn with desire: this torturer eviscerates the heart, this very desire tears you apart. But for how long? Until you attain it. Behold, you have attained it. You burned with desire when you wished to have what you would possess: now you have what you fear to lose. Therefore, it is not security that follows desire, but fear joins desire as a torturer. Before you had anything, desire alone tormented you; when you began to have it, fear also tormented you. I spoke poorly, saying "followed," but another torturer joined: for initially there was the desire of having, now there remains the increase. For, it is not that a boundary was set to desire because what you sought was added to you. Do you not see that the more you have, the more you crave? When you had nothing, you sought little; but since you have become rich, inheritances do not satisfy your desires. You desire to have what you do not have, you fear to lose what you have: these two torturers strangle you. Even amidst torments, confess to your God; hear the one calling, feel the one offering, so that the torturers may depart; hear him who says: Come to me, all you who labor and are burdened. You are fatigued by diverse and tearing affections of the world, and pressed by severe burdens: I will refresh you. You were free and wandering, rushing into precipices: take my yoke upon you. Because of this desire and the difficulty of having, you were rough, and walking elevated by vain success of things: against the bitterness and against the elevation, learn from me because I am gentle and humble in heart. Do not observe each other, he says, and have arrogance among you. To be blessed, humility must be learned from Christ.

Someone says: "What if I want to have? Oh, if only I had! God, give me that I may have. Behold, my neighbor has what I do not have: he is greeted, and he does not greet; I greet in return, and he does not greet. God, give me." If you dislike him, why do you wish to be like him? He himself says: "I greet in return, and I am not greeted"; and he desires to be what he condemns. "But," he says, "when I have, not only will I greet in return, but I will also greet first." Out of desire to have, you submit yourself: but he who made you knows you better; he better advises you who does not give what is not expedient for you. Certainly, that you may have, because you rightly think you will have, will use well, and govern piously; that you may have riches, you fear labor and want. Do you wish to be blessed? Come to him who cries: I will refresh you. The only thing is that you learn what he says: Learn from me, because I am meek and humble in heart. For you look to your wealthy neighbor, having and being proud: by looking at him and emulating him, you will be proud; you will not be humble unless you look at him who was made humble for your sake. Learn from Christ what you do not learn from man: in him is the model of humility; whoever comes to him is first formed in humility itself, that he may be adorned in exaltation. For what is his appearance? Who, though in the form of God, did not consider it robbery to be equal with God; but emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, made in the likeness of men, and found in appearance as a man: he humbled himself, becoming obedient unto death, even death on a cross. He said so much, and had not yet ended the measure of his humility unless he had added: even death on a cross; for this kind of death had great opprobrium among the Jews. He took this, which had great opprobrium, that he might give a reward from that very humility to those who do not blush. How far did he go, cutting down your pride? Even to the reproaches of the cross.

How light is the burden of Christ! But perhaps as small? He who, being in the form of God. Pay attention: when have you been in the form of God? And do you blush to be humbled, for whose sake the form of God was humbled? Learn, he says, from me. You have not found out how great a foundation of your loftiness you knew: He says, Learn from me, for I am gentle and humble in heart, and you will find rest for your souls. For indeed in all your desires you seek rest: for this reason you are restless, while seeking, so that, having found what you seek, you may finally rest. You think this in vain: by finding what you wrongly seek, you will be more restless. He says, Learn from me, for I am gentle and humble in heart, and you will find rest for your souls; for my yoke is easy. Did you fear being bound? My yoke is easy, sweet; if you feared being bound, desire to be pleasantly bound. Do you not see even in the very bodies of humans seeking and desiring temporal things there are certain bindings, of which people are pleased? How difficult it is for them to allow themselves to be loosened! He who has a collar, pleases himself with the collar, which desire twists. And do you think that the yoke of Christ will strangle you? Do not fear, accept: it is easy; it restrains miserable freedom, does not bring any harshness. And my burden is light. Do not think that I will not impose something on you, if you are my beast of burden - this your Lord says to you - I will impose my burden: but do not fear, it is light; it does not weigh you down, but lifts you up; it does not burden, but honors. It is not so light, although not very heavy: as small burdens are, which when carried, the one who carries them says: "It is light"; still even the light itself, although not much, has some weight. The burden of Christ is so light that it lifts: you will not be pressed by but lifted by it; without it you will not rise. Consider this burden to be such for you as the wings are for birds: if birds have the burden of wings, they are lifted up; if they are removed, they remain on the ground. For what is heavy to a lover? Do we not see - to omit innumerable other things with which the human race boils and is worn out - how much a hunter labors, what he endures, what heats in summer, what colds in winter, what thickets of forests, what difficulties of paths, what slopes of mountains? Love, however, not only makes all these things tolerable, but even pleasant: so pleasant that, if you forbid hunting, then he labors, then he suffers dreadful mental tedium; he cannot bear rest. So much is endured to reach a boar; and it is hard to endure to reach God! The burden of Christ is called love.

Therefore Christ said this. When you heard: My burden is light, do not think about what the martyrs suffered here, and say to yourselves: "How is Christ's burden light?" Men confessed Him and suffered so much: boys confessed Him, girls confessed Him; the stronger and weaker sex, the older and younger age, all deserved to confess and be crowned. I think they did not labor. Why did they not labor? Because they endured everything with love. This is the burden of Christ, which He deigns to impose: it is called love, it is said to be love, it is named affection. Through this, whatever was most laborious before will be easy for you; through this, whatever you weighed as heavy will be light. Take up this burden: it will not weigh you down, it will lift you up; it will be wings for you, which before you have them, cry out to the one calling: Who will give me wings like a dove? - not like a raven, but like a dove, and I will fly, he says. And as if you were asking: For what? And I will find rest. Therefore through that burden you will find rest for your souls. Take up this burden, these wings; and if you begin to have them, nourish them. Let these wings reach such a measure that you may be able to fly. One wing is, You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind. But do not remain with one wing; for if you think you have one, you do not have it at all. You shall love your neighbor as yourself. For if you do not love your brother whom you see, how can you love God whom you do not see? Let the other wing come: thus you will fly, thus you will take away desire from earthly things, you will fix love in heavenly things. As you strive with these two wings, you will meanwhile have your heart lifted up; so that the lifted-up heart may in due course also lift up its flesh. And do not think that having all the wings is too much for you: indeed, the numerous precepts of this love should be sought in the Holy Scriptures, in which the reader and listener may be exercised; but on these two commandments hang all the Law and the Prophets.

Sermons - Sermon 69

SERMO 69 ON THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL MT 11:28-30:

"Come to me, all you who labor and are burdened," and so on.

Whence this labor.

We heard in the Gospel that the Lord, rejoicing in spirit, said to God the Father: I praise you, Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because you have hidden these things from the wise and prudent, and have revealed them to infants. Yes, Father, for such was your gracious will. All things have been delivered to me by my Father; and no one knows the Son except the Father, and no one knows the Father except the Son and anyone to whom the Son chooses to reveal him. We labor in crying out, you labor in hearing. Let us therefore listen to him who follows and says: Come to me, all who labor. For why do we all labor, if not because we are mortal men, fragile, infirm, carrying earthen vessels which cause mutual distress? But if the vessels of the flesh are strained, let the bounds of charity expand. What then does he say: Come to me, all who labor, except that you may not labor? Finally, his promise is at hand: because he called those who labor, perhaps they would seek by what reward they were called: And I will give you rest, he says.

Humility is the foundation of the spiritual edifice.

Take my yoke upon you, and learn from me: not to create the world, not to create all visible and invisible things, not to perform miracles in the world, and to raise the dead; but because I am meek and humble of heart. Do you wish to be great? Begin from the least. You think of constructing a great edifice of loftiness, first think of the foundation of humility. And as much as anyone wishes and plans to construct a massive building, the greater the building will be, the deeper he digs the foundation. And indeed, while the structure is being built, it rises upward: but the one who digs the foundation, digs downward. Therefore, even the structure is humbled before it becomes lofty, and the summit is erected after the humbling. To see God and to be seen by God.

What is the pinnacle of the construction we are striving to build? To what height will the summit of the building ascend? I quickly say, up to the sight of God. You see how lofty it is, how great a matter it is, to behold God. Whoever desires this understands both what I say and what they hear. The sight of God is promised to us, of the true God, the highest God. For it is a good thing to see Him who sees. For those who worship false gods easily see them: but they see those who have eyes and do not see. But to us, the vision of the living and seeing God is promised, so that we may long to see that God of whom Scripture says: He who planted the ear, shall He not hear? He who formed the eye, shall He not see? Therefore, does He who made the ear by which you hear not hear? And does He who created the eye by which you see not see? In that Psalm it appropriately prefaces and says: Understand therefore, you senseless among the people; and you fools, be wise at last. For many commit evil because they think they are not seen by God. It is indeed difficult to believe that He cannot see: but they think He does not want to. Few are found of such great impiety, that what is written is fulfilled in them: The fool has said in his heart, there is no God.

This madness is of a few. For as great piety belongs to a few, so does great impiety likewise belong to a few. But what I am saying, the crowd says: Does God now think about it, to know what I do in my house, and does God care what I intend to do in my bed? Who says this? Understand, you senseless among the people; and you fools, be wise at last. You, being a man, because you labor to know all things in your house and to concern yourself with all the words and deeds of your servants, do you think that God labors in this way to attend to you, who did not labor to create you? Does He who made your eye not gaze upon you? When you did not exist, He created you so that you might be; does He not care for you now that you exist, who calls things that are not as though they are? Therefore, do not promise this to yourself. Whether you wish it or not, He sees you; and there is nowhere you can hide from His eyes. For if you ascend to heaven, He is there; if you descend to hell, He is there. You labor, unwilling to refrain from evil deeds, and wish not to be seen by God. Great labor. Do you want to do evil daily, suspecting you are not seen? Hear what Scripture says: He who planted the ear, shall He not hear? He who formed the eye, shall He not see? Where do you hide your evil deeds from the eyes of God? If you do not wish to part from them, you labor much. The sinner must flee to God.

Hear the one saying: Come to me, all you who labor. Do not end your toil by fleeing. From whom do you choose to flee, not to him? Find where, and flee. But if you cannot flee from him because he is present everywhere, flee to God who is near to you, where you stand. Flee. Behold, by fleeing you have gone beyond the heavens, he is there: you have descended to the depths, he is there: wherever you choose in the solitudes of the lands, he who said: I fill heaven and earth, is there. Therefore, if he himself fills heaven and earth, and there is nowhere you can flee from him; do not labor: flee to the one who is present, lest you sense the coming one. Assume that by living well you will see him, by whom you are seen, even if living badly. For by living badly you can be seen, but you cannot see: however, by living well you are both seen and you see. For how much more intimately will he see you who crowns the worthy, who mercifully saw to call the unworthy? Nathanael said to the Lord, whom he did not yet know: Whence do you know me? The Lord said to him: While you were under the fig tree, I saw you. Christ sees you in your shadow: will he not see you in his light? For what does it mean: While you were under the fig tree, I saw you? What does that signify? Recall the original sin of Adam, in which we all die. When he first sinned, he made for himself girdles from fig leaves, signifying in those leaves the itch of lust, whereby he came to sin. From there we are born, we are thus born, in the flesh of sin we are born, which only the likeness of the flesh of sin heals. Therefore, God sent his son in the likeness of the flesh of sin. He came from there, but not so. For a virgin conceived him not by lust, but by faith. He came into the virgin who was before the virgin. He chose her whom he created, he created her whom he would choose. He brought fruitfulness to the virgin, he did not take away integrity. Therefore, he who came to you without the itch of fig leaves, when you were under the fig tree, saw you. Prepare to see loftily, by whom you were seen mercifully. But since it is a great height, think of the foundation. Which foundation, you ask? Learn from him, for he is gentle and humble in heart. Dig this foundation of humility in yourself, and you will reach the height of charity. Turned to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 7

sermO 7 ABOUT THE BUSH IN WHICH THERE WAS A FLAME And the bush was not consumed.

Sermon Given By the fast of the fiftieth day A great miracle. When the divine reading was read, we also awaited with our hearts the great miracle that God's servant Moses had made with great attention, and we too became attentive, considering how the fire appeared in the bush and the bush was not consumed. Then we noticed that the holy Scripture first mentioned that the angel of the Lord appeared to Moses in the bush. Then Moses was no longer speaking as if with the angel, but as with the Lord. Thirdly, we noticed that when Moses inquired about the name of God, so that he might have something to tell the children of Israel when they asked what the name of the God who had sent him was, He answered: I am who I am. And not in a passing manner, but with emphasis by repetition, He added saying: Thus you shall say to the children of Israel: He who is sent me to you. Finally, after stating His name, He further added and said: This you shall say to them: The Lord God of your fathers, the God of Abraham and the God of Isaac and the God of Jacob has sent me to you. This is my name forever. About these things, listen to the gift of the Lord. They are indeed great and like volumes of the mysteries of God, which if we try to unfold fittingly and sufficiently, neither strength nor time will suffice. The burning bush signified the people of the Jews.

Therefore, what we can briefly say is that it is not without purpose, not in vain, not without some secret significance. In the bush, there was a flame, and the bush was not consumed. For the bush is a certain kind of thorns, and it could not be praised as something the earth produced for the sinner. For it was initially said to the sinning man: The earth will produce thorns and thistles for you. Nor should we think that the fact that the bush was not consumed, that is, the flame did not take hold, is something good. For if the flame signifies something good, in which an angel or the Lord appeared - hence when the Holy Spirit came, divided tongues like fire were seen by them - we must be consumed by this fire, not, however, be not consumed because of hardness. The bush that was not consumed symbolized the people who resisted God. Therefore, the bush symbolized the thorny people of the Jews, to whom Moses was sent. And so the bush was not consumed because the hardness of the Jews, as I said, resisted the law of God. For if that thorny people were not signified, Christ would not be crowned by them with thorns. Did the Angel of the Lord or the Lord Himself appear?

However, that the same one who spoke to Moses is called both the angel of the Lord and the Lord is a great question, and it should not have a rash affirmator, but a cautious inquirer. There are two opinions that can be derived from this, any one of which may be true, both according to faith. What I said about which one of them is true, I meant what the writer sensed. For when we, inquiring into the Scriptures, feel something that the writer perhaps did not sense, we should not, however, feel anything that is contrary to the rule of faith, the rule of truth, or the rule of piety. Therefore, I propose both opinions. There may also be a third that escapes me. From these two proposed, choose whichever you will. Some say it is for this reason that he is called both the angel of the Lord and the Lord, because it was Christ, about whom the Prophet openly says that he is the angel of great counsel. For angel is the name of an office, not of nature. For an angel is called in Greek what is known in Latin as a messenger. A messenger, therefore, is the name of an action: by doing, that is, by announcing something, he is called a messenger. Who would deny that Christ announced the kingdom of heaven to us? Then a messenger, that is, an angel, is sent by the one who announces something through him. And who would deny that Christ was sent? He who so often says: I have not come to do my own will, but the will of Him who sent me, He Himself specifically was sent. For even that pool of Siloam is interpreted as "Sent". Hence, He who anointed the eyes with clay commanded to wash the face from it. For no one's eye is opened, except the one who is cleansed by Christ. Therefore, the same angel, the same Lord. The Catholic faith concerning the unity and Trinity of God. But here arises something else to be cautioned against. For there are not lacking heretics who say that the natures of the Father and the Son are different and discordant, and that they are not of one and the same substance. However, the Catholic faith believes that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit are one God, a Trinity of one substance, inseparable, equal, not confused by mixture, nor separated by distinction. Therefore, those who try to persuade that the Son is not of the same substance as the Father argue from this, that the Son was seen by the fathers. They say, "The Father was not seen; however, the invisible and visible are of diverse natures. And therefore," they say, "it is said of the Father: 'Whom no man has seen, nor can see'; so that He who was seen is not only to be believed as not the Father but understood rather as the Son, a creature, who was seen not only by Moses but also by Abraham, and not only by Abraham but also by Adam himself and the other fathers." The Catholic faith does not say this. But what does it say? God the Father, God the Son; immutable Father, immutable Son; eternal Father, coeternal Son; invisible Father, invisible Son. For if you say the Father is invisible, the Son visible, you have distinguished them, indeed you have separated the substances. How have you found grace, who have lost the faith? Therefore, this question is solved thus: God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit in their own nature are invisible. However, He appeared when He willed, to whom He willed. Not as He is, but as He willed, to whom all things are subject. For if your soul, being invisible in your body, makes a sound to appear, and the voice in which your soul appears when you speak is not the substance of your soul; the soul is one thing, the voice is another, and yet it appears in that thing which it is not. So also God, if He appeared in fire, is not fire; if He appeared in smoke, is not smoke; if He appeared in sound, is not sound. These things are not God, but they signify God. Having retained this belief, we securely believe that it could be said that the Son who appeared to Moses was called both the Lord and the Angel of the Lord. The opinion of those thinking that it was not Christ but an angel who was sent. But those who think that he was truly the angel of the Lord, not Christ but a sent angel, must explain why he is called Lord. For just as it is asked by those who declare it to be Christ why he is called an angel, so it is required from those who declare him an angel why he is called Lord. But those who say it was Christ, I have already recounted how they explain why he is called an angel; because the Prophet openly said that the Lord Christ is the angel of great counsel. Therefore, those who say it was an angel must answer why he is called Lord. They too respond: As in the Scriptures the Prophet speaks and it is said that the Lord speaks, not because the Lord is the Prophet, but because the Lord is in the Prophet, so also when the Lord deigns to speak through an angel, as through an Apostle, as through a Prophet, it is rightly said that the angel speaks of himself and the Lord because of the indwelling God. Indeed, Paul was a man and Christ God, and yet the Apostle himself says: Do you seek a proof of Christ who speaks in me? The Prophet also said: I will hear what the Lord God speaks in me. He who speaks in a man, also speaks in an angel. Therefore, the angel of the Lord appeared to Moses, and it is said to him: Lord, and he said: I am who I am. It is the voice of the inhabitant, not of the temple.

Three appeared to Abraham: what this signifies. For if Christ existed for that reason when he is called an angel, because he was one, what shall we do when three appeared to Abraham? What do we say here? Three appeared, and Abraham, speaking as if to one, says: Lord. What do we say? Why three? Was it the Trinity itself? Why then Lord? Because the Trinity is one Lord, not three Lords, and the Trinity is one God, not three gods; one substance, three persons. For neither is the Father the Son, nor is the Son the Father, nor is the Holy Spirit either the Father or the Son. But the Father is not except as of the Son; the Son is not except as of the Father; the Spirit is both of the Father and of the Son. Although some say among those three that one excelled, whom Abraham called Lord when he had appeared with two others as Christ with his angels. But what do we do, since when two were sent to Sodom appearing to Lot, brother of Abraham, he recognizes divinity in them, and although he sees two, he calls them Lord. And he in the three calls them Lord, and he in the two calls them Lord. Therefore, let us not separate the Trinity and make a duality in Sodom; I think we understand better that our fathers recognized the Lord in the angels, they understood him dwelling in the dwelling place, they did not give glory to those carrying but to the one residing. This opinion is confirmed not only by the Epistle written to the Hebrews, where it is said: For if the word spoken by angels was steadfast (for he was speaking of the Old Testament, he commended that angels spoke there but God was honored in his angels, and through the angels the inner inhabitant was heard), but also in the Acts of the Apostles Stephen says, reproaching and rebuking the Jews: Stiff-necked and uncircumcised in heart and ears - stiff-necked, unburnt thorns - you always resist the Holy Spirit. Therefore, the bush was not burned, because the Spirit of the flame was resisted by the thorns of sins. You always resist the Holy Spirit. Which of the Prophets did your fathers not kill? And where it is mentioned: You who received the law by ordinances of angels and have not kept it. If he had said “angels,” not “of angels,” there would be no lack of those who would say, “It is Christ,” because he is called the angel of great counsel. Christ is an angel, but are the angels Christ? And the Apostle Paul says that the seed of Abraham was dispensed from the Old Testament to the New. And how was it dispensed? Disposed, he says, through angels in the hand of a Mediator.

What it is: I am who I am. So now the angel, and in the angel the Lord, was saying to Moses who was asking His name: I am who I am. This is what you will say to the children of Israel: He who is has sent me to you. Being is the name of unchangeability. For all things that are changed cease to be what they were and begin to be what they were not. Being is. True being, pure being, genuine being belongs only to him who does not change. He possesses true being to whom it is said: You will change them and they will be changed, but you are the same. What does it mean: I am who I am, except, I am eternal? What does it mean, I am who I am, except, I cannot be changed? No creature, neither heaven, nor earth, nor angel, nor power, nor seat, nor dominations, nor authorities. Therefore, with this being the name of eternity, it is more that He deigned to have the name of mercy: I am the God of Abraham and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. This is in itself, that is to us. For if He only wished to be that which He is in Himself, what would we be?

Moses, if he understood, nay, because he understood when it was said to him: I am who I am; He who is has sent me to you, this much. He believed it to be much for men, he saw it to be much distant from men. For he who has worthily understood this, which is what it is and truly is, and has been touched by what light of the most true essence, even if briefly as if by a glimmer, sees himself far below, far removed, far dissimilar, as he said: I said in my trance. For having been taken up in mind, he saw something, I don't know what, that was more to Him. And this was what was true. He said, I said in my trance. What? I am cast away from the sight of your eyes. Therefore, when towards that which was said, not towards that which was seen, Moses saw himself far unequal and as if less capable, from which he inflamed with desire itself of seeing what is, was saying to God with whom he was speaking: Show me yourself. As it were, therefore, from that excellence of essence far dissimilar he might despair, He raises up the one despairing because he had seen him fearing, as if He were saying: Because I said: I am who I am; and: He who is has sent me, you understood what it is to be, and you despaired to comprehend. Lift up your hope: I am the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. Thus I am what I am, thus I am being itself, so that I do not wish to be absent from men. If in any way we can seek God and investigate Him who is, and indeed not far from each one of us: For in Him we live and move and have our being; let us therefore praise ineffably His essence and love His mercy.

Sermons - Sermon 70

SERMO 70 Again concerning the words of the Gospel Mt 11, 28-30:

"Come to me, all who labor and are burdened, and I will refresh you," and so on. The yoke of Christ.

It seems strange to some, my brothers, when they hear the Lord saying: "Come to me, all you who labor and are burdened, and I will refresh you. Take my yoke upon you, and learn from me, for I am gentle and humble of heart, and you will find rest for your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light:" and they consider those who have bravely taken up that yoke and accepted that burden with the gentlest shoulders, to be so agitated and exercised by the difficulties of this world, that they seem called not from labor to rest, but from rest to labor; as the Apostle also says: "All who want to live piously in Christ will suffer persecution." Therefore, someone says: "How is the yoke easy, and the burden light, when bearing that yoke and burden is nothing other than to live piously in Christ?" And how is it said: "Come to me, all you who labor and are burdened, and I will refresh you," and not rather, "Come, you who are idle, so you may labor"? For He also found those who were idle, whom He sent into His vineyard, to bear the heat of the day. And under that easy yoke and light burden, we hear the Apostle say: "In all things commending ourselves as ministers of God, in much patience, in tribulations, in necessities, in distresses, in stripes," etc. And in another place in the same Epistle: "From the Jews five times I received forty lashes less one. Three times I was beaten with rods, once I was stoned, three times I suffered shipwreck, a night and a day I was adrift in the deep," and other dangers that indeed can be counted, but can hardly be endured, except with the help of the Holy Spirit.

Whence the yoke of Christ is gentle.

Therefore, all those harsh and grievous things he often and abundantly endured: but indeed the Holy Spirit was present to him, who, in the corruption of the outer man, would renew the inner man day by day, and having tasted spiritual rest in the abundance of God's delights, in the hope of future blessedness he softened all present harshness and lightened all grievous things. Behold how sweet a yoke of Christ he bore, and how light a burden: that all those things, which enumerated above every listener shudders at as hard and immense, he would call a light tribulation; gazing with inner and faithful eyes at how much the future life, purchased at the price of temporal things, is worth, not to endure the eternal labors of the impious, and to enjoy eternal happiness of the just without any anxiety. Men suffer themselves to be cut and burned, so that the pains not of eternity, but of a somewhat longer-lasting ulcer, may be redeemed at the price of sharper pains. In the languid and uncertain rest of the shortest and ultimate life, a soldier is worn down by most immense wars; perhaps restless in labors for more years than he will rest in leisure. By what tempests and storms, in what horrible and dreadful severity of sky and sea, are merchants troubled, that they might acquire airy riches, filled with greater dangers and tempests than those by which they were acquired? What heat, what cold, what dangers from horses, from ditches, from precipices, from rivers, from wild beasts do hunters undergo? What labor of hunger and thirst, what hardships of the vilest and most sordid food and drink, to catch a beast? and sometimes even the flesh of the beast itself, for which they endure such great things, is not necessary for feasts. Although even if a boar or a deer is captured, it is more pleasing to the mind of the hunter that it was captured, than to the palate of the eater that it was cooked. By what torments of almost daily beatings is the tender age of children subjected? By what annoyances of wakefulness and fasting are they exercised even in schools, not for learning wisdom, but for riches and honors of vanity, that they may learn to utter numbers, letters, and eloquent deceits? By love, even the harshest things become gentle. But among these all who do not love these things, the same things suffer grievously: indeed, those who love, endure the same things, but they do not seem grievous. For love makes all fierce and monstrous things completely easy and virtually nothing. How much more certainly and easily does charity lead to true happiness, which desire has led to misery as far as it could? How easily is any temporal adversity endured, so that eternal punishment may be avoided, and eternal rest may be obtained? Not undeservedly did that chosen vessel say with great joy: The sufferings of this time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed in us. Behold from whence the yoke is sweet, and the burden light. And if it is narrow for the few who choose it, yet it is easy for all who love it. The Psalmist says: For the words of your lips, I have kept hard ways. But what is hard for those laboring, softens for those same people who are loving. Consequently, by the dispensation of divine mercy, it has been so arranged, that the inner man, who is renewed day by day, no longer placed under the Law, but already relieved under grace from the burdens of innumerable observances, which were indeed a heavy yoke, but suitably placed on a hard neck, by the easiness of simple faith, and good hope, and holy charity, whatever distress the prince who was cast out might have brought upon the outer man from without, might become light by inner joy. For nothing is so easy for good will as it is to itself: and this suffices with God. Therefore, however much this world rages, the Angels truly proclaimed at the birth of the Lord in the flesh: Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace to men of good will: because the yoke of the one who was born is sweet, and the burden light. And as the Apostle says: God is faithful, who does not allow us to be tempted beyond what we can bear; but with the temptation also makes a way out, that we may be able to bear it.

Sermons - Sermon 70A

SERMON 70/A Similarly, from the same chapter of the Gospel. ON HUMILITY All here labor and are burdened. The Word of the Lord, the trumpet of justice and truth, as if standing in the assembly of the human race, calls and says: Come to me, all you who labor and are burdened, and I will refresh you. Take my yoke upon you, and learn from me, for I am meek and humble of heart, and you will find rest for your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light. Whoever does not labor, let him not hear; but whoever labors, let him hear: Come to me, all you who labor and are burdened. Whoever is not burdened, let him not hear; but whoever is burdened, let him hear: Come to me, all you who labor and are burdened. For what reason? And I will refresh you. Everyone who labors and is burdened seeks refreshment, desires rest. And who does not labor in this world? Let it be told to me, who does not labor either by working or by thinking? The poor labor in works, the rich labor in thoughts; the poor wish to have what they do not possess, and they labor; the rich, fearing to lose what they have and wishing to increase what they do not have, labor even more. Everyone bears their burdens, which are the sins that weigh down their proud necks; and yet under such a weight they lift themselves up; and when they are pressed down by sins, pride swells. Therefore, what does the Lord say? I, he says, will refresh you. Take my yoke upon you, and learn from me. What, Lord, do we learn from you? We know in the beginning you are the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God; we know all things were made through you, visible and invisible. What do we learn from you? To hang the sky, to solidify the earth, to spread out the sea, to expand the air, to fill all elements with suitable creatures, to order the ages, to rotate the times? What do we learn from you? Or perhaps, do you want us to learn what you did on earth? Do you want to teach these things? So, do we learn from you to cleanse lepers, to cast out demons, to chase away fevers, to command the sea and waves, to raise the dead? Not these things, he says. Then tell us, what? For I am meek and humble of heart. Blush before God, human pride. The Word of God says, God says, the Only Begotten says, the Most High says: Learn from me, for I am meek and humble of heart. Such height descends to humility, and does man stretch himself forth? Gather yourself, and return yourself, man, to the humble Christ, lest in your stretching you be torn apart.

God is humble and you are proud?

Now a psalm was sung, now Alleluia was said: Who is like the Lord our God, who dwells on high and looks upon the lowly? Looking upon you, may he find you humble, lest he condemn you. He himself spoke, he himself preached, he himself called the human race to this salvation: Learn from me, he says, not to create a creature; learn that I am gentle and humble in heart. In the beginning he was: what is higher? The Word was made flesh: what is more humble? He commands the world: what is higher? He hangs on a tree: what is more humble? When he did these things for you, why do you still lift yourself up, still swell, an inflated bubble? God is humble, and you are proud? Perhaps, because he said: The Lord is high and looks upon the lowly, you say: "He does not look upon me." What is more miserable for you, if he does not look upon you, but despises you? To look upon has mercy, to despise has contempt. But perhaps, because the Lord looks upon the lowly, you think you are hidden, because you are not humble, you are high, you are proud. You are not hidden here from the eyes of God. See indeed what he says there. The Lord is high. Certainly high. How will you reach him, do you seek ladders? Seek the wood of humility, and you have reached. The Lord is high, he looks upon the lowly: but the high (lest you think you are hidden, who are proud) but the high he knows from afar. He knows, but from afar. Salvation is far from sinners. What about the lowly? from near. Wondrous device of the Almighty! He is high, and he looks upon the lowly from near; the proud are high, he knows them from afar. The Lord is near to those who have a broken heart, and he will save the humble in spirit. Therefore, brothers, let not pride swell in you, but let it rot: shun it, cast it away. Christ seeks the humble Christian. Christ in heaven, Christ with us, Christ in the underworld, not to be held, but to be freed. We have such a leader. He sits at the right hand of the Father, but he gathers us from the earth; this one in this way, that one in that way: bestowing upon him, chastising this one; making that one joyful, troubling this one. He gathers, who gathers; he gathers us, lest we perish; he gathers us there, where we do not perish: into that region of the living, where merits are recognized, and justice is crowned.

Sermons - Sermon 71

SERMO 71 On the Words of the Gospel of Matthew 12:32 "Whoever speaks a word against the Holy Spirit, it will not be forgiven."

It will not be forgiven him, neither in this age, nor in the future. OR CONCERNING BLASPHEMY AGAINST THE HOLY SPIRIT The Pharisees are warned by their own words to withdraw from the kingdom of the devil. A great question arises from the recent gospel reading; to answer which, as far as we are concerned, we are insufficient: but our sufficiency is from God, as much as we can either receive or grasp His help. First, therefore, observe the magnitude of the question: so that, when you see the burden placed on our shoulders, you may pray for our labors, and in the help provided to us, you may find edification for your minds. When a demon-possessed blind and mute person was brought to the Lord, and He healed him, so that he spoke and saw, and all the crowds were amazed, saying: "Could this be the Son of David?" But the Pharisees, hearing this, said: "This man casts out demons only by Beelzebub, the prince of demons." But Jesus, knowing their thoughts, said to them: "Every kingdom divided against itself is laid waste, and every city or house divided against itself will not stand; and if Satan casts out Satan, he is divided against himself: how then will his kingdom stand?" By saying this, He wanted to make them understand from their own confession, that by not believing in Him, they had chosen to be in the kingdom of the devil, which could certainly not stand when divided against itself. Therefore, let the Pharisees choose whatever they wish. If Satan cannot cast out Satan, they could find nothing to say against the Lord; but if he can, they should be much more concerned and withdraw from his kingdom, which cannot stand when divided against itself. The expulsion of the devil through the power of Christ. In what manner, however, the Lord Christ casts out demons, so that they do not think He does it by the prince of demons, let them observe what follows: "And if I," He says, "cast out demons by Beelzebub, by whom do your sons cast them out? Therefore, they shall be your judges." He said this, indeed, about his disciples, sons of that people, who certainly were well aware that they had learned nothing of evil arts from the good Master, such that they would cast out demons by the prince of demons. Therefore, He says, they shall be your judges. "They," He says, "they ignoble and contemptible of this world, in whom not artful wickedness, but holy simplicity of my power appears, they shall be my witnesses and shall judge you." Then He adds: "But if I by the Spirit of God cast out demons, then the kingdom of God has come upon you." What does this mean? "If I," He says, "by the Spirit of God cast out demons, your sons could not do otherwise, to whom I have given not a malignant doctrine but simple faith. Without a doubt, the kingdom of God has come upon you, whereby the kingdom of the devil is overthrown; along with it, you shall also be overthrown, unless you change."

Liberation from the devil through grace. And because He had said: "In what do your sons cast out?", to show His grace in them, not their merit: "Or how can anyone," He says, "enter the strong man's house and plunder his goods, unless he first binds the strong man and then plunders his house? 'Your sons,' He says, 'who either have believed in me, or are still going to believe, and will cast out demons not by the prince of demons but in simple holiness; who indeed were or are even what you also are, that is, sinners and ungodly, and therefore in the house of the devil and the goods of the devil; how could they be rescued from him, whom strong iniquity held firmly, unless he were bound by the chains of My righteousness, and I would plunder his goods, which were vessels of wrath, and make them My vessels of mercy?"' This is what also the blessed Apostle says, rebuking the proud as if they were boasting about their own merits: "For who makes you different?" This is: "From the lump of perdition from Adam and from vessels of wrath, who makes you different?" And so no one would say "my righteousness", "What do you have," he says, "that you did not receive?" Wherefore he also says about himself: "For we too were once naturally children of wrath, even as others." Therefore he was also a vessel in the house of that wicked one while he was a persecutor of the Church, a blasphemer, abusive, acting in malice and envy, as he confesses; but He who bound the strong man, rescued the vessel of destruction from him and made it a vessel of election. The Kingdom of Christ remains undivided even with schisms stirred up.

Then, so that unbelievers and the impious who oppose the Christian name would not think that because of various heresies and schisms of those who under the Christian name gather flocks of the lost, even the kingdom of Christ is divided against itself, he consequently adds: "He who is not with me is against me; and he who does not gather with me, scatters." He does not say: "He who is not under the sound of my name," or: "under the appearance of my sacrament," but: "He who is not with me is against me." Nor does he say: "He who does not gather under the sound of my name," but: "He who does not gather with me, scatters." Therefore, the kingdom of Christ is not divided against itself, even if men try to divide what was purchased at the price of Christ's blood. For the Lord knows who are his. And let everyone who names the name of the Lord depart, he says, from iniquity. For if he does not depart from iniquity, he does not belong to the kingdom of Christ, even if he names the name of Christ. Thus, to mention some examples: the spirit of greed and the spirit of lust, because one gathers, the other dissipates, are divided against themselves; and both belong to the kingdom of the devil. Among the idol worshipers, the spirit of Juno and the spirit of Hercules are divided against themselves; and both belong to the kingdom of the devil. The pagan enemy of Christ and the Jewish enemy of Christ, are divided against themselves; and both belong to the kingdom of the devil. The Arian and the Photinian, both heretics, and divided against each other; the Donatist and the Maximianist, both heretics, and divided against each other; all the vices and errors of mortals, contrary among themselves, are divided against themselves; and all belong to the kingdom of the devil. Therefore, his kingdom will not stand. But the just and the impious, The faithful and the unbeliever, the catholic and the heretic are indeed divided against each other; but not both belong to the kingdom of Christ. The Lord knows who are His. Let no one flatter himself with the name. If one wishes the name of the Lord to benefit him, let him depart from iniquity who invokes the name of the Lord.

Sin against the Holy Spirit, such as in pagans, Jews and heretics, is not unforgivable. But these evangelical words, even if they had some obscurity, which with the Lord's help I think has been explained, were not however of such difficulty as appears to be what follows. Therefore I say to you: Every sin and blasphemy will be forgiven men; but blasphemy against the Spirit will not be forgiven. And whoever speaks a word against the Son of Man, it will be forgiven him; but whoever speaks against the Holy Spirit, it will not be forgiven him, either in this age or in the age to come. What, therefore, will happen to those whom the Church desires to gain? Surely, is a false hope promised to those corrected and coming to it from whatever error, in the remission of all sins? For who is not convicted of having spoken a word against the Holy Spirit before becoming a Christian or Catholic? Firstly, those who are called Pagans, worshipers of many gods and false idols, when they say that the Lord Christ performed miracles by magical arts; are they not like those who said He cast out demons by the prince of demons? Then, when daily they blaspheme our sanctification, what else do they blaspheme but the Holy Spirit? What about the Jews, who said this word about the Lord, from where did this man arise? Do they not still speak a word against the Holy Spirit, denying that He is in Christians, just as those denied that He was in Christ? For neither did they malign the Holy Spirit, nor saying that He did not exist; or indeed that He existed, but was not God, but was a creature; or that He was of no power to cast out demons. They did not speak such unworthy things, nor anything similar about the Holy Spirit. For the Sadducees denied the Holy Spirit; but the Pharisees defended that He existed against the heresy of the Sadducees, yet denied that He was in the Lord Jesus Christ, whom they thought cast out demons by the prince of demons, although He cast them out by the Holy Spirit. And therefore both Jews and any heretics who confess the Holy Spirit, but when they deny that He is in the body of Christ, which is His one Church, undoubtedly Catholic; they are without a doubt similar to the Pharisees, who even then, if they confessed the Holy Spirit to exist, nevertheless denied that He was in Christ, whose works in casting out demons they attributed to the prince of demons. I omit that some heretics argue that the Holy Spirit Himself is not the creator but a creature, like the Arians, Eunomians, and Macedonians; or they entirely deny Him, so that they deny that God is Trinity, but assert that only God the Father exists, and He is sometimes called the Son, sometimes the Holy Spirit, like the Sabellians, whom some call "Patripassians," because they affirm that the Father suffered; since they deny that the Father has a Son, they undoubtedly deny that the Holy Spirit exists. The Photinians also, who say that only the Father is God, and the Son is merely a man, completely deny that the Holy Spirit is a third Person.

It is evident, therefore, that both by Pagans and by Jews and by heretics the Holy Spirit is blasphemed. Surely then are they to be abandoned and without any hope counted, since it is a fixed sentence: He who speaks a word against the Holy Spirit, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this age nor in the one to come; and are to be thought that only those are liberated from the guilt of this most grievous sin, who from infancy are Catholics? For whoever has believed in the word of God to become Catholics, certainly either from pagans or from Jews or from heretics they have come into the grace and peace of Christ; for whom, if it is not forgiven what they have spoken a word against the Holy Spirit, it is vainly promised and preached to men that they should turn to God and receive remission of sins either in baptism or in the peace of the Church. For it was not said: "It shall not be forgiven him, except in baptism", but: It shall not be forgiven him, he says, neither in this age nor in the one to come. The opinion of some concerning the sin of those baptized against the Holy Spirit is disapproved. To some it seems that only those sin against the Holy Spirit who, having been washed in the baptism of regeneration in the Church and having received the Holy Spirit, afterward immerse themselves in some deadly sin like adultery, murder, or even defection from the name of Christian or from the Catholic Church, as if ungrateful for such a great gift of the Savior. But I do not know how this sense can be proven, since a place for repentance for certain crimes is not denied in the Church, and the Apostle says to correct even the heretics for this purpose: "Lest God perhaps grant them repentance to know the truth, and they recover themselves from the snares of the devil, held captive by him according to his will." For what is the purpose of correction without any hope of forgiveness? Finally, the Lord does not say: "Whoever, being a faithful Catholic, speaks a word against the Holy Spirit," but: "Whoever speaks," that is, "anyone who speaks, whoever speaks," it will not be forgiven him, neither in this age nor in the age to come. Therefore, whether he be a pagan, or a Jew, or a Christian, or a heretic from either the Jews or the Christians, or whatever other name he has of error, it is not said: "this one" or "that one," but: "Whoever speaks a word against the Holy Spirit," that is: "blasphemes the Holy Spirit," it will not be forgiven him, neither in this age nor in the future. Furthermore, if every error contrary to the truth and hostile to the Catholic peace, as we have shown above, speaks a word against the Holy Spirit, yet the Church does not cease to correct and gather from every error those who receive forgiveness of sins and the very Holy Spirit whom they had blasphemed, I think we have shown the great mystery of this significant question. Therefore, let us ask for the light of exposition from the Lord. The most difficult question of all.

Therefore, brothers, perk up your ears to me, and your minds to the Lord. I say to your Charity: perhaps in all the holy Scriptures there is found no greater or more difficult question. Hence - to confess something about myself to you - I have always avoided the difficulty and trouble of this question in the sermons I gave to the people: not because I had nothing to think about it - for in such a great matter I would not neglect to ask, seek, knock - but because I did not think I could meet the demands of the understanding that was somewhat revealed to me with the words that came to me at the moment. However, today, hearing the readings from which the discourse was to be given to you, when the Gospel was being read, my heart was so moved that I believed God wanted you to hear something about this through my ministry. Not every blasphemy against the Spirit is unforgivable.

Therefore, first I warn you to notice and understand that the Lord did not say: "Every blasphemy against the Spirit will not be forgiven," nor did He say: "Whoever speaks any word against the Holy Spirit will not be forgiven," but rather: "Whoever speaks a word." For if He had said that, nothing at all would remain for us to discuss; because if every blasphemy and every word spoken against the Holy Spirit would not be forgiven to men, the Church would gain no one at all from any kind of impiety of those who contradict the gift of Christ and the sanctification of the Church, whether Pagans, Jews, or any heretics, and even many among the uninstructed within the Catholic Church itself. But far be it that the Lord would say this, far be it, I say, that the Truth would say that any blasphemy or any word spoken against the Holy Spirit would have no forgiveness, neither in this age nor in the future.

There is a certain blasphemy that is unpardonable.

He indeed wished to exercise us by the difficulty of the question, not to deceive us by the falsity of the sentence. Therefore, it is not necessary that anyone should think that every blasphemy or every word said against the Holy Spirit will not obtain forgiveness; but it is certainly necessary that there is some blasphemy and some word, which, if said against the Holy Spirit, will never deserve forgiveness or pardon. For if we take it universally, who can be saved? But if we consider it as none, we contradict the Savior. Therefore, there is undoubtedly some blasphemy and some word which, if spoken against the Holy Spirit, will not be forgiven. However, the Lord wanted us to inquire what this word might be; hence, He did not specify it. He wanted it, I say, to be inquired, not denied. For the Scriptures are accustomed to speak in such a way that when something is said so that it is neither completely nor partially finished being said, it is not necessary that it can be understood completely, but also not partially misunderstood. Therefore, this sentence would be universally pronounced if it were said: "Every blasphemy against the Spirit will not be forgiven," or: "Whoever speaks any word against the Holy Spirit will not be forgiven, neither in this world nor in the future." On the other hand, it would be particularly pronounced if it were said: "Some blasphemy against the Spirit will not be forgiven." Because the sentence was pronounced neither universally nor particularly (for it was not said: "Every blasphemy against the Spirit," or: "Some blasphemy," but was only said indefinitely: "Blasphemy against the Spirit will not be forgiven;" nor was it said: "Whoever speaks any word," or: "Whoever speaks some word," but indefinitely: "Whoever speaks a word"), it is not necessary to understand every blasphemy or every word, but it is indeed necessary to understand that some blasphemy and some word were intended by the Lord: although He did not wish to specify it, so that by asking, seeking, and knocking, if we receive any correct understanding, we may not hold it cheap.

Place John 15:22 about certain sin of the Jews. For a clearer understanding of this, consider what the same person said about the Jews: "If I had not come and spoken to them, they would not be guilty of sin." Indeed, it is not said as if the Jews would have been entirely without any sin if He had not come and spoken to them. He found them full and burdened with sins. Therefore, He says: "Come to me, all you who labor and are burdened." From what, if not the burdens of sins and transgressions of the Law? Because the Law entered that the offense might abound. Therefore, when He says elsewhere: "I have not come to call the righteous, but sinners," how, if He had not come, would they not have sin, unless because this statement, pronounced not universally nor particularly but indefinitely, does not mean all sin? But certainly, if we understand some sin which they would not have had unless Christ had come and spoken to them, otherwise, we would say the statement is false, which it is not. Therefore, He did not say: "If I had not come and spoken to them, they would have no sin," so that the Truth would not lie. Nor did He definitely say: "If I had not come and spoken to them, they would have had no certain sin," lest pious enthusiasm should be insufficiently exercised. Indeed, in the abundance of the Holy Scriptures, we are nourished by the clear, exercised by the obscure; there hunger is driven away, here disgust. Because it is not said: "They would have no sin," let us not be disturbed since we recognize the Jews as sinners, even if the Lord had not come. But however, because it is said: "If I had not come, they would not have sin," it is necessary, even if not all, that they contracted some sin from the Lord's coming that they did not have before. This is precisely because they did not believe in His presence and His speaking to them, considering Him an enemy because He spoke the truth, and moreover, they killed Him. This great and terrible sin, they surely would not have had if He had not come and spoken to them. Therefore, when we hear, "They would not have sin," we do not understand all sin, but some sin; likewise, in today's reading, when we hear: "Blasphemy against the Spirit will not be forgiven," not every blasphemy but certain blasphemy; and when we heard: "Whoever speaks a word against the Holy Spirit, it will not be forgiven him," we must understand not every word but a certain word.

It was said here about the Holy Spirit. For even this statement, "But the blasphemy against the Spirit will not be forgiven," certainly does not refer to any spirit, but we must understand it as the blasphemy against the Holy Spirit. Even if it were not stated more clearly elsewhere, who would be so foolish as to understand it otherwise? According to this rule of speech, the statement, "Unless one is born of water and the Spirit," is also understood. For he did not say "of the Holy Spirit" there, and yet it is understood. Nor because he said "of water and the Spirit," is anyone compelled to understand every spirit. Therefore, when you hear "But the blasphemy against the Spirit will not be forgiven," just as not every spirit, so too must not every spirit's blasphemy be understood. The other evangelists agree with Matthew on this matter.

I see that you now want to hear what that blasphemy against the Spirit is, which shall not be forgiven, and what the word is which, if spoken against the Holy Spirit, shall not be forgiven, neither in this world nor in the world to come. I also would like to say what you are most eagerly waiting to hear; but bear with some delays for greater diligence, until, with the Lord's help, I can explain everything that comes to mind. For two other Evangelists, Mark and Luke, when speaking of this matter, did not say "blasphemy" or "word", so that we might understand not every blasphemy, but a certain one, and not every word, but a certain one. What then did they say? According to Mark, it is written: "Amen, I say to you, all sins will be forgiven the sons of men and all blasphemies with which they blaspheme. But whoever blasphemes against the Holy Spirit will never be forgiven, but is guilty of an eternal sin." According to Luke, it is written: "Everyone who speaks a word against the Son of Man will be forgiven. But whoever blasphemes against the Holy Spirit will not be forgiven." Is it because of some minor difference in wording that the truth of the same sentence is abandoned? For what other reason is there that the Evangelists do not say the same things in the same way, except so that we may learn to place emphasis on things through words, not words through things, and to seek nothing else in the speaker except the will for which words are brought forward to declare? For what does it matter to the point at issue, whether it is said: "The blasphemy against the Spirit shall not be forgiven," or whether it is said, "Whoever blasphemes against the Holy Spirit shall not be forgiven," unless perhaps because the same thing is said more plainly in this way than in that, and one Evangelist does not destroy but explains another? The blasphemy against the Spirit, it is said in abbreviated form, because it is not expressed whose spirit. For not every spirit is the Holy Spirit. Again, it can be said: the spirit of blasphemy, when one blasphemes with a spirit; just as it can be said: "the spirit of prayer," when one prays with a spirit; whence the Apostle says: "I will pray with the spirit, I will also pray with the mind." But when it is said, "Whoever blasphemes against the Holy Spirit," those ambiguities are resolved. Again, what is written: "He will never be forgiven, but is guilty of an eternal sin," what is it other than what is read according to Matthew: "It shall not be forgiven, neither in this world nor in the world to come"? By different words and another mode of speech, the same sentence is expressed. And what is in Matthew: "Whoever speaks a word against the Holy Spirit," lest we understand anything other than blasphemy, the others said more plainly: "Whoever blasphemes against the Holy Spirit." Nevertheless, the same thing is said by all, nor does any of them depart from the speaker's will, for understanding which words are spoken, written, read, heard.

Difficulty in the words of Mark. But someone may say: Behold, I have received and understood that when it is said: Blasphemy, neither "all" nor "certain" is expressed, it can indeed be understood as "all," but it is not necessary; however, unless "some certain one" is understood, what is said is false. So too with the word: if "all" is not said, or "certain," it is not necessary that "all" be understood; but unless "some certain one" is understood, in no way can what is said be true. But where it is read: He who blasphemes, how do I understand "some certain blasphemy," when it is not read "blasphemy," or "some certain word" where it is not read "word," but seems to be said generally: He who blasphemes? We respond to this contradiction thus: Because even here if it were said: "He who blasphemes against any blasphemy in the Holy Spirit," there would be no reason for us to think that some blasphemy should be sought when we ought to understand "all"; but because "all" cannot be understood, lest the hope of remission be taken away from Pagans, Jews, heretics, and all kinds of people who blaspheme in the Holy Spirit by their various errors and contradictions, it remains indeed that, in what is written: He who blasphemes against the Holy Spirit, shall not have forgiveness eternally, that person is understood who blasphemes not in all ways, but in such a way that he can never be forgiven. A twofold temptation. For just as in what is said: God tempts no one, it must be understood that God tempts no one in a certain manner of temptation, lest that which is written be false: The Lord your God is testing you, and lest we deny that Christ is God, or say the Gospel is false, where we read that He asked the disciple, testing him, He Himself knew what He was going to do. For there is a temptation that leads to sin, by which God tempts no one; and there is a temptation that tests faith, by which God deems it worthy to tempt. Thus, when we hear: Whoever blasphemes against the Holy Spirit, we must not accept every kind of blasphemy, just as not every kind of temptation.

Salvation is promised to the believer and baptized.

Moreover, when we hear: "He who believes and is baptized will be saved," we certainly do not understand it in the way of the one who believes as the demons believe and tremble, nor in the number of the baptized where Simon the magician could be baptized, but could not be saved. Just as, therefore, when he said: "He who believes and is baptized will be saved," he was not looking at all the believers and the baptized, but at some; precisely those established in that faith which, as the Apostle distinguishes, works through love; so, when he said: "He who blasphemes against the Holy Spirit has no forgiveness forever," he did not intend all, but a certain guilt of blaspheming against the Holy Spirit, by which whoever has been bound will be solved by no remission ever. A certain manner of eating the flesh of Christ peculiar to the pious.

Also, that which he says: "He who eats my flesh and drinks my blood abides in me, and I in him," how should we understand this? Can we indeed accept those of whom the Apostle says that they eat and drink judgment upon themselves, even though they eat the very flesh and drink the very blood? Was Judas, the impious betrayer and seller of the master, although he first ate and drank the sacrament of his flesh and blood with the other disciples, as Luke the evangelist more clearly states, was he in Christ or was Christ in him? Many indeed who either deceitfully in their heart eat that flesh and drink that blood, or after eating and drinking subsequently become apostates, do they remain in Christ, or Christ in them? But certainly there is a certain mode of eating that flesh and drinking that blood, where one who eats and drinks in this manner abides in Christ and Christ in him. Therefore, it is not that whoever eats the flesh of Christ and drinks the blood of Christ abides in Christ and in him Christ, but in a certain mode; which manner, indeed, he himself saw when he said these things. So also, when he says: "He who blasphemes against the Holy Spirit has no forgiveness forever," it is not that whoever blasphemes is guilty of this unforgivable sin in any manner, but in a certain manner, which he intended for us to seek and understand, who uttered this true and terrible sentence.

He approaches the solution of the question. Who then is this manner of blasphemy, or rather immoderation, what is this blasphemy, and what is the word against the Holy Spirit, now, as I think, the order itself demands that we say, and let us not further defer your expectation, detained so long but necessarily. You know, dearest ones, in that invisible and incorruptible Trinity, which the true faith and Catholic Church holds and preaches, that God the Father is not the Father of the Holy Spirit, but of the Son; and that God the Son is not the Son of the Holy Spirit, but of the Father; however, that God the Holy Spirit is not the Spirit of the Father alone or of the Son alone, but of the Father and the Son; and that this Trinity, although with the individual property and substance of each person preserved, nevertheless, because of the undivided and inseparable essence or nature of eternity, truth, and goodness, is not three gods, but one God. And by this, to the extent of our capacity, as far as it is allowed for us still to see through a glass and in a riddle, especially for such as we are, authority is hinted to us in the Father, in the Son nativity, in the Holy Spirit the communion of the Father and the Son, in the three equality. Therefore, what is common to the Father and the Son, through this they wished us to have communion both among ourselves and with them, and to be gathered into one through that gift which both have in one, that is, through the Holy Spirit God and the gift of God. For in this we are reconciled to divinity, and we delight in it. For what would it profit us to know any good thing, unless we also loved it? As we learn by truth, so we love by charity, so that we may know more fully and with happiness enjoy what we know. Moreover, charity is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Spirit who has been given to us. And because we were alienated from the possession of true goods by sins, charity covers a multitude of sins. Therefore, the Father is the true source of the Son to truth, and the Son is the truth born of the true Father, and the Holy Spirit is the goodness poured out from the good Father and the good Son; however, divinity is of all of them not unequal, nor separable is their unity.

Forgiveness of sins is given through the Holy Spirit.

First, therefore, the gift comes to us from the goodness of God at the beginning of our faith: the forgiveness of sins, to receive eternal life, which will be given at the end. For as long as they remain, there remain in some way enmities against God, and alienation from Him, which is from our own evil, as Scripture does not lie, saying: "Your sins have separated you from God." Therefore, He does not bestow His good things upon us unless He takes away our evils. And the former grow to the extent that the latter decrease; nor will the former be perfected unless the latter are brought to an end. But now, that the Lord Christ forgives sins in the Holy Spirit, just as He casts out demons in the Holy Spirit, can be understood from this: after He rose from the dead, when He said to His disciples: "Receive the Holy Spirit," He immediately added: "If you forgive anyone’s sins, they are forgiven; if you do not forgive them, they are not forgiven." For that regeneration, where there is remission of all past sins, happens in the Holy Spirit, as the Lord says: "Unless one is born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God." But being born of the Spirit is one thing, and being fed by the Spirit is another; just as being born of the flesh, which happens when a mother gives birth, is one thing, and being fed by the flesh, which happens when she nurses the infant, is another—designed to drink with pleasure from where he was born so that he might live; to receive nourishment for living from where he received the beginning of being born. Therefore, the first benefit of the believers is the remission of sins by the kindness of God in the Holy Spirit. Thus also began the preaching of John the Baptist, who was sent as the forerunner of the Lord. For it is written: "In those days came John the Baptist, preaching in the wilderness of Judea, and saying: ‘Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.’" Hence also it is written of the Lord Himself: "From then on Jesus began to preach: ‘Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.'"

John also said, among other things, to those who came to be baptized by him: "I baptize you with water for repentance; but he who is coming after me is mightier than I, whose sandals I am not worthy to carry; He will baptize you with the Holy Spirit and fire." The Lord also said: "John indeed baptized with water, but you shall be baptized with the Holy Spirit, which you will receive not many days hence," up to Pentecost. But when John said: "And with fire," although it can also be understood as the tribulation that believers would endure for Christ's name, it is not inappropriate to see the same Holy Spirit signified by the name of fire. Therefore it is said on His coming: "They saw what seemed to be tongues of fire that separated and came to rest on each of them." Hence the Lord Himself also said: "I came to cast fire upon the earth." And the Apostle says: "Be fervent in spirit," because charity is inflamed by this. For it is spread in our hearts by the Holy Spirit who is given to us. The contrary to this fervor is what the Lord said: "The love of many will grow cold." But perfect charity is the perfect gift of the Holy Spirit. That earlier matter pertains to the forgiveness of sins, through which benefit we are rescued from the power of darkness, and the prince of this world is cast out by our faith, who works in the children of disobedience, by no other force than the association and bondage of sin. For in the Holy Spirit, by whom the people of God are gathered into one, the unclean spirit is cast out, who divides against himself.

Impenitence is a sin against the Holy Spirit.

Against this free gift, against this grace of God speaks the unrepentant heart. Therefore, this very unrepentance is the blasphemy against the Spirit, which will not be forgiven neither in this age nor in the future.. For he who speaks a very evil and exceedingly impious word against the Holy Spirit, by whom those baptized have all their sins forgiven, and whom the Church has received, so that to whomsoever it forgives sins, they are forgiven, calls down wrath upon himself in the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God, who will render to everyone according to his deeds, through his own hardness of heart and impenitent heart, even though the patience of God leads him to repentance. Therefore, this impenitence (for thus we can somewhat designate both blasphemy and the word against the Holy Spirit which has no forgiveness forever); this impenitence, I say, against which both the herald and the judge cried out, saying: "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand"; against which the Lord opened the mouth of the evangelical preaching, and against which He predicted that the very Gospel would be preached in the whole world; where, after He rose from the dead, He said to the disciples: "It was necessary for the Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead on the third day, and that repentance and forgiveness of sins should be preached in His name to all nations, beginning from Jerusalem," this impenitence, indeed, has no forgiveness, neither in this age nor in the one to come; because repentance procures remission in this age, which may be effective in the future.

One should despair of no one in the present life. But this impenitence, or impenitent heart, as long as anyone is living in this flesh, cannot be judged. For no one should be despaired of, as long as the patience of God leads to penance; nor does He take the impious from this life who does not wish the death of the impious as much as that he should return and live. He is a pagan today: how do you know whether he will be a Christian tomorrow? He is a faithless Jew today: what if he believes in Christ tomorrow? He is a heretic today: what if he follows the Catholic truth tomorrow? He is a schismatic today: what if he embraces Catholic peace tomorrow? What if those whom you know in any kind of error, and condemn as most desperate, repent and find true life before they end this life? Therefore, brothers, let what the Apostle says also admonish you: Do not judge anything before the time. For this blasphemy against the Spirit, for which there is never any forgiveness (which we understand not as all but as a certain kind, and that persistent hardness of the impenitent heart either mentioned, discovered or even shown as we think), as we have said, cannot be found in anyone, as long as they are still in this life. A certain objection is refuted. That it should not seem absurd, because when a man perseveres in hard impenitence until the end of this life, and speaks much and long against this grace of the Holy Spirit, nevertheless the Gospel has called such long contradiction of an impenitent heart, as if something brief, a word, saying: Whoever shall speak a word against the Son of Man, it shall be forgiven him; but whoever shall speak against the Spirit

He shall not be forgiven, neither in this age nor in the age to come. For even though this blasphemy may be extensive and woven with many words and long, Scripture frequently refers to many words as a single word. For no Prophet ever spoke a single word, yet it is thus read: "The word that came to such and such a Prophet." And the Apostle: "Elders," he says, "are worthy of double honor, especially those who labor in word and doctrine." He did not say "in words," but: "in word." And Saint James: "Be," he says, "doers of the word, and not hearers only." He did not say "of words," but: "of the word," although many words from the Holy Scriptures are read, spoken, and heard in the Church solemnly and publicly. Thus, no matter how much time any of us spends laboring in preaching the Gospel, he is not called a preacher of "words" but of "the word," and no matter how much time any of you diligently and eagerly listens to our preaching, you are called a diligent hearer not of "words" but of "the word." In the same way, as the Scriptures speak and ecclesiastical custom knows, whoever in his whole life, in which he carries this flesh, however long it may be extended, speaks any words either orally or in thought with an impenitent heart against the forgiveness of sins which is granted in the Church, he speaks a word against the Holy Spirit.

Therefore, every other blasphemy, once the sin against the Holy Spirit has been forgiven, is forgiven.

Therefore, not only will the word spoken against the Son of Man be forgiven, but every sin and blasphemy will be forgiven to men because where this sin does not exist—of an unrepentant heart against the Holy Spirit, by whom sins are forgiven in the Church—all else is pardoned. But how will this be forgiven, which even hinders the remission of other sins? Therefore, all will be forgiven to those in whom this unforgivable sin is not present; but those in whom it is present, since this is never forgiven, neither are other sins forgiven, because the remission of all is hindered by this one sin. Hence, whoever speaks a word against the Son of Man will be forgiven, but whoever speaks against the Holy Spirit will not be forgiven, not because the Holy Spirit is greater than the Son in the Trinity, which no one, not even a heretic, has ever said; but because whoever resists and blasphemes the truth, which is Christ, even after such a great proclamation of Himself among men—that the Word became flesh and dwelt among us, which is the Son of Man, the same Christ—if he does not speak that unrepentant word against the Holy Spirit, of whom it is said: "Unless one is born of water and the Spirit," and again: "Receive the Holy Spirit; if you forgive the sins of any, they are forgiven," that is, "if one repents, he will receive through this gift the forgiveness of all sins," including that which he spoke against the Son of Man; because to the sin of ignorance or stubbornness or any blasphemy, he did not add the sin of impenitence against the gift of God and the grace of regeneration or reconciliation, which is accomplished in the Church by the Holy Spirit.

Why the blasphemy of the Son is pardoned more easily than that of the Spirit.

Therefore, it must not be thought, as some suppose, that the word spoken against the Son of Man is forgiven because Christ became the Son of Man by taking on flesh, but the word spoken against the Holy Spirit is not forgiven because the Holy Spirit is greater than the flesh, which undoubtedly he is, being equal in his own substance to the Father and the only-begotten Son concerning his divinity, by which also the only-begotten Son is equal to the Father and the Holy Spirit. For if this had been said because of the flesh, certainly all other blasphemies would be left unmentioned, and only this one which is spoken against the Son of Man would seem forgivable, as if it were with the thought of him being merely a man. But since it was previously said, "Every sin and blasphemy will be forgiven men" (which is also stated similarly in another Gospel: "All sins will be forgiven the sons of men and whatever blasphemies they utter"), without doubt even the blasphemy spoken against the Father is included in this general statement; and yet it is only this one which is defined as unforgivable, which is spoken against the Holy Spirit. Did the Father take on the form of a servant, by which the Holy Spirit is greater? Certainly not. But after the universal mention of all sins and every blasphemy, he desired to emphasize more prominently the blasphemy spoken against the Son of Man; because, even if men were bound by that sin, as he remembered when he said, "If I had not come and spoken to them, they would not be guilty of sin" (which also shows in the Gospel according to John to be a very serious sin, where he says about the Holy Spirit himself, when promising to send him: "He will convict the world of sin, and righteousness, and judgment; of sin, indeed, because they do not believe in me"); nevertheless, if that hardness of an unrepentant heart does not speak the word against the Holy Spirit, even that word spoken against the Son of Man will be forgiven. To forgive sins is of the whole Trinity.

Here perhaps someone may ask whether only the Holy Spirit forgives sins, or whether also the Father and the Son do. We respond that both the Father and the Son do. For the Son Himself says of the Father: "If you forgive the sins of men, your Father will also forgive your sins." To whom we also say in the Lord's Prayer: "Our Father, who art in heaven," and among other things we ask this saying: "Forgive us our debts." Concerning Himself, however, He says: "That you may know that the Son of Man has authority on earth to forgive sins." "If therefore," you say, "both the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit forgive sins, why is that unrepentance which is never forgiven said to pertain only to blasphemy against the Spirit, as if he who is bound by this sin of unrepentance seems to resist the gift of the Holy Spirit, which by that gift the remission of sins is granted?" Where I also ask whether Christ cast out demons, or also the Father and the Holy Spirit. For if only Christ, what is it that He says: "The Father who dwells in me, He does the works"? For it is said: "He does the works," as if the Son does not do, but the Father dwelling in the Son. Why therefore does He say in another place: "My Father works until now, and I work"? And shortly after: "For whatever things He does, these the Son likewise does"? But what He says in another place: "If I had not done among them the works which no other man has done," He says it as if He alone does them. But if these things are said in such a way that nevertheless the works of the Father and the Son are inseparable, what is to be believed about the Holy Spirit except that He also works equally? For in that very place whence this question we are discussing has arisen, when the Son was casting out demons, He nevertheless says: "If I cast out demons by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God has come upon you." The power and operation of the Trinity are indivisible.

Here perhaps someone may say, that the Holy Spirit is given rather by the Father or the Son than by His own will to do anything; and that it pertains to what is said: I cast out demons in the Holy Spirit, that it is not the Spirit Himself but Christ who did it by the Spirit; so that it may be understood in this way what is said: I cast out demons in the Holy Spirit., As if it were said: "By the Holy Spirit I cast out." Indeed, the Scriptures are accustomed to speak this way: "They killed with the sword," that is, "by the sword." "They burned with fire," that is, "by fire"; and "Jesus took stone knives, with which to circumcise the sons of Israel," that is: "with which to circumcise the sons of Israel." But those who for this reason take away the proper power of the Holy Spirit should observe what is read as said by the Lord: "The Spirit breathes where he wills." However, when the Apostle says: "But all these things are wrought by one and the same Spirit," it must be feared lest anyone thinks that the Father and the Son do not work these, when he mentions gifts of healings and workings of powers in these works, where the expulsion of demons also surely is. But when he adds and says: "distributing to each one individually as he wills," does he not also manifest the power of the Holy Spirit, but clearly undivided from the Father and the Son? If, therefore, these things are so stated, so that the operation of the Trinity is understood as inseparable; so that, when the operation of the Father is spoken of, it is not understood to work without the Son and the Holy Spirit; and when the operation of the Son, not without the Father and the Holy Spirit; and when the operation of the Holy Spirit, not without the Father and the Son; it is well known to those rightly believing, or even as they can understanding, that it was said concerning the Father: "He does the works," because from Him is the origin of the works, from whom is the existence of the cooperating Persons (because the Son is born of Him, and the Holy Spirit principally proceeds from Him from whom the Son is born and with whom that same Spirit is common), and what the Lord says: "If I had not done among them the works which no one else did," it is not referred to the Father or Spirit, that they did not cooperate in those works, but to humans, by whom many miracles are read to be done, and yet none did what the Son did; and what the Apostle says of the Holy Spirit: "But all these things are worked by one and the same Spirit," it is not said because the Father and Son do not cooperate with Him, but because in these works they are not many but one Spirit, and in His various operations He is not different from Himself. The unity of the Persons, who act commonly and equally, is substantial. And yet it is said not in vain, but reasonably and truthfully that the Father said, not the Son or the Holy Spirit: "You are my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased"; but although this miracle of the audible voice from heaven pertains only to the person of the Father, we do not deny that the Son and the Holy Spirit cooperated in it. For neither because the Son, bearing flesh, was conversing with men on earth at that time, was He not also in the bosom of the Father as the only-begotten Word, when that voice came from the cloud; nor can it be wisely and spiritually believed that God the Father separated the operation of His audible and transient words from the cooperation of His Wisdom and His Spirit. Similarly, when we most rightly say that neither the Father nor the Holy Spirit, but the Son walked on the sea, as it was the flesh of that one and the feet resting on the waves; yet who would deny that in that work of such a great miracle the Father and the Holy Spirit cooperated? For thus we most truly say that the Son alone assumed that flesh, not the Father or the Holy Spirit; and yet anyone who denies that the Father or the Holy Spirit cooperated in this incarnation, which pertains to the Son alone, does not think rightly. Likewise, we say that neither the Father nor the Son, but the Holy Spirit alone appeared both in the form of a dove and in tongues as of fire and gave those in whom He came the ability to proclaim the mighty works of God in many and various languages; from which miracle, pertaining to the Holy Spirit alone, we cannot separate the cooperation of the Father and the only-begotten Word. Thus, the works of each individual in the Trinity are operated by the Trinity, with the two cooperating with the one working, in agreement in action among the three, not lacking in effectiveness in one. And because these things are thus, it is for this reason that the Lord Jesus casts out demons in the Holy Spirit. For neither could He alone fulfill this, nor did He assume that assistance as if it were insufficient for this work; but a spirit divided against itself is fittingly expelled by that Spirit which the Father and the Son have in common, not divided against themselves.

Outside the Church, sins are not forgiven.

Thus, sins are not forgiven outside the Church; they must be forgiven in that Spirit by whom the Church is gathered into one. Finally, if someone outside the Church regrets their sins yet remains unrepentant for the great sin of being alienated from the Church of God, what does such repentance benefit them? They speak a word against the Holy Spirit merely by being separated from the Church that has received the gift so that forgiveness of sins can occur within it in the Holy Spirit. Although the Trinity enacts this forgiveness, it is especially understood to pertain to the Holy Spirit. He is the Spirit of the adoption of sons, in whom we cry, "Abba, Father," enabling us to say, "Forgive us our debts." And: "By this we know," says the Apostle John, "that Christ abides in us, by the Spirit he has given us." The Spirit himself bears witness with our spirit that we are the children of God. It is to him that the society pertains which makes us into the one body of the only Son of God. Therefore, it is written: "If there is any encouragement in Christ, any comfort from love, any participation in the Spirit..." Because of this society, those into whom he first came spoke in the tongues of all nations. For it is through tongues that the fellowship of the human race is established; thus it was necessary for this society of the sons of God and members of Christ to be signified through the tongues of all nations. So, as it was evident then that one had received the Holy Spirit by speaking in the tongues of all nations, so now one recognizes that they have received the Holy Spirit by being held in the bond of peace of the Church, which is spread across all nations. Hence, the Apostle says: "Eager to maintain the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." The Holy Spirit is the Spirit of both the Father and the Son. But that He Himself is the Spirit of the Father, the Son Himself says: He proceeds from the Father, and in another place: For it is not you who speak, but the Spirit of your Father who speaks in you. But that He Himself is also the Spirit of the Son, the Apostle says: God has sent the Spirit of His Son into our hearts, crying: Abba, Father, that is, "causing to cry." For we cry out, but in Him, that is, He who pours out love into our hearts, without which anyone who cries out cries in vain. Hence he also says: But if anyone does not have the Spirit of Christ, he is not His. To whom, then, in the Trinity would the communion of this fellowship properly belong, if not to that Spirit who is common to the Father and the Son?

Outside the Church there is no Holy Spirit. This Spirit, which those do not have who are separated from the Church, the apostle Judas very clearly declared, saying: "These are they who separate themselves, sensual, having not the Spirit." Hence, also, the apostle Paul, reproving those who in the Church were attempting certain schisms under the names of men, although constituted in its unity, among other things says: "But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God. For they are foolishness unto him, and he cannot know them, because they are spiritually discerned." He shows what he meant by "receiveth not," that is, "he does not comprehend the word of knowledge." He calls those in the Church who are still infants, not yet spiritual, but carnal, and to be fed with milk, not with solid food. As to infants, he says, in Christ, "I have fed you with milk, not with meat; for ye were not able, neither yet now are ye able." Where it says "not yet" or "not as yet," there certainly is no despair, if the direction is that what is not yet may someday be. For he says, "ye are yet carnal." And showing whence they are carnal: "For whereas there is among you envying and strife, are ye not carnal, and walk as men?" And more plainly exposing this: "For when one says, 'I am of Paul,' and another, 'I am of Apollos,' are ye not carnal?" What then is Apollos? And what is Paul? "Ministers by whom ye believed." These, therefore, that is, Paul and Apollos, were united in the unity of the Spirit and the bond of peace: yet because these people began to divide them among themselves and to be puffed up for one against another, they are called men, and carnal, and natural, not being able to receive the things of the Spirit of God; and yet, because they are not separated from the Church, they are called infants in Christ; whom certainly he desired to become angels or gods, though he reproved them for being men, that is, in these contentions savoring not the things of God but the things of men. But of those who are separated from the Church, it is not said: "They do not receive the things of the Spirit," lest it should be referred to the perception of knowledge; but it is said, "not having the Spirit." Yet it does not follow that he who has the Spirit also comprehends by knowledge what he possesses.

Little ones in Christ, having the Spirit, do not yet perceive the things of the Spirit.

Therefore, those who are children in Christ, still natural and carnal, have this Spirit in the Church, though they are unable to comprehend what they have, that is, to understand and know it. For how could they be children in Christ unless they were reborn from the Holy Spirit? And it should not seem strange that someone has something and does not know what they have. For, to say nothing of the divinity of the Almighty and the unity of the immutable Trinity, who can easily grasp what the soul is with knowledge? And who does not have a soul? Finally, to know with absolute certainty that children in Christ, not comprehending the things of the Spirit of God, still have the Spirit of God; let us look a little later at how he scolds them, saying: “Do you not know that you are the temple of God and that the Spirit of God dwells in you?” Surely he would not say this to those segregated from the Church, who are said to not have the Spirit.

False Catholics, heretics, and schismatics do not have the Holy Spirit. But neither can it be said that he is in the Church or pertains to this society of the Spirit who, with a feigned heart, mingles with the sheep of Christ only by bodily mixture. For the Holy Spirit of discipline will flee from the feigned. Therefore, whoever is baptized in schismatic or heretical gatherings, or rather segregations, although they are not reborn of the Spirit, like Ishmael, who was born according to the flesh of Abraham, not like Isaac, who was according to the Spirit, because of the promise, nevertheless, when they come to the Catholic Church and are added to the society of the Spirit, which they undoubtedly did not have outside, the washing of the flesh is not repeated for them. For even outside they did not lack this form of piety, but what is added to them, which cannot be given unless within, is the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. For such were they before they were Catholics, of whom the Apostle says: Having a form of godliness, but denying its power. For indeed, the visible form of a branch can be, even outside the vine; but the invisible life cannot have roots unless in the vine. Thus, the bodily sacraments, which are carried and celebrated even by those separated from the unity of the body of Christ, can exhibit the form of piety; but the invisible and spiritual power of piety cannot be in them, just as sensation does not follow a member of a man when it is severed from the body. The remission of sins does not occur outside the Church.

Since these things are so, the forgiveness of sins—since it is not given except in the Holy Spirit—can only be given in that Church which has the Holy Spirit. For this is done by the forgiveness of sins, so that the prince of sin, the spirit who is divided against himself, does not reign in us; so that, having been rescued from the power of the unclean spirit, we may henceforth be made a temple of the Holy Spirit; and from Him by whom we are cleansed by accepting indulgence, we receive Him as the inhabitant to create, increase, and perfect righteousness. For even at His first coming, when those who had received Him spoke in the tongues of all nations, and the apostle Peter addressed those who were astonished and pricked in the heart, they said to Peter and the Apostles: "What then shall we do, brothers? Show us." And Peter said to them: "Repent, and each one of you be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and you will receive the gift of the Holy Spirit." Certainly, in the Church, both things were done, that is, the remission of sins and the reception of this gift, in which the Holy Spirit was. But they did this in the name of Jesus Christ, because when He was promising the same Holy Spirit, He said: "Whom the Father will send in My name." For the Holy Spirit does not dwell in anyone without the Father and the Son, just as neither the Son without the Father and the Holy Spirit, nor the Father without them. Indeed, Their habitation is inseparable, as is Their operation; but often, They are shown individually through the signs of creation, not through Their substance; just as the spacings of time occupy syllables pronounced separately by voice, yet are not separated by any intervals and moments of time. For They can never be said together, since They can only always be together. But, as we have often said, the remission of sins, by which the divided spirit is overthrown and the kingdom is expelled, and the unity of the Church of God, outside of which there is no remission of sins, is, as it were, the proper work of the Holy Spirit, with the Father and the Son certainly cooperating, because the Holy Spirit Himself is, in a certain way, the association of the Father and the Son. For the Father is not commonly considered Father by the Son and the Holy Spirit, because He is not the Father of both; and the Son is not commonly considered Son by the Father and the Holy Spirit, because He is not the Son of both; but the Holy Spirit is commonly considered by the Father and the Son, because He is the Spirit of both.

It is suggested from Luke that impenitence is to be understood by the name of unforgivable blasphemy.

Therefore, whoever is guilty of impenitence against the Spirit, in which the unity and society of the church's communion are gathered, will never be forgiven; because he has closed himself off from what forgives; and he will deservedly be condemned with the spirit that is divided against itself, and he is also divided against the Holy Spirit who is not divided against Himself. The very testimonies of the gospel warn us of this, if we scrutinize them carefully. For according to Luke, the Lord does not say this where He responded to those who said that He casts out demons by the prince of demons, that it will not be forgiven to the one who blasphemes against the Holy Spirit. Hence it is clear, that this was not said only once by the Lord. But also it should not be negligently overlooked where it was said. For He was speaking of those who confessed Him or denied Him before men, where He said: But I say to you, Whoever confesses Me before men, the Son of Man will also confess him before the angels of God; but whoever denies Me before men will be denied before the angels of God. And so that the salvation of the apostle Peter, who denied Him three times before men, might not be despaired of, He immediately added: And everyone who speaks a word against the Son of Man will be forgiven; but the one who blasphemes against the Holy Spirit will not be forgiven. This is, indeed, the blasphemy of the impenitent heart, which resists the forgiveness of sins, which happens in the Church through the Holy Spirit. Peter did not have this blasphemy, whom soon repented when he wept bitterly, and, having overcome the spirit which was divided against itself, and which had asked for him to be tormented, against which the Lord prayed for him, so that his faith would not fail, he received even the Holy Spirit, to whom he did not resist, so that not only his sin would be forgiven, but through him, the forgiveness of sins would be preached and given. From the other two Evangelists, the same is implied.

Among the other two Evangelists, the cause for the statement about the blasphemy of the Spirit being made was the mention of the unclean spirit which is divided against itself. For it had been said about the Lord that He cast out demons by the prince of demons; there the Lord said that He casts out demons by the Holy Spirit, so that the Spirit, who is not divided against Himself, may overcome and cast out the one who is divided against himself; but that man remains in his perdition, who refuses to pass into the peace of Him who is not divided against Himself through unrepentance. For Mark narrates it thus: "Verily I say unto you, all sins shall be forgiven unto men and blasphemies whatsoever they shall blaspheme; but he that shall blaspheme against the Holy Spirit hath never forgiveness, but is in danger of eternal damnation." After these words of the Lord, he then added, saying: "Because they said he hath an unclean spirit," to show that this was the cause for His statement, since they had said He cast out demons by Beelzebub, the prince of the demons. Not that there is a blasphemy that is not forgiven, since even this shall be forgiven if proper repentance follows; but that, as I said, the cause was the mention of the unclean spirit, which the Lord showed to be divided against itself, because of the Holy Spirit, who is not only not divided against Himself but also makes those indivisible whom He gathers, forgiving sins that are divided against themselves and dwelling in the cleansed; so that it may be, as it is written in the Acts of the Apostles, "the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul." This gift of forgiveness is resisted only by one who has the hardness of an unrepentant heart. For in another passage the Jews also said about the Lord that He had a demon; yet there He said nothing about the blasphemy of the Holy Spirit: because they did not so object to an unclean spirit, that could be shown to be divided against itself from their speech, as Beelzebub by whom they said He was casting out demons. To resist the unity of the Church with an impenitent heart is an unforgivable blasphemy. In this particular reading according to Matthew, the Lord revealed much more clearly what he wished to be understood here; that is, that he who speaks a word against the Holy Spirit resists the unity of the Church with an unrepentant heart, wherein the forgiveness of sins is performed by the Holy Spirit. For, as has already been said, those who, although carrying and handling the sacraments of Christ, are separated from his congregation, do not have this Spirit. For where he spoke about the division of Satan against Satan, and that he himself cast out demons in the Holy Spirit, certainly in the Spirit who is not against himself, as he is divided; there immediately, lest anyone might think, through those who under the name of Christ gather conventicles outside of his flock, that even the kingdom of Christ is divided against itself: He said, "He who is not with me is against me; and he who does not gather with me, scatters"; to show that those who prefer to gather outside, do not gather but scatter. Then he added: "Therefore I say to you: Every sin and blasphemy will be forgiven to men; but blasphemy against the Spirit will not be forgiven." What is this? Therefore, is the blasphemy against the Spirit unforgivable because he who is not with Christ is against him; and he who does not gather with him, scatters? Indeed, truly. For he who does not gather with him, however he may gather under his name, does not have the Holy Spirit.

Congregations outside the Church do not have the Holy Spirit by which sins are forgiven.

Here absolutely, here we are compelled to understand that the remission of all sins and all blasphemy can only be possible in the congregation of Christ, which does not scatter. For it is gathered in the Holy Spirit, who is not divided against himself, unlike that unclean spirit. And therefore, all congregations, or rather dispersions, which call themselves churches of Christ, and are divided among themselves and contrary to each other, and hostile to the gathering in unity which is the true Church of Christ, do not pertain to his congregation just because they seem to bear its name. However, they would pertain if the Holy Spirit, in whom this congregation is united, were divided against himself. But since this is not so (for whoever is not with Christ is against him; and whoever does not gather with him, scatters), therefore every sin and blasphemy will be forgiven to men in this congregation, which Christ gathers in the Holy Spirit and not divided against himself; however, the blasphemy against the Spirit, which consists in resisting this great gift of God with an unrepentant heart until the end of this life, will not be forgiven. For if anyone is so opposed to the truth that he resists God speaking not through the Prophets but in his only Son (since for our sake he willed to be the Son of Man to speak to us in him), it will be forgiven him when he repents and turns to the kindness of God, who, since he wills not the death of the wicked as much as their return and life, gave the Holy Spirit to his Church, so that to whomever it forgives sins in him, they are forgiven. But whoever is an enemy of this gift, so as not to seek it through repentance but to resist it through impenitence, makes unforgivable not any sin, but the very remission of sins being despised or even opposed. Thus it is said to speak against the Holy Spirit when one never comes from dispersion to the congregation which has received the Holy Spirit for the remission of sins. Even if someone comes to this congregation through an evil but nonetheless catholic minister, reproachable and fictitious, with a sincere heart, he receives the remission of sins in the Holy Spirit. This Spirit operates in the holy Church even at this time when it is being threshed like a threshing floor with chaff, in such a way that he does not despise anyone’s true confession, nor is he deceived by anyone’s dissimulation; and thus he shuns the reprobates but also gathers the upright through their ministry. Therefore, the only refuge to avoid irremissible blasphemy is to beware of an unrepentant heart; nor should repentance be believed to avail otherwise than by holding to the Church where the remission of sins is given and the fellowship of the Spirit is preserved in the bond of peace.

Conclusion. As best I could, I have addressed a most difficult question, if at all I could, with the Lord having mercy and aiding me. Whatever, however, in its difficulty I have not been able to grasp, let it not be imputed to the truth itself, which beneficially challenges the devout even when it is hidden, but to my weakness, for I have been unable either to perceive what should be understood or to explain what has been understood. However, regarding those things that we perhaps have been able to investigate by thinking and to resolve by speaking, thanks are to be given to Him from whom we sought, from whom we asked, to whom we knocked, so that we might have from where we might be nourished by meditating, and supply to you by speaking.

Sermons - Sermon 72 augm

Sermon 72 (On the Words of the Lord in the Gospel according to Matthew: Or make the tree good, and its fruit good) A bad man cannot have good works.

(1. Our Lord Jesus Christ has admonished us to be good trees and to be able to have good fruits. For he says: Either make the tree good, and its fruit good; or make the tree bad, and its fruit bad. For by the fruit the tree is known. Where he says: Make the tree good, and its fruit good, this indeed is not an admonition, but a healthy precept, to which obedience is necessary. But when he says: Make the tree bad, and its fruit bad, it is not a precept to do so, but a warning to avoid it. For he spoke against those who thought that, when they were evil, they could speak good things or have good works. This the Lord Jesus says is not possible. For a man must first be changed, so that his works may be changed. For if a man remains in his evil state, he cannot have good works; if he remains in his good state, he cannot have evil works.) We have all been found evil.

(2. But who has been found good by the Lord, since Christ died for the ungodly? Therefore, he found all bad trees. But he gave the power to become children of God to those who believe in his name. Therefore, whoever today is a good man, that is, a good tree, was found bad and made good. And if, when he found bad trees, he wanted to uproot rather than allow to remain what was not worthy of uprooting, what would be left? But he came to bestow mercy, so that later he might exercise judgment, to whom it is said: "I will sing of mercy and judgment to you, O Lord." Therefore, he gave the forgiveness of sins to believers; he did not want to have an account with them regarding past records. He gave the forgiveness of sins: he made good trees. He postponed the axe: he gave safety.) Great is God's patience towards us.

(3. About this ax, John speaks, saying): Already (the ax is laid at the root of the trees. Every tree that does not bear good fruit will be cut down and thrown into the fire. About this ax, the householder threatens in the Gospel, saying: Behold, for three years I have come seeking fruit on this tree and find none. Now I must vacate the place: therefore let it be cut down. And the vine-dresser intercedes: Lord, leave it alone this year also: I will dig around it.)

I will also apply manure to it; if it bears fruit, good; if not, you will come and cut it down. The Lord visited the human race as if through three years, which means through three certain periods. The first period is before the law; the second, in the law; the third is now, which is the time of grace. For if He did not visit the human race before the law, where did Abel come from? Where did Enoch come from? Where did Noah come from? Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob? Whose God He wanted to be called, as if He were the God of three men: I am, He says, the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. But if He did not visit in the law, He would not have given the law. After the law, the householder Himself came: He suffered, died, and rose again, gave the Spirit, and made the Gospel to be preached throughout the whole world. Yet a certain fruitless tree still remained. There is still a part of the human race that does not correct itself. The husbandman intercedes: the Apostle prays for the people: I bend my knees, he says, for you to the Father, that being rooted and grounded in love, you may have the strength to comprehend, with all the saints, what is the breadth and length, the height and depth, to know the love of Christ that surpasses knowledge, so that you may be filled with all the fullness of God. Bending the knees, he intercedes for us before the householder, so that we may not be uprooted. Thus, it is necessary that He comes; He finds us fruitful. The digging around the tree is the humility of the penitent: for every ditch is humble. And the manure basket is the filth of the penitent: for what is filthier than manure? And yet, if used well, what is more fruitful?

Two roots: charity and desire.

Let each one be a good tree. Do not think that you can have good fruits if you remain a bad tree. There will be no good fruit unless of a good tree. Change your heart, and the work will be changed. Uproot desire, plant charity. For just as the root of all evil is greed, so the root of all good is charity. Why then do people murmur or argue among themselves: "What is good?" Oh, if you knew what it is! The good that you want to have is not fully good. The good that you do not want to be, that is a great good! Do you want to have bodily health? Granted, it is good. Nevertheless, it is not a great good, because even a bad person can have it. Do you want to have gold and silver? Behold, I say this too: it is good if you make good use of it; however, you will not use it well if you are bad. Hence, gold and silver are bad for the wicked, good for the good: not because they make people good, but because they find them good, they are converted to good use. Do you want to have honor? It is good, but again, only if you use it well. For how many has honor been the occasion of destruction! For how many has honor been the instrument of good work! A man wants all good things except himself.

Therefore, let us discern these goods, if we can, because we are speaking of good trees. And there is nothing that anyone should think about, except to strive to turn back from those things by which eyes are corrupted as much as he can, to turn his eyes onto himself, to descend within himself, to examine himself, to inspect himself, to seek himself and to find himself; and what displeases, he should kill, and what pleases, he should adopt, and what he adopts, he should plant. For when a man finds himself empty of better goods, why is he eager for external goods? Behold, what use is a chest full of goods to an empty conscience? You want to have goods, but you do not want to be good! Do you not see that you ought to be ashamed of your goods, if your house is full of goods and holds you as evil? For what is it that you wish to have as evil? Tell me. Nothing at all: not a wife, not a daughter, not a son, not a servant, not a villa, not a tunic, finally not a shoe; and yet you want to have an evil life! I ask you, prefer your life to your shoe. All the things that lie around your eyes, splendid and beautiful, are dear to you; and to yourself, you are vile and foul! If the goods with which your house is full, which you wished for, which you trembled to lose, could respond to you, would they not cry out to you: “Just as you wish to have us as goods, we also want to have you as a good master”? With a silent voice, they intercede against you to your master: “Behold, you gave so many goods to this one, and he himself is evil! What use is it to him to have what he has, when he does not have Him who gave everything?” The true good is what.

Therefore, he asks, admonished by my words, and perhaps pricked in the heart, he asks what is good, what kind of good, whence comes the good. Well have you understood that this you ought to inquire. I will respond to the one asking, and I will say: This is the good which you cannot lose unwillingly. For you can lose gold, even unwillingly; you can lose a house, you can lose honors, you can lose the very health of the body. But the good by which you are good, you neither receive unwillingly, nor lose unwillingly. (So, what kind of good is this? The Psalm indeed admonishes us about a great thing, perhaps what we are seeking. For it says: Sons of men, how long will you be heavy of heart? How long that tree for three years? Sons of men, how long will you be heavy of heart? What does it mean to be heavy of heart? Why do you love vanity and seek falsehood? And afterward it says what should be sought: Know that the Lord has made his holy one magnificent. Now also Christ has come, now he has been made magnificent, now he has risen and ascended into heaven, now his name is preached throughout the whole world: How long will you be heavy of heart? The past times suffice: now that holy one is made magnificent, how long will you be heavy of heart? After three years, what remains except the axe? How long will you be heavy of heart? Why do you love vanity and seek falsehood? Still in vain, still useless, still pompous, still fleeting, thus, although Christ the holy one is made magnificent, these things are still sought! Now truth cries out, and still vanity is sought! How long will you be heavy of heart?) Why is the world scourged so harshly? The world is justly scourged: for the world now knows the words of the Lord. "And the servant, not knowing his Lord's will and doing things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few." Why? So that he may seek the will of his Lord. Therefore, the servant not knowing the will: this was the world before the Lord magnified His holy one. The servant was not knowing the will of his Lord, and therefore was beaten with few stripes. But the servant now knowing his Lord's will: this is the case now, since the deity magnified His holy one, and not doing His will, shall be beaten with many stripes. So why is it surprising that the world receives many stripes? The servant knows the will of the Lord and does things worthy of stripes. Therefore, let him not refuse to be beaten with many, for if he does not want to hear the teacher unjustly, he will justly suffer the avenger; nor let him murmur against the chastiser, since he sees himself worthy of stripes, in order to merit mercy.

Trema

]on

].

]iam

]Est enim

]nunc

]ittitur.

]m in faith,

]ipse si

]tate in ]us afterwards

]Sic enim

]and peace

He gives peace.

God gives peace.

/ Upon peace? To those who have peace here in charity, he will also give them peace; he will give them peace in immortality, not to those who say, "Peace, peace," and there is no peace. Therefore, seek peace and pursue it. Thus, in this psalm, he has exalted his holy one. Therefore, there is one who hears us, because we have one who intercedes for us. Thus, after he had said, "The Lord has exalted his holy one," he added, "The Lord will hear me when I cry out to him." For now, I have an advocate there who sits at the right hand of God and intercedes for us.

Turn away from evil, do good. But because He does not listen to give full peace, except to him who turns away from evil and does good - to turn away from evil is to be angry with oneself, to be pricked in the bed; to do good is to offer the sacrifice of righteousness; to seek peace is to hope in the Lord -, when He had said: "Offer the sacrifice of righteousness," He added: "And hope in the Lord." Now you have been angry with yourself, now you have been pricked, now you have turned away from evil, now you have offered the sacrifice of righteousness still in hope in good works: one thing you do not yet hold, lest you say: "I have already done all these things and still have received nothing," you remain in the work of patience. For tribulation produces patience, patience produces probation, and probation produces hope. Now hope does not disappoint. Be secure: you will not be disappointed. Hope in Him. Now it is still like night: you do not yet see God nor hold what He has promised, but in this night do what the psalm says: "In the day of my tribulation I sought God with my hands at night before you and I was not deceived." In the day of my tribulation: consider this whole life as the day of tribulation, and say: "I sought God with my hands, not with my eyes." For it is still night. Seek with your hands, deserve by your works, do good and say that you have sought the Lord with your hands in this night. What follows and also follows for you: "And I was not deceived." I sought at night, I sought by groping and yet I found. This is, I sought with my hands: diligently and sought by my works. But how did I seek with these hands? Before Him, because of that: "Do not do your righteousness before men," not to avoid their gaze, but not to seek your praise. For if you avoid the sight of those looking at you when you do good, where is that: "Let your works shine before men, that they may see your good deeds?" But see what follows: "And glorify your Father who is in heaven" - that He may be glorified in you who made you good. For you were fit to make yourself evil, you are not fit to make yourself good. You were fit to wound yourself, you are not fit to heal yourself. Therefore, when you do good works, desire this that God may be glorified in you, because when you have offered the sacrifice of righteousness - that is, good works -, it follows that you hope in the Lord. The blessedness which you seek, you will have in God. And what am I to hope for? How long am I to hope? Here, do not seek what belongs to this earth. You wish to be blessed, I know. For who does not? You seek a good thing, but not in its proper place. It is as if you hear that gold is good and can only be found under the earth, so you grab a shovel and dig in your house. When asked what you seek, you will answer: "Gold." But the one who knows where gold is found will reply to you: "You seek a good thing, but not in the right place." You seek to be blessed, you wish to be full of joys, you wish to be satisfied with good things so that you do not lack anything and nothing is wanting to you: a great thing, but it is not here. How you may attain it, I will tell you. What can I say but what I have said? Be angry with yourself, convict yourself on your bed, change yourself. Offer the sacrifice of righteousness and hope in the Lord. In Him, you will have what you seek; when you come to Him, there you will have it, because you will have Him of whom it is said: Lord, show us the Father, and it is enough for us.

"Where are the things that were promised to me?"

Finally, what follows here? When he said [and] be pricked - that is, let it repent you for being evil -, offer the sacrifice of righteousness - burn in good works -, he added: Hope in the Lord, and said: Many say: "Who will show us good things?" Lo, they are pricked. "In my bed I was evil: I was angry with myself. I was a thief, I was a plunderer, I was this and that: I was angry with myself, I was pricked in my bed, I changed myself. Now I do good works: when I see someone hungry, I give bread; when I see someone naked, I clothe them; when I see a stranger, I welcome them; when I see someone quarreling, I make peace; when I see someone oppressed, I redeem them; when I see someone sick, I visit them; when I see someone dead, I bury them: where is the good that was promised to me? I have already emended myself, I have already changed, I have already been corrected from evil works and do good ones: where are the things promised to me?" Many say - would that few said this - many say. What do many say? "Who will show us good things?" - where is what was promised to me? "I expend my gold and see nothing. What I expend, I see; what is promised to me, I do not see." It is night. Seek: your hands will not fail, and you will not be deceived. Many say: "Who will show us good things?"

God the only good.

What was that man going to say to whom they were saying, "Who will show us good things?" And what is that good itself? The light of your face, O Lord, has been signed upon us. Behold the good. The light of your face, O Lord, has been signed upon us. We have been made in the image of God, nor are we reshaped except by Him who made us, nor are we reformed except by Him who created us. Therefore, the light of your face, O Lord, has been signed upon us, that we may be your coin and be stored in your treasury. The light of your face, O Lord, has been signed upon us. This is the currency of Christ: the face of our emperor has been signed in us. Christ, like a tax collector, was seeking this coin when, to those criticizing about the tribute, he said, after they showed the coin and responded that it bore the image of Caesar: "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and unto God the things that are God's." Caesar seeks his image in your gold, will God not seek His in your soul? Behold what good things are. Why do many still say, "Who will show us good things?" How long will you be heavy-hearted? You seek goods in which you would fear more. You seek transient goods, you seek temporal goods, you seek goods from which you will be released when alive or leave behind when dead. How long, therefore, will you be heavy-hearted? Why do you love vanity and seek falsehood? Do you want me to show you the good? Have it and you will know. It can be held in the heart, but it cannot be shown to the eyes. The Lord gives joy to the heart.

Finally, see what follows: "The light of your face is signed upon us, O Lord. You have given," he says, "joy in my heart." In my heart, not in my chamber, not in my chest, but in my heart. See that the light of your face is signed upon us, O Lord. For one acquires gold and puts it in a chest: his heart rejoices, but from vanity, not from truth. Do you want to see how vainly he rejoices who rejoices thus and who mistakens falsehood for truth? This person has a full chest: he leaves his house; wherever he wanders, he rejoices because it is full of his. Another had a full chest and lost what he had to the thief: he does not know, yet he still rejoices; he does not know it has perished, yet he still rejoices. How was it yours when it was not in you? Behold, it is already lost, and you still rejoice. You fuel empty hopes. From where else, unless because you seek vanity? For what purpose? For what benefit, what fruit? Behold, you lost it, even though you loved what you lost. And how did you perish? Return then to the highest good, so you can say: "The light of your face is signed upon us, O Lord. We have become your coins: collect us to your treasure, and we give back Caesar's tribute, to you ourselves, to Caesar what you gave, to you what you made, to you who made us. You have given joy in my heart: there it is from where I rejoice, the inner good, stored in the inner chest." This you cannot unwillingly lose; there he is himself who made it, delighted in his temple, because you are pierced in your chamber. No one becomes blessed by earthly things.

Finally, after he said: "The light of your face, O Lord, has been signed upon us; you have given gladness in my heart," he looked at those many who said: "Who will show us good things?" and said: "In the time of their grain and wine and oil they have multiplied – their grain, their wine, their oil." They considered these things and longed for earthly things. And when it went well for them, they were filled with these earthly things – they were multiplied – they said the people to whom these things belong are blessed. But what do you say? Blessed is the people whose God is the Lord. Because the light of your face, O Lord, has been signed upon us. But those who are multiplied in the time of their grain and wine and oil, let them depart from me; let those who love such things not say to me: "Who will show us good things?" There is something that I can show, but there is no one to whom I can show it. Therefore, they have been multiplied in the time of their grain, wine, and oil.

God is our rest.

What about you? In peace, in the same. What is "in the same"? That which does not change, which is not varied, which is not temporal, which is not sometimes this way, sometimes otherwise. In the same I will sleep. It is difficult to explain what I feel, what he said: I will sleep in the same. I will sleep in peace: in the same I will sleep. He who sleeps, in a way, has a break from the senses of the flesh. Why then are you searching externally for forms and colors for the eyes, songs and pleasant melodies for the ears, various tastes for the palate, different pleasures for the touch for your blessed life? Such a good is not what makes you good, such a good is not what you stated: "Who will show us good things?". The good is within, in the image of God, from where this good is formed which neither eye has seen nor ear has heard. Therefore sleep, take yourself away from the desire of the eyes, do not converse with the senses of the flesh, so that your Lord may say to you: Enter into the joy of your Lord. Therefore in peace, in the same, I will sleep and rest.

We hope for eternal goods from God. From where is it approached? Since you, Lord, have made me dwell in hope uniquely. This which was said: Hope in the Lord, after iniquity has already been committed and a sacrifice of righteousness has already been offered, it was said. Hope in the Lord, but you have made me dwell in hope uniquely. What does uniquely mean? Not like many who say: "Who will show us good things?", desiring many things and scattered by various pleasures - one seeks this, another that, they do not seek one thing. From the evil of that person, this one desires good. That one cannot enrich himself unless this one falls into poverty. That greater fish cannot be satisfied unless the lesser fish has been devoured. Those who seek these good things do not seek good things, because they seek non-good things. Therefore, uniquely take this, which the impious do not take. O you unique person - the whole body of Christ - O you unique person - the body whose head is Christ - dwell in hope uniquely, do not seek the good things of the nations. For all these things the nations seek. Seek first the kingdom and the righteousness of God - this is the sign of the face of God. In you seek this and, if it is necessary, all these things will be added to you. Will He feed the thief and abandon you? The earth is the Lord's and its fullness.

Love God freely. Do not withdraw from your God, love your God. To whom you say: "Give me this and that," sometimes say to him: "Give me Yourself." If you love, love freely, do not be an impure soul. Your wife would not please you, if she loved your gold, if she loved you because you gave gold, because you gave a fine tunic, because you gave the best villa, because you gave a chosen slave, because a handsome eunuch, because if she loved these things in you, she would not love you. Do not rejoice in such love: an adulterer can often give more. You wish your wife to love you freely, and you want to sell your faith to God? "Because I believe in you," you say to your God, "give me gold." Are you not ashamed? "Because I believe," you say, "give me gold." You have pledged your faith: look at its price. It is not worth that much, it is not worth gold or silver, your faith is not worth that much; it has a great price: God Himself is its price. Love Him and love Him freely. For if you love Him for something else, you do not love Him. You ought not to desire Him for something else, but whatever else you desire should be for Him, so that all things are referred to the love of Him, and He is not referred to other loves, but He is preferred above all other loves. Love Him, love Him freely. For this reason, that great athlete was provoked by a great adversary saying: "Does Job fear God for nothing?"

Let us seek and love the good of goods.

Therefore, if you wish for good, when you say: "Who will show us good things?", it is God Himself who made you good and who makes you better. He Himself is good by no other good but by His own good. For to you, that you may be good, another good thing happens; to Him that He may be good, no good thing happens. For He is good to Himself by Himself. Commending this great good, the Lord said: "Why do you ask me about what is good? No one is good but God alone." Are there not other goods? Is it not written: "God made all things very good"? But all these things are good through God. However, God is not good through these, nor is He good through other things that possess goodness, but He is the Good of goods. Behold what kind of good it is: seek it. Why do you love vanity and seek after lies? Behold what is good: seek the Good of goods. You seek riches: it is not singular. Look: "Singularly, you have made me dwell in hope." Why is it not singular? Both good and bad possess it. You seek bodily health: both good and bad possess it, and men and beasts; it is not singular. You seek honors: the wicked also attain them; it is not singular. What is singular is what only the good will possess. Here God gives goods to both the good and the bad, He Himself gives good things and bad things to both the good and the bad: to some as torment, to others as exercise. Evils are common to both good and bad. Singular evil is the eternal fire; singular good is the good eternal God. For whatever other things are of creation, God gives even to His enemies: earth and heaven; His enemies use the lights of heaven, the fruits of the earth, bodily health, worldly honors. The creature is what He created and gave to them. He reserves Himself, who created, for you, but if you love freely. For the time will come when He gives Himself to you and it will be said to the impious: "Let the impious be taken away, lest he see the glory of God." Therefore, brothers, let us love God freely, do good, tolerate evil, hope in Him, so that sometime, with Him given back, we may be satisfied with Him alone, who lives and reigns through immortal ages. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 72

SERMO 72 On the Words of the Gospel of Matthew 12:33:

"EITHER MAKE THE TREE GOOD AND ITS FRUIT GOOD" A bad man cannot have good works. Our Lord Jesus Christ admonished us to be good trees so that we might bear good fruits. For He says: Either make the tree good, and its fruit good; or make the tree bad, and its fruit bad. For a tree is known by its fruit. When He says: Make the tree good, and its fruit good, this is certainly not an admonition, but a wholesome commandment, to which obedience is necessary. But when He says: Make the tree bad, and its fruit bad, it is not a commandment to do so, but a warning to avoid it. For He spoke against those who thought that while being evil, they could speak good things or have good works. This, the Lord Jesus says, is impossible. For the man must first be changed, so that his works may be changed. For if a man remains in his evil state, he cannot have good works; if he remains in his good state, he cannot have bad works.

Evil has found us all. Who then was found good by the Lord when Christ died for the ungodly? Therefore, He found all evil trees, but He gave the power to become sons of God to those who believe in His name. Therefore, whoever today is a good man, that is, a good tree, was found evil and made good. And if, when He found them, He had wished to uproot the evil trees, what would remain that would not be worthy of being uprooted? But He came to extend mercy, so that afterward He might exercise judgment, to whom it is said: "I will sing of mercy and judgment to you, O Lord." Therefore, He gave forgiveness of sins to the believers, not wanting to reckon with them concerning their past actions. He gave the forgiveness of sins: He made good trees. He postponed the axe: He gave security. The patience of God towards us.

John speaks of this axe, saying: The axe is already laid at the root of the trees. Every tree that does not bear good fruit will be cut down and thrown into the fire. The householder also threatens this axe in the Gospel, saying: Behold, for three years I have come to this tree and found no fruit in it. Now I should clear the ground: therefore let it be cut down. And the vinedresser intercedes: Lord, leave it alone this year also; I will dig around it and put manure on it; if it bears fruit next year, well and good, but if not, you can cut it down. Just as for three years the Lord visited the human race, that is, in three certain times. The first time, before the law; the second, in the law; the third is now, which is the time of grace. For if He did not visit the human race before the law, whence Abel? whence Enoch? whence Noah? whence Abraham? whence Isaac? whence Jacob? of whom He willed to call Himself the Lord, and of whom all nations were, as if He were the God of three men, saying: I am the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. And if He did not visit in the law, He would not have given the law itself. After the law, the householder himself came: He suffered, died, and rose again, gave the Holy Spirit, and caused the Gospel to be preached throughout the whole world. And still some tree remains unfruitful. There is still some part of the human race: it still does not correct itself. The vinedresser intercedes: the Apostle prayed for the people: I bow my knees before the Father, that being rooted and grounded in love, you may have the strength to comprehend with all the saints what is the breadth and length and height and depth, and to know the love of Christ that surpasses knowledge, that you may be filled with all the fullness of God. By bowing his knees, he intercedes for us before the householder, lest we be uprooted. Therefore, because it is necessary that He comes, let us act so that He may find us fruitful. The digging around the tree is the humility of the penitent: for every digging is lowly. The basket of manure, the filth of repentance; for what is filthier than manure? and yet, if well used, what is more productive?

Two roots: charity and greed.

Let each one be a good tree. Do not think that you have good fruits if you remain a bad tree. There will not be good fruit unless it is from a good tree. Change your heart, and your work will change. Uproot desire, plant charity. For as the root of all evil is desire, so the root of all good is charity. Why then do men murmur or argue among themselves, saying, "What is good?" O if you only knew what is good! What you wish to have is not truly good. What you do not wish to be, this is good! You wish to have bodily health: it is good; but do not think it is a great good, for even the wicked have it. You wish to have gold and silver; behold, I also say this: it is good; but only if you use it well; you will not use it well if you are wicked. Thus, gold and silver are bad for the wicked, good for the good; not because gold and silver make them good, but because, finding them good, it is converted to good use. You wish to have honor: it is good; but only if you use it well. For how many has honor been the occasion of destruction! For how many has honor been the minister of good works! A man desires all good things except himself.

Let us discern these goods, if we can: because we speak of good trees. And here there is nothing that anyone should think, except to turn his eyes to himself, to learn in himself, to examine himself, to inspect himself, to seek himself, and to find himself; and to destroy what displeases; to adapt and plant what pleases. For when a man finds himself devoid of better goods, why is he greedy for external goods? Behold, what does a chest full of goods profit if the conscience is empty? You wish to have goods, and you do not wish to be good yourself! Do you not see that you should be ashamed of your goods if your house is full of goods and it has you as a bad person? What is it that you wish to have as bad? Tell me. Nothing at all: not a wife, not a son, not a daughter, not a servant, not a maidservant, not an estate, not a tunic, lastly not even a shoe; and yet you wish to have a bad life! I beseech you, put your life before your shoe. All things which lie around, elegant and beautiful to your eyes, are dear to you; and you yourself are vile and foul to yourself? If the goods in which your house is filled, which you desired to have, which you feared to lose, could answer you, would they not cry out to you: "As you wish to have us as goods, so we also wish to have a good lord"? With silent voice they intercede against you to your Lord: "Behold, you have given him so many goods, and he himself is bad! What does it profit him to have what he has, when he does not have the One who gave all things?" The true good is what.

Therefore someone asks, admonished by these my words, and perhaps pricked in conscience, he asks what is the good, what kind of good, and whence comes the good. You have understood well that you ought to ask this. I will answer the one asking, and I will say: "This is the good, which you cannot lose against your will. For you can lose gold, unwillingly; you can lose a house, you can lose honors, you can even lose the health of the flesh: but the good by which you are truly good, you neither unwillingly receive nor unwillingly lose." Therefore, I ask what kind of good this is. The Psalm indeed reminds us of a great matter, perhaps the very thing we are seeking. For it says: Sons of men, how long will you be heavy-hearted? How long will that tree in the third year? Sons of men, how long will you be heavy-hearted? What does "heavy-hearted" mean? Why do you love vanity and seek after lies? And behind it says what must be sought: Know that the Lord has made holy his holy one. Now Christ has come, now he has been made magnificent, now he has risen and ascended into heaven, now his name is preached throughout the whole world: how long will you be heavy-hearted? Let the past times suffice; now that holy one has been made magnificent, how long will you be heavy-hearted? After three years, what remains but the axe? How long will you be heavy-hearted? Why do you love vanity and seek after lies? Still vain, still useless, still showy and fleeting, thus, with the holy Christ made magnificent, still these things are sought! Now truth cries out, and still vanity is sought! How long will you be heavy-hearted?

Why is the world scourged so harshly?

Justly is this world strongly scourged: for the world has already known the words of the Lord. And the servant, he says, who does not know the will of his lord, and does things worthy of stripes, will be beaten with few. Why? So that he might seek the will of his lord. Therefore the servant not knowing the will: this was the world, before the Lord magnified His Holy One; the servant was not knowing the will of his lord; and therefore he was beaten with few. But the servant now knowing the will of his lord, this is now, from the time the Deity magnified His Holy One; and not doing His will, will be beaten with many. What wonder then if the world is beaten much? The servant knows the will of his lord, and does things worthy of stripes. Therefore let him not refuse to be beaten with many: for, if he does not want to hear the teacher unjustly, he will rightly suffer the avenger; or let him not murmur against the chastiser, when he sees himself worthy of stripes, that he may merit mercy.

Sermons - Sermon 72A

SERMON 72/A ON THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL MT 12, 41:

"Behold, something greater than Jonah is here" and so forth. The Ninevites listened to a servant, the Jews killed the Lord. The things that have been recited from the holy Gospel, my brothers, if we wish to investigate them all, hardly time suffices for individuals: how much less it suffices for all. Jonah the prophet, who was thrown into the sea and taken into the belly of a sea monster and, on the third day, vomited out alive, bore the figure of the Savior, who suffered and on the third day rose again, the Savior himself showed. The people of the Jews were accused in comparison with the Ninevites, because the Ninevites, to whom the prophet Jonah was sent to rebuke, by doing penance appeased the wrath of God and deserved mercy: And behold, he says, more than Jonah is here, wishing to be understood as Himself, the Lord Christ. They heard the servant and corrected their ways; these heard the Lord and not only did not correct themselves, but moreover killed Him. The queen of the south shall rise, he says, in judgment with this generation and shall condemn it; for she came from the ends of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon, and behold, more than Solomon is here. It was not a great thing for Christ to be more than Jonah, to be more than Solomon: for He was the Lord, they were servants; but yet what are they like who despised the present Lord, when foreigners heard His servants?

Good is to be done not from fear of punishment but from the love of what is right.

Then follows: When an unclean spirit goes out of a man, it walks through dry places seeking rest and finds none. Then it says: I will return to my house from which I came out. And when it comes, it finds it empty, swept, and garnished. Then it goes and takes with it seven other spirits more wicked than itself, and they enter and dwell there; and the last state of that man is worse than the first. So shall it be also to this wicked generation. In order to understand this, if it is expounded correctly, the discourse will be prolonged; however, I will briefly touch upon it as much as the Lord grants, so that I may not leave you without understanding this matter. When sins are forgiven in the sacraments, the house is cleansed; but the inhabitant is needed, the Holy Spirit; however, the Holy Spirit dwells only in the humble of heart. For God says: On whom shall my spirit rest? And He answers: On the humble and quiet one who trembles at my words. Therefore, when He is the inhabitant, He fills, rules, acts, restrains from evil, excites to good, makes righteousness pleasant, so that a man does good out of love for what is right, not fear of punishment. That which I have said, a man is less able to do by himself; but if he has the Holy Spirit as an inhabitant, he finds the same Spirit as a helper in all good things. However, some proud ones, after having their sins forgiven, if they presume to live well by the free choice of human will alone, exclude the Holy Spirit by their very pride; and the house remains as if cleansed from sins but empty of all good things. Your sins have been forgiven, you have been freed from evils; but only the Holy Spirit will fill you with good things. Pride repels Him. You presume on yourself, He leaves you; you trust in yourself, you are given over to yourself. But that desire, by which you were bad, having been repelled from the man, that is, from your mind, when your sins were forgiven, wanders through desolate places seeking rest; and not finding rest, that desire returns to the house, finds it cleansed, brings with it seven other spirits more wicked than itself; and the last state of that man becomes worse than the first. It brings with it seven others. What does it mean: seven others? So, is the unclean spirit also a set of seven? What is this? By seven is signified a totality. It went out totally, came back totally; and if only it came alone! What does it mean: it brings with it seven others? Those it did not have when it was bad, it will have others falsely good. Pay attention, so that, if I am able and as much as I am helped, I may explain what I say. The Holy Spirit is commended by a sevenfold operation, so that the Spirit of wisdom and understanding, counsel and might, knowledge and piety, and the fear of God may be in us. To this sevenfold good, set in opposition a sevenfold evil: the spirit of folly and error, the spirit of rashness and laziness, the spirit of ignorance and impiety, and the spirit of pride against the fear of God. These are the seven wicked ones: who are the other seven more wicked ones? The other seven more wicked ones are found in hypocrisy; one bad spirit of folly, another worse, the simulation of wisdom; a bad spirit of error, another worse, the simulation of truth; a bad spirit of rashness, another worse, the simulation of counsel; a bad spirit of laziness, another worse, the simulation of strength; a bad spirit of ignorance, another worse, the simulation of knowledge; a bad spirit of impiety, another worse, the simulation of piety; a bad spirit of pride, another worse, the simulation of fear. Seven were not borne: who can bear fourteen? It is necessary, therefore, that when simulation of truth is added to wickedness, the last state of the man becomes worse than the first. Which mother who brothers of the Lord.

While he was speaking to the crowds - I follow the Gospel - his mother and his brothers were standing outside, wanting to speak with him. Someone told him, saying: Behold, your mother and your brothers are outside, wanting to speak with you. And he replied: Who is my mother? Or who are my brothers? And extending his hand over his disciples, he said: These are my mother and my brothers. And whoever does the will of my Father who is in heaven, he is my brother, and sister, and mother.

I'd love to speak only on this matter; but since I did not wish to overlook the previous points, I consumed no small part of the time - as I sense - discussing them. For what I now set out to discuss contains many intricate complexities: how the Lord Christ, piously, disregarded his mother—not just any mother but such a one as the Virgin Mother, who, the more she was a mother, the more she was a virgin, and to whom he brought fruitfulness without taking away integrity: a mother who conceived as a virgin, gave birth as a virgin, and perpetually remained a virgin. He disregarded such a mother to prevent maternal affection from impeding his work.

What was he doing? He was speaking to the people, destroying old men and building new ones, freeing souls, unbinding the bound, enlightening blind minds, doing a good work, fervent in good deeds in both act and word. Amid these activities, a carnal affection was announced to him. You heard what he replied: why should I repeat it? Let mothers hear so they do not interrupt the good deeds of their children with carnal affection. For if they wish to interfere, and if by pressing those engaged in such deeds they disrupt what should not be delayed, they will be disregarded by their children; I dare to say, disregarded out of piety. And when a woman is angry because she was disregarded—whether she is married or a widow, when the Virgin Mary was disregarded? But you will say to me, "Do you then compare my son to Christ?" I do not compare him to Christ, nor you to Mary. Therefore, Christ the Lord did not condemn maternal affection, but demonstrated in himself the great example of disregarding the mother for the work of God. And in speaking, he was a teacher, and in disregarding, he was a teacher; and so he deigned to disregard his mother to teach you to disregard even your father and mother for the work of God.

Why Christ willed to become man from a woman. For the Lord Christ could not become a man without a mother, who could become a man without a father? If it was fitting, indeed because it was fitting, that He become man for the sake of man, who created man, consider and recall from where He made the first man. The first man was made without a father, without a mother. What was possible for Him first to adapt for teaching human matters, was He not able to later adapt something similar for the renewal of human matters? Was it difficult for the Wisdom of God, the Word of God, the Power of God, the only-begotten Son of God, was it difficult for Him to make a man from whichever source He wished? Angels presented themselves as men to human beings. Abraham fed holy angels and invited them as if they were men; and not only did he see them, but also touched them, for he washed their feet. Were these things done by angels as if through deceptive phantasms? If an angel was able to exhibit a true human form whenever he wished, could not the Lord of angels make a true man from whichever source He wanted to assume? But He did not want to have a human father, lest He come to men through carnal desire; yet He wanted a mother, so that He might have a mother among men and teach men to respect what is done by God. He chose to receive the male sex in Himself, and He considered it worthy to honor the female sex in His mother. Indeed, in ancient times a woman had sinned and had offered sin to the man; both unions were deceived by the devil's deceit. If Christ had come as a man without commending the female sex, women would have despaired of themselves, especially since through a woman man fell: He honored both, commended both, accepted both. He was born of a woman. Do not despair, men; Christ chose to be a man. Do not despair, women; Christ chose to be born of a woman. Both sexes run together towards the salvation of Christ: let the male come, let the female come - in faith, there is neither male nor female. Therefore, Christ teaches you to disregard your parents and to love your parents. For then you love your parents orderly and piously when you do not place parents before God: The words of the Lord are - "He who loves father or mother more than me is not worthy of me." By these words, he appears to admonish you not to love; rather, if you pay attention, he admonished you to love. For he could have said, "He who loves father or mother is not worthy of me." He did not say this, so as not to speak against the law which he gave, for he himself gave that law through His servant Moses, where it is written: "Honor your father and your mother." He did not promulgate a contrary law but commended that law; he taught you the order, not subverted piety: "He who loves father or mother, but more than me." Love, therefore, but not more than me: God is God, man is man. Love your parents, obey your parents, honor your parents; but if God calls you to something greater, where parental affection could be an impediment, keep the order, do not overturn charity.

Against the Manichaeans asserting that Christ did not have a mother. In such truth of the doctrine of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, who would believe the calumny sought by the Manichaeans, with which they would attempt to assert that the Lord Jesus Christ did not have any mother? For they think, or rather, they are senseless, that the Lord Jesus did not have a human mother, contrary to the Gospel, contrary to the light of the very Truth itself. And consider from where they argue. Behold, they say, He Himself says. What does He say? Who is my mother? or who are my brothers? He Himself, they say, denies it, and you want to impose upon Him what He denies; He Himself says: Who is my mother, or who are my brothers? and you say: He has a mother? O fool,

O contentious one, O deservedly hateful one! Answer me, from where do you know the Lord said: Who is my mother, or who are my brothers? You deny that Christ had a mother, and you try to teach what you intend through this, because He said: Who is my mother, or brothers? If someone else exists and says the Lord Christ did not say this at all, how will you prove it? Answer, if you can, to a man denying that Christ said this. From where you will prove it, from there you will be convicted. Did Christ Himself, indeed, indicate to you in the ear that He said this? Answer, that you may be convicted by your own mouth, answer, that you may prove Christ said this. I know what he will say: "I will take the book, I will open the Gospel, I will recite His words written in the holy Gospel." Good, good: I will hold you with that Gospel itself, I will bind you with that Gospel itself, I will suffocate you with that Gospel itself. Recite in the very Gospel what you think is for you: open, read. Who is my mother? Why did He say this? Read above. Someone announced to Him: Behold, your mother and your brothers stand outside. I do not yet press, I do not yet hold, I do not yet suffocate; you can still say: That messenger, indeed, was false, did not speak the truth, suggested lies: therefore the Lord refuted a false messenger. After his announcement indeed, He responded: Who is my mother? As if He were saying: "You say: Your mother stands outside; I say: Who is my mother? Whom do you want us to believe? The suggesting messenger, or what Christ refuted in what was announced?" Therefore listen, I still ask you: hold only the Gospel, do not discard the book behind you: hold it, give authority to the Gospel; unless you give it authority, there will be no way to prove the Lord said: Who is my mother? But when you have given sufficient authority to the Gospel, see what I ask. A little while ago, I asked how you would know whether Christ said: Who is my mother? What preceded? A certain messenger said to Christ: Your mother stands outside. Before this messenger said this, or for this messenger to say this, what preceded? I compel you to read. I see you now fear lest you read. The Lord responded and said. Who said? I do not say: Who said: who is my mother? for you will answer, the Lord said. The Lord responded, who said? You will answer, the Evangelist said. Did this Evangelist speak the truth or a falsehood? You will say: "What did he speak, truth or falsehood?" The Lord responded, and said to him. What the Evangelist said, did he speak the truth or falsehood? If you would say the Evangelist spoke falsehood, saying the Lord responded; from where do you know the Lord said: who is my mother? If, therefore, you convict the Lord said: who is my mother? because the Evangelist said He said it, you do not convict the Lord said this, unless you believe the Evangelist. Now, if you believe the Evangelist (for you say nothing unless you believe the Evangelist), read above what the Evangelist himself said. The authority of the Gospel depends on the truthfulness of the Evangelists.

How long must I delay you! How long must I keep you in suspense! It is a favor that you are quickly conquered. Pay attention, look, read. I see you are unwilling. Give the book, I will read: This he said while speaking to the crowds. Who says this? The Evangelist, whom if you do not believe, Christ said nothing. If Christ said nothing, who is my mother? Christ did not say. But if who is my mother? Christ said, it is true what the Evangelist wrote. See what he said before: This he said while speaking to the crowds, his mother and brothers were standing outside, wanting to speak with him. The messenger had not yet announced anything you could say was a lie. See what he announced, attend to what the Evangelist stated beforehand: This the Lord spoke to the crowds, his mother and brothers stood outside. Who says this? The Evangelist, whom you believe the Lord said: Who is my mother? But if you do not believe these words, then the Lord did not say: Who is my mother? But truly the Lord said: Who is my mother? Therefore believe him, who said that the Lord said: Who is my mother? For he who said that the Lord said: Who is my mother? He himself said: This he spoke, his mother stood outside. Why then did he deny his mother? By no means! Understand: he did not deny, but he placed something he was doing above his mother. Lastly, the sole cause is to inquire why the Lord said: Who is my mother? The primary cause is to see that he had about whom he said: Who is my mother? He had: she stood outside, wanting to speak with him. Tell me, how do you know? The Evangelist says, whom if I do not believe, the Lord says nothing. Therefore he had a mother. But what is: Who is my mother? To these things that I do, who is my mother? If you say to someone in danger, and having a father: "Let your father save you," whom he knows is not capable of delivering his son, does he not respond to you with utmost reverence, with complete truth: "Who is my father? For this that I want, for this that I feel I need now, who is my father?". Therefore, for what Christ was doing, freeing the bound, enlightening the blind minds, building interior men, constructing a spiritual temple for himself, who is his mother? But, if you think that Christ did not have a mother on earth because he said: Who is my mother? neither did his disciples have fathers on earth because the Lord himself said to them: Do not call anyone on earth your father. The words of the Lord are: Do not call anyone your father on earth; for you have one Father, God. They did not lack fathers: but where it comes to regeneration, seek the Father of regeneration; do not condemn the father of generation, but put the Father of regeneration above him.

It is greater to have been a disciple of Christ for Mary than to have been His mother.

Behold, pay more attention to this, my brothers, pay more attention to this, I beg you, which the Lord Christ said, extending His hand over His disciples: "These are my mother and my brothers; and whoever does the will of My Father who sent Me, he is My brother and sister and mother." Did not the Virgin Mary do the will of the Father, who believed in faith, conceived in faith, was chosen from whom salvation would be born among men, was created by Christ before Christ was created in her? Holy Mary indeed did the will of the Father: and for this reason, it is greater for Mary to have been a disciple of Christ than to have been the mother of Christ: it is greater, it is more blessed to have been a disciple of Christ than to have been the mother of Christ. Therefore Mary was blessed because, even before giving birth, she carried the Master in her womb. See if it is not what I say. While the Lord was passing by with the following crowds and performing divine miracles, a certain woman said: "Blessed is the womb that carried you!" And the Lord, so that happiness would not be sought in the flesh, what did He reply? "Rather, blessed are they who hear the word of God and keep it." Hence, therefore, also Mary is blessed because she heard the word of God and kept it: she preserved the truth in her mind more than the flesh in her womb. Christ the truth, Christ the flesh: Christ the truth in Mary's mind, Christ the flesh in Mary's womb; greater is what is in the mind than what is carried in the womb. Holy Mary, blessed Mary, but the Church is better than the Virgin Mary. Why? Because Mary is a portion of the Church, a holy member, an excellent member, an outstanding member, but still a member of the whole body. If of the whole body, surely the body is greater than the member. The Lord is the head, and the whole Christ is head and body. What shall I say? We have a divine head, we have God as the head. The Church, mother and virgin, similar to Mary.

Therefore, beloved, pay attention to yourselves: you are members of Christ, and you are the body of Christ. Watch how you are what He says: "Behold my mother and my brothers." How will you be the mother of Christ? And whoever hears and whoever does the will of my Father who is in heaven, he is my brother, sister, and mother. I understand brothers, I understand sisters: for there is one inheritance; and thus by the mercy of Christ, who, though He was the only one, did not wish to be alone, He wanted us to be heirs to the Father, co-heirs with Himself. For such is that inheritance, which cannot be constrained by the multitude of co-heirs. Therefore I understand we are brothers of Christ, holy and faithful women are sisters of Christ. How can we understand ourselves to be mothers of Christ? What then? Do we dare to call ourselves mothers of Christ? Indeed we dare to call ourselves mothers of Christ. For I have called you all His brothers, and shall I not dare to call myself and you His mothers? Rather, I would much less dare to deny what Christ said. Ah, beloved, observe how the Church is, which is manifestly the spouse of Christ; more difficult to understand, but it is nonetheless true, the mother of Christ. Mary the virgin preceded in type. How, I ask you, is Mary the mother of Christ, if not because she gave birth to the members of Christ? You, to whom I speak, are members of Christ: who gave birth to you? I hear the voice of your heart: "Mother Church." This holy mother, honored, similar to Mary, both gives birth and is a virgin. Because she gives birth, I prove through you: you were born from her; and she gives birth to Christ, for you are the members of Christ. I have proved the birthing, I will prove the virginity: the divine testimony does not desert me, it does not desert me. Proceed to the people, blessed Paul, be a witness of my assertion; cry out, and say what I wish to say: "I have betrothed you to one husband to present you as a chaste virgin to Christ." Where is this virginity? Where is corruption feared? Let him who said virgin speak. "I have betrothed you to one husband to present you as a chaste virgin to Christ; but I am afraid," he says, "that as the serpent deceived Eve with its cunning, so your minds may be corrupted from the chastity which is in Christ." Hold virginity in your minds: the virginity of the mind, the integrity of the catholic faith; where Eve was corrupted by the serpent's word, there must the Church be a virgin by the gift of the Almighty. Therefore, in mind, bring forth the members of Christ, just as Mary the virgin brought forth Christ in her womb; and thus you will be mothers of Christ. It is not far from you, it is not beyond you, it does not repel you: you were children, be also mothers. Children of the mother, when you were baptized, then you were born as members of Christ: bring to the washing of baptism those you can; so that, just as you were children when you were born, so also by bringing others to be born, you may be mothers of Christ.

Sermons - Sermon 73

SERMO 73 ON THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL MT 13: Where the Lord Jesus explains the parables of the sower Parables of the sower in Mt 13.

Both yesterday and today, as our Lord Jesus Christ spoke, we heard the parable of the sower. Those of you who were present yesterday, remember today. Yesterday it was read about the sower who, as he sowed seeds, some fell along the path, which the birds gathered; some fell on rocky places, which withered in the heat; some fell among thorns, which were choked and could not bear fruit; and some fell on good soil, and brought forth fruit hundredfold, sixtyfold, thirtyfold. But today the Lord again told another parable about a sower who sowed good seed in his field. While men slept, an enemy came and sowed tares among the wheat. When the plants grew, it did not yet appear: when the good seed began to bear fruit, then the tares also became evident. The servants of the landowner were offended, seeing many tares among the good wheat, and wanted to uproot them, but were not permitted: instead, it was said to them: Let both grow together until the harvest. The Lord Jesus Christ also explained this parable: and he said he was the sower of the good seed, he showed the enemy who sowed the tares to be the devil; the time of the harvest, to be the end of the world; his field, to be the whole world. But what did he say? At the time of the harvest I will say to the harvesters: Gather first the tares to burn them, but store my wheat in the barn. Why do you hasten, he said, servants full of zeal? You see the tares among the wheat, you see bad Christians among the good; you want to uproot the bad: be still, it is not the time of the harvest. Let it come, and may it find you as wheat. Why are you fretful? Why do you grudgingly tolerate the bad mixed with the good? They may be in the field with you, they will not be in the barn.

One thing has many names, and two things sometimes share one name in the figures of Scripture. But you know those three things mentioned yesterday, where the seed did not prosper: the path, the rocky places, the thorny places; these are the tares. They have received another name in another likeness. For when similitudes are given, the actual essence is not expressed; through them, not the truth, but the likeness of the truth is expressed. What I say, I know few have understood: but we speak for the sake of all. In visible things, the path is a path, the rocky places are rocky places, the thorny places are thorny places: what they are, that they are; because they are named properly. But in parables and similitudes, one thing can be called by many names: therefore it is not inappropriate for me to say to you, That path, those rocky places, those thorny places are bad Christians; they are also the tares. Is not Christ the lamb? Is not Christ also the lion? Among wild beasts and livestock, the lamb is a lamb, the lion is a lion: both are Christ. Those individually denote properly: these both by similitude. It is even more remarkable that by similitude things very distant from each other can be called by one name. For what is as far distant from each other as Christ and the devil? Yet both Christ and the devil are called a lion. Christ is the lion: The Lion of the tribe of Judah has conquered. The devil is a lion: Do you not know that your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, walks about, seeking whom he may devour? So both are lions: one a lion for strength; the other a lion for ferocity: one a lion to conquer; the other a lion to harm. The serpent itself is the devil, the ancient serpent: are we not commanded to imitate the devil, when our Pastor told us: Be simple as doves, and cunning as serpents? To bad Christians, that they may change.

Therefore yesterday I addressed the way, I addressed the rocky places, I addressed the thorny places: and I said: Change, while you can; turn the hard ground with the plow, throw the stones out of the field, pull up the thorns from the field. Do not have a hard heart, where the word of God quickly perishes. Do not have shallow soil, where the root of love does not sit deep. Do not choke the good seed, which is sown for you by our labors, with worldly cares and desires. For the Lord sows: but we are His workers. But be good soil. Yesterday we said, and today we say to all: Let one bear a hundredfold, another sixtyfold, another thirtyfold. In one the fruit is greater, in another it is smaller: but all will belong to the granary. Yesterday we said these things, today I address the tares: but they themselves are sheep like tares. O bad Christians! O you who fill the Church by living badly! Correct yourselves before the harvest comes! Do not say: I have sinned, and what has happened to me? God has not lost His power: but He demands repentance from you. I say this to the bad, and yet Christians; I say this to the tares. For they are in the field: and it can happen that those who are tares today, will be wheat tomorrow. Therefore I also address the wheat. To good Christians, that they should tolerate the evil ones.

O you, Christians, who live well, few among many sigh, few among many groan. Winter will pass, summer will come, behold the harvest will be present. Angels will come, who can separate and do not know how to err. We in this time are like those servants, of whom it was said: Do you wish that we go and gather them? For we wished, if it were possible, that no evil remain among the good. But it was said to us: Let both grow until the harvest. Why? For you are such that you can be deceived. Finally, listen: Lest perhaps, while you wish to uproot the tares, you root up the wheat along with them. What good do you do? Do you not destroy my harvest with your diligence? The reapers will come: and it was explained who the reapers are: But the reapers are the Angels. We are men, the Angels are reapers. We indeed, if we complete the course, will be equal to the Angels of God: but now when we resent the wicked, we are still men. And now we ought to hear: Therefore let him who thinks he stands take heed lest he fall. For do you think, my brothers, that those tares do not ascend to the arches? Do you think they are below and not above? Would that we were not this. For me it is of little importance to be judged by you. I say indeed to your Charity, both in the arches there are wheats, there are tares; and among the people there are wheats, there are tares. Let the good endure the wicked: the wicked change and imitate the good. All, if possible, let us belong to God: all let us escape the wickedness of this age in His mercy. Let us seek good days, for we are in evil days: but in evil days let us not blaspheme, so that we may be able to reach good days.

Sermons - Sermon 73A

SERMON 73 From the Gospel according to Matthew 13: On the man who sowed good seed in his field "Weeds must be tolerated until the Angels separate them from the wheat."

We have heard the holy Gospel and Christ the Lord speaking in the Gospel; from there let us speak what he himself will give. This parable, brothers, perhaps I would labor to explain it to you; but he provided a summary for us because he himself explained who proposed it. Whoever indeed reads the Gospel reads up to where the Lord said: "Gather first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them; but gather the wheat into my barn." But afterward: His disciples, as it is written, approached him and said to him: "Explain to us the parable of the tares." And he who is in the bosom of the Father himself told: "He who sows the good seed," he said, "is the Son of Man," speaking of himself. "The field, however, is the world; the good seed are the children of the kingdom; the tares, however, are the children of the evil one. The enemy, however, who sows them, is the devil. The harvest is the end of the age; the reapers, however, are angels. When therefore the Son of Man comes, he will send his angels, and they will gather out of his kingdom all causes of sin and all law-breakers, and throw them into the fiery furnace; there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth. Then the righteous will shine like the sun in the kingdom of their Father." I have spoken the words of the Lord Christ, which were not read, but thus are written. Therefore, the Lord explained to us what he proposed. See what we choose to be in his field: see what kind of people the harvest finds us to be. For the field, which is the world, is the Church spread throughout the world. Whoever is wheat, let him persevere unto the harvest; whoever are tares, let them be changed into wheat. For this is the difference between humans and true grains and true tares, because those in the field, what is grain is grain; what are tares are tares. However, in the field of the Lord, that is the Church, sometimes what was wheat turns into tares; and sometimes what were tares change into wheat: and no one knows what will happen tomorrow. Therefore, the laborers indignant with the paterfamilias, when they wanted to go and remove the tares, were not permitted; for they wanted to remove them, but were not allowed to separate the tares. They did what they were capable of, they reserved the separations for the angels. And indeed, they did not wish to reserve the separations of the tares for the angels; but the paterfamilias, who knew all and that a separation was to be sent, commanded them to tolerate the tares, not to separate them: "No," he said – when they had said: "Do you want us to go and gather them?" – "no: lest perhaps, when you would gather the tares, you uproot the wheat with them." Therefore, Lord, will tares also be with us in the barn? "At the time of harvest," I will say to the reapers: "Gather first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them"; tolerate in the field what you will not have with you in the barn.

Against the heretics, the weeds of Catholic unity.

Listen, dearest grains of Christ; listen, dearest ears of Christ; listen, dearest wheat of Christ; attend to yourselves, return to your consciences, question your faith, question your love, awaken your conscience; and if you find yourselves to be wheat, let it come to your mind: He who perseveres to the end, he will be saved. But whoever, having examined his conscience, finds himself among the weeds, let him not fear to change. The command to be cut has not yet been given, the harvest is not yet; do not be today what you were yesterday, nor tomorrow what you are today. What good is it to you to say you will change someday? God has promised forgiveness to you when you are changed, but he has not promised you tomorrow. However you leave the body, that is how you will come to the harvest. Someone has died, I do not know who, he was a weed; can he there become wheat? Here in the field, either weeds become wheat, or wheat becomes weeds; here it is possible; but elsewhere, that is, after this life, it is the time for receiving what has been made, not the time for making what has not been made. But whoever has been as weeds, and wants to separate himself from the field of the Lord Christ, will not be wheat; for he would certainly remain wheat. What do the weeds fear in the wheat? Let both grow together until the harvest, says the head of the household: Let them grow together; the reapers do not make mistakes, they know where to make bundles from, and throw into the fire. However, bundles cannot be made of wheat, and thrown into the fire. The bundles reveal the separations: Arius has his own bundle there, Eunomius has his own bundle there, Photinus has his own bundle there, Donatus has his own bundle there, Manichaeus has his own bundle there, Priscillianus has his own bundle there. All these bundles will be thrown into the fire, let the wheat be secure, they will rejoice pure in the barn. The enemy sowed tares everywhere. Where then did that enemy not sow tares? What kind, what place of wheat did he find, and did not scatter tares? Did he sow among the laity, and did not sow among the clergy, or among bishops? Or did he sow among the married, and did not sow among the chaste who profess? Or did he sow among the married women, and did not sow among the nuns? Or did he sow in the houses of the laity, and did not sow in the congregations of monks? Everywhere he scattered, everywhere he sowed. What did he not mix with? But thanks be to God, for He who will deign to separate does not err. For it is not hidden from Your Love, that tares are found in any high and exalted harvest. And tares are found in the profession. And you say: In that place, and there they found the wicked, and in that congregation they found the wicked; but the wicked are found everywhere, but they will not always reign with the good. Why do you wonder because you found the wicked in a holy place? Do you not know that the first sin in paradise was disobedience, and by it the angel fell? Did it pollute heaven? Adam fell: did it pollute paradise? One of Noah’s sons fell: did it pollute the house of the righteous? Judas fell: did it pollute the choir of Apostles? Sometimes, according to human judgment, some are thought to be wheat, but they are tares; and some are thought to be tares, but they are truly wheat. Because of these hidden things, the Apostle says: Do not judge anything before the time, until the Lord comes, who will illuminate the hidden things of darkness and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts; and then every man shall have praise from God. Man’s praise passes, sometimes man praises evil, and does not know; sometimes man accuses the holy, and does not know. May God forgive those who do not know, and help those who labor!

Sermons - Sermon 74

SERMO 74 On the Words of the Gospel, Matthew 13:52 "For this reason every scribe who is instructed in the kingdom of God," and so on. Who are the scribes of the Jews? The reading of the Gospel urges us to seek and explain, as much as the Lord grants, to your Charity, who is the Scribe trained in the kingdom of God, similar to the head of a household bringing out of his treasure new and old things. For the reading itself concludes with this: what are the new and old things of the learned Scribe. But it is known whom the ancient ones according to the custom of our Scriptures called Scribes, namely those who professed the knowledge of the Law. For such were called Scribes among that people; not like those who are called in the offices of judges, or in the custom of cities. For we must not enter the school in vain, but know in what sense we hold the words of the Scriptures: lest when something from the Scriptures sounds, which is usually understood in another secular use, the listener errs and, by thinking as he is accustomed, does not understand what he heard. Therefore, Scribes were those who professed the knowledge of the Law, to whom the books of the Law belonged either for keeping, or handling, or even writing and understanding.

Scribes unlearned in the kingdom of God.

Such our Lord Jesus Christ reproaches, that they have the keys of the kingdom of heaven, neither enter themselves, nor permit others to enter; reproving, namely, the Pharisees and Scribes, doctors of the Jewish Law. Of whom elsewhere he says: Do what they say; but do not do what they do: for they say and do not do. Therefore it has been said to you: For they say and do not do, unless because there are some of whom it is shown what the Apostle says: You who preach not to steal, steal; you who say not to commit adultery, commit adultery; you who abhor idols, commit sacrilege; you who glory in the Law, by transgression of the Law dishonor God. For the name of God is blasphemed among the nations because of you. Indeed, of them it is clear to say the Lord: For they say and do not do. Therefore, they are those Scribes, but not learned in the kingdom of God.

How bad prefects speak, and are to be listened to by subordinates.

Perhaps one of you might say: And how can an evil man speak good things; since it is written, the Lord Himself saying: A good man out of the good treasure of his heart brings forth good things, and an evil man out of the evil treasure brings forth evil things. Hypocrites, how can you speak good things, while you are evil? He says this: How can you speak good things, while you are evil? he says this: What they say, do; but what they do, do not do: for they say, and do not do. If they say, and do not do, they are evil: if they are evil, they cannot speak good things: how do we do what we hear from them, when we cannot hear good things from them? How this is resolved, let your Holiness observe. Whatever an evil man brings forth from himself is evil; whatever an evil man brings forth from his heart, is evil: for there is an evil treasure. But whatever a good man brings forth from his heart, is good: for there is a good treasure. Whence then did those evil ones bring forth good things? Because they sat in the chair of Moses. Had He not said beforehand:

They sit in the chair of Moses; He would never have commanded that the evil be heard. For what they bring forth from the evil treasure of their heart was different; what they sounded forth from the chair of Moses, as heralds of the judge, was different. What a herald says is never attributed to the herald, if he speaks before the judge. There is a difference between what a herald speaks in his own house, and what a herald speaks when hearing from the judge. For, whether willing or unwilling, the herald sounds the voice of punishment and of his friend. Likewise, whether willing or unwilling, he sounds the voice of absolution and of his enemy. Give the voice from his heart: he absolves his friend, punishes his enemy. Give the voice from the chair of the judge: he punishes his friend, absolves his enemy. Give the voice of the Scribes from their heart: you will hear: Let us eat and drink; for tomorrow we die. Give the voice from the chair of Moses: you will hear: You shall not kill: You shall not commit adultery: You shall not steal: You shall not bear false witness: Honor your father and your mother: You shall love your neighbor as yourself. Do this, which resounds through the mouth of the Scribes from the chair: not what comes from the heart of the Scribes. Thus, embracing both of the Lord's sentences, you will neither obey one while being guilty of the other; but you understand both to be in concord, and regard as true this: because a good man out of the good treasure of his heart brings forth good things, and an evil man out of the evil treasure brings forth evil things: and that, because those Scribes would not speak good things from the evil treasure of their heart, but they could speak good things from the treasure of the chair of Moses. A grape-cluster among thorns.

Therefore, those words of the Lord should not trouble you, saying: Every tree is known by its fruit. Do they gather grapes from thorns, and figs from thistles? Therefore, the scribes and Pharisees of the Jews are thorns and thistles: and yet: What they tell you, do; but do not do what they do. Therefore, from thorns, grapes are gathered, and from thistles, figs, as I have given you understanding according to the previous exposition. For sometimes vines entwine themselves in thorny hedges of the vineyard, and clusters of grapes hang from the bramble. Hearing the name of thorns, would you despise the grape? Seek the root of the thorns, and see where you find it. Follow the root of the hanging cluster and see where you find it. Thus understand that one thing pertains to the heart of the Pharisee, another to the chair of Moses. The old symbols are done away through Christ. But why are they such? Because, he says, a veil is placed over their hearts. And they do not see that old things have passed away and all things have become new. Hence they are such, and whoever even now are such. Whence the old? Because they have been preached for a long time. Whence the new? Because they pertain to the kingdom of God. How then is the veil removed, the Apostle himself says: But whenever you turn to the Lord, the veil is removed. Therefore, a Jew not turning to the Lord does not extend the gaze of his mind to the end. Just as at that time, in this figure, the children of Israel did not extend the gaze of their eyes to the end, that is, to the face of Moses. For the face of Moses, shining, had the figure of truth: a veil was interposed, because they could not yet gaze at the splendor of his face, the children of Israel. Which figure is abolished. For thus the Apostle said: Which are abolished. Why are they abolished? Because when the emperor comes, the images are removed from the midst. The image is viewed there where the emperor is not present: but where he is of whom the image is, the image is removed. Therefore, images were carried before our Emperor the Lord Jesus Christ came. With the images removed, the presence of the emperor shines. Therefore, when anyone turns to the Lord, the veil is removed. For indeed the voice of Moses sounded through the veil, and the face of Moses did not appear. Likewise, now to the Jews the voice of Christ sounds through the voice of the old Scriptures: they hear their voice, they do not see the face of the one sounding. Therefore, do they wish the veil to be removed? Let them turn to the Lord. For then the old are not removed, but are stored in a treasure, so that now it may be that a Scribe is trained in the kingdom of God, bringing forth from his treasure not only new things, nor only old things. For if he brings forth only new things, or only old things; he is not a Scribe trained in the kingdom of God bringing forth from his treasure both new things and old. If he says these things, and does not do them; he brings them forth from the chair, not from the treasure of his heart. And we tell Your Holiness the truth; those things which are brought forth from the old are enlightened by the new. Therefore one turns to the Lord, so that the veil is removed.

Sermons - Sermon 75

SERMO 75 On the Words of the Gospel, Matthew 14:24-33: But the boat was already many stadia from the land, battered by the waves; for the wind was contrary. And in the fourth watch of the night He came to them, walking on the sea. When the disciples saw Him walking on the sea, they were terrified, and said, “It is a ghost!” And they cried out in fear. But immediately Jesus spoke to them, saying, “Take courage, it is I; do not be afraid.”

Peter said to Him, “Lord, if it is You, command me to come to You on the water.” And He said, “Come!” And Peter got out of the boat, and walked on the water and came toward Jesus. But seeing the wind, he became frightened, and beginning to sink, he cried out, “Lord, save me!” Immediately Jesus stretched out His hand and took hold of him, and said to him, “You of little faith, why did you doubt?” When they got into the boat, the wind stopped. And those who were in the boat worshiped Him, saying, “You are certainly God’s Son!”

"But the little boat in the midst of the sea was being tossed by the waves" and so forth. A deeper meaning lies hidden in the deed. The reading of the Gospel which we have just heard admonishes the humility of us all, to see and recognize where we are, and where we should be aiming and hastening to. For that ship carrying the disciples, which was laboring in the waves against an opposing wind, does not signify nothing. Nor without reason did the Lord, leaving the crowds, go up the mountain to pray alone; thereafter coming to His disciples, He found them in peril, walking on the sea, and strengthened them by boarding the ship, and calmed the waves. But what wonder is it if He who created all things can calm all things? However, after He boarded the ship, those being carried said, "Truly, you are the Son of God." But before this evidence, they were disturbed, seeing Him on the sea. For they said, "It is a ghost." But He, boarding the ship, took away the wavering of mind from their hearts, where they were already in more peril from doubt in their minds than in their bodies on the waves.

What the crossing of the sea in a ship signifies. In all things, however, which the Lord has done, He reminds us how we should live here. For no one is not a stranger in this world: although not everyone desires to return to their homeland. From the very journey itself, we suffer waves and storms: but there is a need for us to at least be in the ship. For if in the ship there are dangers, without the ship there is certain destruction. No matter how great the strength of the arms of one who swims in the sea, eventually he is overcome by the vastness of the sea, absorbed and drowned. Therefore, it is necessary for us to be in the ship, that is, to be borne by the wood, so that we may be able to cross this sea. Now this wood, by which our weakness is carried, is the cross of the Lord, on which we are marked, and from the drownings of this world we are delivered. We suffer the waves: but it is He, God, who helps us. The prayer of Christ on the mountain. For the Lord who ascends alone to pray on the mountain, leaving the crowds behind, that mountain signifies the heights of heaven. For leaving the crowds, the Lord alone ascends to heaven after the resurrection, and there he intercedes for us, as the Apostle says. Therefore, what is signified is that, leaving the crowds, he ascends the mountain to pray alone. For he is still the firstborn from the dead, after the resurrection of the body at the right hand of the Father, priest and advocate of our prayers. The head of the Church is above, so that the other members may follow in the end. If, therefore, he intercedes for us, as if at the peak of the mountain, above the height of all creatures, he prays alone. A ship tossed by a storm.

Meanwhile, the ship carrying the disciples, that is, the Church, is tossed and shaken by the storms of temptations: and the contrary wind does not cease, that is, the devil opposing it, who strives to hinder it from reaching rest. But greater is He who intercedes for us. For in this fluctuation of ours in which we labor, He gives us confidence, coming to us and comforting us: only let us not, dismayed in the ship, throw ourselves overboard and cast ourselves into the sea. For although the ship is shaken, it is nonetheless a ship. It alone carries the disciples and receives Christ. Indeed, it is in peril in the sea: but without it, death is immediate. Therefore, hold yourself in the ship and pray to God. For when all counsels fail, when neither the rudders suffice, and even the spreading of the sails is more to danger than to utility; with all human aids and strengths abandoned, the sailors' sole recourse is to pray and to pour out their voices to God. He then grants to sailors that they reach the harbor; will He abandon His Church, that He does not lead it to rest? The storm in the absence of the Lord.

However, brothers, the greatest disturbance in this ship is only in the absence of the Lord. Established in the Church, does it have the Lord absent? When does it have the Lord absent? When it is overcome by some desire. For as it is understood in the sacrament in a certain place: Let not the sun go down upon your wrath; nor give place to the devil: it is understood, not of this sun that has a certain elevation among visible heavenly things, which can be seen commonly both by us and by beasts; but of that light, which only the pure hearts of the faithful see, as it is said: He was the true light, which illuminates every man coming into this world. For this light of the visible sun also illuminates even the smallest and briefest animals. Therefore, the true light is justice and wisdom, which the mind ceases to see, when it has been overcome by the disturbance of anger as if by a cloud: and then it is as if the sun sets over the anger of man. And so in this ship, when Christ is absent, each one is shaken by his own storms, and by his iniquities and desires. For the Law says to you, by way of example: You shall not bear false witness. If you understand the truth of the testimony, you have light in your mind: but if, overcome by base greed, you have determined in your mind to bear false witness, you will already begin to be troubled by the storm with Christ absent; you will be tossed by the waves of your avarice, you will be endangered by the storm of your lusts, and as if Christ were absent, you will almost be submerged. To look back.

How fearful it is, lest the ship should turn away and look back? This happens when, abandoning the hope of heavenly rewards, one is turned aside by longing towards visible and transient things. For even those who are disturbed by temptations of lust, and yet look within, are not entirely desperate, seeking pardon for their sins and striving to overcome and pass through the rage of the storming sea. But those who are so turned away from themselves that they say in their heart, "God does not see; neither does He think of me, or care whether I sin": they turn the prow, are carried by the storm, and are driven back from where they came. For there are many thoughts in the hearts of men: and by the waves of this age, and by many tempests, the ship is troubled when Christ is absent.

Fourth watch of the night. But in the fourth watch of the night, which is the end of the night—for one watch consists of three hours—the Lord comes to aid at the end of the age, and He is seen walking on the waters. Although this ship is troubled by the storms of temptation, it nevertheless sees God glorified walking over all the swells of the sea; that is, over all the principalities of this world. For it had previously been said through His passion that when He, according to the flesh, showed the example of humility, the waves of the sea raged against Him, to which He yielded willingly for us, so that the prophecy might be fulfilled: "I have come into deep waters, and the storm overwhelmed me." For He did not repel false witnesses nor the raging clamor of those shouting, "Crucify Him." He did not suppress the rabid hearts and mouths of the furious by force, but endured with patience. They did to Him all they wished; for He became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. But after He rose from the dead, so that He might alone pray for the disciples established in the Church as in a ship, and carried by the faith of His cross as by wood, and endangered by the temptations of this world as by the waves of the sea, His name began to be honored in this world, in which He was despised, accused, and killed. So that He who had come in the flesh into the deep waters according to His passion, and had been overwhelmed by the storm, might now trample on the necks of the proud as the foam of the waves by the honor of His name. Just as now we see the Lord as though walking on the sea, under whose feet we see all the fury of this world subjected. The error of the disciples portrays the errors of the heretics. But to the dangers of the storms are added also the errors of heretics; and there are those who try to tempt the souls of those in the ship by saying that Christ was not born of a virgin, nor had a true body, but that what was seen by the eyes was something that was not true. And these opinions of the heretics have now arisen, when the name of Christ is already glorified among all nations, just as Christ now walks on the sea. The tempted disciples said, "It is a ghost." But he confirms us against these plagues with his voice, saying: "Take heart; it is I; do not be afraid." For by vain fear do men think these things about Christ, considering His honor and majesty: and they think that He could not have been born in such a way, who has merited to be glorified in such a way, as if they are terrified of one walking on the sea. By this deed is figurated the excellence of His honor: and so they think it was a ghost. But when He says: “It is I;” what else does He say but that He is not what He is not? Therefore, if He showed flesh, it was flesh; if bones, they were bones; if scars, they were scars. For He did not have in Himself, “Yes,” and “No,” but “Yes” was in Him, as the Apostle says. Hence comes that voice: "Take heart; it is I; do not be afraid." That is, "Do not be so terrified of my dignity that you would want to take away from me the truth. Even if I walk on the sea, even if I have the pride and vainglory of this world under my feet like wild waves, nevertheless I appeared as a true man, nevertheless my Gospel truly proclaims about me, that I was born of a virgin, that the Word was made flesh; that I truly said: Touch and see, for a spirit does not have bones as you see that I have; that the hands of the doubting one touched the true marks of my wounds. Therefore: It is I; do not be afraid."

Another errorlikewise shaped. Not only does this matter signify those alone who thought that it was a ghost; it not only designates those who deny that the Lord had human flesh, and sometimes also disturb those who are in the ship with blind perversity: but even those who think that the Lord lied in some things, and do not believe that what He threatened to the impious will come to pass. As though He were partly truthful and partly deceitful, like a ghost appearing in words, as if He is and is not. But those who understand well the voice saying: I am; do not be afraid; already believe all the words of the Lord, so that just as they hope for the rewards He promises, they also fear the penalties He threatens. For just as it is true what He will say to those on the right: Come, blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world: so it is true what those on the left will hear: Depart into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels. For this opinion, by which men think that Christ did not truly threaten the wicked and lost, arose from this, that they see many people and innumerable crowds subject to His name: so from this it seems to them that Christ is a ghost, because He walked on the sea; that is, He seems to lie in threatening punishments, because He seemingly cannot destroy so many innumerable people who are subject to His name and honor. But let them hear Him saying: I am. Therefore, let those not fear who believe that Christ is truthful in all things, not only desiring what He promised, but also avoiding what He threatened: for even if He walks on the sea, that is, all types of men established in this age are subject to Him; yet He is not a ghost, and therefore does not lie when He says: Not everyone who says to Me: Lord, Lord, will enter the kingdom of heaven.

Peter walking on the sea.

What then does it signify that Peter dared to come to Him on the waters? For Peter often bears the person of the Church. What else do we think this meant: "Lord, if it is You, command me to come to You on the waters," except "Lord, if You are truthful and do not lie in any way, let Your Church also be glorified in this world, for prophecy proclaimed this about You"? Let it then walk on the waters, and thus come to You, the one to whom it was said: "The rich among the people will seek your favor." But since human praise does not tempt the Lord, and people in the Church are often disturbed by human praises and honors, and almost sink; therefore Peter trembled on the sea, fearing the great force of the storm. For who does not fear that voice: "Those who call you happy lead you astray, and disturb the paths of your feet"? And because the soul struggles against the desire for human praise, it is good in such a danger to turn to prayer and supplication: lest he who is soothed by praise is overthrown and submerged by reproach. Let Peter, wavering on the wave, cry out and say: "Lord, save me." The Lord then extends His hand: and though He rebukes, saying: "O you of little faith, why did you doubt? Why did you not keep a straight path, looking at Him to whom you were coming, and boast only in the Lord?" Yet He rescues him from the waves, and does not allow him to perish, confessing his weakness and seeking His help. When the Lord is taken into the boat, and faith is confirmed, all doubt removed, and the tempests of the sea calmed, so that they come to the stability and security of the land, all worship saying: "Truly You are the Son of God." For this is the eternal joy, by which the clear truth, and the Word of God, and the Wisdom through which all things were made, and the eminence of His mercy, are known and loved.

Sermons - Sermon 76

SERMO 76 Again on Matthew 14:24-33:

ABOUT THE LORD WALKING ON THE WATERS OF THE SEA, AND ABOUT PETER WAVERING The sea, the age, Peter the type of the Church. The Gospel which was most recently read is about the Lord Christ, who walked on the waters of the sea; and about the apostle Peter, who, walking, wavered with fear, and sinking with doubt, by confessing rose again; it admonishes us to understand that the sea is the present age, but Peter is the type of the one Church. For Peter himself is the foremost in the order of the Apostles, the most ready in love for Christ, often one responding for all. Finally, when the Lord Jesus Christ inquired who men said that He was, with the disciples answering the various opinions of men, and the Lord again asking and saying: But who do you say that I am? Peter replied: You are the Christ, the Son of the living God. One gave the answer for many, unity in many. Then the Lord said to him: Blessed are you, Simon Bar-Jona, for flesh and blood has not revealed this to you, but my Father who is in heaven. Then He added: And I say to you. As if to say: Because you said to me: You are the Christ, the Son of the living God: I also say to you: You are Peter. Indeed, he was previously called Simon. But this name was given to him by the Lord, that he might be called Peter: and this in that figure, to signify the Church. Because Christ is the rock, Peter the Christian people. For the rock is the primary name. Therefore Peter is from the rock, not the rock from Peter: just as not Christ from the Christian, but the Christian from Christ is called. Therefore you are, He says: Peter; and upon this rock which you have confessed, upon this rock which you have recognized, saying: You are the Christ, the Son of the living God, I will build my Church: that is: Upon myself the Son of the living God, I will build my Church. Upon me I will build you, not me upon you. The church is not built upon men, but upon Christ. For men wishing to be built upon men said: "I am of Paul," and "I am of Apollos," and "I am of Cephas," which is Peter. And others who did not wish to be built upon Peter but upon the rock said: "I am of Christ." But the Apostle Paul, when he realized he was being chosen and Christ was being despised, said: "Is Christ divided? Was Paul crucified for you? Or were you baptized in the name of Paul?" Just as you were not baptized in the name of Paul, neither were you in the name of Peter; but in the name of Christ: so that Peter was built upon the rock, not the rock upon Peter.

Peter first blessed, soon called Satan. So then, the same Peter, surnamed blessed from the rock, bearing the figure of the Church, holding the primacy of the apostleship, immediately after a little while when he had already heard that he was blessed, already heard that he was Peter, already heard that he would be built upon the rock, after he heard about the future passion of the Lord, because He had foretold it quickly to His disciples, it displeased him. He feared that he might lose Him who was to die, whom he had confessed as the source of life. He was disturbed, saying: God forbid, Lord; this shall never happen to you. Be kind to yourself, God; I do not wish you to die. Peter was saying to Christ, I do not wish you to die; but Christ was better saying, I wish to die for you. Therefore, immediately he rebuked whom he had praised a little before; and whom he had called blessed, he called Satan. Go behind me, Satan; you are an obstacle to me: for you are not setting your mind on the things of God, but on the things of men. What does he want to make of us out of what we are, who thus blames that we are men? Do you want to know what he wants to make of us? Listen to the Psalm: I said, 'You are gods, and all of you are sons of the Most High', but by thinking humanly: However, you will die like men. The same Peter shortly before blessed, afterwards Satan, in a single moment, within a few words. Do you wonder at the difference in names, consider the differences in causes. Why do you wonder, that shortly before he was blessed, afterwards Satan? Consider the cause why he was blessed. Because flesh and blood did not reveal it to you, but my Father who is in heaven. Therefore blessed, because flesh and blood did not reveal it to you. For if flesh and blood revealed this to you; it was of yourself: but because flesh and blood did not reveal it to you, but my Father who is in heaven; it was of mine, not of yourself. Why of mine? Because all things that the Father has are mine. Behold, you have heard the cause, why blessed, and why Peter. But why that which we shudder at, and do not wish to repeat? Why, except because it was of yourself? For you are not setting your mind on the things of God, but on the things of men. In Peter are symbolized the strong and the weak.

Considering this, we as members of the Church should discern what belongs to God and what belongs to us. Then we will not waver, then we will be founded on the rock, fixed and stable against winds, rains, floods, namely the temptations of the present age. Look, however, at Peter, who was then a figure of us: at one moment he trusts, at another moment he wavers; at one moment he confesses the immortal, at another moment he fears dying. Accordingly, because Christ's Church has strong ones and it has weak ones; it cannot exist without the strong, nor without the weak: hence the Apostle Paul says: But we who are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak; in what Peter said: You are the Christ, the Son of the living God, he signifies the strong; but in the way he trembles and wavers, and does not want Christ to suffer, fearing death, not acknowledging life, he signifies the weak of the Church. Therefore, in that one apostle, that is, Peter, first and foremost in the order of the Apostles, in whom the Church was prefigured, both types had to be represented, that is, the strong and the weak: because without both, the Church does not exist.

Man is weak in himself, strong in the Lord. From this arises therefore also what has just been read: Lord, if it is you, command me to come to you on the waters. If it is you, command me: for I cannot do this in myself, but in you. He understood what was from himself, what was from Him, whose will he believed enabled him to do what no human weakness could accomplish. Therefore: If it is you, command: because when you command, it will happen. What I cannot presume to do, you can command. And the Lord said: Come. And without any hesitation, Peter, at the word of the one commanding, at the presence of the one sustaining, at the presence of the one guiding, without any delay, leaped into the waters and began to walk. He could do what the Lord could, not in himself, but in the Lord. For you were once darkness, but now light; but in the Lord. What no one can do in Paul, no one in Peter, no one in any other of the Apostles, this can be done in the Lord. Therefore, Paul rightly espousing his own unimportance, commending Him: Was Paul crucified for you? Or were you baptized in the name of Paul? Therefore, not in me, but with me; not under me, but under Him. The awareness of one's own infirmity is necessary for obtaining grace.

Thus Peter walked on the waters by the command of the Lord, knowing that he could not do this by himself. Faith achieved what human weakness could not. These are the firm ones of the Church. Attend, listen, understand, act. For it is not necessary to deal with the firm elsewhere, so that they become weak; but it is necessary to deal with the weak, so that they become firm. Yet, many are hindered from firmness by the presumption of firmness. No one will be firm by God, except he who feels himself weak by himself. Separating a voluntary rain God gave to his inheritance. Why do you anticipate, you who know what I am about to say? Let the speed be tempered, so that the slowness may follow. I said this, and I say this: listen, understand, act. No one is made firm by God, except he who feels himself weak by himself. Therefore, as the Psalm says, God separated voluntary rain for his inheritance; not of our merits, but voluntary. Therefore, God separated voluntary rain for His inheritance: for it is weakened; but you perfected it. Because you separated voluntary rain, not regarding the merits of men, but your grace and mercy. Therefore, that inheritance was weakened, and it recognized itself weak in itself, so that it might be firm in you. It would not be firm, if it were not weakened, so that it might be perfected by you in you.

Paul, acknowledging his weakness, is made perfect.

See the portion of this inheritance in Paul, see the one made infirm who said: "I am not fit to be called an Apostle, because I persecuted the Church of God." Why, then, are you an Apostle? "By the grace of God, I am what I am." I am not fit, but by the grace of God, I am what I am. Paul was made infirm, but you have perfected him. Now indeed, since it is by the grace of God that he is what he is, see what follows: "And his grace in me was not in vain, but I labored more abundantly than all of them." See to it that you do not lose by presumption what you have deserved by infirmity. Well this, well: "I am not fit to be called an Apostle; by his grace, I am what I am; and his grace in me was not in vain: all things are excellent." But: "I labored more abundantly than all of them": as if you began to attribute to yourself what just now you had given to God. Recognize, and follow: "Yet not I, but the grace of God with me." Well done, infirm one, you will be most firmly exalted, because you are not ungrateful. You are the same Paul, small in yourself, great in the Lord. You are the one who asked the Lord three times to remove the thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan to buffet you. What was said to you? What did you hear when you asked this? "My grace is sufficient for you; for my power is made perfect in weakness." For indeed he was made infirm, but you have perfected him.

Peter is powerful not in himself, but in the Lord. So too Peter: "Command me," he said, "to come to you upon the waters." I am daring as a man, but I do not ask as a man. Let God as man command, so that what man cannot do, he may be able to do. "Come," he said. And he descended, and began to walk upon the waters: and Peter was able, because the Rock had commanded. Behold what Peter is in the Lord; what is he in himself? Seeing the strong wind, he was afraid; and when he began to sink, he cried out: "Lord, I perish, save me." He dared by the Lord, he could by the Lord: he faltered as a man, he returned to the Lord. "If I said, 'My foot is moved.'" The Psalm speaks, the voice of the holy song is; and if we recognize it, also ours: indeed, if we will, it is also ours. "If I said, 'My foot is moved,'" Why moved, except because it is mine? And what follows? "Your mercy, O Lord, helped me." Not my virtue; but your mercy. For has the Lord indeed abandoned the one who hesitated, who called upon him? Where is that: "Who has called upon God, and been abandoned by him?" Where also that: "Everyone who calls upon the name of the Lord shall be saved?" Immediately extending the help of his right hand, he lifted the sinking one, rebuked the doubting one: "O you of little faith, why did you doubt?" You dared by me, you doubted in me. In the adversity or prosperity of the world, desire is a storm.

Lo, brothers, the discourse must be concluded. Consider the world as a sea, a strong wind, and a great storm. To each individual, their own desire is a storm. You love God; you walk upon the sea, and the swell of the world is under your feet. You love the world; it will swallow you. It knows how to devour its lovers, not to carry them. But when your heart is agitated by desire, to conquer your desire, invoke the divinity of Christ. Do you then think the contrary wind, when there is an adversity of this world? For when there are wars, when there are tumults, when there is famine, when there is pestilence, when any private calamity happens even to each individual, then it is thought that the wind is contrary, there it is thought that God should be invoked. But when the world smiles with temporal prosperity, as if there is no contrary wind. Do not inquire hence about the tranquility of the time: inquire, instead, about your desire. See if there is tranquility in you; see if the inner wind does not subvert you: see this. It is a great virtue to struggle with prosperity, lest it entice, lest it corrupt, lest prosperity itself subvert. It is, I say, a great virtue to struggle with prosperity; it is great felicity not to be conquered by prosperity. Learn to tread upon the world: remember to trust in Christ. And if your foot is moved, if you stumble, if you do not overcome some things, if you begin to sink, say: Lord, I perish, deliver me. Say: I perish; so that you do not perish. For he alone delivers you from the death of the flesh, who died in the flesh for you. Turned to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 77

SERMO 77 OF THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL MT 15, 21-28 "Jesus, having departed from Gennesaret, withdrew to the regions."

"Thyrea and Sidon, and behold, a Canaanite woman" and so forth The Canaanite woman, an example of humility. This Canaanite woman, who was commended to us by the reading of the Gospel, provides us an example of humility and the path of piety: she shows how to rise from humility to great heights. However, she was not, as it appears, from the people of Israel, from whom are the Patriarchs, the Prophets, and the ancestors of our Lord Jesus Christ according to the flesh; from whom is the Virgin Mary herself, who gave birth to Christ. Therefore, this woman was not from that people, but was from the Gentiles. For, as we have heard, the Lord withdrew to the regions of Tyre and Sidon, and a Canaanite woman from those territories came out and urgently sought the favor of curing her daughter, who was grievously tormented by a demon. Tyre and Sidon were not cities of the people of Israel, but of the Gentiles; although close to that people. Therefore, she cried out eagerly to receive the favor and persistently knocked: and she was ignored, not so that mercy might be denied, but so that her desire might be kindled; and not only that her desire might be kindled but, as I said before, that her humility might be commended. Therefore, she cried out as if to a Lord who did not hear her, but who was silently arranging what he was going to do. The disciples interceded for her and said, "Dismiss her, for she cries out after us." And He said, "I was sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel."

How Christ was sent only to the Israelites.

Here arises the question of these words: How do we come to the fold of Christ from the Gentiles if He was sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel? What does such a deep purpose of this mystery mean, that while the Lord knew why He came, namely to have a Church among all the Gentiles, He said He was sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel? Therefore, we understand His presence in His body, His birth, the exhibition of His miracles, and the power of His resurrection had to be shown among that people. Thus it was ordained, so it was commended from the beginning, this was foretold, this was fulfilled: because Christ Jesus had to come to the Jewish people to be seen, to be killed, and to gain from them those whom He had foreseen beforehand. For that people were not condemned but sifted. There was a multitude of chaff there, there a hidden dignity of grains: there what was to be burned, there what was to fill the granary. For from where did the Apostles come if not from there? From where Peter? From where the others?

Saul changed into Paul.

Whence Paul himself, first Saul? That is, first proud, later humble. For when he was Saul, his name was derived from Saul. But Saul was a proud king: in the kingdom of David, he persecuted the humble. Thus when Saul, who later became Paul, then indeed proud, then a persecutor of the innocent, then a devastator of the Church, had received letters (as if burning with zeal for the Synagogue and pursuing the Christian name) from the priests to bring those he found who were Christians to suffer punishments. As he proceeds, as he pants for slaughter, as he thirsts for blood, by the heavenly voice of Christ the persecutor was struck down, and the preacher was raised up. This fulfilled what is written in the prophet: I will strike, and I will heal. For God strikes down what exalts itself in man against God. The physician is not impious who strikes the swelling, who cuts or burns the rot. He inflicts pain: he inflicts it, but so as to lead to health. He is troublesome: but if he were not, he would not be useful. Therefore Christ struck down Saul with one word, raised Paul: that is, struck down the proud, raised the humble. For what was the reason for changing his name, that when he was called Saul before, later he wanted to be called Paul; except that he recognized the name Saul in himself, when he persecuted, as being of pride? Therefore he chose a humble name, that he should be called Paul, that is, the least. For Paul means the least. Paul is nothing other than small. Of which name already glorying, and commending humility: I, he says, am the least of the Apostles. Whence, therefore, wherefrom this one, except from the people of the Jews? Hence the other Apostles, hence Paul, hence those whom Paul himself commends as having seen the Lord after the resurrection. For he says he was seen by about five hundred brothers at once, of whom many remain until now, but some have fallen asleep. The Jews, having heard Peter, were converted. From that people, even those who, when Peter was speaking, proclaiming the passion, resurrection, and divinity of Christ, had received the Holy Spirit, when all those upon whom the Holy Spirit came spoke in the tongues of all nations, were pricked in spirit, those who heard from the people of the Jews sought counsel for their salvation, understanding themselves guilty of the blood of Christ: that they themselves had crucified Him, they themselves had killed Him, in whose name they saw so many miracles being performed, they saw the presence of the Holy Spirit.

Therefore, seeking counsel, they received the response: Repent, and let every one of you be baptized in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ; and your sins will be forgiven. Who would despair of having their sins forgiven when the crime of killing Christ was pardoned for the guilty? Some among the Jewish people converted: they converted and were baptized. They approached the Lord's table and, believing, drank the blood they had shed in their rage. But how they converted, how clearly and perfectly, is told by the Acts of the Apostles. For they sold all their possessions and laid the prices of their belongings at the Apostles' feet; and distribution was made to each as they had need: and no one said that anything was his own, but they had all things in common. And they had, as it is written, one soul and one heart in God. Behold the sheep of which He said: I was sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. For He showed His presence to them, and while being crucified by them, He prayed, saying: Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing. The physician understood that the mindless ones, in a frenzy, were killing the physician, and by killing the physician, they did not know they were making a remedy for themselves. For by the death of the Lord, we are all healed, redeemed by His blood, freed from hunger by the bread of His body. This presence Christ showed to the Jews. Therefore He said: I was sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel: so that He might show the presence of His body to them; not to neglect and overlook the sheep He had among the Gentiles.

Christ was not sent to the nations, but he sent them. For he did not go to the Gentiles himself, but sent his disciples. And there was fulfilled what the prophet said: A people whom I have not known, served me. See how high, how evident, how explicit the prophecy: A people whom I have not known, that is, to whom I have not shown my presence, served me. How? It follows: By the hearing of the ear, they obeyed me: that is, not by seeing, but by hearing they believed. Therefore, greater is the praise of the Gentiles. For they saw, and killed: the Gentiles heard, and believed. But for the calling and gathering of the Gentiles, that what we have just sung may be fulfilled: Gather us from among the Gentiles, that we may give thanks to your name, and glory in your praise, Paul the apostle was sent. That least one made great, not by himself, but by him whom he persecuted, was sent to the Gentiles, from a robber to a shepherd, from a wolf to a sheep. That least apostle was sent to the Gentiles, and labored much among the Gentiles, and through him the Gentiles believed. His letters are his witnesses. The daughter of the synagogue leader, and a woman suffering from bleeding.

You have this most sacredly figured in the Gospel. A certain daughter of the synagogue ruler had died, and her father was asking the Lord to go to her: he had left her sick and in danger. The Lord was going to visit and heal the sick girl: meanwhile, she was announced dead, and it was said to the father: "The girl is dead, do not trouble the teacher anymore." But the Lord, who knew he could raise the dead, did not take away hope from the despairing man and said to the father: "Do not fear, only believe." He proceeded toward the girl: and on the way among the crowds, as she could, a certain woman who suffered from a flow of blood and had spent all that she had on doctors in vain because of that long illness, touched the hem of his garment and was healed. And the Lord said: "Who touched me?" The disciples, who did not know what had been done and saw him pressed by the crowds and were concerned about one who had lightly touched him, answered: "The crowd presses you, and you say, ‘Who touched me?’" And he said: "Someone touched me." For these press upon me, but she touched me. Many therefore press against the body of Christ harassingly, few touch it healthily. He said, "Someone touched me." For I felt power go out from me. And when she saw that she was not hidden, she fell down before his feet and confessed what had been done. After this, he went on, reached where he was going, and found the girl, the daughter of the synagogue ruler, dead, and raised her. The account of those things, although truly done, is nevertheless a figure.

Indeed, it happened, and it was fulfilled as it is told: but nevertheless, even the things that were done by the Lord were significant, as if they were visible words, so to speak, and meaningful. This is most evident in the fact that He sought fruit on the tree out of season, and because He did not find any, He cursed the tree, making it wither. This action, unless taken symbolically, seems foolish: firstly, to have sought fruit on that tree when it was not the season for any tree to bear fruit; secondly, if it were the season for fruit, not having fruit would be the fault of the tree? But because it signified that He was seeking not only leaves but also fruit, that is, not only words but also deeds of men; by making it wither where He found only leaves, He signified the punishment of those who can speak good things but do not want to do good deeds. Thus, also here. For it is undoubtedly a mystery. The all-knowing One says: Who touched Me? The Creator, appearing like an unknowing one, asks not only who knew this but also who foresaw other things. There is certainly something that Christ speaks to us, signifying through the mystery.

What is represented by those things? The daughter of the ruler of the synagogue signified the people of the Jews, for whom Christ came, who said: "I was not sent except to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." But the woman who suffered from a flow of blood symbolized the Church from the Gentiles, to whom Christ had not been sent by the presence of his body. He was going to her, intending her salvation: she intervened, touched the hem as if he were unaware, that is, she was healed as if by someone absent. He said: "Who touched me?" as if he were saying, "I do not know this people. The people whom I did not know served me. Someone touched me. For I felt power go out from me," that is, the Gospel sent forth filled the entire world. The hem, a small part and the end of the garment, was touched. Consider the garment of Christ as representing the Apostles. There, the hem was Paul: that is, the last and the least. For he said both of himself: "I am the least of the Apostles." For he was called after all, believed after all, healed more than all. The Lord was not sent except to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. But because even the people whom he did not recognize were to serve, and were to hear about him through the hearing of the ear, nor was he silent about them there. The same Lord said in another place: "I have other sheep that are not of this fold; it is necessary for me also to bring them, that there may be one flock and one shepherd." The perseverance of the Canaanite woman in asking.

Then that woman was: therefore she was not despised, but deferred. He said, "I was not sent except to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." And she, shouting, persisted, persevered, knocked, as if she had already heard, "Ask, and you will receive; seek, and you will find; knock, and it will be opened to you." She insisted, she knocked. For even the Lord when he said these words: "Ask, and you will receive; seek, and you will find; knock, and it will be opened to you;" had previously said: "Do not give what is holy to the dogs, nor cast your pearls before swine; lest they trample them under their feet, and turn and tear you apart:" that is, after the scorn of your pearls, they may even be troublesome to you. Do not therefore throw to them what they despise.

Why nations dogs. And how do we discern (as if they were responding) who are the swine, who are the dogs? This was demonstrated in that woman. For to that insistent woman he replied thus: It is not good to take the children’s bread and throw it to the dogs. You are a dog, you are one of the Gentiles, you worship idols. But what is more familiar to dogs than to lick stones? Therefore, it is not good to take the children’s bread and throw it to the dogs. If she had left after these words, she would have approached as a dog and departed as a dog: but by knocking, she was made a human from a dog. For she persisted in asking, and by that very reproach, she showed humility and obtained mercy. For she was neither upset nor angry that she was called a dog while asking for a benefit, pleading for mercy: but she said: Yes, Lord; you have called me a dog; clearly, I am a dog, I recognize my name; Truth speaks: but on that account, I should not be repelled from the benefit. Indeed a dog: but even dogs eat the crumbs that fall from their masters' table. I desire a small and insignificant benefit: I do not intrude at the table, but I seek the crumbs.

Humility commended in the Canaanite.

See how humility is commended. The Lord called that woman a dog; she did not say: I am not; but she said: I am. And the Lord immediately, because she acknowledged herself as a dog, said: O woman, great is your faith! let it be done for you as you have asked. You have acknowledged yourself as a dog, I now acknowledge you as a human. O woman, great is your faith! you asked, you sought, you knocked; receive, find, let it be opened to you. See, brothers, how in this woman who was a Canaanite, that is, who came from the Gentiles, and bore the type, that is, the figure of the Church, humility is especially commended. For indeed, the Jewish people, in order to be driven away from the Gospel, were puffed up with pride, because they had merited to receive the Law, because the Patriarchs had come forth from that people, the Prophets existed, Moses, the servant of God, had performed great miracles which we have heard in the Psalm, had done them in Egypt, had led the people through the Red Sea as the waters receded, had received the Law, which he had given to that same people. There was reason for the Jewish people to be proud, and through that same pride, it happened that it did not want to humble itself to Christ, the author of humility, the suppressor of arrogance, the doctor God, who for this reason, although He was God, became man, so that man might recognize man. Great medicine. If this medicine does not cure pride, I do not know what will cure it. He is God, and becomes man: he sets aside divinity, that is, in a way he excludes, that is, hides what was his, shows what he had taken. He becomes man, although he is God: and man does not recognize himself as man, that is, he does not acknowledge himself mortal, does not acknowledge himself fragile, does not acknowledge himself a sinner, does not acknowledge himself sick, so that he might seek a doctor as a sick person! but, what is more dangerous, he sees himself as healthy! The Jews, having been rejected because of pride, the Gentiles were substituted in their place because of humility.

Therefore, for this reason, that people did not approach, that is, because of pride: and they are said to be from the olive tree, that is, from that people created from the Patriarchs, natural branches were broken, that is, Jews justly sterile with the spirit of pride; and the wild olive tree was grafted into that olive tree. The wild olive tree is a people from the Gentiles. Thus the Apostle says that the wild olive tree was grafted into the olive tree, but the natural branches were broken off. They were broken because of pride: the wild olive tree was grafted because of humility. This humility was shown by the woman, saying: Yes, Lord, I am a dog, I desire the crumbs. In this humility also that Centurion pleased: who, when he wanted his servant to be healed by the Lord, and the Lord said: I will come and heal him; he answered: Lord, I am not worthy that you should enter under my roof; but only say the word, and my servant will be healed. I am not worthy that you should enter under my roof. He did not receive Him in his house, he received Him in his heart. The humbler, the more capable, the fuller. For hills repel water, valleys are filled. What then, what did the Lord say to this, after he said: I am not worthy that you should enter under my roof, to those who followed: Amen I say to you, I have not found such great faith in Israel: that is, in that people to whom I came, I have not found such great faith. Such great, what is it? So great. Whence great? From the smallest, that is, from humility, great. I have not found such great faith: like a mustard seed, the smaller, the more fervent. Therefore the Lord was now grafting the wild olive tree into the olive tree. He was doing this then, when He said: Amen I say to you, I have not found such great faith in Israel.

Carnal things are not to be expected in the kingdom of heaven.

Finally, see what follows. Therefore I say to you (because I have not found such great faith in Israel, that is, such humility with faith): Therefore I say to you, that many will come from the east and the west, and will recline with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven. They will recline, he says, they will rest. For we ought not to think of carnal feasts there, nor desire anything of the sort in that kingdom, so that we do not replace vices with virtues, but subjugate vices. For it is one thing to desire the kingdom of heaven for wisdom and eternal life; another, for earthly happiness, as if we would have it richer and greater there. If you think you will be wealthy in that kingdom, you do not cut off desire, you change it: and yet you will be rich, and only rich there. For here your need collects many things. Why do the rich have much? Because they need much. Greater need as if acquires greater means: there the need itself will die. Then you will truly be rich, when you will need nothing. For you will not be rich, and the angel poor, who has neither animals nor carriages nor households. Why? Because he does not need them: because the stronger he is, the less he needs. Therefore there are riches, and true riches. Do not think of the feasts of this earth there. For the feasts of this earth are daily medicines; they are necessary for a certain sickness we are born with. Whoever feels this sickness when the hour of refreshment has passed. Do you want to see how great this sickness is, that it kills like an acute fever, in seven days? Do not think you are healthy. Health will be immortality. For this is a long sickness. Because you sustain your sickness with daily medicines; you seem to be healthy to yourself: remove the medicines, and see what you can do. The necessity of dying from the very beginning. For from the time we are born, it is necessary that we die. This disease must necessarily lead to death. Certainly, when doctors examine the sick, they say this. For example, he has dropsy; he will die: this disease cannot be cured. He has leprosy; nor can this disease be cured. He has consumption; who can cure this? It is necessary that he perish, it is necessary that he die. Behold, the doctor has already said, He has consumption; he cannot survive; yet sometimes, neither does dropsy lead to death, nor does leprosy lead to death, nor does consumption lead to death: and yet it is necessary that anyone who has been born, dies from it. He will die from it, it cannot be otherwise. This is pronounced by both the doctor and the unlearned: but even if he dies later, does he not, nevertheless, die? So then, when is true health, except when there is true immortality? Therefore if there is true immortality, there is no corruption, no deficiency; what need will there be for food there? Therefore, when you hear: They will recline with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob; do not prepare the stomach, but the mind. You will be filled there: and that inner stomach itself has its own food. According to this stomach it is said: Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness, for they shall be satisfied. And indeed they will be satisfied, so that they do not hunger. The natural branches are cut off, and the wild olive is grafted in. The Lord was therefore already grafting the wild olive tree when he said: Many will come from the east and the west, and will sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven, that is, they will be grafted into the olive tree. For the roots of this olive tree are Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob: but the children of the kingdom, that is the unbelieving Jews, will go into outer darkness. The natural branches will be cut off in order that the wild olive tree may be grafted in. But why did the natural branches deserve to be cut off, if not for pride? Why did the wild olive tree deserve to be grafted in, if not for humility? Hence also this woman said: Yes, Lord: for even the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their masters' table. And therefore she hears: O woman, great is your faith! Similarly, that Centurion: I am not worthy that you should enter under my roof. Truly I say to you, I have not found such great faith in Israel. Let us learn, or maintain humility. If we do not yet have it, let us learn: if we have it, let us not lose it. If we do not yet have it, let us acquire it, so that we may be grafted in: if we already have it, let us maintain it, so that we may not be cut off.

Sermons - Sermon 77A

SERMON 77/A

TRACTATUS On the Canaanite Woman According to Matthew What the Canaanite woman teaches us. That woman, who was crying out after the Lord, you heard how she sought, asked, knocked, and it was opened to her. Therefore, it teaches us to seek, so that we find; to ask, so that we receive; to knock, so that it is opened to us. Why then was the Lord unwilling to grant what was asked? Was He unmerciful? But He knew when to give, who delayed giving; for He was not denying His gift, but was exercising her desire. Therefore, let us cry out to Him, as we have now sung: Have mercy on me, O God, have mercy on me, for my soul hopes in You. Have mercy on me, says, O God: why? Because my soul has hoped in You. This, says He, is the sacrifice which I offer to You, that You may hear me: because my soul has hoped in You. Who has hoped in God and been abandoned? It even happens in great temptations; and however much we progress in God, we live under pardon. Did not the Lord Jesus teach the little lambs, and not the rams themselves, to pray? His disciples, our Apostles, the very leaders of the flock, of whom we are the children, as it was said: Offer to the Lord the sons of rams; He was teaching those very rams to pray, when He told them to say: Forgive us our debts. If this daily prayer exists, we live under pardon. And all our sins were forgiven in baptism, and we live under pardon. We progress, if our hope in God is nurtured and strengthened by Him helping us, so that we restrain all lust. Let us fight: our struggle is known to Him, who knows how both to watch and to help. The sacrifice of the mind is to trust in the Lord.

You have heard, when the Apostle was read: We know, he says, that the law is spiritual; but I am carnal. See who says what. The law, he says, is spiritual; but I am carnal, sold under sin; for what I do, I do not know. What does he mean: I do not know? I do not accept, I do not approve. For I do not do what I want, but what I hate, that I do. But if I do what I do not want, I agree with the law that it is good. What does he mean: I agree with the law? Because what I do not want, the law does not want that either: therefore, when I do what I do not want, and this is not wanted by the law, I agree with the law that it is good. But it is spiritual, and I am carnal; what, then, will happen? Do we do what we do not want, and if we do all sorts of bad things, will we be unpunished? Let it not be, do not promise yourself this, O man, pay attention to what follows: But if I do what I do not want, it is no longer I that do it, but sin that dwells in me. What is the sin he speaks of, if not the desire of the flesh? And lest you think it does not pertain to you, he said, that sin dwells in me. And what does he mean: I do not do it? I desire with the flesh, but with the mind I do not consent. The flesh desires, the mind does not consent: behold the struggle. Remain, mind, in your fight, and ask help from the Lord your God. Remain, mind, in your fight, and cry out as that woman: Lord, help me. Remain, mind, in your fight, and cry out as you have sung: Have mercy on me, O God, have mercy on me. Behold the sacrifice: My soul has trusted in you. In baptism, iniquity is erased, but weakness remains; however, in the resurrection, there will be no iniquity, and weakness will be consumed. When this mortal body puts on immortality, and this corruptible body puts on incorruption, then the saying that is written will be fulfilled: Death is swallowed up in victory.

Where, O death, is your sting? And if the contention of death is our struggle, it is no longer I that do it, but sin that dwells in me. He called the desire of the flesh sin; I desire, but with the mind I do not consent, and the desire to evil does not cease to incite. This is the contention of death. However, then the external enemy, the devil, will be underfoot, when the internal enemy, desire, will be healed, and we will live in peace. What kind of peace? That which eye has not seen, nor ear heard. What kind of peace? That which no heart has conceived, no discord pursues. What kind of peace? Of which the Apostle said: And the peace of God, which surpasses all understanding, will guard your hearts. Of this peace, the prophet Isaiah speaks: Lord our God, give us peace; for you have given us all things. You promised Christ, and you gave. You promised His cross, and the shedding of His blood for the remission of sins, and you gave. You promised His ascension, and the sending of the Holy Spirit from heaven, and you gave. You promised the Church spread throughout the whole world, and you gave. You promised the future heretics for our exercise and proving, and victory of the Church over their errors, and you gave. You promised the abolishment of idols of the nations, and you gave. Lord our God, give us peace; for you have given us all things.

Every day must be fought against desire.

Meanwhile, until we come to that peace where we will have no enemy, let us fight long, faithfully, and vigorously, so that we may deserve to be crowned by the Lord God. The Apostle James says: No one, when tempted, should say that they are tempted by God. He speaks of temptation that is for seduction. God, he says, is not the tempter of evils, and he tempts no one; but each one is tempted by their own desire, being drawn away and enticed by it. Then desire, when it has conceived, gives birth to sin; and sin, when it is full-grown, gives birth to death. Therefore, each one is tempted by their own desire; thus, let them fight, let them resist, do not consent, do not be dragged away, do not allow it to conceive what it will bear. Behold, temptation flatters, it stirs, it presses, it demands that you do something evil; do not consent, and it will not conceive. If you think willingly, it conceives; it will bring forth for you to die. See what the Apostle says: Sin, when it is full-grown, brings forth death. Sin is sweet, but death is bitter: beware of the sweetness of sin, lest you feel the bitterness of death; beware of desire, and even if not in deed, certainly in word. You hear something willingly that you should not hear, you say what you should not say, you think what you should not think. Nothing is faster than thought; it has incredible wings; it flings itself from the heart, and precedes language; evil is thought before it is spoken. Do not stand there. A thought creeps in: go away from there, proceed elsewhere, do not linger there. You do not intend to do evil: why do you willingly think what you do not wish to do? My brothers, for whom these sins are not great, doubting to persist in them, the Lord says: Say, forgive us our debts. However much you may advance, you have that desire within you. Before death is swallowed up in victory, thus say: Forgive us our debts. Do not raise your head in pride, fear God: we live under pardon. Say with all your heart: Forgive us our debts. This concerns the past, what has been done, what has been said, what has been thought: regarding the future, what? Listen, and say what follows: Lead us not into temptation. Watch and pray that you do not enter into temptation. What is: to enter into temptation? To consent to evil desire. Have you consented? you have entered: or quickly leave. Before you come to sin, kill your consent; rejoice that you have not done it, regret that you have thought it.

Sin should be feared more than death.

Brothers, let us have a wise heart: let us fear God who promises great things, who threatens terrible things. This life will end someday. You see that people pass away from here daily: death can be postponed, but it cannot be taken away. Whether we wish it or not, this life will end; let us desire that life which has no end; to which life there is no way to pass except through death. Let us not fear, therefore, that which will come someday; let us fear that which, if it comes, and takes hold of us in sins, draws us not to temporal but to eternal death; which may God avert from all, and from us, and from you. O man, do you not fear to die eternally, who acts in such a way as to be punished or die eternally? Let the fear of this death teach you how the future death is to be feared. You fear death: can you escape death? Whether you like it or not, it must come. You fear death, you should fear sin more; for by sin the soul dies, sin is the enemy of your soul. You will be resolved from sin someday, but freed from the fetters of corruptible flesh, see that you are not bound by the fetters of gehenna. When freed, you should be free, not a servant. Beware of fraud, because of that covetousness which is called avarice; beware of shameful gains, because of the covetousness which is called avarice; because this avarice is also the root of all evils, as Scripture says. Beware of drunkenness, beware of adultery, theft, lying, false testimony. Beware of blasphemies, enchantments, incantations, and various superstitions. Beware of usury and interest; do not have fellowship with moneylenders, dismiss them. A day will come when it will be said to them: Your money be with you to destruction. A day of judgment will come, when for this money, and with this money, they will burn in eternal fire, where there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth. That money will be a testimony against them. Do not give or take it in such a way, lest you begin to render a bad account of yourselves to God on the day of judgment. For what does it profit them, except that for the money, which they will either lose while alive or leave behind when dead, they lose their soul, which they cannot redeem? As the holy Gospel says: What does it profit a man, if he gains the whole world, but suffers the loss of his soul? Or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul? Therefore, beware, my brothers, of usury and interest, and do not say: And from what shall we live? This is not to seek life but death. Do not say: And from what shall we live? There are other means by which men conduct themselves. Do not do what God prohibits, do not live from it. O wretched and miserable, and unhappy! You attend to the fact that you live from it, and do not attend to how you will die from it. And from what, you ask, shall I live? This a pimp can also tell me, this a robber can also tell me; should robbery or pimping be practiced for that reason, because those who do them live from them? Woe to the wretched who live from them, because they die from them. It is better to beg than to live from illicit actions. Finally, it is better for a man to die than by living from illicit actions to bring about that he is tormented by eternal death. This death ends pain: that death remains in eternal pains. Believe, understand, fear, abstain from every evil thing; study the word of God, love to hear what God wills, and what He promises to those who do His will. And for it to be done what He commands, God is to be prayed to, and God helps.

[Explicit Treatise on the Canaanite Woman according to Matthew].

Sermons - Sermon 77B

Sermon 77/B ON THE CANAANITE WOMAN The Canaanite woman obtained a favor from Christ by persevering in prayer.

You know from the Gospel, brothers, how the Canaanite woman obtained by perseverance what she could not by a single request; and the Lord, by delaying her, was exercising her desire, not denying the benefit; for he knew where she would reach by asking, as he himself was teaching her to this end. First, she was called a dog by him; afterwards, woman, great is your faith. Having received the benefit, she departed joyful; but first she was changed, and then made joyful. How much changed? Made from a dog into a woman. And what kind of woman? One whose faith was great. Much was gained: in one moment, how much she advanced! For this reason, the Lord delayed, who said: Always pray, and do not give up. For it is the Lord's command urging us to pray. Every day people pray; the devout do not neglect the times of prayer. For the Apostle also says: Always rejoice, pray without ceasing. This means: One ought always to pray, and not to lose heart. In another place, the Lord himself says: Ask, and it will be given to you; seek, and you will find; knock, and it will be opened to you. This is what the Canaanite woman did: she asked, she sought, she knocked, she received. But she did this that her daughter might be healed from a demon, and she deserved it; her daughter was made well from that hour. Would she have asked again after her daughter was healed? Until she received, she sought, asked, knocked; she received, was joyful, and departed. I do not know what it is, or rather, it is something great, for which it is necessary to always pray and not to give up. It is more than the health of the daughter, it is the immortality of life: this is what it is necessary to always pray for until the end, as long as life is lived here, until life without end is lived, where there will no longer be petition but exultation.

Other different prayers are not to be condemned.

Therefore, now we ought always to pray, and not lose heart. This one prays for this, that one for that; your prayers are diverse because your desires are diverse. All groan almost equally: but He who hears distributes the wills. One asks God, like that Canaanite woman, that the son who is sick may be healthy; a woman prays for her husband, a husband for his wife; they all pray for the sick: such a prayer is not to be reproached. Others pray, groan, intercede, seek, ask, knock, to become rich; and the greater the desire, the more ardent and frequent is such a prayer. And some even think that the Lord said this for this reason: Ask, and you will receive; seek, and you will find; knock, and it will be opened to you; for everyone who asks receives, and the one who seeks finds, and to the one who knocks, it will be opened. The covetous man hears this, and daily asks for nothing else except to become rich. But, to be silent about the covetous man, the poor man hears this; he prays, asks, seeks, knocks, to become rich; and sometimes he spends much time, and finds no moment in receiving, and says to himself: What did the Lord mean by saying: Ask, and you will receive; seek, and you will find; knock, and it will be opened to you; for everyone who asks receives, and who seeks finds, and to the one who knocks, it will be opened? What have I done, miserable one, that I ask and do not receive? What shall we say to such a one? Did the Lord lie?

Did the Scripture lie? By no means. Even avarice itself does not dare to say this: what therefore does greed not say, will piety say it?

God provides what helps, not what harms.

What then shall we say to that man? Ask still, insist still, knock still; because it is not said in vain: Everyone who asks receives. Pray as much as you can, ask, knock, persevere, and you shall be rich. He delays time in praying, he expires in poverty; he has received nothing, he finds nothing to leave to his children. Is then all the labor of asking, seeking, knocking lost? It is not lost. Therefore to such a man, not yet... living what is to be said, except: Change your prayer? And why do you ask, seek, knock, that you may become rich from being poor? Have you not heard the Apostle saying: Those who want to become rich fall into temptation, and many foolish and harmful desires, which plunge men into ruin and destruction? Behold what you were asking: but your Father, from whom you asked it, mercifully denied what you asked, lest you should fall into ruin and destruction. Behold, change your prayer. For even you do not give to your son what he has asked. What if your son asked for a knife with which to wound himself, or weeping, asked to be lifted onto a horse, would you do it? Would you dare? Is it not better for him to cry while safe, than to be mourned while injured? If therefore you, being greater, know how to give good things to your son, how much more does the Father, who is always good, provide for you when he does not give what you know not? It is necessary that you be a son; he does not despise you, be sure, son. Paul the Apostle, when he was buffeted by the angel of Satan, lest he be exalted, as he himself confesses - for who among us would dare to say such a thing about the Apostle? - said of the angel of Satan: For which cause I besought the Lord thrice, that it might depart from me; and He said to me: My grace is sufficient for you, for power is made perfect in weakness. Why indeed do you ask, O Paul? Is it not that it might be well with you? Leave the artisan to work how you do not know, that it might be well with you. Does the poultice hurt you when it stings? It is for you, for it heals. If therefore the Apostle Paul asked and was not heard, why are you sad when you are not heard? Perhaps indeed what you ask is not expedient for you to receive. The devil was heard but not the Apostle.

It is a wondrous thing, my brothers: the Apostle asked, and he did not receive; the devil asked, and he received: the Apostle was not heard, and the devil was heard. O justice! Rather, great justice. And where, you say, was the devil heard? Did you not read, or did you not hear, the demons were heard and allowed to go into the swine? Or did you not read, or did you not hear, the devil asked the Lord to test His servant Job, and he received? A wondrous thing! The devil asked, and Job was delivered. Delivered, but to be tested; delivered, but to be tried; delivered, but to be examined, and to be recommended to posterity. The devil received him, but to be confounded. You see because it is not always good to receive what you ask for. Therefore, change your prayers, so you may securely receive what is good; change your prayers, amend your desires. I say this to those who desire temporal things to become rich.

It must be requested what Idithun was asking, whose words were sung.

See what Idithun was asking, whose words we sang: Hear, he says, my prayer, heed my tears with your ears. Was he asking for riches? Did he have a wound in his body, and was he asking for it to be healed? And where do we find what he was asking for, or in what desires he was exercising his prayers, or for what desires he was shedding tears, which he wanted to be heard? Where do we find his desire? Where, if not in his words? My substance, he says, is as nothing before you. Truly, however, all is vanity, every living man. And now what is my expectation? Is it not you, Lord? And my substance is always before you. A little earlier he said: And my substance is as nothing before you. Mortal substance is as nothing before you; but because after this life I will receive immortality, for which I want you to heed my tears, there will be immortal substance before you always. Behold the desire, behold what to seek, behold what to desire, behold what to pray for; behold what must always be prayed for, until we depart from here, and not to fail.

Pray and weep, hope to attain all that God has promised.

Perhaps one of you might say: What did Idithun mean by saying: "Hear my tears"? For tears are seen, not heard; tears flow, they do not sound. Truly, they have their own voices, just as the blood of Abel had its own voice. If the blood of the slain cried out to the Lord, then the tears of the one beseeching also do, absolutely. For tears are indeed the blood of the heart. Therefore, when you ask for eternal life, when you say: "Thy kingdom come," where you may live securely, where you may always live, where you may never mourn a friend, never fear a foe, when you ask for this, weep, shed your inner blood, offer up your heart to your God; this is what it means to pray and not give up; this is what the Lord's prayer teaches: "Hallowed be thy name, thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven," so that we may be equal to your angels. O desire! Who would dare to desire such a thing, if God had not deigned to promise it? Pray: what you ask for is great, but greater is the one who promised. It is difficult what he promised, for a man to become an angel, nothing difficult. But everything is possible for God. You think it is something great and difficult for a man to become an angel; does it not seem difficult to you, and much more difficult and much more incredible, that the Only-Begotten of God became a man? That a man should become an angel, man doubts, for whom God became a man! Do you doubt you will receive what you ask for, when you hold such a pledge, who deigned to freely make himself your debtor? You did not lend money or give some service to God. Do you not have anything that is not from Him, and that you are to receive also from him? He deigned to make himself a debtor, and what kind of debtor! He wrote the chirograph, gave the pledge. His chirograph is the divine Scripture; his pledge is the death of Christ, his promise is the death of Christ. He who gave the death of his Son to the impious, would he deny the death of his Son to the pious and faithful?

It should be asked not only with words but also with actions. Be secure, brethren, you will receive: ask, seek, knock, you will receive, you will find, it will be opened to you. But do not ask, seek, knock only with voices, but also with conduct; perform good deeds, without which this life ought not at all to be led; with daily good deeds, erase sins. Do not despise even those light sins; although they may not be great, they accumulate, they make a heap; they amass and form a mass. Do not despise because they are minute, but fear if they are many. What is more minute than drops of rain? And with these many, fields are satisfied, rivers are filled. Do not despise your light and small sins, lest, having formed a heap, they weigh you down. Behold, the water of the sea gradually trickles through the cracks of a ship, and yet it fills the bilge; if it is not bailed out, it sinks the ship. However, if a large wave comes, like a mountain, it overwhelms the ship at once and destroys it; such are murders, that is, serious sins such as adultery, fornications, blasphemies, perjuries; they are great sins, they overwhelm at once. Those small sins, however, without which human life cannot exist, gradually enter through the cracks of human frailty and flow into the bilge. Imitate sailors, whose hands do not cease, and nothing remains in the bilge; let them not cease, I say, from good deeds. But again they flow into the bilge, because the cracks of human frailty remain; and therefore, let the bilge be bailed out again. For if your hands do not cease from bailing out with good deeds, that day will find you pure; and you will come securely to that life which Idithun longed for, when he said: "Receive my tears with your ears."

[Explicit sermon about the Canaanite woman].

Sermons - Sermon 77C

SERMON 77/C On the Birth of John the Baptist And his father Zechariah was filled with the Holy Spirit and prophesied, saying: "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, for he has visited and redeemed his people. And has raised up a horn of salvation for us in the house of his servant David, as he spoke by the mouth of his holy prophets from of old, that we should be saved from our enemies and from the hand of all who hate us; to show the mercy promised to our fathers and to remember his holy covenant, the oath that he swore to our father Abraham, to grant us that we, being delivered from the hand of our enemies, might serve him without fear, in holiness and righteousness before him all our days. And you, child, will be called the prophet of the Most High; for you will go before the Lord to prepare his ways, to give knowledge of salvation to his people in the forgiveness of their sins, because of the tender mercy of our God, whereby the sunrise shall visit us from on high to give light to those who sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, to guide our feet into the way of peace." And the child grew and became strong in spirit, and he was in the wilderness until the day of his public appearance to Israel. FROM THE SERMON ON THAT WHICH IS WRITTEN:

"If anyone desires to come after me, let him deny himself"

[FRAGMENT] Let correction not be withheld. When a man sees someone living badly and perhaps giving something to the Church, and does not correct him, he flees in spirit. What does it mean to "flee in spirit"? To be afraid. Fear is an internal flight. Why is he afraid? Because he is a hireling. Perhaps the person receiving the correction will take it badly and stop giving what he usually gives. He sees the wolf coming, that is, the devil breaking the neck of the one living badly, and flees in spirit, refrains from useful correction, full of fear. But he who is a shepherd and cares for the sheep does not let him go and does what the Apostle says: Correct the restless, comfort the faint-hearted, and so on. Therefore, let no one suppose that a pious shepherd, or one who calls himself a shepherd, does not repay evil for evil, when he rather repays evil for good. For though he is a sinner and wicked, he gives of his goods to the Church; but the other one repays him evil for good, from whom he withholds correction. But because all this must be done out of love, and sometimes men consider their correctors their enemies, therefore, after saying: Correct the restless, he added: Comfort the faint-hearted. Perhaps, due to the correction, he begins to lose heart and is disturbed: then it is necessary to comfort him. Support the weak so that they do not fall through weakness. If weakness has caused him to stumble, let love receive him into its bosom. And after saying these things, he added finally: See that no one repays anyone evil for evil. Therefore, correction is not evil if it is done. But what does a good sheep say when corrected by his superior? "The righteous will correct me in mercy."

Sermons - Sermon 78

SERMO 78 ON THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL MT 17, 1-8 "After six days Jesus took Peter, and James, and"

"John his brother" and so on What the kingdom of Christ is.

We must examine and contemplate, dearest ones, this vision which the Lord showed on the mountain. For it is about this that He said: Truly I tell you, there are some standing here who will not taste death before they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom. This is where the lesson that was read begins. After He said this, six days later He took three disciples, Peter, John, and James, and went up the mountain. These three were some of those about whom He had said: There are some here who will not taste death before they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom. This is no small matter. For that mountain was not the extent of the kingdom. What is a mountain to Him who owns the heavens? This is not only what we read, but also what we see in some way with the eyes of our heart. He calls His kingdom that which He elsewhere calls the kingdom of the heavens. The kingdom of the heavens, however, is the kingdom of the saints. For the heavens declare the glory of God. Of which heavens it is immediately said in the Psalm: There is no speech nor language, where their voice is not heard. Their sound has gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world. Of whom, if not of the heavens? Therefore, of the apostles, and all faithful preachers of the word of God. The heavens shall reign with Him who made the heavens. To show this, see what happened.

Allegory of the Lord's Transfiguration. The Lord Jesus himself shone like the sun; his garments became white as snow: and Moses and Elijah spoke with him. Jesus himself indeed shone like the sun, signifying that he is the light that illuminates every man coming into this world. What the sun is to the eyes of the body, he is to the eyes of the heart: and what the sun is to the flesh, he is to the hearts. But his garments, his Church. For garments, if they were not held by the wearer, would fall. Of these garments, Paul was a kind of the very last fringe. For he says: For I am the least of the Apostles: and in another place: I am the last of the Apostles. But in the garment, the fringe is the last and the least. Therefore, just as the woman who suffered from a flow of blood, when she touched the fringe of the Lord, was made well: so the Church, which comes from the Gentiles, was saved by Paul's preaching. Is it any wonder if the Church is signified by the white garments, when you hear the prophet Isaiah saying: And if your sins are like scarlet, they shall be white as snow? What do Moses and Elijah, that is, the Law and the Prophets, avail unless they speak with the Lord? Unless they give testimony to the Lord, who will read the Law? who will read the Prophets? See how briefly the Apostle says this: For by the law comes knowledge of sin: but now apart from the law, the righteousness of God is manifested; behold the sun: having witness from the Law and the Prophets; behold the splendor.

Peter's vow.

Peter sees this, and understanding like a human, he says: Lord, it is good for us to be here. He was suffering from the crowd's weariness, he had found the solitude of the mountain; there he had Christ the bread of the mind. Why should he leave there for labors and pains, having in God holy loves, and therefore good manners? He wished well for himself, hence he added: If you wish, let us make here three tabernacles: one for you, one for Moses, and one for Elijah. To these things the Lord did not respond: but yet a response was given to Peter. For while he was speaking, a bright cloud came and overshadowed them. He was seeking three tabernacles: the heavenly response showed us that there is one, which the human sense was trying to divide. The Word of God is Christ, the Word of God in the Law, the Word in the Prophets. Why, Peter, do you seek to divide? It is more proper for you to join. You seek three: understand also that it is one. A voice from the cloud. The disciples' prostration.

All were thus overshadowed by a cloud, and as one tent was made for them, a voice sounded from the cloud, saying: This is My beloved Son. Moses was there, Elijah was there: it was not said, These are My beloved sons. For an Only One is one thing, adopted ones are another. He was commended, whence the Law and the Prophets were glorified. He is, it says: My beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear Him. For you have also heard Him in the Prophets, and you have heard Him in the Law. And where have you not heard Him? Upon hearing this, they fell to the ground. Now the kingdom of God is demonstrated to us in the Church. Here is the Lord, here is the Law and the Prophets: but the Lord as Lord; the Law in Moses, Prophecy in Elijah; but they as servants, as ministers. They as vessels; He as the fountain. Moses and the Prophets spoke and wrote: but they were filled with Him when they poured forth. The raising up of the disciples. The Lord, however, extended His hand and raised up those lying down. Then they saw no one, except Jesus alone. What does this mean? You have heard, when the Apostle was read, that we see now through a glass darkly, but then face to face. And tongues shall cease, when that which we now hope and believe has come. Therefore, what they signified by falling to the ground, is that we die: because it was said to the flesh, "You are dust, and to dust you shall return." But when the Lord raised them up, He signified the resurrection. After the resurrection, why do you need the Law? why do you need the Prophecy? Hence, Elias does not appear, Moses does not appear. What remains for you: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. It remains for you that God will be all in all. There will be Moses, but now no longer the Law. We will see Elias there, but now no longer a prophet. For the Law and the Prophets bore witness to Christ, that it was necessary for Him to suffer, and on the third day rise from the dead, and enter into His glory. Where that will be fulfilled which He promised to His beloved: He who loves me will be loved by my Father, and I will love him. And as if it were said: Because you will love him, what will you give him? And I will show myself to him. A great gift, a great promise. God does not reserve for you any other reward but Himself. O greedy one, why is it not enough for you what Christ promises? You seem rich to yourself; but if you do not have God, what do you have? Another is poor; and if he has God, what does he lack? The salvation of others is to be cared for out of charity.

Come down, Peter: you wished to rest on the mountain, come down, preach the word, be urgent in season and out of season, reprove, rebuke, exhort, with complete patience and instruction. Work, sweat, endure some torments: so that what is understood in the Lord’s white garments, you may possess through the brightness and beauty of righteous conduct in charity. For in the praise of charity, when the Apostle was being read, we heard: It does not seek its own. It does not seek its own, because it gives what it possesses. In another place, more dangerously stated if you do not understand it. For indeed, instructing the faithful members of Christ according to the same charity, the Apostle says: Let no one seek his own, but that of the other. For avarice, having heard this, prepares frauds, so that in business, pretending to seek the other's good, it might deceive someone and seek not its own, but the other's. Let avarice be restrained, let justice proceed: let us hear and understand. To charity it was said: Let no one seek his own, but that of the other. But you, avaricious one, if you resist, and rather interpret this precept to desire someone else’s; lose your own. But as I know you, you want to have both your own and the other’s. You commit fraud to have what is another’s: suffer theft, so you lose your own. You do not want to seek your own, but you take the other’s. If you do this, you are not doing well. Hear, oh avaricious one, listen: the Apostle explains more clearly in another place what he said: Let no one seek his own, but that of the other. He says of himself: But I do not seek what is to my benefit, but what is for the benefit of many, so that they may be saved. This Peter did not yet understand, when he desired to live with Christ on the mountain. He reserved this understanding for you, Peter, after death. But now he himself says: Descend to labor on earth, to serve on earth, to be despised, to be crucified on earth. Life descended to be killed; bread descended to hunger; the way descended to be wearied on the journey; the fountain descended to thirst: and you refuse to labor? Do not seek your own. Have charity, preach the truth: then you will reach eternity, where you will find security.

Sermons - Sermon 79

SERMO 79 AGAIN ON THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL MT 17, 1-8: Where Jesus showed Himself on the mountain to the three disciples

We heard a great vision on the mountain, where the Lord Jesus was shown to three disciples, Peter, James, and John, when the holy Gospel was read. His face shone like the sun; this signifies the clarity of the Gospel. His garments became white as snow; this signifies the purification of the Church, to whom it was said through the prophet: "And though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow." Elijah and Moses were conversing with Him; for the grace of the Gospel has testimony from the Law and the Prophets. In Moses, the Law; in Elijah, the Prophets: to speak briefly. These are the benefits of God through the holy Martyr, which are to be recited. Let us listen. It pleased Peter to make three tabernacles: one for Moses, one for Elijah, and one for Christ. The solitude of the mountain delighted him, he suffered the weariness from the tumult of human affairs. But why did he seek three tabernacles, except because he did not yet know the unity of the Law, the Prophecy, and the Gospel? Finally, he was corrected by a cloud. While he was speaking thus, behold, a bright cloud overshadowed them. Behold, the cloud made one tabernacle: why did you seek three? And a voice from the cloud said: "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; listen to Him." Elijah is speaking; but listen to Him. Moses is speaking; but listen to Him. The Prophets speak, the Law speaks; but listen to Him, the voice of the Law and the tongue of the Prophets. He sounded in them, He appeared in Himself when He deigned. Listen to Him: let us listen to Him. When the Gospel was being spoken, think it was the cloud: from there the voice resounded to us. Let us listen to Him: let us do what He says, let us hope for what He promised.

Sermons - Sermon 79A

SERMON 79/A SERMO On the Gospel, where in Jesus was transfigured on the mountain. Who would not die before they had seen the Son of Man in his kingdom.

Before the Lord revealed himself on the mountain, as we heard when the holy Gospel was read, he said: "There are some standing here who will not taste death before they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom." We know, however, that at the end of the world, the Lord Jesus Christ will come as a judge and will give the kingdom to those on his right, and punishment to those on his left, who, as we believe and confess, will come to judge the living and the dead. All those who stood around him when he spoke, having met the condition of death, have slept, and they will not see the Lord in his kingdom until the time of the resurrection has come. So what did he mean when he said, "There are some standing here who will not taste death before they see the Son of Man in his kingdom"? Undoubtedly, the holy Gospel revealed the question through subsequent events. For he took three with him up the mountain—Peter, James, and John—and before them, he was transfigured, so that his face shone like the brightness of the sun. Therefore, these were from those standing around who would not taste death until they saw the Lord in his kingdom. There will be a brightness at the end of the ages. The Lord showed this brightness in himself. His members will shine as did his head. It is written: "He will transfigure the body of our lowliness to be conformed to the body of his glory." Behold, he shone on the mountain like the sun, and he had not yet resurrected. He had not yet tasted death, but as God in the flesh, he accomplished what he wanted by divine power even though the flesh had not yet been resurrected. For to know it was not presumptuous if we too hope for this, listen to him and do not doubt. When he explained the parable of the weeds, he said: "He who sows the good seed is the Son of Man. The field is the world. The good seed are the children of the kingdom. The weeds are the children of the evil one. The enemy who sows them is the devil. The harvest is the end of the world. The reapers are the angels. Therefore, when the end of the world has come, the Son of Man will send out his angels, and they will gather all the offenses out of his kingdom and throw them into the blazing furnace, where there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth." What about the wheat? Listen to what follows: "Then the righteous will shine like the sun in the kingdom." And since they will be such in the kingdom, the Lord therefore said: "There are some standing here who will not taste death before they see the Son of Man in his kingdom."

Peter's empty counsel.

Now then, brothers, what does it mean? Moses and Elijah appeared; they placed the Lord in the midst and were conversing with him. Saint Peter was pleased with solitude; he was weary of the turbulent human race. He saw the mountain, he saw the Lord, he saw Moses, he saw Elijah. They alone were there who belonged to them alone. He delighted in the quiet, idle, blessed life and said to the Lord: Lord, it is good for us to be here. Why should we come down from the mountain to be disturbed and not choose to enjoy ourselves here? It is good for us to be here. Let us make three tabernacles here, if you will: one for you, one for Moses, and one for Elijah. Peter, still not knowing how he ought to speak, wanted to divide them. He thought what he was saying was good. But what did the Lord do? He sent a cloud from heaven and covered them all, as if saying to Peter: Why do you wish to make three tabernacles? Behold one. Then they heard a voice from the cloud: This is my beloved Son, so that they might not compare him to Moses and Elijah and think the Lord was to be received as one of the Prophets when he was the Lord of the Prophets: This is my Son: listen to him. Terrified by this voice, they fell. The Lord approached and lifted them up, and they saw no one but Jesus alone. The great sacrament of the Transfiguration. A great mystery, if the Lord grants, I will speak now. Moses and Elijah speak with the Lord. In Moses, the Law; in Elijah, the Prophets. When we propose something from the Gospel, we prove it from the Law and the Prophets. And Moses and Elijah speak with the Lord, but as ministers at the sides, in the middle the ruler. What is it for Moses and Elijah to speak with the Lord? Listen to the Apostle: "Through the law," he says, "comes the knowledge of sin; but now the righteousness of God has been manifested apart from the law." Behold the Lord where Moses and Elijah are, having testimony from the Law and the Prophets. At this time, the testimonies of the Law and the Prophets are necessary. But when we are resurrected, what need is there for the Law, what need for the Prophets? We do not seek testimonies because we will see Him Himself. But when will this be? After the resurrection. Therefore, those who had fallen rose again and saw the Lord alone.

Sermons - Sermon 8

SERMO 8

SERMON ON THE TEN PLAGUES OF THE EGYPTIANS AND THE TEN COMMANDMENTS OF THE LAW Dressed in Carthage at the table of Saint Cyprian A question proposed by the brothers. To the Lord our God, whom we worship, it has been said in praise in a certain place of the Scriptures: "You have arranged all things in measure, number, and weight." Then, by apostolic teaching, we are instructed to behold the invisible things of God through those that have been made, and to investigate the hidden things through the manifest ones. Thus, when all of creation is questioned, it responds with a certain voice of its own nature that the Lord God is its maker. Moreover, the Apostle reminds us that what was written in the books, called the Old Testament, happened in a figurative manner: "But they were written for our correction upon whom the end of the ages has come."

Therefore, beloved, if those things which appear in the nature of things as if by chance, when diligently examined and prudently investigated and discovered, intimate the praise of the Creator and the divine providence spread and arranging through all, as it is said, "reaches mightily from one end to the other and orders all things sweetly;" how much more so those things which are not only done, but also recounted in the divine Scriptures? Hence, the question proposed to us by the brothers, or rather the inquiry and dispute, about the meaning of the Egyptians being struck with ten plagues and the people of God being instructed with ten commandments, we have undertaken in the name of our Lord, with His assistance and giving, and with the devout intention of your hearts, to explain as much as we can.

Those who proposed it know what they have proposed, that is, they know they have proposed it, nor do they recall me having rashly presented this to you. However, whoever did not propose it, listen equally to what we can, so that the concern of the brothers' proposal is the concern of all, and the exposition of our ministry is nourishment for everyone. For we believe that He will assist, if not for our sake, certainly for yours, so that we may say things that ought to be said and are useful to hear, so that walking together on the path of His truth and hastening to the homeland together, we may deserve to avoid the enemies and pitfalls of our journey by recognizing the will of God's law.

We believe the deeds just as we read the deeds.

There are ten plagues by which the people of Pharaoh were struck. There are ten commandments by which the people of God were instructed. Let us see, brothers, that the things accomplished corporally are to be understood spiritually. For we do not think that they were only spoken and written down, but we believe that the deeds occurred as we read them, and yet we know by apostolic doctrine that these deeds were shadows of future things. Therefore, we believe that the deeds are to be spiritually investigated, yet we cannot deny that they happened. Let no one say: "It is indeed written that water was turned into blood in the plague of the Egyptians, but it signifies something, for it could not really happen." He who says this seeks the will of God while offending the power of God. What indeed? If it could signify something by being spoken, could it not also signify by being done? Or is it not that Isaac or Ishmael were born? They were born, they were men, and they were born of Abraham, one from a slave woman, the other from a free woman. Although they were men and were born, they still prefigured two Testaments, the Old and the New. Thus, we must first search for meanings based on the solid reality of accomplished deeds, lest we appear to want to build in the air if we take away the foundation. Therefore, I believe that all who disregard and do not observe the ten commandments of the law suffer spiritually what the Egyptians suffered corporally. Until I explain this proposal with the help of the Lord, I want you to be attentive and praying for us, so that we may speak things useful to you. For as far as we are concerned, perhaps we contemplate; but what we speak, we serve you. The sign of the rod turned into a serpent

Therefore, first accept this, so that you are not mistaken in counting, that what was first done as a sign, namely, that the rod was turned into a serpent, does not pertain to these ten plagues. For it was an introduction to Pharaoh, by which Moses was commended to lead the people of God out of Egypt. However, those who were stubborn had not yet been struck, but were already terrified by a divine sign. Neither is there now a need, nor is there a purpose, to say anything about the rod itself being turned into a serpent. Nevertheless, because we made mention of it out of necessity so that no one would err in counting, and there should not remain in anyone's mind a scruple about something not understood, we briefly say that the rod signifies the kingdom of God, and indeed the kingdom is the people of God; but the serpent signifies this time of mortality: for death was offered by the serpent. Therefore, as if falling from the hand of the Lord to the earth, they were made mortal. Hence, when the rod was cast from the hand of Moses, it was turned into a serpent. The magicians of Pharaoh likewise did the same: their rods being cast down were turned into serpents. But first the serpent of Moses, that is, the rod of Moses, devoured all the serpents of the magicians. Then at last, being seized by the tail, it was once again made a rod, and the kingdom returned to the hand. For the rods of the magicians are the peoples of the impious. Yet these peoples of the impious, conquered in the name of Christ, when transferred into His body, are as if devoured by the serpent of Moses, until the kingdom of God returns to the hand of God, but at the end of this mortal age, which is signified by the serpent's tail. A great sign: let it be, let it be. You have heard what you ought to desire; hear what you ought to avoid. The first commandment, the first plague. The first commandment in the law is about worshiping one God: "You shall have no other gods before me," it says. The first plague of the Egyptians was the water turned into blood. Compare the first commandment to the first plague. Understand the one God, from whom all things are, in the likeness of water, from which all things are generated. To what does blood pertain, except to mortal flesh? What then is the conversion of water into blood, except that their foolish hearts were darkened? For professing to be wise, they became fools; and they exchanged the glory of the incorruptible God for the likeness of the image of corruptible man; the glory of the incorruptible God for the likeness of the image of corruptible man, and of birds and four-footed animals and reptiles. The glory of the incorruptible God, from whom all things are, is like water; the likeness of the image of corruptible man and of birds and four-footed animals and reptiles, is like blood. And this indeed happens in the heart of the impious, for God remains unchangeable: nor because the Apostle also said, "They exchanged," did God therefore change. The second commandment, the second plague. The second commandment: You shall not take the name of the Lord your God in vain; for whoever takes the name of the Lord their God in vain shall not be cleansed. The name of the Lord our God Jesus Christ is truth: for he himself said: I am the truth. Therefore truth cleanses, vanity defiles. And since he who speaks truth speaks of God—for whoever speaks falsehood speaks of himself—speaking truth is speaking rationally; but speaking vanity is more like making noise than speaking. Rightly, because the second commandment is the love of truth, to which the love of vanity is opposed. Now truth speaks, vanity makes noise. See the second plague opposed to this second commandment. What is that second plague? The abundance of frogs. You have a fitting symbol of vanity, if you consider the loquacity of frogs. See the lovers of truth, not taking the name of the Lord their God in vain, speaking wisdom among the perfect, even among the imperfect: not indeed speaking what they cannot grasp, yet not departing from truth, and not proceeding into vanity. For although the imperfect cannot grasp if something somewhat higher were argued about the Word of God, God with God, through whom all things were made, and could grasp what Paul speaks among them as infants in Christ Jesus, Christ Jesus, and him crucified; still, that is not truth, and this is not vanity. It would be vanity, however, if we said that Christ did not truly die, but feigned it, that those wounds were in appearance, that the blood was not real but simulated flowing from the wounds, if we said he showed false scars as if after false wounds. But when we say all these things are true, we say they were done, certain, expressed, fulfilled, we believe and preach, even though we do not speak of that lofty and immutable truth, we do not go into vanity. But those who say all those things in Christ are false and simulated are croaking frogs in a muddy swamp. They can have the noise of a voice, but they cannot insinuate the doctrine of wisdom. Finally, in the Church, those adhering to the truth speak the truth through whom all things were made: the truth, the Word made flesh and dwelling among us: the truth, Christ born of God, one from the one, the only begotten and coeternal; the truth, having taken the form of a servant born of the virgin Mary, suffered, crucified, rising, ascending; everywhere truth, both which a little one can grasp and which a little one cannot grasp; truth both in bread and milk, in the bread of the great, in the milk of the little ones. Indeed, the same bread is conveyed to become milk through flesh. But they who contradict this truth and deceived by their own vanity deceive, are frogs bringing tedium to the ears, not food to the minds. Hear rationally speaking men: There are neither words nor speech where their voices are not heard; but their voices are not empty because their sound has gone out into all the earth, and their words to the ends of the world. But if you want to understand frogs and their opposition, recall that verse of the psalm: Each one spoke vanity to his neighbor. The third commandment, the third plague The third commandment: Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy. In this third commandment, a certain indication of rest is insinuated, a tranquility of heart, a peace of mind, which a good conscience produces. There is sanctification there, because there is the Spirit of God. Finally, observe rest, that is, quiet: Upon whom, he says, does my Spirit rest? Upon the humble and quiet and those who tremble at my words. Thus, the restless recoil from the Holy Spirit, lovers of quarrels, sowers of slanders, more desirous of contention than of truth, through their own restlessness do not admit the peace of the spiritual Sabbath to themselves. Against the restlessness of these it is said, as though they should have the Sabbath in their hearts by the sanctification of the Spirit of God: Be meek in hearing the word, that you may understand. What am I to understand? God saying: "Cease from your restlessness; let there not be a tumult in your heart caused by the phantasms fluttering through corruption and stabbing you; let it not be so." For you are to understand God saying to you: Be still, and know that I am God. You do not wish to be still through your restlessness, and blinded by the corruption of your contentions, you demand to see what you cannot. For notice the opposite third plague to this third commandment: gnats were born in the land of Egypt from the mud. They are certain very tiny, very restless flies, flying disorderly, rushing into one's eyes, not permitting a person to rest, as they go and rush around, as if banished yet returning, just like the utterly vain phantasms of contentious hearts. Hold fast to the commandment, beware the plague. The fourth commandment, the fourth plague. The fourth commandment is: Honor your father and your mother. The contrary to this is the fourth plague of the Egyptians. Cynomya, it is the dog fly: it is a Greek term. It is dog-like not to recognize parents; nothing is so dog-like, as when those who begot are not recognized. Rightly, therefore, even the puppies of dogs are born blind. The fifth commandment, the fifth plague. The fifth commandment is: Thou shalt not commit adultery; the fifth plague is the death of the Egyptian livestock. Let us compare. Take an adulterous man, not content with his own marriage. He does not want to tame a certain desire of the flesh within himself, which is common to us and the animals. For indeed, to lie together and procreate is also of the animals; to reason, to understand is of humans. Therefore, reason, which presides in the mind, ought to reign and dominate, to curb the impulses of the lower flesh, not to release them indiscriminately and illicitly at random. And so, by the institution of the Creator, it is given to the animals by nature that they are not moved to females and to mating except at certain times. For neither does the beast restrain itself by reason at other times, but altogether cools down when the very impulse grows cold. However, man can always be moved, for he can also curb the impulse. The Creator gave you the dominion of reason. To you, He has granted the reins of continence as if they were on lower beasts. You hold what the beast cannot, and thus you hope for what the beast cannot. You labor somewhat in maintaining continence, the beast does not labor. But you will always rejoice in eternity, which the beast does not reach. If the work fatigues, let the reward encourage you. For it is moderation itself to curb the inner desire, and not to release what you have in common with the beast indiscriminately like a beast. But if you disdain yourself within yourself, and neglect the image of God in which He made you, overcome by beastly desire, you will be a beast as if you had lost your humanity; not as though you are turned into the nature of a beast but having the form of a man with the likeness of a beast, who does not heed the saying: Do not be like a horse and a mule, which have no understanding. And perhaps you choose to be a beast and wander freely in lust, not restraining the desire of the flesh by any law of continence? Observe the plague. If you do not fear being like a beast, at least fear dying like a beast. The sixth commandment, the sixth plague. The sixth commandment: You shall not kill. The sixth plague, boils on the body, and blisters bubbling and bursting, and burnings of wounds from the ashes of the furnace. Such are murderous souls. They burn with anger, because through the anger of murder brotherhood has perished. Men burn with rage, and they also burn with grace. But one is the fervor of health, another the fervor of an ulcer. Burning pimples throughout the body conceived murders. It bursts forth, and is not healthy. It boils, but not from the Spirit of God. For both he who wants to help boils with fervor, and he who wants to kill boils with fervor; the former by precept, the latter by disease; the former with good works, the latter with ulcerous sores. If we could see the souls of murderers, we would mourn more than for the rotting bodies of those afflicted with ulcers. The seventh commandment, the seventh plague. The seventh commandment follows: You shall not steal, and the seventh plague: hail on the fruits. What you take away against the commandment, you lose from heaven. For no one has unjust gain without just loss. For example, he who steals gains clothing but by heavenly judgment loses trust. Where there is gain, there is loss; visibly gain, invisibly loss; gain from one's blindness, loss from the Lord's cloud. For nothing is without providence, dearest ones. Or do you truly think that what men suffer happens while God sleeps? These appear to happen everywhere: clouds are gathered, rains are poured down, hail is thrown, the earth is shaken by thunder, terror by lightning. These are thought to happen everywhere and as if they do not pertain to divine providence. Against such thoughts, that psalm is vigilant: Praise the Lord from the earth - when praises had been said from heaven - dragons and all abysses, fire, hail, snow, ice, wind of tempests, which do His word. Therefore, those who with their evil desire steal outwardly are inwardly struck by hail by God's judgment. Oh if they could inspect the field of their heart! Certainly, they would lament, as they would not find there what they could put into the mouth of their mind, even if in their theft they found what their throat's greed could gulp. The hunger of the inner man is greater, the hunger is greater and the plague more dangerous and the death graver. Many dead walk, and many hungry exult in vain riches. Finally, Scripture calls the servant of God rich inwardly: The man of your hidden heart, it says, who is rich before God. Not rich before men, but rich before God; where God sees, there is rich. What then does it profit you if you steal where man does not see, and where God sees you are struck by hail? The eighth commandment, the eighth plague. The eighth commandment: You shall not bear false witness. The eighth plague: the locust, an animal harmful with its teeth. But what does a false witness mean, unless to harm by biting and to consume by lying? Finally, the Apostle, warning the men of God not to attack each other with false accusations, says: "If you bite and devour one another, beware that you are not consumed by one another." The ninth commandment, the ninth plague. The Ninth Commandment: You shall not covet your neighbor's wife. The Ninth Plague: Dense darkness. For there is a certain adultery against which a command was given above, even in not desiring the chastity of another's wife. For he is an adulterer who does not go to another's wife only because he is not content with his own. But indeed, not only to sin after one's own but also to attempt another's, truly there is dense darkness. For nothing pains the heart of the sufferer so much. And he who does this to another would not wish to suffer it himself. Every man is more prepared for other things. But whether there is one found who tolerates this patiently, I do not know. O dense darkness of those doing this, those desiring such things! Truly they are blinded by a terrible fury: for the fury is untamable, to defile the wife of another man. The tenth commandment, the tenth plague. The tenth commandment: You shall not covet any of your neighbor's belongings, not the cattle, not the property, not the slave, you shall covet nothing at all of your neighbor’s. The plague contrary to this commandment is the tenth: the death of the firstborn. When I seek a comparison in this plague, nothing appears to me in the meantime—perhaps it may occur to those who investigate more thoroughly—except that all the things which men have they keep for their heirs, and among heirs nothing is dearer than the firstborn. Here, however, it is reprehensible to covet the property of your neighbor. He who steals also covets. For who steals his neighbor's property without coveting it first? But above there was already a commandment about stealing. There, understand also robbery. For the Scripture would not command about theft and be silent about robbery unless it wanted you to understand that if it is penal to take secretly, it is of much greater punishment to seize violently. Therefore, to take from someone unwillingly, whether secretly or openly, has its own commandment. However, to covet the property of your neighbor, which God notes in your heart, even if you seek just succession, is not permitted. In fact, those who want to possess the property of others as if justly, seek to make themselves heirs to the dying. For what seems more just than to possess a thing left to oneself, to have it by common right? "What are you doing here, man? It has been left to me; I have inherited the estate, I read the will." This voice of avarice seems most just. You praise him as possessing by law; God condemns him as unjustly coveting. See what sort of person you are, who wish to be made heir by someone. You certainly don't want him to have his own heirs, among whom nothing is dearer than the firstborn. Therefore, you are punished in your firstborn, who coveting the property of others, you seek what was not lawfully due to you as though by a shadow of right. And it is indeed easy, brothers, to lose your firstborn bodily. For men are mortal: whether before the parents or after the parents they die, they perish. It is troubling, lest by this hidden and unjust covetousness you lose the firstborn of your heart. For the firstborn in us has the image of the grace of God: newly born, first born. Among all the offspring of our heart, the firstborn is faith. For no one performs good deeds unless faith has preceded. All your good works are your spiritual offspring, but among these, faith was born to you first. Whoever secretly covets another's property loses internal faith. For you will undoubtedly be a deceiver at first, not acting out of love but out of deceit. You seem to love the one from whom you desire to be made heir, but by loving him you seek his death, and in order to see yourself in possession of his property, you envy him his successor.

Secure in the commandments of God.

Brothers, after the ten commandments have been given and the ten plagues inflicted, let the defiance of the Egyptians who scorned these commandments make you cautious, so that you may securely keep your possessions in the precepts of God. Your possessions, I mean your possessions in the inner chest, in your inner treasure; possessions that neither thief nor robber nor powerful neighbor can take away from you, where neither moth nor rust are to be feared, with which the rich man departs even when shipwrecked. Thus, you will be the people of God among the wicked, the Egyptians, while they endure these things in their heart, but you remain intact in your inner selves, until the people are led out of Egypt in a sort of your own exodus. This indeed happens: for that was done once, but this does not cease to be done. For if we pay attention, we also despoil the Egyptians. For indeed, this was not done without mystery, how less intelligent men dare to accuse God here because He commanded that gold, silver, and clothes be asked from the Egyptians. These things were given and taken away: They would have been thieves, unless they had done it by God's command. Let your Love attend: They, I say, would have been thieves, unless they had done it by God's command. But since they did it by God's command, they were not thieves. You no longer accuse them: Are you ready to accuse God Himself? It was for them to obey; for God it was to give the command, who knows who should endure what, and why anyone endures anything by what merit. It would have been a most evident and heinous parricide for Abraham if he had struck his son on his own accord. This very crime he creditably committed because he obeyed God who commanded it. And what would have been cruelty in spontaneous will, was made piety under God's command.

Two examples of the Apostles.

I wish to say something about the Acts of the Apostles, demonstrated in two Apostles, the great rams of the flock, whose feast day we celebrate on the same day, in Peter and Paul. When Peter was imprisoned, an angel came to him, and with the chains loosened from his hands, ordered him to leave. He went out and followed the angel. He was freed from prison by the command of the Lord, by the authority of God. The next day, the judge sought him to be heard. He learned that he had left, and ordered the prison guards to be brought forward. He asked the soldiers who were interrogated to be brought forward; he passed judgment on them, the sentence of the law which seemed to him just to have been pronounced on Peter. What can we say? Was Peter responsible for their death? Would he not have been perversely pious if he had contradicted the will of God and replied to the angel ordering him to leave: "I won't leave so that the unfortunate prison guards do not die because of me"? He would be answered: Leave these things to the Creator; since you are not the creator for a person to be born, you cannot be the judge for how one dies. However, when Paul, imprisoned and bound, sang to God, and the earth trembled, and the bonds were loosened, he did not leave, lest the prison guard suffer any harm. For there was room for human justice to be considered so that one would not be punished for the sake of another when nothing was commanded against divinely. No one dies except whom God wishes. The decision to die is left to God's judgment, but the desire of a murderer is condemned. For it is not to be considered here what God judged, but what the evil mind desired. We were freed through Judas the betrayer, but Judas did not provide this for us: he wanted to kill, not to free. Praise to God, condemnation to Judas, yet Judas would not have done this if God had not allowed it, who did not spare His own Son but delivered Him up for us all.

What it means to lift up the Egyptians.

Let no one, therefore, brothers, let no one scrutinize God. It is proud, impious, foolish. Restrain your desires; do nothing with an evil mind; be prepared to obey, not to harm. Thus did they, and God did. If they had stolen, even so God had willed to allow those who suffered to receive it, when He permitted those who did it to suffer. Nevertheless, He would have exacted punishment from the thieves and some temporal vindication from those who suffered the thieves. Now, however, they did not act insolently: God by righteous judgment willed it to happen. When, if you weigh the cause, perhaps they did not take another's gold but exacted a due recompense. Unjustly oppressed, they made bricks in Egypt for a long time; for hard labor of servitude without recompense they did not leave. And yet God did this for some certain cause. If we are like the people of Israel in Egypt in this world, surely I dare to say to you— for I think that I speak to you by the Spirit of God— take the gold, silver, and clothes of the Egyptians. Their gold, their wise men; their silver, their eloquent men; their clothes, the variety of their languages. Do we not see all these in the Church? Does not the Church do this daily? How many wise men in the world believe in Christ! The gold of the Egyptians is taken away. The holy Cyprian, whose table this is, was once either gold or silver of the Egyptians. But the clothes, with which in some way the senses are clothed, are the various languages. You see them migrate from Egypt to the people of God: there are neither words nor speeches, whose voices are not heard. Here is the gold, here is the silver, here are the clothes of the Egyptians. And we come out rich and bear our reward. For we have not labored in the mud of Egypt for nothing. The Spirit sanctified the Sabbath day.

Thus, all things, brothers, whether they can be explained by us or cannot yet be explained, whether you can understand them or cannot yet understand, whether in this way as they were said by us or in another better way, believe completely that all these things happened to them figuratively, but were written for our correction, upon whom the end of the ages has come. Would I then not be attentive to these things? And you, any spiritual Christian, would we not be attentive, and would we say it happened without purpose that in the third plague Pharaoh's magicians failed? Should I find nothing here? Should I think it was done or written in vain? Pharaoh's magicians turned rods into serpents, turned water into blood, made frogs; they made these things. They came to the third plague, that is, to those insects called gnats, and there they failed who made serpents, who made frogs, they failed at gnats. It is not at all, it is not without purpose. Knock with me. This third plague, to what is it contrary? To the third commandment of God, where it is commanded to the people about the Sabbath, where rest is proclaimed, where sanctification is recommended. For it was said there: Remember the Sabbath day to sanctify it. Finally, even in the first works of the world, God made the day, made the sky and earth, the sea, the lights, the stars, animals from the waters, from the earth man in His own image. He made all these things: nowhere is anything sanctified sounded. These things are completed in six days, and the seventh day of God’s rest is sanctified. He sanctifies not His works, but His rest. What shall we say? As rest is sweeter to us who work than labor, do we think the same with God? We should not think this, nor that He made it by laboring and not by commanding. God said: Let it be, and it was done. In this way, even a man would not labor in making. But on that day, a certain rest is recommended to us from all our works, that after our good works we might understand that we will rest without end. For all the days there have an evening, the seventh does not. We work indeed with an end; we rest without an end. There sanctification sounds in a great mystery pertaining to the Holy Spirit. Take what I say, brothers, however, with patience, I beseech you, considering more what I try than what I explain. I know what I say and who I am saying to, a man speaking divine things to humans. Be strenuous with me, labor with me that you may rest with me. As much as the Lord grants, as much as He opens, as much as He signifies, as much as wisdom itself hints, showing itself to its lovers hilariously and meeting them with all providence, the Sabbath day is sanctified, the rest of God. There sanctification first sounds. As it seems to me, as much as you recognize, as much as we believe, there is no divine and true sanctification except by the Holy Spirit. For not in vain is He specifically called the Holy Spirit. Although the Father is holy and the Son is holy, yet this name properly belongs to the Spirit, that the third Person in the Trinity is called the Holy Spirit. He rests upon the humble and quiet, as upon His Sabbath. For this reason, the number seven is also attributed to the Holy Spirit: the scriptures sufficiently indicate this. Let better ones see better things, and greater ones greater things, and let them say or explain something more subtle and divine about this number seven. I, however, see what is present, which is enough, and I remind you to see that this number seven is attributed specifically to the Holy Spirit because sanctification sounds on the seventh day. And how do we prove the number seven is attributed to the Holy Spirit? Isaiah says the Spirit of God comes upon the faithful, upon a Christian, upon a member of Christ: the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and fortitude, the spirit of knowledge and piety, the spirit of the fear of God. If you followed, I have enumerated seven things, like a descending Spirit of God upon us from wisdom to fear, so that we might ascend from fear to wisdom: For the beginning of wisdom is the fear of the Lord. Thus the sevenfold Spirit and the one Spirit, with sevenfold operation one. Do you want something more evident? The holy scripture commemorates the feast day of Pentecost made up of weeks. You have it in the book of Tobit: it clearly says that this festival day was made of weeks. For seven times seven returns forty-nine in total. But, as if to return to the head — we are gathered into unity by the Holy Spirit, not scattered from unity — therefore, to the forty-nine is added one, the honor of unity, and they become fifty. Not without reason, therefore, on the fiftieth day, after the Lord's ascension, the Holy Spirit came. The Lord rises, ascends from the underworld, not yet to heaven. From that resurrection, from that assumption from the underworld, fifty days are counted; and the Holy Spirit came on the fiftieth number, as making a birthday for Himself among us. For forty days He conversed here with His disciples; on the fortieth day He ascended into heaven, and after spending ten days there, as if with the sign of ten commandments, the Holy Spirit came, for no one fulfills the law except by the grace of the Holy Spirit. Therefore, brothers, you see clearly that this number seven pertains to the Holy Spirit. But whoever does not cling to the unity of Christ and barks against the unity of Christ is to be understood as not having the Holy Spirit. For contentions and dissensions and divisions are made only by the natural man, of whom the Apostle says: But the natural man does not perceive the things of the Spirit of God. Then it is written also in the epistle of the apostle Jude: These are they who separate themselves — he spoke reproachingly — these are they who separate themselves, natural, not having the Spirit. What could be clearer? What could be more evident? Rightly they come, and even if believing the same things as us, yet they are coming to receive the Holy Spirit, whom they cannot have as long as they are enemies of unity. However, the Apostle compares them to Pharaoh's magicians: Having a form of godliness, but denying its power. Having a form of godliness, they did similar things, but denying its power, they failed at the third sign.

Why did they fail at the third sign? But still, seek with me why they failed in the third. For they could have failed in the second, in the first, in the fourth; what difference does it make where they would fail if they were going to fail anyway? Why then in the third? But first see what I promised, whether the apostle Paul compared the heretics to them more: "Having," he says, "a form of godliness, but denying its power. Avoid such people. For among them are those who crawl into households and capture weak women, burdened with sins and led by various passions, always learning and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth." Indeed, they always hear the testimony about the Catholic Church and do not want to come to the Catholic Church. Always learning. For do they not always hear: "In your offspring all the nations of the earth shall be blessed"? Do they not always hear: "Ask of me, and I will make the nations your heritage and the ends of the earth your possession"? Do they not always hear: "All the ends of the earth shall remember and turn to the Lord, and all the families of the nations shall worship before him"? Do they not always hear: "He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the River to the ends of the earth"? They always hear these things but, always learning, they never come to the knowledge of the truth. Now see what I promised, what the Apostle adds subsequently: "Just as Jannes and Jambres opposed Moses, so these men also oppose the truth, men corrupted in mind and disqualified regarding the faith. But they will not get very far." Rightly they failed in the third sign, but they will not get very far. Why will they not get very far? For their folly will be plain to all, as it was with those two. Now see why they failed in the third sign. Remember that those who oppose unity do not have the Holy Spirit. Indeed, the first three commandments of the decalogue are understood to pertain to the love of God, so that the remaining seven are understood to pertain to the love of neighbor, so that in the two tablets of the law and the ten commandments, those two summary commandments are held: “You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your might” and “You shall love your neighbor as yourself.” On these two commandments depend all the Law and the Prophets. Therefore, let us refer the first three commandments to the love of God. Which are the first three? The first: "You shall have no other gods before me." The contrary plague is water turned into blood, because the supreme origin of the Creator was brought into the imitation of flesh. The second commandment: "You shall not take the name of the Lord your God in vain," pertains, as I believe, to the Word of God, which is the Son of God: for there is one God, and one Lord Jesus Christ, through whom all things exist. Against the Word there are frogs. See frogs against the Word, noise against reason, vanity against truth. The third commandment about the sabbath pertains to the Holy Spirit because of sanctification, which was first sounded on the sabbath: which we have strongly, as much as we could, commended to you a little before. The contrary to this commandment is the restlessness of flies born from corruption, rushing into the eyes; hence they are also called men of corrupted minds. Therefore, in this third sign, they failed, who, being enemies of unity, did not have the Holy Spirit. For the Holy Spirit does this as punishment. He does one thing by grace, another by punishment; he does one thing by filling, another by abandoning. Finally, that we might already recognize from their own confession that Pharoah’s magicians acknowledged this, let us see how the Spirit of God is called in the Gospel, what name he received. The Jews, criticizing the Lord, said: “This man casts out demons only by Beelzebul, the prince of demons,” to which he replied: “If I cast out demons by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God has come upon you.” Another Evangelist narrates: “If I cast out demons by the finger of God.” What one called the Spirit of God, another called the finger of God. Therefore, the Spirit of God is the Finger of God. Hence the Law was given written by the finger of God, which law was given on Mount Sinai on the fiftieth day after the slaying of the lamb. After celebrating the Passover by the people of the Jews, fifty days are completed after the slaying of the lamb, and the law is given written by the finger of God. Fifty days after the slaying of Christ are completed, and the Holy Spirit comes, that is, the finger of God. Thanks be to the Lord, who wisely conceals and pleasantly reveals. Now see how even the magicians of Pharaoh explicitly confess this. Failing in the third sign, they said: "This is the finger of God." Let us praise the Lord, the giver of understanding, the giver of the Word. If these things were not hidden in mysteries, they would never be sought diligently. If they were not sought diligently, they would not be found so pleasantly.

Sermons - Sermon 80

SERMO 80 ON THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL OF MATTHEW 17:18-20 "Why were we not able to cast him out," and so forth. ON PRAYER The unbelief of the Apostles. Our Lord Jesus Christ also reproved unbelief in His disciples, as we heard a little while ago when the Gospel was being read. For when they had said, "Why could we not cast it out?" He answered, "Because of your unbelief." If the Apostles were unbelieving, who is faithful? What do the lambs do if the rams waver? Yet the mercy of the Lord did not despise them as unbelievers; but He reproved, nourished, perfected, and crowned them. For they themselves, mindful of their weakness, as we read in one place in the Gospel, said to Him, "Lord, increase our faith." "Lord," they said, "increase our faith." The first benefit was knowledge, to know that they had less; the greater blessing, to know from where they asked. "Lord," they said, "increase our faith." See if they were not bringing their hearts as if to the source, and knocking that it might be opened to them from where they might be filled. He wanted to be knocked at, not to repel the knockers, but to exercise those desiring.

God, although He knows our needs, must still be prayed to. For do you think, brothers, that God does not know what is necessary for you? He knows our desires beforehand, who knows our need. Finally, when He taught prayer and advised His disciples not to be wordy in prayer, He said: "Do not be wordy; for your Father knows what you need before you ask Him." The Lord says something else already. What is it? Wishing that we should not speak much in prayer, He said to us: "Do not speak much when you pray; for your Father knows what you need before you ask Him." If our Father knows what we need before we ask Him, why do we speak at all? What is the reason for prayer itself if our Father already knows what we need? Someone might say: "Do not ask me for long; for I know what you need." If you know, Lord, why should I ask at all? You do not want me to have a long petition; rather, you command that I should hardly have any. And what about that other place? He who says: "Do not be wordy in prayer," in another place says: "Ask, and it will be given to you." And lest you think it was only said in passing for you to ask, He added: "Seek, and you will find." And lest you consider this transitory, see what He added, see where He concluded: "Knock, and it will be opened to you." See what He added. He wanted you to ask, so that you may receive; to seek, so that you may find; to knock, so that you may enter. So how, if our Father already knows what is necessary for us, why do we ask? Why do we seek? Why do we knock? Why do we weary ourselves in asking, seeking, and knocking to instruct the one who knows? In another place, the Lord's words are: "One should always pray and not lose heart." If one should always pray, how does He say: "Do not be wordy"? How do I always pray if I finish quickly? You command me to finish quickly, yet you command to always pray and not lose heart: what is this? And to understand this: ask, seek, knock. For it is closed, not to reject you, but to exercise you. Therefore, brothers, we should encourage prayer, both for us and for you. For there is no other hope for us in the many evils of the present age, except to knock in prayer itself, and to believe and hold firmly in our hearts that your Father does not give you what He knows is not beneficial for you. For you know what you desire; He knows what is beneficial for you. Suppose I say you are under me and you are weak, as it is true: for all this life of ours is weakness; and a long life is nothing else but a long weakness: suppose, therefore, you are sick under a doctor. The recent wine, you delighted in it, you asked to drink it from the doctor. You are not forbidden to ask, lest it might not harm you and it would be beneficial for you to receive. Do not doubt to ask: ask, do not hesitate; but if you do not receive, do not be saddened. If this is under a human doctor of your flesh; how much more under God, the doctor, creator, and restorer of both your flesh and soul?

Praying to God to heal from vices.

Therefore, since the Lord in this chapter encouraged prayer, where he said: Because of your unbelief, you could not cast out this demon; for he concluded his exhortation to prayer thus: This kind is not cast out, except by fasting and praying. If a man prays to cast out another's demon, how much more should he pray to cast out his own avarice? How much more, to cast out his own drunkenness? How much more, to cast out his own lust? How much more, to cast out his own impurity? How many things are in man, which, if they persevere, do not admit him to the kingdom of heaven? See, brothers, how one asks a doctor for temporal health, how if anyone is desperately ill, is he ashamed, or reluctant to hold the feet of the man, the most skilled chief physician, washing his footprints with tears? And what, if the doctor says to him: You cannot be healed otherwise unless I bind you, cauterize you, cut you? He answers: Do what you want, only heal me. With what fervor does he desire the fleeting health of a few days, so that for it he is willing to be bound, and cut, and burned, and to be kept from eating what he likes, from drinking what he likes, or when he likes? He endures it all, so that he might die later: and he does not want to endure a little, so that he might never die! If God, who is our heavenly physician, says to you: Do you want to be healed? What will you say, except, Heal me? Perhaps you do not say, because you think yourself healthy, and that is what makes you worse sick.

Christ the physician finds all the sick. For if you put two sick people in place; one who begs the doctor with tears, the other who, in his sickness, mocks the doctor with a lost mind; the former promises hope to the one weeping, laments for the one laughing. Why? Except because he is sick with such a peril that he thinks himself to be healthy? So were the Jews. Christ came to the sick and found all sick. No one should flatter himself with health, lest the doctor renounce him. He found all sick; it is the apostolic judgment: For all have sinned and are in need of the glory of God. When therefore he found all sick, there were two kinds of sick people. Some came to the doctor, clung to Christ, listened, honored, followed, and converted. He received all without any scorn, healing for free, because omnipotence healed. When he received them and joined them to be healed, they rejoiced. However, another kind of sick people, already having lost their mind due to the sickness of iniquity, did not know they were sick; they mocked him because he received the sick, and said to his disciples: Behold what kind of master you have, who eats with sinners and publicans. And he, knowing what they were and who they were, answered them: It is not the healthy who need a doctor, but the sick. And he showed them who was healthy, and who was sick: I have not come, he said, to call the righteous, but sinners. If sinners, he said, do not come to me, why have I come? For whom have I come? If all are healthy, why did such a great doctor descend from heaven? Why did he make medicine for us not from his box, but from his blood? Therefore, that kind of sick people who were milder in their sickness and felt themselves to be sick, adhered to the doctor to be healed. But those who were more dangerously sick mocked the doctor, denounced the sick. To what extreme did their madness proceed? That they would seize, bind, scourge, crown with thorns, suspend by wood, and kill the doctor by the cross. Why are you surprised? The sick killed the doctor: but the doctor, being killed, healed the insane one. By which remedy the sick are healed through Christ, the sick are healed.

First of all, not forgetting himself on the cross, and showing us his patience, and giving an example of loving our enemies; seeing them raging around, knowing their sickness, as a doctor who knew the frenzy in which they had lost their minds, immediately [said] to the Father: "Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing." But do you think that those Jews were not wicked, cruel, bloodthirsty, turbulent, enemies of the Son of God? Do you think that voice was void and empty: "Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing"? He saw all, but he recognized his own among them. Finally, he died, because it was fitting that with his death he would kill death. God died, so that a kind of celestial compensation might be made, that man might not see death. For Christ is God, but he did not die there as God. For the same one is God, the same one is man: there is one Christ, God and man. Man was assumed, so that we might be changed for the better, did not drag God towards the worse. For he took what he was not, he did not lose what he was. Since he was therefore God and man, wanting us to live by means of him, he died in accordance with us. For he had nothing from which he might die: nor did we have anything from which we might live. For what was he, who had nothing from which he might die? “In the beginning was the Word; and the Word was with God, and the Word was God.” Seek from God how he might die, you will not find [a way]. But we die, who are flesh, a man bearing sinful flesh—that is, a man of sin. Seek from sin how it might live, it does not have it. Therefore, neither could he have death from his own [being], nor we life from ours: but we [have] life from his, he [has] death from ours. What sorts of exchanges! What did he give, and what did he receive? Trading men come to exchanges, to change things. For the ancient exchange was the change of things. A man gave what he had, and received what he did not have. For example, he had wheat, but he did not have barley; another had barley, and he did not have wheat: that one gave the wheat which he had, received the barley which he did not have. How much it was that a greater quantity compensated for a cheap kind! Behold therefore, one gives barley, to receive wheat: finally, another gives lead, to receive silver; but he offers much lead for a little silver: another gives wool, to receive clothing. And who can list all? However, no one gives life, to receive death. Therefore, the voice of the physician hanging on the wood was not empty. For that he might die for us, because the Word could not die: the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us. He hung on the cross, but in the flesh. There is the vileness, which the Jews despised: there is the love, through which the Jews were saved. For concerning them, it is said: "Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing." And that voice was not empty. He died, was buried, rose again; after forty days spent with his disciples, he ascended into heaven, sent the Holy Spirit to those who awaited the promise. They, having received the Holy Spirit, were filled, and began to speak in the tongues of all nations. Then the Jews who were present, being terrified at the name of Christ speaking in all tongues, men who were unlearned, uncultured, whom they knew among themselves to be raised in one language, were terrified: they learned from Peter speaking whence this gift was. He gave this, who hung on the wood. He gave this, who was mocked hanging on the wood, to give the Holy Spirit sitting in heaven. They heard, they believed those of whom he had said: "Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing." They believed, were baptized, and conversion was made. What conversion? The blood of Christ, which they furiously shed, believing, they drank. A prayer in the perils of this life.

Therefore, to conclude our discussion from where we began, let us pray, and presume upon God: let us live as He commands, and where we falter in this life, let us call upon Him, just as the disciples called upon Him saying: "Lord, increase our faith." And Peter presumed, and faltered: yet he was not despised and drowned, but was uplifted and raised up. Indeed, from where did he presume? It was not from his own strength: it was from the Lord. How? "Lord, if it is You, command me to come to You on the water." For the Lord was walking on the water. "If it is You, command me to come to You on the water. For I know that if it is You, You command and it is done." And He said: "Come." He descended at His command, and trembled in his own weakness. Yet when he trembled, he cried out to Him: "Lord," he said, "save me." Then the Lord reached out His hand to him, and said: "O you of little faith, why did you doubt?" He Himself invited, He liberated the one who was faltering and trembling; so that it might be fulfilled, what is said in the Psalm: "If I said, My foot slips; Your mercy, O Lord, supported me."

How temporal and eternal benefits are to be sought.

Therefore, there are two kinds of benefits: temporal and eternal. Temporal benefits include health, substance, honor, friends, house, children, wife, and the other aspects of this life where we are but sojourners. Let us consider ourselves in the stable of this life as if we are pilgrims passing through, not as possessors intending to stay. The eternal benefits are, however, first and foremost, eternal life itself, the incorruption and immortality of flesh and soul, the company of Angels, the heavenly city, unfailing dignity, the Father and the fatherland, He without death, it without an enemy. Let us desire these benefits with all fervor, ask for them with all perseverance, not with lengthy speech but with witness of groaning. Desire always prays, even if the tongue is silent. If you always desire, you always pray. When does prayer slumber? When desire grows cold. Therefore, let us request these everlasting benefits with total eagerness, seek those goods with all intention, ask for those goods securely. For those who possess these goods, they benefit and cannot harm. On the other hand, temporal benefits sometimes are useful, sometimes harmful. Poverty has benefitted many, and riches have harmed many: a private life has benefitted many, and high honor has harmed many. Likewise, money has benefitted some, dignity has benefitted others; it benefitted those who used them well: but for those who used them poorly, not having them hurt more. And accordingly, brothers, let us ask moderately for these temporal things, securely knowing that if we receive them, He gives, who knows what is expedient for us. Have you asked, and it has not been given to you what you requested? Trust the Father, who would give it to you if it were expedient for you. Consider about yourself as well: As your child, unaware of human affairs, is to you, so you are to the Lord, unaware of divine affairs. Behold, your child cries before you all day to give him a knife, that is, a sword: you refuse to give it, you do not provide it, you disregard his crying so that you do not mourn over his death. Let him cry, let him vex himself, let him clash himself to be lifted onto a horse: you do not do it, because he cannot manage it; he will injure and kill himself. What you refuse as a part, you are keeping whole for him. But so that he may grow and securely possess everything, you do not give him a small dangerous thing.

Bad times: from where and how they should be endured.

Therefore, we say, brothers, pray as much as you can. Evils are abundant, and God has willed that evils are abundant. If only the evil ones were not abundant, and evils were not abundant. People say these are bad times, laborious times. Let us live well, and the times are good. We are the times: as we are, so are the times. But what can we do? Can we not turn the multitude of people to a good life? Let the few who listen live well: let the few living well endure many living badly. They are grains, they are in the threshing floor: they can have chaff with them in the threshing floor, but they will not have it in the granary. Let them endure what they do not want, so that they come to what they want. Why are we saddened and do we blame God? Evils are abundant in the world, so that the world is not loved. Great men, faithful saints, who despised the beautiful world: we cannot even despise the ugly one. The world is evil, behold it is evil, and yet it is loved as if it were good. But what is the evil world? For the heavens are not evil, nor the earth, and the waters, and the things that are in them, the fish, the birds, the trees. All these things are good: but evil men make an evil world. But since we cannot be without evil men as long as we live, as I said, let us groan to our Lord God; and let us endure evils, so that we may come to good things. Let us not blame the Master of the household; for He is dear. He carries us, not we Him. He knows how to govern what He has made: do what He has commanded, and hope for what He has promised.

Sermons - Sermon 81

SERMO 81 ON THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL MT 18, 7-9 Where we are advised to beware of the scandals of the world How we are fortified against scandals. The divine readings, which we just heard as they were recited, admonish us to gain strength against the scandals that have been foretold, to fortify our Christian hearts, and this from the mercy of the Lord. For what is man, he says, except that you are mindful of him? Woe to the world because of scandals, the Lord says: Truth says: it terrifies and admonishes, it does not want us to be careless; for it certainly did not make us hopeless. Against this Woe, that is, against this evil to be feared, dreaded, and avoided, Scripture comforts us, exhorts us, and instructs us at that place where it is said: Great peace have they who love your law, and there is no stumbling block for them. It shows the enemy to be avoided, but it did not cease to show a fortified wall. You thought when you heard: Woe to the world because of scandals, where you might go outside the world, lest you suffer scandals. Therefore, to avoid scandals, where will you go outside the world, unless you flee to him who made the world? But how can we take refuge in him who made the world unless we hear his law, which is preached everywhere? It is not enough to hear it, unless we love it. For divine Scripture, making you secure against scandals, does not say: Great peace have they who hear your law. For not the hearers of the law are righteous before God. But because the doers of the law shall be justified, and faith works through love: Great peace, he says, have they who love your law, and there is no stumbling block for them. This thought is echoed also in what we sang by listening and responding: But the meek shall inherit the land and shall delight themselves in an abundance of peace. Because: Great peace have they who love your law. For they are the meek, those who love the law of God. For blessed is the man whom you instruct, O Lord, and teach him out of your law; that you may give him rest from the days of adversity, until the pit is dug for the wicked. How different the voices of Scripture seem, and they converge and agree into one meaning, so that whichever thing you could hear from that most abundant fountain, you also may acquiesce, agreeing with the truth, full of peace, fervent in love, fortified against scandals.

Gentle in affliction, untroubled by scandal.

Therefore, it is proposed to see, or to seek, or to learn how we should be meek: and from what I have now mentioned from the Scriptures, we are admonished to find what we seek. Let your Charity be attentive for a moment; a great matter is at hand, that we be meek: a necessary thing in adversities. For the adversities of this age are not called scandals: observe what scandals are. For example, someone established in some necessity is urged by pressure. This is not a scandal, because pressure is urging. Pressure also pressed martyrs, but they were not oppressed. Beware of scandal, not much of pressure. Pressure presses you, scandal oppresses you. So what is the difference between pressure and scandal? In pressure, you prepared to maintain patience, hold on to constancy, not abandon faith, not consent to sin. If you keep this, or if you have kept it, pressure will not be ruin to you: but that pressure will be useful to you for the same purpose as in the winepress, not that the olive is crushed, but that oil is drawn out. Finally, if in that pressure you give praises to God, how useful is the winepress, from which the liquid flows from you? The Apostles sat in pressure, chained, and in that pressure they sang hymns to God. What was pressed? what was extracted? Job sat in great pressure on the dung heap, destitute, without help, without substance, without sons; full, but with worms, which indeed pertains to the outer man. But because he was also full of God inwardly, he praised God, and that pressure was not a scandal to him. So where is the scandal? When his wife came to him and said: Say something against God, and die. For with everything taken away by the devil, Eve was kept, not for consolation, but for the temptation of her husband. Here is where the scandal was. She exacerbated his miseries, her own miseries along with his, and began to persuade him to blaspheme. But he, who was meek, because God had taught him from His law, and had softened him from evil days, had much peace in his heart loving the law of God, and it was not a scandal to him. She was the scandal, but it was not to him. Finally, see the meek, see one instructed in the law of God, I say the eternal law. For that law given on tablets to the Jews was not yet in the time of Job, but the eternal law still remained in the hearts of the pious, from which that which was given to the people was written. Because he had been softened by the law of God from evil days, and he had much peace loving the law of God, see how meek he is, what he answers. Learn from him what I proposed, who are the meek. You have spoken, he says, like one of the foolish women. Should we receive good from the hand of the Lord, and shall we not endure evil? Who the meek are.

We have heard by example who the meek are: let us define them in words, if we can. The meek are those to whom in all good deeds, in all that they do well, nothing is pleasing except God; in all the sufferings they endure, God is not displeasing. Come, brothers, pay attention to this rule, to this standard; let us strive towards it, seek growth, in order to fulfill it. For what good is it that we plant and water, unless God gives the increase? Neither is he who plants anything, nor he who waters; but God who gives the increase. Hear, you who wish to be meek, who desire to be softened by the evil days, who love the law of God; so that there may be no scandal in you, and you may have great peace, to possess the earth, and delight in the abundance of peace: hear, you who wish to be meek. Whatever good you do, do not please yourself. For God resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble. Therefore, whatever good you do, let it please not yourself but God; whatever evil you suffer, let God not displease you. What more? Do this, and you will live. The evil days will not overtake you; you will escape what is said: Woe to the world because of offenses. To which world is woe foretold because of offenses, unless it is said of that world: And the world did not know him? Not that world of which it is said: God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself. A bad world, a good world: the bad world, all bad people in the world; and the good world, all good people in the world. As we often look at a field. This field is full: with what fruit? With wheat. Similarly we say, and we say truly, This field is full of chaff. A tree is full, full of fruit. Another says: It is full of leaves. And he who says: It is full of fruit, tells the truth: and he who says: It is full of leaves, tells the truth. Neither does the fullness of leaves take away the place of the fruit, nor does the fullness of fruit expel the crowd of leaves. It is full of both: but the wind seeks one thing, the farmer gathers another. Thus then, when you hear: Woe to the world because of offenses, do not be afraid; love the law of God, there will be no scandal for you.

"A stumbling block from the eye, from the hand, from the foot." But his wife intervened, persuading him to some evil. You love her as one should love a wife: she is a part of you. But if your eye scandalizes you, if your hand scandalizes you, if your foot scandalizes you, you have just heard the Gospel, cut it off, throw it away from you. Whoever is dear to you, whoever is held in great regard by you, let them be great to you, let them be a beloved part of you, as long as they do not begin to scandalize, that is, to persuade you to some evil. Hear that this is a scandal. We established the example of Job and his wife: but there the scandal was not named. Hear the Gospel: the Lord, when he was preaching about his passion, Peter began to persuade him not to suffer. Get behind me, Satan, you are a scandal to me. The Lord absolutely taught you, who gave you the example of living, both what a scandal is, and how to avoid a scandal. To whom he had said a short time before: Blessed are you, Simon Bar-Jona, he had shown him to be a part of himself. But when he began to be a scandal, he cut off the part: he restored the part, he replaced the part. Therefore he will be a scandal to you, who begins to persuade you to some evil. And let your Charity attend: this often happens, not out of malevolence, but out of perverse benevolence. For your friend, who loves you and is loved by you in return, your father, your brother, your son, your wife, sees you in trouble, and wants to make you do evil. What is it, sees you in trouble? Sees you in some pressure. Perhaps you suffer that pressure on account of justice: therefore you suffer pressure, because you do not want to bear false witness. For example I shall say. Examples abound, because Woe to the world from scandals. Behold, for example, some powerful person seeks from you, for his own gain, for his own robbery, the service of false testimony. You refuse: you refuse the false, lest you deny the truth. Not to dwell too long, he becomes angry, he is powerful, he oppresses. A friend approaches, who does not want you to be in pressure, does not want you to be in trouble: I beg you, do what you are told. What great thing is it? Perhaps now just as Satan said to the Lord: It is written about you, that he has commanded his angels concerning you, lest you dash your foot against a stone. Perhaps this friend of yours, because he sees you as a Christian, wants to persuade you with the law, what he thinks you should do. Do what he says. What? What he wants. But it is a lie, it is false. Have you not read: Every man a liar? Now this is a scandal. He is a friend, what will you do? He is an eye, he is a hand: Cut him off, and throw him from you. What does it mean: Cut him off, and throw him from you? Do not consent. This means: Cut him off, and throw him from you, do not consent. For our members in our body make unity by consent, live by consent, are connected by consent. Where there is dissent, there is disease or wound. Therefore he is your member: you will love him. But he scandalizes you; Cut him off, and throw him from you. Do not consent; turn him away from your ears, perhaps corrected he will return. A lie is forbidden by divine law.

How will you do what I say, sever, and reject, and correct by that means perhaps? How will you do, answer. He wanted to persuade a lie from the Law. For he said: Speak. And perhaps he did not dare to say, Speak a lie: but thus, Speak what you wish. You say, But it is a lie. And he, to excuse himself: Every man is a liar. And you, brother: A mouth that lies, kills the soul. Note, what you heard is not a light matter: A mouth that lies, kills the soul. What does this powerful enemy of mine, who oppresses me, do to me, because you pity me, and pity the condition in me, and do not want me to be in evil; when you want me to be evil? What does this powerful one do to me? What does he oppress? The flesh. You say, the body is oppressed: I say, it is destroyed. How much more gently does he deal with me, than if I were to lie? He kills my flesh: I kill my soul. An angry powerful one kills the body: A mouth that lies, kills the soul. He kills the body; it would have died even if it were not killed: but the soul, which is not killed by iniquity, is received by truth for eternity. Therefore, keep what you can keep: let perish what is destined to perish sometime. You answered; and yet you have not solved Every man is a liar. Answer him to this as well, lest he seems to have said something to persuade a lie, bringing testimony from the Law, pressing you from the Law against the Law. For in the Law it is written: Thou shalt not bear false witness: and in the Law it is written: Every man is a liar. Consider what I reminded a little earlier, when I concluded with the words with which I could to the gentle man. He is gentle, to whom nothing is pleasing except God in all good deeds he does; in all evil he suffers, God does not displease. Therefore, respond to him, who says: Lie, because it is written: Every man is a liar: I do not lie, because it is written: A mouth that lies, kills the soul. I do not lie, because it is written: You will destroy all those who speak falsehood. I do not lie, because it is written: You shall not bear false witness. Even if he presses my flesh with pressures because he is displeased with the truth: I listen to my Lord: Do not fear those who kill the body.

Let humans act, not as humans, but as children of God.

How then is every man a liar? Or are you perhaps not a man? Respond quickly and truthfully, and that I may not be a man so that I may not be a liar. For see: God looked down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if there were any that understood and sought after God. They have all turned aside, they have together become unprofitable: there is none that does good, no, not one. Why? Because they wanted to be the children of men. But to take them away from these iniquities, to redeem, heal, cure, and change the children of men, He gave them power to become the children of God. So what of it? You were men, if you were children of men: you were all men, you were liars; for every man is a liar. The grace of God comes to you, giving you the power to become children of God. Hear the voice of my Father saying: I said: You are gods, and all of you are children of the Most High. Because if you are men, children of men, if not children of the Most High, you are liars; because every man is a liar. If children of God, if redeemed by the grace of the Savior, if bought with precious blood, if reborn with water and the Spirit, if predestined for the inheritance of the heavens, certainly children of God. Therefore, now gods. What does lying have to do with you? For Adam was purely man, Christ was God and man, God the creator of all creation. Adam was man, Christ was the man mediator of God, the only begotten Son of the Father, God-man. Behold, you are far from God as a man, and God is far above man: He placed Himself in the middle as God-man. Acknowledge Christ, and through the man ascend to God. When the slanders of the pagans must be refuted.

Now therefore, having been corrected, and if we have done anything, gentle ones, let us hold an unwavering confession. Let us love the law of God, so that we may escape what was said: Woe to the world because of offenses. Let us say something about offenses, with which the world is full, and how offenses increase, pressures abound. The world is devastated, the winepress is trodden. Come now, Christian, heavenly offspring, strangers on earth, who seek a city in heaven, who desire to be associated with holy angels, understand that you have come in order to depart. You pass through the world, striving towards Him who created the world. Let not the lovers of the world disturb you, who wish to remain in the world, and whether they want to or not, they are compelled to migrate: let them not deceive you, let them not seduce you. These pressures are not offenses. Be righteous, and they will be exercises. Tribulation comes: what you will choose, either exercise or damnation. How it finds you, such you will be. Tribulation is fire: does it find you as gold? it removes impurities: does it find you as chaff? it turns you into ashes. Therefore, the pressures which abound are not offenses. But what are offenses? Those sayings, those words, by which it is said to us: Behold what Christian times bring about, behold these are offenses. This is said to you so that you, if you love the world, may blaspheme against Christ. And your friend, your adviser says this to you: therefore, he is your eye. Your minister, your co-worker says this to you: therefore, he is your hand. Perhaps the one who sustains you, who lifts you up from earthly humility says this to you: therefore, he is your foot. Cast off, cut off, throw away from you, do not consent. Respond to such as he did, to whom false testimony was suggested. Respond you, too: say to the man saying to you, Behold, in Christian times there are so many pressures, the world is devastated: respond you, Christ foretold this to me before it happened. The pressures of the failing world foretold.

Why are you disturbed? The pressures of the world disturb your heart, just as that ship where Christ was sleeping. Behold the cause, O thoughtful man, why your heart is disturbed: behold the reason. This ship in which Christ sleeps is the heart where faith sleeps. What new thing is being said to you, Christian? What new thing is being said to you? In Christian times, the world is devastated, the world fades. Did not your Lord say to you, "The world will be devastated"? Did not your Lord say to you, "The world will fade"? Why did you believe when it was promised, and are disturbed when it is fulfilled? Therefore the tempest rages in your heart: beware of shipwreck, awaken Christ. The Apostle says to dwell: Christ through faith in your hearts. Through faith, Christ dwells in you. Faith present, Christ is present: faith vigilant, Christ is vigilant: faith forgotten, Christ is asleep. Awaken, stir up, say: Lord, we perish! Look what the Pagans say to us: what is worse, what bad Christians say. Arise, Lord, we perish. Let your faith awaken, Christ begins to speak to you. Why are you disturbed? I have foretold all these things to you. I foretold them so that when evils come, you would hope for good, so you would not fail in evils. Are you surprised that the world is failing? Be surprised that the world is aging. Man is born, grows, and ages. Many complaints in old age: cough, phlegm, sore eyes, anxiety, fatigue. Therefore, man ages; he is full of complaints: the world ages; it is full of pressures. Did God provide little for you because in the old age of the world, He sent you Christ to renew you when all things are failing? Do you not know this was signified in the seed of Abraham? For the Apostle says the seed of Abraham, which is Christ. He does not say: And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to your seed, which is Christ. Hence, a son was born to elderly Abraham because Christ was to come at the old age of this world. He came when all things were growing old, and made you new. The matter created, the matter established, the matter decaying, was already turning to decline. It was necessary that it be abundant in labors: He came to console you amid labors and to promise you eternal rest. Do not wish to cling to the old world, and do not refuse to rejuvenate in Christ, who says to you: The world is perishing, the world is aging, the world is failing, it labors with the breath of old age. Do not fear, your youth will be renewed like the eagle.

Complaints of the pagans against the Christian religion because of the devastation of Rome

"Behold," he says, "in Christian times Rome perishes. Perhaps Rome does not perish: perhaps it is scourged, not slain: perhaps it is chastised, not destroyed. Perhaps Rome does not perish if the Romans do not perish. For they will not perish if they praise God; they will perish if they blaspheme. For what is Rome if not the Romans? For it is not concerning stones and wood, not concerning high walls and vast fortifications. It was thus made that it might sometimes fall. When a man built, he placed stone upon stone; and when a man destroyed, he removed stone from stone. A man made it, and a man destroyed it. Is it an injury to Rome because it is said, It falls? Not to Rome, but perhaps to its artificer. We do an injury to its founder because we say, Rome, which Romulus founded, falls? The world will fall, which God founded. But neither does what man made fall, except when God wills; nor does what God made fall, except when God wills. For if man’s work does not fall without God’s will, how can God’s work fall by man’s will? Still, God made the world for you that it would fall; and thus He created you to die. The same man is the ornament of the city, the same man its inhabitant, ruler, governor; he comes in order to go, he is born to die, he enters to pass away. Heaven and earth shall pass away: what wonder then if the city sometimes has an end? And perhaps at this time it has no end; yet sometime it will have an end. But why does Rome perish under the sacrifices of Christians? Why did its mother Troy burn under the sacrifices of the pagans? The gods, in whom the Romans placed their hope, indeed the Roman gods in whom the pagan Romans placed their hope, migrated from burning Troy to found Rome. The Roman gods were originally the Trojan gods. Troy burned, Aeneas carried away the fugitive gods: rather he carried away the foolish gods while fleeing. For the gods could be carried by one fleeing, but they themselves could not flee. And coming into Italy with those gods, he founded Rome with false gods. It is lengthy to pursue the rest, yet briefly I shall mention what their letters contain. Their well-known author speaks thus: The city of Rome, as I have understood it, was founded and held at the beginning by the Trojans, who, led by Aeneas in their flight, wandered with uncertain settlements. They had their gods with them, and they founded Rome in Latium, placing there the gods to be worshipped who were worshipped in Troy. Their poet introduces Juno, angry with Aeneas and the fleeing Trojans, and says:" The hostile nation sails the Tyrrhenian sea.

Carrying Troy into Italy and the conquered Penates; That is, carrying the defeated gods into Italy. Now, when the gods were being carried defeated into Italy, was it divine power, or an omen? Therefore, cherish the law of God, and let it not be a scandal to you. We ask you, we beseech you, we exhort you: be gentle, sympathize with those who suffer, support the weak; and in this occasion of many travelers, the needy, the working, let your hospitality abound, let your good works abound. What Christ commands, let Christians do, and only to their own harm do Pagans blaspheme.

Sermons - Sermon 82

SERMO 82 ABOUT THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL MT 18:15-18:

"If your brother sins against you,"

"Rebuke him between you and him alone." AND ABOUT THE WORDS OF SOLOMON (PROV 10, 10, ACCORDING TO THE LXX).

"Nodding with the eyes with deceit, he accumulates sadness for men." And the rest.

Preliminary observation. Our Lord admonishes us not to neglect each other's sins, not by seeking what to criticize, but by seeing what to correct. He indeed said that one has a sharp eye to remove the speck from his brother's eye, who does not have a beam in his own eye. But what this means, I briefly suggest to your Charity. A speck in the eye is anger: a beam in the eye is hatred. Therefore, when one who hates reproves an angry person, he wants to remove the speck from his brother's eye, but he is hindered by the beam, which he himself carries in his own eye. A speck is the beginning of a beam. For, when a beam is born, it is first a speck. By watering the speck, you lead it to become a beam: by nurturing anger with malicious suspicions, you lead it to hatred.

What the difference is between the anger of one who reproves or punishes and hatred.

There is much difference between the sin of the angry and the cruelty of the one who hates. For we also get angry with our children: who is found to hate their children? Even in the case of animals, sometimes a mother cow turns away the suckling calf out of a certain annoyance, angered: but she embraces it with a mother's affection. She seems to annoy it when she pushes it away: yet it is sought after if it is missing. Nor do we otherwise give discipline to our children, except by somewhat getting angry and showing indignation: yet we would not give discipline unless we loved them. Thus not everyone who gets angry, hates; so much so that sometimes one is proved to hate more if they do not get angry. For consider a boy wanting to play in the river, in whose current they might perish: if you see this and patiently allow it, you hate; your patience is his death. How much better is it to get angry and correct him, than to allow him to perish without getting angry? Therefore, hatred must be avoided above all, the beam must be taken out of the eye. For there is a great difference when someone in anger exceeds the measure of a word, which afterward they erase by repenting; and it is another thing to keep hidden snares in the heart. Finally, much difference lies between these words of Scripture: "My eye is troubled because of anger." But what is said about that one? "Whoever hates his brother is a murderer." There is much difference between a troubled eye and an extinguished one. A speck troubles, a beam extinguishes.

Hatred harms him who hates more than the other.

Therefore, let us first persuade ourselves, so that what we were admonished about today, we may be able to do well and fulfill, above all not to hate. For then, when the plank is not in your own eye, you rightly see whatever is in your brother's eye; and you suffer until you remove from your brother's eye what you see to be harming his eye. The light that is in you does not allow you to neglect the light of your brother. For if you hate and wish to correct, how do you amend the light, having lost the light? For Scripture also clearly says in the same place where it is written: "He who hates his brother is a murderer." It says, "He who hates his brother is in darkness until now." Hatred is darkness. Moreover, it cannot happen that he who hates another does not harm himself first. For he tries to harm the other externally but devastates himself internally. As much as our soul is greater than the body, so much more should we take care that it is not harmed. But he who hates another harms his own soul. And what will he do to him whom he hates? What will he do? Take away money, but does he take away faith? Harm reputation, but does he harm conscience? Whatever harms, harms externally. Consider what harms yourself. For internally he is his own enemy who hates another. But because he does not feel what evil he does to himself, he rages against another, living all the more dangerously by not feeling what evil he does to himself; for by raging, he has lost his sense. You raged against your enemy: while you raged, he was stripped, you were unjust. There is much difference between being naked and being unjust. He lost money, you lost innocence. Ask who has suffered the graver loss. He lost a perishable thing, you became perishable. With what spirit a brother is to be corrected.

Therefore, we ought to rebuke with love; not with eagerness to harm, but with the intent to correct. If we are such, we excellently do what we are admonished today: If your brother sins against you, rebuke him between you and him alone. Why do you rebuke him? Because you are pained that he sinned against you? Far be it. If you do it for your own sake, you do nothing. If you do it for his sake, you do excellently. Finally, consider from the very words whose love you ought to do it for, whether yours or his. If he listens to you, he says, you have gained your brother. Therefore, do it for his sake, so that you gain him. If by doing this you gain him, he would have been lost if you had not done it. Why then do many people disregard these sins and say: What great thing have I done? I sinned against a man. Do not disregard it. You have sinned against a man: do you want to understand that by sinning against a man you perish? If he against whom you sinned rebukes you between you and him alone, and you listen to him, he has gained you. What does it mean, he has gained you; except that you would have perished if he had not gained you? For if you had not perished, how did he gain you? Therefore, let no one disregard it when they sin against a brother. For the Apostle says in one place: Thus, by sinning against the brethren and wounding their weak conscience, you sin against Christ: because we have all become members of Christ. How do you not sin against Christ when you sin against a member of Christ? The remedy for this sin.

Therefore, let no one say, "I have not sinned against God, but I have sinned against my brother, against a man: it is a slight sin, or no sin at all." Perhaps you say, "It is slight because it is quickly healed." You have sinned against your brother: make amends, and you are healed. You have quickly done a deadly thing, but you quickly found the remedy. Who among us hopes for the kingdom of heaven, my brothers, when the Gospel says: "Whoever says to his brother, Fool, shall be liable to the hell of fire"? Great terror; but see the remedy there: "If you bring your gift to the altar and there remember that your brother has something against you, leave your gift there before the altar." God is not angry because you delay presenting your gift: He seeks you more than your gift. For if you come to your God with a bad mind against your brother, carrying a gift, He answers you: "You are lost, what have you brought to me?" You offer your gift, and you are not God's gift. Christ seeks more whom He redeemed with His blood than what you found in your barn.

Therefore, leave your gift there before the altar, and go first to be reconciled to your brother; and thus coming, you will offer your gift. See how quickly the guilt of hell is dissolved. Not yet reconciled, you were guilty of hell: reconciled, you safely offer your gift at the altar.

Forgiveness must be sought from the one whom you have harmed.

However, men are quick to inflict injuries and slow to seek reconciliation. "Ask," he says, "forgiveness from the man whom you have offended, from the man whom you have hurt." He responds: "I will not humble myself." Listen to your God, even if you scorn your brother: "He who humbles himself will be exalted." Do you not wish to humble yourself, you who have fallen? There is a great difference between someone who is humbling himself and someone who is lying down. You are already lying down, and you do not wish to humble yourself? You might have rightly said, "I do not wish to descend," if you had not wished to fall.

What must be done by him who has suffered an injury.

Therefore, this is what the one who has acted unjustly should do. But what should the one who has suffered do? What we have heard today: If your brother sins against you, rebuke him privately, just between the two of you. If you ignore this, you are worse. He committed the injustice, and by doing so, inflicted a grave wound upon himself: do you ignore your brother's wound? Do you see him perishing, or having perished, and neglect him? You are worse by being silent than he is by reviling. When then someone sins against us, we should have great care, not for ourselves; for it is glorious to forget injuries: but forget your injury, not your brother's wound. Therefore, rebuke him privately, just between the two of you, aiming for correction, sparing his shame. For perhaps due to shame, he begins to defend his sin, and whom you want to make better, you make worse. Therefore, rebuke him privately, just between the two of you. If he listens to you, you have gained your brother: for he would have perished if you did not act. But if he does not listen to you, that is, if he defends his sin as if it were righteousness, bring along one or two others with you; because every matter is to be established by the testimony of two or three witnesses. If he does not listen to them, tell it to the Church: if he does not listen even to the Church, let him be to you as a Gentile and a tax collector. Do not consider him any longer among the number of your brothers. Even so, his salvation should not be neglected. Although we do not count Gentiles and Pagans among the number of brothers, we nevertheless always seek their salvation. Therefore, we have heard the Lord advising in this way and prescribing with such care, so as to add immediately: Amen I say to you, whatever you bind on earth will be bound in heaven; and whatever you loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven. You begin to regard your brother as a tax collector, binding him on earth: but make sure you bind justly. For unjust bonds are broken by justice. However, when you have corrected him and reconciled with your brother, you have loosed him on earth. When you loose on earth, he will be loosed in heaven. You do much good, not to yourself, but to him; for he has harmed himself greatly, not you, but himself. The Gospel is reconciled with Solomon. The harmony of the Old and New Testament.

Since these things are so, what is it that Solomon says, which we first heard today from another reading: "Nodding the eyes with sorrow, he heaps up sadness for men: but he who rebukes openly, makes peace"? If therefore he who rebukes openly, makes peace; how is it: "Rebuke him between you and him alone"? It must be feared that the divine precepts are not contrary to themselves. But let us understand that there is supreme concord there, not as some vainly suppose, who err sadly thinking that the two Testaments in the Old and New Books are contrary to each other: so as to think that this is contrary, because it is in the book of Solomon, this in the Gospel. For if some unskilled and slanderous critic of the Divine Scriptures were to say, "Behold where the two Testaments contradict each other. The Lord says: Rebuke him between you and him alone. Solomon says: He who rebukes openly, makes peace. Does the Lord therefore not know what He prescribes? Solomon wants the forehead of the sinner to be crushed; Christ spares the shame of the blushing one. For it is written there: He who rebukes openly, makes peace: here however: Rebuke him between you and him alone; not publicly, but secretly and in private. Do you want to know, whoever thinks such things, that the two Testaments do not contradict each other, because one is found in the book of Solomon, the other in the Gospel? Hear the Apostle. Certainly the Apostle is a minister of the New Testament. Therefore, hear the Apostle Paul instructing Timothy and saying: "Rebuke those who sin before all, that others also may fear." Now it seems not the book of Solomon with the Gospel, but the Epistle of the Apostle Paul seems to conflict. Let us set Solomon aside for a moment without offense: let us hear Christ the Lord and Paul His servant. What do you say, Lord? "If your brother sins against you, rebuke him between you and him alone." What do you say, Apostle? "Rebuke those who sin before all, that others also may fear." What do we do? Do we hear this controversy as if judges? God forbid. Rather, being placed under judgment, let us knock, so that it may be opened to us: let us flee under the wings of the Lord our God. For He did not speak contrary to His Apostle, because He spoke in him too, as He says: "Do you want to receive proof of Christ who speaks in me?" Christ in the Gospel, Christ in the Apostle: Christ therefore said both; one with His own mouth, the other with the mouth of His herald. For when the herald says something from the tribunal, it is not written in the Acts that the herald said: but it is written that he said it, who ordered the herald what to say.

Correction must sometimes be secret, sometimes public.

Therefore, brothers, let us hear these two precepts in such a way that we understand, and let us be established peacefully between the two precepts. Let us be in agreement with our hearts, and Scripture is in no way discordant. It is truly so, both are true indeed: but we must discern that sometimes this, sometimes that, is to be done; sometimes a brother should be corrected between you and him alone, sometimes a brother should be corrected in the presence of all, so that the others may also have fear. If we do this sometimes and that other times, we will maintain the harmony of the Scriptures, and in doing and obeying, we will not err. But someone says to me: When do I do this, when that: lest I correct between me and him alone when I ought to correct in the presence of all; or then correct in the presence of all, when I ought to correct in private? When it ought to be secret, when public. Your Charity will soon see what we must do at times: but let us not be sluggish in doing it. Pay attention and see: If your brother sins against you, correct him between you and him alone. Why? Because he has sinned against you. What does it mean: He has sinned against you? You know that he has sinned. Because it was secret when he sinned against you; seek secrecy when you correct what he sinned. For if only you know that he has sinned against you, and you wish to accuse him before everyone; you are not a corrector, but a betrayer. Observe how the just man, Joseph, spared with great kindness the great disgrace he suspected about his wife, before he knew where she had conceived from: because he sensed she was pregnant and knew he had not approached her. Thus remained a certain suspicion of adultery: and yet because only he sensed it, only he knew it, what does the Gospel say about him? But Joseph, being a just man and not wanting to make her a public example. The husband's pain did not seek vengeance: he wanted to help the sinner, not to punish the sinning person. Though, he says, he did not want to make her a public example, he intended to dismiss her secretly. While he was considering these things, behold, an angel of the Lord appeared to him in a dream; and revealed what it was, since the man's bed was not violated, for she had conceived the Lord of both from the Holy Spirit. So your brother has sinned against you; if only you know it, then he has truly sinned against you alone. For if he wronged you in the presence of many, he has also sinned against those whom he made witnesses to his iniquity. For I say, dearest brothers, that you can recognize this within yourselves. When someone wrongs my brother in my presence, may it be far from me to consider that wrong as something foreign. He has absolutely wronged me too: even more so, he has wronged me, whom he thought he pleased by what he did. Therefore, those things that are sinned in the presence of all must be corrected in the presence of all: those things that are sinned secretly must be corrected secretly. Distribute the times, and Scripture agrees. The manner of reproof, why it should be done in secret.

Let us act thus and it must be done thus, not only when we are sinned against, but when someone sins, so that it is unknown to others. We must rebuke in secret, argue in secret; so as not to expose the person while wanting to reproach publicly. We wish to rebuke and correct: what if the enemy seeks to hear what to punish? For the bishop knows some murderer, and no one else knows him. I want to rebuke publicly, but you seek to report him. Indeed, I neither expose nor neglect: I rebuke in secret; I place the judgment of God before his eyes; I terrify his bloody conscience; I persuade him to repent. We must be endowed with this love. Hence, sometimes men admonish us, as if we do not rebuke: either they think we know what we do not know, or they think we are silent about what we know. But perhaps what you know, I also know: but I do not rebuke in your presence because I wish to heal, not accuse. There are adulterers in their homes, they sin in secret; sometimes they are betrayed to us by their wives, often jealous, sometimes seeking the welfare of their husbands: we do not expose them publicly, but we rebuke in secret. Where the evil occurred, there the evil dies. Yet we do not neglect that wound; above all, showing the man established in such a sin and bearing a wounded conscience, that wound is deadly: because sometimes those who commit such things, by some perverse means, disdain it; and somehow they gather no and vain testimonies for themselves, saying, God does not care about carnal sins. Where is what we heard today: Fornicators and adulterers God will judge? Behold, pay attention, whoever suffers from such a disease. Hear what God says: not what your mind, favoring your sins, says to you, or your friend, tied by the same chain of iniquity with you, or rather your enemy and his. Therefore hear what the Apostle says: Marriage is honorable among all, and the bed undefiled. But fornicators and adulterers God will judge.

Life must quickly be corrected.

Therefore, brother, be corrected. Do you fear that your enemy might accuse you; and do you not fear that God might judge you? Where is faith? Fear when there is reason to fear. The day of judgment is indeed far off; but the last day of each person cannot be far off; because life is short. And because that shortness is always uncertain, you do not know when your last day will be. Correct yourself today, for the sake of tomorrow. Let correction benefit you now even in secret. For I speak openly, and in secret I reprove. I knock on the ears of all: but I address the consciences of some. If I were to say, You, adulterer, correct yourself: first, I might say what I do not know; perhaps what I had rashly heard, I might suspect. I do not say, You, adulterer, correct yourself; but, whoever among this people is an adulterer, correct yourself. Public correction, but secret correction. I know that he who will have feared, corrects himself. The sins of the flesh are not to be despised.

Let him not say in his heart, "God does not care about the sins of the flesh." The Apostle says, "Do you not know that you are the temple of God, and the Spirit of God dwells in you? Whoever destroys God's temple, God will destroy him. Let no one deceive himself." But perhaps someone might say, "My soul is the temple of God, not my body." He also added testimony, "All flesh is grass, and all the glory of flesh is as the flower of grass." What an unfortunate interpretation! A punishable thought! Flesh is called grass because it dies; but what dies for a time does not rise with sin. Do you want to know an even clearer meaning from this? The same apostle says, "Do you not know that your bodies are a temple of the Holy Spirit within you, which you have from God?" (No longer despise bodily sins: see how even your bodies are a temple of the Holy Spirit within you, which you have from God.) Did you despise bodily sin, despise that you sin against the temple? Your very body is a temple of the Spirit of God within you. Now see what you do with the temple of God. If you chose to commit adultery in the church within these walls, would anything be more wicked? But now you yourself are the temple of God. You enter the temple, you leave the temple, you remain in the temple at your home, you rise in the temple. See what you do, see that you do not offend the inhabitant of the temple, lest he departs from you and you fall into ruin. The Apostle says, "Do you not know that your bodies (he was speaking from fornication, so they would not despise bodily sins) are a temple of the Holy Spirit within you, which you have from God, and you are not your own? For you were bought at a great price." If you despise your body, consider your price.

Correction must not be delayed.

I know, and with me, every man who has considered a little more attentively, that no one who fears God does not correct himself under His words, except he who thinks he has more time to live. It is this very thing that has killed many, when they say: Tomorrow, tomorrow: and suddenly the door is closed. He remained outside with the voice of a raven, because he did not have the moan of a dove. Tomorrow, tomorrow; the voice of a raven. Groan like a dove, and strike your breast: but giving yourself blows to the chest, be corrected by the beating; lest it seem that you are not striking your conscience, but rather paving a bad conscience with blows, making it more solid, not more correct. Groan with a not empty groan. For perhaps you say to yourself: God has promised me forgiveness when I correct myself; I am safe: I read the divine Scripture: On the day that a wicked person turns from his wickedness and does justice, all his iniquities I will forget. I am safe; when I correct myself, God will give me forgiveness for my evils. And what am I to say? Will I voice a complaint against God? Will I say to God: Do not give him forgiveness? Will I say that this is not written, that God did not promise this? If I say these things, I say all falsehoods. You say well, you speak truly; God has promised forgiveness to your correction, I cannot deny it: but tell me, I beg you; look, I agree and I concede and I acknowledge that God has promised you forgiveness; but who has promised you tomorrow? Where do you read for me that you will receive forgiveness if you correct yourself; read there for me how long you will live. I do not read it, you say. Therefore, you do not know how long you will live. Be corrected and always ready. Do not fear the last day, as a thief who, while you are sleeping, digs through the wall: but stay awake, and correct yourself today. Why do you delay until tomorrow? There will be a long life. Let that long life be good. No one defers a good long meal, and yet you want to have a long bad life? Certainly, if it will be long, it is better that it be good: if it will be short, it is good that it be spent well. But men neglect their life so much that they do not want to have a bad life, except that. You buy an estate, you seek a good one; you want to marry, you choose a good wife; you want children to be born, you wish for good ones; you rent sandals, and you do not want bad ones: and you love a bad life! What has your life done to offend you, that you want only it to be bad, so that among all your good things, you alone may be bad? The pastor ought to correct wrongdoings and carry the burden of his ministry.

Therefore, my brothers, if I wanted to correct one of you in private, perhaps he would listen to me: I correct many of you in public; everyone praises me; let someone listen to me. I do not love a praiser in voice, and a despiser in heart. For when you praise, and do not correct yourself, you are a witness against yourself. If you are evil and what I say pleases you, displease yourself: because if you, being evil, displease yourself, you will please yourself when corrected, which I said the day before yesterday, unless I am mistaken. In all my words, I propose a mirror. These words are not mine, but I speak at the Lord's command, by whose threat I do not keep silent. For who would not choose to remain silent and not to give an account of you? But we have already taken up a burden that we cannot and should not shake off from our shoulders. You have heard, my brothers, when the Epistle to the Hebrews was read: Obey your leaders and submit to them; for they keep watch over your souls, as those who will give an account: let them do this with joy and not with sorrow; for this would be unprofitable for you. When do we do these things with joy? When we see people making progress in the words of God. When does a worker rejoice in the field? When he looks at the tree and sees fruit; when he looks at the harvest and sees abundance of crops in the threshing floor: he did not labor in vain, he did not bend his back in vain, he did not wear out his hands in vain, he did not endure cold and heat in vain. This is what it means: let them do this with joy and not with sorrow; for this would be unprofitable for you. Did he say: it would be unprofitable for them? No; he said: it would be unprofitable for you. For when those leaders are saddened by your evil deeds, it is profitable for them; the sadness itself is beneficial for them: but it is not profitable for you. But we want nothing to be good for us that is not good for you. Therefore, together in the Lord's field, brothers, let us work well; so that together we may rejoice in the reward.

Sermons - Sermon 83

SERMO 83 ON THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL MT 18, 21, 22:

"As many times as my brother sins against me," etc. The likeness of cruel slaves.

Yesterday, the holy Gospel admonished us not to neglect the sins of our brothers: "If your brother sins against you," it says, "rebuke him between you and him alone. If he listens to you, you have gained your brother. But if he disdains you, take with you one or two others, that every word may be established by the mouth of two or three witnesses. But if he refuses to listen to them, tell it to the Church. And if he refuses to listen even to the Church, let him be to you as a Gentile and a tax collector." Today's chapter, which follows the one we heard just now, also pertains to this matter. For when the Lord Jesus had said this to Peter, Peter asked the Master how often he should forgive a brother who sins against him and sought to know whether seven times would suffice. The Lord responded to him: "Not seven times, but seventy-seven times." Then he told a very frightening parable: "The kingdom of heaven is like a man, a householder, who wished to settle accounts with his servants; among them he found one debtor who owed ten thousand talents. And when he ordered that all he had, and his entire family, and he himself be sold, and the debt be paid, the servant fell on his knees before his lord, asking for a delay and earned forgiveness. For his lord had mercy on him and forgave all his debt. But that servant, once freed from his debt but still a slave to iniquity, went out and found a fellow servant who owed him not ten thousand talents, as his own debt had been, but one hundred denarii. He began to seize him by the throat and said, 'Pay what you owe.' But this fellow servant begged him, just as he had begged his lord: however, he did not find such a fellow servant as his lord had been. Not only did he refuse to forgive the debt, but he did not even grant a delay. He dragged him off, strangled, to be paid, already freed from the lord's debt. This displeased the other servants, and they reported to their lord what had happened. And the lord made that servant come before him and said to him: 'You wicked servant, I forgave you all that debt because you pleaded with me; should you not have had mercy on your fellow servant, just as I had mercy on you?' And he ordered that all that had been forgiven be required of him."

Every man is a debtor to God; however, he has his brother as a debtor.

Therefore, he proposed this similitude for our instruction and did not want us to perish while admonishing. Thus, he says, your heavenly Father will do to you if each one of you does not forgive his brother from your hearts. Behold, brothers, the matter is clear, a useful admonition; and a very healthy obedience is owed, so that what is commanded be fulfilled. For every man is both a debtor to God and has his brother as a debtor. For who is there that is not a debtor to God, unless there can be found in him no sin? But who is there that has no brother as a debtor, unless no one has sinned against him? Do you think anyone in the human race can be found who is not himself bound by some sin to his brother? Therefore, every man is a debtor, yet also has a debtor himself. That is why God, being just, set a rule for you in your debtor, what He Himself will also do. There are two works of mercy that free us, which the Lord Himself briefly set forth in the Gospel: Forgive, and you will be forgiven; give, and it will be given to you. Forgive, and you will be forgiven pertains to forgiveness. Give, and it will be given to you pertains to granting a benefit. He said this concerning forgiveness; you also want to be forgiven for what you sin, and you have another whom you can forgive. Again, regarding granting a benefit; a beggar asks you, and you are a beggar of God. For when we all pray, we are beggars of God: we stand at the door of the great father of the family, or rather we lie prostrate, supplicant and groaning, wanting to receive something; and that something is God Himself. What does a beggar ask of you? Bread. And what do you ask of God, if not Christ, who says: I am the living bread that came down from heaven? Do you want to be forgiven? Forgive: forgive, and you will be forgiven. Do you want to receive? Give, and it will be given to you.

How often one should forgive a brother. But listen to what might move you in this clear directive. In the forgiveness where pardon is sought and owed by the forgiver, what can move you is what moved Peter. "How often must I forgive?" he said. "Seven times?" "Not enough," said the Lord: "I do not say to you, Seven times; but, seventy-seven times." Now count how many times your brother has sinned against you. If you can reach the seventy-eighth fault to go beyond seventy-seven times, then exact vengeance. Is it really true what He says, and does the matter truly stand such that if he sins seventy-seven times you forgive; but if he sins seventy-eight times, it is already permitted for you not to forgive? I dare, I dare say, that even if he sins seventy-eight times, you should forgive. And if he sins, as I said, seventy-eight times, forgive. And if he sins a hundred times, forgive. And why should I say so many and so many times? Absolutely, as many times as he may sin, forgive. Have I then dared to exceed the measure of my Lord? He fixed the limit of forgiveness at seventy-seven. Shall I presume to overstep this limit? It is not true, I have not dared to say more. I heard my Lord Himself speaking in His Apostle, where no measure and number are prefixed. For he says: Forgiving one another, if anyone has a complaint against another; even as God in Christ forgave you. You heard the pattern. If Christ has forgiven you seventy-seven sins up to this point and no further, set a limit yourself and do not forgive beyond. But if Christ has found thousands of sins and yet forgives them all, do not withhold mercy, but seek the resolution of that number. For the Lord did not say seventy-seven times without reason; since absolutely there is no sin which you ought not to forgive. Behold, that servant whose debtor was found to owe him ten thousand talents. I think indeed that ten thousand talents, as small as the amount might be, represent ten thousand sins. I do not want to say that one talent encompasses all sins. Now, how much did that servant owe him? He owed a hundred denarii. Is this not more than seventy-seven? And yet the Lord was angry because he did not forgive him. For not only are a hundred more than seventy-seven, but a hundred denarii perhaps are a thousand asses. But what is that compared to ten thousand talents?

All debts must be forgiven. And therefore let us be ready to forgive all offenses that are committed against us, if we desire to be forgiven. For if we consider our own sins, and count what we have done, what we have seen, what we have heard, what we have thought, what innumerable motions; I do not know whether we could sleep without a burden. Therefore, we ask daily, we daily knock at the divine ears by praying, we daily prostrate ourselves and say: Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors. What are your debts? All, or some part? You will respond, All. Thus also you to your debtor. Therefore, you set this rule, you speak this condition: with this pact and agreement when you pray, you remind, so that you say: Forgive us as we also forgive our debtors.

Notable figure regarding this matter.

What then does seventy-seven mean? Listen, brothers, to a great mystery, an admirable sacrament. When the Lord was baptized, the holy evangelist Luke recalled his generations there: in what order, in what lineage, by what descent it came to the generation in which Christ was born. Matthew began from Abraham and came down to Joseph in descending order. But Luke, numbering in ascending order, began to count from the baptism of Christ. Why did one descend and the other ascend? Because Matthew commended the generation of Christ, by which He descended to us; therefore, he began to count descending when Christ was born. Luke, however, began to number at the baptism of Christ, as that is the beginning of ascension: he began to count ascending and completed the generations at seventy-seven. From whom did he count? Pay attention to whom. He began to count from Christ up to Adam himself, who first sinned and generated us with the obligation of sin. He reached up to Adam, and seventy-seven generations were counted: that is, from Christ up to Adam, which we said are seventy-seven; and from Adam to Christ seventy-seven. Therefore, if no generation is omitted, no sin is overlooked where it ought not to be forgiven. For this reason, he enumerated seventy-seven generations, commending the number the Lord mentioned in the forgiveness of sins; since he began to count from baptism, where all sins are forgiven.

Decalogue, another figure of the same. And in this, brothers, accept still a greater sacrament. In the number seventy-seven exists the mystery of the forgiveness of sins. So many generations are found from Christ to Adam. Then, ask more diligently the secret of this number itself, and seek its hidden places: knock more diligently, so that it may be opened to you. Justice consists in the law of God: this is true. For the law is entrusted in the Ten Commandments. Therefore, he owed ten thousand talents. This is that memorable Decalogue written by the finger of God, handed down to the people through Moses, the servant of God. Therefore, he owed ten thousand talents: it signifies all sins, because of the number of the law. He also owed a hundred denarii: not less from the same number. For even a hundred times a hundred makes ten thousand; and ten times ten, a hundred. Both the ten thousand talents, and the ten times ten. For the legitimate number has not been deviated from, in which you will find both sins in both. Each debtor, and each crying for pardon and obtaining it: but that bad servant, ungrateful servant, wicked, refused to pay back what he received, refused to grant what was given to him unworthy. In the seventy-seventh number, all sins prefigured.

Therefore, see, brothers: everyone who begins from Baptism, goes forth free, ten thousand talents having been forgiven him; and when he goes out, he is to find his fellow servant as his debtor. Therefore, observe the sin itself: because the number eleven is the transgression of the law. For the law is ten, the sin is eleven. For the law through ten, the sin through eleven. Why the sin through eleven? Because it is the transgression of the ten, so that you come to eleven. However, in the law, the measure is fixed: but transgression is sin. Now when you transgress the ten, you come to eleven. So great is the mystery that was figured, when it was commanded that the tabernacle be made. Many numbers were said there, in great sacrament. Among other things, goat hair curtains were ordered to be made, not ten, but eleven: because through goat hair the confession of sins is shown. What more do you seek? Do you want to know that all sins are contained in this number seventy-seven? Sevenfold is usually counted as total: because time rolls around in seven days, and with the sevenfold completed, it returns again to the beginning, so that the same form is rolled. Through such revolutions of form, the ages pass: yet the number seven is not departed from. For He said all sins, when He said seventy times seven: because that eleven multiplied by seven, becomes seventy-seven. Therefore, He wished all sins to be forgiven, who signified them by the number seventy-seven. Let no one hold against himself by not forgiving, lest he be held against when he prays. For God says, Forgive, and it will be forgiven you. But I first forgave: do you at least forgive later. For if you do not forgive, I will recall you; and whatever I had forgiven you, I will replicate to you. For Truth does not lie; nor does Christ deceive or be deceived, who added, saying: So also will your Father who is in heaven do to you. You find a Father, imitate the Father. For if you do not wish to imitate Him, you plan to be disinherited: He will therefore do to you, He says, your heavenly Father, if you do not forgive each one your brothers from your hearts. Do not say in your tongue, I forgive, but delay in your heart. For God shows you punishment by threatening vengeance. God knows where you say. A man heard your voice: God looks at your conscience. If you say, I forgive; forgive. It is better when you cry out with your mouth, and forgive in your heart, than to be kind with your mouth, cruel in your heart.

Forgiveness must be granted in such a way that discipline is not neglected.

Now therefore, undisciplined children plead, and do not want to be flogged, who thus prescribe to us when we wish to give discipline: I have sinned, forgive me. Behold, I have forgiven, and again he sins. Forgive: I have forgiven. He sins a third time. Forgive: I have forgiven a third time. Now let him be flogged the fourth time. And he replies: Have I wearied you seventy times seven? If by this prescription the severity of discipline falls asleep, when the discipline is suppressed, impunity encourages wickedness. What then must be done? Let us correct with words, and if necessary, also with blows: but let us forgive the offense, let us cast the fault out of our hearts. For this reason the Lord added: from your hearts, so that if discipline is imposed through love, leniency does not depart from the heart. For what is as kind as a doctor bearing an instrument? He cries while being cut, and is cut: he cries while being burned, and is burned. This is not cruelty; far be it that the severity of the doctor be called cruelty. He is severe on the wound so that the man may be healed: because if the wound is patted, the man is lost. Thus, therefore, I have warned in this way, my brothers, that we love our brothers who have sinned in every way, that we do not let love for them depart from our hearts, and that we give discipline when necessary: lest through the relaxation of discipline wickedness increases, and we begin to be accused on account of God; because it has been recounted to us: Rebuke those who sin before all, so that others may fear. Certainly, if anyone distinguishes the times, which alone is true, and resolves the question, it is true. If the sin is secret, rebuke in secret. If the sin is public and open, rebuke publicly: so that the sinner may be corrected, and the others may fear.

Sermons - Sermon 84

SERMO 84 ON THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL MT 19, 17:

"If you wish to come to life, keep the commandments."

How greatly eternal life is to be loved is understood from the love of this life. The Lord said to a certain young man: If you wish to enter into life, keep the commandments. He did not say: If you wish to enter into eternal life; but: If you wish to enter into life; defining that life which would be eternal life. Therefore, let us first commend the love of this life. Indeed, even any kind of life is loved; and people fear and dread to end even this kind of life, troublesome, miserable as it is. Hence, it is to be seen and considered how much eternal life is to be loved; when even this miserable and eventually ending life is loved so much. Consider, brothers, how greatly life is to be loved, where you will never end life. You, therefore, love this life, where you labor so much, run, bustle, gasp; and it is hardly counted what is necessary in this miserable life; to sow, to plow, to plant, to sail, to grind, to cook, to weave: and after all these you have to end life. Behold what you suffer in this miserable life you love: and you think you will always live, and never die? Temples, stones, marbles, strengthened with iron and lead, still fall: and does man never think he will die? Learn therefore, brothers, to seek eternal life, where you will not endure these things, but will reign forever with God. For he who desires life, as the prophet says, loves to see good days. For in evil days death is actually preferred over life. Do we not hear and see people in some tribulations and distresses, conflicts and illnesses, while they are situated, and see themselves laboring, saying nothing else but, God send me death, hasten my days? And sometimes an illness comes; there is hurrying, doctors are summoned, payments and gifts are promised. Death itself says to you: Behold, I am here, whom you asked for from the Lord a little while ago; why do you now wish to flee from me? I found you to be a deceiver, and a lover of miserable life.

True and blessed life: eternal life. In these days which we live, the Apostle says: "Redeeming the time, because the days are evil." Are not, therefore, the days we live in the corruption of this flesh, under such a burden of a corruptible body, among so many temptations, amid so many difficulties, where false pleasure exists, no security of joy, fear torturing, greed craving, and dry sadness? Behold how evil the days are: and no one wants to end these evil days, and people greatly ask God to live long. But what is it to live long, if not to be tormented long? What else is it to live long, but to add evil days to evil days? And when children grow, it seems days are added to them; but they do not know that they decrease: and this is a false reckoning. For with their growth, the days rather decrease than increase. Set for some man, for example, eighty years: whatever he lives, he diminishes from the total. And foolish men celebrate many birthdays, both their own and their children's. O wise man! If wine decreases for you in a bottle, you are saddened: you lose days, and rejoice? Therefore, the days are evil: and worse because they are loved. Thus, this world so flatters, that no one wants to end this troubled life. For true and blessed life is this when we rise and reign with Christ. For even the impious will rise, but to go into fire. Therefore, life is not unless it is blessed. And blessed life cannot be, unless it is eternal, where there are good days; not many, but one. From the custom of this life, days are so called. That day knows no sunrise, no sunset. That day has no tomorrow following it; because it is not preceded by a yesterday. We have this day, or these days, and this life, and true life in promises. It is therefore the reward of some work. For if we love the reward, let us not fail in work: and we will reign forever with Christ.

Sermons - Sermon 85

SERMO 85 OF THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL MT 19, 17-25:

"If you wish to come to life, keep the commandments," and so forth. The observation of commandments for the attainment of life. The Gospel reading, which just resounded in our ears, brothers, demands a listener and a doer more than an expositor. What is clearer than this light: If you wish to enter into life, keep the commandments? What then shall I say? If you wish to enter into life, keep the commandments. Who is there who does not want life? And yet who is there who wants to keep the commandments? If you do not wish to keep the commandments, why do you seek life? If you are lazy in work, why do you hurry for the reward? That rich young man said he had kept the commandments: he heard the greater commandments: If you wish to be perfect, one thing is lacking in you; go, sell all that you have and give to the poor; and you will not lose, but you will have treasure in heaven; and come, follow me. For what does it profit you if you do it and do not follow me? But he went away sorrowful and sad, as you have heard: for he had many riches. What he heard, we also heard. The mouth of Christ is the Gospel. He sits in heaven; but He does not cease to speak on earth. Let us not be deaf: for He cries out. Let us not be dead: for He thunders. If you do not wish to do the greater things, do the lesser. The burden of the greater is much for you, at least undertake the lesser. Why are you lazy about both? Why do you oppose both? The greater things are, Sell all that you have and give to the poor, and follow me. The lesser things are: Do not kill, Do not commit adultery, Do not bear false witness, Do not steal. Honor your father and mother, Love your neighbor as yourself. Do these. Why do I call to you, to sell your things, when I cannot force you not to steal what belongs to others? You have heard: You shall not steal; you rob. Before the presence of such a great Judge, I now hold you not a thief, but a robber. Spare yourself, have mercy on yourself. This life still gives you a reprieve, do not reject correction. You were a thief yesterday; do not be one today. Perhaps you were one even today; do not be one tomorrow. At some time end the evil, and for the reward demand the good. You want to have good things, and you do not want to be good: your life is contrary to your wishes. If it is a great good to have a good house, how much evil is it to have an evil soul? The rich are saved with difficulty. The rich man left sorrowful, and the Lord said: How difficult it is for those who have riches to enter the kingdom of heaven! And how difficult it would be, he showed by proposing a similitude so difficult that it would be utterly impossible. For everything impossible is difficult, but not everything difficult is impossible. Consider the kind of difficulty: Truly I say to you, it is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven. A camel passing through the eye of a needle: if he had said a flea, it would be impossible. Finally, having heard this, the disciples were saddened and said: If it is so, who then can be saved? What rich man? Poor people, hear Christ, I speak to the people of God. You who are poor are more numerous, at least seize this; and yet listen. Whoever glories in poverty, beware of pride, lest humble rich people surpass you: beware of impiety, lest pious rich people surpass you: beware of drunkenness, lest sober rich people surpass you. Do not glory in poverty, just as they should not glory in riches. The worm of riches is pride.

Let the rich hear, if indeed there are any; let them hear the Apostle: Command the rich of this world, for there are rich of another age. The poor are the rich of another age, the Apostles are the rich of another age, who said: As having nothing, and possessing all things. To let you know of which rich he speaks, he added, of this world. Therefore let the rich of this world hear the Apostle: Command, he says, the rich of this world, not to be proud. The first worm of riches is pride. A bad moth, it gnaws everything and leads to ashes. Command, therefore, not to be proud, nor to hope in the uncertainty of riches; lest perhaps you sleep rich, and rise poor. Nor hope in the uncertainty of riches (these are the words of the Apostle); but in God, he says, the living. A thief takes your gold, who takes God from you? What does the rich man have, if he does not have God? What does the poor man not have, if he has God? Therefore, do not hope in riches, he says; but in the living God, who provides us abundantly with all things to enjoy; among which all things, also himself. On what should be given regarding wealth.

If therefore they should not hope in riches, nor trust in them, but in the living God; what are they to do with riches? Hear what: They should be rich in good works. What does this mean? Explain it, Apostle. For many do not want to understand what they do not want to do. Explain it, Apostle: do not give occasion for evil deeds through the obscurity of speech. Tell what you have said: They should be rich in good works. Let them hear, understand: let them not be allowed to excuse themselves, but rather begin to accuse themselves, and say what we have just heard in the Psalm: For I acknowledge my sin. Tell what it is:

Let the rich be rich in good works.

What does it mean: "Let them give easily"? Is this not also understood? Let them give easily, let them share. You have, another does not have: share, so that it may be shared with you. Share here, and you will share there. Share bread here, and you will receive bread there. What bread here? What you gather with sweat and toil, from the curse of the first man. What bread there? He who said: I am the living bread, which came down from heaven. You are rich here, but you are poor there. You have gold, but you do not yet hold present Christ. Distribute what you have, so that you may receive what you do not have. Let them be rich in good works, let them give easily, let them share.

How much should be distributed to the poor?

Therefore, will they lose their possessions? Let them share, he said: no, let them give all. Let them keep for themselves as much as is sufficient, let them keep more than is sufficient. Let us give a certain part from it. What part? The tenth part. The scribes and Pharisees gave tithes. Let us be ashamed, brothers; they gave tithes, for whom Christ had not yet shed blood. The scribes and Pharisees gave tithes: lest you think you are doing something great because you break bread for the poor; and that is scarcely one-thousandth of your wealth. And yet I do not blame it: at least do this. I am so thirsty, so hungry, that even for those crumbs I am glad. But nevertheless, I will not remain silent about what He who died for us said while alive. Unless your righteousness exceeds that of the scribes and Pharisees, he says, you will not enter the kingdom of heaven. He does not flatter us: He is a physician, He reaches to the living. Unless your righteousness exceeds that of the scribes and Pharisees, you will not enter the kingdom of heaven. The scribes and Pharisees gave tithes. What is it? Ask yourselves. See what you do, of what you do; what you give, what you leave for yourselves; what you spend in mercy, what you reserve for luxury. Therefore: Let them willingly distribute, let them share, let them store up a good foundation for themselves for the future, so that they may lay hold of true life. The poor are bound to curb their desires.

I have admonished the rich: listen, you poor. You give: you do not desire to steal. You distribute your resources: you restrain your desires. Listen, you poor, to the same apostle: It is indeed great gain. Gain is the acquisition of profit. It is indeed great gain, he says, piety with sufficiency. You share the world with the rich: you do not share a home with the rich, but you share the sky, you share the light. Seek sufficiency, seek what is enough, do not desire more. The rest burdens, it does not uplift; it loads, it does not honor. Great gain, piety with sufficiency. First and foremost piety. Piety is the worship of God. Piety with sufficiency. For we brought nothing into this world. Have you brought anything here? But neither have you, the rich, brought anything. You found everything here, you were born naked with the poor. Common to both is the frailty of the body; common is the wailing, a witness of miseries. For we brought nothing into this world (he speaks to the poor); but neither can we take anything out. Having food and clothing, let us be content with these. For those who wish to become rich Those who wish to become rich; not: Those who are. Let those who are, be. What concerns them they have heard, that they be rich in good deeds, readily give, share.

They heard it themselves. You who are not yet, listen. Those who want to become rich fall into temptation and traps, and many foolish and harmful desires. Do you not fear? Hear what follows: Which drown men in destruction and perdition. Do you not fear? For the love of money is the root of all evils. Avarice is wanting to be rich, not merely being rich. That is avarice itself. Do you not fear being drowned in destruction and perdition? Do you not fear the root of all evils, avarice? You uproot the root of thorns from your field, and do not uproot from your heart the root of evil desires? You cleanse your field, from which your belly may receive fruit; and do you not cleanse your heart, where your God may dwell? For the love of money is the root of all evils: which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows.

Meeting of the rich and the poor.

You have heard what you should do, you have heard what you should fear, you have heard from where the kingdom of heaven is purchased, you have heard from where the kingdom of heaven is hindered. All of you agree on the word of God. Both the rich and the poor God has made. Scripture speaks: The rich and the poor have met together; the Lord has made both. The rich and the poor have met together. On what road, unless in this life? A rich man is born, a poor man is born. You meet each other while walking the same road. Do not oppress, do not defraud. This one needs, that one has. But the Lord has made both. Through him who has, He helps the needy: through him who does not have, He tests the one who has. We have heard, we have spoken: let us fear, let us beware, let us pray, let us reach.

Sermons - Sermon 86

SERMO 86 On the words of the Gospel Matthew 19:21:

"Go, sell everything you have, and give to the poor," and so on. The treasure to be placed in heaven. The Gospel has reminded us by the present reading to speak to your Charity about the heavenly treasure. For indeed, unlike the faithless greedy ones think, our God did not wish to make us lose our possessions: if that which is commanded to us be well understood, piously believed, and devoutly accepted, He did not command us to lose them but showed the place where to put them. For no one can think except about his treasure and follow his wealth with a certain journey of the heart. Therefore, if they are buried in the earth, the heart seeks the abyss; but if they are reserved in heaven, the heart will be on high. Therefore, if Christians want to do what they also profess to know: for not all who hear this know it; and would that those who know it not know it in vain: he who therefore wants to have his heart on high, let him place there, there what he loves; and being placed on earth in the flesh, let him dwell with Christ in the heart: and as the head of the Church has gone before it, so let the heart of the Christian go before him. Just as the limbs are to go where the head Christ has gone before, so the heart of man, having risen again, will go where it has now gone before. Let us, therefore, go from here as far as we can: our whole being will follow where something of ourselves has gone ahead. The earthly house is ruinous: the heavenly house is eternal. Let us migrate in advance to where we plan to come.

Seeking the counsel of salvation, but not gladly listening.

We heard about a certain rich man seeking advice from the Good Teacher on how to attain eternal life. What he loved was great, but what he was unwilling to disdain was worthless. Thus, with a perverted heart, he listened to him whom he had already called a good teacher, and with greater love for worthlessness, he lost possession of charity. Unless he wished to obtain eternal life, he would not have sought advice on having eternal life. What then is it, brothers, that he rejected the words from the faithful teaching of the one whom he himself had called a good teacher? That teacher is good before he teaches; when he teaches, is he bad? He was called good before he taught. He did not hear what he wanted, but he heard what he needed: he came desiring, but he left sad. What if he had been told: Lose what you have? When he left sad, because it was said, Keep well what you have. Go, he said, sell all that you have, and give to the poor. Perhaps you are afraid of losing? Look at what follows: And you will have treasure in heaven. Perhaps you had set some servant to guard your treasures: your guard for your gold will be your God. He who gave on earth guards in heaven. Perhaps he would not have doubted to entrust what he had to Christ, and thus he was saddened because it was said to him: Give to the poor, as if saying in his heart, If you had said, Give to me, I would keep it for you in heaven; I would not hesitate to give to my Lord, the good teacher: but now you have said: Give to the poor.

What is given to the poor, God receives. No one should fear to give to the poor; no one should think that he is giving to the one whose hand he sees. He receives who commanded you to give. Neither do we say this from our own heart or human conjecture: hear him himself both advising you and writing security for you. "I was hungry," he says, "and you gave me to eat." And when, after enumerating their deeds, they responded: "When did we see you hungry?" he replied: "When you did it to one of the least of these my brethren, you did it to me." The poor man begs, but the rich man receives: you give to him who consumes, he receives who repays. Nor will he repay with what he has received: he wanted to be a lender, he promises more than you have given. Uncover now your avarice, think of yourself as a moneylender. Certainly if you were, you would be scolded by the Church, confounded by the word of God, all your brothers would curse you as a cruel moneylender, desiring to gain from the tears of others. Be a moneylender, no one prohibits you. You wish to give to the poor, who when he repays will lament: give to the worthy, who even encourages you to accept what he promises.

God himself is appropriate as creditors so that they may receive.

Give to God, and meet God. Indeed, give to God, and you shall be received. Certainly, you sought your debtor on earth: and he too sought, but where to hide himself from your face. You approached the judge and said, "Order my debtor to be summoned." Upon hearing this, he departs, and does not even seek to greet you: to whom perhaps, in his need, you had offered help by lending him support. Therefore, you have someone to give to. Give to Christ; he meets you freely, so that you may receive, and marveling, because he received something from you. For those on the right side he himself will freely say: "Come, blessed of my Father." Whither? "Come, receive the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." For what reason? "I was hungry, and you gave me something to eat; I was thirsty, and you gave me something to drink; I was naked, and you clothed me; a stranger, and you took me in; sick and in prison, and you visited me." And they: "Lord, when did we see you?" What is this? The debtor meets, and the creditors excuse. The faithful debtor does not want them to be deceived. Do you hesitate to receive? I have received, and you are unaware? And he responds how he received: "When you did it for one of the least of these my brothers, you did it for me." I did not receive personally: I received through my brethren. What was given to them has reached me: be secure, you have not lost. You looked upon the less worthy on earth: you have a worthy one in Heaven. I, he says, have received, I will repay.

What Christ gives in exchange for earthly things. And what have I received? What shall I give back? I was hungry, he says, and you gave me food, and so forth. I received the earth, I will give heaven: I received temporal things, I will restore eternal things: I received bread, I will give life. In fact, let us also say this, I received bread, I will give bread: I received drink, I will give drink: I received shelter, I will give a home: I was visited when sick, I will give health: I was visited in prison, I will give freedom. The bread that you gave to my poor, was consumed: the bread that I will give, both restores and does not fail. Therefore let him give us the bread, that bread which descended from heaven. When he gives bread, he will give himself.

What did you want, then, when you lent money? To give money and to receive money: but to give less and to receive more. God says to you, I will exchange everything you have given for the better. For if you were to give a pound of silver and receive a pound of gold, how much joy would you feel? Look and ask greed: I gave a pound of silver, I receive a pound of gold. What is similar between silver and gold? More so, what is similar between earth and heaven? And you were going to leave behind both gold and silver here: but you were not going to remain here forever. And I will give another, and I will give more, and I will give better, and I will give eternal. So, let our greed be restrained, brothers, so that what is holy may be kindled. Completely what prohibits you from doing good speaks to you badly: you want to serve a bad mistress, not recognizing the good Lord. And sometimes two mistresses occupy the heart, and they tear apart the bad servant worthy of serving such, in different directions.

Greed and luxury, two mistresses giving opposite commands.

Sometimes a man is possessed by two opposing mistresses, greed and luxury. Greed says: Save; luxury says: Spend. Under two masters ordering different things, demanding different things, what will you do? Both have their own persuasive arguments. And when you begin to refuse to obey and to go into your own freedom; since they cannot command, they flatter. And their flatteries are more to be feared than their commands. What does greed say? Save for yourself, save for your children. If you are in need, no one will give to you. Do not live for the moment: plan for your future. On the other hand, luxury says: Live while you live, do good for your soul. You are going to die, and you do not know when: to whom you will leave your possessions, whether he will possess them, you do not know. You take away and deprive from your own throat: perhaps once you are dead, he will not even place a cup over you; or if he places a cup, he himself will be drunk, no drop will fall to you. Therefore, do good for your soul while you can, when you can. Greed orders one thing: Save for yourself, plan for the future. Luxury orders another: Spend, do good for your soul.

Christ frees from their yoke. Be weary, o book called to freedom; be weary of the servitude of such mistresses. Acknowledge your Redeemer, your Liberator. Those servants: He commands easier things, He does not command contrary things. I dare to say more. Avarice and lust were commanding contrary things, so that you could not obey both: and one was saying, Preserve for yourself, and provide for the future: the other was saying, Spend, do well for your soul. May your Lord proceed saying the same, and your Redeemer not commanding contrary things. If you should refuse, his house does not need one who serves unwillingly. Attend to your Redeemer, attend to your price. He came to redeem, He shed blood. He held you dear, whom He purchased at such a high price. You acknowledge who has purchased, attend to what He redeems. I am silent about the other vices proudly dominating you: for you were serving innumerable evil masters. I speak of these two commanding contrary things, pulling in different directions, avarice and lust. Rescue yourself from these, come to your God. If you were a slave to iniquity, be a slave to righteousness. The words they were saying to you, and commanding contrary things, you hear the same from your Lord, and He does not command contrary things. He does not remove their words, but removes their power. What was avarice saying to you? Preserve for yourself, provide for the future. The word is not changed, the man is changed. Now if it pleases, compare those who offer counsel. That is avarice, this is righteousness. The counsel of avarice is imprudent.

Discuss contrary things. Greed says, "Save for yourself." Suppose you want to obey: ask where to save. It will show you a fortified place, a walled chamber, an iron chest. Fortify everything: perhaps a domestic thief will even break through the innermost parts; and while you take care of your money, you will fear for your life. Perhaps while you save much, he who wants to seize it also thinks of killing. Finally, although you fortify your treasure and your clothing with whatever defense against thieves; fortify them against rust and moths. What will you do? There is no external enemy taking it away, but an internal one consuming it.

Another foolish plan.

Therefore, greed did not give good advice. Behold, it commanded you to save, and it did not find a place to give where you could save. Let it also say consequently, Plan for the future. For how much of the future? For a few uncertain days. It says, Plan for the future, to a man who perhaps will not live until tomorrow. But behold, let him live as much as greed thinks, not as much as it shows, not as much as it teaches, not as much as it trusts: but as much as it thinks he will have lived, grown old, and finished his life; still the old man, bent over, leaning on a staff, seeks profit, and hears greed saying, Plan for the future. For which future? It speaks now to the dying. Because of your sons, it says. If only at least we would have those old men who are not greedy, who do not have sons. Even to them, even to such, even to those not excusing their own inequity with any image of piety, it does not cease to say, Plan for the future. But perhaps they are quickly ashamed: let us see those who have sons, whether they are certain their sons will possess what they have left behind. Let them pay attention while they live, to the sons of others, some losing what they had through the wickedness of others, some squandering what they possessed through their own wickedness: and the children of the rich remain poor. Stingy, tenacious slaves of greed. But my sons will possess this, it says. It is uncertain: I do not say it is false; but what you have done is uncertain. Finally, make it certain: what do you want to leave them? What you acquired for yourself. Surely what you acquired was not left to you, and you have it. If you could have what was not left to you, then they can also have what you do not leave them. The counsel of God commands that which is greed. The counsels of greed have been refuted: but the Lord says the same things, now let justice speak: the words will be the same, not the meaning. The Lord your God says to you, Keep for yourself, consider the future. And ask him, Where will I keep it? You will have a treasure in heaven, where neither thief approaches, nor moth destroys. For how long will you keep it? Come, blessed of my Father, take possession of the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. For how many days is this kingdom, the end of the sentence itself shows. When he said about those on the left: So they will go into eternal fire; about the righteous he said: But the righteous into eternal life. This is to consider the future. The future, which has no further future. Those days without end are called days, and it is called a day. For one said: That I may dwell in the house of the Lord in the length of days, when he spoke of those days. And a day is called: I have begotten you today. And those days, one day; because there is no longer time: that day is neither preceded by yesterday, nor excluded by tomorrow. Therefore let us consider into that future: and the words that greed was saying to you are not different; and greed is overturned.

False piety in the children of the greedy.

It remains for you to say: And what do I do about my children? Listen to the advice of your Lord on this matter as well. If your Lord says to you, I who created think better than you who begot: you might not have something to say. But you will look upon that rich man who went away sad, and was rebuked in the Gospel; and you might say to yourself: That rich man did wrong by not selling everything and giving to the poor, because he had no children; but I have children; I have those for whom I must provide. And in this weakness your Lord will stand by you.

I dare to speak through His mercy: I dare to say something, not from my presumption, but from His compassion. For yourself and for your children: but listen to me. If, as human things are, each of you has lost a child: pay attention, brothers, pay attention, because greed has no excuse, neither here nor in the future age. Behold, even human things: for we do not desire it, but we see examples. A Christian has been lost, you have lost a Christian child: therefore you have not lost him, but you have sent him ahead. For he has not departed, but has proceeded. Ask your faith: certainly you too will go there, where he has gone before. I speak briefly, to which I think no one will respond. Is your son alive? Ask your faith. If therefore he lives, why is his part seized by his brothers? But you will say: Will he not return, and possess it? Then send it to him where he has gone ahead: he cannot come to his things, but his things can go to him. See with whom he is. If your son were serving in the palace, and became a friend of the Emperor, and said to you, Sell my part there, and send it to me: would you find anything to respond? Now, your son is with the Emperor of all emperors, and with the King of all kings, and with the Lord of all lords: send to him. I do not say, He himself has necessities: his Lord, with whom your son is, is needed on earth. Here He wants to receive what He gives in heaven. What some greedy people are accustomed to doing, make a passage: give to strangers, what you will receive in your homeland.

What was owed to the living is due to the dead.

Finally, now, nothing about you; I speak about your son. You hesitate to give your own, and hesitate to return what belongs to another: certainly, you are convicted because you were not keeping it for your own sons. Behold, you do not give to your sons because you would take away from your sons. You would certainly take away from him. Why is he unworthy to receive, because he lives with a more worthy one? Deservedly if he with whom he lives would not wish to receive, now he is rich not to your house but to the divine house. Therefore, let it be absent that I say to you, Give what you have: but I say to you, Return what you owe. But his brothers, you say, will have it. O bad doctrine, teaching your sons to wish for the death of their brothers! If they will be richer from the matter of their dead brother, see how they watch themselves in your house. What then will you do? You divide the inheritance, and teach fratricide? In the division of inheritance, Christ must be counted among the sons. But I do not want to speak of the one lost, lest I seem to threaten human misfortunes. Let us speak in a better and more prosperous way. I do not say, you will have one less, but count it as you have one more. Make room for Christ with your children; let your Lord join your family, let your Creator join your offspring, let your brother join the number of your children. For indeed, with such importance, he deigned to be a brother. And although he is the Only Begotten Son of the Father, he wished to have co-heirs. Behold how generously he is! Why are you so barren? You have two children, count him as the third; you have three, let him be the fourth; you have five, let him be the sixth; you have ten, let him be the eleventh. I do not wish to say more: reserve a place for your Lord among your children. For what you give to your Lord will benefit both you and your children; but what you poorly reserve for your children will harm both you and them. You will give one portion, which you accounted for one child. Consider yourself to have begotten one more. The excuse for greed has been removed.

What is great, my brothers? I give advice, do I bind the throat? As the Apostle says: I say these things for your benefit, not to cast a snare upon you. I think, brothers, it is a small and easy thought to think that the father of children has one more child, and to acquire such estates which you may possess forever, both you and your children. Greed does not have what it says. You have shouted at these words. Speak against it, do not let it conquer you, do not let it be stronger in your hearts than your Redeemer. Let it not be stronger in your heart than he who advises us to lift up our hearts. So now let us dismiss it. The counsel of luxury is refuted.

What does luxury say? What? Do well by your soul. Behold, even the Lord says: Do well by your soul. What luxury was telling you, justice tells you this. But see also here how it is said. If you want to do well by your soul, consider that rich man who, by the counsel of luxury and greed, wanted to do well by his soul. A region succeeded for him, and he did not have where to store his fruits, and he said: What shall I do? I do not have where to collect them. I found what I shall do: I will tear down the old storehouses, and I will build new ones, and I will fill them, and I will say to my soul: You have many goods, rejoice. Listen to the counsel against luxury: Fool, this night your soul will be taken from you: the things which you have prepared, whose will they be? And where is that soul going, which will be taken from him? This night it will be taken, and he does not know where it will go.

Another rich man luxurious.

Behold another rich man, luxurious and proud. He feasted sumptuously every day and was clothed in purple and fine linen. And a poor man covered with sores lay at his gate, longing to be fed with the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table; even the dogs came and licked his sores. The poor man died and was carried by the angels to Abraham's bosom. The rich man also died and was buried; and in Hades, being in torment, he lifted up his eyes and saw Abraham far off and Lazarus in his bosom. And he called out, 'Father Abraham, have mercy on me, and send Lazarus to dip the end of his finger in water and cool my tongue, for I am in anguish in this flame.' But Abraham said, 'Child, remember that you in your lifetime received your good things, and Lazarus in like manner bad things; but now he is comforted here, and you are in anguish. And besides all this, between us and you a great chasm has been fixed, in order that those who would pass from here to you may not be able, and none may cross from there to us.' And he said, 'Then I beg you, father, to send him to my father's house— for I have five brothers— so that he may warn them, lest they also come into this place of torment.' But Abraham said, 'They have Moses and the Prophets; let them hear them.' And he said, 'No, father Abraham, but if someone goes to them from the dead, they will repent.' He said to him, 'If they do not hear Moses and the Prophets, neither will they be convinced if someone should rise from the dead.' God's counsel on giving alms.

Regarding the giving of alms and obtaining rest for the soul in the future, so we should do good for our soul, which has been perversely spoken by luxury, spoken also by Moses, and the Prophets. Let us listen while we live. Because there, it is in vain to desire to hear, who scorned these things when they listened. Or are we waiting for someone to rise from the dead and tell us to do good for our soul? This has already been done: not your father, but your Lord has risen. Listen to Him, take good advice. Do not spare your treasures, spend as much as you can. The voice of luxury pleads: the voice of the Lord has been made. Spend as much as you can, do good for your soul, so that your soul is not taken away this night. You have in the name of Christ, as I believe, a sermon about giving alms. This voice of yours praising, is acceptable to the Lord, if He sees also the hands working.

Sermons - Sermon 87

SERMO 87 Held on the Lord's Day, about that which is written In the Gospel of Matthew 20:1-16 "The kingdom of heaven is like a man, a householder,"

"Who sent laborers into his vineyard."

We worship God, and God worships us.

You have heard a parable from the Holy Gospel resonating with the present time about those who work in the vineyard. For now is the time of the physical harvest. There is also a spiritual harvest, where God rejoices in the fruit of His vineyard. For we worship God, and God cultivates us. But we do not worship God in such a way that we make Him better by worshipping. We worship Him by adoring, not by plowing. He, however, cultivates us like a farmer cultivates the field. Thus, when He cultivates us, He makes us better; because a farmer also makes the field better by cultivating it: and He seeks the very fruit in us, so that we may worship Him. His cultivation in us is that He continuously removes evil seeds from our hearts with His word, opens our hearts like with a plough of His discourse, plants the seeds of His commandments, and awaits the fruit of piety. For when we have accepted this cultivation into our heart so that we may worship Him well, we are not ungrateful to our farmer, but we produce the fruit in which He rejoices. And our fruit does not make Him richer, but makes us more blessed.

How God cultivates us.

Behold, listen, for as I said, God attends to us. For because we attend to God, it is not necessary to prove it to you. For every man has this on his lips, that men attend to God. But that God attends to men, the listener almost shudders when he hears: for it is not customary among men to say that God attends to men; but that men attend to God. Therefore, we must prove to you that God also attends to men; lest we seem to have spoken an undisciplined word, and someone disputes against us in his heart, and, not knowing what we said, reproaches us. Therefore, it is established to show you that God also attends to us; but I have already said, as a field, to make us better. The Lord says in the Gospel: I am the vine, you are the branches, my Father is the farmer. What does a farmer do? I ask you, who are farmers; what does a farmer do? I suppose he attends to the field. If therefore the Father God is a farmer, he has a field, and attends to his field, and expects fruit from it. A vineyard planted by God.

Finally, he planted a vineyard, as the Lord Jesus Christ himself says, and leased it to farmers, who would give him the fruit at the proper times. And he sent his servants to them to ask for the produce of the vineyard. But they mistreated them, and killed some, and refused to give the produce. He sent others; they endured similar treatment. And the master of the house, the cultivator of his field, and the planter and leaser of his vineyard, said: I will send my only son; perhaps they will respect him. And, he said, he sent his son as well. They said among themselves: This is the heir; come, let us kill him, and the inheritance will be ours. And they killed him; and cast him out of the vineyard. When the owner of the vineyard comes, what will he do to those wicked tenants? It was answered: He will bring those wretches to a wretched end, and will lease the vineyard to other farmers, who will give him the produce at its proper time. The vineyard was planted, and the law given in the hearts of the Jews. Prophets were sent, seeking their good life as fruit: the prophets were mistreated and killed by them. And the Christ, the only Son of the master of the house, was sent; and they killed the heir, and thus lost the inheritance. Their wicked counsel turned against them. They killed in order to possess; and because they killed, they lost. The laborers hired for the cultivation of the vineyard. And now you have heard the parable from the Holy Gospel, because the kingdom of heaven is like a householder who went out to hire laborers for his vineyard. He went out early in the morning, and those he found he hired; and he agreed with them for a denarius as their wage. He went out also at the third hour, found others, and brought them to the work of the vineyard. And he did the same at the sixth and ninth hours. He also went out at the eleventh hour near the end of the day, found some idle and standing; and he said to them: Why are you standing here? Why are you not working in the vineyard? They answered: Because no one has hired us. He said: Come also, and what is just, I will give you. He agreed on a denarius as their wage. Those who were to work for one hour, how could they hope to earn a denarius? Yet they rejoiced that they would receive something. They were also brought in for one hour. When the day ended, he ordered them all to be paid their wages, from the last to the first. He then began to pay from those who had come at the eleventh hour, and he ordered to give them a denarius. Those who had come at the first hour, seeing those who had received a denarius, which they had agreed upon, hoped to receive more: it came to them, and they received a denarius. They murmured against the householder, saying: Behold, those of us who have borne the burden and the heat of the day, you have made equal and the same as those who have worked only one hour in the vineyard. And the householder, giving a most just answer to one of them, said: Friend, I did you no wrong; that is, I did not cheat you; what I agreed upon I gave you. I did not wrong you, because I gave what I promised. For this one I do not wish to pay, but to give. Am I not allowed to do what I wish with what is mine? Or is your eye evil, because I am good? If I took away something from someone else, I would rightly be reprimanded, as if I were a cheater and unjust; if I did not give what was owed to someone, I would rightly be reprimanded, as if I were a cheater and denier of another’s right: but when I give what is owed, and moreover, give a gift to whomever I wish, neither the one to whom I owed can reproach me, nor can the one to whom I gave ought to rejoice. There was nothing to respond: and all were made equal, and the last became first and the first last; by equalizing, not by overturning. What does it mean, The last will be first and the first last? Because both the first and the last received the same. The reward was first given to the last, what it may be.

What is it then that he began to give from the last? Are not all, as we read, going to receive simultaneously? For we read in another place of the Gospel, that he will say to those whom he will place on his right: Come, blessed of my Father, take possession of the kingdom prepared for you from the beginning of the world. If, therefore, all are going to receive simultaneously, how do we understand here that those who worked the eleventh hour received first, and those who worked the first hour received later? If I can speak in such a way that it comes to your understanding, thanks be to God. For you ought to give thanks to him, who distributes to you through us: for we do not distribute from what is ours. If you ask about two, for example, who received first, the one who received after one hour or the one who received after twelve hours; every person responds that the one who received after one hour received before the one who received after twelve hours.

Thus, although all received in one hour, nevertheless because some received after one hour, and others received after twelve hours, those are said to have received first who received after a short time. The first righteous, such as Abel, such as Noah, called as if at the first hour, will receive the happiness of resurrection with us. Other righteous ones after them, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and whoever was of their age, called as if at the third hour, will receive the happiness of resurrection with us. Other righteous ones, Moses and Aaron, and whoever with them called as if at the sixth hour, will receive the happiness of resurrection with us. After them, the holy Prophets called as if at the ninth hour, will receive the same happiness with us. At the end of the world, all Christians called as if at the eleventh hour, will receive the happiness of that resurrection with them. All will receive simultaneously: but see how long those first ones wait to receive. If therefore those first ones wait a long time, and we wait a short time; although we receive simultaneously, we seem to have received first because our reward will not be delayed. A denarius of eternal life.

We will all therefore be equals in that reward, as the first are last and the last are first: because that denarius is eternal life, and in eternal life, all will be equal. For although they will shine with the diversity of merits, some more, others less: however, concerning eternal life, it will be equal to all. For it will not be longer for one and shorter for another, as it is equally everlasting: what has no end will not have an end for you, nor for me. In a certain way, there will be conjugal chastity, in another way, there will be virginal integrity: in another way, the fruit of good work, in another way, the crown of suffering. This in one way; that in another way: however, as far as pertains to living eternally, neither will one live more than the other, nor the other more than the one. For they live equally without end, though each one lives in his own brightness: and that denarius is eternal life. Therefore, let him not murmur who received after a long time, against him who received after a short time. To one, it is repaid; to the other, it is given; however, to both, one thing is given.

How are those called at various hours of the day understood otherwise?

There is also something similar in this life, and except for that resolution of this likeness, by which those called in the first hour are understood to be Abel and the righteous of his age, in the third Abraham and the righteous of his age, in the sixth Moses and Aaron and the righteous of his age, in the ninth the Prophets and the righteous of his age, in the eleventh as if in the end of the age all Christians; except for this resolution of this likeness, and in this life of ours this likeness can be observed. For as those called in the first hour, who newly begin to be Christians from their mother's womb; as it were in the third, children; as it were in the sixth, youths; as it were in the ninth, those inclining towards old age; as it were in the eleventh, the completely decrepit: nevertheless, all will receive the same denarius of eternal life.

Against those who delay coming when called to the vineyard. But take heed and understand, my brothers, lest anyone delays coming to the vineyard because he is assured that whenever he comes, he will receive that denarius. He is indeed assured that the denarius is promised to him; but he is not commanded to delay. For did those who were hired for the vineyard, when the head of the household went out to hire those he found at the third hour, and he hired them, for instance, did they say to him, "Wait, we will not go there until the sixth hour"? Or those whom he found at the sixth hour said, "We will not go until the ninth hour"? Or those found at the ninth hour said, "We will not go until the eleventh hour"? For he will give everyone the same amount: why should we toil more? What he will give and what he will do is in his own counsel: you, when you are called, come. For indeed equal wages are promised to all, but concerning the very hour of work, there is a great question. For if those, for example, who are called at the sixth hour, being in the prime of their bodies, where the years of youth are ardent, just as the sixth hour is ardent; if those young men called would say, "Wait, we have heard in the Gospel that all will receive the same wages; when we grow old, we will come at the eleventh hour; receiving the same amount, why should we toil more?" It would be answered to them and said: You do not wish to labor, who do not know whether you will live until old age? You are called at the sixth hour, come. The head of the household indeed promised you a denarius even if you come at the eleventh hour: but no one promised you that you will live until the seventh hour. I do not say, until the eleventh, but until the seventh. Why then do you delay when He who calls you, certain of the reward, uncertain of the day? See lest perchance what He promises you by giving, you take away from yourself by delaying. If this is rightly said of infants, as if they pertain to the first hour; if it is rightly said of children, as if they pertain to the third hour; if it is rightly said of young men, as if they are in the fervor of the sixth hour: how much more rightly is it said of the decrepit, "Behold now it is the eleventh hour, and you still stand idle, reluctant to come?" As the head of the household goes out to call to his vineyard. Did not the head of the household come out to call you? If he did not come out, what is it that we are speaking? Certainly, we are servants of his household, sent to hire workers. Why then do you stand? You have already finished the number of years, hasten to the denarius. For this is for the head of the household to come out, to be made known: because he who is in the house, is in secret, he is not seen by those who are outside; but when he comes out of the house, he is seen by those who are outside. Christ, when He is not understood and not recognized, is in secret: but when He is recognized, He comes out to hire. For He came out from secrecy to knowledge: Christ is known, Christ is preached everywhere; all things under heaven proclaim the glory of Christ. He was in a certain way laughable and reprovable among the Jews, He seemed humble, He was despised. For He hid His majesty, He had evident infirmity. What was evident in Him was despised, and what was hidden was not known. For if they had known, they would never have crucified the Lord of glory. Is He still to be despised sitting in heaven, if He was despised while hanging on the tree? They wagged their heads who crucified Him, and standing before His cross, and as if achieving the fruit of their cruelty, they insultingly said: If He is the Son of God, let Him come down from the cross. He saved others, cannot He save Himself? Let Him come down from the cross, and we will believe in Him. He did not come down, because He was hidden. For He who could rise from the tomb could much more easily come down from the cross. For our instruction, He demonstrated patience, postponed His power, and was not recognized. He had not yet come out to hire workers, He had not come out, He had not been known. On the third day He rose, showed Himself to the disciples, ascended to heaven, and sent the Holy Spirit on the fiftieth day after the resurrection, the tenth after the ascension. The sent Holy Spirit filled all who were in one chamber, one hundred and twenty people. Those filled with the Holy Spirit began to speak in the languages of all nations, the calling was expressed, He came out to hire. For then even one who received the Holy Spirit, even one spoke in the languages of all nations. But now in the Church itself, unity as if one speaks in the languages of all nations. To what language has the Christian religion not reached? to what ends has it not extended? Now there is no one who hides from its heat; and still delay from him who stands in the eleventh hour!

Despair and perverse hope kill the soul.

It is clear, my brothers, entirely clear, hold firm and be certain that our God Jesus Christ, when anyone turns to faith in Him from their evil or excessive way, all their past sins are forgiven, and wholly, as if debts were forgiven, new leaves are started with Him. Absolutely everything is forgiven. Let no one be anxious that something will not be forgiven them. But again, let no one perversely be secure. For these two things kill souls: either despair or perverse hope. Listen briefly about these two evils. For just as good and right hope brings deliverance, so perverse hope deceives. First, observe how despair deceives. There are men who, when they start to think about the evils they have committed, do not believe they can be forgiven; and while they do not believe they can be forgiven, they let their soul perish, perishing in despair, saying in their thoughts: There is no hope for us anymore; for such great things we have committed cannot be forgiven or pardoned; why then should we not satisfy our desires? Let us at least fulfill the pleasure of the present time, since we have no reward in the future. Let us do whatever we please, even if it is not lawful; so that we may have at least temporal pleasure, since we do not deserve to receive eternal joy. Saying such things, they perish by despairing, whether before they entirely believe, or after they have become Christians and fallen into some sins and crimes by living wickedly. The Lord of the vineyard approaches them, and as if they were despairing and turning their back on his call, He knocks and cries out through the prophet Ezekiel: On whichever day a man turns from his wicked way, all his iniquities I will forget. Hearing and believing this voice, they are revived from despair, and from that deepest and profound abyss into which they had been sunk, they emerge.

Perverse hope is a conversion which is deferred. But they must fear that they fall into another abyss, and by hoping perversely they die, who could not die by despairing. For they change thoughts indeed far different, but no less pernicious; and again they begin to say in their hearts: If on any day I shall have turned away from my wicked path, a merciful God, as He truly promised through the Prophet, will forget all my iniquities, why should I turn today, and not tomorrow? Why today, and not tomorrow? Let today pass as yesterday, be in the most wicked pleasure, be in the gulf of crimes, wallow in deadly delight: tomorrow I shall turn, and that will be the end. It is responded to you: The end of what? You say: Of my iniquities. Well, rejoice, because on the morrow there will be an end to your iniquities. What if before tomorrow your end comes? Therefore, indeed you rightly rejoice, because on account of your iniquities, God promised you forgiveness if you turn: but no one promised you tomorrow. Or if perhaps the mathematician has promised, it is far different than God. Many mathematicians have deceived, because often they promised profits to themselves and found losses. Therefore, also for these badly hoping ones, the master of the household proceeds. Just as he went out to those who had badly despaired and perished by despairing, and called them back to hope: so also he proceeds to those who wish to perish by hoping and delaying; and he says to them through another book: Do not delay to turn to the Lord. Just as he had said to those: On whatever day the wicked turns away from his wicked way, I will forget all his iniquities; and he took away their despair, by which they had already given their soul to perdition, in every way hopeless of forgiveness: so also he proceeds to these who wish to perish by hoping and delaying; and he speaks to them, and rebukes them: Do not delay to turn to the Lord, nor defer from day to day. For his wrath will come suddenly, and in the time of vengeance he will destroy you. Therefore do not defer, do not close what is open against you. Behold the giver of forgiveness opens the door for you; why do you delay? You should rejoice if he ever opens to one knocking: you have not knocked, and he opens, and you remain outside? Therefore do not defer. Scripture says in a certain place regarding works of mercy: Do not say, Go and return, tomorrow I will give; when you can do good immediately: for you do not know what the next day will bring. You have heard the command not to defer so that you may be merciful to another, and by deferring you are cruel to yourself? You should not defer to give bread, and you defer to accept forgiveness! If by having mercy on another you do not defer, have mercy also on your own soul pleasing God. Offer alms also to your soul. We do not say that you give to it, but that you do not drive away the hand of the giver.

Friendship with the powerful, when it harms safety, must be condemned. But sometimes men greatly harm themselves from there, when they fear to offend others. Good friends are very powerful for good, and bad friends for evil. Therefore, the Lord, so that we may scorn the friendships of the powerful for our salvation, did not wish to choose senators first, but fishermen. Great is the mercy of the artisan. For he knew that if he chose a senator, the senator would say: My dignity has been chosen. If he chose a rich man first, the rich man would say: My wealth has been chosen. If he chose an emperor first, the emperor would say: My power has been chosen. If he chose an orator first, the orator would say: My eloquence has been chosen. If he chose a philosopher, the philosopher would say: My wisdom has been chosen. Meanwhile, he says, let those proud ones be deferred, they swell greatly. There is a difference between greatness and swelling: both are large; but not both are healthy. Let those proud ones be deferred, he says, they must be healed by some solid means. Give me, he says, that fisherman first. Come you, poor man, follow me; you have nothing, you know nothing, follow me. Poor idiot, follow me. There is nothing in you to be afraid of, but there is much in you to be fulfilled. Such a large fountain must have an empty vessel brought to it. The fisherman abandoned his nets, the sinner received grace, and became a divine orator. Behold what the Lord did, of whom the Apostle says: God chose the weak things of the world to confound the strong; and God chose the base things of the world, and things which are not, to bring to nothing things that are. Finally, now the words of fishermen are read, and the necks of orators are bowed. Therefore, let empty winds be removed from the midst; let the smoke, which vanishes as it grows, be removed from the midst; entirely, these things should be scorned for salvation's sake.

Christ the physician must be obeyed, despising the opposing powers.

If anyone were sick in body in the city, and there was a very skilled doctor there, an enemy to the friends of the sick person: if anyone therefore were sick in the city with some dangerous bodily disease, and there was in the same city a very skilled doctor, an enemy, as I said, to the powerful friends of the sick person, who would say to their friend, Do not call him, he knows nothing: they would say this not with a judging mind, but with envy: would not he, for his own health, disregard the stories of his powerful friends, and in order to live a few more days, despite any offense given to them, employ that doctor, whom reputation had commended as very skilled, to drive away the disease of his body? The human race is ailing, not with diseases of the body, but with sins. A great sufferer lies in the entire world from the east to the west. The omnipotent physician descended to heal the great sufferer. He humbled himself even to mortal flesh, as if down to the bed of the sick. He gives precepts of health, he is scorned: those who listen are freed. He is scorned when powerful friends say, "He knows nothing." If he knew nothing, his power would not fill nations. If he knew nothing, he would not exist before he was with us. If he knew nothing, he would not send Prophets before himself. Are not the things that were foretold now being fulfilled? Does not this physician prove the power of his art by fulfilling promises? Are not harmful errors being overturned throughout the whole world, and the desires of the world being tamed by the threshing? Let no one say, "The world was better before than it is now: since this physician began to exercise his art, we see many dreadful things here." Do not be amazed. Before anyone was cured, the physician's station seemed clean of blood: but now, seeing this, shake off vain delights, come to the physician; it is a time for health, not for pleasure. The frenzied, and the lethargic.

Let us be healed, therefore, brothers. If we recognize the physician, let us not rage against him like madmen, nor turn away from him like those with lethargy. For many have perished by raging, many by sleeping. The frenzied are those who go insane by not sleeping. The lethargic are those who are oppressed by excessive sleeping. Truly, men are like this. Against this physician, some want to rage; and since He now sits in heaven, they persecute His faithful members on earth. He heals even such as these. Many of them, turned from enemies into friends, from persecutors into preachers. He even healed those very Jews who raged against Him when He was here, like madmen, for whom hanging on the wood, He prayed. For He said: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. Many of them, however, with rage calmed, as if their madness was subdued, recognized God, recognized Christ. After the Ascension, with the Holy Spirit sent forth, they turned to Him whom they had crucified, and in believing in the Sacrament, they drank His blood, which they had shed by raging.

Exempla.

We have examples. Saul was persecuting the members of Him who was already seated in heaven: he was heavily persecuting in madness, with a lost mind, with excessive disease. But with one voice from heaven He cried to him: Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me? He struck the frenzied one, raised him healthy; killed the persecutor, brought to life the preacher. Many lethargics also are healed. For they are similar to those who do not rage against Christ, and are not malicious against Christians; but only by delaying they languish with sleepy words, become lazy to extend their eyes to the light, and those who wish to wake them are troublesome. "Leave me," says the languid lethargic, "I beg you, leave me." Why? "I want to sleep." But you will die from that. He, in love with sleep, responds, "I want to die." And charity from above: "I do not want [you to die]." Often, even a son exhibits this sentiment of charity towards an elderly father who is close to dying, already at the end of his age. If he sees that his father is lethargic, and recognizes this lethargic disease in him from the doctor, who tells him: "Wake your father, do not let him sleep if you want him to live," the son is present to the elder, knocks, plucks, pricks, is troublesome out of pity: nor does he quickly allow him to die by the very old age that would soon take him; and if he lives, the son rejoices, so that he may live a few more days with him who is about to die and with whom he will succeed. With how much greater charity should we be troublesome to our friends, with whom we will not live a few days in this world, but with God forever? Let them love us, therefore, and do what they hear through us, and worship whom we worship, so that they may receive what we hope for. Turned to the Lord, etc.

Sermons - Sermon 88

SERMO 88 On the Words of the Gospel, Matthew 20:30-34: And behold, two blind men sitting by the roadside, when they heard that Jesus was passing by, cried out, "Lord, have mercy on us, Son of David!" The crowd rebuked them, telling them to be silent; but they cried out all the more, "Lord, have mercy on us, Son of David!" And stopping, Jesus called to them and said, "What do you want me to do for you?" They said to him, "Lord, let our eyes be opened." And Jesus in pity touched their eyes, and immediately they recovered their sight and followed him. Where two blind men were sitting by the roadside, and crying out, "Lord, have mercy on us, Son of David."

Christ, the physician of our salvation. To what purpose his miracles were. Your Holiness knows well with us that our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ is the physician of our eternal salvation, and that He took on the weakness of our nature so that our sickness would not be eternal. For He assumed a mortal body in which He could kill death. And although He was crucified through our weakness, as the Apostle says, He lives by the power of God. The words of the same Apostle are: And because He no longer dies, death no longer has dominion over Him. These things are well known to your faith. It also follows that we should know that all the miracles which He did corporeally are for our admonition, so that we may perceive from Him that which will neither pass away nor have an end. He restored sight to the blind, whose eyes death would someday close; He raised Lazarus, who would die again. And whatever He did for the health of bodies, He did not do so that they would be eternal: although He will indeed grant even to the body eternal salvation in the end. But because those things which were not seen were not believed, through these temporal things which were seen, He built faith towards those things which were not seen. The faith of the Church thereafter is more praiseworthy without miracles.

Therefore, let no one, brothers, say that our Lord Jesus Christ does not perform these things now, and for this reason prefer earlier times over the present times of the Church. For at one time the same Lord, to those who saw and therefore believed, preferred those who do not see and yet believe. Up until that time, indeed, the disciples' weakness wavered to such an extent that, even though they saw Him already resurrected, they thought they needed to touch Him to believe. It was not enough for their eyes to see unless hands were also placed upon His members and the scars of the recent wounds were touched: so that the disciple who doubted, upon suddenly touching and feeling the scars, would exclaim: "My Lord and my God!" The scars showed Him to be the one who healed all wounds in others. Could the Lord not have risen again without scars? But He knew the wounds in the hearts of the disciples, which He kept the scars on His body to heal. And what did the Lord say to that now-confessing disciple who declared: "My Lord and my God"? "Because you have seen me," He said, "you have believed; blessed are those who do not see and yet believe." Whom did He call, brothers, if not us? Not just us alone, but those after us as well. For a short time later, after He withdrew from mortal sight to strengthen faith in hearts, whoever believed, believed without seeing, and their faith held great merit: comparable to this faith, they brought only a pious heart, but not a probing hand.

Christ now performs greater miracles.

Therefore, the Lord did these things to invite to faith. This faith now burns fervently in the Church, spread over the whole world. And now it performs greater healings, for the sake of which He did not disdain to demonstrate those lesser ones then. For as the soul is better than the body, so the salvation of the soul is better than the salvation of the body. Now the blind flesh does not open its eyes by the miracle of the Lord; but the blind heart opens its eyes to the word of the Lord. Now the mortal body does not rise again; but the soul, which lay dead in the living body, rises again. Now the deaf ears of the body are not opened: but how many have closed ears of the heart, which yet, being penetrated by the word of God, are opened, so that those who did not believe, believe, and those who lived badly, live well, and those who did not obey, obey? And we say, He believed; and we marvel when we hear about those whom we once knew as hard-hearted. Why then do you now marvel at someone believing, being innocent, serving God; except because you see someone seeing, whom you knew as blind; you see someone living, whom you knew as dead; you see someone hearing, whom you knew as deaf? For behold otherwise the dead, about whom the Lord said to someone who was delaying, so that he would not follow the Lord, because he wanted to bury his father: "Let the dead bury their own dead." Certainly, the dead who are burying are not dead in body: because if they were, they would not be able to bury dead bodies. Yet He calls them dead: where, except inwardly in the soul? For as visibly often in an entire and safe house, the master of that house lies dead; so in an entire body, many have a dead soul within: and thus the Apostle arouses them: "Awake, you who sleep, and arise from the dead, and Christ will illuminate you." He illuminates the blinded one who arouses the dead one. For by His voice through the Apostle, it is cried to the dead: “Arise, you who sleep.” The blind will be illuminated by light, when he has arisen. But how many deaf people did the Lord himself look upon with his own eyes, when He said: "He who has ears to hear, let him hear." For who was standing before Him without ears of the body? Therefore, which other ears was He seeking, except the ears of the inner man? The eye of the mind, by which God is seen, is cleansed through faith.

Moreover, what kind of eyes was he seeking when he was speaking to those who surely had sight, but seeing through the eyes of the flesh? For when Philip said to him, "Lord, show us the Father, and it suffices us": he indeed rightly understood that the Father being shown could suffice; but if he who was equal to the Father did not suffice, how would the Father suffice? And why did he not suffice? Because he was not seen. Why was he not seen? Because the eye was not yet healthy enough to see. For what was seen in the flesh of the Lord was seen by the disciples who honored him, but also by the Jews who crucified him. Therefore, he who wished to be seen differently required different eyes. And so he responded thus to the one saying, "Show us the Father, and it suffices us": "Have I been so long with you, and you have not known me? Philip, he who has seen me has seen the Father." And so, to heal the eyes of faith for the time being, he was first admonished according to faith, that he might come to sight. And lest Philip think that God should be considered as he saw the Lord Jesus Christ in the body, he immediately added: "Do you not believe that I am in the Father, and the Father in me?" He had already said: "He who has seen me has seen the Father." But Philip's eye was not yet healthy enough to see the Father: and therefore not enough to see the Son equal to the Father. Thus, the mind's vision still wounded and unable to bear such great light, was healed and strengthened with the medicines and plasters of faith, and he said: "Do you not believe that I am in the Father, and the Father in me?" Therefore, he who cannot yet see what the Lord is about to demonstrate, should not seek first to see what he believes: but first believe, that the eye may be healed with which to see. For the form of a servant was displayed only to servile eyes: because he who did not consider it robbery to be equal with God, if he could already be seen as equal with God by those he wished to heal, would not have needed to empty himself and take the form of a servant. But because there was no way for God to be seen, and there was a way for a man to be seen, he who was God made himself man, so that what was seen might heal what could not be seen. For he himself said in another place: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." Philip could indeed have responded, and said, "Lord, behold, I see you: is the Father like this which I see, since you said, 'He who has seen me, has seen the Father'?" Before Philip responded to this, or perhaps before he thought it, when the Lord said, "He who has seen me, has seen the Father," he immediately added: "Do you not believe that I am in the Father, and the Father in me?" For with that eye he could not yet see, neither the Father, nor the Son equal to the Father: but that the eye might be healed to see, it had to be anointed to believe. Therefore, before you see what you cannot see, believe what you do not yet see. Walk by faith, that you may arrive at sight. Sight will not gladden in the homeland, whom faith does not console on the way. Thus says the Apostle: "As long as we are in the body, we are away from the Lord." And immediately he connects why we are still away, although we have already believed: "We walk," he says, "by faith, not by sight." Our whole work now is to heal the eye of the heart.

Therefore, all our work, brothers, in this life is to heal the eye of the heart, whereby God may be seen. For this reason are the most holy mysteries celebrated; for this reason is the word of God preached; for this reason are the moral exhortations of the Church—namely, those pertaining to the correction of morals, the correction of carnal desires, and the renunciation—not only in word but through a changed life—of this world; for this end do the divine and holy Scriptures accomplish whatever they do, that the inner part may be cleansed from that which hinders us from the sight of God. For just as the eye, made to see this temporal light, and although heavenly, yet corporeal and visible (for it was indeed made to see this light); nevertheless, if something is thrown or falls upon it, by which it is disturbed, it is cut off from this light; and although this light surrounds it by its presence, yet the eye turns away and is absent: but not only does it become absent by its disturbance from the present light, but the light itself, for which it was made to see, becomes painful to it: so too the eye of the heart, disturbed and wounded, turns away from the light of righteousness, neither daring nor able to contemplate it. The study of cleansing the eye of the heart.

What disturbs the eye of the heart? Greed, avarice, iniquity, worldly desires disturb, close, and blind the eye of the heart. And yet, just as a doctor is sought when the eye of the flesh is disturbed, and it is not delayed to open and cleanse it so that it may be healed to see this light, so should it be. We run, no one rests, no one delays, even if a speck falls into the eye. Certainly, the sun, which we wish to see with healthy eyes, was made by God. Much more luminous, indeed, is He who made it: nor is it the same kind of light, which pertains to the eye of the mind. That light is the eternal wisdom. But God made you, O man, in His own image. Would He give you the means to see the sun He made, and not give you the means to see Him who made you, when He has made you in His own image? He gave this also: He gave you both. But you care much for these outer eyes, and neglect the inner one greatly: you carry it worn and wounded. It is torment for you if your maker wishes to show Himself to you: it is torment for your eye before it is cured and healed. For Adam sinned also in paradise and hid himself from the face of God. Therefore, when he had a healthy heart with a pure conscience, he rejoiced in God's presence: after the eye was wounded by sin, he began to fear the divine light, fled into the shadows and thick woods, fleeing the truth and seeking darkness. The sick are invited to take the cup by the example of Christ.

Therefore, my brothers, since we were born from there, and as the Apostle says: In Adam all die: for we all were once two men if we did not want to obey the doctor, so that we would not be sick; let us obey, so that we may be freed from sickness. The doctor gave us precepts when we were healthy: he gave precepts so that we would not need the doctor. It is not the healthy who need a doctor, he says, but the sick. We disregarded the precepts when we were healthy, and we experienced how dangerous it was to disregard that precept. We have already begun to be sick, we labor, we are on the bed of sickness: but let us not despair. For since we were unable to come to the doctor, he himself deigned to come to us. He did not despise the wounded even when he was despised by the healthy. He did not cease to give other precepts to the ailing one, who did not wish to keep the first ones so he would not become ailing: as if he were saying: Surely you have experienced that I spoke the truth when I said: Do not touch this. Therefore heal at last, and come back to life. Behold, I bear your sickness: drink the bitter cup. For you yourself made those precepts of mine given to the healthy so sweet, so laborious. They were disregarded, you began to labor: you cannot be healed unless you drink the bitter cup, the cup of temptations with which this life abounds, the cup of tribulations, distresses, sufferings. Drink, he says, drink, so that you may live. And lest the sick respond to him, I cannot, I do not endure, I do not drink: the healthy doctor drank first, so that the sick would not hesitate to drink. For what bitterness is in such a cup, which he did not drink? If it is insult: he heard it first when he expelled demons: He has a demon, and because he casts out demons in Beelzebub. Hence, to console the sick, he said: If they have called the master of the house Beelzebub, how much more his household? If sufferings are bitter: he was bound and scourged and crucified. If death is bitter: he also died. If the kind of death is feared by weakness: nothing at that time was more ignominious than the death of the cross. For not in vain did the Apostle, commending his obedience, add, saying: He became obedient unto death, even death on a cross.

Why Christ honored the cross here. But because He was going to honor His faithful ones at the end of this age, He first honored the cross in this age; so that the princes of the earth who believed in Him would prohibit the crucifixion of any criminals: and what the persecuting Jews procured for the Lord with great insult, now His servants, even kings, bear on their foreheads with great confidence. It is not only evident now what kind of death the Lord deigned to endure for us: as the Apostle says: He was made a curse for us. And while the blindness of the Jews insulted Him as He was hanging, He could indeed have come down from the cross, He who would not have been on the cross at all if He had not willed it: but it was greater to rise from the tomb than to come down from the cross. Therefore, the Lord doing these divine acts and suffering human ones, reminds us by corporeal miracles and corporeal patience, that we may believe and be healed to behold those invisible things which the eye of flesh does not know. Therefore, doing this, He cured those blind men, about whom now the Gospel has been recited. And in curing, see what He admonished the inward sick man. The healing of the two blind men, what it signifies.

Observe the outcome of the event itself and the sequence of things. Two blind men were sitting by the road, and as the Lord was passing by, they cried out for Him to have mercy on them. But the crowd that was with the Lord restrained them from shouting. Do not think this was left without a mystery. However, they overcame the restraining crowd with their very persistent cry, so that their voice reached the ears of the Lord, as if He had not already anticipated their thoughts. Therefore, the two blind men cried out to be heard by the Lord and could not be silenced by the crowd. The Lord was passing by, and they cried out. The Lord stopped, and they were healed. For the Lord stopped: Jesus, and called them, and said: What do you want me to do for you? And they said: That our eyes may be opened. Because of their faith, the Lord restored their sight. If we understand the inner sick, the inner deaf, the inner dead; let us also seek the inner blind. The eyes of the heart are closed: Jesus passes by, so let us cry out. What does it mean, Jesus passes by? Jesus does temporal acts. What does it mean, Jesus passes by? Jesus performs transient actions. Observe and see how many of His deeds have passed. He was born of the Virgin Mary: does He always get born? He was nursed as an infant: does He always suckle? He journeyed through the stages of life up to youth: does He always grow physically? Childhood gave way to boyhood, boyhood to adolescence, adolescence to youth in one who was passing by and yielding. Even the miracles He performed have passed: they are read and believed. For such things were written to be read, they were passing as they happened. Lastly, so that we may not dwell on many things, He was crucified: does He always hang on the cross? He was buried, rose again, ascended into heaven: He no longer dies, and death no longer has dominion over Him: His divinity always remains, and the immortality of His body will never fail. Yet all the things that were done by Him temporally have passed; they are written to be read and preached to be believed. In all these things, therefore, Jesus passed by.

Two blind men, two peoples.

What do the two blind men by the wayside signify if not the two peoples to whom Jesus came to bring healing? Let us show these two peoples in the Holy Scriptures. It is written in the Gospel: I have other sheep that are not of this fold; I must bring them also, that they too will listen to my voice, and there shall be one flock and one shepherd. Who, then, are these two peoples? One is the Jewish people, and the other, the Gentiles. I was sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, He said. To whom did He say this? To His disciples, when that Canaanite woman was crying out, who confessed herself to be a dog, so that she might merit the crumbs from the table of her masters. And because she merited them, two peoples to whom He had come were demonstrated: specifically, the Jewish people, of whom He said: I was sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, and the Gentiles, whose type this woman prefigured, whom He first rejected, saying: It is not right to take the children's bread and toss it to the dogs. And to whom, when she said: Yes, Lord, but even the dogs eat the crumbs that fall from their masters' table, He responded: O woman, great is your faith! Let it be done for you as you desire. From there was also that Centurion, about whom the same Lord says: Truly I say to you, I have not found such great faith in Israel. Because he had said: Lord, I am not worthy to have you come under my roof; but only say the word, and my servant will be healed. Thus, before His Passion and glorification, the Lord already designated two peoples: one, to whom He had come because of the promises to the fathers; and the other, whom He did not reject out of mercy: to fulfill what was promised to Abraham: In your seed all the nations shall be blessed. Therefore, the Apostle also, after the Lord’s resurrection and ascension, having been rejected by the Jews, went to the Gentiles. Yet he did not remain silent to the churches that had believed from among the Jews: I was personally unknown to the churches of Judea that are in Christ. They only heard the report: The man who formerly persecuted us is now preaching the faith he once tried to destroy. And they praised God because of me. Thus, Christ is called the cornerstone who made both one. For the cornerstone unites two walls coming from different directions. What is so different as circumcision and uncircumcision, with one wall from Judea and the other wall from the Gentiles? But they are united by the cornerstone: For the stone which the builders rejected has become the cornerstone. A corner in a building is not there unless two walls coming from different directions meet in one, and are joined together in a certain unity. Therefore, these two walls figuratively were the two blind men crying out to the Lord.

Passing by, Jesus is called upon and heals.

Pay attention now, most beloved. The Lord was passing by, the blind were crying out. What does it mean, 'was passing by'? He was doing transient works, as we have already said. According to these transient works, our faith is built. For we believe in the Son of God, not only because He is the Word of God, through whom all things were made: for if He had always remained in the form of God, equal to God, not emptying Himself by taking the form of a servant; the blind would not feel, so that they could cry out. But when He was working transiently, that is, He humbled Himself, becoming obedient unto death, even death on a cross, two blind men cried out: "Have mercy on us, Son of David." Because even this very thing, that the Lord and creator of David, also wished to be the son of David, He did in time, making this happen by passing by. To cry out to Christ, what.

What does it mean, however, brothers, to cry out to Christ, if not to align with the grace of Christ in good works? I say this, brothers, lest we be noisy in voices and mute in conduct. Who is it that cries out to Christ to remove the inner blindness as Christ passes by, that is, by dispensing to us temporal sacraments, which remind us to grasp the eternal? Who is it that cries out to Christ? He who despises the world cries out to Christ. He who rejects the pleasures of the age cries out to Christ. He who says, not with the tongue, but with his life: The world is crucified to me, and I to the world; cries out to Christ. He who scatters and gives to the poor, that his righteousness may endure forever; cries out to Christ. For he who hears, and is not deaf, hears: Sell your possessions and give to the poor; make for yourselves purses that do not grow old, a treasure in heaven that does not fail: as if hearing the footsteps of Christ passing by, let the blind man cry out at these things, that is, let him do these things. Let his voice be in deeds. Let him begin to despise the world, distribute his own to the needy, consider as nothing the things that men love; let him disdain injuries, not seek to avenge, offer the cheek to him who strikes, pray for enemies; if anyone takes his belongings, not seek to retrieve them; if he has taken anything from anyone, restore it fourfold. The crowd preventing them from shouting. When they begin to do these things, all their relatives, friends, and acquaintances are disturbed. Those who love the world contradict them: "Why are you so insane? You are excessive. Are there not others who are Christians? This is foolishness, this is madness." And the crowd shouts such things, lest the blind call out. The crowd rebuked the shoutings, but it did not overcome their cries. Let them understand what they are doing, who wish to be healed. And now Jesus passes by: let those who are beside the way call out. These indeed are the ones who honor with their lips, but their heart is far from God. They are beside the way, whom the Lord commands to be of a broken heart. For when the things the Lord did are recited, passing by, Jesus is always shown to us as passing by. Because until the end of the age, there will not lack the blind sitting by the way. Therefore, it is necessary that those sitting beside the way cry out. The crowd that was with the Lord restrained the cry of those seeking healing. Brothers, do you see what I am saying? For I do not know how to say it, but more I do not know how to be silent. I say this, and I say it openly. For I fear Jesus passing by and remaining: and therefore I cannot be silent. Good Christians, truly zealous, wanting to do the commandments of God, which are written in the Gospel, are hindered by bad and lukewarm Christians. The very crowd that is with the Lord hinders those crying out; that is, it hinders those doing good works, lest by persevering they be healed. Let them cry out, not be discouraged, nor be led by the seeming authority of the crowds; nor imitate those who were Christians first, living poorly and envying good works. They should not say: "How do so many live, so let us live." Why not rather say as the Gospel says? Why do you want to live according to the rebuke of the prohibiting crowd, and not according to the footsteps of the passing Lord? They will insult, reproach, call back: you cry out until you reach the ears of Jesus. For those who persevere in doing such things as Christ instructed, and do not heed the prohibiting crowds, nor think much of the fact that they seem to follow Christ, that is, that they are called Christians; but love the light that Christ will grant more than they fear the noise of those prohibiting: in no way will they be separated, and Jesus will stand and heal them.

How eyes are healed. For how are our eyes healed? How do we perceive Christ through faith when He passes by in temporal dispensation; thus let us understand Christ standing in immutable eternity. For there the eye is healed, when the divinity of Christ is understood. Let your Charity perceive this: heed what I will say, a great mystery. All things done temporally by our Lord Jesus Christ embed faith in us. We believe in the Son of God, not only in the Word through whom all things were made; but in the Word made flesh, so that He might dwell among us, born of the Virgin Mary, and the other things that faith holds, which were shown to us, so that Christ might pass by, and so that the blind, hearing the footsteps of Him passing by, might cry out, recalling with their deeds the profession of faith in life. Now that they may be healed by crying out, Jesus stands still. Indeed, he who says: And if we have known Christ according to the flesh, but now no longer do we know, sees Jesus already standing. For he saw the divinity of Christ, as far as possible in this life. There is the divinity of Christ, there is the humanity of Christ. Divinity stands, humanity passes. What is this, that Divinity stands? It does not change, is not moved, does not depart. For He did not come to us in such a way that He left the Father: nor did He ascend in such a way that He was moved from His place. By assuming flesh, He changed place: but God assuming flesh, because He is not in place, neither changes place. Let us be touched while Christ stands, let our eyes be healed. But whose eyes? Namely those crying out, when He passes by: that is, those doing good works through the faith that was dispensed temporally to educate us as infants. The inner light is compared with the visible.

Having healed eyes, what could we possess more precious, brothers? Those who see this light which is made, which shines from heaven, or which is shown from a lamp, rejoice. And how wretched are those who seem not able to see this? But why do I speak, why do I say these things, except to exhort all of you to cry out when Jesus passes by? I commend to your Holiness a light to be loved, which perhaps you do not see. Believe, while you do not yet see; and cry out, that you may see. How great is the misfortune thought of men who do not see this bodily light? Someone is blinded: immediately it is said, 'He had an angry God, he committed some evil.' This is what the wife of Tobias was saying to her husband. He was shouting about the kid, lest it be from theft; he did not want to hear the sound of theft in his house: she defending her deed, struck her husband with reproach: and when he said, 'Return it, if it is from theft'; she responded insulting, 'Where are your justices?' How blind she was, who defended theft: and what light did he see, who commanded the return of theft! She was outside in the light of the sun: he was inside in the light of justice. Which of them was in the better light?

Alms do not allow [one] to go into darkness. To this light, brothers, we urge your Love to love it; so that you may cry out through works as the Lord passes by: let the voice of faith resound; so that Jesus, the Wisdom of God and the majesty of the Word of God through which all things were made, may open your eyes. Tobias likewise advised his son to cry out for this: that is, he advised him to do good works. He told him to give to the poor, ordered him to make alms for the needy, and taught him saying: Son, alms do not let one go into darkness. A blind man gave advice for receiving and obtaining light. Alms, he said, do not let one go into darkness. If the son, amazed, replied to him, Why then, father, did you not give alms, so that now you speak as a blind man? Are you not now in darkness, who tells me, Alms do not let one go into darkness? He knew about which light he taught his son, he knew in the inner man what he saw. The son reached out his hand to the father, so that he might walk on the earth; and the father to the son, so that he might dwell in heaven.

Shouting must be done among the crowds preventing shouting.

Briefly, to conclude, brothers, this discourse, from that which most touches and distresses us, see that there are crowds that reprimand the shouting blind men. All who in this crowd wish to be healed, let them not deter you: for many are Christians in name, and impious in deeds; do not let them deter you from good works. Shout among the restraining crowds, recalling, insulting, living badly. For not only with voices do the wicked compress good Christians, but also with evil actions. The good Christian does not want to go and watch. This very fact that curbs his desire, that he may not go to the theater, he shouts for Christ, he shouts to be healed. Others rush in, but perhaps Pagans, perhaps Jews. Indeed, so few would be in the theaters, that they would leave in shame if Christians did not go to the theaters. Therefore they too run, bearing the holy name to their punishment. So shout, by not going, pressing in your heart the temporal desire; and hold yourself with a strong and persevering shout to the ears of the Savior, that Jesus may stand and heal you. Shout amid those very crowds, do not despair of the Lord's ears. For those blind men did not shout from that part where the crowd was not, to be heard from that part where there was no impediment of those preventing. They shouted amidst those very crowds: and yet the Lord heard. So also you, even among sinners and the wanton, among lovers of worldly vanities, shout there, that the Lord may heal you. Do not shout to the Lord from another place, do not go to heretics, and there shout to the Lord. Pay attention, brothers, because in that crowd which forbade shouting, those who shouted were healed.

Perseverance overcomes opponents. For Your Holiness to consider, what it means to persevere in calling out. I will say what many have experienced with me in the name of Christ: the Church does not cease to bear such ones. When any Christian begins to live well, to be fervent in good works, and to despise the world, in the novelty of their works, they suffer reprovers and contradictory cold Christians. But if they persevere, surpass them by enduring, and do not falter from good works, the same ones who previously prevented them will now obey. For they reprimand and disturb and forbid as long as they presume they can be overcome. But if defeated by the perseverance of those making progress, they turn and begin to say: Great man, holy man: blessed is he to whom God has granted. They honor, congratulate, bless, and praise, like the crowd that was with the Lord. They prevented the blind from crying out, but after they cried out in this way, deserving to be heard and to obtain the mercy of the Lord, the same crowd says again: Jesus is calling you. Now they become encouragers who a little before were reprimanding them to be silent. However, he alone is not called by the Lord who does not labor in this world. But who in this life does not labor in sins and iniquities? If all labor, it is said to all: Come to me, all you who labor. If it is said to all, why blame your inviter for your fault? Come. His house is not narrow for you: equally by all, the kingdom of God is possessed entirely by each individual; increasing the number of possessors does not diminish it, because it is not divided. To each is the whole intact, which is held concordantly by many. The good and the bad are intermixed in the Church.

However, in the mystery of this reading, brothers, we recognize that which resounds most openly in other places of the holy books: that inside the Church there are both good and evil, which we often call wheat and chaff. No one should leave the threshing floor before the time; bear the chaff during the threshing, bear it on the threshing floor. For what you bear, you will not have in the granary. The winnower will come, who will separate the evil from the good. There will also be a physical separation, which is now preceded by a spiritual one. Always separate yourselves from the evil in heart; cautiously couple with them in body for a time. Be diligent in correcting your own, who pertain to your care in whatever way, by admonishing, teaching, exhorting, warning. Use whatever means you can. And, when you find in the Scriptures and in the examples of the saints, whether those before or after the Lord's advent in this life, that the evil do not taint the good in unity, do not become lazy in correcting the evil. The evil does not taint you in two ways: if you do not consent and if you rebuke: that is, do not participate, do not consent. It is indeed participation when their deed is joined with a partnership of will or approval. Thus, the Apostle admonishing us says: Do not participate in the unfruitful works of darkness. And because it was not enough to merely not consent, lest indifference to discipline follow, he says: But rather, also reprove them. See how he includes both: Do not participate; but rather also reprove. What does it mean: Do not participate? Do not consent, do not praise, do not approve. What does it mean: But rather also reprove? Rebuke, correct, restrain.

Correction must not be done with a proud spirit.

Next, in the very act of correcting or restraining the sins of others, one must be cautious not to exalt oneself when correcting another; and that apostolic saying must be considered: "Therefore let him who thinks he stands, take heed lest he fall." Outwardly, reproof should sound terrifying; inwardly, love should hold on to gentleness. If a man is overtaken in any transgression, as the same apostle says; you who are spiritual should restore such a one in a spirit of gentleness, considering yourself, lest you also be tempted. Bear one another's burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ. Again, elsewhere: "The servant of the Lord must not quarrel; but be gentle to all, able to teach, patient, in humility correcting those who are in opposition; if perhaps God will grant them repentance, so that they may know the truth, and that they may come to their senses and escape the snare of the devil, having been taken captive by him to do his will." Therefore, be neither consenting to evils, so as to approve them; nor negligent, so as not to rebuke them; nor proud, so as to rebuke others insultingly.

Unity must never be abandoned. But he who has deserted unity violates charity: and whoever violates charity, whatever other great thing he may possess, he himself is nothing. If he speaks in the tongues of men and angels, if he knows all mysteries, if he has all faith to move mountains, if he distributes all his goods to the poor, if he gives his body to be burned, but lacks charity; he is nothing, it profits him nothing. He possesses all things in vain, who lacks that one thing by which all things are used.

Let us then embrace charity, striving to preserve the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace. Let us not be led astray by those who understand carnally and make a physical separation, separating themselves in spiritual sacrilege from the grains of the Church scattered throughout the world. For the good seed has been sown throughout the whole world. That good sower, the Son of Man, did not sow the good seed in Africa alone, but everywhere. However, the enemy sowed weeds among the wheat. But what did the householder say? Let both grow together until harvest. By what means shall they grow? Certainly through the field. What is the field? Is it Africa? No. What is it then? Let us not interpret for ourselves, let the Lord speak: let no one presume anything by his own will. For the disciples said to the Master: Explain to us the parable of the weeds. And the Lord explained: The good seed, he said, are the children of the kingdom; but the weeds are the children of the evil one. Who sowed them? The enemy, he said, who sowed them is the devil. What is the field? The field, he said, is the world. What is the harvest? The harvest, he said, is the end of the age. Who are the reapers? The reapers, he said, are the angels. Is Africa the world? Is this time the harvest? Is Donatus the reaper? Await the harvest throughout the whole world, grow into the harvest throughout the whole world, tolerate the weeds throughout the whole world until the harvest. Do not be led astray by the perverse, by the very light chaff, which flies off before the coming of the winnower from the threshing floor: do not be led astray. Hold them to this one simile of the weeds, and do not allow them to speak further. He handed over the books. No. But he handed over the books. Whomever it was, did the faithlessness of the betrayers nullify the faith of God? What is the faith of God? That which he promised to Abraham, saying: In your seed all nations shall be blessed. What is the faith of God? Let both grow together until the harvest. By what means shall they grow? Through the field. What is, "Through the field?" Through the world. A story of the Donatists about the diminution of the grains.

Here they say to him: Indeed both had grown throughout the world, but now the grain has diminished, and has been brought back to this our region and scarcity. The Lord does not allow you to interpret what you want. He who expounds this parable shuts your mouth, a sacrilegious mouth, an impious mouth, a profane mouth, a contrary mouth to you, who contradict the testator, even calling you to the inheritance? How does he shut your mouth? By saying: Let both grow until the harvest. If the harvest had already happened, we would believe the grain to be diminished. Although not even then will it be diminished, but will be stored in the barn. For so he says: Collect first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn; but gather the wheat into my barn. If therefore they grow until the harvest, they are stored after the harvest; wicked, impious, when are they diminished? I concede that in comparison to the tares and the chaff, the grains are fewer: yet both grow until the harvest. For when iniquity abounds, the love of many grows cold: the tares grow, the chaff grows. But because there cannot be an absence of grain in the whole field, which by enduring to the end may be saved, both grow until the harvest. And if because of the abundance of evils it was said: Do you think, when the Son of Man comes, he will find faith on the earth? and by this name are signified all those who through the transgression of the law imitate him to whom it was said: You are dust, and to dust you shall return: yet also because of the abundance of good, and because of him to whom it was said: Thus shall your seed be as the stars of heaven, and as the sand of the sea, even that cannot be left unsaid: Because many shall come from the east and the west, and shall sit down with Abraham and Isaac in the kingdom of God. Therefore both grow until the harvest; and the tares or chaff have their judgments in the Scriptures, and so do the grains. Those who do not understand these confuse and are confused; and thus they clamour with blind desire, so that they do not wish to be silent even when the truth is revealed.

Place concerning bodily separation wrongly understood by the Donatists.

Behold, they say, the prophet says: Depart, go out from there, and touch no unclean thing: how then shall we endure the wicked for the sake of peace, from whom we are ordered to depart and go out, that we may not touch the unclean thing? We understand this separation spiritually, they understand it physically. For I also cry out with the prophet, and whatever kind of vessels we may be, God uses us in your dispensation: we also cry out and say to you: Depart, go out from there, and touch no unclean thing; but by the contact of the heart, not of the body. For what is it to touch the unclean thing, if not to consent to sins? But what is it to go out from there, except to do what pertains to the correction of the wicked, as much as can be done with the peace of each individual being maintained according to their rank and person? It displeased you that someone sinned; you did not touch the unclean thing. You reproved, you corrected, you admonished, you also applied, if the situation demanded it, appropriate discipline that does not violate unity; you went out from there. Attend to the deeds of the saints, lest perhaps our interpretation should seem personal. As the saints understood these words, so indeed they must be understood. Depart from there, says the prophet. First, by the customary use of the very word, I assert this meaning, and afterward show that it is not my own. Often people are accused; and when they have been accused, they defend themselves: but when the man who is accused has reasonably and justly defended himself, those who hear say: He went out from there. Where did he go out from? Remaining in place, he went out from there. How did he go out from there? By giving a reason and a most just defense. This is what the saints did when they shook the dust off their feet against those who did not accept the peace proclaimed to them. That watchman went out from there, to whom it was said: I have made you a watchman for the house of Israel. For it is said to him: If you warn the wicked man, and he does not turn from his wickedness and from his way; that wicked man shall die in his iniquity, but you will have saved your soul. If he does this, he goes out from there, not by separation of the body, but by the defense of his work. For he did what needed to be done: even if the other did not obey, who was supposed to obey. This is: Depart from there. The prophets reproached the people's vices, nor did they depart from that.

Moses cried out, Isaiah cried out, Jeremiah cried out, Ezekiel cried out. Let us see if they themselves did this, if they abandoned the people of God and transferred themselves to other nations. How many times and how vehemently did Jeremiah rebuke the sinners and wicked people of his own! Yet among them he was, entering the same temple with them, celebrating the same sacraments: he lived in that congregation of wicked men, but by crying out, he separated himself from them. This is to separate oneself from them, this is to not touch the unclean, and to not agree in will, and to not spare with the mouth. What shall I say about Jeremiah, Isaiah, Daniel, Ezekiel, and the other prophets who did not withdraw from the wicked people, lest they forsake the good ones mingled with those people, where they themselves could have been such? Moses himself, brothers, when he was receiving the law on the mountain, the people below made an idol. The people of God, the people led through the parting waves of the Red Sea, which had overwhelmed their pursuing enemies, after so many signs and miracles in the plagues upon the Egyptians leading to death, and in their own protection leading to salvation, nevertheless demanded, forced, made, worshipped an idol, and sacrificed to an idol. God communicates the act of the people to His servant, and says He will destroy them from His face. Moses intercedes on behalf of that very people to return to them: and he had the opportunity to withdraw and go out from them, as these understand, so as not to touch the unclean, so as not to live among such; yet he did not. And lest it seem that he did this more out of necessity than out of love, God offered him another people: "I will make you," He says, "into a great nation," so that He may destroy the others. But he did not accept this, instead he clung to the sinners, he prayed for the sinners. And how did he pray? Great is the proof of love, brothers. How did he pray? See that motherly love that we have often spoken about. When God threatened the sacrilegious people, the compassionate heart of Moses trembled, he interposed himself on their behalf against the wrath of God. "Lord," he said, "if You forgive their sin, forgive: but if not, blot me out of Your book which You have written." How fatherly and motherly his heart was, how confidently he said this, contemplating the justice and mercy of God! So that, because He is just, He would not destroy the just, and because He is merciful, He would forgive the sinners.

One must withdraw from evils with the heart, not with the body.

Certainly it is now evident to your prudence how all such testimonies of the Scriptures must be received: so that when Scripture sounds, we ought to withdraw from evil, we should not be commanded to understand anything else, but rather to withdraw with the heart; lest we commit a greater evil in the separation from the good than we flee from in the association with the wicked, as the Donatists themselves have done. If they truly rebuked the wicked and not rather defamed the good, they would tolerate whatsoever kinds for the sake of peace, who received the Maximianists as intact, whom they had formerly condemned as lost. Certainly the prophet openly said: "Depart and go out from there, and do not touch what is unclean." For me to understand what he said, I consider what he did. By his action he explains his statement to me. He said: "Depart." To whom did he say it? Certainly to the just. From whom did he say they should depart? Certainly from sinners and the wicked. I ask whether he himself departed from such people? I find that he did not depart. Therefore he understood it differently. For surely he would first do what he commanded. He departed in heart, he reproved and rebuked. By restraining himself from agreement he did not touch the unclean: but by rebuking he went out freely in the sight of God; to whom God imputes neither his own sins, because he did not commit them, nor those of others, because he did not approve them; nor negligence, because he did not keep silent; nor pride, because he remained in unity. Thus, my brothers, as many of you as have among you those who are still weighed down by the love of the world, the greedy, perjurers, adulterers, spectators of trifles, consultors of astrologers, soothsayers, augurs, drunkards, the lustful, whatever evils you know to be among you; as much as you can, disapprove them, so that you may withdraw with the heart; that you may rebuke, and depart from there; and do not consent, so that you do not touch the unclean.

Sermons - Sermon 89

SERMO 89 ON THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL OF MATTHEW 21:19-12, WHERE JESUS CAUSED THE TREE TO WITHER; And from those LC 24, 28 where he pretended to go further.

What the cursing of the fig tree should remind us. The most recent reading of the holy Gospel has warned us, has terrified us, lest we have leaves and not have fruit. This, however, is briefly explained: lest words be present, and deeds be lacking. Great terror! Who does not fear, when in the very reading with the eyes of the heart sees a dry tree, and thus it is said to it: Never let fruit grow from you again. Let terror correct, let correction bring forth fruit. Without a doubt, the Lord Christ foresaw a certain tree deservedly becoming dry, because it had leaves and did not have fruit. That is the Synagogue, not called, but rejected. For from there the people of God were called, who truthfully and sincerely were expecting the salvation of God Jesus Christ in the Prophets. And because they were faithfully expecting, they deserved to recognize Him present. From there were the Apostles, from there the whole crowd preceding the Lord's beast of burden and saying: Hosanna to the son of David; blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord. There was a great crowd of faithful Jews, believing in Christ before the blood shed for them was poured out. For the Lord Himself had not come in vain, except to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. But after He was crucified among others, already exalted in heaven, He found the fruit of repentance: neither did He make them arid, but cultivated them in the field, and watered them with His word. From there were those four thousand Jews who believed, after the disciples were filled with the Holy Spirit, and those who were with them, spoke in the languages of all nations, and in some measure foretold the future Church by that diversity of languages. They believed then, and they too were the sheep that had perished of the house of Israel; but since the Son of Man had come to seek and to save that which was lost, He found even them. But I do not know where, as if preyed upon by wolves, they were hiding in the thickets; and because they were hiding in the thickets, He did not reach them to find them except torn by the thorns of suffering: yet He reached, He found, He redeemed. They had killed; not Him more than themselves. They were saved by the One killed for them. Indeed, the Apostles speaking, those who had pierced Him with a lance were pricked, they were pricked in conscience: being pricked, they sought counsel, received what was given, did penance, found grace, and believing, drank the blood they had shed in rage. But those who remained in the evil and sterile progeny up to this day and to the end, are figured in that tree. Now you come to them, and you find among them all the words of the Prophets. But these are leaves: Christ is hungry: He seeks fruit; but the reason He does not find fruit in them is because He does not find Himself in them. For he does not have fruit, he does not have Christ. But he does not have Christ who does not hold to the unity of Christ, who does not have charity. Therefore, by this connection, he does not have fruit who does not have charity. Listen to the Apostle: But the fruit of the Spirit is charity; as if about to commend a cluster, that is, fruit. But the fruit, he says, of the Spirit is charity, joy, peace, long-suffering. Do not be surprised by the following, where charity begins. A mountain sent into the sea by the Apostles.

Therefore, when the disciples marveled at the dryness of the tree, He commended faith to them and said: If you have faith and do not doubt—in other words, if you believe all things from God—you will not say, This God can do, and this God cannot do; but you shall presume upon the omnipotence of the Omnipotent. You will not only do this, but if you say to this mountain, Be taken up and cast into the sea, it will happen. And whatever you pray for, believing, you will receive.

We read about miracles performed by the disciples, or rather performed by the Lord through the disciples, for He says, Without Me, you can do nothing. The Lord could do many things without the disciples, but the disciples could do nothing without the Lord. He who could also make the disciples could not have been helped by them to make them.

We read about the miracles of the Apostles, but we never read that a tree withered by them or a mountain was cast into the sea. Let us seek, therefore, where it happened. For the words of the Lord could not have been in vain. If you consider those ordinary and well-known trees and mountains, it did not happen. But if you consider the tree of which He spoke and the mountain of the Lord of which the prophet said: In the last days, the mountain of the Lord shall be manifested; if you consider these things, if you understand these things; it happened and it happened through them. The tree is the Jewish nation, but again, I say, rejected, not called: that tree, which we mentioned, is the Jewish nation. The mountain, as the prophetic testimony taught, is the Lord Himself. The dry tree is the Jewish nation without the honor of Christ: the sea is this world of all Gentiles. Now see the Apostles speaking to the tree to wither and sending the mountain into the sea. They speak in the Acts of the Apostles to the Jews who oppose and resist the word of truth, that is, having leaves but not bearing fruit, and they say to them: It was necessary that the word of God should be spoken first to you, but since you reject it: You speak the words of the prophets, and you do not recognize Him whom the prophets foretold, that is, having leaves; Behold, we turn to the Gentiles. For this too was prophesied: Behold, I have set you as a light to the Gentiles, that you may bring salvation to the ends of the earth. Behold, the tree has withered; and Christ is with the Gentiles, the mountain cast into the sea. For how could the tree not wither, placed in the vineyard of which it was said: I will command my clouds that they rain no rain upon it? The curse of the tree prefigured something future. For the Lord to commend this prophetically, that He had done this concerning this tree, not only wishing to exhibit a miracle, but to foretell something by the miracle; there are many things that remind and persuade us, indeed they extort belief from the unwilling. First, what had the tree sinned, since it had not borne fruit? If it had not borne fruit at its own time, that is, the time for those fruits, there would certainly be no fault in the tree; because a tree without sense could not be guilty. Added to this, as it is read in another evangelist narrating this same thing: The time of figs was not yet. For that time was when the fig tree brings forth tender leaves, which we know grow before the fruit; this we prove because the days of the Lord’s passion were drawing near, and we know the time when He suffered; and if we did not consider this, we ought certainly to believe the Evangelist saying: The time of figs was not yet. Therefore, if only a miracle was to be commended, and not something to be figured prophetically, much more mercifully would the Lord have done, and more worthily of His mercy, had He found a dry tree and made it green; just as He healed the sick, cleansed the lepers, raised the dead. But then, contrary to this, as if against the rule of His clemency, He found a green tree, not yet bearing fruit beyond its time, yet not denying its fruit to its husbandman, and made it dry: as if He were saying to man. It was not the dryness of this tree that pleased Me, but I wished to insinuate to you that I did this with a reason, because I wished to commend to you something for you to attend to more. I did not curse this tree, I did not inflict punishment on an insentient tree; but I scared you, if you noticed, so that you would not despise Christ being hungry, and that you might love to be enriched with fruit rather than overshadowed by leaves.

Anything said or done in Scripture can be understood in three ways. This is the one thing that the Lord commends about himself, that he wanted to signify something. What else? Being hungry, he comes to the tree and seeks fruit. Did he not know that the time had not yet come? What the tree's caretaker knew, the Creator of the tree did not know? He therefore seeks fruit on the tree which it did not yet have. He seeks, or rather, pretends to seek. For if he truly sought, he erred. But far be it that he should err. Therefore, he feigned. Fearing that he feigned, you confess that he erred. You shun error, you run into feigning. We are troubled in the middle. If we are troubled, let us desire rain, that we may flourish, lest by saying something unworthy about the Lord, we wither instead. The evangelist indeed says, "He came to the tree, and did not find fruit on it." Of course he did not find it, it would not be said of him unless he either truly sought, or pretended to seek, what he knew was not there. Hence, we do not doubt, let us by no means say Christ erred. What then, do we say he feigned? Do we say this? How shall we escape from this? Let us say what the evangelist wrote, lest we dare to say anything from ourselves. What the evangelist wrote, let us say; and when we have said it, let us understand it. But to understand, let us first believe. For unless you believe, you will not understand, says the prophet. After the resurrection, the Lord Christ walked on the road with two of his disciples, who did not yet recognize him, to whom he was accompanying as a third traveler. They came to the place where they were heading, and the evangelist said, "He pretended to go farther." They, however, held him back, out of human kindness, saying that it was already evening and asking him to stay with them there: received into their hospitality, he breaks the bread, and in the blessed and broken bread he is recognized. Therefore, let us no longer fear to say, he pretended to seek, if he pretended to go farther. But another question arises. Yesterday, we highly commended the truth in the Apostles; how do we find feigning in the Lord himself? We must therefore say, brothers, and explain to you within our modest abilities, which the Lord grants us for your sake, and commend to you something to hold regularly in all the Scriptures. Everything that is said or done, is either known by its own property, or signifies something figuratively; or certainly has both, its own cognition, and a figurative signification. I proposed three things; examples must be given, and from where if not from the holy Scriptures? A statement to be taken literally: because the Lord suffered, because he rose and ascended into heaven, because we shall rise at the end of the world, because we shall reign with him eternally if we do not despise him. Take this statement literally; do not seek figures: as it is said, so it is. So also with deeds. The Apostle went up to Jerusalem to see Peter; the Apostle did this, it happened, it is his own. It reports to you a deed done: the very deed according to its property. Figuratively stated: "The stone that the builders rejected has become the cornerstone." If we take the stone literally, which stone did the builders reject, and it became the cornerstone? If we take the corner literally, on whose corner was this stone made the head? If we admit it is said figuratively, and you take it figuratively; the cornerstone is Christ; the head of the corner, the head of the Church. Why is the Church a corner? Because here he called the Jews, there the Gentiles, and as if two walls coming from different directions and converging in himself, he united by the grace of his peace. For he himself is our peace, who made both one.

Made in the form of a figure.

You have heard of the proper saying, the proper deed, the figurative saying: you are waiting for the figurative deed. There are many, but in the meantime, what comes to mind from the mentioning of the cornerstone, when Jacob anointed the stone which he had placed at his head while he slept, in which dream he had seen a great vision, ladders rising from the earth to heaven, and angels ascending and descending, with the Lord leaning upon the ladder, he understood what he ought to signify, whence he showed us by that vision's and revelation's understanding he was not foreign, he figured the stone for Christ. Do not wonder, therefore, that he anointed it, because Christ received his name from the anointing. But this Jacob was called in Scripture a man without deceit. This same Jacob, you know, was called Israel. Therefore, the Lord in the Gospel when he saw Nathanael said: Behold, a true Israelite, in whom there is no deceit. And that Israelite, not yet knowing who was speaking with him, replied: How do you know me? And the Lord said to him: When you were under the fig tree, I saw you: as if to say: When you were in the shadow of sin; I predestined you. And he, because he remembered being under the fig tree, where the Lord was not, recognized the divinity in him, and responded: You are the Son of God, you are the King of Israel. He under the fig tree was not made a barren fig tree: he recognized Christ. And the Lord to him: Because I said to you: When you were under the fig tree, I saw you, therefore you believe; you will see greater things than these. What are these greater things? Amen, I say to you. Because that Israelite, in whom there is no deceit; look to Jacob in whom there is no deceit; and recall from where he speaks, a stone at his head, vision in a dream, ladders from earth to heaven, descending and ascending; and see what the Lord says to the Israelite without deceit: you will see heaven opened: Hear, Nathanael without deceit, what Jacob without deceit saw: you will see heaven opened, and angels ascending and descending; to whom? to the Son of Man. Therefore he anointed the stone at the head of the Son of Man; because the head of the woman is the man, the head of the man is Christ. Nor did he say: Ascending from the Son of Man and descending to the Son of Man, as if he were simply up above: but, ascending and descending to the Son of Man. Hear the Son of Man crying out from above: Saul, Saul. Hear from below the Son of Man: Why do you persecute me? An event truly happened and nonetheless was symbolic.

You have heard a saying of our own, that we shall rise again: a deed of our own, that as it is said, Paul went up to Jerusalem to see Peter. It is said figuratively: The stone which the builders rejected; the figurative deed, the anointed stone, which was at the head of Jacob. It is due to your expectation that both are, and it has been done both properly and means figuratively. We know Abraham had two sons, one from the maid, the other from the free woman; properly done, not only narrated but also done: do you expect a figure there? These are the two Testaments. Therefore, what is said figuratively is in some way feigned. But since it has an outcome of signification, and that very signification holds the faith of truth, it avoids the charge of falsehood. Behold, a sower went out to sow; and in sowing, some fell by the wayside, some fell on stony places, some fell among thorns, some fell on good ground. Who went out to sow, or when did he go out, or among which thorns, or on which stones, or on which way, or into which field? If you hear it feigned, you understand it as signifying: it is feigned. For if truly a man went out as a sower, and the seeds, as we have heard, were cast among these various places, it would not be feigned, but neither would it be a lie. It is not yet feigned, but not a lie. Why? Because it signifies something, that which is feigned does not deceive you. It seeks the understanding, not making you err. Wishing to commend this, Christ sought fruit, he was commending there a figurative, not a deceptive feigning; and because of this, a laudable, not criminal feigning; not to lead you into falsehood when examined, but when searched deeply, you find the truth.

Christ must be held for the breaking of bread.

I see what he is going to say: Explain to me what he meant, that he pretended to go further. For if he did not mean it, it is deceit, it is a lie. According to our explanations and very discreet rules, we must say this, what certain semblance of going further signified: he pretended to go further, and is held, so that he does not go further. Therefore, as to the physical presence, the Lord Christ was thought to be absent; he was thought to be absent, as if he would go further. Hold him faithfully, hold him at the breaking of bread. What shall I say? Did you recognize him? If you recognized him, there you found Christ. There is no need to speak further about the sacrament. To those who postpone to know this sacrament, Christ is further from them. Let them hold it, not let go; invite to hospitality, and they are invited to heaven.

Sermons - Sermon 9

SERMO 9

TREATISE OF SAINT AUGUSTINE ON THE TEN STRINGS SERMON HELD AT CHUSA Let us rejoice at the mercy of the Lord, let us fear the judgment of the Lord. Our Lord and God is merciful and compassionate, patient and greatly merciful and truthful. Just as He abundantly bestows mercy in the present age, He also threatens severe judgment in the age to come. The words I have spoken are written and contained in divine authorities, because: Merciful and compassionate is the Lord, patient and greatly merciful and truthful. It is greatly pleasing to all sinners and lovers of this world, because the Lord is merciful and compassionate, because He is patient and greatly merciful. But if you love so greatly the merciful one, also fear the last part which He said: And truthful. For if He said nothing else except: Merciful and compassionate is the Lord, and greatly merciful, it is as if you would turn yourself to security and impunity and to the license of sins. You would do what you wished, you would use the world, either as much as would be allowed to you or as much as your passion would dictate. And if anyone admonished and terrified you with well-meaning advice, to refrain yourself from excessive indulgence following your desires and abandoning your God, you would stand amidst the voices of the one admonishing, indeed with a shameless front, as if hearing divine authority, and you would read from the Lord’s book: "Why do you terrify me about our God? He is merciful and compassionate and greatly merciful." Lest men say such things, He added one word at the end, which He said: And truthful. And He shook off the joy of those presuming falsely, and induced fear in those grieving. Let us rejoice in the mercy of the Lord, but let us fear the judgment of the Lord. He spares, but He is not silent. He is silent, but He will not always be silent. Listen while He is not silent in the word, so that it does not come to you to hear when He is not silent in the judgment.

Just compose your case. But now you may arrange your case. Arrange your case before the final judgment of your God. There is no reason for you to presume, when He comes, you will not bring false witnesses by whom He may be deceived, nor will you employ a lawyer with fraudulent and verbose skills, nor will you make any attempt to corrupt the judge. What then will you do before such a judge, whom you cannot deceive or corrupt? And yet there is something you can do. For then He Himself will be the judge of your case, who is now the witness of your life. We have called, and we have praised. Let us arrange our case. He who is witness to your works is also witness to these words. Let them not be in vain, let them be turned into lamentation. It is time to reconcile quickly with the adversary. God is so patient in seeing daily injustices and not punishing them, yet the judgment will swiftly come. Indeed, in the manner of human life, what seems long is short to God. But even the age and the human race, which seem long, what does it console? If the last day of the whole human race is far off, is the last day of each individual man far off? This I say: many years have passed since Adam, many years have flowed, and many more will flow, though not as many, yet the years will pass until the end of the age, just as these have passed. It seems long what remains, although it will not be as long as what has passed, yet from the passed time that has elapsed, the end of the remaining time is to be expected. There was once a day that was called today. From that until this today, has not whatever was future become past? It is considered as if it never was. So will be whatever remains until the end. But let this itself be long, let it be prolonged, as much as you suppose, as much as you say, as much as you think, as much as your thoughts imagine but scripture does not shape, as much as you want to prolong the day of judgment, will you prolong the last day for yourself, that is, of your life when you will depart from this body? Let old age be certain for you, if it can be. But for whom can it be? Is it not true that from the time a man begins to live, he is able to die? The possibility of death begins with life. On this earth and in the human race, he alone cannot die who has not yet begun to live. Therefore the uncertain day should be expected daily. And if the uncertain day should be expected daily, let reconciliation be made with the adversary, while he is with you on the way. For this life is called the way, through which all pass. And this adversary does not depart. The Word of God is an adversary, with whom to compose a cause. But who is this adversary? This adversary is not the devil, for Scripture would never urge you to agree with the devil. Therefore, there is another adversary whom man makes for himself. For if he were an adversary, he would not be with you on the way. He is with you on the way so that he may agree with you. He knows that unless you agree on the way, he will hand you over to the judge, and the judge to the officer, and the officer will throw you into prison. These words are from the Gospel; they are remembered by those who have read or heard them. So who is the adversary? The Word of God. The Word of God is your adversary. Why is it an adversary? Because it commands contrary things that you do not do. It says to you: "There is one God, worship one God." You want, having disregarded one God like the legitimate husband of the soul, to fornicate with many demons, and what is worse, not openly forsaking and repudiating like apostates do, but, remaining in the house of your husband, you admit adulterers. That is, as a Christian you do not leave the Church, but consult astrologers, soothsayers, augurs, or sorcerers. As if not departing from the house of your husband, your adulterous soul, remaining in his marriage, fornicates. It is said to you: "Do not take the name of the Lord your God in vain," nor believe that Christ is a creature simply because he took on a creature for you. And you despise him who is equal to the Father and one with the Father. It is said to you to observe the Sabbath spiritually, not as the Jews observe it with carnal leisure. For they want to idle themselves with trifles and luxuries. Indeed, it would be better for the Jew to do something useful in his field than to be turbulent in the theater. And it would be better for their women to spin wool on the Sabbath than to dance shamelessly all day on their balconies. But you are told to observe the Sabbath spiritually, in the hope of the future rest that the Lord promises you. For whoever acts for the sake of that future rest, whatever he does, even though it may seem laborious, if he relates it to the promise of rest, he does not yet have the Sabbath in reality but has it in hope. But you want to rest so you may labor, whereas you ought to labor so you may rest. It is said to you: "Honor your father and mother." You insult your parents, though you do not wish to suffer the same from your children. It is said to you: "You shall not kill." But you wish to kill your enemy; and perhaps the only reason you do not kill him is because you fear the judgment of man, not because you think of God. Do you not know that He is a witness to your thoughts? With Him living whom you wish to die, He holds you a murderer in your heart. It is said to you: "You shall not commit adultery," that is, you shall not go to any woman other than your wife. But you demand this from your wife and are unwilling to give it to her. And while you ought to lead your wife in virtue since chastity is a virtue, you fall in the first assault of lust. You want your wife to be victorious while you, defeated, lie down. And while you are the head of your wife, she goes to God before you, whose head you are. Do you want your house to hang upside down? For the man is the head of the woman. But where the woman lives better than the man, the house is upside down. If the man is the head, he ought to live better and lead his wife in all good deeds so that she may imitate her husband, follow her head. Just as Christ is the head of the Church, and the Church is commanded to follow her head and walk in its footsteps, so the head of every household is the man, and the woman is like the body. Wherever the head leads, there the body ought to follow. Why then does the head want to go where it does not want the body to follow? Why does the man want to go where he does not want his wife to follow? In commanding these things, the Word of God is an adversary. For men do not want to do what the Word of God commands. And what shall I say, that the Word of God is an adversary because it commands? I fear I may be an adversary to some because I speak these things. What does it matter to me? May He who terrifies me make me strong to speak, so that I do not fear the complaints of men. For those who do not want to keep chastity for their wives—and such people are abundant—do not want me to speak these things. But whether they wish or not, I will speak. For if I do not exhort you to agree with the adversary, I will remain at odds with him. He who commands you to do these things also commands us to speak them. If by not doing what he commands you to do, you are his adversaries, by not speaking what he commands us to say, we will remain his adversaries.

Against adultery. Have I dwelled at length on the other points that I mentioned above? For we presume this about your Charity, that you worship one God. We presume this about the Catholic faith that is in you, that you believe the Son of God to be equal to the Father. And you do not take in vain the name of the Lord your God, as if you thought the Son of God to be a creature. For every creature is subject to vanity. But you believe that He is equal to the Father, God from God, the Word with God, the Word is God, by whom all things were made, light from light, co-eternal with Him who begat, one with Him who begat. But you believe this Word assumed a creature, assumed mortality from the Virgin Mary, and suffered for us. We read these things, we believe them to be saved. Neither did I dwell on the point that whatever you do, you do for the hope of the future. For I know that all Christians think about the future age. For he who does not think about the future age, nor is he a Christian for the sake of receiving what God promises at the end, is not yet a Christian. Nor did I dwell on the point where the Word of God says: Honor your father and your mother. For many honor their parents, and we rarely find parents complaining about the wickedness of their children, although they are not lacking; but still, since it rarely happens, it needed a brief admonishment. Nor did I want to dwell on the point where it is said: You shall not kill. For I do not believe there is a crowd of murderers here. But that evil, more widely spreading, has taken hold, and in this, that adversary is more vehemently irritated, who shouts so as to someday be a friend. Daily complaints are made, even though women themselves now do not dare to complain about their husbands. Thus, the custom invading all things is observed as law, so that perhaps even women are persuaded that it is allowed for men, but not for women. For they are accustomed to hear of women being brought to trial who were perhaps found with servants. They have never heard of a man being brought to trial because he was found with his maidservant, though it is a sin. In equal sin, it is not divine truth but human perversity that makes the man seem more innocent. And if perhaps today any man has suffered his wife to be more bold and murmuring, to whom it already seemed that it was permitted for the man, and he heard in the Church that it is not permitted for the man, if therefore he has suffered his wife, as we have said, more freely murmuring and saying to him: "What you do is not permitted. We heard this together.

We are Christians. What you demand from me, return to me. I owe faith to you, you owe faith to me, we both owe faith to Christ. And if you deceive me, you do not deceive Him to whom we belong, you do not deceive Him who bought us." Hearing these and similar things, which he is not accustomed to, while he does not want to be made healthy in himself, he becomes insane against me. He gets angry, he curses. Perhaps he even says: "How did it happen that he came here, or that my wife went to church that day?" And I believe that he says this in his thoughts, for he does not dare to break out into speech openly, not even before his wife alone. For perhaps if he breaks out and says this, she can respond and say: "Why do you curse the one to whom you were shortly before giving acclamations? Surely we are spouses. How can you live harmoniously with me if your tongue is in discord?" Brothers, we look at your dangers, we do not attend to your wills. For if a doctor attends to the will of the sick, he never cures them. What ought not to be done, let it not be done. What God forbids, let it not be done. He who believes in God hears from Him what we say. Certainly, it would have been better for some who are unwilling to be corrected, that we should either not have come here if we were to speak thus, or because we have already come, not to say these things.

We sing better bitter things to you for a time. The day before yesterday I remember saying to Your Holiness, that if we were lyre players or providing something similar to entertain your frivolous pursuits, which I now beg you to abandon, you would have kept us to set a date for performing, and each would contribute to us a reward according to his means. Why would we walk delighted by vain songs that are beneficial for nothing, sweet for a time, bitter in the future? For by such shameful songs the human spirits are enticed, enervated, and fall from virtue into vice. And because of these vices, they later feel pains and with great bitterness digest what they drank with temporary sweetness. Therefore, it is better that we sing you bitter things for a time, which will later become sweet within you. Nor do we demand any reward, except that you do what we say, or rather not do, if we ourselves say it. But if He who fears no one says it to all, and by whom it happens in His name and for the glory of His mercy that we also fear no one, we all have heard it, we all should do it, we should all agree with our adversary. The first three commandments of the Decalogue pertain to God.

Consider me a harpist, what more could I sing to you? Behold, I bear a psaltery with ten strings. You sang this a little while ago before I began to speak. My chorus was you. Did you not sing a little while ago: To God I will sing a new song, I will sing to you on a ten-stringed psaltery. Now I am striking those very ten strings. Why is the voice of God’s psaltery bitter? Let us all play on the ten-stringed psaltery. I do not sing to you something you cannot do. For the Decalogue of the law has ten commandments. These ten commandments are distributed as follows: three pertain to God, seven pertain to people. Three to God, which I have already said: Our God is one, and we must make no likeness, and we must not forsake the one God, because the God Christ, the Son of God, is one with the Father. And therefore it should not be taken in vain by us, to think of him as made, that is, some creature through whom all things were made. Since he himself is one God, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, in the Holy Spirit, that is, in the gift of God, eternal rest is promised to us. From there we now receive the pledge. For the Apostle says: Who gave us the pledge, the Spirit. If we have received the pledge, so that we may begin to be calm in the Lord and in our God, to be gentle in our God, to be patient in our God, we will also be at peace in Him from whom we received the pledge, forever. This will be the Sabbath of Sabbaths, because of the rest pertaining to the gift of the Holy Spirit. Therefore, the third commandment about the Sabbath, which we mentioned, which the Jews celebrate carnally, we acknowledge spiritually. For because it is called the Holy Spirit, for that reason God sanctified the seventh day, when he made all his works, as we read written in Genesis. There you do not find the sanctification named, except on that day when it is said: God rested from his works. For God was not tired, that it would be said: God rested from his works, but in that word rest was promised to you who labor. And because He made everything very good, so it is said: God rested, that you may understand that you too will rest after good works, and will rest without end. For all the previous days mentioned, that is, the previous days have an evening. This seventh day does not have an evening where God sanctified rest. It is said there: "Morning came, that the day might begin." It is not said: "Evening came, that the day might end," but it is said: Morning came, that the day might be without end. Thus, our rest begins as a morning, but it does not end, because we will live forever. To this hope, if we do whatever we do, we observe the Sabbath. That very third string of this Decalogue, that is, of the ten-stringed psaltery: commands pertain to him in the three strings. To the love of neighbor pertain the seven strings of the dialogue.

If it were said to us: You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your mind, and nothing were said about our neighbor, it would not be a decachord, but a trichord. However, the Lord added: And you shall love your neighbor as yourself, and intertwined it, saying: On these two commandments hang all the Law and the Prophets, all the Law hangs on the two commandments, on the love of God and the love of neighbor. Therefore, the Decalogue pertains to the two commandments, that is, to the love of God and the love of neighbor. To the first commandment belong three strings, because God is Trinity. To the second commandment, that is, to the love of neighbor, belong seven strings: how one lives among men. For the number seven, as if of seven strings, begins with the honor of parents. Honor your father and your mother. For to his parents does a man open his eyes, and this life begins from their friendship. Whoever does not defer honor to his own parents, to whom will he show mercy? Honor your father and your mother. And the Apostle says: Honor your father and your mother, which is the first commandment. How is it first, when it is the fourth commandment, unless it is because it is the first in the number seven? It is first in the love of neighbor on the second tablet. For this reason, two tablets of the Law were given. God gave two tablets to his servant Moses on the mountain, on which the ten commandments of the law were inscribed on the two stone tablets - which is the psaltery of ten strings - three on one tablet pertaining to God, seven on the other tablet pertaining to the neighbor. Therefore, on the other tablet, the first is: Honor your father and your mother. Second: You shall not commit adultery. Third: You shall not kill. Fourth: You shall not steal. Fifth: You shall not bear false witness. Sixth: You shall not covet your neighbor's wife. Seventh: You shall not covet your neighbor's goods. Let us join these to the three pertaining to the love of God, if we wish to sing the new song on the psaltery of ten strings. The old and new man, the old and new song.

Let your Charity pay attention, so that I may say what the Lord suggests. The people of the Jews received the law. They did not observe it in the Decalogue. And whoever obeyed, obeyed out of fear of punishment, not out of love for justice. They carried the psaltery, but did not sing. For to the singer it is pleasure, to the fearful it is a burden. Thus the old man either does not do it, or he does it out of fear, not out of love for holiness, not out of delight in chastity, not out of the temperance of charity, but out of fear. He is an old man, and an old man can sing an old song, not a new one. But so that he may sing a new song, he must be a new man. And how he can be a new man, listen—not to me, but to the Apostle saying: "Put off the old man and put on the new." And so no one would think, when he said, "Put off the old man and put on the new," that something must be set aside and something must be taken up when he commanded the changing of man, he added and said: “Therefore, putting aside falsehood, speak the truth.” This is what he meant by “Put off the old man and put on the new.” He said this: Change your ways. Love God, whom you previously disregarded. You loved the idle things of iniquity, the temporal pleasures; love your neighbor. If you do it out of love, you are singing a new song. If you do it out of fear, you still do it, you do carry the psaltery, but you are not yet singing. But if you do not do it, you throw away the psaltery itself. It is better to carry it at least, than to throw it away. But again, it is better to sing with pleasure than to carry with burden. And no one reaches the new song unless he is already singing with pleasure. For he who carries with fear is still in the old. And what am I saying, Brothers, pay attention. He has not agreed with his adversary, who still acts in fear. For he is afraid that God will come and condemn him. For he is not yet delighted by chastity, he is not yet delighted by justice, but fearing God's judgment, he refrains from acts. He does not yet condemn the lust that rages within him. He is not yet delighted by what is good. He does not yet have the sweetness there to sing a new song, but fears penalties from his old condition. He has not yet agreed with his adversary. May God please you as He is. For such men are often deceived by such thoughts, so as to say to themselves: "If it could be, God would not threaten us, would not say such things through His Prophets that frighten men, but would come to give everyone forgiveness, to pardon everyone, and afterwards come, sending no one into hell." Since he is unjust, he wants God to be unjust. God wants you to make yourself like Him, and you try to make God like you. Let God please you as He is, not as you want Him to be. For you are perverse, and you want God to be such as you are, not as He is. If, however, He pleases you as He is, you are corrected, and you will align your heart with that rule from which you are now alienated and distorted. Let God please you as He is, love Him as He is. He does not love you as you are, but hates you as you are. Therefore, He has mercy on you, because He hates you as you are, to make you what you are not yet. I said to make you what you are not yet. For He does not promise you that He will make you as He is. For you will be like Him, but in a certain way, that is, an imitator of God like an image, but not like the image which is the Son. For images even among men are diverse. A son of man bears the image of his father, and this is what his father is, because he is a man like his father. But in a mirror, your image is not what you are. For your image is different in the son, and different in the mirror. In the son, your image is according to the equality of substance; in the mirror, however, how far it is from the substance! And yet it is a certain image of you, though not such as it is in your son according to the substance. Thus in the creature, the image of God is not what it is in the Son who is what the Father is, that is, the Word of God through whom all things were made. Therefore, regain the likeness of God, which you lost through evil deeds. For just as the image of the emperor is different in a coin and different in the son—for the image is still an image, but it is impressed differently in a coin; it is held differently in the son, and differently in the solid gold coin with the emperor's image—so you are the coin of God, better in this respect because you are a coin of God with understanding and with a certain life, so that you know whose image you bear and in whose likeness you were made. For a coin does not know it bears the image of the king. Therefore, as I began to say, God hates you as you are, but loves you as He wants you to be, and therefore He urges you to change. Agree with Him, and first begin to wish well and hate yourself as you are. Let this be the beginning of your agreement with the word of God, that you first begin to hate yourself as you are. When you too begin to hate yourself as you are, just as God hates you as you are, you begin already to love God as He is. The sick person agrees with the doctor.

Attend to the sick man. The sick man hates his sickness as it is, hence he begins to agree with the doctor. For the doctor also hates him as he is. Indeed, he wants him to be healthy because he hates the feverish state and is the pursuer of fever in order to be the liberator of the man. So too are avarice, lust, hatred, desire, luxury, and the frivolity of spectacles the fevers of your soul. You ought to hate them along with the doctor. Thus you agree with the doctor, strive with the doctor, and gladly listen to what the doctor orders, gladly do what the doctor orders, and as health progresses, the precepts also begin to delight you. How burdensome is food to the sick when they are being restored? And the sick consider the hour of their restoration worse than that of their attack. And yet, agreeing with the doctor, they force themselves, and although unwilling and struggling, they conquer themselves to take in something. With what eagerness do the healthy look forward to receiving more, from which the sick scarcely receive less? But how did this come about? Because they hated their fever and agreed with the doctor, and together they pursued the fever, both the doctor and the sick man. Therefore, when we say such things, we only hate your fevers, indeed in us the very Word of God hates your fevers, with whom you ought to agree. For what are we, except saving along with you, healing along with you?

You shall not commit adultery. Do not look at me, but at the word of God. Do not be angry at your own remedy: for I have found no other way to pass. I have come to the fifth string, a man who touches the ten-stringed psaltery. Was I to skip the fifth string? No, I will strike it continually. For on it I see almost the whole human race lying, on it I see more toil. By striking it, what do I say? Do not commit adultery after other men's wives because you do not want your own wives to commit adultery after you. Do not go where you do not want them to follow. In vain you try to excuse yourself when you say: "Do I go to another man's wife? I go to my maid." Do you want her to say to you: "Do I go to another man? I go to my servant." You say: "It is not another man's wife to whom I go." Do you want it to be said to you: "It is not another man to whom I go"? May it never be that she says this. For it is better that she grieves for you than imitates you. For that chaste and holy woman and true Christian, who grieves for her fornicating husband, does not grieve for the flesh but grieves for charity’s sake, she does not want you to do it not because she herself does not do it, but because it is not good for you. For if she abstains so that you may not do it, if you do it, she will do it. But if she owes it to God, if she owes it to Christ what you demand, and she abstains because He commands it, and if the husband fornicates, she shows her chastity to God. For Christ speaks in the hearts of good women, speaks inwardly where the husband does not hear, because he is not worthy if he is such. Therefore He speaks inwardly and says, and comforts His daughter with such words: "You are tormented by your husband's insults, what did he do to you? Grieve, but do not imitate him to do evil, but let him imitate you in doing good. For in what he does evil, do not consider him your head, but me." For if he is the head in what he does evil, the body will follow its head, and both will go headlong. But to the end that the body does not follow its evil head, let it hold itself fast to the head of the Church, Christ. Owing her chastity to Him, showing her honor to Him, whether her husband is absent or present, she does not sin; because she is never absent from the One to whom she owes not to sin.

What a woman can do, a man cannot do?

Therefore, my brothers, do this so that you may agree with the adversary. What I say is not bitter, or if it is bitter, it heals. If this potion is bitter, let it be taken. Because the bowels are in danger, if it is bitter, let it be drunk. It is better to have a little bitterness in the throat than eternal torment in the bowels. Therefore, change yourselves. Whoever was not practicing this good of chastity, now do so. Do not say: "It cannot be done." It is shameful, my brothers, it is disgraceful for a man to say that what a woman does cannot be done. It is a crime for a man to say, "I cannot." Can a man not do what a woman can? For does she not bear flesh? She was first deceived by the serpent. Your chaste wives show you it can be done, which you do not want to do and say cannot be done. But perhaps you say it is easier for her because she is under much guard: the command of the law, the diligence of her husband, even the terror of public laws. It is also a great defense of her modesty and chastity. Many safeguards make a woman chaster; manliness itself should make the man so. For this reason, there is greater custody for the woman, because greater is her weakness. She blushes before her husband; do you not blush before Christ? You are freer because you are stronger. Because you easily conquer, you are entrusted to yourself. There is both the husband's diligence over her, and the terror of laws, and societal customs, and greater modesty. And God is over you, only God. For you find easily equals among men, before whom you are not ashamed because many do this. And such is the perversity of the human race that sometimes it must be feared lest the chaste be ashamed among the impure. Therefore, I do not cease to touch this fifth string because of this perverse custom and the stain of the whole, as I said, human race. If anyone among you commits murder, which God forbid, you want to drive him out of the homeland and immediately if possible, exclude him. If anyone steals, you hate him and do not want to see him. If anyone gives false witness, you abhor him, nor will he seem to you a man. If anyone covets another's goods, he is considered a robber and unjust. If anyone has lain with his maidservants, he is loved, kindly received, his wounds turned into jokes. But if anyone exists who says he is chaste, does not commit adultery, and it is known that he does not, he blushes to approach those unlike himself, lest they insult him, mock him, say he is not a man. To this extent has human perversity fallen, that a man is seen as bound by lust, and is not seen as the conqueror of lust. Those who triumph exalt and are not men; they lie defeated and are men! If you watched in the amphitheater, did you watch in such a way that he who lay beneath the beast seemed stronger to you than he who killed the beast? In the inner struggle you are both a harper and a hunter. But because you disregard the interior battle and delight in exterior battles, therefore you do not wish to belong to the new song, where it is said: "He teaches my hands to fight and my fingers to battle." For there is a battle that a man wages against himself, fighting against evil desires, restraining greed, crushing pride, suffocating ambition, slaughtering lust. These battles you wage in secret and are not defeated in the open. For this reason, your hands are taught to fight, and your fingers to battle. This is not in your spectacles. In those spectacles, the hunter is not the same as the harpist; the hunter does one thing, the harpist another. In God's spectacle, it is one and the same. Strum the same ten strings, and you will slay beasts. You do both at the same time. You strike the first string by which one God is worshipped; the beast of superstition falls. You strike the second string by which you do not take the name of the Lord your God in vain; the beast of the error of wicked heresies, which thought otherwise, falls. You strike the third string where you do whatever you do for the hope of future rest; the cruelest of all beasts, the love of this world, is slain. For because of the love of this world, men labor in all endeavors. But you labor in all your good works, not for the love of this world, but for the eternal rest that God promises. See how you do both at the same time. You strike the strings and slay the beasts. That is, you are both a harpist and a hunter. Do such spectacles not delight you, where we do not gain the eyes of the editor, but the eyes of the Redeemer? "Honor your father and your mother"; you strike the fourth string so you honor your parents, the beast of impiety is slain. "You shall not commit adultery"; you strike the fifth string, the beast of lust falls. "You shall not kill"; you strike the sixth string, the beast of cruelty falls. "You shall not steal"; you strike the seventh string, the beast of rapacity falls. "You shall not bear false witness"; you strike the eighth string, the beast of falsehood falls. "You shall not covet your neighbor's wife"; you strike the ninth string, the beast of adulterous thoughts falls. For it is one thing not to do something outside of marriage, another not to desire another's wife. Therefore, there are two commandments: "You shall not commit adultery," and "You shall not covet your neighbor's wife." "You shall not covet your neighbor's goods"; you strike the tenth string, the beast of covetousness falls. Thus, with all these beasts falling, you safely and innocently dwell in God's love and human society. Striking the ten strings, how many beasts do you slay! For there are many heads beneath these heads. On each string, you do not kill single beasts, but flocks of beasts. Thus, you will sing the new song with love, not with fear.

What you do not want to be done to you, do not do to others. Do not say to yourself, when perhaps you want to indulge in something luxuriantly: "I do not have a wife, I do what I want; for I am not sinning against my wife." Now you know your worth, now you know where you approach, what you eat, what you drink, indeed whom you eat, whom you drink. Abstain from fornications. Lest perhaps you might say to me: "I go to a brothel, I proceed to a harlot, I go to a prostitute, nor do I break that commandment which is said: You shall not commit adultery, for I do not yet have a wife nor do I do anything after her; nor do I violate that commandment where it is said: You shall not covet your neighbor's wife. Which commandment do I incur going to a public house?" Do we not find the string to pluck? Do we not find the string by which word we bind this fugitive? Let it not flee, it has where it is bound. But let it love, and it will not be a bond, but an ornament. In those very ten strings, we find it. For the ten commandments are referred to those two, as we have heard, to love God and neighbor, and those two to that one. But that one is: What you do not want to be done to you, do not do to another. Therein are contained the ten, therein are contained the two. Do not corrupt the temple of God which is you. But you say: "If I steal, I do what I do not want to suffer; if I kill, I do what I do not want to suffer from another; if I do not show honor to my parents, when I want it to be shown to me by my children, I do what I do not want to suffer; if I am an adulterer and plot something of that kind, I do what I do not want to suffer—for if anyone were asked, he would say: I do not want my wife to do such a thing—if I covet my neighbor's wife, I do not want anyone to covet mine, I do what I do not want to suffer; if I covet my neighbor's goods, I do not want mine to be taken away, I do what I do not want to suffer. But when I go to a prostitute, to whom do I do what I do not want to suffer?" What is more serious, to God Himself. May Your Holiness understand. For indeed: What you do not want to be done to you, do not do to another, pertains to two commandments. How does it pertain to two commandments? If you do not do to a man what you do not want to suffer from a man, it pertains to the commandment of neighbor, to the love of neighbor, to the seven chords. But if you want to do to God what you do not want to suffer from a man, what is this? You do not do to another what you do not want to suffer? Has man become dearer to you than God? "So how do I do it," he says, "to God Himself?" You corrupt yourself. "And how do I do injury to God because I corrupt myself?" How does someone who perhaps wants to stone your painted board, on which is your image placed idly in your house for your vain honor, neither sensing, nor speaking, nor seeing, do you any injury? If anyone were to stone it, would it not be an insult to you? But when you corrupt the image of God, which is yourself, through fornications and the dissipations of lust, do you consider that you have not approached any man's wife, do you consider that you have done nothing against your wife, who you do not have. And do you not consider through illicit lusts in fornication whose image you have violated? Lastly, God who knows what is useful for you, who truly governs His servants for their benefit, not His own—for He does not need servants as help, but you need the Lord for help—He, therefore, the Lord who knows what is useful for you, has granted a wife, nothing more. He has commanded this, He has ordered this, lest through illicit pleasures His temple, which you have become, should collapse. Do I say this? Listen to the Apostle: Do you not know that you are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwells in you? He says this to Christians, He says this to the faithful: Do you not know that you are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwells in you? If anyone destroys the temple of God, God will destroy him. Do you see how He threatens? You do not want your house to be corrupted, why do you corrupt the house of God? Certainly, you do not do to anyone what you do not want to suffer? There is therefore no way to escape. He is held who thought he could not be held. For all the sins of men either pertain to the corruption of shameful acts, or to crimes of harming. Because you cannot harm God in crimes, you offend Him in shameful acts, you offend Him in corruptions, you do Him injury. For you do injury to His grace, His gift.

Serve God in the way you want your servant to serve you.

If you had a servant, you would want your servant to serve you. Serve your better Lord, your God. You did not make your servant, both you and your servant were made by Him. You want the one with whom you were made to serve you, and you do not want to serve Him by whom you were made? Therefore, when you want your servant, a human being, to serve you, and you do not want to serve your Lord, you do to God what you do not want to endure. Therefore, that one commandment contains two, those two contain ten, those ten contain all. So sing a new song on a psaltery of ten strings. But to sing a new song, be new people. Love righteousness: it has its beauty. That is why you do not want to see it, because you love something else. For if you did not love something else, you would certainly see it. Why do you see it when you demand it? Why do you praise faith when you demand it from your servant? How beautiful a thing faith is! But it is beautiful when it is demanded from a servant; it is seen when it is sought from another. When it is demanded from you, it is not seen. You see gold, you do not see faith. As gold shines to the eyes of the body, so faith shines to the eyes of the heart. You open the eyes of the heart to it when you want your servant to show it to you. And if he shows it to you, you praise the servant and proclaim him and say: "I have a distinguished servant, a great servant, a faithful servant." What you praise in a servant you do not show to the Lord, and thus more wickedly because you want to have a better servant than God has in you. God commands your servant to be good to you. Just as He commands your wife that even if you commit adultery, she should not commit adultery, so He commands your servant that even if you do not serve your God, he should serve you. But see that this whole matter is for your admonition, not for your ruin. For because that servant serves you worthily though you are unworthy, that is, because he serves you well though you are unworthy and serves you faithfully and loves you purely, he owes that to God, not to you. Therefore, it is right that you also consider that you are under a Lord, to whom he also pays attention to serve you. Therefore, fulfill what is said: What you do not wish to be done to you, do not do to another. But when you say "another," consider both your neighbor and God. Sing on a psaltery of ten strings, sing a new song, harmonize with the word of God, for He is with you on the way. Harmonize quickly with your adversary, lest you come to the judge with discord. If you do what you hear, you have harmonized with Him. But if you do not do it, you are still quarreling with Him, and you have not yet settled until you comply.

Beware of smaller sins because they are many. To be in harmony, abstain from detestable corruptions, from detestable inquiries, from astrologers, from soothsayers, from sorcerers, from augurs, from sacrilegious sacrifices; abstain, as far as you can, from frivolous spectacles. If any worldly delights creep into your soul, exercise yourselves in mercy, exercise yourselves in almsgiving, in fasting, in prayers. For by these daily sins are cleansed, which cannot fail to creep into the soul, due to human frailty. Do not despise them because they are small; but fear them because they are many. Observe, my brothers. They are trivial, they are not great. There is no beast like a lion, so as to break the neck with one bite. But frequently, even many small beasts kill. If someone is thrown into a place full of fleas, will he not die there? They are indeed not greater, but human nature is weak, which can be destroyed even by the smallest beasts. So also with small sins: you observe that they are small; beware because they are numerous. How small are grains of sand! If more sand is put into a ship, it sinks it so that it perishes. How small are raindrops! Do they not fill rivers and bring down houses? Therefore, do not despise these things. But you will say: "And who can be without these?" Do not say this—for indeed no one can—God, mercifully seeing our frailty, has set against it remedies. What are the remedies? Almsgiving, fasting, prayers: these are the three. To speak truly in prayer, perfect almsgiving must be fulfilled. What are perfect alms? That from what abounds to you, you give to him who does not have, and that you forgive him who does you harm.

Small sins are cleansed by daily alms. But do not think, Brothers, that daily adulteries are to be committed, and should be cleansed with daily alms. Daily alms are not sufficient for greater crimes, so that they cleanse them. It is one thing to change life, another to endure life. The former must be changed, so if you were an adulterer, do not be an adulterer; if you were a fornicator, do not fornicate; if you were a murderer, do not be a murderer; if you went to the mathematician and other sacrilegious pestilences, cease now. Do you think these things, unless they cease to be done, can be cleansed by daily alms? I speak of those daily sins which are easily committed by tongue, such as harsh words, or when someone lapses into immoderate laughter, or into such daily trifles. Even in those granted, there are sins. With a wife, if the mode of intercourse exceeds the due for procreating children, it is already a sin. For a wife is taken for this purpose, as even the records indicate where it is written: For the sake of procreating children. When you wish to use a wife more than the necessity for procreating children compels, it is already a sin. Even such sins are cleansed by daily alms. In the very food, which indeed is granted, if by chance you exceed the measure and take more than necessary, you sin. These are the daily things I speak of, but nevertheless they are sins and not light because they are numerous. Because, indeed, daily and numerous, the collapse from their multitude is to be feared, even if not from their magnitude. Such sins, Brothers, we say can be cleansed by daily alms. But give alms and do not cease. Pay attention to your daily life overflowing with these very sins, I speak of these minute ones. Your alms should be like those of Zacchaeus, not the Pharisee's. And when you give alms, do not do it proudly, nor pray as the Pharisee did there. But what did he say there? "I fast twice a week, I give tithes of all that I possess." And the blood of the Lord had not yet been shed! We have received such a great price for us, and yet we do not give as much as the Pharisee. And you have the Lord openly saying in another place: "Unless your righteousness exceeds that of the scribes and Pharisees, you will not enter the kingdom of heaven." Therefore, they give tithes; if you give a hundredth part, you boast that you have done something great. For you consider what another does not do, not what God commands you to do. You measure yourself by comparison with someone worse, not by the command of someone better. It is not because the other does nothing that you do something great. But because there is rejoicing over some of your smallest works—for such is your barrenness that there is joy over small things—you flatter yourselves with the small grains of alms, and forget the heaps of sins. You perhaps brought out something small that another either did not have or did not bring out when he had it. Do not consider who does not do after you, but what God commands you to do. Finally, why do these secular desires not suffice for you whom you have surpassed, but you want to be rich, equal to those richer than you? You do not consider how many poorer you surpass; you want to surpass the richer ones. But there is a measure in almsgiving. Here it is said, "How long shall I do it?", and there it is not said, "How many rich ones have I surpassed?" The countless miseries of beggars are not considered, the subsequent multitudes of the poor are not looked at, but the few preceding rich ones are placed before your eyes. Why in good work is that Zacchaeus not considered, who gave half of his goods to the poor? But we are compelled to wish that at least that Pharisee is considered, who gave tithes of all he possessed. A great excuse for greed. Do not spare perishable treasures, vain treasures. Do not under the guise of piety increase money. "I save for my children": great excuse. He saves for his children. Let us see. Your father saves for you, you save for your children, your children for theirs, and so on for all, and no one will do the commands of God. Why do you not rather spend everything for Him who made you out of nothing? He who made you, He feeds you out of what He made, He feeds your children. For you do not commit your children better to your inheritance than to your Creator. And indeed men lie. Greed is evil. They wish to cover themselves up with the name of piety and whitewash, so that they may seem to save for their children what they save for greed. For as you know that it often happens thus, it is said of someone: "Why does he not give alms? Because he saves for his children." It happens that he loses one. If he was saving for his children, he should send a part after him. Why does he hold onto it in the world, and leaves him who went before in spirit? Return to him what is his, return what you were saving for him. "He is dead," he says. But he has gone before to God, his part is owed to the poor. It is owed to him to whom he has gone. It is owed to Christ: for to Him he has gone. And He himself said: "What you did to one of the least of these, you did to me, and what you did not do to one of the least of these, you did not do to me." But what do you say? "I save for his brothers." If he lived, would he not share with his brothers? O dead faith! For your son is dead. Whatever you say, you owe to the dead what you were saving for the living. "My son is dead, but nevertheless I save his part for his brothers." So you believe that he is dead? If Christ did not die for him, he is dead. But if there is faith in you, your son lives. He lives absolutely. He has not departed, but has gone before. With what face will you come to your son who went before, to whom going before you do not send his part to heaven? Or is it not able to be sent to heaven? It is absolutely able. Hear the Lord himself saying: "Store up for yourselves treasures in heaven." If therefore that treasure is better kept in heaven, should it not then be sent to your son, when if sent it would not perish? It will be kept here where it can perish, not sent there where Christ is the guardian? Surely what you hold here, and do not wish to send after your son, to whom do you entrust it? To your agents and stewards. You entrust to your agents his part who has gone before, and do not entrust it to Christ to whom he has gone? Or is your steward more fit for you, Christ less fit?

It is very little to be called a Christian.

You see, brothers, that it is a lie when men say: "I save for my children." It is a lie, my brothers, it is a lie. Men are greedy. Or at least they certainly would be compelled to confess what they do not want to, since they are ashamed to remain silent about what they are. They should pour out, vomit in confession what they carry. The chest is oppressed by the gluttony of iniquity. Let confession vomit it out, but do not return to the vomit like a dog. Be Christians. It is very little to be called Christian. How much do you give to actors? How much do you give to hunters? How much to disgraceful people? You give to those who kill you. For through those very exhibitions of pleasures, your souls are killed. And you are mad about who gives more. If you were mad about who saves more, you would not be bearable. Whoever goes mad saving more, that is avarice. Whoever goes mad giving more, that is extravagance. God wants neither a miserly nor an extravagant person. He wants you to place what you have, not to throw it away. You strive to win in doing worse, not giving effort to who might be better. And would that you did not strive to be worse. And you say: "We are Christians." You throw away your possessions to gain the favor of the people, you hold onto your possessions contrary to commands. Behold, Christ does not command, Christ begs, Christ is in need. I was hungry, says Christ, and you did not give me to eat. He wanted to be in need because of you, so that you might have a place to sow the earthly things He gave, and reap eternal life. Do not be lazy and wrongly complacent. Amend your morals, redeem your sins. And when you have done these things, give thanks to God, from whom you received the means to live well. And give thanks to Him in such a way that you do not insult those who do not yet live well, but encourage them with your own morals. By doing this, you will have as perfect justice as can be in this life. Living in good works, in prayers, in fasts, in alms for your minor sins, and abstaining from those great sins, you reconcile with your adversary, and you say securely in prayer: Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors. For you have what must be forgiven to you daily, who have what you forgive daily. Walking thus securely on the way, you will not fear the robberies of the devil, because Christ made Himself the way and the great thoroughfare, leading to the homeland. There, all security, all rest will be, where even the works of mercy will cease, because there will be no need for the poor. Therefore, it will be that Sabbath of Sabbaths, so that what we desire here, we will find there. Amen.

Sermons - Sermon 90

SERMO 90 ON THE WORDS OF THE GOSPEL, MT 22: 1-14: WHERE THE ROYAL SON'S WEDDING AGAINST THE DONATISTS, ON CHARITY The Lord's banquet is twofold: one here, for the faithful; another in heaven, for the blessed. The marriage of the king’s son and his banquet are known to all the faithful, and the preparation for the Lord’s table is offered to everyone's will. However, it matters how one approaches, since approaching is not forbidden. Indeed, the holy Scriptures teach us that there are two banquets of the Lord; one where both the good and the bad come, and the other where the bad do not approach. Therefore, the banquet of the Lord, of which we have just now heard when the Gospel was read, certainly includes the good and the bad. All who excused themselves from this banquet are bad: but not all who entered are good. I address you, therefore, who are the good reclining at this banquet, anyone who is attentive to what has been said: "Whoever eats and drinks unworthily eats and drinks judgment upon himself." I address all of you who are such, so that you do not seek the good outside, but endure the bad within.

All the just in this life are both evil and good.

I have no doubt that Your Charity wishes to hear who those are, about whom I spoke, so that they do not seek the good outside, but bear the evil within. If all inside are evil, whom did I address? But if all inside are good, whom did I advise to bear the evil? First, therefore, with the Lord's help, let us, as best we can, resolve this question. If you consider the good perfectly and plainly, no one is good except God alone. You have the Lord saying most plainly: Why do you ask me about what is good? No one is good except God alone. So how do those weddings have the good and the bad, if no one is good except God alone? First, you must know, according to a certain manner, that we all are evil. In a certain way, we are all entirely evil; however, in a certain way, not all of us are good. For can we compare ourselves to the Apostles? To whom the Lord himself said: If you then, being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children. If we consider the Scriptures, there was one evil among the twelve Apostles, because of whom the Lord said in one place: And you are clean, but not all. Nevertheless, he addressed them all in common: If you then, being evil. Peter heard this, John heard it, Andrew heard it, and the other eleven Apostles all heard it. What did they hear? You, being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children; how much more will your Father in heaven give good things to those who ask him? When they heard that they were evil, they despaired; when they heard that God in heaven was their father, they breathed again. He said: Being evil: what then is owed to the evil, except punishment? How much more so, he said: Your Father, who is in heaven: what is owed to the sons, except reward? In the name of the evil, fear of punishments; in the name of the sons, hope of heirs. Who are to be understood as evildoers excluded from the banquet?

Therefore, in what sense were the same ones evil who were in some sense good? For to whom it was said, "Though you are evil, you know how to give good gifts to your children; how much more will your Father in heaven?" Therefore, He is the Father of the evil, but not to be abandoned; because He is the physician of those to be healed. Therefore, in a certain sense, they were evil.

And yet those guests of the householder at the royal wedding, I think, were not of that number of whom it was said: "they invited both good and evil"; so that in the number of the evil might be counted those whom we heard to have been excluded, specifically the one who was found not having a wedding garment. In what sense, I say, were they evil who were good; in what sense were they good who were evil? Hear John in what sense they were evil: "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us." Behold, in what sense they were evil: because they had sin. In what sense were they good? "If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." Therefore, if we say, according to this interpretation, which you have heard me present from the holy Scriptures, that the same men are both good in some sense and evil in some sense; if we wish to take in this sense what was said: "They invited both good and evil," that is, the same ones being both good and evil; if we wish to take it thus, we are not permitted because of the one who was found not having a wedding garment, and not merely cast out to be deprived of that banquet, but to be condemned to eternal punishment in the darkness.

One excluded signifies many excluded. But someone says: What about one man? What wonder? What great thing, if one without a wedding garment slipped in among the servants of the father of the family in a crowd? By no means could it be said on account of him: They invited both good and bad. Listen carefully, therefore, and understand, my brothers. That one was a kind of many; indeed there were many. Let the diligent listener answer me here and say: I do not want you to narrate your suspicions to me; I want it to be proven to me that that one was many. The Lord will assist, I will plainly prove, nor will I seek longer to prove it. In His own words God will help me, and what is clear to you will be ministered through me. Behold, the father of the family came in to inspect those reclining. See, my brothers, for it was not pertinent to the servants, except to invite and bring in both good and bad: see that it is not said, The servants considered those reclining and there they found a man not having a wedding garment, and they said to him. This is not written. The father of the family inspected, the father of the family found, the father of the family distinguished, the father of the family separated. This indeed should not be passed over. But we took up to prove something else, how he could be many. The father of the family indeed came to inspect those reclining, and found a man not having a wedding garment: and he said to him; Friend, how did you come in here not having a wedding garment? But he was speechless. For he was asked by one to whom he could feign nothing. That garment indeed was inspected in the heart, not in the flesh: which if it had been put on from above, it would not have been hidden even from the servants. Take heed where the wedding garment is to be put on, where it says: Let your priests be clothed with righteousness. About that garment the Apostle says: If indeed being clothed, we shall not be found naked. Therefore, he was found by the Lord who was hidden from the servants. Being asked he was speechless: he is bound, cast out, condemned—one out of many. Lord, I said, because you admonish all to admonish. Recall with me the words you heard, and you will find that many were that one, now you will judge. Certainly the Lord asked one, said to one: Friend, how did you come in here? One was speechless, and concerning that one it was said: Bind him hand and foot, and cast him into outer darkness: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. Why this? For many are called, but few chosen. What could contradict this manifestation of truth? Cast him, he says, into outer darkness. Certainly that one, of whom the Lord says: For many are called, but few chosen. Therefore, a few are not cast out. Certainly, that one who did not have a wedding garment. Cast him out. Why is he cast out? For many are called, but few chosen.

Dismiss the few, cast out the many. Certainly, he was one. That one totally, not only many but surpassing the multitude of the good in number. Indeed many and good: but in comparison to the evil few are good. Many good grains were born: compare with the chaff, and there are few grains. The same ones in themselves many, in the comparison of the evil few. How do we prove that in themselves they are many? Many shall come from the east and west. To what will they come? To that banquet, into which both good and bad enter. Speaking of another banquet, He added: And they shall sit down with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven. That is the banquet to which the evil shall not approach. This, which now is, be received worthily, so that one may come to that. Therefore, the same many, who are few: many in themselves, few in comparison to the evil. Therefore, what does the Lord say? He found one, and says: Let many be cast out, let few remain. To say indeed: Many are called, but few chosen, is nothing else than to openly show who in this banquet are considered such as to be brought to another banquet, into which none of the evil shall come.

What is the wedding garment?

What then is it? All who approach the Lord's table, which is here, I do not want to be separated with many, but preserved with few. How will you be able to achieve this? Take the wedding garment. You ask, explain to us the wedding garment. Without a doubt, that garment is what the good have, who are to be preserved for the banquet to which no evil one comes, to be led by the Lord’s grace: they have the wedding garment. Let us then seek, my brothers, among the faithful who have something that the evil do not have, and that will be the wedding garment. If we say the Sacraments, you see how they are common to both the evil and the good. Is it Baptism? Indeed, no one reaches God without Baptism: but not everyone who has Baptism reaches God. Thus I cannot understand Baptism itself to be the wedding garment, that is, the sacrament itself; for I see that garment among the good and among the evil. Perhaps it is the altar, or what is taken from the altar. We see that many eat and drink judgment upon themselves. What then is it? Fasting? The evil also fast. Concurrence to the church? The evil also concur. Finally, are miracles performed? Not only do the good perform them, but also the evil, and sometimes the good do not perform them. Behold, in the old people, the magicians of Pharaoh performed miracles, the Israelites did not: in the Israelites only Moses and Aaron performed them; the rest did not, but they saw, feared, and believed. Are the magicians of Pharaoh who performed miracles better than the people of Israel who could not perform miracles, and yet the people belonged to God? In the same Church, listen to the Apostle: Are all prophets? Do all have the gifts of healing? Do all speak in tongues? The wedding garment is charity.

What, then, is that wedding garment? This is the wedding garment: The end of the commandment is, the Apostle says, charity from a pure heart, and a good conscience, and faith unfeigned. This is the wedding garment. Not just any charity: for often those who share in an evil conscience appear to love one another. Those who commit crimes together, who do evil deeds together, who love the theater together, who shout together for charioteers and hunters, often love one another; but they do not have charity from a pure heart, and a good conscience, and faith unfeigned. Such charity is the wedding garment. If I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, but have not charity, I am become, he says, as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal. They have arrived with nothing but tongues, and it is said to them, Why have you come in here without a wedding garment? If I have, he says, prophecy, and know all mysteries, and all knowledge, and if I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, but have not charity, I am nothing. Behold, these are the miracles of men often not having the wedding garment. If, he says, I have all these things, and have not Christ, I am nothing. I am nothing, he says. Is prophecy, then, nothing? is the knowledge of mysteries nothing? Those things are not nothing: but I, if I have those things, and have not charity, I am nothing. How many good things are useless without one good thing? If I have not charity, if I give all my goods to feed the poor, if I give my body to be burned, these things can be done even out of love for glory, they are empty. Since, therefore, they can be done even out of love for glory, empty, not out of the richest charity of piety, he also mentions them, and hear him: If I distribute all my goods to feed the poor, and if I give my body to be burned, but have not charity, it profits me nothing. This is the wedding garment. Examine yourselves; if you have it, you are secure at the Lord's feast. There are two things in one man, charity and lust. Let charity be born in you, if it is not yet born; and if it is born, let it be nurtured, fed, and grow. But lust, if it cannot be entirely extinguished in this life (for if we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us): in as much as we have lust, in so much as we are without sin, let charity grow, let lust diminish; so that someday charity can be perfected, and lust consumed. Clothe yourselves with the wedding garment: I speak to you who do not yet have it. You are already inside, you are already approaching the feast, and still you do not wear the garment in honor of the bridegroom: you still seek your own, not those of Jesus Christ. For the wedding garment is received in honor of the union, that is, of the bridegroom and the bride. You know the bridegroom: he is Christ. You know the bride: she is the Church. Honor the one marrying, honor the one leading. If you honor well those who are marrying, you will be children. Therefore, make progress in this. Love the Lord, and from there learn to love yourselves: so that when, by loving the Lord, you have loved yourselves, you may safely love your neighbors as yourselves. When, indeed, do I find someone who loves himself, so that I may permit him a neighbor to love as himself? And who is it, he says, who does not love himself? See who it is: He who loves iniquity hates his own soul. Does he love himself, who loves his flesh, and hates his soul, to his own harm, to the harm of his soul and his flesh? But who loves his soul? He who loves God with all his heart, and with all his mind. Now to such a person I entrust a neighbor. Love your neighbors, as yourselves.

Neighbor, every man.

Who, he says, is my neighbor? Every man is your neighbor. Did we not all have two parents? Every kind of animal has those close to it: a dove to a dove, a leopard to a leopard, an asp to an asp, cattle to cattle, and is not a man a neighbor to man? Recall the institution of creation. God said, the waters brought forth; swimming creatures, great whales, fish, birds, and things like that were brought forth. Were all birds from one bird? Were all vultures from one vulture? Were all doves from one dove? Were all snakes from one snake? Were all golden fish from one golden fish? Were all sheep from one sheep? Truly, the earth simultaneously brought forth all kinds. It came to man, and the earth did not bring forth man. One father was made for us: not even two, father and mother: I say, one father was made for us, not even two, father and mother: but from one father, one mother; one from none, but made by God, and one from him. Consider our race: we have flowed from one source; and because that one turned into bitterness, we have all become wild olives from the olive tree. Grace has come, too. One generated for sin and for death, yet one race, yet all close to each other; yet not only similar, but also related by blood. One came against one: against the one who scattered, one who gathers. Thus, against the one who kills, one who gives life. For as in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive. But just as from him everyone who is born, dies: so in Christ everyone who believes, is made alive. But if he has the wedding garment, if he is invited to be saved, he is not to be separated.

What faith should be praised.

Therefore, have charity, my brothers. I have explained to you the wedding garment, I have explained to you the garment. Faith is praised, it is constant, it is praised: but what kind of faith, the Apostle distinguishes. For the apostle James rebukes some who boast of faith and do not have good morals, and says: You believe that there is one God, and you do well. Even the demons believe, and shudder. Whence Peter was praised, whence he was called blessed, recall with me. Because he said: You are the Christ, the Son of the living God? He did not consider the sound of the words, but the affection of the heart, who pronounced him blessed. Do you want to know that the blessedness of Peter was not in those words? The demons also said this. We know who you are; you are the Son of God. Peter confessed the Son of God; the demons confessed the Son of God. Distinguish, Lord, distinguish. I clearly distinguish. Peter spoke in love, the demons from fear. Finally, he says: I am with you until death. They say: What have we to do with you? Therefore, you who have come to the banquet, do not boast of faith alone. Distinguish even that faith, and then the wedding garment is recognized in you. Let the Apostle distinguish, let him teach us: Neither circumcision, he says, is of value, nor uncircumcision, but faith. Say which: do not even the demons believe and shudder? I say, he says, listen, I distinguish, I now distinguish: But faith which works through love. Which faith then? what kind of faith? Which works through love. If I have all knowledge, he says, and all faith, so as to move mountains, but have not charity, I am nothing. Have faith with love: for you cannot have love without faith. This I advise, this I exhort, this I teach in the name of the Lord Your Love, that you may have faith with love: because you can have faith without love. For I do not exhort you to have faith, but charity. For you cannot have charity without faith; for I speak of charity towards God and neighbor: how can this exist without faith? How does a fool who says in his heart: There is no God, love God? It is possible that you believe that Christ has come, and not love Christ. But it is not possible that you love Christ, and not say that Christ has come.

Charity must be extended to enemies.

Therefore, have faith with love. This is the wedding garment. Love one another, you who love Christ: love friends, love enemies. Do not let it be hard for you. What then do you lose, when you gain a lot? Why do you ask God for something great, that your enemy may die? This is not the wedding garment. Consider the bridegroom himself hanging on the cross for you, and praying to the Father for his enemies: Father, he says, forgive them, for they know not what they do. You saw the bridegroom saying this, see also the friend of the bridegroom invited with the wedding garment. Consider blessed Stephen, how he reproaches the Jews, as if severe, as if angry: Stiff-necked, and uncircumcised in heart and ears, you always resist the Holy Spirit. Which of the prophets did your fathers not kill? You heard how the tongue raged. Are you still ready to speak against anyone, and would that you speak against him who offends God, not who offends you. He offends God and you do not rebuke; he offends you, you cry out: where is that wedding garment? You have heard then how Stephen raged: hear how he loved. He offended those whom he rebuked, he was stoned by them. And when he was being pressed and struck on all sides by the hands of the furious and by the blows of the stones, he first said: Lord Jesus Christ, receive my spirit. Then after he prayed standing for himself, for those who were stoning him, he knelt and said: Lord, do not hold this sin against them, I will die in the flesh, not they in their hearts. And having said this, he fell asleep. After these words he added nothing: he spoke, and departed; his last prayer was for his enemies. Learn to have the wedding garment. So you too kneel, and strike your forehead on the ground, and about to approach the table of the Lord, the banquet of the holy Scriptures, do not say, If my enemy dies: Lord, if I have deserved anything from you, kill my enemy. But if you do say this, are you not afraid that he might answer you: If I wanted to kill your enemy, I would kill you first? Or do you boast, because now you have come invited? Consider, a little while before what you were. Did you not blaspheme me? Did you not mock me? Did you not want to erase my name from the earth? But you applaud yourself, because you have come invited. If I had killed you as an enemy, whom would I make a friend? You teach me badly by praying, what I did not do to you? Rather I, God says to you, will teach you to imitate me. Hanging on the cross I said: Forgive them, for they know not what they do. I taught this to my soldier. Be my recruit against the devil. Otherwise, you will not fight victoriously in any way, unless you pray for your enemies. Say plainly, say also this, say that you pursue your enemy: but knowingly say; distinguish what you say. Here is a man your enemy: answer me, what in him is hostile to you; is it that he is a man, hostile to you? No. But what? That he is evil. That he is a man, that I made, is not hostile to you. He says to you: I made the man not evil: he became evil through disobedience, who rather obeyed the devil, than God. What he did, that is hostile to you: from where he is evil, he is your enemy; not from where he is a man. For I hear man, and evil: one name is of nature, the other of guilt: I heal the guilt, and preserve the nature. Thus your God says to you: And behold I avenge you, I kill your enemy; from him I take away what is evil, I preserve what is man: if I make that man good, did I not kill your enemy, and made your friend? Thus pray what you pray, so that men do not perish, but the enmities themselves perish. But if you pray this, that the man die; you pray evil against evil: and when you say, Kill the evil one; he answers you, Which one of you?

Love must be extended so that it draws all to God.

Therefore, extend your love, not just to your spouses and children. This kind of love is also found among animals and birds. You know how these sparrows and swallows love their mates, incubate their eggs together, and nurture their chicks together with a certain natural kindness, expecting no reward. A sparrow does not say, "I will nurture my offspring so that when I am old, they will feed me." It thinks none of this: it loves freely, feeds freely; it exhibits the affection of a parent without requiring recompense. And you, I know, love your children in the same way. For children are not obligated to save up for their parents, but parents for their children. Herein, many of you excuse your avarice, claiming that you are acquiring and saving for your children. But extend your love, let this love grow: to love children and spouses is not yet the wedding garment. Have faith in God. First, love God. Extend towards God; and whomever you can, bring them to God. If they are an enemy: bring them to God. If they are a son, a wife, a servant: bring them to God. If they are a stranger: bring them to God. If they are an enemy: bring them to God. Bring, bring the enemy: by bringing them, they will not be an enemy. Thus, progress will be made, thus love will be nurtured, so that being nurtured, it may be completed: thus the wedding garment will be put on: thus the image of God, in whose likeness we were created, will be reshaped by progress. For by sinning, it had become worn out, it had become abraded. From what was it worn out? From what was it abraded? When it is rubbed against the earth. What does it mean to be rubbed against the earth? It is worn down by earthly desires. For even though man walks in the image, he is yet disturbed by vanity. Truth is sought in the image of God, not vanity. For by loving the truth, the image to which we were created is reshaped, and the proper coin is paid back to our Caesar. For from the Lord's response, which you heard, the Lord said to the testing Jews: "Why do you test me, hypocrites? Show me the coin used for the tax," that is, the expression of the image and inscription. Show me what you pay, what you prepare, what is demanded from you; show me. They showed him a denarius: and he asked whose image and inscription it bore. They replied: "Caesar's." This Caesar also seeks his image. Caesar does not want what he ordered to perish, and God does not want what he made to perish. Caesar, my brothers, did not make the coin: mint workers make it; artisans are commanded, he gave orders to his ministers. The image was expressed in the coin: in the coin is the image of Caesar. And yet what others impressed, he seeks: he treasures it, he does not want it denied to him. The coin of Christ is man. There is the image of Christ, there is the name of Christ, the gift of Christ, and the duties of Christ.

Sermons - Sermon 90A

SERMON 90/A Sermon of Saint Augustine, bishop On the love of God and neighbor "Believing, let us seek so that seeking we may find." In the evangelical reading that was just recited, let us, as if we too are seeing the Lord, not with the eyes of the flesh, but - which is more beneficial - with the eyes of faith, take on the attitude of the one asking which commandment is the greatest in the law. For he who was asking, because he saw not with the eyes of faith but of the flesh, was tempting rather than seeking. But we as believers should seek so that we might find; let us also say: Lord, what is the greatest commandment in the law? However, let us ask not with the cunning of a tempter, but with the eagerness of a learner. For he now responds to us as he did to him who, if he did not believe, sought for us and not for himself; if he did believe, the hearer is now more instructed, if the tempter could be corrected then.

Christ summed up the entire law in a brief commandment.

Indeed, let us first consider how he inquired about one command, desiring to know which command in the law was not only singular but also great; the Lord, however, responded not with one, but with two commands. For perhaps he, having heard which was great, might seek many following ones; but the Lord, lest after the great command more would be sought, added one more, in order that it might be fulfilled what had been prophesied so long before: "For the Lord will make a short and complete word upon the earth." Now it happens, this reading is completed. For there are many precepts of the law, and as an incomprehensible forest, the commandments sprout through all the pages. And who could fulfill those which no one can retain in mind? But the Lord Christ, full of mercy, just as He showed Himself great in a brief body, so He concluded the broad law in a brief command. In that brevity of body, we have the whole Son of God; in the brevity of those commands, we hold the whole law of God. Mercy has ended sloth. Do not think about how long you will learn, but rather how you will do quickly what you have learned. On explaining the Word of God.

You shall love, he said, the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your mind. This is the first and greatest commandment. And the second, he said, is like unto it. You shall love your neighbor as yourself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets. Why do you stretch yourself with the spreading of branches? Hold to these roots, and the whole tree is in your hand. The Lord briefly intimated this, as we see; we are compelled to say more about these two commandments. Or perhaps we are not compelled, and what we heard from the Lord is sufficient? Certainly, it is sufficient, but not for everyone. For the greater a person is, the more what is briefly said is sufficient. The great seek brevity; the small, because they understand less, desire more. We fear to offend the fastidiousness of the former, and we do not wish to burden the weakness of the latter. Nevertheless, if we remain silent, those who understand less will complain; let those who already understand bear with us so that those who do not yet understand may take hold of us. The commandment of love is presented differently in the Gospel and in Paul.

