Description

A.W. Tozer emphasizes the significance of how we interpret the world around us, contrasting the past view of life as a battleground with the modern perspective that sees it as a place for enjoyment. He argues that our interpretation shapes our reality, and with the shift in worldview, Christians must reassess their spiritual philosophy according to biblical teachings. Tozer warns that this reexamination is crucial, as it influences our lives and the choices we make in a world that is often misinterpreted.

Transcript

If you have ever given much thought to this present world in which we live, you have some idea of the power of interpretation. The world is a stable fact, quite unchanged by the passing of years, but how different is modern man's view of the world from the view our fathers held. The world is for all of us not only what it is; it is what we believe it to be, and a tremendous load of wealth or woe rides on the soundness of our interpretation! In the earlier days, when Christianity exercised a dominant influence over American thinking, men conceded this world to be a battleground. Man, so our fathers held, had to choose sides. He could not be neutral-for him it must be life or death, heaven or hell!

In our day, the interpretation has changed completely.

We are not here to fight, but to frolic! We are not in a hostile foreign land; we are at home! It now becomes the bounden duty of every Christian to reexamine his spiritual philosophy in the light of the Bible. So much depends on this that we cannot afford to be careless about it!
