

Misreading God's Self-Revelation

by A.W. Tozer

---

Humans are naturally inclined to error, but divine revelation through the Holy Spirit is necessary to complete our understanding of God.

Scripture: Psalm 19:1, Romans 1:20

Topics: "Understanding God", "Divine Revelation"

Description

A.W. Tozer emphasizes that humans are naturally inclined to heresy and error, instinctively gravitating towards falsehoods. While natural theology reveals some truth about God's glory through creation, it remains insufficient for a complete understanding of God. Tozer argues that divine revelation through Scripture is essential to fill in the details of God's nature and character, allowing the Holy Spirit to illuminate the full picture of truth. He highlights the importance of relying on God's Word to gain a deeper and more accurate understanding of Him.

Transcript

We are all heretics by nature and take to error as instinctively as ducks take to water.

This does not mean that natural theology is wholly false, for the heavens declare the glory of God and the visible universe shows His eternal power and Godhead. Add to these the presence in the human heart of that light that lights every man that comes into the world, and you have the source of a certain body of truth known more or less clearly by the whole human race.

The knowledge thus received, however, is inadequate; it forms little more than a frame for the total picture. The details are all unknown and undiscoverable, so that we must depend upon divine revelation as given in the holy Scriptures to fill in the particulars and render the picture intelligible. The brush of the Holy Spirit labors to complete the work and to show every hill and rock and tree and blade of grass, each in its proper relation to everything else.
