Description

Frederick W. Robertson preaches about the dangers of worldliness, emphasizing the need to detach from outward, transitory, and unreal things in the world. He explains that love for the inward, eternal, and true aspects of life must replace the love for worldly pleasures, as one affection will naturally displace the other. Robertson highlights that experiencing the kingdom within leads to a fading love for superficial emotions and a shift towards true blessedness. He stresses that encountering the beauty of the King and embracing truth transforms one's perspective on worldly pursuits, making them insignificant in comparison to the everlasting love of the Father.

Transcript

"Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world" (1 John 2:15).

Worldliness then consists in these three things:--Attachment to the Outward--attachment to the Transitory--attachment to the Unreal: in opposition to love for the Inward, the Eternal, the True: and the one of these affections is necessarily expelled by the other. If a man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him. But let a man once feel the power of the kingdom that is within, and then the love fades of that emotion whose life consists only in the thrill of a nerve, or the vivid sensation of a feeling: he loses his happiness and wins his blessedness.

Let a man get but one glimpse of the King in His beauty, and then the forms and shapes of things here, are to him but the types of an invisible loveliness: types which he is content should break and fade. Let but a man feel truth--that goodness is greatness--that there is no other greatness--and then the degrading reverence with which the titled of this world bow before wealth, and the ostentation with which the rich of this world profess their familiarity with title: all the pride of life, what is it to him? The love of the Inward--Everlasting, Real--the love, that is, of the Father, annihilates the love of the world.
