Description

Thomas Brooks emphasizes the profound power of tears in his sermon 'Tears Have Tongues,' illustrating that tears are not silent but rather have a voice that reaches the ears of God. He explains that penitent tears serve as powerful prayers, acting as ambassadors that bring forth grace and mercy from the throne of God. Brooks highlights that even in silence, tears can plead for pardon and mercy, making them a unique form of communication with the divine.

Transcript

"The Lord has heard the voice of my weeping."

Psalm 6:8

Tears are not mutes. Tears have a voice. Tears have tongues. Tears can speak. There is no prayer compared to those which secret tears make in the ears of God. Tears make the most forcible entry into the ears of the great God of heaven.

Penitent tears are undeniable ambassadors which never return from the throne of grace without a gracious answer. Tears are a kind of silent prayers, which, though they say nothing--yet they obtain pardon; and though they plead not a man's cause

--yet they obtain mercy at the hands of God.
