Transcript

On the 20th of August 1912, William Booth, God's soldier, laid down his sword. Congress Hall, London. Townsend came to pay tribute.

Last time, he leaves the army headquarters in Queen Victoria Street. Through the streets of London, his funeral procession passed, through the city of which he was Freeman. The flags of nations invaded by the army were carried proudly at the head of the column.

The whole traffic of this metropolis was arrested by one of the densest multitudes that ever thronged its thoroughfare. As the carriage passed the mansion house, the Lord Mayor of London saluted the coffin. Ten thousand men and women from the ranks of the Salvation Army, specially selected to represent their comrades, walked behind their promoted leader, who had taught them to give their lives ministering to the poorest, the lowliest, and the lost.
